

Accidental Surrogate for Alpha

Chapter 1 – Betray

Ella

“I’m sorry Ella.” My physician says gently. “I’m afraid you have very few viable eggs remaining. Frankly, I normally see these numbers in women ten or fifteen years your senior.”

“What?” I murmur, not believing my ears. I’ve been trying to get pregnant for years. I’m only 30, I should have plenty of eggs left.

“In terms of fertility, you have very little time left.” She continues. “If you want to conceive, you need to do so before your next cycle begins.”

“My next cycle?” I repeat, my mouth hanging open in shock. I love kids more than anything, and though it might not be everyone’s ambition, I want nothing more than to be a mother.

I have to get home and tell my boyfriend this news, and there’s not a moment to waste.

I make it home in record time, bursting through the door and opening my mouth to call for Mike, but stopping dead in my tracks. As soon as I walk inside I see a pair of high heels and a handbag by the door — neither of which belong to me.

Even if I could find a man willing to have a baby with me in time, I’m not eager to trust anyone after Mike’s betrayal. I’m going to have to do this on my own, and I know Cora can help me. I don’t have much money, but I have enough savings to pay for the insemination, especially since I basically have one shot and one shot only.

When I arrive, all my plans to lay out my situation for Cora clearly and concisely go out the window, because the moment I see my sister I fall to pieces. She hugs and kisses me until my tears subside, slowly extracting the story from me piece by piece. When she hears about Mike and Kate she swears up a storm, but that’s nothing compared to her reaction when I explain about my fertility.

“That little shit! I’ll kill him!” She fumes, studying me with a worried expression. “Ella, if your doctor was right this means you only have one chance to conceive.”

“I know.” I sniffle. “And if this is going to be my only baby, I don’t want to take any chances. I want the best donor we can find.”

“Don’t you worry about that.” Cora assures me, “We’ve got donations from actors, models, scientists — it’s only the creme de la creme here.” She glances at the door and lowers her voice. “You didn’t hear it from me, but even Dominic Sinclair sent his samples here for testing.”

"Dominic Sinclair? I repeat, "the billionaire?" I've seen the man around town, but we don't exactly run in the same circles. He lives in the same neighborhood as my wealthy employer and often says hello to the children I nanny, but he's always surrounded by bodyguards and is so intimidating I get goosebumps just thinking about him.

"Oh my god." Cora slaps her hand over her mouth. "I wasn't supposed to tell you that! I don't know what I was thinking. Apparently he's no stranger to fertility issues himself, and he trusted us to handle his swimmers over every other lab in the country. I've got his sperm in the other room at this very moment." She frets, "But Ella you can't tell anyone, you have to promise me."

"Of course!" I agree immediately. "I know how important confidentiality is here."

"Thank you," Cora breathes. "Now, I'm going to give you a dossier of our clients so you can pick a donor, and once you've chosen we'll get you knocked up before you can even blink."

It's not an easy decision, but eventually I choose a handsome surgeon whose photo practically makes me swoon. Cora leaves the room only long enough to prepare the sample, and though she looks a bit flustered when she returns, she quickly and professionally completes the insemination, holding my hand when the procedure is finished. "It's all take care of now, Ella." She promises, "You can come back in ten days to see if it worked."

Ten days. I think dazedly. Ten days to decide my entire future.

If only I'd known that by the time those ten days were up, my future would no longer belong to me — but to Dominic Sinclair himself.

Chapter 2 – Be Fired

Ella

Six days to go.

I think, staring at the date circled on my calendar.

Six days until I find out if my dreams are finally going to come true... or if I have to figure out an entirely different plan for my life.

I've thought about nothing else since Cora inseminated me last week, I'm so anxious to find out if I'm pregnant I haven't even begun to process Mike's betrayal.

I'm trying to keep a level head, yet I can't help but imagine my future with this new baby. Try as I might, I catch myself daydreaming about it constantly. I even find myself humming as I get ready for work in the morning.

When I arrive at my employer's estate in the most exclusive neighborhood in Moon Valley – which basically makes it the most exclusive neighborhood in the world, since Moon Valley is one of the most expensive cities on the planet – I'm immediately greeted by two little voices shouting my name in excitement. "Ella!"

The next thing I know, 3-year-old Millie is hugging my legs while her older brother, Jake, wraps his arms around my middle. "Good morning love puddles!" I exclaim, returning their hugs. "Are you ready for the museum?"

"Yeah!" They cheer, racing out the door without even stopping to put on coats. It takes a bit of wrangling to get them back inside and bundled up for the cold winter day, but before long we set out into the snow.

Jake races ahead of Millie and I, impatient to get to the science museum and not seeming to notice that his sister's tiny legs simply don't move that fast. Chuckling, I lift Millie into my arms and settle her on my hip. "Goodness, you're getting too big for this, munchkin."

"Nuh-uh," Millie grins, "You're just too little."

She might have a point. At five foot one, I don't exactly have the kind of build suited to heavy lifting. I'm in great shape, but I've never been particularly strong. "Smarty pants." I tease, laughing with the little girl.

When I look back towards Jake, I realize he's stopped a few feet ahead of us. My heart skips a beat when I realize why. We're in front of the Sinclair mansion, and its owner is currently standing in the middle of the sidewalk, his gaze searing me like a firebrand as I approach with Millie. Dominic Sinclair is just about the most handsome man I've ever seen, but he's also one of the most terrifying.

With dark hair and piercing green eyes, chiseled features and a body so muscular I could swoon, it doesn't seem fair he gets to look so good and also be so rich. If I didn't know better I might think it was his wealth or imposing height that makes him so intimidating, after all he's at least six foot four, which means he towers over me and everyone else around him. However it's neither of those things, there's simply an indefinable quality about the man that I can't put my finger on, one which screams danger

. He gives off this energy that's so raw and animalistic one forgets there's anyone else in the room.

Taking a steadying breath, I close the distance between us so Millie can say hello. When she greets him, Dominic drags his attention from me and offers her a smile so genuine that it tugs at my heartstrings. As I watch him talk to my two young charges, I remember what Cora told me about his infertility struggles. He clearly loves children, and I feel a wave of empathy for him. If anyone knows what it's like to yearn for a family of their own, it's me.

Jake is currently showing Dominic his new toy airplane, pulling the matchbox model from his pocket and demonstrating how far it can fly. With a great heave, he sends the toy gliding through the air, only to land in the middle of the street. Before any of us can say a word, Jake races after it, right into the busy road.

"Jake no, be careful!" I cry, watching him dart out into the path of an oncoming car but feeling frozen by my fear. Before I can contemplate putting Millie down to go after him, a blur of movement whirrs past my vision. I've never seen anyone move so fast in my life. Dominic became little more than a hazy outline of himself, chasing after Jake and pulling him out of the way just before the car slams into them. The vehicle's tires are still screeching when Dominic sets Jake down beside me, his expression suddenly very stern.

"That was very dangerous." He scolds gently. "You should never go into the street without looking both ways first."

Jake hangs his head. "I'm sorry, I didn't want my plane to get runned over."

"You are a million times more important than a toy." Dominic tells him firmly, "and you scared your nanny half to death."

"I'm sorry, Ella." Jake sniffles, looking up at me with wide eyes.

"I know sweetheart, just don't ever do that again." I breathe, cuddling him against my side. "Thank you so much." I say to Dominic, feeling more grateful than I can express. "I have no idea how you moved so fast! It was like something out of a superhero film."

"Must have been the adrenaline." Dominic shrugs, giving Millie another smile before taking his leave. "Enjoy the rest of your day, and stay out of the road young man!"

"Yes sir!" Jake calls after him, pocketing his airplane. "I really am sorry." He adds to me.

"It's forgotten." I tell him softly, though I take his hand so that he can't run off again.

"It all happened so fast." I tell Cora later that night. "I mean the more I think about it, the more amazing it seems. One moment he was there, and the next he was gone. It was like magic."

"Thank goodness Jake is alright." She replies, but rather than looking relieved, her face is twisted into a deep grimace.

Studying my sister's expression, I realize her grim demeanor is not just about Jake's near miss. Something else is wrong, and I actually feel guilty for not noticing sooner. "Is everything okay?"

Cora frowns, "Not really. But you've got so much going on right now, it's not important."

"Cora, don't be ridiculous." I admonish. "What's going on?"

"Well, speaking of Dominic Sinclair," She begins cryptically, "you know that sperm he sent to us for testing?"

"Yeah," I confirm, wondering where on earth this was going.

"It's gone missing... and I'm the last person who saw it, not to mention it was in my custody." She explains, her voice becoming thick with emotion. "Ella, I think... I think I'm going to be fired. And if there's an investigation I could lose my medical license."

"What?" I exclaim. "What do you mean it's missing? A vial of sperm can't just get up and walk away."

"I know, I think someone had to steal it, but there's no way of knowing who's responsible. And it looks like I'm going to have to take the blame." She shares, her eyes shining with tears.

"Cora, I can't believe you didn't tell me this sooner!" I lament, "They can't fire you, it isn't fair.”

“You don’t understand, Dominic is one of our biggest donors.” Cora explains. “And he’s furious, he basically wants my head on a platter.”

A week ago I might have believed there was no hope for Cora, but seeing how kind and understanding Dominic was with the kids today makes me wonder if he could really be so heartless. Surely if he understood that Cora would never be so irresponsible he’d show some leniency? I have to try and help her, I would do anything for my sister – even begging a ruthless billionaire for mercy.

Chapter 3 – Request

Ella

Three days to go. I repeat these words to myself as I walk down the street, still preoccupied with my possible pregnancy, even as I prepare to go to bat for my sister. In some ways it's a coping mechanism: I'm about to beg Dominic Sinclair to save Cora's job, and I need a comforting thought to help me get through this.

His bodyguards see me first, and I can see their mouths moving as they watch me move closer, no doubt notifying him of my presence. Approaching nervously behind Dominic, I wonder for the hundredth time if this is a mistake. Who am I to ask a favor from one of the most powerful men on the planet? Shaking myself, I tell the little voice in the back of my mind to shut up – this is for Cora. I might not be brave for myself, but I can be brave for her.

"Mr. Sinclair?" I ask hesitantly, feeling my heart pound violently against my ribcage.

He turns around and gazes imperiously down at me. "Yes?"

"I'm Ella Reina, I nanny for Jake and Millie Graves." I begin, gnawing on my lower lip.

His dark eyes catch on my mouth, and suddenly I feel like a frightened rabbit in front of a hungry wolf. "I know who you are, Ella." The sound of my name on his lips sends a shiver down my spine. He speaks the familiar syllables with so much purpose, as if they truly mean something to him.

"Oh... well, I don't mean to be impertinent, but I'm friends with Dr Cora Daniels..." As soon as I say her name, his expression closes off, and some unidentified emotion flashes in his eyes.

"She told me she's in trouble at work, and I know you're one of the bank's donors." I improvise. "I don't know what Cora is being accused of, but I'm sure she's innocent. She takes her job incredibly seriously, and she would never do anything to risk her career."

"And what do you expect me to do about it?" Dominic asks ominously. I can tell he doesn't believe my weak story, his body language has changed completely, and I can feel his rising anger vibrating in the air around us.

"I just thought... I hoped that if you had any sway there, you might be able to put in a good word for her." I finish, feeling color flood my cheeks. I'm both ashamed of myself for such a feeble attempt, but unsure how else to handle such a delicate topic. The last thing I want is to get Cora in even more trouble than before.

Dominic's jaw ticks as he watches me, and the voice in the back of my head urges me to run for it. “From what I’ve heard, your friend made a very serious mistake, and the consequences have been more than appropriate. The best thing she can do now is take responsibility for her mistakes, not sending you to do her dirty work for her.”

“I – she didn’t, she doesn’t even know I’m here! I swear.” I plead.

“I’ve said all I’m going to say on this matter.” Dominic declares, turning away from me and striding into his house. The door slams shut behind him, and I’m left with his various bodyguards.

“You need to leave now, miss.” One of the men announces sharply.

“I can’t.” I moan, “he has to understand, she’s going to lose everything!”

“We’re not going to ask you again.” A second guard growls, a clear threat in his words.

“Please, she’s innocent.” I beg, “you have to –” before I can say anything more, the men grab me by the arms and begin trying to lead me off the property. Feeling truly desperate, I dig in my heels, deciding that my dignity is worth Cora’s entire future. “I’m begging you, if I could just talk to Mr. Sinclair.”

“You’ve already talked to him.” The first guard grumbles, “and frankly you’re lucky he was as generous to you as he was. Your friend clearly told you things she shouldn’t.”

The next thing I know, they’ve thrown me off the property and onto the sidewalk so forcefully that I lose my balance, tumbling to the ground as tears spark in my eyes. The iron gates slam shut behind me, and I have no choice but to slink off before I can embarrass myself further.

Of course, this was only the beginning of my misfortune. When I arrived at work the next day, I found that my keys no longer fit the locks on the front door. I knocked, overwhelmed with confusion, and a few minutes later the door swung open to reveal Jake and Millie’s furious mother.

“My keys aren’t working.” I tell her, wondering why she’s glaring at me so fiercely.

“They’re not meant to.” She answers coldly, “as of yesterday afternoon, your services were no longer required.”

“I... you’re firing me?” I squeak, not believing my ears. “Why?”

“We got a call from the neighbors.” She explains haughtily, “apparently you let Jake run into the road the other day where he was almost hit by a car! And then yesterday you were seen making a fool of yourself at Dominic Sinclair’s home – they said his bodyguards had to drag you off the grounds like a common criminal.”

“That isn’t fair, that isn’t what happened!” I plead. “Jake through his toy into the road and ran after it, I didn’t let it happen, and what happened with Mr. Sinclair was a misunderstanding.”

“I don’t want to hear it.” She hisses. “Now leave before I call the police.”

“Please, can’t I at least say goodbye to the kids?” I request, praying she’ll grant me this one kindness.

“I’m dialing.” She tells me simply, pulling her cell phone from her pocket.

“No!” I raise my palms in supplication, “It’s okay, I’ll go.”

For the second time this week, I find myself shamefully retreating through this opulent neighborhood with tears streaming down my face. What hurts even worse than losing my job is the fact I didn’t get to explain the situation to Jake and Millie, or see them one last time. I’m sure their mother will tell them horrible things about me, despite the fact that I’ve been lovingly raising for them for the last two years.

I know Dominic Sinclair is responsible for this. I don’t believe my ex-boss’s story about the neighbors for one moment. He clearly wanted to punish me, just like he’s having Cora punished. A rush of fury takes hold of me, and suddenly I wish I could punish him somehow. It’s not like me to be so vindictive, but right now it truly feels like my entire life is falling apart, and it’s partly his fault.

I spent all my money on the insemination, and without a job I have almost nothing. How am I ever going to afford to have a baby now? I guarantee I’m not going to get a good reference from Jake and Millie’s mother.

As if things weren’t already bad enough, when I return home I find a stack of bills in the mailbox and I don’t even recognize half the senders. I open them one by one, feeling my confusion and disbelief grow by the minute.

As I look at the stores on the breakdown of charges, my suspicion grows: they’re all Mike’s favorite places. Is it possible he did this behind my back? That he’s been hiding the bills from me for months... or years? I know he’ll deny it if I confront him, which leaves me only one option.

I have to call Kate. My former best friend might have betrayed me completely with her affair, but if anyone knows what Mike has been up to, it’s her.

Chapter 4 – Desperation

Ella

My hands are shaking as I dial Kate's number. Have I ever been this angry? If I have I certainly can't remember it now.

"Hello?" Kate answers almost immediately, using a sickly sweet tone that screams of fakeness.

"Kate?" I state bluntly. "Are you with Mike right now?"

There's a pregnant pause on the other end of the line, before she weakly responds, "What? Of course not."

"Come off it Kate, do you really think I don't know about your st?" I demand. "I'm not a complete idiot."

"Ella listen—" She begins, obviously gearing up to give me some sort of excuse.

"No, I don't even care about your little affair anymore – but I need to talk to him right now." I declare fiercely.

There's another pause, and then Kate's voice drops its innocent tone. "You don't care?" She repeats, sounding truly shocked. "You know I'm already pregnant?"

I wasn't prepared for that particular piece of news. I clench my hands into fists, feeling so furious I think I might actually break the phone with my tight grip, "And what, you think that's some sort of victory?" I bite.

"Does he know you're pregnant?" I ask sharply, "because a man who's so afraid of responsibility that he'd poison me for years is probably willing to do it to anyone."

"Well no, but he loves me, he would never –" She tried to explain.

"He loved me too once." I cut her off. "At least he said he did. It's amazing how charming he can be, considering what a bastard he truly is. How do you think he's going to support you and your child? He doesn't even have a job."

"Of course he does!" She objects, "He just didn't tell you about it because he didn't want you to bleed him dry. He's a stock broker."

"Oh Kate," I sigh, "Poor, gullible, stupid Kate. He's as much a stock broker as I am a wizard."

“Don’t talk to me like that! He’s got money, he lavishes it on me all the time!” She insists.

“With fraudulent credit cards he took out in my name!” I shout, losing my temper completely.

“What?” She squeaks.

“That’s right. I’ve only just found out – he’s completely bankrupted me. I’m calling the police and if I were you, I’d check your own credit rating immediately, because I’d be willing to be you’re next.” I snap.

“No,” she repeats weakly, “you’re wrong, it’s different with me.”

My voice is getting thick with emotion now, but I can’t help it. “And frankly I don’t really care what happens to you Kate, but if you’re really pregnant then your baby deserves better than to be raised in a homeless shelter, and that’s exactly where Mike will land you.”

I hang up before I start crying, not giving her a chance to respond. Why did I buy his lies about looking for work for so long? He crushed me little by little, all the while pretending to be so nice, and I let it happen.

Never again. I decide. I won’t ever let myself be fooled that way again.

I still want to get my revenge on Mike, but first I’ve got to try and salvage what’s left of my life. I have to go to the police and see if I can resolve these financial issues... I can’t have a baby if I’m bankrupt, and I can only pray the police will help.

“I’m very sorry Miss. Reina, but if your ex-partner has left the area, there’s not much we can do about this.” The police officer breaks this news to me about as gently as he might smash an ant beneath his boot. “I’ll give you the police report to send to the credit card company, but that’s the most help you’re going to get from us.”

Anger fills me to the brim. I guarantee he’d never treat my case with so little consideration or respect if I wasn’t an impoverished nanny. If I was a wealthy man like Dominic Sinclair, he’d be fawning at my feet, offering to go to any lengths to solve my problems. I storm out of the station before I can lose my temper and verbally assault the man, immediately calling the credit card companies.

One by one they crush my hopes, telling me in no uncertain terms that unless a culprit is arrested in my case, I’ll be held responsible for the charges.

As I hang up on the final call, I can feel the earth crumbling beneath my feet. How did it come to this? I literally have nothing. No one will hire me without a recommendation from my previous employer, which means I won't be able to pay rent or keep food on the table. Normally I might turn to Cora in such a time, but I can't burden her with this when she's in the same boat.

Tomorrow I'll finally find out whether or not I'm pregnant, and up until now the strange sensation I've been experiencing the last few days has been a comfort and source of hope. I don't know how to explain it: it's as if I'm suddenly different somehow – even though I can't see any changes, I just have this intense knowing that I'm no longer the same woman I was a week ago.

I thought it was a sign the insemination worked, but now I'm praying that it's my imagination going overboard.

At first I try to distract myself, turning on the TV and freezing when I see Dominic Sinclair on the news talking about all his good will initiatives in the community. "When our work is finished, the Moon Valley children's home will be a place of love and community, motivated to find the best homes for every child in need. Our initiative not only ensures that the permanent residents in the home have the best possible conditions, but that there is continuous follow up with children placed with adoptive families to ensure they thrive in their new homes."

So much for the supposed philanthropist, I think bitterly. Turning a blind eye to the lives he's selfishly ruining all the while pretending to be a friend of the downtrodden. A week ago I might have been touched by such a broadcast. I grew up in an orphanage just like the one he's describing, and I know just how terrible the conditions can be. Now however, I see nothing but his hypocrisy. Cora was an orphan too, she didn't do anything wrong – where is his compassion for her? Clearly it's only for the TV cameras. It's a shame. He's very convincing... then again, so was Mike.

Of course Mike was never as handsome as Dominic Sinclair, nor did he ever have his charisma or imposing presence. I don't know if I've ever met anyone like him. Even while he was refusing to help me, scolding me and having me thrown out the door, part of me was still taken in by his handsome features and pure magnetism.

Shaking myself, I turn the TV off. What the hell is wrong with me? The man is a heartless billionaire and I'm still sitting here mooning over him like a silly schoolgirl.

I end up going to bed early, trying not to think about tomorrow. Of course, I still lie awake late into the night – I know what it means to grow up an orphan, and I can't countenance bringing a child into the world just to abandon it to that bleak existence. The more my life unravels, the more stark my options become.

If I am pregnant... Am I going to abort the child? Even though it's what I've wanted my entire life!

Chapter 5 – Pregnancy test

Ella

“No, I understand.” I murmur into the phone. “Thanks for listening at least.”

I wearily hang up the line, burying my head in my hands. I spent all morning calling in every favor and loan I possibly could, throwing my dignity right out the window to beg my friends and acquaintances in my time of need.

I've never thought of myself as a proud woman, but begging this way was more of a challenge than I could have imagined.

I only wish I could help Cora as well as myself. She's still waiting to hear if she'll be fired, and while she's not supposed to be handling any samples, she got permission to do my tests this afternoon. After all, I've already been inseminated, so her supervisor didn't see any risk of further negligence.

Still, I'm far from excited when I walk through the front doors of the sperm bank. Ten days ago I was heartsore but optimistic for the future, yearning for a baby more than anything else in the world. Now I'm dreading the exam.

However my trepidation soon gives way to surprise, because as soon as I enter the facility I have the strangest feeling that Dominic Sinclair is near. It takes me a while to actually find him, behind closed doors with Cora's bosses in a luxurious, glass-walled conference room, but I don't have the faintest idea how I knew he was present. I also don't understand why I feel drawn to him: after all, he's ruined both my sister's and my own life. I shouldn't be excited to see him.

It was dumb luck that I stumbled across his path, the conference room is on the way to Cora's office, but I find myself stopping to observe the meeting inside. I'm struck speechless when I lay eyes on him. Is it possible that he's gotten more attractive since the last time I saw him? It was already unfair that somebody that powerful and intelligent could be so handsome, but now it truly just feels like being kicked while I'm down. The bastard has a heart of stone, and still the universe has rained endless gifts upon him while people like Cora and I have nothing.

Shaking myself out of my trance, I continue down the hall, though I feel the weight of dark eyes on my back as I retreat. Cora has clearly been crying when I arrive. Her eyes are red and her cheeks splotchy, though she tries to hide it.

“Hey.” I greet her gently, wrapping her up in a hug. She leans into me, squeezing tight and lingering far longer than she usually would. “Is there any news?”

“Sinclair is in there finalizing it all now. I'm going to be given formal termination notice this afternoon." She shares, sniffing slightly.

"I'm so sorry, honey." I croon, rubbing her back.

"It's okay." She lies, pulling away. "How are you hanging in there?"

"Not very well." I confess. "I'm sort of dreading this, to be honest."

"It's amazing how fast things can change, huh?" She asks, looking as though she might burst into tears. "I mean, what are we going to do, Elle?"

"Well figure it out." I promise. "We've been in tight spots before." I remind her, "remember the summer we slept in boxes on the street after we ran away from the orphanage?"

"Yeah," She nods with a sad smile. "But it's winter now, I don't think we'll last long in the elements. And you weren't pregnant then."

"Yeah well, if I'm pregnant now...." I can't look her in the eyes as I say this, "I don't think I'm going to stay that way."

"What?" Cora exclaims, looking horrified. "But this is your only chance! And we aren't completely hopeless, you've got time to try to figure out a plan B."

That phrase alone reminds me of Mike, and I realize I haven't shared my latest news with Cora. "I can't afford a baby even if I do find a job. I'm going to be paying off my debts for years to come." I share, filling her in on the details of Mike and Kate's latest betrayal.

"I can't believe this!" She bursts out when I'm finished. "It just isn't fair, Ella! I mean, I thought we paid our dues, I thought we were done with suffering. After everything we've been through, we deserve a better future than this! You deserve to be a mom – no one loves children more than you do."

"And you deserve to be a doctor." I reply. "You worked so hard."

"I still don't think you should give up yet." She frowns. "You can terminate the pregnancy up until the end of the first trimester. It would be a tragedy if you aborted it, then pulled off a miracle and it turned out you could have kept it. Don't take that risk. Keep the baby until the very last moment."

"I don't think miracles happen to people like me." I remark softly. "Besides that seems kind of like it's own form of torture – the longer I carry the baby the more attached I'm going to get. I don't want this to hurt any worse than it has to."

"It's going to hurt no matter what." Cora reasons, "You ought to give yourself a chance – keep the door open. Don't give up hope completely."

"Let's just find out if I have to make that decision in the first place." I state, changing the subject. "I may not even be pregnant." Yet even as I say it, I can feel in my heart that I am.

"Okay." Cora agrees, pulling a sterile cup wrapped in plastic from one of her cabinets. "You know what to do."

I take the cup and quickly duck into the bathroom to provide a urine sample, returning it to her almost immediately. I pace back and forth across the office as Cora runs the tests. "Well?" I press, seeing the results pop up on her computer screen.

She offers me a sad smile. "Congratulations little sister, you're going to have a baby."

I told myself that I wouldn't fall to pieces no matter the results, but as soon as the words are out of her mouth I'm crying. I've been waiting to hear those words for years and was beginning to think I never would. It's both unimaginable joy, and unimaginable pain. I never knew my heart could hold such conflicting emotions at the same time, let alone in such extremes. "Really?"

"Really." Cora confirms, hugging me. "Come on, let's do an ultrasound. You can hear the heartbeat."

"Isn't it too early?" I squeak.

"Just one of the benefits of being at the finest lab in the country." Cora quips, the words bittersweet on her tongue. "Our technology is years ahead of what's available in public hospitals."

Climbing onto the raised exam table, I lay back and lift my top, not bothering to change into a gown or cover my clothes with a sheet, I simply expose my flat belly as Cora wheels in an ultrasound on a cart. Within minutes the machine is emitting a strange whoosh woosh woosh, and Cora squirts a dollop of jelly on my tummy. She pressed the wand to my skin, and before long a tiny heartbeat sounds – making me cry all over again.

However Cora is frowning deeply. "This is so strange, the baby seems awfully large, but we tested you at your last visit to be sure you weren't already pregnant."

"What does that mean?" I ask anxiously. "Is the father just a big guy?"

“I don’t just mean size – I mean development.” Cora purses her lips and furrows her brows as she studies the images, suddenly looking very worried. She’s whispering now, speaking to herself more than to me. “It doesn’t look human... but that can’t be... it’s not possible.”

“What are you talking about?” I inquire, “How can you tell? Isn’t it just a tiny blob?”

“As I said, our tech is state of the art. It doesn’t just highlight shapes – it analyzes the molecular structure.” Before she can say another word, the door bursts open, startling us both. To my shock and horror, Dominic Sinclair is standing in the doorway, glaring at us as if we’ve done something terrible. “What’s the meaning of this?” He demands.

“What’s the meaning of this? I repeat in shock, “what’s the meaning of you barging into a private exam?!”

“Because,” He declares fiercely, and I swear his eyes are almost glowing with rage. “I can smell my pup.”

Chapter 6 – He's a werewolf

Ella

“Your pup?” I parrot, realizing I must sound like an idiot the way I keep repeating him – but it’s all too strange and surreal, I feel like ‘m having a dream — one that may or may not be a nightmare. “What are you talking about?”

I might have been admiring his physical prowess a little while ago, but now I’m back to thinking Dominic Sinclair is just plain terrifying. I’ve known my fair share of bad men, but none of them have ever intimidated me the way he does. It’s like he’s superhuman, giving off waves of energy that make me want to curl up into a little ball at his feet.

“You.” He narrows his eyes at Cora, then gestures to me. “Is this what you did with my sperm, you inseminated your friend?”

‘Of course not!’ She objects hotly, though there’s a noted shake in her voice. “Yes, I inseminated Ella last week, but not with your sperm. She chose a donor from our client dossier.

You’re lying.” He accuses, stating the accusation as if it’s fact. “Ella clearly knew about the samples – since she came to plead your case -“

“You did that?” Cora blinks at me

“Yes, but I was only trying to help. I thought he might show you mercy if he realized you would never do anything to risk your career” I apologize, “I’m so sorry, I just wanted to help.

“It’s okay.” She tells me gently, patting my hand and turning back to Sinclair. “That doesn’t mean anything... mean, yes I inseminated her on the same day your sample disappeared but... no – it’s not possible, your sample was in a separate fridge...” She trails off again, looking back at the ultrasound screen with wide eyes Oh my god...

What?” I inquire, beyond confused.

“It’s not human.” She murmurs again, so quietly I can barely hear her. Suddenly she whirls around, looking up at Dominic Sinclair with true fear. “I swear, I didn’t do it on purpose. I don’t know how it happened!”

“Why do you keep saying that it’s not human?” I question, beyond exasperated. “What else could it be – an alien?”

‘Don’t pretend like you don’t know.’ The infuriated man growls. “Don’t pretend like you two didn’t plan this precisely for this reason.”

Cora's hand is shaking on mine now. "Ella, when I told you about the samples, I only told you half the story. She explains. "I had to sign a thousand confidentiality documents, because certain secrets came along with running tests on Mr. Sinclair's samples."

"What secrets?" I demand, feeling as if everyone around me is speaking in code.

"He's not..." She begins, glancing at the huge man nervously. "He's not human... he's a werewolf."

Before I can stop myself, I burst out into laughter. "No really, what is it?"

"Really." Cora whispers urgently. "He's a werewolf."

"Cora" I tell her, almost certain I'm dreaming now. "Werewolves aren't real.

I didn't believe they were either." She confesses, "until I started working here. This lab is as renowned as it is because there's two sides of the business. Half of our bank is dedicated to shifter samples, in fact very few humans work here because so few are trusted with the truth

I'm starting to truly worry for my sister, "Are you high?" ask under my breath

"He's not high" Sinclair rumbles drawing my attention back to his face. Now I'm sure his eyes are glowing with light, The evidence is right in front of me, but my brain can't figure out how to process it, Instead it shuts down. I feel a sudden wave of terror wash over me

When I wake, Cora is gone. I sit up on the exam table, trying to remember what happened. Of course it doesn't take long for me to recall the strange events that came to pass. because Dominic Sinclair is sitting in front of me. watching me closely, His eyes aren't glowing anymore. but I remember the way they'd lit up from within, I also remember the way he'd moved faster than should have been possible to rescue Jake. At the time I wrote it off as adrenaline but now I'm not so sure.

"How are you feeling, Ella?" He asks me, much calmer than he'd seemed earlier

"I think I'm losing my mind." I answer weakly. "This can't be real."

"It is real" He assures me. "Your friend should never have agreed to let you try to entrap me when she knew the truth."

.I just wanted a baby.” I arqut(ora didntlet me do anythina and wasn+ trwina to entrar

Please.” He scoffs, “I’ve had my men run your background, I know you’re bankrupt. Obviously you thoughtthat if you were pregnant with my child I would pay your debts for you. You simply miscalculated – you didn’t know what you were getting yourself into, or expect Cora to lose her job for the “mistake.” The horrible marhas the nerve to use air quotes around bis final word.

That’s insane!” I hiss. “I didn’t bankrupt myself- my identity was stolen and I didn’t even know about it untiafter the insemination. I’m not an irresponsible person, or the type of woman who expects a man to solve he problems. I would never do what you’re suggesting.

I don’t want to hear your excuses.” He answers harshly. “The evidence is against you.”

“We don’t even know that it’s your child!” I remind him. “Maybe it isn’t…” I have to give myself a shake before can continue. “Maybe it isn’t human, but that doesn’t mean it’s yours.

“I know it’s mine.” Sinclair snarls, making me tremble with instinctive fear. “I can smell it, I can sense my bloodline in your womb.

can only gape at him. He can smell it? Sense his bloodline? It’s like I’ve left reality and entered a differenuniverse. “This is crazy” I can feel myself sliding back into denial, “if werewolves were real. people wouldknow about it!”

Sinclair rolls his eyes and lifts a hand the size of a dinner plate. While I watch, five claws extend where hisfingernails were a moment ago. I stare at the odd and slightly sickening sight with abject disbelief. “How areyou doing that?”

“I’m going to give you the benefit of the doubt and assume that’s your shock speaking, rather than youintelligence.” Sinclair draws.

I glower at him, temporarily forgetting that he’s not only a man twice my size, but apparently a lethalpredator. “You don’t get to talk to me like that just because you have money and howl at the moon.

He arches one dark brow, challenging my defiance. “Is that so?”

Yes,” I snap, crossing my arms overchest and tiltincg my chin up stubbornly. “t is.If I didn’t know any better, I’d think he wanted to smile. I swear the corners of his mouth twitched. "You're agutsy little thing, I'll give you that."

I don't want you to give me anything." I growl, " want you to leave me alone.

His eyes flash dangerously, "That's not going to happen. You're carrying my pup.

Pup." I say, feeling my stomach churn uncomfortably, "like., four leas and a tail?

"No." He answers. not unkindly, "t doesn't work that way.

Well how does it work?" i question, more subdued now. "How does any of this work?

Well in a lot of ways werewolves are iust like hbumans " " cinclair eynlains leanina back in his chair hut nevetaking his eyes off me. In fact, his gaze is so intense I'm finding it increasingly difficult not to squirm. "Wecome into the world in human form and we live most of our lives the same way. Most shifters don't maketheir first transformationuntil thew're a few wears oldthere – heightened instincts, sights as adults maketeRtinAlgn ae aautAraAit look. It's like learnina to speake doing in theearly years."

"But how can I be pregna

For the first time Sinclair looks less sure of himself. "m actually not sure. I've never heard of such a thinghappening, Our society exists parallel to your own, A few people – like your friend – are occasionally let in orthe secret, but it's only in very special cases and they never truly integrate. It's only when someone hascertain knowledge or expertise that's very valuable to us.

So there's iust like... a shadow world full of werewolves that exists right under human's noses?" i summarize.

"That's a nice way of putting it, yes." He confirms.

And packs and alphas... all the things we read in paranormal novels -is that all real?"

"Well our transformations have nothing to do with the full moon, but other than that many things are correct. We're much faster and stronger than humans, and our society is divided into packs but they're very large. You can think of them like provinces or states in a larger kingdom." Sinclair shares.

"Kingdom?"I ask,"Like with a king and queen and everything?"

"Yes" His answer seems strangely loaded, as if he's omitting something very important – but I don't know what it might be.

“Now, if you’re done asking questions, can we finally talk seriously?”

“Talk seriously?”What could be more serious than turning my entire world upside down?

He stares pointedly at my“About this baby.”

Chapter 7 – Agreement

Ella

“This baby is mine.” I tell him possessively. “You can’t just tell me you’re magic and expect me to take that as proof you’re the father.”

“My senses don’t lie, little human.” Sinclair declares, leaving no room for argument. “Nor do my investigators. You’re not in any position to care for this child. Your income is too low to pay off your debts in time, and no woman who claims to be responsible would ever get pregnant in such a situation.”

“My income?” I force the words out through clenched teeth, “what income? You got me fired!”

The big man... or wolf, I suppose, blinks in surprise. “You were fired?”

“Now who’s playing dumb?” I demand wryly. “You called the Graves after I asked you to help Cora, you got me fired and ruined my reputation.”

“I did no such thing.” He insists. “I didn’t even know you were no longer employed.”

“I thought your investigators were the best?” I taunt, and I can feel myself toeing the line of his temper.

“Clearly this was very recent.” He bites back. “And I don’t blame you for becoming desperate, but you have to admit the only explanation for this,” He gestures to my tummy, “is that you needed money and hoped to extort it from me in exchange for the child.”

“I wanted this child more than anything in the world!” I exclaim, surging to my feet. “I’ve been trying to get pregnant for years and when I came to Cora I didn’t know about the identity theft or that I was going to lose my job. This was my last chance and you have no idea how hard it’s been... how painful it is to think I might have to abort it because of everything that’s happened since.” I didn’t mean to tell him so much, but the words poured out of me before I could stop them. I’ve been so preoccupied with these thoughts the last few days I clearly couldn’t keep them contained.

“Abort it!?” Sinclair rises to his feet in a blur, suddenly towering over me despite the fact that I’m still standing on the exam table’s step. “So now you’re threatening me?”

“What?!” I cry, “no! It doesn’t have anything to do with you, as you said I can’t afford to have a baby so I was trying to do the right thing!”

“Werewolves don’t abort their pups.” He growls. “Our children are too precious and Cora knows that. I'm sure that's what she was thinking when she suggested using my sperm."

"Argh!" I explode, clenching my hands into fists. "You're impossible! How many times do I have to tell you that if this child is yours, it was an accident! Cora didn't switch the samples on purpose and I didn't get pregnant because I wanted you to pay off my debts!"

He narrows his eyes at me. "You're a very good actress, you know that?"

"And you're a snake." I snap. "I wouldn't be surprised if you have scales when you shift instead of fur!"

A true growl sounds in his chest, so full of raw power that my knees go weak. "Be careful Ella, I'm showing you a lot of lenience right now because you don't know our ways, but keep speaking to me like that and I'll –"

"You'll what?" I hiss, "you just told me how precious your pups are so I know you're not going to hurt me." To my horror, I feel my eyes burning with tears. Swiping at them angrily, I continue, "and I've already lost everything else I care about, so it's not like you can punish me some other way."

I spin away so that he can't see me cry. I don't know what to do – I know how suspicious our situation looks. If I didn't know better, I would think the same thing he did. It was all too suspicious, especially now that I know the truth about Cora's lab. It couldn't be easy to mix up samples of different species... wait a minute. The little voice in the back of my head whispers, and I turn back to Sinclair.

"If you didn't know it was possible for a human to be impregnated by a werewolf, why would Cora have ever attempted to use your sperm?" I interrogate. "She couldn't have known it was the wrong sample. She wouldn't have believed it would work even if we were as calculating as you seem to think. And if all I wanted was to extort your money, why haven't I asked for it? Why haven't I admitted it?"

The huge werewolf blinks, processing this information with a grimace. Silence stretches between us and eventually he sighs, scrubbing a hand over his face. "I'm not saying I believe you, but however it happened, we need to come to an agreement."

I eye him warily, "what sort of agreement?"

"Just name your price, Ella." He mutters, pinching the bridge of his nose. "How much do you want?"

"For what? The baby?" I sputter, "You want me to sell you my child?"

"It's my child, and it will be raised by me." He insists. "You don't belong in my world. So how much is it going to take for you to give it up?"

"I'm not going to negotiate a price for my baby, like it's a bag of rice or a car! Nor do I want it raised by someone who thinks of it as nothing more than a commodity!" I'm raising my voice now, feeling beyond offended for the tiny being in my womb.

"You don't know what you're talking about!" Sinclair grumbles, "do you have any idea how long I've been waiting for an heir?"

"An heir, not a child – not a son or daughter, but an heir – is that all it is to you? Some hypothetical legacy? I might not be able to prevent myself from losing this child now, but I'm not going to hand it over to someone who doesn't give a damn about it beyond what it can offer them." I state ferociously, my maternal instincts kicking into high gear.

"As I said, you don't know what you're talking about." He repeats gutturally. "I will give this baby a life you never could, it will want for absolutely nothing! With you its best chance is to scrounge and scrape in poverty, assuming you have the decency to let it live. With me it will be treated like a prince or princess."

"Money can't buy everything." I remind him coolly. "I notice you said nothing about love."

"Because I already love it!" He snarls, "I have a connection to my pup you will never understand. How dare you speak to me about love when you contemplated killing it!"

"That was also out of love!" I exclaim, "I didn't want it to suffer, I didn't want it to grow up like..." I almost said, 'like I did', but I stop myself just in time. "I love it more than myself, and I was willing to sacrifice my own happiness for its sake."

"Then do as much now." Sinclair commands, "Give it a life you can't, by signing over custody to me. Carry the baby and deliver it, then leave it with me where it belongs."

"You don't understand, if I do that I'll never be able to walk away from it." I beseech him. "I'm not that strong. If I carry it to term, I'll never be able to give it up – I need to be there to care for and protect it."

"That's simply not possible." Sinclair proclaims. "You aren't fit to be a mother to any child and especially not mine. You can't even care for yourself, that much is obvious by your debts—"

"I already told you—" I try to object, however he keeps talking over me.

"And your excuse about Cora assumes she understands enough about werewolf society to know we don't cross breed. All she knows is that we exist, and how to inseminate our women. She probably assumed we occasionally mate with humans and just lucked out!" He accuses.

"She's a doctor who works with your samples all the time, she probably knows a lot more about your organic chemistry than you do yourselves." I defend, realizing too late that this could also incriminate her.

He arches his brow, clearly thinking along the same lines. "Either way, she proved she wasn't to be trusted as soon as she betrayed her confidentiality agreement about my sperm to you, and you've proved you can't be trusted by changing your story every ten seconds. You can't love the baby enough to abort it but not love it enough to give it up to a better life. I clearly just haven't offered you a high enough price yet."

"That isn't fair," I object, shaking my head. I've just learned everything I believe to be true was actually false, at the height of an extremely emotional moment. I wasn't even conscious the whole time. How can he expect me to think or communicate clearly?

He doesn't budge. "It's alright, Ella. You don't need to make excuses. I'm going to make you an offer you can't refuse."

Chapter 8 – Compromise

Ella

Up until this point of my life, I've hated a handful of people. At the moment Mike and Kate are at the top of my list, but they aren't alone. However Dominic Sinclair is very quickly rising through the ranks and making a play for the top spot. Mike and Kate's betrayal hurt so much because I cared for them both, but Sinclair might be the first person I've encountered who I dislike this strongly after so short a time.

He's looking me up and down with the bearing of a wolf deciding how to devour the rabbit in its claws, and I realize that's all I am to him. All those intense looks over the last couple of years, every encounter, every smile – the entire time he's been thinking I'm some lesser being, the prey to his predator. Maybe he's like Mike and thought I was a particularly attractive specimen, but in the end they're the same sort of monster.

"There is no offer you could ever make me that would convince me to give you my child." I tell him sharply. "I am not for sale, and neither is my baby."

"Now you're just being stubborn." Sinclair sighs, "digging in your heels because you don't like me."

"What gave it away?" I deride. For the second time, it seems like he wants to smile despite his better judgment, but again he holds back.

"Use your head, Ella." He instructs patronizingly. "Let's say I believe you didn't do this just to cash in on a big pay day."

"You obviously don't!" I interrupt, earning myself a look so stern a shiver runs down my spine.

"Let's say I do. What are your options? How are you going to raise this child? If you try to abort it I will take you to court and I guarantee the judge will prevent you from going through with it – which means you can either keep the baby and try to get by on your own, or let me have it."

"Take me to court if you like." I challenge, even though my will to go through with terminating the pregnancy has gotten weaker and weaker from the moment I learned it was real. "You forget it's my body."

"Which you intentionally inseminated. It's not like you got knocked up after a one night stand or were assaulted. I'm offering a child a good life and I have more political sway than you can imagine." He flashes his teeth at me, teeth that look alarmingly like fangs. "Not to mention I'm a donor at every hospital in the city, no physician will perform the procedure and risk me defunding their entire facility."

Suddenly I can see how this man acquired so much money and power, he has more cunning than I know how to contemplate, with a clear killer instinct. All at once I realize he's right, the judges and doctors will side with him, whether he convinces them or bribes them – he'll win.

He's trapped me and I didn't even realize it was happening. I have no doubt he's every bit as ruthless as he seems, which means I'm going to have to carry this baby to term whether I can afford it or not. My best hope is to find some other job in that time, but even then the best life I'd be able to offer my baby is an impoverished one. It's not like disgraced nannies get hired as CEOs.

Sinclair can clearly read my dismay, because he strikes again. "If you cooperate, I'll pay off your debts. I'll help you find a job and cover every last one of your medical and living expenses. If you deliver me an heir, I will also pay you a handsome bonus, and give you anything else you like – a house? A car? A business investment? Be my surrogate and you can have anything your little heart desires."

"But I'm not just a surrogate." I remind him, feeling as though my heart was crumbling to pieces in my chest. "I'm this child's mother. It has my DNA and it will be half human. It has a right to that heritage as well as yours."

He shakes his head. "This child will be a werewolf, and a powerful one at that – my genes guarantee it. It will be raised with its own kind. And it will have a wonderful life, Ella – I promise."

"Why should I trust you?" I wonder aloud, "you clearly don't trust me, why do you expect me to give you something you refuse to offer in return."

"I have good reason not to trust you, but you have no reason not to trust me. I've never wronged you." He says, as if this justifies everything.

"Bull," I combat, "you cost Cora her job, you cost me mine – even if you didn't make the call, whoever did reported that I was begging at your gates."

"Cora cost herself her job." He claims firmly. "Mistake or malice, my sperm ended up in your womb – a place it never should have been." His foreboding expression softens for a moment. "And I truly am sorry about your job – I know how much Jake and Millie loved you. If you want your job back, I can make it happen."

I don't know what I think of that possibility. I'd love to see my precious charges again, but I don't know if I can get past their mother's cruelty. "Money can't fix everything." I reply, "and all your promises – what good is having everything I need if I'll never have the thing I want most?"

"If it's a child you want, I can help you adopt a human baby." He offers, circling me as if he's some sort of wolfish vulture. He clearly senses he's closing in on the kill, and he's not wrong.

I can feel my lip begin to tremble as fresh tears threaten. It feels selfish to say 'but I want this baby', especially when I grew up an orphan and know how many children need good homes. In truth Sinclair is offering me the world on a platter – my baby gets to live and have a good life, all my problems will be solved, and I can adopt a child that needs a mother as badly as I need to be one. Am I being silly, holding onto my childhood baggage about wanting to be part of a family bonded through more than just affection, a family bonded by blood? After all, blood is no guarantee of love – how many kids did I grow up with whose natural parents abandoned or abused them?

In the end, I don't think I have a choice. I have to do this. Knowing my baby will be loved and cared for, will have to be enough. It's the best solution for us both, and the fact that it hurts so badly doesn't mean it's wrong.

"Draft a contract before I change my mind." I grind out, hating this man more than I can express.

Sinclair nods, and strides to the door. A little while later one of his men comes in with a heavy stack of documents, which takes me almost a full hour to read through. When I finally close the last page and nod in approval, the lawyer places the contract in front of Sinclair, who promptly turns to add his signatures to all the appropriate pages.

"You're doing the right thing, Ella." He tosses over his shoulder, triumph clear in his voice.

"That's easy for you to say." I gripe, watching him lean over the document brandishing a fountain pen. "Are you proud of yourself? Bullying a weak little human into giving you the only child she'll ever have?" I inquire to his back. "You sent your sperm here because you struggled with infertility too, didn't you? How would you feel if you and your wife finally conceived and someone took the baby from you?"

Sinclair straightens up, going very still but not acknowledging my words. When he turns around his expression is completely closed off. "Actually I'm not married." He tells me. "Not anymore."

"Way to miss the point." I mutter under my breath, snatching the pen from his hand and moving in front of the contract. Before I can add my signature to the pages, I feel the room begin to spin. I brace my hands against the low table, clamping my eyes shut then blinking them open and trying to clear my vision, which is suddenly very blurry. The blood is rushing in my ears.

“How long have we been in this room?” I ask, feeling as if my body is being slowly doused in warm water. All my senses are fuzzy, and it’s not until Sinclair appears at my side that I realize I slurred my words. “Are you alright, Ella?”

My legs give out, and I suddenly find myself slumping into a very large, very hard wall of concerned werewolf. Powerful arms come around me, and Sinclair’s scent fills my nose. It’s deep and rich, like being deep in the forest on a moonlit night. “You smell nice.” I murmur, sounding completely drunk, before the world goes black for the second time in as many hours.

However this time, I hear an odd grumbling noise as I sink into the darkness. At first I think it’s Sinclair, but the sound isn’t coming from his chest, it almost sounds like it’s coming from... inside me?

Chapter 9 – Counterattack

Ella

I blink my eyes open warily, knowing I'm not at home in my own bed solely by the luxurious mattress and beddings surrounding me. The last thing I remember, I was in Cora's office with none other than Dominic Sinclair, who was single-handedly offering to save my future and break my heart in one fell swoop.

I was about to sign away my rights to my baby... my baby, I think dazedly, pressing one hand to my belly. Am I really pregnant? After all this time?

The idea that I have to give up my child because life dealt me yet another ruthless blow makes me feel sick to my stomach... in fact, I lurch from the bed and race for the bathroom, feeling my insides roil and clench. I make it to the toilet just in time, emptying my stomach into the porcelain bowl and dropping to my knees with a groan of misery.

I suppose that's all the proof I need. I really am going to be a mother... but for how long? 30 seconds? Five minutes? Will Dominic Sinclair give me the opportunity to even hold my baby before ripping it from my arms? Do I want that torture? Yes, I decide instantly. I have to hold my baby in my arms, even if it's only for a fraction of a second.... Even if we aren't technically the same species.

That particular thought sends my head spinning so quickly I have to clench my eyes shut. Werewolves are real. Not only are they real, but I'm pregnant with one... Dominic Sinclair, who I've mooned over a thousand times, is a creature I believed only existed in novels and films. And what was that grumbling noise when I passed out, why did it feel like I could hear his voice in my head?

All of a sudden it's just too much to handle. I slip back into the bedroom and climb back into the opulent bed, for the first time realizing I must be in the Sinclair mansion. There's no other explanation. I've never been in a room this beautiful, or with such expensive furnishings. It must all belong to him.

But why would he bring me home with him? I have a home of my own. Peeking out of the plush covers, I scan the room, my eyes landing on a table by the door. There's a vase of flowers and a folded note, which appears to have my name scrawled across the front. Gingerly regaining my feet, I collect the parchment and open it, my heart beating a mile a minute.

Ella,

Please make yourself at home. I'll be at the office until this evening, but as soon as I return we can finish our talk. Ask the servants for anything you require.

Yours,

Dominic

And if I want to go home? I think defiantly, What then Mr. Bossy?

The suggestion that there's a discussion to conclude between us grates on my nerves. He basically left me with no choice, leveraging safety, stability and my child's wellbeing over my head so that I'd be forced to agree to his terms. It's not as if I really stood a chance against him. He has all the power in the world while I have nothing, and he made it very clear that there was no wiggle room in our agreement.

Maybe passing out was my brain's subconscious way of protecting me, giving me more time to process and think before signing away my baby. Or if not my brain, whatever higher power created shifters and humans – this entire crazy planet. I never considered myself religious before, but if magic is real, who's to say what else is possible?

Tears well in my eyes, and unlike earlier, they have nothing to do with my joy over being pregnant, or my grief about everything I'm losing. These tears are nothing but pure, righteous anger over everything that's happened to me over the last few days. Cora's words ring in my head, "It isn't fair." It isn't fair that I have to lose everything because of the actions and cruelty of other people. It isn't fair that Dominic Sinclair should hold my future ransom when he could fix it with the snap of his fingers. The amount of money it will take to repay my debts isn't even a drop in the bucket to him, and I'm pregnant with his child. He could easily help me without also robbing me of my baby – as if he has no concept of the value of a mother's love.

Before I can change my mind, I gather myself and slip out the bedroom door, sneaking through the hallways until I finally find my way out of the maze of a house. Only once does a servant try to stop me. I'm almost to the front door when a guard steps in front of me, "Miss, you don't have permission to leave."

I notch my chin up and glare at the man. "Are you going to stop me?"

He looks as though he wants to do just that. He frowns deeply, eyeing me closely. I can almost see the thoughts scrolling through his head. Yes he has orders not to let me leave, but he also knows I'm pregnant with his boss's precious heir. He can't risk roughing me up if I fight back.

After a moment I decide to test the strength of his resolve, storming past him without another word. When I arrive home a little while later, I head straight for my computer, pulling up the internet browser and typing in Dominic Sinclair's name. He might have fancy investigators to look into my past, but I'm no simpleton, I can do research as well as anyone.

At first I find only fawning business articles about his genius intellect and cunning as a negotiator and investor. It seems like everyone who's ever decided to look into the man has fallen in love with him. Nevermind the fact that he was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, they make it sound as though he's a completely self made man. The articles lament his difficult childhood growing up without a mother, and a number of interviews actually detail how deeply this affected him. The way they tell it, being raised by a single parent is the worst upbringing a child could have.

After I've read through all the financial analyses and rave reviews, I dig deeper, looking into his philanthropic record and secret identity. I'm mildly dismayed to find all his charitable efforts are completely legitimate and he actually does donate half his revenues to those in need (of course, half a colossal fortune still leaves a fortune behind). The internet is chock-full of reports and speeches he's made, good will efforts to better mankind.

Things are less clear when I try digging into his true status as a werewolf. At first my searches result in little more than illuminati conspiracy theories and nonsense, and I realize keeping an entire species secret must require more discretion. It occurs to me that there might be a dark or parallel web for werewolves, just like there are for illicit activities.

It takes most of the afternoon, but eventually I figure out that I can download a special browser to access the dark web, and before long I've dived deep into the annals of werewolf society. Here I find a very different image of the perfect businessman touted in the human media (Don't even get me started on how bizarre it is to discover that there really is a sprawling werewolf society thriving in the shadows of my own).

Apparently Dominic Sinclair isn't just any werewolf, but the Alpha of the Moon Valley pack and prospective King of the entire bloody continent. No wonder he'd been so vague and guarded when I asked about ruling monarchs! He's poised to become the next King himself, if he can pull off his upcoming campaign.

There aren't many contenders in the race, but Sinclair's been undermined by his family situation. The last king died without an heir and left werewolf society with a dangerous power vacuum – it's the reason they have to select a new king in the first place. No one wants to repeat this cycle with another childless King, and the fact that Sinclair has been unable to produce an heir is only half the problem. He also doesn't have a mate, or Luna – not anymore at least.

I read until my eyes grow sore, learning that Sinclair was once married to a she-wolf who left him when he couldn't give her a child – despite the fact that they were fated mates (another concept I can't wrap my mind around). It's no wonder he was so intense about finally having an heir – I thought he was just a domineering jerk who believed he needed to pass down his business legacy or something, not that the entire future of his society might depend on it. The articles made it very clear that werewolves would be in serious trouble if he doesn't take the throne. A few of his competitors can only be described as power mad and unhinged, and they're doing their best to discredit Sinclair.

When I finally finish, sitting back in my chair and dragging my hand over my face, I try to wrap my brain around all this. Sinclair needs an heir, he needs a Luna, and he knows how difficult it can be for a child to grow up without a mother. For all his cunning, I now know all his weak spots. If I play my cards right, I just might be able to talk the terrifying Alpha into letting me stick around after the baby is born. Then I can prove how critical it is for a child to be with its mother – I can give us all a chance.

Even as I think these optimistic words, a knock sounds on the door, and somehow I know it's Dominic Sinclair before I can even get up off the couch. Taking a deep breath I stride across the room and pull the heavy door open, revealing one very large, very angry werewolf bearing down on me.

Chapter 10 – Move

3rd Person

Sinclair glared down at the tiny human in front of him. It seemed every time he saw Ella she grew more beautiful, especially since he learned she was carrying his pup. She'd been an enchanting distraction before, now she was almost irresistible. With fair skin, rose gold hair and eyes so amber they almost seemed metallic, he found it hard to believe she was not a wolf herself. However, as delectable as her scent was, she was clearly nothing extraordinary.

"Why did you leave?" Sinclair demanded, scanning his sharp eyes over her body to make sure she was unharmed. His attention lingered on her flat tummy, where his pup safely rested. He could still smell it, hear its tiny heartbeat and feel an inexplicable connection to the miniscule bundle of cells.

"Because I'm not a dog. I don't sit and stay just because you tell me to." Ella announced, crossing her arms over her chest.

"I didn't order you to do anything." Sinclair argued, baffled by the way his wolf purred in response to her sass.

"And yet you seem displeased that I didn't sit by and obediently wait for you to come home and dictate more decisions about my future." Ella quipped, leaning against the doorframe.

"I didn't dictate anything." Sinclair argued. "We negotiated fair and square."

"If that's what you call fair it's no wonder you earned your ruthless reputation." Ella remarked slyly, "I wasn't in any state to have such an important conversation, let alone make such a momentous decision."

Sinclair didn't seem to hear her, instead he'd slipped past her into the apartment. "Is this where you live?"

"Obviously." Ella rolled her eyes.

He shook his head, "This won't due."

"Excuse me?" Ella gaped, "you've got some nerve you know –"

"I won't have the mother of my pup staying in such poor conditions." Sinclair decided, "You'll move into my estate as soon as possible."

Ella clenched her fists at her sides and took a deep breath. "I make my own decisions."

“Not since you agreed to our deal.” Sinclair countered. “The moment you said yes, you handed over authority to me.”

“I didn’t sign anything!” Ella reminded him.

A verbal agreement is enough in werewolf law – the contract was really for you.” Sinclair announced, smirking like the cat who ate the canary.

“Then why did your note say we needed to finish our conversation, what was there to finish if not signing the deal?” Ella demanded hotly.

“Everything, including you moving in with me, your prenatal regimen, birth plan, financial arrangements.” Sinclair explained, striding into Ella’s bedroom and pulling open the closet doors. By the time Ella reached him, he was already pulling a suitcase from the top shelf.

“Stop that!” Ella insisted, vigorously attempting to wrest the suitcase from his hand. She tugged the large bag so forcefully she almost lost her balance. In fact she was pulling with all her strength and weight, if Sinclair had chosen to release his end of the bag she would certainly topple to the ground. “I never agreed to move in with you!”

The next thing Ella knew, the huge shifter’s hand was circling her nape, applying just enough pressure to freeze her in her tracks but not enough to hurt. “Listen closely, itle human” He rumbled authoritatively, radiating power. ” appreciate your spirit, but as long as you’re carrying my pup, you will be careful, and wrestling with wolves twice your size over heavy luggage is not allowed.”

Ella narrowed her eyes at the attractive Alpha. Her instincts were going a bit haywire at the moment. Her insides were in puddles over being so near him, her knees were weak in the face of his stern scolding, and her heart was in full revolt. No one had ever cared about her enough when she was young to set rules and discipline, so she’d been running wild for as long as she could remember. And she did not take kindly to being told what to do now. With a fiery flash in her amber eyes, she stomped her smalfoot right onto his, sending pain vibrating up through her own bones, and not even phasing him.

Ella couldn’t smother her whimper, “What are you made of, steel?”

“That’s what tussling with a wolf will get you” He responded unsympathetically, releasing her and stalking to the bed, where he neatly unfolded the suitcase. “Now be a good girl, and pack your bags.

“I would sooner set everything I own on fire.” Ella replied coolly, resisting the urge to rub her aching foot.

That might not be the worst idea.” Sinclair muttered, glancing at her wardrobe. “If you’re going to live with me, you might as well look the part too. Should I fetch a lighter?”

“No!” Ella yelled, moving to protect her things. “They might not be up to your standards but I like my things, and I like my apartment” In truth, this apartment reminded Ella too much of Mike, and she hadn’t picked out any of her furniture or appliances they were all hand-me downs. Still, she didn’t appreciate the way Sinclair was trying to order her around. There might be an exchange of money or services in their arrangement, but she wasn’t one of his servants, and it was important they establish that if her plan was going to work.

Sinclair cocked his head to the side, eyeing her as if she were a profound curiosity. “And how are you going to pay your rent on this place?”

Ella’s mouth opened and closed helplessly. “That’s not the point.”

Sinclair wasn’t sure what to make of the beautiful human. The more time he spent around her, the more his wolf began to sit up and pay attention. His wolf had always perked up with interest when he saw Ella around the neighborhood, but he’d never allowed himself to explore those feelings because she was a human. Now however.. now he had every excuse to figure out the puzzle that was Ella. “It’s part of the arrangement.” He dictated firmly, “you’ll be back on your feet faster if you don’t have to worry about living expenses, and I want you close – this baby is too important to me.”

It was true Sinclair didn’t want to let her out of his sight, but that was also because he’d been dreaming of becoming a father for years. He didn’t want to miss a moment of Ella’s pregnancy. The little human was beginning to squirm beneath the weight of his gaze, and he could see her working through the problem in her mind. She had to realize it made more sense for her to stay with him, she might be feisty, but she was far from stupid.

“Fine,” Ella finally conceded, shooting Sinclair a sulky pout. “But I want to talk to you about a few things first.”

“Are you going to keep glaring at me that way while you do?” Sinclair asked, his mischievous wolf egging him on. He wasn’t sure what it was about seeing Ella all riled up, but he couldn’t seem to stop himself from pushing her buttons.

“Ye—” Ella bit back her response, seeming to think better of losing her temper with him. She needed to convince him, to persuade him – not alienate him. “No.” She amended, taking a deep breath. “I want to talk to you about our arrangement. What’s going to happen to the baby in the early years? Who’s going to care for it?”

“I’ll pay someone.” Sinclair responded simply, “A nursemaid.”

“Why would you ever pay someone when the baby’s mother is there and dying to do all the things a servant would? It will need milk and lullabies and love, I can provide that better than anyone. Forgive me, but I know you aren’t married, and a child needs a mother.” Ella was hoping this would be an emotional subject for the man – it can’t have been easy to grow up without a mother. “It’s healthier for the baby to have me around, especially given how busy you are. You can’t exactly take a newborn to the office with you every day.”

Sinclair hesitated. He knew she was right, it was better for the pup to have Ella near, and he didn’t want his heir to grow up the way he did. Still, Ella didn’t belong in his world. She was human and she couldn’t be trusted – this was probably another scheme to swindle him somehow. She’d already proven what a good actress she was back at the sperm bank. It was a clever ploy, but he wasn’t going to let another conniving woman ruin his life. He’d learned his lesson with his ex-wife, Lydia.

Ella was watching him closely, reading his expression and scrambling for another argument. Her eyes lit up after a moment’s thought, and her pink lips parted for the battle. “It would help you politically as well. I’ve been doing some research, I know you’re campaigning to become Alpha King and you’ll appear stronger with a family by your side. How would it look, if you have to hire a human to carry your child? Wouldn’t you prefer to simply tell everyone I’m your girlfriend?”

So much cunning in such a small package – it was honestly impressive. “So you want to be a queen, is that it?” Sinclair growled suspiciously.

“No!” Ella exclaimed, “I’m not suggesting we actually become a couple, I can pretend to be a... a werewolf...” She couldn’t believe she was saying those words. “And we can put on a show in public so that you can say we’re in a relationship and you’re finally having a baby.” Ella shrugged, the idea still forming as she spoke. “It could be an extension in our contract – you get a family in public and the baby gets two parents.”

Sinclair considered her words carefully. “You’re serious?”

“Yes.” Ella insisted. “What do you think?”

Chapter 11 – Call me Dominic

Sinclair shook his head almost as soon as the words were out of Ella's mouth. The idea was intriguing, but it would never succeed. "That's not how it works – we aren't mates. My kind only gets one, and everyone already knows I found mine many years ago." Sinclair informed her coolly.

"But... you got divorced." Ella's words were tremulous and hesitant, as if she was afraid to bring up the subject. She'd clearly been very busy with her research. He was about to tell her off, when his wolf roared in his head. Enough! Stop this, you know she's right – it's better for everyone this way.

Sinclair was taken aback, his wolf never disagreed with him – they'd always been on the same page about everything. The pup is most important, it needs its mother. His wolf continued, besides, she's not asking you for anything – if she was just a gold-digger like Lydia, she'd be eager to move in with you.

I don't know. Sinclair thought. It's worth taking a second look at Ella's background but –

No buts! His wolf interrupted. Give her what she wants.

Why are you so determined about this? Sinclair demanded, surprised by his inner canine's insistence.

We can't hurt Ella. His wolf proclaimed fiercely. She'll suffer if we take the pup away.

Sinclair had to admit he didn't want the lovely human to be in pain, but he still didn't trust her. His wolf on the other hand was absolutely adamant, and all shifters knew better than to question their animal instincts. Intuition didn't lie – not when it came to the supernatural.

"Fine." He grumbled. "But only if you help with my campaign. It won't be easy, there's more to being a Luna than standing on my arm and looking pretty."

Ella's face lit up so brightly Sinclair had to fight his smile. His wolf on the other hand, actually wagged his tail like an excited puppy. What the hell is going on with me? He thought, speaking more to himself than his wolf – who was clearly losing his mind.

"What's a Luna?" Ella asked curiously, barely able to contain her joy but trying to remain engaged in the conversation.

"It's an Alpha's mate." Sinclair explained, realizing just how much he was going to have to teach her. "And for the record, this little arrangement will only last until I meet a she-wolf who might fill the role for real."

“But you just told me werewolves only get one mate.” Ella questioned, not understanding.

“We only get one fated mate. Chosen mates are completely different. We can choose as many as we like, but the Goddess only grants us one fated love.” Sinclair informed her. “The bond is different” “Different, as in weaker?” Ella clarified. “No —just different” Sinclair corrected. “Not all fated mates are a good fit, and some chosen couples are much happier together.” “So if you find another mate, I won’t be allowed to see the baby anymore?” Ella asked, gnawing on her lower lip.

“We can talk about it if and when it happens.” Sinclair stated after a moment “But I want to be very clear that this agreement only lasts as long as it works. If we can’t find a way to get along well enough to convince people or if I learn that this is all another one of your tricks—” Ella’s eyes flared with anger, but Sinclair forged on ahead. “The deal is off.”

Though Ella’s cheeks were flushed bright pink, she set her shoulders as if preparing herself to take on a great challenge. “Fine. Have your people draw up the contracts.”

“I will.” Sinclair agreed, “As soon as you pack your bags.”

Ella sent another glower his way, and though his wolf was preoccupied thinking how adorable she was when she was grumpy, Sinclair couldn’t help but take her in hand. He Reached out and caught her chin between his thumb and forefinger, tilting her pretty face up to his. “And Ella — the first rule of being a shifter? The Alpha makes the rules.”

Sinclair watched as his words sunk in. Ella’s eyes narrowed, and she was squirming again, positively overflowing with defiance. He had to give her credit, for someone who’d only just learned about the existence of werewolves, she certainly wasn’t afraid of him. In fact, she was showing much more bravery than many fully grown wolves did facing down an Alpha.

Of course, there were Alphas, and then there was Sinclair- who was strong enough to bring even the most dominant pack leaders in line. Though perhaps it was simply that Ella didn’t realize just how dangerous he was.

After a moment Ella settled, looking up at Sinclair from beneath her lashes. “Yes, sir.” She ground out, clearly hating being forced to submit.

“I like the sound of that.” He praised, dragging his thumb over her full bottom lip. “But if we’re going to pull this off, you should call me Dominic.”

A visible shiver ran down Ella’s spine, and Sinclair’s wolf purred with pleasure. Her amber eyes were so wide he could see every glimmering shade of gold in her irises. Her dark lashes fluttered as he stared her down, and eventually she lowered her eyes and murmured, “Yes, Dominic.”

When Ella arrived back at Dominic Sinclair’s mansion, she was beside herself with confusion. She’d started her negotiation with him feeling completely in control, but now it seemed like he’d completely turned the tables on her. She wasn’t sure when or how it had happened, but the bossy werewolf had somehow managed to get the better of her. In the moment it had seemed like he had some strange power over her, like she’d been hypnotized by his dark gaze.

Her mind was absolutely overflowing with thoughts, but the moment she stepped into the bedroom Sinclair had prepared for her, her mind went entirely blank. It was the same room she’d woken up in that afternoon, but everything was different now.

The beautiful space was full of candles and music, the air scented with essential oils. Ella felt as if she was walking into a spa, in fact there were even servants running a hot bath in the massive whirlpool tub in the bathroom, just waiting for her to arrive. Ella could barely take in all the finery and amenities Sinclair had brought in, including a craft table and miniature fridge full of drinks and snacks. There was even a massage table set up along the far wall. “You did all this for me?” Ella gaped, staring up at Sinclair’s handsome face in abject disbelief.

He blinked down at her, not seeming to understand why she was so surprised. “Pups are more important than anything.”

Of course. Ella thought, somewhat bitterly. It’s not for me, it’s for the pup.

“Here.” Sinclair offered Ella a small golden bell. “Ring this whenever you need anything.”

Ella shook her head, trying to push the bell away. “I don’t feel comfortable being waited on by servants.”

“It’s not for the servants.” Sinclair informed her, guiding her to wrap her fingers around the bell, “it’s for me. If you need me for anything, ring that and I’ll come.”

Ella reeled, “But... couldn’t I just come find you, am I not allowed to leave this room?”

Sinclair rolled his eyes. “Of course you can. I’m just trying to make things easy on you – you should be as relaxed as possible for the next six months!”

“Six months?” Ella repeated, feeling as though she was missing something. “Should I be stressed after that?”

“I think that’s unavoidable. Since you’ll have a new baby.” Sinclair quipped, catching sight of her confused expression. “Shifter pregnancies are shorter than humans, around six months – that’s why the baby was so large at your ultrasound.”

“Oh.” Ella was still busy processing that detail when Sinclair excused himself for a phone call. Six months? She thought fearfully. That doesn’t give me nearly as much time to prepare.

Suddenly needing some fresh air, Ella went to the window and pulled it open, heaving in two very large lungfuls. The brisk winter air felt good on her flushed skin, even if opening the window had unleashed a torrent of sound on her ears. In the yard below men or wolves, she supposed – were sparring on a snow covered lawn. They violently clashed with bare hands and weapons, openly shouting, growling and laughing. The tumult was so uproarious that Ella was tempted to slam the window shut, but she didn’t want to lose the refreshing air.

Ella eyed the bell in her hand, curious to see if it really would bring Sinclair to her side – even in the middle of a business call. With a mischievous smile, she rang the bell and waited. Within thirty seconds, Sinclair was in front of her, looking down at her with amusement – as if he knew exactly what she was up to. “You rang?”

“Would it be possible for them to do... that,” Ella gestured at the commotion on the lawn, “somewhere else? It’s very loud.”

Without hesitation Sinclair leaned out the window and told the sparring sentries to go elsewhere, ordering them not to train outside this window anymore. Ella watched in amazement as the men immediately raced to obey – what must it be like to be so powerful that people fell over themselves to do your bidding? It struck her that Sinclair was the most powerful person in every room he walked into, yet here he was, deferring to her – doing whatever she asked.

“Thank you.” Ella murmured.

“You’re welcome.” Sinclair answered, still fighting his smile. The more time he spent with Ella, the more endearing he found the little human. In fact, it was enough to make him question everything he’d been thinking the last couple of days. He’d already ordered a second investigation into her background, and he could barely stand the thought of waiting two days for the results. He’d have to keep his distance until then, until he knew whether he could trust her – once and for all.

Two days. He thought impatiently, That’s nothing, you can easily stay away that long... right?

Chapter 12 – Investigate

Sinclair was sitting in his office, trying not to think about Ella.

Two days had dragged past at a snail's pace, and the Alpha was finding it more and more difficult to stay away from the pretty human. His wolf was driving him up the wall, constantly suggesting that they go and check on her, just to make sure she was alright.

It was ridiculous – he knew she was perfectly fine. The mischievous creature rang her bell every few hours, just to see if he'd come to her. In fact, he was starting to think the bell had been a bad idea. He was beginning to crave hearing it, hoping she would ring the damned thing so he could give in to his wolf and go see her.

Of course, every time it happened, Ella would scramble for some anemic excuse to explain the call – yet he was never bothered. Sinclair could tell she was just testing her limits and amusing herself, this was probably the first time in her life anyone had taken care of her, and he couldn't bear to spoil her fun.

Ella was so unlike his ex, Lydia, that it made his head spin. Sinclair had loved his mate and wanted to give her everything her heart desired, but she wasn't the most easy-going of she-wolves. Even before she'd shown her true colors and betrayed him, he'd known going through a pregnancy with her would be very difficult.

He could imagine her in Ella's shoes now, demanding every unreasonable extravagance she could imagine and complaining non-stop. She would have made a wondrous experience a trial – something not to relish but endure- whereas Ella was sweetly reveling in the magic of creating life, overwhelmed to find herself in comfort rather than constantly struggling.

Sinclair's thoughts were interrupted by a knock on the door, and he promptly called, "come in."

His heart leapt when the investigator he'd hired to look into Ella poked his head through the door, "Is now a good time, Alpha?"

"Yes." He agreed, more than eager to hear what the man had discovered.

"Well you were right." The investigator announced as he entered and plopped into the chair opposite Sinclair's. "I checked with the police, Ella Reina reported a stolen identity a couple of days after the insemination, and until a few months ago her financial history was perfectly sound."

Sinclair's wolf howled triumphantly in his head. I knew it! I knew she wasn't bad.

"Do the police have any leads?" Sinclair questioned.

“Oh she told them exactly who was responsible.” The investigator shared. “She claimed her ex-boyfriend had opened about a dozen credit cards in her name, and the story tracks. All of the credit cards she opened herself have no debt on them whatsoever.

She pays off her balance every month like clockwork, and all the charges are very modest. The new cards were maxed out almost immediately on luxury items which certainly weren't in her home based on your description. It's a completely different spending pattern. I think she was telling you the truth, at the time of the insemination, she didn't know she was in financial trouble.”

“Then how did my sperm end up getting switched with the donor she chose?” Sinclair questioned, beyond relieved to hear the mother of his pup was not another shallow, gold-digging schemer like Lydia.

“I don't know, but you said yourself she hasn't asked you for anything other than the right to stay with the baby. Her file at the clinic indicated she's been trying to get pregnant for years.” The investigator reasoned. “That doesn't sound like someone who set out to entrap you.”

Sinclair felt a pang deep in his chest. Like him, Ella had struggled with fertility for years, only to be betrayed by her partner. For all their differences, he was beginning to think they had more in common than they realized. However there was one thing he didn't understand, and he was tired of going through the investigator. It was time to get the story straight from the source... and this time he'd actually listen.

When he arrived at Ella's room, he found her curled up in the window seat with a sunbeam bathing her in golden light, sound asleep. She was wearing some of the silk pajamas he'd purchased for her when he saw her shabby sleep clothes on day one, and looked so sweet it actually hurt to look at her. He was reluctant to disturb her, knowing she needed her rest, and started to retreat. However the sound of his footsteps must have roused her, because a moment later Ella opened her eyes and yawned. Stretching like a sleepy kitten and offering him a welcoming smile. “Good morning.”

“I think you mean, good afternoon.” Sinclair teased, fighting the urge to brush the hair from her face. “How are you feeling?”..

Ella's stomach answered for her, growling pointedly and making her flush. “Sorry.”

“Don't apologize.” Sinclair insisted, “I'll get you something to eat. What would you like?”

Ella peeked up at him from beneath her lashes, “does it have to be healthy?”

Chuckling, Sinclair strode forward and knelt down beside her. He pressed one hug palm to her belly, making her flinch. with surprise, then shushing her gently and petting her hair. “Shh, I just want to feel the baby.” He focused on the tiny being in Ella’s womb, trying to pick up on their developing mental link.

Once he did, he began laughing again, a rich cozy sound that wrapped Ella in warmth. “So, pickles and ice cream, is that it?”

“How did you know that!” Ella exclaimed, her eyes wide.

“All shifter parents have a mental link with their pups, even in the womb.” He explained.

“Is that why I can hear you in my head sometimes?” Ella questioned. “Like when I passed out, I swear I could hear you from inside me.” Sinclair nodded.

He was surprised that a human was able to pick up on it, but it was the only explanation. “That’s right. Now, sit tight and I’ll get your snack.” Ella was surprised that Sinclair planned on preparing it himself. She assumed he’d send a servant, if he’d even allow her to have something so unhealthy. He’d been so adamant about prenatal vitamins, exercise and care.

Apparently cravings were a different matter though — he must have understood how powerful the hunger was. When he returned, with a heaping bowl of ice cream and a plate of pickles, Ella almost wanted to hug him she was no grateful. Of course, she put that idea out of her head immediately. Dominic Sinclair was many things, but she seriously doubted he was a hugger.

Ella tucked into the snack, sighing with pleasure and making Sinclair grin... though it didn’t last for long. “I hate to ruin your good mood,” he began apologetically, “but I wanted to ask — why did you go to a sp3rm bank to get pregnant, if you didn’t know about your boyfriend’s betrayal until afterwards?”

Ella blinked, “You’ve decided you believe me about the debt, then?”

“My investigators took a closer look at your situation.” He agreed. “I’m sorry I didn’t trust you at first... trust doesn’t always come easily for me.”

“I suppose I can understand that.” Ella answered, somewhat cryptically. Working up the courage to tell this intimidating man her story, she took a deep breath. “But I did know about Mike’s betrayal beforehand – just not the identity theft.

The truth is that he kept me around for years because... well, basically he wanted a trophy in his bed. All the time I was trying to get pregnant, he was sleeping with my best friend and giving me the morning after pill every morning in my coffee. I caught him in the affair the same day I learned that my eggs were so diminished that if I didn’t get pregnant now, I never would.”

Tears were streaming down her face now, and she couldn't bring herself to look at Sinclair. Setting the ice cream down, she concluded. “So you see, this baby is my last chance... my only chance. That's why I went to Cora – I couldn't risk failing again.”

Before she knew what was happening, Sinclair had pulled her out of the window and into his arms. Suddenly Ella found herself cushioned by warm muscles on all sides. She was so completely enveloped in his embrace, she wasn't sure where she ended and he began. So much for not being a hugger. “I'm so sorry, Ella.” He rumbled against her hair.

She nodded pitifully, trying to hold herself together despite the growing temptation to let this strange man comfort her. He smelled so wonderful, and she felt so safe – safer than she could ever remember feeling, though that shouldn't be possible. After all, she barely knew the man and he'd caused her nothing but trouble. “I won't take the baby from you.” Sinclair declared then, astonishing Ella. “If I do find a new mate, you can have visitation rights.”

“Really?” Ella sniffled, not believing her ears.

“Yes. I'm sorry I've been so harsh.” Sinclair purred, stroking her spine.

That was all it took. The next thing Ella knew, she was sobbing her heart out into Sinclair's collar, while he rocked and soothed her. As gentle as he was with the fragile human, Sinclair was furious inside. He couldn't recall ever feeling so much rage for anyone.

His wolf was going berserk with the need to find and punish Ella's ex-boyfriend. He wanted to destroy the man who had broken her heart. She was the mother of his pup, and no one had the right to harm her.

Even as he held her, a plan formed in his mind. A plan to make Mike pay for his crimes. The police might not be able to help Ella, but he certainly could.

Chapter 13 – Pregnancy diet

Ella

This is confusing. It was much easier for me to hate Sinclair when he was being overbearing and bossy, I'm not sure what to make of all this kindness. It seems too good to be true, and that's a guaranteed red flag. I learned the hard way growing up as an orphan, if it seems too good to be true, it's because it is.

At the same time, I can't bring myself to pull away from Sinclair. He's still holding and rocking me more tenderly than I ever could have imagined. Has anyone ever held me this way? Mike certainly didn't, and while Cora has always comforted me in times of need, this does not feel like cuddling Cora. I'm aware of Sinclair's touch in a way that is far from sisterly, I feel as though I'm being scalded by his heat, and wonder if werewolves run higher temperatures than humans.

It strikes me quite suddenly that if Sinclair is half this attentive with his children, my baby will have more love than I could have possibly hoped for. He really will make a wonderful father – assuming this isn't some act to make me agree to some new condition on our agreement. Then again, I remember how kind he's always been to Jake and Millie, how obviously he loves children.

I'm not sure where it comes from, but suddenly I feel a rush of jealousy for the woman who will become his mate. She will be very lucky indeed, and it's obvious his sperm wasn't the problem with his past fertility struggles now. They'll probably have many children together, and my baby can have siblings to love and play with. I might not be able to have a big family, but my child will be part of one – and that's what's important, right? So why do I feel so bitter at the thought of another woman being with Sinclair?

I might suspect that a she-wolf would feel threatened by my baby, because it would prevent one of her own pups from becoming Sinclair's heir, but I know that's not it either. I snuggle closer as my tears slow, and Sinclair purrs, sending a delicious shiver down my spine. Why is it so hard to pull away from him? Why does the idea of leaving his arms make me so disappointed?

I can't be attracted to him. I can't. It's a recipe for disaster!

"What are you thinking about?" His deep voice sounds in my ear, and I jolt as if I've been shocked. I can feel myself coloring already, and when I look up at him, there's a knowing smirk on his face.

I try to conjure an excuse that would explain my embarrassment, so I confess a half truth, "I was thinking I want more ice cream."

Sinclair frowns now, eyeing the bowl I've just finished. "I think that might be overdoing it.

The doctor said you needed a very nutritious diet.”

The baby doesn't care for this, and neither do I. My craving hasn't been satisfied yet, and no one has ever deigned to tell me what I can or cannot eat. “I'm an adult, Sinclair. I can see to my own health.”

“I've asked you to call me Dominic.” He reminds me, catching me in the crosshairs of his piercing eyes.

“My point remains the same no matter what I call you.” I state tritely, pulling away from him at last. I slip off his knee and rise to my feet. His collar is soaked through with my tears, and though I'm standing and he's kneeling, he's still almost as tall as I am. I place my hands on my hips, trying not to cower in the face of his stern expression.

“What if I make you something else, what's your favorite dish?” Sinclair questions.

Rolling my eyes, I retrieve my bowl and circle around him, heading for the door. My fingers are inches from the handle when a tree trunk arm circles my middle and I'm lifted off my feet. “Hey! Put me down!”

“Such a naughty little human.” Sinclair clucks in disapproval, setting me down on the couch.

“You said I was free to go wherever I wish here.” I remind him. “I want to go to the kitchen.”

“You may go to the kitchen if you like,” He agrees, “but not if you're only going to fill up on ice cream. That baby needs more than sugar and fat to grow big and strong.”

The more this goes on, the more I feel like a child. Here I am, demanding sweets when I know it isn't best for my child, but I can't help the cravings I'm experiencing. The baby wants what it wants, and there's no reasoning with my hormones. They are stronger than any PMS or mood swing I've ever experienced before, it makes me feel like a different person. I'm a mature adult, I've been on my own my whole life – I raised myself and Cora, even though she's older. So why do I feel like crying again simply because I'm not going to get my way?

I'm still caught up in my thoughts when I feel calloused fingers stroke my cheek, drawing my attention up to Sinclair. “Has no one ever cared for you enough to set limits?” He asks, searching my face. In the wrong tone it might have sounded like a cruel reminder, but he speaks with true sympathy.

“I'm an orphan, remember?” I bite, my voice thick with emotion. “No one has ever cared for me at all – not the way you mean.”

“Well that changes now.” Sinclair proclaimed firmly, leaving no room for argument. “I’ll be back in a minute.”

I remain in my room, trying to get hold of myself and wrap my brain around this strange new relationship with Sinclair. I feel very confused by his behavior, and my own feelings. My body is responding to him like it’s never responded to anyone – it feels as if I’ve come alive after a very long sleep – but I have to wonder whether that’s only the baby? Surely if there is such a strong bond between Sinclair and the pup that they have a mental link, I must be affected too.

I’m so lost in my thoughts that I almost don’t realize it when the man in question returns, carrying a tray. He sets it down in front of me and though I’m feeling contrary enough that I’m tempted to reject it on principle, that impulse evaporates as soon as he raises the cloche to reveal the meal he’s prepared. It’s macaroni and cheese with broccoli, not exactly healthy, but certainly better than ice cream. Not to mention, it’s my absolute favorite dish from childhood.

“How did you know?” I ask, astonished. This is not something he could have possibly learned from his link with the baby. It’s not a craving, but a personal fact very few people know.

“I have my ways.” Sinclair answers slyly, offering me a fork.

I accept it gladly, and wonder again at this mysterious man... wolf. There’s so much about him I don’t understand, things that have nothing to do with being a werewolf, and everything to do with his human side.

“What happened between you and your mate?” I ask, not sure if this is an appropriate question for me to ask, but deciding to test my luck. “When you said not all fated mates are good fits, were you talking about yourself?”

Sinclair blinks, and at first I don’t think he’ll answer, but after a moment he sighs and sits beside me. He leans forward and rests his elbows on my knees. “Yes.” He admits, watching me take my first bite of food with laser sharp focus. I moan with pleasure when the flavors hit my tongue, and some unreadable emotion flashes in his green eyes. “Lydia was beautiful, intelligent, and incredibly calculated. I don’t know if there was ever really love between us, or just the bond. We married because... that’s what you do when you find your mate. I knew she’d make a good Luna, and I wanted a family. I wanted to give her everything she desired – that’s the way it is with mates, even when the feelings are complicated, you feel compelled to make them happy.”

“Unfortunately what Lydia wanted was a baby.” Sinclair continued grimly. “And when I could not give her one, she left me for another Alpha – without a second thought. In the end I'm not sure if she loved me, or my money and power. She was a very materialistic woman, and the status of being a Luna wasn't worth nearly as much if she didn't produce an heir."

"That's awful." I murmur, wanting to reach for his hand, but not feeling quite brave enough. "I'm so sorry."

Before he can respond, a woman's voice sounds on the other side of the door. "Knock knock!"

When Sinclair rises to open the door, I look at my phone and see a series of texts from Cora. Why did Dominic Sinclair just call me to ask your favorite meal? How are you? What's going on? Are you with him?

Well that's one mystery solved. I think. However I don't have time to dwell on it, because Sinclair is ushering a woman I don't recognize inside.

"Ah Aileen, come in." Sinclair invites, showing her into the room. "Ella this is Aileen, she's my Beta's wife, and she's going to teach you everything you need to play the part of a Luna."

As curious as I am about the role, I'm more curious about Sinclair. I want to keep talking, but he's already departing, and Aileen is offering me a wide smile. "Are you ready to begin?"

Chapter 14 – Purchase

Ella

For a moment I don't know how to answer the strange woman. Am I ready to begin learning how to be a queen? Is anyone ever?

That's the kind of job that takes a lifetime of preparation, and I still don't even recognize half the words these people are using.

"Am I supposed to know what a beta is?" I whisper to Aileen, watching Sinclair stride out the door with an unreadable expression on his face.

"A beta is like a second in command." She smiles warmly, coming forward and taking both of my hands in hers. Now that we're alone, she looks me over with an approving nod. "Well you are a stunning little thing, I have to say. When Sinclair explained the situation to us I wasn't sure what to think, but now that I see you it makes a bit more sense. Any man would be lucky to have your genes passed down to their pups."

I bristle at this statement. I don't mind the compliment, but after what happened with Mike, I'm not overly fond of people commenting on my looks. I've already had one man reduce all of my value to physical beauty, so I'm definitely not crazy about an entire society of werewolves looking at me through the same lens. Luckily if we pull this off, they'll all believe I'm a shifter, but I suspect there will still be some questions. I'll have to talk to Sinclair about giving me a good backstory.

"But being a beta is more than just a job, isn't it?" I say, pushing past the awkwardness of the abrupt subject change. "It's something you're born into?"

Aileen seems to notice my discomfort, and takes her hands away. "Well yes, all wolves are born as alphas, betas or omegas."

"And what do those things actually mean?" I press, not understanding.

"You can think about it like a class system, though it's more complicated than that. Every wolf is born into their role, and there isn't any way of changing it. Alphas are the strongest both physically and in personality. That's why they lead our packs, they are the only ones dominant enough to rule a lot of very powerful beings." Aileen shares.

"But not all Alpha's rule, do they?" I wonder aloud.

"No, only the strongest of the strong actually take control." She clarifies patiently.

"So Sinclair?" Why does his name feel so electric on my tongue, why does the mere thought of him send a shiver down my spine?

“Is the most powerful of the pack leaders. That’s why he’s campaigning to be king.” Aileen reveals.

“But why is it a campaign?” I inquire. “If it just comes down to brute strength.”

“Well in the old days they would just fight, but we’re more evolved now. Now we don’t just want a ruler who can beat the competition into the ground, we want someone intelligent and compassionate.” Aileen explains.

“I have a hard time thinking of Sinclair as compassionate.” I admit. He was certainly ruthless when it came to our dealings. Then again, a little voice says in the back of my head. He did hold you when you cried.

Aileen looks as though she’s reading my mind. “Don’t let Dominic fool you.” She advises. “He’s had a rough go of it with his mate. Trust me, once you get past all his walls and sharp edges, there’s a very loving man underneath.”

“I don’t think I’ll be the one to get past those things.” I murmur doubtfully.

“I wouldn’t be so sure.” She muses. “You’re giving him a pup – after all this time.”

I don’t know what to make of this statement, and before I can consider it, Aileen is forging on ahead. “Now betas are born mediators. They aren’t so bossy as Alphas, so they don’t butt heads with the leader vying for control. They’re more mellow and even-tempered, they balance the Alpha out. That’s what my husband, Hugo, does for Dominic.”

“And omegas?” I ask.

“Omegas are on the bottom of the food chain, literally and figuratively. They’re smaller and weaker, and they have naturally submissive natures. They’re followers, not leaders.”

“So compared to a human,” I probe, “where would an omega stand?”

Aileen’s lip twitches, “All wolves are stronger, faster and have sharper senses than humans, no matter their rank. We’re different species, even the weakest wolf will be stronger than you.” She pauses thoughtfully. “I wonder how Dominic will cope with that.”

“What do you mean?” I question anxiously.

“Alpha’s are very protective, very possessive. He’s not going to like the idea that you’ll be so vulnerable among our kind.” She surmises, still halfway in her thoughts.

I can't focus on this at the moment however – it's not exactly news that Sinclair is bossy, and I'm still trying to wrap my head around the fact that magical creatures are real. "But how do shifters even exist?" I burst out. "I mean, do we have some common ancestor?"

"No, the goddess created us separate from humans." Aileen corrects gently.

Well this is new information. "The goddess?"

"The moon goddess, she rules over all creatures." Aileen informs me, as if this should be common sense.

"Why haven't I ever heard of her?" I ask, holding my hands to my head in confusion.

"Humans are more distant from the divine. You don't know about her, because you can't feel her magic and influence. We can."

Aileen states matter-of-factly.

"Gosh that's a lot to take in." I mutter, trying to imagine what it would be like to feel celestial power, to commune with the gods of creation somehow. I never believed such a thing was possible. I never even believed in a god – how could I? My life hasn't known many blessings. It's hard to believe in a higher power when all you know is suffering. While I'm lost in my thoughts, a young boy comes running through the door and Aileen catches him in a hug even as she scolds him.

"Naughty boy!" There was a huge smile on her face, and the child resembles her so clearly I know he must be her son. "You should know better than to enter a closed door without knocking!"

There's pure maternal joy shining off her face, and I have to wonder whether it's the first time they've seen each other that day, but when she speaks, it becomes clear that this is not the case. "Where's your father, I left you with him only ten minutes ago!"

"I know but I missed you." The boy grins up at his mother, and my heart melts in my chest. What must it be like to love someone so completely, to have such a powerful bond to another being? I want it so badly it hurts.

It's still so surreal to think I'm really pregnant after all this time, that it takes me a moment to remember I don't have to long hopelessly anymore. I'm going to have that kind of love soon. I press my hand to my belly with excitement. I can't wait until my next check up, until I can hear that tiny heart beat again, and see the baby in a sonogram. Sinclair is taking me this afternoon – to a shifter doctor this time – and I'm counting down the minutes now more than ever.

Thump thump thump.

Has there ever been a more beautiful sound than my baby's heartbeat? If there has, I've certainly never heard it. This appointment is so different from my last one. Instead of Sinclair towering over me lobbing threats and accusations, he's by my side, staring at the ultrasound screen with the widest smile I've ever seen on his face – completely transfixed.

I know exactly how he feels. These last few days I've felt like a higher power myself. I'm creating life inside me and it's nothing short of a miracle. In the moments I can forget my troubles, I'm giddy with happiness. I didn't realize how low my hope had fallen until I felt such disbelief at finally becoming pregnant.

"I never thought this day would come." I didn't mean to say the words, but they fall from my tongue as fresh tears burn in my eyes – tears of joy this time.

Sinclair's face turns away from the screen for the first time, his brilliant green eyes landing on my face as a tender smile takes over his features. His massive hand slides around my crown, gently cradling my head as he lowers his brow to mine, until they're resting against each other.

"It's real." He whispers to me, and I nod happily, taking comfort in his protective hands.

"Hmm." The doctor mutters, breaking our revelry.

"What, is something wrong?" I ask anxiously. Sinclair's thumb immediately begins brushing back and forth across my hair, instinctively soothing my fraying nerves.

"The baby's just a bit small for my liking." He tells us, making my heart race with worry.

Both men hear it immediately on the machines surrounding us, and Sinclair shushes me softly. "That's not necessarily bad, is it?"

"Well babies develop at different rates, but for a man of your size and strength, I would have expected a larger fetus." The doctor shares.

My hands are shaking, but Sinclair doesn't seem bothered. He snorts, "They told my mother the same exact thing when she was carrying me, and I turned out fine. She was little, like you." He adds warmly, "your body is doing it's best, it needs to fatten up a bit before it can support a bigger baby."

I have to fight the urge to laugh, and instead bat my lashes at him. "Then you should let me have all the ice cream I want."

Sinclair tosses his head back and laughs, "You are incorrigible." He remarks wryly. "What am I going to do with you at the campaign dinner tomorrow?"

"Campaign dinner?" I repeat, confused.

"Yes, didn't I tell you?" He looks genuinely surprised, or I might be more upset. "Tomorrow it's out of the frying pan and into the fire for our plan. I need you by my side. "

Chapter 15 – Learn werewolf

Ella

“What!” I exclaim, unable to wrap my head around this idea. “But I’m not ready!”

“You will be.” He promises. “Aileen will keep working with you tomorrow, and then we’ll go shopping so you can look the part. It’s only a meal, no one is going to be quizzing you on werewolf politics.”

“I don’t know.” I fret, “what if I say the wrong thing?”

“I’ll be with you the whole time.” Sinclair vows. “Don’t worry, I won’t let you put your foot in your mouth.”

This does make me feel better, but I’m still woefully far from feeling confident in my ability to pass as a completely different species. “Can’t we wait a little while?” I request anxiously. “I promise I’ll never miss another event, I just need a little more time.”

“Ella, the elections are in three months.” Sinclair says softly. “We don’t have much time to waste. Very few people change their minds at the last moment. My image has been marked with controversy from day one because I don’t have a family.”

“I don’t understand, why is that so controversial if the King is something people vote on. It’s not like having an heir is going to decide the future of succession.”

“Because it’s not about succession. It’s about personal stability. Unmated Alphas are viewed as being more temperamental and aggressive. If I have a mate and a pup however, people will view me as more grounded and cautious.” Sinclair explains.

“Is that true?” I ask, “that unmated alphas are wilder?”

Sinclair grimaces but nods, “To a degree, yes. Some men are more or less aggressive naturally, but it makes a difference when you have someone to take care of – someone who might be harmed if anything happened to you.”

“Okay, so you’re saying it has to be tomorrow?” I surmise, “the sooner you turn your image around, the better.”

“That’s right.” Sinclair agrees. “As long as you’re well enough, I need you there.”

“And you promise you won’t leave my side?” I question.

“You have my word.” He vows.

“Okay then.” I concur, not feeling half as confident as I sound.

The doctor – who by now has finished his exam – steps out, leaving me with Sinclair to change clothes before we check out.

However Sinclair doesn’t leave, he stays in the exam room as if he expects me to change in front of him.

“Aren’t you going to...?” I trail off, hoping he’ll pick up on my train of thought without me saying more.

“To what?” He asks, a knowing smile on his handsome face.

“I can’t change in front of you.” I protest, my cheeks going bright pink. “I’m only wearing underwear beneath this thing.”

His brow furrows, but there’s a devious glint to his intense eyes which makes me think he knows exactly what I mean. “Human modesty.” He clucks his tongue and shakes his head. “So prudish, you’ll see soon enough, wolves aren’t nearly as repressed.”

“I’m not a prude! Or repressed!” I defend hotly, climbing down from the table and regretting it instantly. A second ago I was equal to Sinclair in height, now he towers over me. .

“The Goddess made our bodies perfect as they are, why would we hide them?” He questions silkily, the same devilish smile on his face.

Narrowing my eyes at the big man, I grumble, “fine.” Whipping the gown off over my head, I stomp over to the corner where I left my clothes neatly folded. I tug them on quickly, but not so quickly that Sinclair will think I’m embarrassed about being exposed before him. When I turn back, he looks mildly impressed.

“I didn’t think you’d actually go through with it.” He confesses. “But I’m sure glad you did.”

I notch my chin up defiantly. “I don’t back down that easily. You might have seven senses or whatever, but it will take more than that to figure me out.”

His smirk only grows as he closes the distance between us, invading my space with his powerful presence. “I can’t wait.”

“What do you think?” I ask a few hours later, as I stand in front of a full length mirror in a gown which costs more than my apartment.

"I prefer the green one." Sinclair responds thoughtfully, his penetrating gaze running up and down my body as I try on yet another dress.

I don't know how to feel about this shopping trip. I'm enamored by the stunning clothes around us, but it seems so extravagant to spend so much on material things. I'm only too aware that orphans are starving in this very city, wouldn't the money be better spent on charity?

I say as much to Sinclair, but he only smiles at me. How has our relationship changed so quickly? A couple of days ago he only glared at me, now he always seems to look at me fondly. "Did you find nothing about my finances when you were snooping?"

"Research is not snooping." I answer tritely. However then the memory rises, and I recall that he gives at least half his fortune to the less fortunate. "If you still have this much to spend on mere clothes after giving away so much, maybe you should give more."

Sinclair shocks me completely. He nods thoughtfully. "Maybe I should." I can only blink, Mike never listened to my advice – or indeed anything I said – with so much attention. It's only now that I see what true consideration is like, that I realize just how deficient he was as a partner.

Trying to shake myself out of my thoughts, I change the subject. "So the green one?" I confirm, knowing precisely the dress to which he's referring. It's the same emerald shade as his eyes, and studded with gemstones and rose gold accents that precisely match my hair.

He nods. "It suits you, besides, it covers your shoulders."

"Why should that matter?" I question in confusion.

"Because I haven't marked you, and I don't want people to notice." He explains.

"Marked me?" I squeak, not understanding what this means.

"I take it Aileen didn't get that far?" He guesses, rising from the dressing room chair and prowling towards me. My pulse spikes as he approaches, and suddenly I realize why I'd felt like a rabbit facing a wolf when I went to plead Cora's case with him. That's basically what we are, he could snap me up in one bite, and I'd be helpless to stop him. "A mark," He begins, hooking his finger under the spaghetti strap of my gown and tugging it off my shoulder, "Is the way a wolf claims his mate."

I gulp, too focused on Sinclair to fully process his works. "Mark how?"

"It's a bite, right here." His traces a finger over the spot where my neck meets my shoulder. "A deep bite, one that leaves his scent permanently on her skin."

"I – doesn't that hurt?" I fret.

Sinclair laughs, a dark, husky sound. "No sweet Ella, not if you time it right."

"Time it right with what?" I inquire innocently, furrowing my brow.

The next thing I know, Sinclair's eyes are glowing with his wolf, and my knees go weak. "Maybe I'll explain it to you one day. In the meantime I'll just scent mark you." He remarks cryptically. "Now stay there, I'm going to fetch one more dress to try."

When he steps away, I realize just how attuned I am to his presence. I wasn't aware of any of my other surroundings when he was near. He consumed my attention completely, barring all else.

Once he's gone I notice a pretty blue frock on one of the racks just outside the dressing room. I move to examine it, but as soon as I take the dress from the rack, a second set of hands lands on the hanger and tries to yank it out of my hands. "Hey, I saw that first!"

The woman in front of me is blonde and pretty, but sneering with an awful expression. She pulls so hard on the hanger that I start to lose my balance. She must be a shifter, I think, she's too strong to be a human. At this point, I'm only hanging onto the dress because it's the only thing holding me upright, but the woman is soon trying to pry my hands free. "I said let go!"

I'm about to simply give up and fall to the ground, when a pair of powerful hands catch my waist, guiding my feet back to the ground.

"Take your hands off of her, right now!" Sinclair barks, his snarling voice silencing everyone in the store. The petty woman releases me quickly, seeming to shrink into herself in the face of the infuriated alpha. "I'm so sorry, Alpha." She apologizes. "I didn't know she was with you."

"That shouldn't matter." He declares, coming to my side. "Are you all right?"

"I'm fine," I insist, but before I can say more, another man speaks from behind us.

"Brother, don't tell me you're attacking defenseless woman now." The shifter speaking turns his attention to me now. "And who's this?"

Chapter 16 – Brother

Ella

The stranger looks a lot like Sinclair, and the word “brother” strikes my interest. If they’re siblings, why is Sinclair looking at him so harshly? They don’t seem friendly at all.

“This is Ella.” Sinclair announces, sliding his arm around my waist. “My future mate, and the mother of my pup.”

“Our pup.” The words are out of my mouth before I can stop them. I’m not sure why I said it, but the way Sinclair declared the pups as his – as if it belonged to him and not me – brought out my maternal instincts. I even growled a little as I staked my claim, making Sinclair’s lips quirk with amusement.

“You don’t really believe that, do you?” The man scoffs. “I’ve never seen or heard of you before, I didn’t have the faintest idea my brother was expecting, and he hasn’t even marked you.” I realize he’s right. Sinclair had mentioned scent marking me before the campaign dinner – whatever that means – but he hasn’t done it yet. Luckily his pup’s presence is strong enough to make me smell like a wolf, but this man clearly isn’t fooled by our pretense as a couple. “Let me guess, he just picked you up off the street because you make such a pretty womb?”

A low rumble is vibrating against my side as Sinclair’s wolf begins to growl. Meanwhile I flush with embarrassment, it’s not the truth, but it’s close enough to make me want to hide behind Sinclair’s strength and dominance. Where did that come from? The little voice in my head asks. You’ve never hidden from a problem or backed down from a challenge a day in your life. That’s true, but then again, I’ve never had anyone to hide behind before.

The man is still speaking, making fun of my naivete for expecting Sinclair to honor my role as our baby’s mother. “And you actually think he’ll keep you around once you squirt the kid out? Clearly brains and beauty don’t go hand in hand.”

“Clearly ugliness and cynicism do.” I bite back, feeling bolstered by Sinclair’s steady presence at my side. “If you ask me the fact that you haven’t heard about me says more about your low status than my own. You’re obviously not important enough to warrant the Alpha’s time.”

Sinclair chuckles darkly, giving me a small squeeze to show his approval. “She has a point, Roger.”

The man, Roger, glares at his brother before offering me a look that almost appears pitying. “Mark my words, he’ll toss you to the curb at the first opportunity.”

I notch my chin up, "You underestimate me, and Dominic." I announce, feeling a thrum of excitement to speak his given name for the first time. I think it's actually coming from the baby, as if I can feel Sinclair's pleasure to hear me saying it through our pup.

"He has more honor in his little finger than you do in your entire body. That much is obvious and I've only just met you."

Roger opens his mouth to argue back, but Sinclair stops him. "Roger, give it a rest. Show some respect to your future Luna."

"Really Dominic, you're going to keep up this act?" He counters fiercely. "How did you even manage this, aren't you sterile? How do you know the brat she's carrying is even yours?"

In a flash Roger is suspended in the air, with Sinclair's huge hand circling his throat, holding him aloft. He squirms and tugs at Sinclair's white knuckled fingers, but I don't think he's truly afraid because he shoots me a triumphant smirk. "More honorable, huh?" Roger quips. "You certainly have an interesting definition."

"Do not speak about my pup that way." Sinclair snarls, "I know it's mine because we are bonded already, and I will be bonded to Ella after our formal mating ceremony. If anyone needs to learn some manners, it's you."

Roger shrugs. "What do you expect, we never had a mother." He shoots another scathing look in my direction, "It's a shame your pup won't either. You could at least have the dignity to be honest with her."

Before I can keep track, Sinclair has dropped him to the floor. "Get out, before I really lose my temper."

Roger clammers to his feet and calls over the blonde woman who fought me over the blue dress. "Come on, Sasha, we're leaving." Before they depart however, Roger offers his brother one final scowl. "You miscalculated badly today, brother. What do you think the Alpha council is going to say when they find out you attacked your own family in broad daylight – over nothing more than a few honest words? The council wants a stable king, not a loose cannon. Clearly that pup hasn't done a damn thing to even you out. Just you wait, your campaign is going to be over by the end of tomorrow's dinner."

Part of me wants to run after Roger and kick him right in the behind, I can't believe what just happened. I don't blame Sinclair either, I don't think his aggression had anything to do with being unmated, I think it was because he feels so protective of his pup, and by extension – me. Besides, his brother has to know what a sore spot his fertility struggles are. How cruel does a person have to be to bring up such a thing.

"I'm sorry about that, Ella." Sinclair's attention is already back on me. "I shouldn't have lost control that way."

"If I'd been strong enough to attack him, I would have done it myself." I confide, leaning into his warmth. His energy is still very agitated, and all my instincts are driving me to comfort him the same way he's comforted me today. "What did you mean about a mating ceremony?"

"Oh," He shakes his head, brushing the topic aside. "That's just for show during the election. I don't expect you to actually go through with it. It's simply a way of explaining to people why you don't bear my mark."

"Oh." I murmur. Why does that disappoint me so much? I know Sinclair is handsome, but we're different species and he's completely controlling, I can't truly be attracted to him – can I?

Even as I think it, I breathe in his scent, and feel heat begin to pool low in my belly. Snap out of it! I scold myself. That's just the baby, it wants to be near its father. It's just another wolfy mindlink thing... isn't it?

I look up to Sinclair to make sure he's not watching me struggle to untangle these confusing feelings, and for once, his attention is very far away. My relief immediately gives way to sympathy as I take in his distant expression. "Don't be offended – but your brother is an asshole." I say gently.

Sinclair looks down at me, his grim features softening to a smile. "You can say that again."

"Do you want to talk about it?" I press, curious but not wanting to intrude on his private business.

"Oh," He sighs, dragging a hand through his hair. "Roger and I... we're very different people – as you saw. We've never gotten along."

"Why not?" I inquire.

Sinclair's face darkens, and I worry that I've pushed into such sensitive territory that he'll refuse to tell me any more, however he surprises me again. "I took his mother away from him. She died protecting me, and he's never forgiven me. There was already bad feelings between us – he's older, but I was always stronger. It was clear from a young age that I, and not he, would be my father's heir. So there was always jealousy and competition – then Mom sacrificed herself for me, and that was it."

"I'm so sorry." I express, intuitively wrapping my arms around him for a hug. I can tell he's surprised, I don't think many people instigate hugs with the future king, but I'm not a wolf, and all I see is a man in need of affection in front of me. His arms come around me in reply, and his voice purrs in my ear. "You really are full of surprises, you know that?"

"What's so surprising?" I ask against his chest, using the excuse to breathe in his delicious scent again. "You hugged me when I needed it – why shouldn't I return the favor?"

"I'm just used to taking care of others, that's all." He shares. "And I don't know anyone brave enough to touch me without permission."

"And here I thought wolves were supposed to be all tough and brave." I joke, pressing my nose to his pec. "They sound like a pack of scaredy-cats to me."

Sinclair laughs, sounding like a completely different man than the haunted creature he'd been a moment ago. "You know, if you keep this up I'm not going to be able to wait until tomorrow to scent mark you."

I'm getting ahead of myself now, feeling overconfident amidst his praise and safe to poke his buttons now that his horrible brother has gone away. "Why are you?"

"Because I want it to be strongest before the campaign dinner." Sinclair explains.

"It wears off?" I ask, putting two and two together.

"Your scent is getting so strong sometimes I forget how little you know about our ways. Did Aileen explain anything about this to you?" He questions.

"No – I think she was more concerned with teaching me political things."

His eyes light up, though I don't know why. "So you don't even know what scent marking is?"

"No." I flush, waiting for him to continue. When he doesn't I prompt, "are you going to tell me?"

"No." He replies slyly. "I'm going to show you."

Chapter 17 – Preparation

Some of my confidence has waned on the ride home. Sinclair has been so mysterious about this scent marking business, and I don't like the way he keeps looking at me – as if I'm some prey to be devoured.

There's still so much I don't understand about this world, like how carrying his child can make me smell more like a wolf myself, or how someone can leave a mark which must be sensed and smelled, rather than seen with the naked eye. Not for the first time, I'm jealous of shifters' heightened abilities. The more time that passes, the more enchanted I am by the idea of transforming, of letting out one's inner animal and being truly wild and free. I don't know why I like the idea so much – it's not like I have an inner animal to release, so I'm not actually missing out.

"You look nervous." Sinclair observes, resting one proprietary hand on my knee as the car speeds along. Of course, his touch only makes me more antsy.

"You can fix that." I suggest, "it doesn't have to be a surprise."

"True, but it's much more fun this way." He smirks.

"Fun for you maybe." I mutter mutinously. "Besides, if you want your scent to be strongest tomorrow, shouldn't we wait?"

"And deprive myself of the opportunity to do it a second time?" He arches a brow, "why on earth would I do that?"

"I..." I don't know what to make of this. If he were anyone else I'd think he was flirting with me, but that's not possible. Wolves and humans don't mix. Maybe he simply enjoys teasing me, like a cat toying with a mouse. He certainly enjoys making me squirm. I realize this must be the reason, and suddenly I find myself feeling very indignant. I don't like the idea of being some plaything to the hungry predator. I narrow my eyes at him. "Maybe I won't let you." I decide.

The hand on my knee tightens, but not enough to hurt. "What was rule number one, little human?"

"That I should be as relaxed and happy through my pregnancy, so you shouldn't be making me nervous." I reason, knowing full well he expects me to confirm that he – as Alpha – is in charge.

"You forget I have a link straight to our pup, I know when you're stressed, and when you're just making mischief." Sinclair rumbles. "But if you want more justification for doing it often, it's to avoid scenes like what just happened. If people can't see your shoulder and also smell me on you very powerfully, they can be fooled into thinking I have marked you. We can give the mating ceremony excuse to those who ask, but it would be better to avoid the questions altogether.”

A little while later, Sinclair is standing in front of me in my room, looking so powerful and attractive I'm almost too distracted to hear him speak. “Take off your clothes.” He instructs.

“What, all of them?” I squeak.

“You can keep your underwear on, but it's better if we're skin-to-skin.” He says, unbuttoning his own shirt.

I watch with wide eyes as he strips down to his boxer-briefs, taking in the sight of his muscular body and feeling my jaw go slack.

I've never seen anyone so rugged and chiseled.

“Do I need to take them off for you?” He asks, arching a brow and stepping forward.

“What? No!” I yelp, reminding myself that he's already seen me in my bra and panties. Taking a deep breath, I carefully lift my dress over my head, bracing myself for whatever is to come next.

Standing beside Sinclair in a ball gown, done up from head to toe in makeup, jewelry and heels, it seems hard to believe Sinclair was rubbing his mostly naked body all over me an hour ago. Scent marking – I've learned – is a deeply intimate act, one that confuses me more than I care to admit.

Yesterday when he marked me the first time, he took it slow and explained every step of the process, making sure I understood why it was so important to impart his scent on every inch of my body. This second time, however, was completely different. There were no explanations, no soothing caresses for my frazzled nerves. He came to me with a mission in mind, and slowly, sensuously covered me in his pheromones. If he noticed my body's response to his attentions – my aching breasts and liquid arousal, he gave no indication.

Now those feelings are long gone, as we're finally at the campaign dinner I've been preparing for non-stop over the last 48 hours. Sinclair quizzed me in the car on the way over, testing my knowledge of shifter society and nodding with approval when I smoothly answered each of his prompts. He hasn't said a word otherwise, which tells me just how much tension he's carrying in anticipation of the event.

When we arrive at an incredible palace, I can't keep my jaw from dropping to the floor. "I've never seen such a beautiful estate."

"This is where our pup will be raised if my campaign is successful." He shares, "The King's Palace."

"Why is the current King stepping down?" I ask as we climb the marble stairs, mostly trying to distract myself from all the flashing cameras and reporters screaming out to get Sinclair's attention.

"Alpha Dominic, over here!"

"Alpha Dominic, who's your date?"

"It wasn't his choice." Sinclair shares. "He's getting old and is no longer the strongest among us. The alpha council voted to force him to abdicate."

"Does he not have heirs of his own?" I question, trying my best to smile and wave at the crowd vying for attention around us.

"His eldest son is my biggest competition – and he would be a disaster." Sinclair intimates, ducking his head low enough that his lips brush the shell of my ear. "You're doing brilliantly by the way – look at them all, eating out of the palm of your hand."

I giggle quietly, feeling a wave of appreciation for the support. Normally I would be beside myself with nerves to walk into a room like this, surrounded by rich and powerful people – shifters. However next to Sinclair, the blatant stares and avid attention doesn't bother me. I feel confident by his side, even as I'm bowled over by his raw power. I didn't realize how much of it he keeps reined in on a day-to-day basis. Now however I can feel it viscerally, flowing off of him in a riptide of authority.

Before I know it, we've left the reporters behind and are crossing the ballroom to a pair of thrones at the end of a great hall. The throngs of people part to let us pass, and I have to admit – I do feel like royalty. No one has ever shown me so much respect or admiration.

I'm still reveling in the attention we're drawing when we stop in front of the King and Queen. They're both incredibly impressive.

The king's hair is streaked with gray, but he still has an air of unquestionable strength. His Luna is lovely and dignified, with features that hint to great beauty in her younger years.

Sinclair nods to each of them, while I dip into a curtsy. "Alpha Dominic," The king greets

Sinclair with a smile that doesn't reach his eyes. "Dare I say you've finally found a mate?"

"That's right." Sinclair announces, loudly enough for all to hear. "And the Goddess has blessed us with a pup."

"Well I must say you have excellent taste. You, my dear, are an incredible beauty." The Luna smiles, no more genuinely than her husband. "Congratulations to you both!"

The announcement prompts a rush of supporters to gather around us both, and before I even realize it's happened, Sinclair is no longer beside me, we're separated by a few people, but I can still see him, so I try not to panic. "You must tell us your name!" A small throng of women gush in front of me.

"I'm Ella." I share, unsure whether I should use my own surname, or his. "Soon to be Sinclair." I lie, deciding to stick with our cover.

They squeal with excitement, and more people swirl around me, until at last I'm faced by an imposing looking man. He's watching me sharply, almost with suspicion. "Tell me, Ella, where are you from? How is it we've never seen you before?"

"I come from the Shadow Pack, in the north." I explain, repeating the lie Sinclair and I agreed upon. "I was in town visiting my cousin when I met Sinclair, and the rest is history."

"Oh, what cousin?" He asks, zeroing in on the detail.

"Aileen Corentin." I bluff, smiling widely.

"As in the wife of Dominic's beta?" He presses. "And you only met him recently?"

"Yes – our families are deeply estranged. Bad blood you know, divided allegiances and all that." I explain. "I only recently learned I had a cousin here, but once I did I reached out so we could meet."

"Hmm," He murmurs thoughtfully. "Still you must have been here some time, if you're already breeding."

"Not long at all." I correct him, "but you know how it is when you find the one... or maybe you don't. I didn't believe in love at first sight myself, until I found Dominic." I beam towards the man in question, trying to look as if I'm head over heels in love.

It must have worked, because he excuses himself and slips away into the crowd, a thoughtful expression on his face.

I watch him stride away, hoping Sinclair will return to my side soon. I can't explain why, but I feel that wasn't the last I'll see of that man, and I don't want to be alone the next time he finds me.

Chapter 18 – Campaign dinner

Ella

Where is Sinclair? I think nervously, scanning the room. He promised he wouldn't leave my side. Why did I ever let myself get separated from him. The crowd around me is still bombarding me with questions, and though I think I'm putting up a good front, I can't help but feel overwhelmed. My pulse is racing, and the blood is rushing in my ears. I'm not ready for this. I've only had two days to prepare, surely they're going to see right through my act!

I'm getting more and more light headed by the minute, and my stomach is beginning to churn. I think I'm going to be sick, but I'm not sure if it's morning sickness, or my nerves. I might be excited about the idea of the baby making its presence known, but this is the last place I want to get sick.

I turn in place, searching the room for any kind of restroom. I can't ask any of the aristocrats around me, speaking about such a private matter with people of this stature would be considered incredibly inappropriate. However before I can figure out a possible retreat, I see Sinclair striding through the crush of shifters, his brow furrowed as he watches me.

The people around me disappear when he finally closes the distance between us, and I'm amazed to feel my nausea and my nerves settle as soon as I breathe in his scent and feel his warm presence. "Are you alright?" He asks with concern, brushing the hair out of my face.

Though I feel far better than I did a moment ago, I'm still terribly overwhelmed. My lower lip trembles, and I wonder if I'm really so stressed that I might cry, or if it's just my pregnancy hormones spinning out of control. I don't want to show weakness in front of Sinclair, I don't want him to think I'm not up to playing this role. I not only have to prove myself to all these strangers, but to the father of my child. I plaster a wide smile across my face. "I'm fine."

He narrows his eyes, sidling closer and dipping his head to my ear. "Are you being honest, sweet Ella?"

I bristle at this prompt. Who is he to demand honesty about my feelings? If I don't want to talk about them, that's my choice. I'm about to tell him as much, when his low growl ricochets through my body, and the words spill unwillingly from my lips. "It's just a bit of morning sickness." I explain in a whisper, "I think the crowd made me overheat."

"And?" He presses, clearly sensing that there's more to the story.

I don't not like how easily he can read me. Either that means I'm failing in my act, or his connection to our pup is giving him an unfair advantage sensing my emotions. To be honest, I'm not sure which possibility frightens me more. Still, I can't stop myself from speaking, though I refuse to look him in the eyes. "I got nervous." I can feel myself flushing at the admission, "you promised you wouldn't leave my side." I add petulantly, glaring up at him from beneath my lashes Sinclair's demanding growls soften to a purr, and the next thing I know, he's tucking me to his chest, stroking his hand down my spine in a soothing caress. "Poor little mate." He murmurs, no doubt for the people around us who might overhear. "I'm sorry I've been neglecting you."

I can hear the crowd oohing and ahing at the display, an Alpha caring for his mate. Is that why he's doing this? Does he actually care about my feelings, or is he just putting on a show? It must be the latter, I decide, otherwise he wouldn't ever call me his mate.

"How sweet." I recognize the voice immediately. It belongs to the same man who was questioning me with such suspicion a little while ago. "Breeding women can be so needy, can't they, Alpha Dominic?"

A growl rises in my defense, but to my surprise, it doesn't come from Sinclair – it comes from me! I don't think I've ever growled in my life. Is that the pup's influence? Sinclair probably thinks it's part of my act, trying to pass myself off as a she-wolf, but I didn't intend to do it at all!

A few chuckles pass through the crowd, though I don't know why. I feel completely serious, but I hear murmurs describing my cuteness. The other man blinks, looking up at Sinclair as if he expects him to chastise me. "My apologies, your highness."

Sinclair states simply. "She's a fierce little thing at the best of times." The words sound like an excuse for my behavior, but his tone is full of praise and his arms tighten around me affectionately.

Too late, his address for the other man filters through my brain. Your Highness. That must mean this is the prince, and Sinclair's main opponent in the election. It's no wonder I found him so imposing, or why he resembles the King so much.

"Well, what more could we want in a Luna." The Prince remarks, not sounding like he means a single word of this. "In fact, your loving display has inspired me! What's say we play a game, to celebrate your new family?"

"What kind of game do you have in mind?" Sinclair's muscles tensed, but his reply tells me saying no isn't really an option here.

After all, the entire point of this evening is to sell our relationship to the Alpha council. They're supposed to believe we're madly in love and overjoyed to be starting our family. We're being tested now, and backing down from the challenge would be a mistake.

“My own special version of the newlywed game.” The Prince gives us a sly grin. “To test the mating bond.”

I try to stay calm, but inside I’m panicking. We don’t have a mating bond, how on earth are they going to test it? We’re sure to fail, and at the very first hurdle! I look up at Sinclair for guidance, but he’s smiling at the Prince, calling his bluff. “As you wish.”

The Prince guides us towards the dais before the king and queen, placing me on one side, and Sinclair on the other. “Now the object of the game is simple.” The Prince explains, raising his voice so the entire audience can hear. “Ella and Dominic will communicate with each other through their bond, and afterwards they’ll both have to write out what the other expressed without consulting one another verbally. If their responses match perfectly, we’ll know they’re a strong couple.”

The implications are obvious, if our responses don’t match, we’ll look like a disconnected, weak couple – not the united Alpha and Luna we should be. Oh god, we’re going to fail! I think anxiously. Sinclair’s bond to the baby is strong, but the baby is so little that their mental link is still dependent on him touching me. I could hear Sinclair’s voice when I was passed out in his arms, and he could hear the pup’s craving when his hand was on my belly. Otherwise it hasn’t happened.

I look to Sinclair, but he seems completely unconcerned. Then again, I have no doubt he’s very good at hiding his emotions after spending so long in the public eye. Indeed, his face is a perfect mask, and as our eyes meet, I try to listen with all my might, praying that somehow his bond to the pup will spark to life even at this distance.

After a moment I realize it’s no use. I don’t have the first idea what he’s trying to communicate to me, so I do the only thing I can think of. I cross the dais swiftly and throw myself into the huge Alpha’s arms. I slide my arms around his neck as he catches me, and press my lips to his.

Sinclair purrs, locking me to him with one strong arm and catching the back of my head with the other, holding me in place so his talented lips can plunder my mouth. I might have instigated the kiss, but he takes charge immediately, drawing tiny whimpers from me as his tongue teases my lips and then delves inside. Fireworks explode behind my eyes as butterflies burst to life in my tummy.

I’ve never been kissed like this before, with so much skill and dominance that it feels as though he’s reaching inside me and touching my very soul. I’ve also never felt this kind of electricity with any partner. It’s as if my entire body is on fire, and he’s barely even begun. My feet are hovering around his knees, and I remember Sinclair’s remark about humans being prudish, so I wrap my legs around his waist as best I can through my voluminous skirts.

It's not until he pulls back, finally snapping me out of my daze, that I remember we're not alone. While his lips were on mine I wasn't aware of anything but the two of us, but now I realize cheers and wolf whistles are egging us on all sides. The crowd seems to love our display, but when I open my eyes again I find Sinclair's dark gaze boring into me so forcefully my heart stops beating completely.

Uh-oh, I think I might have just made a huge mistake.

Chapter 19 – A kiss

3rd Person

Ella slowly untangled herself from Sinclair's body as he returned her feet to the ground, feeling terribly unsure of herself. The audience was still making a huge racket, but the imposing Alpha was studying her as if she was some sort of curious anomaly – one he was desperate to figure out. Her cheeks were flushed scarlet, but she followed his lead. Sinclair hadn't looked away from her to acknowledge their onlookers – so she didn't either.

Ella couldn't have known how much more meaningful it was for Sinclair to be watching her this way, rather than smiling. Shifters were creatures of raw passion and intense feeling, there were many lighthearted moments of course, but the look of a successfully mated Alpha and Luna was not the lovesick expressions humans so often displayed in relationships. To those around them, Sinclair's laser focus on the little human looked like a devoted lover hungry for his mate, and her anxious energy was only further proof – a she-wolf who had just provoked her mate's lust in public, and was going to have to face the consequences when she got home.

The tableau only made them cheer louder, and this eased Ella's fears a bit. Sinclair might not be happy with her, but the crowd certainly was. It can't have been a complete mistake, could it?

"How lovely, but not exactly the point of the game." The Prince's drawling criticism finally broke the spell, at last tearing Ella and Sinclair's attention away from one another.

"Wasn't it?" Ella asked innocently, feeling less intimidated by the Prince than the wolf still holding her in an iron grip. "He told me to kiss him – was I supposed to refuse?"

The spectators laughed and applauded, and Sinclair turned glowing eyes in their direction. "No doubt you'll forgive us taking our leave." He declared rakishly, earning a fresh surge of wolf whistles. "My mate is in need of some attention."

Ella blinked, wondering if he meant what she suspected. Were wolves really so open about sex? Before she could think about the matter any further, the King stood and offered them a toast, "To the happy couple."

Sinclair led Ella back through the flood of congratulations and well wishes, past the media frenzy and back into the safety of his limousine.

She slid into the far end of the vehicle, hiding from all the camera flashes behind blacked out windows. When Sinclair slid in a moment afterwards, he zeroed in on Ella immediately. The corner of his mouth tilted up when he saw her sitting as far away as possible. "Is there a reason you're all the way over there?"

"Are you angry?" Ella murmured in reply, wrapping her arms protectively around her middle. She was painfully aware that if she messed up badly enough, it might cost her the baby.

"How could I be angry?" Sinclair exclaimed, truly shocked. "Ella, you saved the day. That was brilliant. None of the Alphas on the council will question me now. Even the King liked you. My campaign is safe because of your quick thinking."

"Oh," she relaxed slightly, feeling silly now. "You looked so severe after the kiss, I just... I thought I messed up."

"Far from it." Sinclair announced as the car slowly began to move. "But I am curious what inspired you to kiss me."

Ella stared at her lap. "It was the first thing that came into my mind. I knew we were going to fail if we actually had to play the game."

"But why a kiss?" He pressed. "You were already feeling ill, you could have easily given morning sickness as an excuse. No one would have faulted you."

"I don't know." She shrugged, fidgeting nervously.

"Did you like it?" He pressed, his deep voice like velvet cloaked steel.

"What?!" Ella chirped, her gold eyes going wide. "Of course not, it was just for show. Besides, I'm not a good kisser anyway."

Sinclair's brow furrowed. "Why the hell do you think that?" He asked.

"Mike told me, more than once." She admitted, her voice barely louder than a whisper.

Sinclair rose from his seat, having heard more than enough. He migrated over to where Ella sat, kneeling down onto the floor of the car so he could look her in the eye. Is he going to touch me? Ella wondered anxiously. Why do I want to feel his hands on me so badly? She got her answer a moment later, when he took her chin between his thumb and forefinger, and tilted her face up to his. "Your ex was a fucking idiot." He murmurs. "For more reason than one."

Her heart sank, it hadn't escaped her notice how many people had commented on her beauty that evening, or how proud Sinclair had seemed to have her on his arm.

"Because I'm pretty?"

Sinclair shook his head. "You're gorgeous, Ella, but so are lots of people. He's an idiot because he couldn't see past it – to the force of nature underneath."

"I'm not a force of nature." Ella protest. "I'm poor and weak and –"

His finger moves to cover my lips. "You are what I say you are." Ella bristled beneath his intimate touch and domineering manner.

She wanted to challenge him, to insist that she knew herself better than he did. With great effort, she kept her mouth shut because she knew it wasn't an argument she could win. Nodding in approval, Sinclair continued. "And I say you are brave, clever, so sweet I can't stand it, and so much stronger than you know." He offered her a wolfish grin then, "Not not mention the best kisser I've ever had the pleasure of tasting."

Ella blushed scarlet, and Sinclair chuckled, taking the seat next to her. He slung an arm over her shoulders, encouraging her to lean into his warmth. "Thank you." Ella murmured, sinking into his embrace.

"I didn't say it to please you." Sinclair remarked simply, brushing off her thanks. "I said it because it's true."

"Bossy wolf." Ella muttered, earning herself another rumbling laugh.

Before long her eyelids were growing very heavy, and the exhaustion of the stressful evening threatened to take hold completely.

She tried to stay awake until they returned home, but the little voice in her head told her not to be silly. Sinclair would make sure she woke up when the time came.

Sinclair watched as Ella slowly succumbed to sleep, feeling a stab of guilt for putting her through so much when she needed her rest. He couldn't help ducking his head to press a kiss to her hair, thinking again of their kiss. For all her flaws, he'd thought he'd been to heaven and back with Lydia when it came to sex – after all the Goddess fated couples together based on sexually compatibility. She'd been the best lover he'd ever had, but kissing her hadn't felt anything like kissing Ella.

She threw herself into the act so freely, without any inhibitions or reluctance. Ella was clearly an incredibly affectionate woman, and it made him even angrier to imagine the world denying her the love she deserved for so many years. He couldn't wait until Mike was finally in front of him. He'd teach that feckless human a lesson he'd never forget.

Sinclair breathed in the fragile human's scent, calming his temper with Ella's bewitching fragrance. His wolf purred with approval, his voice rising in the back of Sinclair's head. She smells better and better every day. This one is special.

It's probably just the baby. Sinclair reasoned, knowing exactly what his wolf was talking about. The more time that passed, the more Ella smelled like a she-wolf. Frankly it had been driving him crazy – pushing him to scent mark her far more frequently and intimately than was necessary, toying with his senses at every turn. He wasn't even sure how to describe her aroma – one moment it was like fresh rain and wild orchids, the next like sultry summer nights and sweet honey.

Completely different from the pup. His wolf pointed out. You know it's not the same scent.

That's true, but there's no other reason her scent would be changing. You forget this has never happened before, we don't know what happens to humans carrying shifter pups. I'm sure it's just the baby.

Sinclair's wolf rolled his eyes. Fine, stick your head in the sand if you're so determined. The Alpha wasn't sure what to make of this – of any of this. Why was his wolf being so difficult, arguing and being contrary just to be contrary. This had never happened before. His wolf had been with him from birth, and they'd never butted heads this way.

What on earth did it mean? And why was Ella the one to bring out this side of his inner animal? Was his wolf right? Was there something special about her? Or was it just the fact that she was carrying his baby, making his dreams come true when no one else had been able to do so? Did that alone make her special? Sinclair was not a man who was used to feeling uncertain, and he didn't like it one bit. At the same time, he couldn't bring himself to blame Ella for making him feel this way, even though she was certainly the cause.

Instead he found himself watching her sleep the rest of the ride home, completely transfixed, and perfectly content to watch her do nothing at all.

Chapter 20 – Shower

Ella

I dream that I'm on a boat, rocking gently in a starlit sea. I stare up at the night sky, bathed in the light of the full moon. My belly is swollen with my pup, and Sinclair is beside me, telling me stories about shifters – all the myths and legends of his people. His voice carries me along the waves, until he begins describing the life we'll have together with our baby. He paints a picture of perfection, a happy life as a family of three- my child and I pampered and cared for while he rules his empire, wanting for nothing.

It all seems too good to be true, and it's not until I realize I'm dreaming that I understand why. When I blink my eyes open, I realize that there are tears in them. I really am rocking, but not in any boat. Sinclair is carrying me inside from the car and clearly trying very hard not to wake me.

I must have fallen asleep. I realize dazedly.

"You don't have to carry me." I murmur, hoping the emotion in my voice can be passed off as grogginess.

"Hush now." He croons, "I don't mind. You just rest."

Another time I might argue, but I'm so sleepy, and his arms feel so good around me that I just snuggle in. To my surprise, Sinclair leans his face towards my hair and inhales a deep breath. "You smell more like a wolf every day." He shares. "The baby must be very healthy."

This idea makes me smile, "Will I be able to feel it move soon, if pregnancy is so much shorter?"

"After a couple of months, yes." He confirms.

This is still sooner than human babies quicken, but I feel so impatient. "Hmph, that's so long to wait."

Sinclair chuckles. "Maybe, but it will be so worth the wait, sweet Ella."

"Do... do shifter pregnancies ever have complications?" I ask, finally feeling brave enough to voice this hidden worry. It's been on my mind ever since the doctor told me the baby was developing slowly, but Sinclair seemed so confident that I told myself everything was fine.

“Rarely.” He answers. “But it happens. That’s why I’m being so cautious with you – I don’t want anything to happen, for both our sakes.”

I scoff, pressing my nose to his chest and inhaling his own scent. “I think you just like telling people what to do – baby or not.”

Sinclair’s wolf flashes in his eyes, but he smirks; “Keep it up you naughty thing, and I’ll show you what strict really is.” Before I can respond or contemplate what this might mean, he pushes into my bedroom, striding towards my bed as if he intends to tuck me in.

“No, I want a shower first.” I object.

“Are you sure? It’s very late.” Sinclair asks.

I nod, “I hate going to bed not feeling clean.” After a childhood of almost always feeling dirty, it had become a crutch of mine.

Sinclair helps me with the zipper on my dress, and within minutes I’m standing beneath a steaming cascade of water, feeling more and more myself as more of the day washes away. I felt like a different person with all that makeup and finery on, it’s such a relief to be free of it.

I’m rinsing shampoo from my hair when I hear a strange growl – violent and very close by. It isn’t Sinclair, and it isn’t coming through the me*tal link with the baby. I don’t know how I can recognize his growl from anyone else’s, but in my heart, I know that danger is near. Did someone come into the bathroom after me? I wonder frantically, trying to peer through the fogged up glass, how did they get past Sinclair’s guards!?

The snarl sounds again, reverberating around the small space, and I cry out in fear, unable to stay quiet. I don’t think ten seconds passed before the door slams open and Sinclair appears, his wolf glowing in his eyes. “Ella, are you alright? What’s wrong?”

He comes over to the shower stall, opening the glass door to release the steam, and finds me curled up in a ball in the corner. “I swear someone was in here with me.” I confess shakily. “I could hear them growling and snarling, but I couldn’t see through the steam.”

Sinclair’s body, already rigid, tightens even further as he begins scenting the air and searching the room. “I don’t smell anything” He tells me after a moment, “but I’ll have the guards search anyway, just in case” He charges out of the room only long enough to bark some orders at his guards, telling them to begin searching the grounds. While he’s away, I wrap a towel around my naked body, trying to ease my trembling.

As soon as Sinclair returns, he pulls me into his arms. "It's okay Ella, you're safe." He promises.

"I'm sorry, I don't know what's wrong with me." I apologize.

"It's okay, it's probably just all the stress piling up on you." He reasons. "But if you don't feel safe you can sleep in my room tonight."

I nod into his chest, realizing it's bare for the first time. He must have been getting ready for bed himself.

My nerves are so frayed that I don't even object when he swings my legs up into his arms, or think about stopping to grab night clothes, I simply let Sinclair carry me back to his rooms. When he sets me down I realize I didn't bring anything to sleep in. I pause, trying to decide if I want to go back or ask to borrow something, when Sinclair's voice interrupts my thoughts. "Oh no!"

"What, what's wrong?" I ask anxiously, spinning around and searching for a threat.

However Sinclair's attention is focused on me, and suddenly I'm painfully aware of the fact I'm only wearing a towel.

"You washed off my scent." He frowns, prowling closer.

"So?" I murmur, "I'm only going to sleep. No one is going to be smelling me."

He shakes his head. "We can't take that risk."

"I – what risk?" I murmur, feeling my blood heat up in response.

"Well if I have to wake up early and leave for the office, there won't be time to mark you before I go." Sinclair reasons. "I'm afraid my wolf is fairly insistent. It needs to be tonight."

"Your wolf?" I squeak.

Sinclair nods, "It's for the baby's protection, he won't let either of us rest until it's done."

He's towering me over now, and I can already feel my body getting worked up. The last couple of times he's marked me have been almost dangerously arousing. "But I'm naked." I whisper, as if it's some sort of secret.

His green eyes flash, and a shiver runs down my spine. “Do you want me to go get you some underthings?”

I gnaw on my lower lip. I don't want him to leave, and the idea of being completely naked with this man is beyond intriguing. Besides, I know it doesn't mean anything to him. Nudity to shifters is completely normal, and he might think I'm pretty or a good kisser, but at the end of the day I'm still a human. He could never want me that way.

I shake my head after a moment, hoping I won't completely embarrass myself. Sinclair nods with approval, reaching for my towel. I instinctively clutch the fabric to my skin, backing out of his reach. He arches a brow, “Second thoughts?”

“No.” I respond defiantly, unwrapping the terrycloth and revealing myself to him completely.

His dark gaze rakes over every inch of my exposed skin, and before long I have goosebumps. Sinclair strips off his own clothes, and it takes all my willpower not to look below his waist. He backs me into the bed, and when my thighs hit the mattress I clamber up onto it, still inching out of his reach, but too afraid to turn my back on such a known predator. I know he would never hurt me, but right now his wolf is in control, and I feel his power deep in my bones.

I'm shifting backwards towards the pillows, and suddenly Sinclair is on the bed with me. He's on all fours, stalking me with lethal grace until I'm pinned beneath him, feeling more vulnerable than I have in my entire life. A low purr sounds in his chest as his green eyes bore into mine, and somehow I feel soothed, even as he lowers his face to the curve of my neck and breathes me in. His chest is brushing mine, and I'm embarrassed to realize my nipples are already hard.

“Are you cold?” He rumbles in my ear.

I nod, not feeling brave enough to admit how turned on I am.

“Mmm, let's see if we can do something about that.” He offers, pressing his limbs flush to mine. The next thing I know his body is undulating against mine as his hands stroke every inch of me. This is like the previous times he marked me, only even more intimate than before. We've never done this naked, and until now, he's always been in total control, now I can feel his hardness pressing into my thigh, and I have to tell myself over and over again that it's just a natural response – just the pooling wetness between my legs is perfectly normal – considering a gorgeous man is currently rubbing himself all over me.

It takes longer this time, though I don't know why. It seems like Sinclair is determined to be even more thorough than in the past. I'm proud that I'm able to get through it without making a fool of myself, and though I wish it could go on forever, I'm also relieved when Sinclair finally stops, settling with his ear pressed to my belly, just above our pup. He looks so serene listening to the tiny heart beat, and who knows whatever else is coming through the me*tal link. I actually thought he'd fallen asleep, until of course he opens his eyes and catches me staring. "There's someone I want to take you to meet tomorrow."

Chapter 21 – Sinclair Confides in his father

Sinclair

I think my wolf is broken. Legitimately. I can't figure out what on earth is going on with him. Last night the threat against Ella made my heart practically leap out of my chest, but that's to be expected. What was not to be expected was how upset my wolf became when he realized that Ella had washed my scent off. Despite what I told her, it had nothing to do with protecting our cover, and everything to do with him throwing a tantrum that she was no longer scent marked.

Being naked with her was both a blessing and a curse. I could happily admire her beautiful body all day long, but the intimate physical contact got me more than a little excited. My balls were so blue by the time my wolf was satisfied that the only way I could calm down was by listening to the baby's heartbeat. It was an important reminder to be gentle with Ella, and gave me more joy than I can express.

My mental link with the pup is a fleeting thing, and most of the time all I can hear are blips of emotion. The baby is happy when it hears Ella's voice or smells me, it likes it best when we're together, and more often than not it simply sleeps. Still, merely being near it has given me new appreciation for my own father. I never knew it was possible to love someone I've yet to even meet so much, and the power of the bond astonishes me. Moreover, I want Dad to meet Ella – he's had a rough few years, and I can't think of anything that would make him happier than meeting the woman carrying his first grandchild.

Ella looks nervous as the car moves along through the heavy mid-day traffic. I haven't told her who I'm taking her to meet yet and I'm getting the impression she doesn't like surprises. She's a fascinating puzzle, this little human. Clearly accustomed to great hardship and yet obviously used to getting her own way. I suppose after such a turbulent life, control is a crutch for her, so much so that she panics when it slips out of her fingers. Is it terrible that I enjoy throwing her off balance so much, knowing what I do about her past? She's just so cute when she gets all riled up – I can't help myself.

When the car finally pulls to a stop, Ella blinks up at me hopefully. "Will you tell me now?"

"Come on, trouble." I chuckle, sliding out of the car and extending my hand to help her do the same, "You'll find out soon enough."

Ella grumbles mutinously under her breath as she sets off down the street, and I catch her waist, pulling her under my arm. "Would you like to say that a bit louder?" I intone ominously.

"No." She responds tartly. "I would not."

“You know I have supernatural hearing, right?” I question, watching her eyes widen anxiously.

She processes this for a moment, then narrows her eyes suspiciously. “Could you really hear me?”

“Not this time.” I admit, “you did a good job mumbling.”

“Then I’ll do a good job in the future too.” Ella decides, nodding in approval of her decision.

I’m reluctant to laugh and encourage her defiance, but I can’t stop the corners of my mouth from quirking up. I steer her into the house, pushing through the heavy door without pausing to knock. As we stride inside the familiar space, I’m transported back to my childhood, remembering walking these same halls as a young boy. It’s not as luxurious as my current estate, but it’s undeniably the place I consider home.

“Whose house is this?” Ella asked, surveying the comfortable rooms curiously.

“Actually, this is the house where I grew up.” I finally share, nodding towards the photos on the wall.

Ella is so preoccupied studying the images that she doesn’t seem to notice my father wheeling into the hall, seated comfortably but permanently in a high-tech wheelchair. Either Ella really is interested in the images before her, or human hearing is even worse than I realize, because she doesn’t turn around until I speak.

“Dad this is Ella.” I nudge her forward so they can meet, “Ella, this is my father.”

Ella blinks, seeming unable to find the words to reply. This was clearly the last thing she expected. My father was once a terrifying man – every bit as tall and imposing as I am myself. Now however, he’s a shadow of the man he used to be. He was paralyzed from the waist down more than five years ago now, and even though the injury stole his title, vitality and mobility, he’s never let it dampen his spirit. In intelligence and will he’s as strong as he’s always been, and I still learn from him every time we talk.

“I hoped he would bring you to meet me soon.” Dad tells Ella. “I’m so thrilled that you found each other. I’ve been waiting for a grandchild for some time now.”

“It’s an honor to meet you.” Ella replies, “I’m happy too, I think we’ve all been waiting.”

“You can say that again.” I chime in.

“Please, come in, I want to hear everything about my new daughter-in-law.” Dad encourages, wheeling into the living room. Ella, however, is frozen in place. At first I thought his allusion to our fake union might have blindsided her, but the more I watch, the more I suspect she’s more daunted by the prospect of sharing her story with him. Even though I know all the major moments in her life from my investigators, I realize Ella has never spoken about them herself. The more I think about it, the more I appreciate how little she speaks about her past at all.

I’m almost disappointed in my own powers of observation. She’s so charming and affectionate it’s easy to mistake her genial qualities for openness – but she isn’t open, not really.

Ella actually sighs with relief when her phone begins to ring, though she looks up to me for permission before actually answering it. “It’s okay, go ahead.” I permit, “I need to have a word with my Dad anyway.”

She nods appreciatively and raises the device to her ear, “Cora?”

I can hear the other woman’s voice on the other end of the line, and stride after my father to avoid eavesdropping. I really did want to introduce Ella to Dad – to connect these new members of my family with the man who raised me – but I also need to speak to my father after what happened last night.

“Ella’s taking a call from her sister.” I explain when I enter the room alone, taking a seat across from him. “And as eager as I am to catch up with you, I need to speak about something and I don’t want her to overhear.”

My father was Alpha for almost 20 years before the attack, and he understands the need for discretion and secrecy better than anyone. No one understands the drive to protect your loved ones from unseen threats better than a pack leader. “Go ahead.”

“We went to a campaign event last night at the King’s palace – it was Ella’s public debut.” I recount, “But when we came home there was a strange wolf in her room. They were gone by the time I reached her and I said it was just her imagination, but I’m afraid whoever was there wanted to hurt her.”

“She has no idea?” My father clarifies.

“I didn’t want to frighten her more than she already was. The baby is still so little – she doesn’t need the stress.” I share, even as a stab of guilt assails me. “Do you think the King or the Prince might have been behind it?”

“You know as well as I do that the King will go to any lengths necessary to hold onto his power.” My father rumbles, nodding to his mangled legs.

We've never been able to prove it, but the timing of my father's injury was always beyond suspicious. Rogues beset him after an event during his own campaign to be king five years ago, after the last king died without ever producing an heir. His primary competitor became king, and probably expected to rule for far longer than he actually has. I consider it karma, if you have to sabotage your competition to seize power, it shouldn't be any surprise when the alpha council loses faith in you afterwards.

"The King and Prince never paid any attention to me before though," I remind him, "do you think my perceived sterility really kept them at bay? Is having a pup on the way really all it took for them to finally see me as a threat?"

"You know the history as well as I do," My father murmurs, "They never believed the Alpha council would elect another ruler without heirs, even if you were the most qualified candidate for the job. Ella changes everything. Your pup changes everything."

"Then why not attack me?" I growl, hating the idea that finally getting a family of my own could also bring about the end of my career. "Why target Ella?"

My father rolls his eyes then. "Come on, Dominic. Whether they admit it or not, you're the strongest Alpha to enter the field of competition in half a century – stronger even than me." He concedes with a smile. "Going after you would be suicidal – but a breeding she-wolf? She's the perfect target." He shakes his head. "And if you don't have heirs, you might as well give up the throne now."

"That isn't fair." I snarl. "Ella is innocent in all this – and the pup..." I trail off, unable to comprehend the idea of anyone hurting an unborn child.

"I know." My father sighs, "But this cannot be ignored. If we're right, Ella and the pup are in grave danger."

Chapter 22 – Ella’s Nightmares

Ella

“Wait, what!” I exclaim, not believing my own ears. “You got your job back?”

“It sounds like somebody very important called in some favors for me.” My sister confirms. “They even gave me a raise to compensate for my troubles.”

She doesn’t need to say more. There’s only one person with enough power to undo a command issued by Dominic Sinclair – and that’s Dominic Sinclair himself. “I can’t believe this. Why didn’t he tell me?”

“You mean you didn’t ask?” I can imagine the precise look on Cora’s face. Stunned and reeling at once.

“I mean, not after that first time.” I relate, wondering if I should have tried harder to help her. Did I misperceive my importance to Sinclair, or the power I hold now that I’m carrying his child?

“Well apparently that’s all it took.” She relates, her voice full of elation. “Thank you, Ella.”

“Don’t thank me,” I object. “I’m the one who got us into this situation to begin with.” I remind her ruefully.

“Of course you didn’t.” She refutes. “Listen, I don’t know how it happened, but either I made a mistake or...”

“Or what?” I press.

“Or someone did this on purpose.” She sounds uncertain now, as if she can’t fathom the motive for such an act. I find myself equally confused.

“Why would they?” I fret, not wanting to believe my sister messed up so badly, but not seeing any logic in the alternative.

“I don’t know.” She confesses. “But that’s not important now. It’s all going to be okay from here on out. You get your baby, I get my career... the only thing we need now is to find a way to get revenge on Mike.”

“That was a much easier problem to solve before he fled halfway across the country.” I share. “I’m not sure how I’m supposed to enact any sort of plan against him when he’s so far away.”

“You could always ask for Sinclair’s help.” Cora suggests, a note of teasing in her voice – the same one children use on the playground to tease each other about crushes.

“No.” I don’t even need to think about it. “I don’t want him to think I’m high maintenance. He’s already helped me so much.” Glancing at the closed door Sinclair disappeared behind, I sidle back towards the entrance, lowering my voice to a whisper. “If I start to seem like too much trouble he might change his mind about letting me have visitation rights with the baby. It’s honestly driving me crazy – I’ve got to censor every single word that comes out of my mouth.”

“It’s not as if you were an open book before, Elle.” Cora replies wryly.

“No, this is different.” I clarify. “I’m constantly afraid that I’ll say the wrong thing and make myself seem weak or fragile, too annoying to put up with. It’s exhausting.” I drag my hand through my hair. “I end up over-analyzing everything I do with him. I shouldn’t have cried, I was too sassy, too timid, too bold. It’s like walking an emotional tightrope. And the worst part is that he can read me so damned well that even when I try to hide what I’m feeling, he still works it out.”

“I’m sorry sweetie.” Cora commiserates.

“Thanks,” I sigh, “I think I just need a little more time to get my bearings. Once I figure Sinclair out I’ll understand what I need to do to keep my head above water.”

There’s a pregnant pause on the other end of the line.

“What?” I prompt my sister, knowing she wants to say something.

“It’s just that I worry when I hear you talk that way.” Cora admits. “It’s like you’re still in survival mode – ‘keeping your head above water,’ rather than taking care of yourself, making yourself happy and enjoying becoming a mother.”

“Yeah well, like it or not, this is a survival situation.” I counter cynically, “if I don’t perform well I lose my baby. The best I can hope for if I do perfectly is visitation rights after Sinclair finds his mate, and even that could mean anything from every weekend to once a year. I don’t want to risk landing with the latter or bungling the deal completely.”

Cora sighs heavily, and lets the matter drop. “How are you otherwise? Any morning sickness?” She asks, excitement entering her tone.

I laugh. “I spent all morning in the bathroom... but I’ve never been happier to be sick.”

“Aw, I’ve never been happier for you to feel miserable either.” She jokes. “I hope it keeps up.”

“Me too.” The more the baby makes its presence known, the more secure I feel that it’s growing big and strong.

“Anyway, I’ve gotta run. Sinclair brought me to meet his father.” I confess. “It was great to talk though, let’s have dinner soon.”

Lunch with Sinclair’s father was surprisingly pleasant. I don’t know what I imagined when I pictured the elder Alpha, but the sweet man in the wheelchair was far from the imposing figure I expected. He radiated quiet strength and dignity, but he also welcomed me to his family with genuine warmth. I could see the shadow of a powerful leader in his stoic demeanor, but also the humility of a man whose circumstances had irrevocably changed and who chose to adapt rather than rail at the world for its injustice. He was obviously incredibly proud of his son, and obviously thrilled to become a grandfather.

I felt far more at ease when we finally left his home, and I spent the rest of the day napping and reading my pregnancy books. I can’t believe how tired I’ve been, or how hungry. I expected the changes, I just didn’t think they’d happen so fast. Of course after so much rest, I couldn’t sleep when night finally fell. It took me ages to finally drift off, and when I finally found rest – nightmares awaited me.

I found myself trapped in the horrors of my past: reliving the orphanage and the foster homes, all full of cruel adults and abusive parents. In my dreams I’m always running away from someone, trying to protect Cora and my other surrogate siblings. The dreams have gotten worse since I got pregnant, no doubt driven by my raging hormones.

Tonight takes me back to one of the worst days of my life. The sounds of my own screams and pleading tears fill my head, as dreadful images fill my vision. The next thing I know someone is shouting my name, and my eyes snap open.

“Ella!” Sinclair is sitting beside me on my bed, his powerful hands gripping my shoulders as he tries to bring me back to reality. It takes me a minute to realize it’s him, rather than the man who’d been attacking me in my dreams. I jerk out of his hold and scramble to the other side of the mattress, curling up into a little ball and gasping for air.

“Easy sweetheart, it’s only me.” Sinclair assures me, making a soft purring sound that magically unwinds my taut muscles. How does he do that?

There are tears streaming down my face, and again I feel a stab of shame for showing this weakness in front of him. “I’m okay.” I stammer once I come back to myself. “I’m okay.”

Sinclair shushes me softly, and though I thought I was out of his reach, I clearly underestimated the length of his strong arms. He plucks me from the corner and pulls me into his lap. "You don't have to be okay, Ella." He remarks gently, cuddling me close. "You're safe."

Those words are like a balm on my soul, but I know where they lead. If I let him comfort me, he's going to want to know what happened. And I don't want to talk about my dreams, I don't want him to feel like I'm some fragile creature he has to soothe. I scramble for something to pull his attention away from me, landing on a question that has been burning in my mind since this afternoon. "Why didn't you tell me about Cora's job?"

Sinclair seems taken aback. "What? Were you dreaming about Cora?"

"No." I sniffle, "I just want to know."

"You want to distract me, more like." Sinclair guesses shrewdly. At first I think this means he won't answer, but then he says. "I didn't tell you because I didn't do it for you. I did it because it was right."

Why does my heart sink when he says it wasn't for me? Did I want it to be? Would it be better if he only took action to please me, rather than doing so for the sake of morality? No, of course not... so why does it sting so badly?

"Oh." I murmur, unable to conjure any more eloquent response.

"Does that disappoint you?" He asks, sounding curious, rather than judgemental.

"No, I just didn't expect it." I admit.

"Because I'm the big bad wolf?" Sinclair teases, petting me in long, tender caresses.

I nod, pressing my nose to his chest. "I keep waiting for you to huff and puff, and blow my house down." I joke through my tears.

Sinclair chuckles, and for one long moment he simply holds me, rocking me back and forth until my racing heartbeat slows. "I ought to make you tell me about your dreams." He muses, making my limbs stiffen up again. "But I won't." His lips graze my hair, and butterflies burst to life in my tummy. "That said, I think you should sleep with me from now on."

Chapter 23 – Ella’s First Interview

Ella

I must have misheard him. He can’t truly mean that he wants me to move into his rooms. Does he really think I’m that much of a baby, that I need constant watching?

“But it was only one dream.” I protest, my voice still shaky, “I swear it’s not a big deal.”

Sinclair purrs again, and I feel my insides melting against my will. “Maybe it is, maybe it isn’t. I just want you to sleep easily.” Before I can stop him, he’s lifting me into my arms.

“Sinclair—” He interrupts me with a growl, and I quickly amend myself, “Dominic this really isn’t necessary. I can sleep on my own.”

“I’m sure you can.” He concedes. “But I want you close.”

“And what about what I want?” The words slip out before I can stop them, and Sinclair pauses, looking down at me with an appraising look.

“And what do you want, Ella?” He asks huskily, his deep voice reverberating down my spine.

“I—” I open my mouth to tell him I want to be alone, in my own space and without his intimidating presence. However somehow I can’t make the words come. Why is it that I can’t seem to stop myself from speaking when I don’t want to, then can’t make myself talk when I do? What is this man doing to me?

Sinclair smirks. “You know the problem, don’t you?” He taunts, and I can only shake my head in reply. “You can’t lie to me. The pup is making you more and more like a wolf, and wolves can’t lie to their Alpha’s, not directly at least.”

The breath seems to evaporate from my lungs, I can’t lie to him? My eyes go wide as I realize the implications of this, and I want to protest that such a thing isn’t fair, people are entitled to their secrets! “But you’re not my Alpha.” I finally protest, my voice sounding very small indeed.

Sinclair cocks a brow. “Aren’t I?” After a beat he continues towards the door, as if this settles the matter. I don’t know why I don’t object further – maybe because he’s clearly made up his mind, maybe because I don’t really want him to change it. I let him carry me out into the hall, flushing scarlet when I see so many guards waiting outside my room. Had all these men heard me screaming like a baby? Surely I hadn’t spoken or said anything while unconscious?

“Do you always have this many guards posted at night?” I squeak.

“This pup is the most important thing to me in the world.” Sinclair responds simply. “You can expect lots of guards to be around from now on.”

Of course. I think, It's all for the pup. I'm just an afterthought. Will I ever be anything more?

I don't need to ask Sinclair to know the answer – it's already painfully obvious: No. In a world of mystically powerful beings like wolves, a human like me could never be anything but an afterthought. The only reason he's putting up with me at all is the pregnancy. And honestly, the only reason I'm putting up with him is our arrangement... so why does it hurt so much?

The next morning I wake up to find a maid setting down a room service tray by my bedside, stacked high with my favorite foods. At first the smell of fruit and oatmeal has my stomach growling, but before I can so much as raise a spoon to my lips, a wave of nausea overtakes me. I rush to the bathroom and retch, groaning pitifully.

When I finally finish with the joys of pregnancy, I return to Sinclair's sprawling, king sized bed. The food which looked so appetizing a moment ago just makes my stomach churn now, but I notice a folded note on the tray. My name is scrawled across the front in the swooping handwriting I now recognize as Sinclair's.

Ella,

I've arranged an interview for you this morning, with the leading news outlets in the area. We've been getting a lot of requests and the reporter promised you would only have to answer questions of which I approved. Call me if you have any questions. I'll see you tonight.

Yours,

Dominic

An interview?! I've never given an interview in my life! And this won't even be an interview as myself, this will be an interview under cover, pretending to be a completely different person, a completely different species! What kind of questions are they going to ask, what on earth am I going to say to them? What am I going to wear?

Two hours later, I'm seated in front of an intimidating man in a sharp looking suit, feeling very small and out of place. A camera is poised on my face, and I'm trying to look serene – rather than panicked. I found a pretty sweater dress in the wardrobe Sinclair procured for me, and decided that simple elegance was the best foot forward. Now I wonder if I miscalculated, the reporter is watching me with sharp eyes, and I can already feel myself blushing.

“So Ella, it will come as no surprise to you that many shifters in the Moon Valley Pack and beyond are very curious about you.” He begins obliquely. “With you by his side, the Alpha is poised to become our next King, yet no one knows anything about you.”

“I can understand how that might worry some pack members.” I smile gently, trying to appear confident and self-assured.

“How did you and Dominic meet?” He presses. “When did it happen, I’d love to hear the whole story?”

Sinclair and I had discussed this at length, even before this interview arose. “Well it will be obvious to all those in the know that we aren’t fated, but I can’t help thinking that the Goddess didn’t play a hand in our meeting. For years my family in the Shadow Pack insisted we had no other relations – apparently my parents cut ties with the Moon Valley before I was even born. It wasn’t until they passed away that I learned about my cousins here – including Aileen Corentin.”

We’d decided the story should be as close to the truth as possible, so my fake identity is an orphan just like I am in reality. “I came to visit her after making contact, and of course she’s the wife of Beta Hugo. One day I was having lunch with Aileen and Hugo and Dominic walked in... and the rest is history.”

“But you haven’t known each other very long, is that correct?” The reporter inquires.

“Yes,” I confirm. “But when it’s true love, it doesn’t take long for the heart to recognize its mate. And then we were blessed with a pup without even trying.”

“Some pack members might be worried that you come from such a humble background, you have no experience leading.” The reporter states bluntly. “How would you respond to their fears?”

This was a question Sinclair hadn’t prepared me for in our earlier discussions regarding our cover. We decided on what we would tell people about how we met, nothing more. “I would say that great leaders come from all kinds of backgrounds, and in fact my humble origins give me insight into the needs of everyday shifters in a way that an aristocratic upbringing would not. I’m in touch with what regular people want and need, and I can speak for them with empathy and understanding, representing their voices in a forum where they often left out.”

The reporter arches his brows, and I know I’ve impressed him. Take that! I think triumphantly. People always assume I don't have a brain in my head because I'm young and attractive, not to mention I chose to work caring for children. But I'm no fool, and hopefully this will help the shifters see that.

"And what do you think our society needs most at this time in history, what is the biggest issue the future King and Queen need to address?" He asks.

I navigate his questions with more or less difficulty for the next half hour, feeling better about some responses than others, and praying that I haven't put my foot in my mouth. I think I've done well, but I'm completely exhausted. At first part of me was excited to pretend to be someone other than myself – almost like playing dress up or make believe. However that initial interest disappeared very quickly, when I realized just how stressful it is to constantly be acting.

I know what it's like to put up walls around myself, but this is the first time I've ever been forced to blatantly lie to those around me, to try to pass myself off as someone else. All at once, the gravity of this deal I've struck slams into me. If I'm exhausted now, how am I going to feel when I've been doing this for months? Years? Can I really do this for the rest of my life? What will happen if the truth comes out? What will people do when they learn I'm a fraud?

Because, I realize, that's what I am. This isn't just a game or a play we're performing, I'm actively deceiving people. I'm campaigning to take up a public office, and lying every step of the way. Guilt and worry assails me in a tidal wave, this is wrong! I think frantically. I have to talk to Sinclair.

Chapter 24 – Cold Feet

Sinclair

I'm sitting in my office, speaking with my cabinet, when Ella's delicious scent fills my nose. I've been thinking about her on and off all morning, wondering how she took the news of the interview, and hating that I hadn't been able to tell her about it in person. Normally I wouldn't do such a thing, but I'd needed to check in with my guards about their investigation into the intruder, and she'd been sleeping so sweetly that I couldn't bear to wake her.

I can sense how close she is now, and wonder if something went wrong. I'm already on my feet when I hear my assistant encouraging her to stay, "No, he'll want to see you, just wait one moment."

"I'm sorry, it's really not urgent," Ella is protesting. "I should have known he'd be busy."

She's retreating, her delicate footsteps receding, and I push through the door before she can get away. "And just where do you think you're going?"

Ella freezes in place, her little body winding tight as a spring. When she turns, she's staring at the floor, "I'm sorry." She says again, "I didn't mean to interrupt."

I glance at the wolves over my shoulder, "Leave us."

Ella gnaws on her plump lower lip as my cabinet members file past her out of the office, shifting restlessly on her feet. I can tell something is bothering her, but I also can't help but think how lovely she looks in the cream-colored dress hugging her curves. "Come here, little one." I command, not moving from the doorway.

This gets her attention, and indignation flashes in her golden eyes as her gaze snaps to mine. I can tell she wants to disobey, but I arch my brow in challenge and she slowly crosses the distance between us. I drag my knuckles over the high plane of her cheekbone when she's finally in front of me, enjoying the way her defiance becomes muddled with uncertainty once more. "How did the interview go?"

"Good – I think." She qualifies, unconsciously leaning her cheek into my hand. My wolf perks up at her obvious response to my touch, and I beckon her inside.

"Can I get you anything, have you eaten lunch?" I question, thinking of the pup.

"My stomach has been too unsettled." Ella admits, looking guilty.

I press my hand to her flat belly, feeling the pup's heartbeat and prodding the mental link. The babe seems perfectly content, but it worries me that Ella hasn't eaten. "We can order in some lunch.” I suggest, resisting the urge to continue touching her.

“Sin–Dominic, I need to talk to you.” She answers, ignoring the offer and just barely remembering to call me by my given name.

“Sure, what’s going on?” I inquire, taking a seat behind my desk.

Ella’s hands are fidgeting, and she’s staring at the anxious movement rather than meeting my gaze. “I think... I think I’m having second thoughts.”

This gets my attention loud and clear. “How so?”

“What we’re doing... it’s wrong.” Ella chokes out, positively trembling. “It’s fraud. I... I don’t know if I can take the pressure.” Her cheeks are flushing with color and she sounds as though she might cry. “I know I said I could do it, but I’m not sure I can pretend to be someone I’m not for the rest of my life... but I don’t want to lose the baby.” Now she really is crying, and I’m on my feet in an instant. Ella turns her back on me, shoulders shaking, as if she doesn’t want me to see how upset she is. “I don’t want to fail you, I can’t lose the baby. I just don’t know what to do.”

I approach behind her, my heart aching for the poor little human. I should have foreseen this problem. Ella is honest and good-hearted, of course a life of deceit would bother her. I suppose when we made the agreement I didn’t realize how much integrity she has, but I know now. Ella flinches when I take her shoulders in my hands, and I have to forcibly turn her body to face me again. “Come here,” I say again, but this time it’s not an order. It’s an invitation, one I have to force Ella to accept by pulling her into my arms.

As soon as I envelop her in my embrace, she cracks, emitting a heartbroken sob and wrapping her slender arms around my middle. She must be clinging to me with all her might, but it feels about as powerful as a child’s grip compared to my shifter strength. “I’m sorry.” I profess, kissing her hair. “I should have realized how much this scheme was asking of you.”

“I can still do it!” She insists defiantly, clearly beside herself with the competing needs to prove herself, keep her baby, and do the right thing.

Doubts swirl in my own mind. Can this really work? What will we do after the baby comes, and she no longer has its smell? What happens if someone connects her to Ella Reina, orphaned human and disgraced nanny? Am I really willing to put her through all this? She doesn’t even know about the true dangers she faces, and already the stress is becoming too much. Is asking her to pose as my Luna hurting the pup? What will it think when it gets old enough to understand our relationship is a sham? What would happen if the pack found out the truth?

Even as all the potential calamities fill my head, my wolf surges to the forefront, insisting that we have to find a way to make it work. Ella has already proven to be my biggest asset in this campaign – not only is she giving me an heir, but she charms everyone she meets. I need her if I'm going to win. More importantly, my wolf won't abide the thought of letting her go. I try to tell him dissolving our agreement doesn't mean letting her go, but he's absolutely determined.

"Come on, let's talk about this." I suggest. Moving to the couch. "What worries you the most about our plan?"

"I don't want to hurt anyone." Ella whispers, tears clinging to her dark lashes. "I don't want to trick honest, hardworking shifters. I don't want my life to be a lie."

"How long have you been feeling this way?" I press.

"I guess a little bit from the beginning." She confesses, "but it really hit me today during the interview. I just thought about doing this for the rest of my life and it just felt so overwhelming."

I nod, pulling her between my legs and petting her sides. "The first, and most important thing I need you to understand is that shifter society doesn't work like human society does. We are a ruthless species, and we do whatever is necessary to ensure the safety of our packs." I explain. "I know it feels like a giant fraud, but you have to remember that my campaign is the only thing standing between a lot of innocent people and a tyrant. If the Prince takes the throne, he will wipe out the Alpha council and all his political competition in order to stay in power forever. He will oppress and terrorize millions of people."

"If he's that bad, why hasn't he already staged a coup?" Ella inquires, a few notable degrees calmer as my words sink in.

"Because he doesn't have the power yet." I clarify, "He doesn't have an army – yet. His father is bad, but he's old fashioned enough to respect our political system. The Prince on the other hand..." I trail off.

"So basically you're saying that lying is the lesser evil." Ella summarizes.

"Honesty is an incredibly admirable trait." I relate gently, "but it's also a luxury that shifters can't afford right now. I know it feels wrong, but when your enemies are as abominable as the Prince, you have to bend the rules to survive."

"Like wartime spies?" Ella suggests morosely.

"A little." I crack a smile.

She nods, thinking so deeply that her brow furrows, and I have to resist the urge to smooth out the adorable wrinkles with my fingers. "I want a safe life for my baby. If the Prince wins the election... would he...?" She trails off, unable to utter the horrible words.

"It's highly likely" I confirm, I have no doubt the prince would try to kill my heir – he probably has already.

Ella frowns, "Then I'll do whatever it takes to help you win." She seems much more relaxed now, but I can still sense her lingering nerves.

"Would you feel better if you could spend more time with shifters, get to know our ways better?" I ask, suspecting that at least some of her unease is due to the fact that she's afraid she'll fail.

Ella nods, and I give her a squeeze. "Okay, then you and I are going to start going out more, so you can get to know my world and my people."

"I think that would help." Ella admits. "I'm sorry I lost it that way, I don't know if it's the hormones or the stress, or what! I just started spiraling and I couldn't stop."

"Hey," I interrupt, "It's okay. I want you to tell me when you lose it, I want you to talk to me when you have worries or doubts, okay?"

"Okay." She nods, giving me a shy smile.

"Now let's get some food into you, and tonight – we'll go out."

I don't say what I'm thinking, what my wolf so desperately wants to add to that sentence. I know it's too soon, and Ella is still too skittish of me. Still, it feels too exciting to deny. Tonight we're going out together – On our first real date.

Chapter 25 – First Date

Ella

It's not a date, it's not a date, it's not a date. I've been repeating the same thought over and over again. I know Sinclair is only taking me out tonight because I fell to complete pieces this afternoon. I'm still kicking myself, totally ashamed of my weakness and determined to prove myself to him after all. I spent the better part of an hour picking out my dress for tonight, eventually deciding on a little black dress that shows off my figure and makes me feel strong and sexy, nothing like my usual self.

I wrap a heavy winter coat around my body after Sinclair's makeup artists and hairdressers finish making me up, sliding on a pair of strappy stilettos and taking a few deep breaths before heading downstairs. Sinclair is waiting for me at the bottom of the stairs, his emerald gaze raking up my bare legs and lingering on my coat, as if he's tempted to unwrap it and get a preview of what's underneath. It's amazing how overheated he can make me feel from a single glance – he's already seen me naked, and it's not as if there's any true feeling behind it anyway.

"Ready?" He asks, his deep voice making my heart stop for just a few beats.

I nod shyly, and let him guide me out the door with a hand on the small of my back. However as soon as I take a step outside, I find myself backing into Sinclair's protective shelter. A sea of reporters is gathered just outside the estate's gates, cameras flashing and voices raised in shouts for our attention. It's precisely like the scene which had awaited us outside the King's palace, only this is a random Tuesday evening – at the place I'm gradually beginning to think of as home.

"Dominic?" I squeak.

"It's okay," His lips brush my ear as he tucks me under his arm, "your interview aired this evening, that's all. Early feedback would indicate you're a hit."

"You mean, they're here because of me?" I whisper, praying I can walk gracefully in my heels, and that Sinclair will catch me if I start to fall flat on my face.

"That's right." He grins, waving at the reporters. "If you feel nervous just take a deep breath, and remember it will all be over in a few seconds."

I do as he advises, and sure enough the next thing I know, I'm safely ensconced in the back seat of his limousine. "Do you ever get used to it?" I ask shakily.

"No." Sinclair admits, "but it gets easier."

"So are you going to tell me where we're headed, or is it another surprise?" I guess, trying not to sound too petulant.

“This time I’ll tell you.” Sinclair conceded, in a tone that sounded as though this was a grave sacrifice. “I think you’ve had a hard enough day already.”

“Thank you.” I note primly, gazing at him expectantly.

The corner of his mouth tilts upwards, “It’s just so tempting.”

“Dominic!” I exclaim in exasperation.

He laughs. “Okay, okay. We’re going to a little French restaurant I know, and afterwards we’ll go dancing at a popular shifter club.”

I find myself practically bursting with curiosity. “Is shifter food very different from human food? Do shifters have their own dance styles?”

Sinclair smiles, and I suddenly wish I’d chosen to sit beside him, rather than across the car. “We eat more red meat than humans – rarer steaks too – but otherwise it’s not so different.” A low rumble, somewhere between a purr and a growl sounds in his chest. “And our dancing can be a bit more.... Sensual, but don’t worry, I’m looking forward to teaching you.”

Oh god. His intense focus and scintillating tone has my body heating up like a bonfire, and I have to squeeze my thighs together to relieve the sudden ache at their center. It’s not a real date, it’s not a real date, it’s not a real date.

To my dismay, the reporters have followed us to the restaurant, and they’re waiting when Sinclair helps me from the car. Their cameras are still flashing when the hostess helps me out of my coat, capturing images through the glass of my slinky black dress and Sinclair’s ravenous expression when he takes in the sight. It speaks volumes that despite their blatant observation, all I could focus on in that moment was Sinclair, and his glowing green eyes.

Before I know it he’s pulled me into his arms and is claiming my mouth in an earth-shattering kiss. I’m sure it’s only for the benefit of the cameras, but I melt against him immediately, letting him ravish me for all to see. My heart is hammering so powerfully when he finally releases me that I almost don’t hear him tell me how incredible I look. I’m in a complete daze as he guides me to the back of the restaurant, trying to recall if I’ve ever felt so overpowered by lust. I’m a grown woman who’s had a healthy sex-life, but I can’t ever recall feeling as though I’ll die if someone doesn’t make love to me in the next five minutes. But that’s exactly how I feel now.

“Ella?” Sinclair’s voice drags me back into the present, and I realize more time has passed than I realize. We're seated at the table, and a waitress is standing beside him, watching me with an expectant smile. "Something to drink?"

"Just water." I manage huskily, trying to pull myself together.

"You still with me?" Sinclair teases a moment later.

I'm beginning to wonder if werewolf pheromones are extra powerful on humans, the more time I spend with this man, the more I feel like I'm being drugged by desire.

"Mhmm," I murmur, my voice much higher than I intended. "Do you have any recommendations?"

I was talking about the menu, but Sinclair's sultry reply comes back, "I always recommend sitting side by side, rather than across from one another."

"I don't know." I answer coyly, "It's awfully warm in here, I wouldn't want to overheat."

"You do look a bit flushed." Sinclair observes, "should I have them turn up the air conditioning?"

"Then I'll be cold." I argue.

Sinclair arches a brow, "then you'd better come over here so I can keep you warm." It wasn't a request. I rise from my chair and circle the table, sliding into the booth next to Sinclair even as he signals the waitress to lower the temperature in the room. He slides an arm around me and purrs with contentment. "There, much better."

Maybe for him, I'm squirming in my seat, painfully aware of the wetness pooling between my legs. In hindsight I can't even begin to follow the circular logic that brought us here – but I'm not complaining. I feel safe being so close to Sinclair, and the butterflies in my belly are fluttering out of control. It's not a date, it's not a date, it's not a date.

Of course it only gets worse as the night progresses. Our intimate dinner turns into him hand feeding me dessert, then leading me around a darkened dance floor with our bodies pressed flush together, whirling through unfamiliar, infinitely seductive steps. I haven't had a drop of alcohol given my condition, but I feel completely drunk on Sinclair. The evening flashes before my eyes, and I spiral into my desire: my world reduces to the feeling of his body moving against mine, his hands gliding over my waist and hips.

It's a good thing Sinclair is so intimidating or I might have tried to make a move, and I'm not sure I could survive getting involved with this powerful wolf. My body might want him, but when my senses return I'll remember how completely mismatched we are. We could never be together, and indulging my physical desires can only lead to disaster.

I'm slowly beginning to suspect that Sinclair isn't completely immune to me, but I know it could never be more than physical attraction on his part, and I'm not the sort of woman who can handle casual sex. I know I'll catch feelings sooner or later, and then I'll get my heart broken. Sinclair could never want me as more than an amusing distraction or plaything and more importantly, I'm carrying his child. I have to be able to get along with him for the rest of my life, and I know I'm not what he wants.

I fall asleep tossing and turning, until Sinclair loses his patience and pulls my body to his, spooning me and purring until I drift off. We went to bed late, but I wake up when it's still dark out, a sense of dread flooding my form.

Something is wrong.

There's wetness between my legs, but not the slick desire that tormented me earlier. I reach down and when I withdraw my fingers again, they're stained with sticky, red, blood.

Trying not to panic, I shake Sinclair awake. He groans and opens his eyes to slits, mumbling blearily.

"Sinclair, something's wrong!" I murmur frantically. "I'm bleeding. I think... I think I might be having a miscarriage."

Chapter 26 – At the Hospital

Ella

Sinclair is instantly alert. He sits up in bed and pulls the covers back, staring at the red stain on my nightgown with an unreadable expression. He presses his palm to my belly, undoubtedly trying to communicate with the pup through their mental link. I'm trembling while I wait for him to give his verdict, terrified that the new life inside me might already be coming to a heartbreaking end.

"I think he's okay." Sinclair murmurs after a moment, looking up at me with a furrowed brow. "But we should get you to the hospital right away."

I slide out of bed on autopilot, my mind spinning with all the terrible possibilities. What if my ovaries were too damaged by Mike's sabotage to support a healthy baby? What if my uterus isn't strong enough to carry the child to term? Was the doctor right at our last appointment, was something wrong from the start? Is that why it was so small?

I can only wrap my arms around myself to try and cease shaking as the blood rushes in my ears. Please don't take this baby from me. I silently beg the universe, it's all I have, I won't survive losing it.

Sinclair dresses quickly, but I'm only vaguely aware of him moving around in my periphery. I'm standing there frozen, too afraid to move in case I somehow make the bleeding worse. Without asking, Sinclair comes over and sweeps me up into his arms. He only pauses to wrap me in a coat before heading out into the snow, then bundles me into the car and takes off into the night.

We arrive at the emergency room in minutes and Sinclair doesn't even bother parking. Instead he skids to a stop in front of the main entrance, once again scooping me up and charging inside. I've been to the hospital before, and it's always been a long, drawn out process of triages and waiting to be seen for hours on end.

Not this time.

The moment the staff sees Sinclair they leap into motion, eager to do his bidding. I've never been more grateful for his wealth and influence than I am in this moment. Nurses and orderlies gather around us, leading us straight into the treatment area. The nurses bring forward a wheelchair, but Sinclair holds onto me tightly. "She's three weeks pregnant and bleeding."

Seeming to realize he's not going to release me, the nurses take the wheelchair away and direct us into a consultation room,

"Okay honey, just hold on." They advise, "we'll get someone over to take a look at you right away.”

No sooner has Sinclair set me down onto a reclining gurney that an orderly comes in with a scratchy hospital gown and an ultrasound machine, shortly followed by a doctor in a white coat. The man nods to Sinclair, “Alpha.” Suddenly I realize the special treatment we’re receiving isn’t only because of Sinclair’s wealth. This must be a shifter hospital, which makes a lot of sense in hindsight. He wouldn’t take a werewolf child to a human facility.

Sinclair greets the man stiffly, still hovering protectively over me. I haven’t had time to change into the gown or even get comfortable on the gurney, and I find myself leaning towards Sinclairs solid strength, finding relief in his presence amidst all the hubbub and uncertainty.

“Is it alright if I examine her?” The doctor asks, nodding towards me.

This strikes me as a very odd question – first because it was directed at Sinclair and not me, and second because an exam is the entire reason we’re here. Of course it’s alright! However a low rumble sounds in Sinclair’s chest, and when I look up at him I realize how menacing his outward energy has become. He’s glaring at anyone who comes near me, and strategically placing his body between me and everyone else. He wouldn’t appreciate the comparison, but his behavior sort of reminds me of a dog guarding a bone.

I hiccup a hysterical laugh as the image forms in my mind – the big bad Alpha getting possessive about his new human pet- but when the doctor and Sinclair look down at me with concern I quickly sober. “Sorry, my nerves are fraying a bit.” I explain, prompting Sinclair to wrap one of his muscular arms around me.

Turning towards the doctor, I add. “I don’t know how long I’ve been bleeding, I just woke up and felt it.”

The doctor looks back to Sinclair, waiting until he gives his permission before approaching me. “Have you had any other symptoms?”

I shake my head, “nothing out of the ordinary. A bit of morning sickness, mood swings, cravings – everything you’d expect.”

“That’s good.” The doctor confirmed, offering me a smile before looking to Sinclair. “And the mental link?”

“Strong heartbeat and consistent emotional blips,” My stomach is quickly becoming Sinclair’s favorite spot to rest his hand, and it returns there now. “It’s sleeping – I think.”

The doctor nods, "Alright, then what I'd like to do is run some tests and make sure everything is alright with mother and pup.

Spotting isn't unusual in the early stages, though there's a bit more blood than I'd like. Ella, why don't you get changed and then a nurse will be in to run your vitals – then we'll take some blood and do an ultrasound."

He steps out, and before I can even think about changing, I find Sinclair pulling my nightgown off over my head. "Oh! Dominic, I can do that myself."

"Just let me take care of you, Ella." He responds sternly, leaving no room for argument as he fits the loose gown around my body. In the end, I think fussing over me is his way of finding some control in a helpless situation, so I comply without further complaint, telling myself it's all for his benefit rather than my own. I don't let myself think about how nice it feels to have someone helping me – not to have to go it all alone for once.

"Lie back now," Sinclair encourages once the ties are secure, helping me recline on the gurney. He leans his elbow on the mattress near my head, looking down at me intently. "How are you doing?"

His scrutiny feels too intense, and I can't bring myself to look him in the eye. I shrug, "I'll decide how I feel when we know what's going on."

Before he can respond the nurse returns and begins taking all my vital signs. Everything seems perfectly normal until she takes my blood pressure. She purses her lips at the numbers on the screen, and I feel my pulse race even faster when I follow her gaze. One forty over one hundred! I think frantically. My blood pressure has never been so high in my entire life.

"Is that reading normal for you?" The nurse asks with false nonchalance.

"No, my blood pressure is usually below average." I squeak, causing Sinclair to shift closer still.

He returns his hand to my belly, circling his fingers in soothing caresses over my skin. "You've had a scare." He reasons, looking to the nurse for reassurance, "I'm sure that's all this is."

She doesn't respond to his statement, instead eyeing me with concern. "You need to try to calm down, Ella. Take some deep breaths and let your mate worry about the pup."

"Let my mate worry about the pup?" I repeat indignantly, sitting up. "I'm its mother, I can't just turn off my love for it."

“She wasn’t suggesting that, sweetheart.” Sinclair croons, gathering me to his chest and purring in that infuriating way that never ceases to make me unravel. Against my will I find myself leaning into his protective hold, falling victim to that strange power once again.

“That’s it.” The nurse encourages with a smile, “everything else looks good, we’ll check your pressure again in a bit, and I’ll inform the doctor of the situation.”

I’m sulkily snuggling closer to Sinclair as she retreats and glaring daggers at her back. “How do you do that?” I inquire sullenly, breathing in the Alpha’s familiar scent.

“Do what?” He asks, stroking my hair.

“That purring thing!” I clarify, resenting him for making me feel better when my baby might be in danger, then feeling guilty for resenting him. My moods are so variable these days I can barely keep up with them. I’ve always heard how wild one’s emotions can become when pregnant, but I didn’t realize it would happen this fast.

Sinclair chuckles warmly, and an unwelcome shiver runs down my spine. “It’s something all male wolves can do – it’s how we soothe our mates when they’re upset.”

“Oh.” I blink. “How did you know it would work on a human?”

“I didn’t.” He shares, “I didn’t even mean to do it the first time – it was simply instinct, but you responded so beautifully.”

“Hmph.” I murmur, not sure if I like the idea of him having that kind of power over me. “Do female wolves have some way of soothing their mates?”

Sinclair laughs again, a deep sultry sound.. “Lots of ways.”

“Like what?” I press.

“That’s a conversation for another day.” Sinclair remarks slyly, piquing my curiosity.

I want to object, to ask more, but the doctor reappears before I can respond. He does my ultrasound with quick professionalism, and I’m relieved to hear the baby’s steady heartbeat through the machine. Still, I won’t be able to truly relax until I know everything is okay. When he finally concludes the exam, I’m practically breathless for news.

“Well?” I ask anxiously. “Is the baby okay?”

Chapter 27 – Mike Meets Sinclair

3rd Person

The doctor smiled at Ella and Sinclair, pleased to be able to deliver good news for once. “Your baby is just fine.” He shared, watching the tension seep out of the expectant parents in front of him. “As I said, some spotting is perfectly normal in the early stages, and everything else looks perfect.”

Sinclair squeezed Ella to his chest, kissing her hair while she tried not to burst into tears of joy. The doctor let them have a moment to celebrate before continuing, “I am worried about Ella’s blood pressure, however. It was probably just the stress of the emergency, but it’s something we have to be very careful of. If hypertension persists, it could develop into a condition called preeclampsia, which can be very dangerous for both mother and pup.”

Ella was still reveling in their good news, but Sinclair was immediately alert at the mention of a potential danger. “So what do we do? Just keep an eye on it?”

“I’m going to send you home with a portable test kit so you can check her blood pressure at home, you should do it every day until it stabilizes and then every week until delivery. Of course if it remains high you need to see your regular OBGYN right away.

And more than anything else, you need to avoid stress, Ella.” The physician advised.

Ella nodded in agreement, though in truth she wasn’t sure this goal was entirely achievable. She was about to be a first time mother, all the while grappling with a false identity, supernatural society, and political campaign. Stress seemed like an inevitability.

“Thank you doctor,” Sinclair professed, “we’ll do everything we can to keep her relaxed.” Ella wasn’t sure she liked the sound of that – if Sinclair tried to keep her on bed rest or anything of the sort, it wasn’t going to go over well. She was so lost in her thoughts, she didn’t realize Sinclair was watching her and all but reading her mind. “Won’t we, little mate?” He added pointedly.

This jolted Ella back to the present, and she looked up at Sinclair with wide eyes, thinking – not for the first time – that she needed to do a better job paying attention to the powerful Alpha if she wanted to get through this pregnancy with her wits intact.

“Yes, Dominic.”

That afternoon Sinclair struggled to focus on his work. All he could think about was Ella and the baby, and he was sorely tempted to take the rest of the day off to look after them. He'd already blown off all his morning meetings for that very purpose, and though Ella had encouraged him to go about his business as usual, his mind was on anything but business.

He was just about to collect his things and tell Hugo he was calling it a day, when a knock sounded on his door. "Come in."

The investigator he'd hired to look into Ella and subsequently track down her lowlife ex-lover poked his head inside. "Alpha, he's here."

That got Sinclair's attention. Maybe he would be able to get something worthwhile done today after all. "Bring him in." He instructed coolly.

When Mike stumbled in the austere office a few minutes later – practically thrown inside by Sinclair's guards – he looked around in nervous confusion. Sinclair studied the human closely, trying to convince his wolf that attacking the wretched man wasn't a very honorable thing to do – considering his advantages in speed, strength and power. Still, it was tempting. He didn't know what Ella had ever seen in the man, and he suspected that Mike's mental manipulation and gaslighting had gone a long way towards forcing her to settle for someone so inferior.

For all her spirit and intelligence, Sinclair knew that Ella had suffered a love-starved upbringing. It wasn't hard to imagine that she could fall head over heels for the first person to show her any attention, even letting them convince her she didn't deserve any better than their mistreatment and disdain. He thought of Mike telling her she was a bad kisser, wondering how far the creep's insults had gone – did she also think she was bad in bed, bad at keeping a house or doing everyday things? How worthless had this human made her feel for his own gain?

It infuriated Sinclair to imagine anyone mistreating sweet Ella this way, and he was all the more impressed that she had been able to come out of the ordeal with so much strength of will. He growled before he could stop himself, and Mike froze in his tracks, staring at Sinclair in surprise and obvious fear. "What is this? Why did you bring me here?"

"This, is your just desserts." Sinclair answered coldly, rising from his chair. "Do you know who I am, Mike?"

"You're that billionaire that's always on TV." Mike countered, barely containing a jealous sneer.

"That's right." Sinclair smirked. "I'm also Ella's new fiance." He lied, going with a similar story to the one they were telling the shifters. "We're expecting a child together, despite your efforts to make her infertile."

All the blood drained from Mike's face. He stood frozen for a long moment before shaking his head in disbelief. "You're lying. We only just broke up and she would never have cheated on me, the stupid bitch was too spineless to -"

Sinclair's wolf snarled out a warning so fierce that Mike all but wet himself, suddenly realizing on an instinctive level that the being in front of him was no normal human – but a dangerous predator. "If you have any sense at all you'll shut your fucking mouth before you say another word against her." Sinclair thundered.

Mike backed away towards the door, trembling like a leaf. "I... wh- what are you?"

"Not anyone you want to cross." Sinclair informed him, prowling forward, stalking his vile prey as if he were nothing more than a deer in the woods.

"This is crazy!" Mike objected. "I haven't done anything wrong."

"Do not lie to me!" Sinclair barked, "I know everything, you leech. You took advantage of that angel, knowing exactly how vulnerable she was. You ruined Ella's life – wrecked her finances, poisoned her body, betrayed her commitment and made her think she didn't deserve any better!" Sinclair reached out and closed his powerful hand around the scrawny human's neck, forcing his back up against the door. "You are not a man, you are spineless, despicable little weasel, and if you want to keep your head on your shoulders you are going to make things right!"

"What?!" Mike choked, clawing at Sinclair's tight grip, "how?"

"You're going to go to the police, and sign a full confession. Ella already filed a police report, and you're going to turn yourself in and pay back every cent you stole from her." Sinclair commanded, "I don't care if you have to work for a hundred years, you're going to make it right."

"But I don't have that kind of money!" Mike objected frantically, becoming near hysterical as Sinclair lifted his feet off the ground.

In the back of his mind Sinclair momentarily worried about making a habit of attacking men this way, but he couldn't deny that Mike and Roger both deserved it.

"Then you can rot in prison!" Sinclair answered ferociously. "It's that or I gut you right here."

"No!" Mike shouted frantically, "Please, don't hurt me! I'll do whatever you say!"

"Good." Sinclair rumbled. "Because if you don't I will make you wish you'd never been born.”

A little while later a shrill ringtone filled Ella’s suite at Sinclair’s estate. She picked up her phone, seeing the local police station’s number scrolling across the screen. “Hello?”

“Hello, Ms. Reina?” A male voice replied on the other end of the line.

“Speaking.” She confirmed.

“This is Moon Valley Police Department, we’re calling in reference to a report you filed last week?” The man referenced.

“Yes?” Ella questioned sitting up a little straighter. The officers hadn’t given her any hope that her case would ever be resolved, so she didn’t have the faintest idea why they were calling.

“Your ex-boyfriend turned himself in this afternoon.” The officer shared, “he doesn’t have the funds to pay the bills he accumulated in your name, but he signed a confession which should convince your creditors to remove the charges from your accounts, and he will be prosecuted to the furthest extent of the law.”

“I.. what? Really?” Ella couldn’t believe it. “How... Mike would never turn himself in, I don’t understand.”

“Well I can’t speak to his motives, but I can tell you he was dropped off by a pair of bodyguards employed by Dominic Sinclair, and he seemed very shaken. It sounds to me like you’ve got friends in high places, Ms. Reina.”

“Thank you.” She murmured, still trying to process this information. As she hung up she tried to comprehend this new development. Had Dominic really found Mike for her, forced him to do the right thing? She knew he’d promised to help resolve her financial situation, but making Mike stand trial seemed like a gesture far beyond their agreement.

What did it all mean?

Chapter 28 – Ella Pays A Visit

Ella

I hear Sinclair's footsteps coming up the stairs just past five, and I realize he must have left work at the earliest available opportunity. I'm not complaining, I've been so eager to ask him about Mike ever since the police called me, and as unbelievable as it seems I even find myself missing him the more time we spend apart. I think it must be the pup's craving to be near its father rather than my own interest, because more often than not I'm nervous or on-edge when we're together. The one exception is when I go to his rooms at bedtime; I haven't had a single nightmare since he insisted we begin sleeping together, and I look forward to falling asleep in his strong arms every night.

He comes into my rooms without knocking, offering me a wide smile when he sees me cuddled up in bed. The doctor gave me strict orders to rest today, and after the exhausting ordeal at the hospital, I actually didn't mind. "Hello trouble." Sinclair greets me fondly, taking a seat on the edge of my mattress. "How are you feeling?"

"I'm fine." I promise, "No more spotting." I blush, but I figure we have to get used to speaking on such familiar terms about my body. Pregnancy does nothing if not steal one's sense of modesty, as the most personal bodily functions must be discussed to assess the baby's health.

"I'm glad." Sinclair sighs with visible relief. "Have you checked your blood pressure?"

"No, I've been distracted." I admit.

"Tsk, tsk," He teases, retrieving the home monitoring device from my bedside. "Let's have your arm, gorgeous."

I wait while he settles the cuff around my bicep and presses the machine's start button. Once the cuff begins to inflate and pressure increases on my arm, I say, "I got a call from the police today."

Sinclair keeps a perfectly straight face, as if he doesn't have the first idea what I'm about to say. "Oh?"

"It seems that Mike turned himself in this afternoon." I share, watching him closely. "He came all the way back from the coast and signed a full confession. He's going to stand trial."

Sinclair is busy watching the numbers on the machine, but he manages a distracted smile, "that's wonderful, Ella."

I wait for him to say more, but he remains silent, avidly focused on taking my vital signs.

“You’re really going to pretend like you had nothing to do with it?” I finally burst.

The machine beeps, and Sinclair frowns, loosening the cuff. “Still too high.” He murmurs, looking back up at me. Sinclair scans my features, taking my cheek in his oversized hand. “Are you still feeling stressed?”

“I’m trying to talk to you about something.” I reply, rather than answering him.

“Ella it was nothing. I would have done it for anyone.” He states simply.

Of course. I think bitterly, better not go getting ahead of yourself, Ella. Don’t make the mistake of thinking you’re special when you’re anything but. “That might be true.” I murmur, “but it’s a very big deal to me. I don’t know how to thank you.”

“That’s not necessary.” Sinclair responds, as if this settles the matter. “I was happy to do it. That rat deserved a lot worse than a jail cell if you ask me.”

I don’t know why, but his ferocity makes me feel better about his dismissive manner. At the very least it shows that he does care, and I decide then and there that I’m going to find a way to thank him – whether he thinks it’s necessary or not.

The next day I spend the morning sick to my stomach, reminding myself over and over again that morning sickness is a good sign, and I shouldn’t complain. After my fourth bout of nausea, I take a few pillows and books into the bathroom, setting up a makeshift camp on the cold tiles so that I’m not constantly running back and forth. By the afternoon I feel well enough to go out and about, and I eagerly dress and depart, excited to follow through with my plans to thank Sinclair for his kindness.

At first I wasn’t sure about turning up at his father’s house unannounced, but when I arrive the elder Alpha greets me with so much hospitality and generosity I decide I should try and visit more often. “Come in, come in! What a lovely surprise!”

“Thank you.” I flush, “I hope you don’t mind me dropping by like this.”

“Of course not, my darling. You’re welcome anytime.” He replies genially. “I was just about to have a late lunch, please join me.”

“Oh no, I couldn’t impose.” I demur.

“Nonsense, I know the look of a breeding mother who’s spent the morning indisposed.” He observes wryly. “You’re still green about the gills, dear one. Some food in your tummy will help.”

“Thank you.” I smile despite myself. “I see you’re as perceptive as your son.”

“And I see you would prefer it if he did not perceive so much.” The old man answers.

“Is it that obvious?” I chuckle, taking a seat across from him in the sitting room as a servant runs to get another place setting for lunch.

“I don’t blame you.” He confides. “I expect if I were in your shoes I wouldn’t enjoy having someone read my every thought and feeling either.”

Unlike Sinclair, his father sets me completely at ease. So at ease in fact that I find the words sliding off my tongue before I can stop them. “I’m not used to men like you and your son, Alpha -“

“None of that Alpha nonsense.” He interjects. “call me Henry.”

I can’t help but laugh, “you and Dominic really are a pair, you know that?”

Henry smiles warmly, “a high complement. I’m very proud of my son, you know. And I’m so thrilled he’s finally found his second chance mate.”

A stab of guilt assails me. Of any of the people we’re deceiving, Sinclair’s father makes me feel the most ashamed for our lies.

“Thank you.” I manage to reply, unable to stop myself from confiding, “we’re both so excited for this baby I’m not sure if we’ve even discussed whether we truly are mates. I mean we’re saying it for the campaign of course, but I hardly think I’m what Dominic imagined for a mate.”

Henry shakes his head firmly. “Trust me, Ella. I know my son, and I know a good match when I see it. You two will get there in time.”

“Well, I have to say he has already done so much for me. I’ve been scrambling for some way to thank him, but I’m afraid I don’t know him well enough to know what he’d like best. I was hoping you might help me do a bit of plotting.” I confess.

“You’ve come to the right place.” Henry assures me, “what kind of surprise did you have in mind.”

“Just anything to show him how grateful I am.” I explain, “how excited I am to be having this baby together, for all his support.”

“Well one secret I will gladly tell you about my son is that he has a powerful sweet tooth.”

Henry intones. "He doesn't indulge it often, but the quickest way to his heart is probably through dessert."

I giggle, "Really?" It seems so strange that the terrifying Alpha wolf might have a secret vice as wholesome as sugar. "Any particular recipes?"

"His favorite cake as a boy was simply chocolate with vanilla icing – simple but classic. If you make him that, it will transport him straight back to his childhood." Henry explains.

"I like that idea. One of our first days together he called my sister to find out my favorite dish – I like the symmetry of returning the gesture." I muse aloud.

"And of course, if you end up with too much left over, I always appreciate a good sweet myself." Henry hints, "As well as charming company."

"You have a deal." I agree happily. "In fact, I was thinking I might visit you more often." I suggest, "If you don't mind having me around that is."

"I would love nothing more." Henry beams, "though you should probably clear it with Dominic first."

I grimace, not caring for this idea. "Do you think he'd object?"

"I think he's got a new mate and a baby on the way – nothing makes an Alpha more overprotective." Henry reasons.

"But surely he wouldn't think you're a threat." I protest.

"Not me personally, but there may very well be other dangers out there." Henry suggests, "in fact I'm surprised he let you come out without a guard today."

"Well, he doesn't know." I answer hesitantly.

"You didn't tell him you were leaving?" Henry clarifies.

"No, but I'm an adult." I argue, confused. "I shouldn't have to ask permission just to pay a visit to family."

"Ella, you're with an Alpha now." Henry reminds me gently. "Everything is different now. Does anyone know where you are right now?"

"No." Nervously gnawing on my lip, I wonder if I've made a bad miscalculation. "Do you think he's going to be angry?"

“If I were you, I’d try to get back before he realizes you left.” Henry suggests.

I don’t need to be told twice, I finish my lunch and kiss Henry’s scruffy cheek, before heading out again. On the way home I stop only to purchase the ingredients for Sinclair’s cake, hurrying back to the house in the hopes that no one has noticed I was missing. Of course it’s just my luck that Hugo catches me coming up the walk to the mansion, arms laden with grocery bags.

He doesn’t say a word, but I know the game is up.

I’m in big trouble.

Chapter 29 – Ella Bakes

Ella

I've been avidly watching the clock ever since returning home. Neither Hugo nor any of the guards said a word about my absence, but they did immediately take the grocery bags from my arms, insisting I shouldn't be doing any heavy lifting. I came straight to the kitchen afterwards, hoping that I might be able to finish my surprise before Sinclair comes home, and thereby counteract some of his displeasure that I snuck out.

In my defense it wasn't really sneaking. Sure, I waited until the guards were distracted just in case they tried to stop me leaving, but no one ever told me I wasn't allowed to do so. In fact Sinclair told me I was free to go where I wish... though in hindsight I imagine the Alpha wouldn't like it if he came home and no one knew where I was – especially after the hospital yesterday.

I try to focus on baking rather than the scolding I've surely got coming from Sinclair. I'm really not sure how to handle the situation. It feels entirely unfair that I could be in trouble for breaking rules I didn't know existed, but I'm afraid of angering Sinclair further by expressing my true feelings.

I'm starting to feel completely bipolar in this arrangement of ours. I'm perpetually afraid of saying or doing the wrong thing and provoking Sinclair's temper, but I'm not used to censoring myself this way. Eventually the truth inevitably slips out and then I worry I've ruined everything. So I try to reverse course and do damage control, and probably come off like I've got split personalities.

I don't know what to do. I know I should try to keep Sinclair happy so that I have the best possible chance to stay with my baby, but I don't know how long I can keep this up. I also don't know what to make of Sinclair in the first place. He's the most confusing man I've ever encountered. I don't even recognize myself around him. One moment he's turning me on, making me feel safer than I've ever felt in my entire life, and doing sweet selfless things like helping Cora – and the next he's stomping around like a tyrant and ordering me about.

I've just finished mixing the wet and dry ingredients together in a big silver bowl when the door clicks open behind me, and Sinclair's familiar scent fills the room. Uh-oh, here we go.

When I turn around, I find him framed in the doorway, his arms crossed over his broad chest, and a thunderous expression on his face.

"Welcome home?" I greet him weakly, that statement sounding more like a question than anything else.

Sinclair's emerald eyes begin to glow as he studies me, raking his gaze over my body from head to foot and making me positively squirm. "What do you have to say for yourself, Ella?"

"I'm making you a surprise," I explain, realizing telling him sort of defeats the point. "Or I was – to thank you for your help with Mike."

"You left the estate." He growls, striding forward. "You didn't tell anyone you were leaving or where you were going."

"I was perfectly safe." I supply feebly. "I went to see your father."

"You just got out of the hospital yesterday." Sinclair rumbles, as if I could forget. "You shouldn't be lugging around groceries or going on extended walks, and especially not without guards."

"Dominic, you never told me that I needed to take guards with me if I went out, or that I had to run my plans by you first." I counter, trying to stay calm.

"Because I thought it was common sense!" He exclaims. "Ella, you know how crazy the media coverage has been lately, and you know I don't go anywhere without guards – and I'm a lot bigger and stronger than you are. What if something had happened- we wouldn't have known where to look for you!"

"I was just trying to do something nice for you!" I exclaim, fighting back tears. "I never agreed to be a prisoner here."

"Don't be so dramatic." Sinclair scoffs. "No one is saying you're a prisoner. But you are a public figure now, and you're in delicate condition. We're talking about taking basic precautions and keeping me in the loop. I need to know where you are, I need to know that you're safe and not taking careless risks!"

"Carrying a few bags of sugar is hardly a risk to my health!" I argue, smothering a few extra choice words. "I'm not so delicate that I need a constant babysitter. You forget that I was on my own for 30 years before you came along and I did just fine!"

"Oh right, so fine that a bottom dwelling asshole bankrupted and betrayed you for years on end!" Sinclair snaps.

"That isn't fair." I fight back, my voice thick with emotion. "Don't blame me for what Mike did!"

"I'm not." He sighs, seeming to regret his rash statement. "I wouldn't. But if you were vulnerable to scum like him in the human world, you're five times as vulnerable among shifters. You don't know how dangerous it is out there!"

"And how am I suppose to know, if you don't tell me?" I demand. "How am I suppose to know I'm breaking your ridiculous rules if you don't even tell me what they are in the first place?"

"They aren't ridiculous, they're for your own safety!" Sinclair grits out.

"That didn't answer my question." I remark, narrowing my eyes.

"I'm sorry Ella, I didn't expect you to go galavanting around town when you're barely recovered! I thought you would come to me if you needed something." He grits out, his jaw ticking in annoyance.

"I don't want to have to come to you every time I want to set foot outside the house!" I cry, "I don't like having to rely on other people for things I'm perfectly capable of doing for myself."

"You mean you don't trust other people." Sinclair corrects me, cutting to the quick. "You feel safer doing everything for yourself, and you don't know how to ask anyone else for help – let alone believe they'll come through for you."

I don't know how he managed to figure that out. He isn't wrong – I've always preferred to do everything myself, because I learned the hard way that I'm the only person I can rely on when push comes to shove. But I've never told him this – I've never expressed this to anyone. "I meant what I said." I insist, stubbornly notching my chin up.

"I understand better than you think, Ella." Sinclair relates, softening his tone. "But you're supposed to be avoiding stress."

"What's stressing me out is you standing here yelling at me!" I accuse, tears burning in my eyes. "I was just trying to do something nice, I didn't know it would upset anyone!"

"Come on, now." Sinclair admonishes. "At least do me the courtesy of being honest – you couldn't have gotten out of this house unseen without trying."

"Or maybe your guards aren't as on top of things as you think they are." I bite back.

Sinclair narrows his eyes. "You managed to ditch guards specifically assigned to you, Ella."

"What?" I squeak. "Why do you have guards assigned to me?"

"Because you're pregnant with my pup!" He growls, "because I have enemies who would target you at a moment's notice, which you very well know."

"Or maybe it's because you're just an invasive, overprotective ass!" I explode, "you haven't stopped bossing me around from the moment I got here!"

Sinclair's eyes flash dangerously, and the next thing I know he's prowling towards me across the kitchen. I back away until my body collides with the cabinets, suddenly wondering if I've pushed him too far. "Careful Ella." He warns, looming over me. He braces his hands on the counter on either side of my body, pinning me between his arms. He ducks his head so that his face is only a few inches from mine, and I feel the power and authority rolling off him in waves. "I've given you a lot of leeway so far because you don't know our ways, but if you keep speaking to me that way I won't be accountable for my actions."

My knees turn to jelly in the face of his anger, but somehow this fear isn't the same kind I've known in the past. I don't believe he'll hurt me, especially since I'm carrying his pup – as he keeps pointing out. No, his threats feel different – darkly sensual in a way I don't quite understand. All of a sudden I'm very curious to see what he'll do if I keep pushing him. I'm sorely tempted to test him, to see just how far I can push my luck. "Fine." I hiss. "I won't speak to you that way. I'll show you instead."

I reach for the bag of flour on my left, taking a handful in my fist. Before I can think better of it, I act, lobbing the flour right into his incredibly handsome face.

Chapter 30 – Food Fight

Ella

The flour collides with Sinclair's face in an explosion of white powder, covering his features in dense grains and fluttering through the air around us. A low growl rumbles in his chest, and fear slices through me as I wonder if I've made a grave mistake. Sinclair takes a moment to open his eyes after the flour hits, but when he does, his wolf is glowing bright in his irises, and my instincts take over.

I try to duck under his arms, to evade his hold anyway I can. However the moment I begin attempting escape he leans forward, crushing my body between him and the counter. At once I'm reminded of how much larger Sinclair is. Sometimes it's easy to be fooled when I'm dressed up in heels or there's space between us, but now I can feel how helpless I am beside him. The top of my head barely reaches his sternum, and next to his muscles, my slender limbs feel terribly frail.

Sinclair's breath is coming in heaving gasps, and I have the good sense to remain frozen as he tries to gain control of his wolf.

When I look up at him, I can see only the wild animal fuming beneath his skin, and I realize exactly how dangerous this man is.

I'm not sure if he's going to attack me, or yell at me, and my heart is racing a mile a minute. I instinctively flinch when he moves, but he doesn't raise a hand against me. Instead he reaches past me towards the bowl of chocolate cake batter, and the next thing I know, a river of the thick, sweet mixture is dripping down my face.

I gasp in shock, realizing that Sinclair is pouring the batter over me, and try to jerk away. "Dominic, no!"

A dark laugh rolls through the big wolf like thunder, "Oh baby, you asked for this."

I raise my arms over my head, trying to protect myself, but when that doesn't work I reach for the bowl too, returning fire with handful of batter straight into Sinclair's expensively tailored shirt. Soon we're wrestling over the bowl, trying to retrieve more sweet ammunition to splatter each other with, and I'm laughing harder than I can remember laughing in a very long time.

The sound of Sinclair's own cozy chuckles fill my ears as I trade out cake batter for icing, reaching up with two hands and smearing it over his face as he playfully nips at my fingers, before positively squealing as warm, melted chocolate is drizzled over the low cut top of my dress, seeping down between my breasts and into my bra.

We're both absolutely covered in the various cake components, giddy with laughter and still searching for new ways to combat one another. The bowls on the counter are already empty, and I narrow my eyes at Sinclair as I contemplate moving to the pantry or fridge for more ammo. His white teeth flash, and the next thing I know he's racing towards the fridge faster than I can even comprehend.

I dart to the pantry, pulling open the door to use as a shield and disappearing inside, zeroing in on a bottle of caramel syrup, even as I see Sinclair plucking a can of whipped cream from the fridge. Soon we're stalking around the kitchen island, trying to get close enough to squirt each other with our chosen item, and inevitably laughing and racing away when the other gets too close.

I try to feint around the edge of the counter, making him think I'm going to go in a direction other than the one I intend, but I'm outmatched in this game in every possible way. Sinclair is bigger, stronger and faster, and he can read my intentions far better than I can read his.

He snatches me easily, spraying me with cold whipped cream until I manage to wriggle free, even though I know he's letting me escape. If he wanted to he could have easily pinned me in place, but we're both having too much fun with our game.

It's making an unholy mess, but I can't remember the last time I had this much fun. Sinclair has completely surprised me too – I never expected him to have a playful side, and it's so different from the men I've known before. Mike and I certainly never did anything like this, and I doubt my ex would have had the inclination or the confidence to let a woman defy him this way. Sinclair, on the other hand, has no doubts about his masculinity. He can gladly let me tease and defy him without feeling threatened, because he knows at the end of the day his dominance is complete.

Too late I realize I'm thinking about Sinclair in comparison to my past lovers, when I know he doesn't see me this way at all. Yet I can't help it, the more time that passes the more certain I feel that Sinclair is attracted to me. I know it's only physical and that I could never be anything but a plaything to him, but it feels nice to be desired – even if it is superficial.

When the bottle of caramel is empty, I try to make my way back to the pantry, but Sinclair has other ideas. "Come here you." He purrs, snatching me up. "Such a bad girl." His fingers are digging into my sides, tickling me ruthlessly and making me giggle and squeal uncontrollably. I try to wrestle him for dominance, but I know it's a lost cause.

We tumble to the floor together, wrestling and writhing against one another, getting more and more dirty with every minute that passes. Sinclair lets me pin him to the tiled floor, straddling his middle and trapping his hands above his head. "Ha!" I declare triumphantly, secretly needing him to prove my victory false, to take control and make me forget my own name.

“Oh, you think you’ve won, do you?” He taunts, grinning up at me.

“You’re not so scary, you know.” I counter, smiling widely. “What would all those big tough wolves say if they knew their leader was letting a weak little human throw food in his face?”

The next thing I know I’m on my back with Sinclair looming above me. The air leaves my lungs in a great whoosh – I didn’t even see him flip me, but suddenly our situations are completely reversed. I’m still straddling Sinclair, my legs spread on either side of his body so that his hardness is pressed to my most sensitive flesh through our clothes. “They’d say, lucky Alpha.” He answers smugly, looking down at me with undiluted hunger.

The little voice in my head has me metaphorically squirming, needing to apologize for reasons I don’t understand. It’s almost as if I feel compelled to submit now that Sinclair has physically bested me, but why would that be the case? I try to hold the words back, but I can’t stop them no matter what I try. “I am sorry I snuck out.” I confess, peeking up at him from beneath my lashes.

“You’re forgiven.” Sinclair rules gently, “As long as you promise not to do it again.”

My metaphorical squirming becomes very literal now, though I freeze almost immediately when I realize the way my nervous movement rubs my sensitive sex against his. Softening, I agree, “I promise.”

I don’t understand what’s happening to me. I have all of these strange emotions bubbling up inside me. Is it all just the pregnancy, the pup making me feel and behave more like a wolf, or is it something more than that. “That’s my girl.” Sinclair praises, looking down at me with obvious pride.

“What are you doing to me?” I murmur, before I can stop myself.

“What do you mean?” He asks, frowning slightly.

“I don’t know.” I huff, “I just feel like a different person since we met.”

“Maybe you’re becoming the person you were always meant to be.” Sinclair suggests, shifting so that my wrists are captured between one of his strong hands, while the other slides down my body. “It’s finally safe to come out of your shell, so you are.”

“I think you’re giving yourself an awful lot of credit.” I respond primly, even as I fight the desire to lean into his touch. “And it’s a shame you were such a jerk.” I add pointedly, “now you won’t get to taste the cake I made.”

Sinclair arches his brow, gazing down at my batter covered body and adopting a devilish expression. Before I know what's happening, he's lowered his mouth to the swell of my breast and is licking the cake batter from my skin, groaning with delight.

"Delicious." He praises, rising up over me again. His eyes drift to the curve of my full lips, then the whipped cream splattered across my clavicle – as if he can't decide what to taste next. A low purr vibrates against my skin, "I want more."

Chapter 31 – Rogue Attack

3rd Person

Sinclair was tired of fighting his instincts. Ella was looking up at him with heavy-lidded eyes, the scent of her arousal heavy in the air. Why was he fighting his desire for her? So she was human – she was also beautiful, spirited and bright, everything he could want in a woman. It was exhausting trying to rein in his wolf, and he was tired of denying himself. The fact was that Sinclair wanted Ella more intensely than he could remember wanting anyone. The logical part of his brain insisted it was just the pup growing in her womb, but the more time that passed the more the Alpha believed it was the woman herself.

Sinclair dipped his head until their mouths were mere inches apart, and Ella sighed and tilted her chin up – offering her lips for the taking. He was about to claim them when a knock sounded at the door, followed by a low squeak and a familiar man's voice,

“What on earth?”

Sinclair turned to look at Hugo, who was frozen in the doorway, staring at the food-splattered kitchen and the couple on the floor in abject shock. “Not now.” Sinclair growled, his wolf clamoring just beneath the surface of his skin.

Hugo met the Alpha's piercing gaze, “Dom -“

“I said not now.” Sinclair repeated fiercely.

“Trust me.” Hugo stated resolutely, “you want to hear what I have to say.”

Grumbling with annoyance, Sinclair looked back to Ella, sorely tempted to tell her not to move a muscle until he returned.

However he knew that if Hugo was being this persistent, he probably wasn't going to be back anytime soon. It filled him with regret that he wouldn't be able to lick all the chocolate from Ella's sweet body himself, or even help her wash away the remnants in a steaming shower. His mind was overflowing with all the sensuous possibilities, but the best he could do was promise the little human that, “we'll finish this later.”

He helped Ella to her feet before taking his leave, grabbing a dish towel on the way out to wipe the flour, chocolate and syrup from his face. “What's up?” He asked Hugo, once they were alone.

“There's been a rogue attack in old town.” The Beta shared gravely. “It looks like there's quite a few fatalities.”

Sinclair cursed, “any hints on who’s responsible?”

“Witnesses say the attackers came out of nowhere. They burst onto the canals and started wreaking havoc.” Hugo explained.

“It’s clear they were sent to harm, no one reported having anything stolen.”

Sinclair’s wolf – already fighting for control – reared up inside him, overwhelmed by urgent concern for his pack members. There hadn’t been a rogue attack in a very long time, and he highly doubted that the timing of this incident was a coincidence. “I’ll shower as fast as I can, and I’ll be right there.”

The scene of the attack was worse than Sinclair could have imagined.

Moon Valley’s old town was normally an enchanting place at this time of year. With its idyllic maze of canals woven through historic buildings and blanketed in thick white snow, it should have looked like a winter wonderland – if it weren’t for all the blood.

Ever since the river froze a few weeks earlier, the waterways became bustling thoroughfares dotted with pop up shops to be navigated by humans and shifters on ice skates. They weren’t as grand as they’d be after the solstice celebrations began the following week, but they certainly shouldn’t have looked like this.

At least a dozen bodies littered the ice, and thick crimson pools steamed then froze solid on the glassy surface. Keening filled the air as shifters mourned and injured beings suffered on the sidelines, tended to by concerned bystanders and emergency responders. Sinclair scanned the carnage – noting that all the victims were wolves, not that this came as a surprise. This part of the city was dominated by estates passed down through generations of wealth which, combined with the steep rents on new properties and high end businesses, all but guaranteed the inhabitants were shifters.

Moon Valley’s human mayor was already on the scene, but she was only there for appearances sake. Human tourists might visit to take in the natural splendor, but old town was strictly under Sinclair’s jurisdiction. Sighing with resignation, Sinclair approached the austere woman. “Madame Mayor.”

“Alpha,” She replied tersely, “I presume this was your kind’s doing?”

“Definitely a wolf attack.” He confirmed, ignoring the clear disdain in her voice. “My investigators are on the case.”

“You know this isn’t the kind of press our city needs – just before the holidays too. It’s high tourist season.”

“It’s the holidays for us as well,” Sinclair reminded her. “And you would do well to recall that I don’t blame you when humans wreak havoc in the territory.”

“That’s because my kind is no threat to yours.” The mayor quipped.

Sinclair scoffed, “Right, that’s why we exist in secret – because humans are so accepting of those who are different.”

The Mayor, like all human mayors of Moon Valley, had been less than amused to discover the existence of shifters when she took office two years earlier. Nor could she ever fully wrap her mind around the power dynamics. It never ceased to confuse her that the monarchy resided in Moon Valley but did not rule the pack directly, rather delegating power to the territory’s Alpha.

Sinclair, on the other hand, thought it was pure stubbornness on her part – since she had no problem understanding state versus federal governance in her own society.

“And I suppose this has nothing to do with your campaign?” She questioned. “The Prince’s statement yesterday was quite damning.”

Sinclair blinked. What statement? Had he really been so distracted by Ella that he missed an important development in the race?

It was a silly question. As soon as he asked it of himself he knew the answer was yes. He’d become so preoccupied with the lovely human over the last couple of weeks that he’s thought of little else – including the campaign. Sure he kept his appointments and appearances, but his mind was rarely focused on the matter at hand. It was permanently locked on Ella. In fact, now that he reflected on it – he’d scarcely thought of anything else since she’d come begging for her sister’s job – even before he knew about the pup.

If he’d missed a major statement by the prince, then she wasn’t only a distraction, but a dangerous one. If he’d been paying attention, would he have seen this attack coming? He could imagine the kind of drivel the statement included – was the Prince behind the attack too? He wouldn’t put it past him, and there was no doubt this was going to hurt him. At the end of the day this was his city, not the Prince’s and the attack would make him look like an Alpha who couldn’t protect his people.

Guilt washed over him in a tidal wave. The criticism would be true either way. Whether a political scheme, or a genuine rogue threat, he had failed to secure old town. He had failed to protect his people, and the death surrounding him was his fault. The lives of all Moon Valley shifters were in his hands, and he’d let these slip through his fingers – worse, he hadn’t even noticed it happening.

If not for Ella this might never have happened. He wasn't blaming her, far from it – he knew he was the only one to blame. It was his distraction with the human beauty which allowed this to happen, and if it was a princely plot, then it was his heir and his campaign which were responsible.

The mayor, seeing Sinclair had disappeared into his thoughts, shifted away to make a statement to the media, leaving the Alpha with his guilt. He'd always hated seeing any of his people hurt – but this was the first time he knew without a doubt that they were hurt because of him. Suddenly the reasons that he'd been fighting his instincts when it came to Ella and his desire, came rushing back to him like a wildfire. His wolf might want her, but taking his eye off the ball at this stage in the game was dangerous to all of them.

Even as he thought this morbid fact, his eye caught on a flash of silver in his periphery. Turning, he looked up at the raised street running parallel to the canal. There was a sleek town car parked near the bridge, and a crowd of shifters gathered at the railing, looking down on the bloody tableau so many feet below them.

Sinclair recognized the Prince immediately, with his sleek blonde hair and gaudy clothes. The other man gazed over the crime scene with cold disinterest, until he finally met Sinclair's gaze. He arched one blond brow and shook his head, as if in disappointment, but he couldn't keep the smirk from his face. A moment later the human mayor appeared at his side, murmuring in his ear.

Ice froze the blood in Sinclair's veins, and he looked to Hugo, a grave expression on his handsome face. "Tighten Ella's security as soon as possible." He commanded. "I want eyes on her at all times."

Chapter 32 – Ella Has a Visitor

Ella

I scrub the food from my body as steaming water pours down around me in a blissful cascade. A hot shower is exactly what I needed, but I feel like a silly school girl starcrossed in puppy love. I can't stop replaying the events in the kitchen in my mind, reliving every word, every touch – every look from Sinclair's penetrating green eyes.

I find myself running my hands over my bare skin in the same places he stroked and caressed me, imagining what he'll do when he comes home. I know he was going to kiss me before Hugo interrupted us, and the memory of his lips so near mine sends shivers of excitement down my spine. Sinclair has kissed me before of course, but never in private, never simply because he wanted to.

My mind races with the possibilities. Will he make love to me when he returns? Is his attraction that strong? I can't stop imagining it. Will he be gentle and tender the way he's been when I most needed comfort? Will he be rough and dominating, unleashing the animal within? Or will he be some combination of the two, passion in all its varying forms?

I finally pull myself out of my daydreams when the water runs cold. I yelp when the heat disappears, dousing me in icy reality.

What am I doing? Who is this silly, sex-crazed girl who's taken over my mind? Sinclair and I don't have a future together, so why am I letting the little voice in my head get so carried away with longing for the impossible? That's not me – I've always been practical and realistic, not some starry eyed dreamer. Shaking myself, I cut off the water and grab a towel, determined to stop being so silly.

No sooner have I stepped out of the shower that a knock sounds at the bedroom door. "Miss, you have a visitor!" A maid calls through the thick wooden panel.

I do? This is a surprise. No one has ever visited me here, and the only person who might is Cora – but it's the middle of the day, surely she's at work. Even though I rationalized this, I'm still surprised when I get downstairs it's not Cora waiting for me. It's just about the last person I would have expected to see – Sinclair's estranged brother, Roger.

"Hello Ella." He greets me, standing from his chair.

I freeze in the doorway of the sitting room, unable to process the sight before me. "What are you doing here?"

"Easy now." He raises his hands in supplication, "I come in peace."

“Excuse me if I find that hard to believe.” I cut.

“I came to apologize for the way I behaved the day we met. I’m ashamed to say that my brother brings out the worst in me. It was wrong to take that out on you.” Roger states remorsefully.

“You know I really don’t understand you two.” I confess. “Where I come from, siblings are all you have – the only friends, the only family or allies. It seems very strange to me that you and Dominic are so at odds.”

“Where do you come from?” He asks thoughtfully.

“The shadow pack.” I’ve told the lie so many times now that I don’t even have to think about it. “But my parents died when I was young.”

“I’m very sorry to hear that.” He says, sounding surprisingly genuine. “But it’s different for Dom and I. Your circumstances pushed you and your siblings together, ours tore us apart. Being the sons of an Alpha sets you in competition with one another from a young age. Our father never encouraged it, but we always knew that one of us would rule one day – and we both wanted to prove ourselves.”

“That must have been difficult.” I empathize, remembering what Sinclair also told me about their mother’s death. “But it doesn’t excuse the things you said to me.”

“Ella, I truly am sorry.” He professes again, raising a finger to qualify his statement. “At least, for the way I spoke to you. But I’m afraid I can’t apologize for the things I said.”

My shoulder’s stiffen. “Shouldn’t it be the reverse?”

“No, because I wasn’t lying.” Roger frowns deeply. “I may have been speaking spitefully but my heart was in the right place.”

I cut my eyes to him, “I don’t think spite can ever be the right place.”

“I was trying to warn you.” Roger insists, “And I’d warn you again if you’ll let me.”

“I’ll listen to what you have to say.” I concede, my morbid curiosity burgeoning. “but I won’t promise to take it to heart.”

Roger sighs, almost seeming relieved. “What has Dom told you about Lydia?” He asks.

I’m taken aback for a moment. I remember Roger’s harsh words about how I was nothing but a womb to him, that he’d toss me aside as soon as the pup came along, but I wasn’t expecting him to bring up Lydia. “That they were fated, but she left when he couldn't give her children." I summarize simply.

"And did he mention that she hasn't had pup with her chosen mate either?" Roger presses.

"No, why would he?" I inquire, though I can already see where this is going.

"They always assumed the root of fertility struggles lied with him." Roger explains, "But now that it's clear that he can father children after all, I guarantee she'll be back."

"Just because she comes back, it doesn't mean Dominic will accept her." I remark coolly. In my head I'm thinking that he won't be so quick to forgive a mate who turned her back on him, fated or not, but I also have to remember I'm supposed to be Dominic's second chance mate. I need Roger to think I'm confident enough in our bond that Lydia's return wouldn't challenge it.

"Ella," He says my name as if it's an apology itself. "They're fated. Take it from someone who learned the hard way – chosen mates can be wonderful, but the Goddess's bond is stronger than all else."

"It happened to you?" I ask, intrigued by his statement.

Roger laughs, "I see Dom left out that part of the story, did he?"

"What part?" I clarify uncertainly.

"Lydia was my lover first." He reveals. "She'd agreed to a formal mating ceremony and everything. We knew we weren't fated, but we thought our love would be strong enough. Then Dominic came of age, and their bond came to life. Everything that had once been between us... disappeared overnight."

"Dominic stole Lydia from you?" I can barely stop myself from gaping with the surprise of this news. Sinclair certainly hadn't shared that part of the tale when he explained Roger's disdain for him.

"They were fated." Roger shrugs, much more accepting that I would have been about the situation. "Neither of them had a choice in the matter... and he won't have a choice when she comes back either."

"And you're certain she'll return?" I prompt.

"I'm sure of it." Roger relates gently. "I'm sorry to be the one to tell you this... and I hope I'm wrong. But you should prepare yourself. I wish I'd had someone to warn me this way."

“Well thank you for telling me. I’ll take your advice into consideration.” I reply honestly.

I thought about Roger’s words for a long time after he left. I still don’t trust the man, after all he definitely has a chip on his shoulder when it comes to Sinclair. I’m curious about why Sinclair left out the details about his past relationship with Lydia, but not enough to believe Roger hook, line and sinker.

Besides, true or not it doesn’t really change anything at the end of the day. Roger thought he was warning me, but he doesn’t know I’m human, that I’ve already been warned and indeed, prepared for a new mate to come into Sinclair’s life eventually anyway. Sure, I wasn’t expecting it to be Lydia – but the identity of the woman doesn’t really matter, I’ll cease being Luna regardless.

I’m still glad of the idea that my baby might have half siblings one day, but it is an important reminder to protect my heart. I was already questioning myself before Roger turned up, and his cautionary tale just reinforces the need to shield my heart against the Alpha. If I keep carrying on this way, mooning over a man who is completely out of my reach and letting my feelings get completely carried away, I’ll basically be asking for heartbreak.

Sinclair might be build for casual sex, but I’m not, and that means I have to stop the flirtation before it goes too far.

That night, I go to sleep in my own bed for the first time in a week. I don’t expect to be missed. Sinclair still isn’t home, and after what I heard this afternoon – I’m glad for some time alone. The last thing I need is for Sinclair to come home and truly attempt to finish what we started this afternoon. No matter how badly I might want to indulge those desires – I know they’re a recipe for disaster.

Half-asleep, it seems that a person came to my bedside. Who?

Chapter 33 – Sinclair Returns

Sinclair

I smell Roger the moment I walk through the door. My wolf is immediately alert, and I approach the first guard I see. “Was my brother here?”

“Yes Alpha.” The man replies. “He requested a meeting with Ella, and she granted it.”

I do not like the sounds of that. “How long was he here? Is she alright?”

“They spoke for close to an hour.” The guard replies. “She didn’t seem upset afterwards, but she went to bed early and without supper.”

Worry simmers in my belly. If Roger was here it was undoubtedly to make trouble, and while Ella might have simply been exhausted, I don’t believe these events are unrelated. I haven’t eaten either, but I head straight upstairs to check on the mother of my pup. However when I reach my rooms, Ella isn’t there.

Instead I make my way downstairs to her suite, concern tying my insides into knots. I push open the bedroom door, following the luscious aroma that is Ella, and stalk silently inside. She’s curled up beneath the covers, sleeping as sweetly as can be. I’m smiling despite my inner turmoil, moving to sit by her side as she doses.

Ella is lying on her stomach, her arms folded up beneath her pillow, her rose gold hair spilling over her bare shoulders in a silky cascade. I brush a few locks away from her face, content to simply watch her sleep. She looks so angelic like this, and I feel a fresh wave of worry for what Roger might have said to her. Did she go to bed in her own rooms because I wasn’t home, or because Roger upset her?

I’ll kill him if he’s said or done anything to harm her. The thought circles ominously around me for a long moment, and I’m a bit taken about by the force of my conviction. I feel so protective of this little human – is it really only because she’s carrying my baby?

After a minute Ella’s brow furrows and she whimpers in her sleep. I worry she might be having another nightmare, which brings on yet another flood of possessive energy. What happened in her life that haunted her dreams this way? Was she reliving past horrors, or simply imagining terrors which haven’t actually come to pass? Something about the way she refused to talk about the last one makes me suspect the former.

I push the covers down only far enough to expose the curve of her spine, needing to feel her shape beneath my fingers. When I stroke one large hand down the graceful column she stirs and stretches, turning towards me and unconsciously cuddling closer.

She blinks her brilliant eyes open a moment later, offering me a bleary eyed yawn.

“You’re back.”

“I am.” I agree, “And you’re in the wrong bed.” I tease, petting her slender waist and marveling at how small she is compared to me. The breadth of my hand easily circles her ribs, and I wonder if my fingers would actually touch if I tried to wrap my other hand around her middle.

“Mmm,” She moans, the sound like a sultry torment to my oversensitized ears. “You weren’t here.”

“As if that’s any excuse.” I mockingly scold.

“Are you going to make me move?” She murmurs, though her eyes have already closed again and she sighs contentedly as I continue to caress her.

“I should.” I muse, “I should make you get up and have the dinner you skipped.”

Ella peeks one eye open then, pouting in a way that does nothing to garner my sympathy and everything to make me contemplate claiming her plump, pink lips. “Your servants are tattle tales.”

“Uh-huh.” I chuckle, trying to keep my tone light as I continue, “they also told me about your visit with Roger.”

Ella hums with indignation, but doesn’t say more.

“Would you like to tell me what he wanted?” I ask after a moment.

“He was warning me.” She yawns.

“What about?” I rumble, fearing I already know the answer.

“Nothing I didn’t already know.” Ella shrugs sleepily. “That your mate will come along one day and you’ll no longer need me to be Luna.”

Only the sight of Ella contentedly stretching into my touch like a sleepy kitten keeps me from jumping to my feet and growling.

“He has no business saying such things to you.”

“Why not?” She purrs, “It’s true.”

I don’t know why it bothers me so much to hear her speak that way – but it does. “You know that and I know that – but he things you’re my second chance mate like everyone else. He thinks you're a she-wolf and he has no right to interfere." The truth is that he completely crossed a line. Ella isn't familiar enough with our ways to understand how egregious his behavior truly was. If she was truly my mate and another man came along and told her I didn't actually care for her, I would be well within my rights to challenge him.

Still, Ella isn't my mate, and though I genuinely hate hearing her talk about a future where we aren't together, I know she's being pragmatic. That's the arrangement we agreed upon. She would be equally justified to dissolve our agreement if she met a man.

Before I've even finished the thought, my wolf is roaring in my head, driven over the edge by the idea of Ella being with anyone else. It takes all my willpower to keep him reined in, and I'm glad Ella is only half awake. I'm sure it's just the pup growing in her belly – I wouldn't care otherwise, but as long as she's carrying my child, the idea of another man – even a human – coming near her makes me absolutely furious. I breathe in a deep sigh, trying to get my wolf back under control. Of course this only amplifies her delicious scent, and my wolf becomes distracted once more.

"You washed off my scent again." I observe, thankful that my voice sounds much calmer than I feel.

Ella flushes despite her foggy state. "I had to – I was covered in chocolate and whipped cream and who knows what else."

Oh how quickly things can change, I think sadly. This afternoon I wanted nothing more than to lick every inch of her body clean, and now I'm glad the temptation is gone. If I'd gone down that road there would have been no turning back, and this afternoon was a cautionary tale I won't soon forget. Ella and I have to find a way to move forward in our agreement without all the pent up sexual tension – maybe she realized the same thing after Roger's visit. Maybe that's the real reason she chose to sleep in her own bed.

I see the logic of it, and yet I can't seem to stop myself from flirting. "Hmm, and who's fault was that?"

"Yours." Ella replies easily, still not opening her eyes.

"Oh really? I seem to remember you throwing the first handful." I remind her amusedly.

Again that sumptuous pout, more tempting than she could possibly realize. "You provoked me."

"Such a temper." I tease, running my fingers through her long hair. "if I didn't know any better I'd think you were a wolf."

“I think I’d like to be one.” She confesses wistfully, “Just to shift and experience what it would be like to be that free.”

I can hear the emotion in her voice clear as day, even though she’s not truly awake. Her words make me wonder what Ella would be like as a wolf, and I have to admit I find the idea more plausible than I would for most humans. She’s so strong of will and spirit, clever, intuitive, both deeply independent and pack oriented – she’s even skittish like she’s wrangling a wild inner animal.

Suddenly I find myself wishing that she was a wolf too, so we could be together without all these complications. “What am I going to do with you, Ella?”

I can’t afford these distractions, and I need to be caring for my family and the pack, not rutting Ella senseless. I’m not even sure if she could withstand the affections of a wolf. She’s so small, so delicate. I can’t risk her or the pup. I have to simply be grateful she’s safe, and give up hoping for more – for both our sakes.

She rolls onto her back, looking up at me curiously. “Earlier you said ‘we’ll finish this later.’” She reminds me. “What did you mean?”

Damn. I’d meant I was going to kiss her until she forgot her own name and take her to bed, but I’ve seen the error of my ways only too well today. “I meant we’d finish talking about security and setting boundaries.” I lie instead. “But we can talk about that tomorrow.”

Chapter 34 – Ella Learns About the Solstice

Ella

I wake up alone in bed, and promptly rush to the restroom to empty the contents of my stomach. When I finally emerge, I find Aileen waiting for me, a breakfast tray in her hands and a kind smile on her face. “How are you doing, my love?”

“I am thankful my baby is growing big and strong.” I recite, clutching my belly and repeating the same mantra I keep employing whenever the morning sickness or mood swings act up.

Aileen chuckles, “but you feel like hell?” She guesses.

I nod pitifully, and Aileen offers me a steaming cup of tea. “Here, have some of this. When I was carrying my pips nothing banished the sickness better.” I take a sip of the herbal brew, sighing happily as warmth fills me up from the inside out. “That’s it.”

Aileen encourages. “I can already see some color coming back into your cheeks.”

“More Luna lessons today?” I guess, thanking her kindness with a wide smile and a squeeze of her soft hands.

“And not a moment too soon.” She reports, “We shouldn’t have put it off this long with the holidays coming up so soon, but Dominic wanted to give you time to rest.”

“The holidays?” I repeat, the wheels slowly turning over in my mind. Her words take a moment to sink in, I’m so ravenous after going to bed without supper that it’s all I can do not to shove my face full of the cream scones and raspberry jam laid out on the breakfast tray. “Of course,” I eventually murmur, “It hadn’t even occurred to me that if you have your own gods you’d have your own holidays and traditions.”

Aileen smiles kindly. “It’s alright, this is all a lot to take in, but we don’t have much time to waste either. The Winter Solstice is next week, and you are going to be very busy, my dear.”

I know enough about ancient pagan traditions to know that the Winter Solstice is the longest night of the year, but beyond that I’m fairly clueless about how werewolves might celebrate the occasion. “What happens at the Winter Solstice?”

“Well, it’s all about honoring nature and the goddess, rebirth, transformations and new beginnings – finding light in the dark half of the year. It’s really beautiful. The week before the solstice day is seven days straight of different festivals and activities, I’ve got a calendar around her somewhere.” She adds, moving back towards the breakfast tray and searching through the contents. “It’s all wonderful: bonfires, drinking and dancing, parading through the streets and decorating the city, lighting candles, giving gifts.

Then there's feasts and rituals, and it all culminates in a grand ball at the Royal Palace."

Her words ring a few bells in my mind. I've always known there are exclusive parties and festivals in the city's wealthiest neighborhoods, but I always assumed they were for the human holiday celebrations, not anything supernatural. I've never attended because I've never had the money or access to such entertainment, but it also sounds like Aileen is talking about events far more extensive than the few of which I'm aware.

"A ball?" I repeat, latching onto her last comment. "Like... an actual ball?"

"I take it you've never been to one?" Aileen surmises, arching a brow.

I simply laugh, "When would I have ever had the opportunity? The only humans who have them are rich and famous!"

"I see," Aileen muses. "Well, I knew I was going to have to teach you our dances, but I suppose we'll have to be a bit more thorough regarding etiquette and the like."

I remember the dances Sinclair showed me at the shifter club, and my heart begins to pound. "What kind of dances?"

"Nothing like what you're thinking." Aileen assures me. "I swear they're all perfectly tasteful."

"And the festivals and rituals?" I gulp, remembering Sinclair's teasing about humans being prudish and repressed.

"Now they can get a bit scandalous, but I promise Sinclair will be with you every step of the way." She promises.

Sure, I think, a bitter taste in my mouth. I've heard that before. Before I can say anything of the sort or ask any additional questions, Aileen abruptly stops rustling through the tray, "Aha! Here it is!" She offers me a sheet of parchment, and I look down at the page with trepidation and awe.

Moon Valley Solstice Festival Schedule of Events

Night 1: Bonfire Night – Wulver Hill

Night 2: Solstice Procession – Old Town

Night 3: Yuletide Feast – Midwinter's Fair

Night 4: Wassailing – Central Canal

Night 5: Moon Bathing – Moon Valley Stone Circle

Night 6: The Wild Hunt – the King's Forest

Night 7: Masquerade Ball – the Royal Palace

"Aileen, I don't know what half these things are! More than half!" I exclaim, feeling suddenly and profoundly out of my depth.

"It's okay." She croons, "you'll take it one day at a time, and you'll be an expert in shifter solstice traditions by the time the week is out."

I scan the parchment over and over again, my eyes repeatedly catching on the ball and whatever moon bathing is. However only one event sends true fear slicing through my body. "What is the Wild Hunt?"

"Ah," Aileen purses her lips, looking as if she wants to smile. "That's when things get especially fun for mated couples. Some people find a partner just for the night, but it's more powerful when you're bonded to the one hunting you."

"Hunting you?" I squeak.

"Yes, she wolves take off into the woods, and then their mates must hunt them down and claim them. It goes back to our origin myths, when the Moon Goddess would lead her celestial army into the forest, in pursuit of souls to create new wolves.

Nowadays "making new wolves" takes on a more literal meaning. I can't tell you how many babies are conceived on the night of the wild hunt."

"But I can't shift." I remind her nervously. Would I even have to participate? Is it required? I'm already pregnant, that must be enough to get permission to sit it out.

"That's alright. As future Luna you'll lead the way into the forest wearing a special ceremonial dress and carrying a torch. You won't be expected to shift until you're out of sight, and then Dominic will set out after you long before anyone else joins – he's the only one who will know you didn't shift."

That doesn't make me feel much better. The idea of having the entire pack watching me lead a ceremony I've never heard of before sounds more frightening than comforting, especially since it will all be a fraud!

“Did Dominic used to do this with Lydia?” I ask, not entirely sure why that thought entered my brain.

“Why, of course.” Aileen confirms. “Why do you ask?”

I shrug, “Roger told me that she was his mate first. I suppose I’m just curious about their relationship.”

Aileen gives me an appraising look, and I try not to squirm beneath her scrutiny. She sighs. “And so she was, but fated mates...

there are some forces so strong nothing can combat them.”

“You both make it sound much more loving than Dominic did.” I confess, remembering how disenchanted the Alpha had seemed with his former mate. He never described how they met or the early days, he never mentioned any love between them, only her hunger for status and power.

“It’s easy to be bitter and cynical when your heart is broken.” Aileen confides, patting my shoulder.

“Right.” I murmur, and I have to admit this makes sense. Who hasn’t been bitter in the wake of a lost love – especially when things didn’t end amicably. Is that what’s happening with Sinclair? Is his pessimistic description of his marriage simply the wounds of a broken heart making themselves known?

And what about Lydia? I can’t even fathom what it would be like to be in love with one man, then feel so uncontrollably compelled to be with another that I’d leave him, but from what everyone says, it doesn’t sound like there was any fighting it. On the other hand, I know how devastating it can be to struggle with fertility – I may not understand the mystical forces behind fated mates, but I have to have some sympathy for her on this front at least.

If I’d believed Mike was sterile and that I might have a chance with another man, would I have left him? I think about it for a long moment, but I don’t think I would, and we were far from fated. Maybe I’m biased, after all I’ve seen the damage her disloyalty did to Sinclair, especially considering that a couple of their wealth could have easily gone through IVF or adopted a child. That, more than anything else makes me wonder if Sinclair was right, that she simply wanted the most powerful man in the room. Still, if that is the case, then Roger is probably right regardless. She’ll come back when she realizes Sinclair is set to be King – and when that day comes I’ll be reduced to nothing. Is Roger right that Sinclair will go back on his word when that happens? Will I lose my baby when Lydia returns?

All of a sudden it all seems like far too much to comprehend. I'm so overwhelmed by new information, confusing feelings and strange possibilities that I feel I might burst. I decide then and there to call Cora – I need to speak to someone who isn't immersed in this crazy world. If anyone can tell me whether or not I'm losing my mind – it's my sister.

Chapter 35 – Dinner with Cora

Ella

“I swear, Cora.” I groan, burying my head in my hands. “I’m in so far over my head it’s ridiculous.”

“You’re doing fine!” Cora insists, despite the fact that she doesn’t have any idea how things are actually going. “I mean a month ago you didn’t even know this world existed.”

“How did you keep it quiet for so long?” I inquire.

“I didn’t have a choice.” Cora admits, “I didn’t even believe it at first. It took me a lot longer to come to terms with it than it took you, believe me. I mean I could see it through my microscope, I could see the molecular evidence, but...” She trails off, shaking her head about just how deep her denial had run. “I just couldn’t wrap my head around it. I always thought magic was nonsense – it actually shook my belief in science for a minute there.”

I appreciate her consolation more than I can express. I’ve felt so alone in all this, it’s wonderful to know I’m not the only one who struggled this way. “I think it helps that I’ve been completely immersed in it.” I reason. “You have no idea how much better I feel just being out with you – away from all that. I mean honestly, it feels as though I’ve been living underwater or something. Like I’m learning how to survive without air because there’s no other option, and I don’t even realize how odd it is until I surface again and remember what breathing is.” I explain. “Not to mention Sinclair. He’s confusing me so much. It’s like I’m a teenager again and he’s my first crush.”

“Maybe it’s just the baby,” Cora suggests, “it wants to be near him.”

“I suppose.” I concede, “but I still don’t understand how any of this is possible. I mean the shifters are one thing – but how can I be pregnant by one?”

“I don’t know.” Cora sighs, “I mean their society has always been hidden for their own protection. A few humans like me are allowed to know, and I expect a few have fallen in love at some point or another, but I’ve never heard of anyone cross breeding.

It shouldn’t be possible.” She shakes her head. “Your baby really is a miracle, Elle.”

“Don’t I know it.” I grin. “I have to focus on that. I have to focus on the baby, rather than him.”

“Is it really that bad?” Cora presses.

“Yeah, I feel like I’m losing it, and I can’t figure out if he reciprocates the feelings, or if it’s all in my head. And then there’s all this stuff with his former mate. It’s all such a mess.”

“Do you trust him?” Cora probes gently, squeezing my hand across the table.

I feel like there’s a rock sitting in the bottom of my stomach as I consider this question. “I made the mistake of trusting one man – after everything that happened to us when we were growing up, I actually fell for Mike’s lies. I knew better and I let my guard down. I’ll never forgive myself for putting myself in that situation, and it’s not a mistake I plan on making again.”

Cora looks at me with so much undiluted pity that I pull my hand away. “Please don’t look at me that way.”

“Mike wasn’t your fault, Ella.” She declares firmly. “Mike was Mike’s fault.”

“It takes two to pull off a con.” I remind her, “It can’t succeed without an easy mark – and that’s obviously what I was. I’m at least partly responsible for not seeing through his bullshit. There were red flags and I just buried my head in the sand rather than confront them.”

She’s shaking her head determinedly, “You know, the older we get, the more I realize just how much you shielded me from when we were kids. You let yourself be hurt so that I and the other little ones wouldn’t be, and now you carry the weight of that trauma while we get off scot free. It isn’t fair. And I hate to see you blaming yourself this way when none of it has been your fault.”

I stare intently at my surrogate sister, feeling a rush of warmth for her. “You know I wouldn’t change that for the world, Cora. I would so much rather suffer myself, than let you be harmed, than fail to protect you.”

“That’s why you’re going to make such a wonderful mother.” She smiles tenderly.

“I just hope this baby is safe.” I relate. “The campaign ends just before I’m due, and once Sinclair is King I’ll be able to relax. But I’m terrified of him losing. If the Prince wins I really think he might come after my baby... maybe it and Sinclair both.”

“I can’t imagine anyone being strong enough to lay a hand on Sinclair.” Cora observes doubtfully.

“On their own maybe not.” I agree, “but with an army behind him?”

“Then you’ll just have to make sure he wins.” Cora encourages. “The word around the office is that you've already made an incredible splash."

"Yeah, so much of one that I can barely go anywhere without camera crews following me around everywhere I go." I complain.

"Well it definitely sounds like you need a night off." Cora declared mischievously. "We should go out! Just the two of us – before your whole life gets consumed by the holidays."

"I'd love to," I sigh, "but if we want to go out without an entire entourage we'll have to be sneaky about it."

She arches her brows. "Sinclair is being that overprotective?"

"Yes and it's driving me crazy. I mean about eleven different people have explained to me about male wolves with a breeding mate. I guess the pup is enough and I understand the prince might want to take him out of the running – but it's not like anything has even happened to make him worry!" I exclaim.

"I suppose it's better to be safe than sorry." Corry counters.

"True – so we'll just have to be extra safe when we go out." I decide. "In fact, we won't go anywhere near the shifter neighborhoods – human world only. I need some more time with my head above water."

The next afternoon I'm patiently allowing Sinclair to take my blood pressure, despite the fact that I'm perfectly capable of doing it myself. I'm trying to keep my thoughts neutral as the cuff begins to inflate, but it's hard to ignore the Alpha's laser focus on my features.

"I know what you're thinking." He smirks after a moment.

"Do you?" I quip.

"I know you can do this yourself." He grins, "but I like doing it for you and I've been so busy that last few days that this is one of the only times I get to spend with you and the pup."

Sure, I think wryly, other than when he's scent marking me every morning and night.

"Why have you been so busy?"

"Just the campaign, and the holidays. It's the craziest time of year." Sinclair explains, frowning at the reading on the little screen.

“Your pressure is still too high.”

“Have you ever considered that you might be what’s stressing me out?” I suggest, the words slipping out before I can stop them.

Sinclair gives me an appraising look, before reaching up to stroke my cheek. “Hmm, your heart does speed up when I touch you.

Why might that be?”

“As I said, stress.” I supply, instantly regretting the direction of this conversation.

“Uh-huh.” He rumbles, still petting me in the most infuriating way.

“Not to mention all this festival business.” I admit, eager to change the subject.

“What worries you about it?” He inquires, taking the bait.

“It’s seven days straight in the public eye, under intense scrutiny when I don’t know the first thing about the Solstice – beyond what Aileen told me.” I share.

“Ella, look at me.” He encourages, waiting for me to obey before continuing. “I promise you, I’ll help you through it.”

“You said that about the campaign dinner.” I remind him.

“I know, but I won’t let you down again, I’ll stay with you the whole time.”

“Okay, but if you don’t -” I begin to object.

“If I don’t I will grovel at your feet and grant you anything your little heart desires.” Sinclair vows, cutting me off.

“Anything?” I repeat, intrigued.

“Yes, but don’t you even think about sneaking away so that I’ll owe you.” He forbids, offering me a wolfish grin.

“Now there’s an idea!” I remark deviously.

Sinclair throws his head back and laughs. “Good Goddess, I’m not going to have to chain you to my wrist am I?”

I shrug, playfully batting my lashes. "I can pick a lock."

He laughs again, and I'm filled with warmth. Shaking his head, he presses a swift kiss to my forehead before standing. "No plotting. Focus on relaxing. I'll be home very late tonight, so don't wait up." He informs me, putting away the machine. "I'll see you in the morning."

I wait until he drives away before calling Cora. We'd agreed to go out the next time Sinclair stayed out late, and I'm not going to miss out on this chance. She picks up the phone promptly, and I'm smiling widely as I tell her the good news, "Cora – we're on."

Chapter 36 – Night Out

Ella

“Cora, this is exactly what I needed!” I exclaim, raising my voice over the pounding music. “When was the last time we went out just for the fun of it?”

“I can’t even remember!” She shouts back, beaming as multi-colored strobe lights flash over her lovely features. “When was the last time you weren’t working or stuck taking care of that prick, Mike!?”

I don’t need to know the exact date to know it’s been ages – we haven’t had the freedom or money to go out in years, not that it had been much of an option beforehand. Cora always offered to pay my way of course, but I never felt comfortable accepting money from her, not to mention Mike would have accused me of trying to meet another man. Looking at my sister now, dancing without a care to the thumping bass, I’m transported back to the first night we ever snuck into a club.

We were fifteen years old, and it was our second summer living in the streets rather than suffering at the orphanage. We couldn’t survive the elements in the fall and winter, so we always ended up going back – but these summers were quickly becoming our escape from all the troubles of the broken system, and this night was our first foray into the world of grown up night life.

We befriended the bartender, convincing him we were much older than our true age and bribing him with the little money we could spare from our jobs at a local daycare center. He let us in without complaint, even offering us our first drink for free. It was the first taste of alcohol we’d ever consumed, and the only amount we’d consume that night. We were determined to save our money so we could afford an apartment together one day – even if that meant sleeping in cardboard boxes in the park, or crashing on the floor of the daycare center in the meantime.

“This is amazing!” I cried, dancing without any inhibitions, raising my arms over my head as I swayed to the hypnotic beat.

“I never knew it could be so fun!” Cora replied happily. “Why isn’t dancing around in the dark at home this great?”

“Because we’re not allowed to have music,” I laugh, “or do anything even remotely resembling fun!”

“We should come back some time!” She suggests, obviously trying to figure out when we might be able to spend money again.

We both know it should be a special occasion, so I throw out, “The last night of summer!

Before we go back to the orphanage!"

The memory shifts before I can stop it, sweeping me off to the night we'd agreed on during that first outing, to the last night of summer. The evening had started out precisely the same way, with us changing in the children's restroom at work, trying our best to look grown up, and bribing our way in through the back door. It soon dissolved into a hazy fog of revelry, where Cora and I spiraled into the dizzying lights and deafening music.

It was all wonderful until an aggressive man twice my age took me by the hand and began grinding his body against mine, gripping me so tightly I couldn't escape his hold no matter how hard I struggled. He pulled me away from Cora from the start, but I didn't truly panic until he began dragging me towards the bathroom. The music was so loud that no one could hear me crying out for help. I wriggled and fought with all my might, but it wasn't until Cora flagged down one of the bouncers to come and pry the horrible man off me that I finally escaped.

It had been a close call, but one which was bound to raise other ghosts from the depths of my past – specters I have no intention of resurrecting now. I reach for Cora, determined not to continue down the path into my shattered memories, "I need some air!" I shout.

She's been dancing with a handsome man who hit on her at the bar, looking as though she's having the time of her life. Still, she takes one look at my face, and her own crumples with concern. "I'll come with you!"

"No," I wave her off, "You stay and have fun, I'll be back soon!"

I stalk out into the snow, not bothering to retrieve my coat from the coat check. The bracing cold is an utter relief after the writhing heat of the dance floor, and though I chafe my arms against the chill, I welcome the brisk air filling my lungs.

I hate it when this happens, when I've been doing so well staying in the present – and then my waking nightmares rise up at the most inopportune moments. I drag a hand through my hair, trying to clear my mind, to get myself back to that happy haze of a little while ago. I haven't wished for a drink since I was inseminated, but I wish I could have one now – just to help me escape, if only for a moment.

As I stand in the cold, contemplating how long is too long to spend out here and distractedly wondering why I never seem to feel the elements the way others do – the sound of clinking glass shatters the silence. I whip around, startling at the sudden sound.

I'm out behind the club, where there shouldn't be anyone else present except perhaps a raccoon raiding the dumpster.

Yet as I watch, four shadowy figures emerge from the darkness. I know they're shifters the moment I lay eyes on them – though I'm not sure how. Each one of the rough, ragged looking men is twice my size, and I immediately turn for the door to the club. I yank on the handle, once twice, then over and over again when it doesn't open. It must be locked!

Annoyance wells up inside me – despite the morbid turn of my thoughts, this night had been the break I needed from my new, surreal reality. Since we came out I haven't thought about wolves, shifters, Sinclair or the campaign even once. I finally felt like I was clearing my mind of all the chaos, but now that's all gone to hell. I can't very well ignore this.

"What do you want?" I demand, trying to sound braver than I feel. "If it's money, I'll give it to you, but you should know Alpha Dominic is my mate."

The man nearest me laughs, a cruel, humorless sound. "You think we don't know that?" He scoffs.

"That's why we're here." The second shifter states, as if this should be obvious."

"Then you also know I'm pregnant." I add, praying that this might provoke some semblance of mercy from them. They simply laugh again, and I add, "if you lay a hand on me, he'll kill you." I threaten, sensing in my heart that this is true, even though he's never told me any such thing.

"That assumes he can find us." The first man, clearly their leader, proclaims.

"And trust me, he won't." His side-kick contributes.

"Who sent you?" I scramble for any lifeline to help myself, to delay them long enough for me to find a way to escape. I'm scanning the alley behind them, but they're blocking every possible exit. "What are they paying you? I'll double the fee whatever it is."

The man scoffs, "We're not here for money, you dumb bitch."

"Then what?" I demand, "a cause?"

The first shifter lashes out so quickly and suddenly I don't even see him moving. He backhands me across the face, his knuckles exploding against my cheekbone with a violent crack. I tumble to the ground, even as he looms above me. "Shut the fuck up."

The coppery tang of blood fills my mouth, and I spit the viscous, crimson liquid into the snow. The world is spinning around me.

When I look up at my attackers, they seem to multiply, looking like eight men instead of four. I'm sure they expect me to whimper and plead with him, but if this is going to be the end of me, I refuse to play into his hands. I would gladly plead for the life of my baby, if I thought it might help, but I know better than to think these men will do anything other than use that pain and fear against me. They're the type that will play on any weakness you expose just to humiliate you.

I glare up at the leader, meeting his expectant smirk with a snark. "You're not the first man who's struck me." I inform him icily,

"and if you want to break me you're going to have to do better than that." I continue, taking only the mildest pleasure in their surprise. "You should be ashamed, I've known little boys with a stronger swing." It's a bold face lie, but I refuse to give him the satisfaction.

"Is that so?" He kneels down, taking my chin in his hand. "I see why the Alpha likes her." He leers, "Shall we see what other charms she's hiding?"

Chapter 37 – Roger To the Rescue

Ella

For all my bravado, my attacker's words fill me with dread. The implications are clear, and panic is bubbling up inside me. No, no, no. I think desperately, hating myself for provoking them. If I'd kept my mouth shut would they have just killed me? Did I bring this upon myself? I open my mouth to scream as he reaches toward me, pure malice glittering in his dark eyes, but before I can make a sound, a voice rings out behind the wolves.

"Take your hands off her!" Roger appears out of nowhere, and for a moment I'm sure I'm hallucinating. Where did he come from?

He charges forward, and I watch in horror and fascination as the clothes explode off his body in shreds and his sinewy muscles vibrate and pulse with energy. Before my very eyes he transforms, bursting forth in a whirlwind of fur, fangs and claws. Where Roger stood a moment before, now there is only a huge gray wolf.

Before I know it the other men have shifted too. Three are gray like Roger, but the first man -the largest and fiercest – has red fur like a fox. Of course I've never seen such a terrifying fox. My mind is reeling – have I ever been this near a wolf? Have I ever even seen one in the wild? I don't even know why I'm focusing on such things – it's not like it matters, these aren't actual wolves.

They're shifters, and the beasts are at least twice the size of true wolves.

My arms are wrapped around my middle, desperately trying to protect my unborn child from the beings in front of me. I'm suddenly painfully aware of how flimsy my human body is next to theirs, and while my baby might be stronger, it's far too little to survive if anything were to happen to me.

I can barely keep track of what's happening, my mind is fractured between primal fear, amazement as I try to process these incredible sights, and anxiety as I attempt to keep up with the unfolding events. The wolves are circling one another, growling and snarling, baring their fangs as their raised hackles and flattened ears reshape their fluffy coats. As ever, my mind finds humor at the most inappropriate of times, and I have to smother a smile as I imagine these shifters' responses to being described as fluffy.

Stop it, Ella! Shaking myself, I push my body up against the wall, trying to flatten myself to the bricks lest one of the enraged creatures comes too close. At first I think they'll continue stalking around each other, posturing forever, but then Roger lunges out of nowhere, and the fight begins.

My human eyes can't keep up with their supernatural speed. All I see is a tornado of limbs, punctuated by the snapping of fangs and yelps of pain. As they attack one another I try to open the door again, then visually carve out a path past them to the mouth of the alley. Unfortunately their battle is so chaotic that I don't think I'll be able to run past them without falling into the middle of the fray. I just have to pray the Roger is strong enough to defeat his assailants.

In the end it's over relatively quickly, amazingly fast actually – given that it was four against one. Roger might not be as strong as Sinclair, but he's clearly much more powerful than this lot. He seizes the leader by the throat, shaking him like a rag doll and sending the others running for safety. Can it really be that simple? I wonder, cut the head off the snake and the body dies? What cowards.

Roger throws the other wolf to the ground – scarlet blood dripping over the snow as he clambers to his feet and scampers off into the night, whimpering like a pup. I'm still standing there frozen when Roger shifts back, coming forward with outstretched hands, as if I'm a wild animal he's trying to calm. "Ella, are you still with me?" He broaches gently.

"I... what just happened?" I gasp. I can feel the tendrils of shock beginning to take hold, wrapping around me with numbing relief.

Yet for some reason my body is fighting the reaction, as if it doesn't think the threat has passed and needs to remain in fight or flight mode. "How did you know I was here? How did you know I was in danger? Who were those men?"

The questions are pouring out of me now, and I'm not sure I can make them stop. I need answers before I can relax, before I can start to process these events.

"I'll explain everything." Roger promises, "first just tell me if you're alright."

"I'm fine." I insist, still protectively clutching my belly.

"You're bleeding." He observes, reaching towards me.

I flinch away from his touch, and trembles rack my body. Between the flashback of my near-assault and this very real attempt, the idea of any man touching me makes me feel sick to my stomach. Even as I think this, I feel my gorge rising, and turn away to vomit. Tears burn in my eyes as my stomach heaves, and I can only be grateful my hair is up. "I need Cora." I tell Roger. "My sister, she's inside."

He looks uncertain. "I don't want to leave you like this Ella."

I shake my head stubbornly. "I need Cora." I need a woman, I'm coming to pieces, and no man will be able to comfort me right now. I wouldn't normally place such a burden on my sister, but I'm afraid this scene is going to be quickly overrun with aggressive shifters, and I don't think I can handle it.

He races out of the alley, no doubt circling the block to make it back to the club entrance. I move away from my quickly freezing sick, and lower myself to the ground in the snow, Wrapping my arms around my knees. A minute later the back door slams open, making me jump five feet in the air. Then Cora is there, dropping to her knees in front of me. "Oh my God, Ella!" She frets, her hands fluttering around me as if she's not sure what to do first, "What happened, are you okay?"

Tears well on my lashes as I look up at her. "I want to go home." I murmur, my lower lip quivering. "Can you call us a cab?"

"Sweetheart of course," she wraps one slender arm around me, then pulls out her phone.

However, before she can dial the number, the device begins to buzz in her hand, and Sinclair's name flashes across the screen.

We both freeze, and I shake my head. "Don't, don't pick up."

Roger nods in agreement, "You'll only get her in more trouble."

But Cora is frowning at my bruised face and split lip, "Honey he's going to find out anyway, and he'll be less angry if he hears sooner rather than later." Before I can stop her, she picks up the phone. I can hear Sinclair's deep tones through the receiver, and then Cora is nodding. "I'm with her. But listen, something has happened."

I clench my eyes shut as the call continues, listening as she calmly shares our location and he promises to come as fast as he can. When she hangs up she looks back down at me, "It'll be okay, Ella." She chafes my bare arms with her hands, "We should really get you up out of the snow."

I get to my feet in something of a trance, hating that I'm worrying her. I bite back my fraying emotions, swiping at my tears. "I'm okay." I say again, "it's just a little bruise."

"Come on, let's go inside." Cora suggests.

"No!" I argue, backing away from the concerned pair. "It's too many people."

"Okay." Cora agrees easily, clearly not sure how to help me.

Trying to keep up a brave front, I turn back to Roger, "Tell me what just happened."

“They were rogues.” He explains, “wolves without allegiance to any pack – if they’re not robbing and raping,” I flinch violently at the word, and he softens his tone, “in the neutral borderlands between territories, they’re working as mercenaries. My guess is that’s what these four were.”

“They knew who I was.” I gulp. “They knew I was here. No one but Cora knew that.”

Roger shakes his head, “They probably followed you from home.”

“But why?” Cora inquires, looking so upset now that I feel compelled to comfort her. It’s a much more comfortable dynamic for me, and I readily squeeze her hand.

“Why else?” Roger scoffs, “The campaign. Your pup – this isn’t even the first rogue attack in Moon Valley this week.”

“It isn’t?” I clarify.

“Dominic didn’t tell you?” He sounds as though he’s trying and failing to sound neutral.

I shake my head, zeroing in on the detail that has me hovering so close to my sister, refusing to lower my guard. “None of this answers how you knew I was here.”

“I didn’t.” Roger shares sadly. “When I left the house tonight I caught the scent of the rogues, and I followed it here – afraid there was going to be another attack. I had no idea you were their target.” He glances at the mouth of the alley, scenting the air. “Brace yourself now, Dominic is close.”

Chapter 38 – Aftermath

Sinclair

When I reach the address Cora supplied, it's all I can do to keep my temper in check. She hadn't explained what happened, only that she and Ella needed to be picked up from a nightclub. I was able to stay calm while I got the details from her, but I found my anger growing exponentially the closer I drew to my disobedient little human. After everything that happened when she snuck out to see my father, I can't believe she defied me again. However as soon as I round the corner of the alley behind the venue, my fury evaporates.

I'm not even sure of what I'm seeing at first. Roger is standing near the back door, naked, disheveled and bruised. The scent of strange wolves reeks to high heaven, and blood is splattered over the ground leading away from the club, along with numerous large pawprints. Cora is standing between me and Ella, her taller frame shielding my pup's mother from view. She looks unharmed but a bit shaken, dressed in a tight red frock.

Roger stiffens at the sight of me, and Cora turns to face me, finally revealing Ella. Her arms are wrapped around her body, and she's wearing a glittery black mini dress and heels. She's staring at the ground, her energy agitated and withdrawn at once.

There's a huge black and blue bruise on her high cheekbone, and a cut on her lip, dried blood congealed around the wound.

I rush forward, surprised when Cora intercepts me, a pleading expression on her face. "Please be gentle – she's in shock."

I immediately skirt around her, reaching for Ella. Roger and Cora both raise their hands to stop me, "No!" It's as if they think my touch might frighten Ella, but as soon as our bodies connect the tension seeps out of Ella like a dam bursting. She comes to me instinctively, letting me gather her to my chest and nestling close to my body. Her small hands cling to my shirt as her nose presses to my chest, breathing in my scent.

Roger and Cora look on with confusion, and I wonder if Ella had been afraid of their touch. The obvious implications of why she would feel that way pour over me, and I hold her tighter. "What happened?" I ask, glaring at Roger. If it weren't for Ella's obvious need of comfort, I might have already attacked him. Seeing any man this close to her when she's injured was a violent trigger.

"Rogues." Roger answers simply. "I caught their scent near my house and followed them. When I arrived they had Ella cornered."

They were talking about..." He trails off, glancing nervously at the woman in my arms.

“They were sent to kill her, but they obviously wanted to have a bit of fun with her first.”

I can't hold back the growl which tears through my chest, and I'm not sure what enrages me more – the fact that anyone wanted to hurt Ella, the way she trembles at Roger's description, or the fact that he brought up their intentions in front of her. Ella burrows closer to me, and I wrap my coat around her shivering body, buttoning it around the small of her back so we're both snug inside. “I fought them off and they ran for it.” Roger continues. “But she was already hurt before I arrived... it didn't look like they did anything, but I don't know.”

Leaning my lips to Ella's ear, I can't help the ragged huskiness of my voice. My wolf is going berserk in my head, and I want nothing more than to hunt down the men responsible and rip them to shreds. “Did they touch you?” I demand, stroking her hair.

She shakes her head against my chest, and I catch the sound of a hiccup – as if she's holding back sobs. She still won't look at me, and I realize she's probably afraid she's in trouble even though she needs my comfort.

“I think one of them hit her.” Cora supplies, no doubt referring to her sister's battered face. “But she wouldn't really talk about it.”

She just kept saying she's fine and she wanted to go home.” I can picture it as if I was there, and I feel a rush of warmth knowing Ella sought me for safety when she shied away from the others.

Cora frowns, continuing. “I don't even know how they found her. We were inside dancing and then... I don't know, I think she got overheated or something and came outside. But... it's like they were waiting for her.”

I nod, “However it happened, it sounds like we both owe Roger our thanks.” I hate saying these words, and I find all of these circumstances incredibly suspicious. Cora has hit the nail on the head, and the red flags are only compounded by the fact that my brother managed to find Ella just in time to leap to her rescue. Still, I don't want to let him on to my suspicions. If it happens the way he says, then I do owe him my thanks, and if it didn't, I need to play my cards close to my chest in order to uncover the truth. “Brother, can you escort Cora home?”

Cora looks very reluctant to leave Ella, but eventually she departs with Roger, giving me another imploring look as they walk away. If I had to guess I'd presume she's asking me not to be too harsh with her sister, but she needn't be worried. I have no intention of scolding or punishing Ella – not tonight at least.

“Come on little one.” I encourage, unbuttoning my coat and scooping her up. She slides her arms around my neck and leans her uninjured cheek against my shoulder, still as quiet as a mouse. The car ride home passes much the same way, and when we reach the mansion I take her straight upstairs to my bathroom.

Setting her on the counter, I rummage through the cabinets for a first aid kit. Ella leans back against the mirror, her face devoid of all emotion. "Come here, let me look at you." I instruct when I've retrieved the proper supplies.

Catching Ella's face between my hands, I tilt her head from right to left, studying her injuries and trying to stay calm. The bruise on her cheek is swelling quickly, it's bright red center showing just how close the blow came to breaking her skin. The cut on her lip seems minor, but the amount of dried blood makes me worry it's deeper than it looks.

I wet a washcloth and begin cleaning the cut, causing Ella hiss and wince, "I'm sorry, sweetheart." I croon. "It has to be done."

Ella snuffles and clamps her eyes shut as I continue working, determined to suffer through it without complaint. Of course, when I switch out the water for alcohol, she practically leaps off the counter, whimpering so pitifully my heart aches. "Shh baby, I know.

I'm almost done." I promise, holding her tightly in place.

"Do you want to tell me what happened?" I ask a little later, pressing a cloth wrapped ice pack to her cheek. She flinches, but replaces my hand with her own, keeping up the cool pressure.

"They already told you." She murmurs, silently submitting as I strip off her dress to check for other injuries.

I'm relieved not to find any other wounds, and when I press my hand to her belly the pup seems perfectly well. It's heartbeat is steady and strong, and though I sense earlier flashes of unease – no doubt caused by Jane's fear – it now seems relieved to be safely home with us both. "I want to hear it from you." I press gently. "Roger and Cora don't know what happened when you were alone with them."

Ella blinks up at me, and I'm surprised by the lack of emotion on her lovely face. "It was nothing. I went outside for some air.

Then I heard movement in the alley and they appeared. I tried to go back in but the door was locked -"

"It was locked?" I question, more sharply than I intended.

"Yes, but it was probably just an automatic door." She reasons. "Anyway I offered them money, I told them I was your mate and you'd kill them if you harmed me, then one hit me... and I made the mistake of provoking him..." She trails off. "Roger turned up soon after that."

"Provoked him how?" I ask, pleased that she's talking but not liking the hollow look in her eyes, or emptiness in her words.

Ella stares at her lap, "it's not important, he probably planned on... raping me even before that."

Sighing, I pull her into my arms, "I'm sure he did." I confirm, knowing how strange a comfort this must seem. Still, Ella clearly knows exactly what they intended, and I'd rather her understand that she didn't cause them to think that way, than deny that the danger was always present.

"You really don't have to fuss over me this way." Ella says after a moment of cuddling. "I'm fine."

"You don't have to be fine, Ella." I inform her sternly.

She squirms in my hold, and I reluctantly release her. I'm not sure what I expected her to say, but her next question takes me by surprise. "Why didn't you tell me about the other rogue attacks?"

Chapter 39 – The Truth Comes Out

Ella

I can't explain it, but for some reason Sinclair's tender care upsets me more than if he was angry. It's taken me a while to come back to myself –as the fog of my shock wore off and the utter safety and security of being with Sinclair thawed my frozen senses, I found my emotions slowly returning. Just not the ones I expected.

Do I want him to be angry? I wonder. Why? Because it somehow hurts me that he doesn't seem to care that I defied him?

Because I feel badly for breaking his rules and want to see that they weren't all for show? Because I'm so angry with myself for what happened tonight, and I feel like I deserve to be punished?

I don't have the answers to these questions, though on some level I suspect all my theories have a kernel of truth. Either way, I find myself picking an argument, rather than letting him comfort me.

Sinclair sighs, though he still doesn't release me entirely. "I didn't want to worry you." He explains, his handsome features a hard mask. "There's only been one so far, and you know I've been worried about your stress levels."

"Is that why you were called away the other day?" I inquire, his sudden disappearance from the kitchen making more sense now.

"Yes." He confirms, "It was horrible honestly. Almost a dozen dead in broad daylight and twice as many injured. They didn't smell like the same wolves who were in the alley with you tonight, but I'm sure they were hired by the same person."

"The prince?" I guess, shifting my hold on the ice pack as my fingers gradually go numb.

"That's right." Sinclair nods. "I've been searching for them ever since, but I think he's probably protecting them."

"Will you search for the ones who came after me tonight?" I murmur, not understanding the sudden bloodlust I feel. It must be my maternal instincts responding to the threat against my pup – I've never wished anyone dead before, no matter what they've done to me, but I want nothing more than for Sinclair to destroy those cruel wolves.

Sinclair nods. "I will hunt them down and tear them to absolute pieces." He snarls, letting out more of his wolf than I think he intended.

I'm amazed to realize I'm smiling about such a macabre idea. Frankly I'm amazed I can smile about anything so soon after the attack, even if it is a somber grin. Either way the stretch of my lips pulls on my cut, and soon my smile is a grimace of pain. “Ow, ow, ow.”

Sinclair tsks, “poor, vicious, darling.” He croons, resting his forehead against mine and petting my sides.

“Is it terrible that I wish them harm?” I whisper, gazing into his green eyes, mere inches from mine.

“Of course not.” Sinclair promises, smiling himself now, “you really are becoming more like a wolf every day.”

A painful pang blooms in my chest. He seems so pleased every time I do something he considers wolfish. It might just be that he’s happy the pup is growing, but it really feels like he doesn’t approve of my humanity – as if he wants me to be a wolf and will take any scraps of behavior he can get. I’m getting lost in my thoughts now, but Sinclair soon pulls my focus back to him.

Framing my face in his hands but careful to avoid touching my bruise, he prompts, “Would you like to tell me why you snuck out tonight – after everything we went through the other day?”

I peek up at him from beneath my lashes, “Am I in a lot of trouble?”

“Just answer the question, Ella.” He admonishes. Part of me wishes he’d tell me I am in trouble – if I am it means he hasn’t given up on me. But it worries me when he goes stoic and unreadable. His anger I can handle, his grim contemplation makes me fear he might decide I’m not worth the hassle and void our deal – taking the baby from me.

“I just needed a night away from all this.” I share, gesturing to our surroundings. “I needed to feel human again, just for a little while. And I thought it would be fine since we were sticking to human territories and businesses. I didn’t know about the other attack.”

“Ella, the other attack isn’t what matters.” Sinclair rumbles sternly, pulling my distracted thoughts back to the present. “I told you it was dangerous for you to be out without guards, you promised me you wouldn’t do this again and you broke your word at the very first opportunity.” I can see his temper flaring now, flashing in his eyes as we finally address the events which led up to the attack. “What were you thinking? After everything I’ve told you about the Prince, after everything you’ve learned is at stake in this campaign.”

“But it’s your campaign, not mine.” I argue. “And I’ve turned my entire life upside down, given up my entire identity to support it.”

At the very least I think I deserve a night to myself.”

“I will gladly give you a night to yourself.” Sinclair agreed, “but if you’re going to be out in the city, you need protection!”

“I don’t want to have to ask permission just to set one foot out the front door!” I burst out. “I shouldn’t have to have babysitters just to go to the park or the grocery store. I don’t know how anyone can live with those kinds of restraints, Dominic.”

“I understand better than you think, Ella.” Dominic confesses, “I don’t like having to drag around half a dozen people with me either, but it’s a necessary evil. Just think about the baby, if not for yourself, please take these precautions for the pup.”

I push down off the counter, shaking my head as I stride past him. “I don’t think you realize just how much you’re asking of me – or how difficult this is. A month ago I led a completely different existence and now everything has changed and everything I thought I knew – was wrong. The only thing I have left is my independence, and now you’re demanding that too!”

“I don’t want to take your independence, or your freedom, Ella.” Sinclair insists, “And I know this isn’t how you wanted to have your baby – but it isn’t exactly what I wanted either. I always imagined I would share the experience with my mate and that we’d be a family forever. I never imagined contracts and custody and fake relationships.” Ouch. It’s completely true, and yet the statement cuts me to the core. “So we can make the best of our situation, or we can let it divide us. Now, I for one, think we should be a team. I want our baby to have two loving, united parents, don’t you?”

“Of course I do.” I murmur, tears springing to my eyes. I need to get out of here before I start to cry. “And I think we’ll get there.

But right now I just need some time to myself. I’m going to sleep in my rooms tonight.”

I turn to leave, but Sinclair’s deep voice stops me. “I don’t think that’s a good idea.”

I pause, turning back in bafflement, “Why not?”

“You’ve had a traumatic experience, you might have nightmares.” He reasons.

I roll my eyes, turning back to the door. “I’ve had traumatic experiences before and I’ve always gotten myself through them just fine – nightmares or not.”

“I understand that, but you don’t have to get through it alone anymore.” Sinclair counters, his footsteps sounding behind me.

“And I understand that you might not want to let the pup out of your sight after the attack, but if you want me to avoid stress, then I need some space to process this.” I reply, trying to empathize with his perspective.

I can practically hear him grappling for another excuse, before he finally gives up the pretense and commands. “Ella, I’m sorry, but I can’t allow that.”

“Excuse me?” I scoff, turning to face him.

He’s standing a few feet away, clenching and unclenching his fists as the muscle in his jaw twitches with agitation. Something about his behavior makes me think this has nothing to do with my potential nightmares, or his own possessive instincts. I have the distinct intuition that he’s keeping something from me – like the first rogue attack.

Narrowing my eyes, I sidle forehead, feeling an inexplicable wave of intuition that not all is as it seems. “What aren’t you telling me?”

“What do you mean?” Sinclair questions impassively.

“I mean that you were already in a security frenzy before there was ever a rogue attack, and unless you’re a complete tyrant and just determined to control me, all these precautions must mean you have another reason to be afraid. I don’t think you’re a tyrant – despite your spot on impression at times – so what aren’t you telling me?” Now that I see it, it seems so obvious. I don’t know how I missed it before.

“Fine,” He sighs, looking as though he’s about to deliver my death sentence. “I’m sorry, Ella, but there really was someone in your rooms the other night.”

Chapter 40 – Intruder

Ella

“What?” I squeak, my voice catching in my throat. The moment the words left Sinclair’s mouth I felt my blood run cold, and now I feel as though I might topple over with the shock of it. I must have misheard him, surely he doesn’ mean what I think he does.

“That night you heard someone growling in your bathroom?” Sinclair explains, stepping forward as though he wants to reach for me, but stopping himself short when I flinch away. “I told you I didn’t smell anything... but I lied. There was someone in your rooms, I just didn’t want to scare you.”

“And you let me go back there, knowing there’d been an intruder?” I demand, indignation swirling to life amidst my fear, surprise and sorrow.

“Sweetheart, I had the guards do a thorough search of the grounds then and there. They were long gone, and I’ve had you sleeping in my rooms ever since. I also increased the guards during the day when I knew you’d be back there.” He shares. “Trust me, I’ve done everything possible to ensure your safety.”

“Except tell me that I was in danger!” I cry. “It’s no wonder you flipped out the way you did when I went to see your father! And you blamed me like I was supposed to know about the threat!”

“Ella –” He begins in a placating tone.

“No!” I cut him off, stomping my foot out of pure wrath. “How am I supposed to know it’s dangerous if you don’t tell me, Dominic?”

I exclaim. “You didn’t even tell me about the rogue attack and that had nothing to do with me! All this time I thought you were being overbearing and overprotective, but I just didn’t have a clue what was happening in my own life!” Too late I realize my earlier desire to leave before I start crying is now a lost cause. Tears are sliding down my cheeks as I continue. “How could you do that! You know what I went through with Mike. I spent years thinking I knew my situation when it was all lies – and you turned around and did the exact same thing!”

Dominic’s usually golden skin goes very pale, “Goddess Ella, I never even thought about it that way.” He admits. “I was just trying to protect you and the pup. I didn’t want you to be afraid.”

“Well all you actually did was make a fool of me.” I inform him stiffly. “And for the record, you also made me more vulnerable to danger. Do you think I would have ever considered sneaking away without guards if I knew someone might actually be after me?! Do you believe I would ever risk my baby that way?"

"Ella, I'm sorry." Sinclair professes, and I'm amazed to see how earnest he looks. Gone is the bossy Alpha who orders everyone about and lays down the law when they defy him, replaced by a man who has been truly humbled. "I'm truly, truly sorry. I was inconsiderate and patronizing – I assumed I knew what was best and never consulted you... I've been a hypocrite, I've been going on about being a team but I've been acting like a tyrant." He continues. "You were right, and that's not the kind of parent I want to be."

Despite my simmering anger, I'm completely agog. I never expected a man as powerful as Sinclair to admit a mistake – or any fault for that matter. I thoroughly believed that people of his ilk never took responsibility for their actions, because they have the privilege of passing it off onto someone else. Even men without means, like Mike, often can't admit when they're wrong. In fact, as a woman, the number of times I've heard any man tell me that I'm right in a disagreement is... well, I think this is the first time.

"Can you ever forgive me?" Sinclair is still going, coming forward to brush the hair back from my face, and looking deep into my eyes.

I cross my arms over my chest, tilting my chin up and giving him a haughty sniff to hide my amazement. "As long as you promise never to do it again."

"I promise that I'll try to do better." Sinclair vows, taking hold of my arms. "I'm still an Alpha, and hopefully a King. It's in my nature to protect at all costs, and those instincts are strongest when it comes to she-wolves and pups. When I think about you in danger my wolf fairly loses his mind, and I really am concerned about this pregnancy. You're high risk as a human, and the longer your blood pressure stays elevated, the more likely you are to become high risk in shifter terms too."

His words send a frisson of fear through my nerves. I've been trying to tell myself all this worry is his overprotectiveness gone mad, but when he puts it in these terms I realize my baby and I might have a harder road ahead of us than I realized. I hadn't considered myself high risk simply because I'm a human carrying a shifter pup, but it makes sense. Again I recall the doctor's warnings about the size of the fetus, the spotting incident and now my persistent stress. I really don't mind if I suffer, but the idea of my baby being at risk is enough to bowl me over.

"So I can't say for certain that I'll never slip up again," Sinclair forges ahead, massaging my arms with the pads of his thumbs,

"but I promise to always consider your perspective, and consult you whenever I can."

"Thank you." I murmur, leaning into his warmth.

He nods and kisses the top of my head, wrapping his strong arms around me. “Do you still want to sleep in your rooms?”

“Would you let me?” I inquire, already testing his resolve.

Sinclair offers me a wolfish grin. “As long as you let me post enough guards at the door.”

I chuckle, and shake my head. “I want to stay with you.”

His muscles untense slightly, and he purrs in contentment. “Good. It’s been a very long night.”

“You can say that again.” I agree, wriggling out of his hold so I can retrieve a night dress from my designated drawer in his dresser.

A little while later we’re curled beneath the plush covers of his king sized bed. Sinclair always sleeps shirtless— not that I’m complaining – so he’s stretched out on his back as I rest my uninjured cheek on his bare pec, immediately soothed by his intoxicating scent. I once asked him why I find smelling him so soothing, and he explained that it’s just the pup. Still I can’t help thinking that I would have loved his scent even if I weren’t ‘breeding’ as he calls it.

“Are you sure you’re alright?” Sinclair asks, tracing his fingers in soothing patterns down my back. “After the attack, I mean.”

I nod, brushing my cheek over the fine hairs of his chest and landing myself with a tickle in my nose. “It was nothing.”

A loud rumble vibrates against my cheek. “Not to me.” Sinclair growls.

My hand has been resting on the hard contours of his abs, and I find myself caressing his soft skin, hoping to soothe him the way he so often soothes me. “Honestly the most shocking part of the whole ordeal was seeing them shift... I’ve never seen anything like it. I still can’t believe it.” In fact that might go a long way to explaining why the entire ordeal still doesn’t quite feel real to me.

“Were you very afraid?” Sinclair presses, taking advantage of my sudden willingness to talk.

“I was more afraid for the baby than anything else.” I confess. “That’s what hurt more than anything, when I thought that my brashness might have cost it, instead of just me.”

A low purr rolls to life in Sinclair’s chest. “Nothing they did or would have done was caused by you, Ella.”

I huff out a laugh. “It seems like there are an awful lot of people telling me things aren’t my fault lately.” I muse aloud. “But at a certain point one has to think the common denominator is common for a reason.”

“Who else?” Sinclair probes. “About what?”

That’s not a conversation I plan on having with Sinclair anytime soon. We might be on better terms, and he might make me feel safe, but I vowed not to make the mistake of trusting another man, and I meant it. Sinclair has already proven himself unreliable on that front. “What does your wolf look like?” I ask, instead of answering his question.

He chuckles, clearly not missing my less-than-smooth transition. “It’s black.” He says simply, “Pitch as the night, with my same colored eyes.”

“Can I see it sometime?” I ask, not quite understanding why I’m so interested in meeting the beast.

“If you like.” He agrees. “But not tonight. Tonight we sleep – and tomorrow we start with a clean slate. Deal?”

For a moment I wonder if such a thing is really possible – part of me thinks it’s too late to stop what’s already begun. Still I have to try, for the sake of my pup if not myself. “Deal.”

Chapter 41 – Parenting Class

Ella

“Parenting classes? Already?” I ask in surprise. “I’m only a few weeks along.”

“Yes, but we only have five months to prepare, and you don’t know anything about shifter children.” Sinclair replies easily.

I’m sitting up in bed with a breakfast tray in my lap, while Sinclair sits in a bedside armchair watching me like a hawk. It’s the morning after the attack and I haven’t been allowed to move a muscle, not even to vomit on my own. I attempted to free my body from Sinclair’s strong arms when we woke so that I could make a mad dash to the bathroom, but he ended up carrying me instead – holding my hair up and rubbing my back until I was finished. In fact he’s been so attentive that he took the day off of work to stay with me, and now he’s talking about going to our first birthing and parenting courses.

“Are shifter children all that different from human ones?” I ask, feeling a wave of anxiety.

“Well they gestate so much faster that I’d expect unique developmental milestones both during pregnancy and infancy, and then there are certainly differences in ability and personality. All their senses are heightened from day one, and they’ll need to learn about our ways and society – which means you do too.” Sinclair reasons.

I frown. Suddenly I feel as though I’m way out of my depth. My child is going to be a little superhuman miracle running circles around me, will I even be able to keep up? Before I realize what he intends, Sinclair has reached out and smoothed my wrinkled brow with the pad of his thumb, a kind smile on his face. “Don’t worry, sweet Ella. This is why I want us to go to class, and we’re a team remember? I’ll always be there to teach our pup the shifter side of things, all you have to worry about is loving him.”

I can’t help but smile at Sinclair’s tender assurances, and it takes me a moment for his last word to click in my brain. “You said “him”, you did the same thing the night I was spotting – I forgot until just now.” I share, eyeing him curiously. “Is that just hopeful thinking because you need an heir... or do you know something I don’t?”

Sinclair smirks, grazing his knuckles over my cheeks. “I expect there are a few things I know that you don’t.” He teases. “But yes, it’s a boy. I knew the moment I felt the mental link.”

“Really?” I gape, my hands naturally gravitating to my flat tummy. Sometimes it still feels terribly surreal that there’s actually a life growing within me, and now – to think I have a son, it's almost too much to take in. I feel tears in my eyes, and Sinclair grins, brushing them away with the pad of his thumb.

"Really." He confirms. "We're going to have a little boy."

Before I can stop myself, I push the breakfast tray aside and launch myself at Sinclair, wrapping my arms around his shoulders and hugging him tightly. He catches me with a chuckle, squeezing me tightly and burying his face in my neck. He inhales deeply, his warm lips flush to my skin. "Are you smelling me?" I ask, amusement clear in my voice.

"So?" He laughs, "you smell me all the time."

"Yeah but that's the baby." I remind him, repeating the same explanation he's given me a hundred times.

"Well I like the way you smell." Sinclair shrugs, nuzzling my hair. I wait for him to tell me this is also because of the pup, but he doesn't. Instead he emits a soft purr. "The baby likes it when we're close this way." He tells me, and I realize our bodies are so tightly pressed together that he's undoubtedly able to connect to the child's consciousness. "He can feel us both, and our happiness."

"I wish I had a link to him like you do." I admit, pulling away at long last.

"Don't worry." Sinclair murmurs, "I'll always be here to tell you what he's thinking and feeling." His hands slide from my body, and suddenly I feel a rush of cold air. I almost want to wrap myself back around him, just to get that luscious warmth back, but Sinclair is already standing. "Now hop to it, cuddlebug. Class is in an hour."

"Hey you're good at that!" I exclaim, looking over at Sinclair's station. Our first assignment in parenting class is properly diapering an infant (using a doll to stand in of course). There are eight other couples joining us, all at varying stages of their own pregnancies. Having diapered many children through my nannying days, I was confident that I could ace this part of the course, but I wasn't prepared for Sinclair to complete the task faster and equally as competently as I had.

He shrugs, the very picture of humility. "In my line of work you have to kiss a lot of babies."

I roll my eyes – I highly doubt many politicians go as far as diapering the babies they kiss. In fact I expect most of them probably pawn off the less pleasant duties of parenthood onto their wives – if they ever lift a finger at all. "Maybe, but it's more than that – isn't it? I remember how great you were with Millie and Jake."

For whatever reason, Sinclair doesn't seem to want to take credit for this. Instead a mischievous glint appears in his eye. "Hey, how about we race?"

"That hardly seems fair, you have supernatural speed." I whisper, careful not to be overheard. Everyone here thinks I'm a wolf, and I'm doing my best not to give away my secret.

"Scared?" He challenges, wagging his eyebrows.

Perhaps another woman might laugh off this silly taunt, but I've never been one to back down from a dare. "Fine." I answer, narrowing my eyes. "You're on."

Sinclair flashes me a wolfish grin. "Ready, set, go!"

At once I get to work, simulating a diaper change complete with wiping and powdering, before sliding the baby doll over a clear diaper and doing up the tabs. Naturally Sinclair finishes about ten seconds ahead of me, "ha! I win!"

Before I can reply, the instructor comes over to us with her arms crossed over her chest, "Parenting is not a game, you two.

Honestly Alpha, I should think you'd take this more seriously."

We both straighten up, feeling chastised. I'm about to apologize when Sinclair points at me and says, "She started it!"

I gape at him, and before I realize what's happening a tiny growl vibrates in my chest. I have no idea where the impulse came from – it's just like that night at the campaign dinner. Before meeting Sinclair I'd never growled a day in my life. It occurs to me that this is probably foolish – wolves don't growl at their Alpha's unless they want a beating. Still, Sinclair can only smile. He drags me close and ducks his head to my ear. "You're lucky that was cutest little growl I've ever heard in my life." He teases.

"Why, what would you have done if it wasn't?" I challenge.

"Keep it up and you'll find out." He promises ominously.

I shrug, "You deserved it, you threw me under the bus and you know it." I try to keep my tone stern, but inside my insides are veritable mush. I love seeing Sinclair's playful side, and it seems the more time we spend together the more it comes out. It's nice to know he's not strong, tough and terrifying 100% of the time – a strong protector is a wonderful thing, but I want my baby to have a father who will play and have fun with it too.

The instructor, having given up on us, moves on to the next couple. Still our amusement only lasts a while. After diapers and CPR we move on to the birthing portion of the course, which is the last thing I want to think about. Like most expectant mothers, I'm excited for the miracle and eager to meet my baby, but I am absolutely dreading the pain of labor. I know it will be worth it in the end, but I'd rather not think about it overly much.

The instructor seems to have no such sympathy, clearly believing that the best preparation is to know every gorey detail ahead of time. Sinclair and I are seated on a yoga mat and my body is settled between his legs, my back resting on his chest. At first I was supporting my own weight, but with a little bit of encouragement I gradually leaned back against Sinclair, letting him support me completely.

The instructor is in front of the room, standing in front of a chart displaying a baby curled in the womb. "The average werewolf baby is 9-12 pounds and 21-22 inches in length--"

I stop listening at this point, trying to wrap my brain around this information. "Did she say 9-12 pounds?" I squeak.

Sinclair strokes my belly, "Shifters are bigger than humans, remember?"

I'm shaking my head, "No – no, I can't do this!" I whisper frantically. "I can't have a 12 pound baby! Delivering a small baby is terrifying enough now you're telling me it's going to be the size of a butterball turkey! Nope, uh-uh, not happening!" I'm well on my way to genuine panic, and my voice is getting louder by the minute. Other couples are turning to look at us, and if I don't get it together quickly, I might not only have a very public breakdown, but expose myself as a human too.

Chapter 42 – Late Night Snack

Sinclair

I can hear Ella's heart racing at a mile a minute, and the baby is starting to become stressed in accordance to his mother. I'm worried too, Ella is small even for a human, and I'm big even for a werewolf, but I don't believe the Goddess would have chosen her to carry my heir if she couldn't handle the toll. I need to calm her down quickly.

I begin to purr, petting her sides in long, soothing strokes. "Easy, little one. It will be alright."

I can feel her nerves begin to settle, but it seems Ella's mind is still in full revolt. "Stop that!" She whimpers, "I don't want you to just soothe this away, I'm right to be afraid!"

"Of course you are." I croon, not letting up on the purrs. "Childbirth is always scary, and it always seems impossible – that's why it's a miracle. You're going to have the best doctors in the country, Ella. I promise you'll get through it in flying colors."

"That's easy for you to say." She grumbles. "You don't have to push a watermelon out of your privates in five months! Oh god, what have you put inside me?"

"Well technically, I didn't put it there." I remind her, trying to lighten the mood.

"Sinclair, I'm serious!" She snaps, "I don't think I can do this!"

"Ella look at me," I instruct gently. She shakes her head, refusing point blank, so I stop caressing her long enough to catch her chin and turn her beautiful face up to mine. "I'm going to take care of you." I promise. "If that means we have to induce the baby to come a couple of weeks early or do a cesarean, we will. We're not going to put your body through anything it can't handle."

Ella is gradually submitting to my purrs, though I can tell she still wants to fight. I can see that keeping my little human calm and relaxed through this pregnancy is going to be even more difficult than I anticipated, but I'm not the least bit disappointed if that means we have to spend more time snuggling and talking this way. I like taking care of Ella – It's in my nature as an Alpha to care for others, and I need to give this comfort every bit as much as Ella needs to receive it – whether she realizes it or not.

Ella sniffs sullenly, nestling into my warmth. "It really isn't fair that you can influence my emotions this way."

"I know." I commiserate, glad she can't see my smile. The stubborn little thing clearly isn't used to having help solving her problems, and I'm sure she doesn't feel comfortable giving anyone else that power. I don't tell her how much influence she has over my own feelings, however. The more time that passes, the more I realize how much my own mood depends on whether Ella is content – something I haven't experienced with anyone but my mate.

With Lydia it was very different, my wolf was never settled unless hers was – and she fully expected me to manage her emotions for her, making every complaint in her life loudly and dramatically known. Ella is a very different creature, hiding her upsets most of the time and never expecting or even want me to fix them for her, but my wolf seems even more unhappy when she's unsettled, than he was with Lydia.

My mind swirls with the implications of this, and I reason that it must be the baby once more. I'm so attuned and concerned about Ella because she's carrying my heir, it makes perfect sense that my wolf is in this heightened state given our situation. I'm sure this connection is also why Ella seems only to be soothed by my purrs, and no one else's. The instructor has gone silent – clearly an old hat at talking couples through the trials of childbirth and expecting panic attacks like Ella's.

My sweet human is not the only first time mother in the room insisting the task ahead of them is impossible, and I'm not the only mate purring. Still, when I stop for a moment to test whether the other men's purrs soothe Ella, her heart rate begins to increase again, and I know she only responds to mine.

It's the pup." I tell my wolf, who's strutting around with masculine pride in my head. "It has to be the pup."

That night I wake alone in bed.

At first I'm not sure what woke me, it's not until I realize my arms are empty and I reach for Ella that I understand she's missing. I sit up, instantly alert. She's not in the room, and the bathroom is dark and empty. I surge out of bed, scenting the air. I don't smell an intruder or sense anything off – not that I would. If anyone got close enough to snatch her from my arms they certainly wouldn't have left me alive.

I follow Ella's intoxicating fragrance out the door and down the stairs, my wolf gradually calming as we near the kitchen and I piece together the puzzle in my mind. She must have woken with a craving and decided to sneak a late night snack.

I pause to listen at the door just in case, the familiar aroma of bacon filling my senses. A moment later I push inside, finding Ella stationed over the stovetop in the dim light. I flip the light on and she leaps half a foot in the air, yelping in surprise.

"It's alright sweetheart, it's only me." I promise, coming forward to wrap my arm around her.

She backs away from me instinctively, clearly not realizing I only want to feel her body against mine, but I catch her hand before she can escape my reach and gather her close. "Did you get hungry?"

Ella nods, flushing, "I didn't want to wake you."

I offer her a stern expression. "I want you to wake me when you get up in the middle of this night." I tell her, "whether it's to satisfy a craving, or to feed the baby when it comes."

Ella blinks, and I wonder if she expected us to sleep apart after she delivers. "But you can't help me nurse. Why would you get up too?"

I roll my eyes, "because we're in this together. If you have to wake up ten times a night, then I should have to, too."

"You say that now," Ella snorts, "We'll see if you're still singing that tune in a few months."

"I'm serious Ella, I don't want to miss a moment of this experience. I've waited for it for a very long time. Besides I might not be able to give the baby milk, but I can support you while you do." I reason, not giving her an inch literally or metaphorically.

Ella narrows her eyes. "Are all shifter men like you? Or all Alpha's? I guarantee you human men aren't."

I furrow my brow, thinking for a moment. "I don't know – honestly. And I really don't care what anyone else does. This is how we're going to do it."

"And what if I don't want you to get up with me?" Ella poses, a devious glint in her eye. "What if I want to let you sleep, or to steal alone time with the baby."

I chuckle, pleased to see she's comfortable enough with me to indulge her mischief. "Just try it and see what happens." I tease back. "Now," I continue, looking over her head to the frying bacon. "What's on the menu tonight?"

"Bacon." She answers, not meeting my gaze.

"And?" I press, knowing her cravings are never so one note.

"Covered in chocolate." She murmurs, flushing. I wait, sensing there's more to the story.

Ella does not disappoint. “Dipped in guacamole and hot sauce.”

I can’t withhold my chuckle, and Ella looks up at me with wide eyes. “You think I’m gross don’t you.”

Oh if only she knew how far the opposite my feelings were. “Of course not – I think you’re pregnant.” I answer, nudging her towards one of the high bar stools. “Now you sit here and relax, beautiful. I’ll take care of the food.” I’m pleased to see Ella no longer flinches when I mention her beauty. She obviously still doesn’t like it when others do, but now instead of seeming uncomfortable or annoyed, she blushes when I compliment her.

I finish preparing her snack with ease. The bacon was almost finished cooking already, and the chocolate is already melted. I pat the bacon dry and let it cool a bit, before cutting the strips in half and dipping them in the rich ganache. I lay them out on a plate and pull out a carton of guacamole from the fridge, placing a heaping spoonful at the center of the plate and drizzling it in hot sauce. I place the plate in front of Ella, who gazes at it in amazement.” I was just going to eat it out of the tub like a heathen.”

I throw my head back and laugh, “I would probably have done the same.” I watch her take the first bite, moaning with pleasure as her lashes fall shut in epicurean delight. However odd it may seem to me, it’s what the baby wants, and Ella loves it.

I get a head start on the dishes while Ella indulges, only pausing to try a bite myself. It’s not as gross as I thought it might be – but it definitely doesn’t delight me the way it does my little human. When I place the last dish in the drying rack I turn back to Ella, only to find her sniffing pitifully.

“Ella, what’s wrong?” I exclaim, shocked by her heightened emotion.

She shakes her head, “It’s nothing, I’m being silly.”

“Tell me right now, Ella.” I order.

Chapter 43 – Roger Comes for a Visit

Sinclair

Her lower lip quivers dangerously, tears sliding down her cheeks. Eventually the truth spills from her lips. “I ate all my bacon!” My heart eases immediately. My wolf hates the sounds of Ella’s tears, but I’m relieved to know this is just a mood swing.

Chuckling, I pull her into my arms. “It’s okay baby, we can get more bacon.”

The next morning I wake up bright and early, though not intentionally. Instead I was jarred from sleep when Ella wriggled out of my arms to race for the bathroom. This is quickly becoming our morning ritual, and I’m far less concerned with my little human’s unhealthy snacking than I was a week ago, as I’m simply pleased she’s able to keep some food down.

When Ella is finally done being sick, I coax her back to bed and wrap her up in my arms. My wolf is urging me to scent mark her again, but I want to give her a few minutes to regain her strength before I begin rubbing my body all over hers. Of our daily rituals, marking Ella has quickly become my favorite. It’s a unique sort of ecstasy and torment: satisfying my wolf and claiming the mother of my pup, then denying both of our lusts when they inevitably spark.

I know exactly how powerfully the intimate contact affects the little human, and the scent of her arousal is becoming increasingly difficult to ignore. It’s not as if I’m not equally turned on, but I also don’t have wild pregnancy hormones rushes through my body

– I wonder how much longer Ella will be able to hold out before she asks for more. More importantly, I wonder if I will have the strength to deny her when that time comes.

“You know the only good thing about this crazy six month pregnancy?” Ella asks.

“You get to be done with morning sickness faster?” I guess.

“Mhmm.” She hums, pressing her nose to my chest and breathing deeply.

I reach down to the hem of her night dress and deftly slip my hand inside, resting it on the soft, warm skin of her belly. I feel a steady heartbeat and waves of contentment through the mental link, “Well I know you’re miserable, but if it helps the baby is happy as can be.”

“Of course he is.” She murmurs sleepily. “He’s always happy when you’re around.”

“And what about you?” I ask, “Are you happy when I’m around?” I’m not sure why I press her this way. I know that at least some of the baby’s emotions are feeding directly off of Ella’s, which means she’s probably content at a minimum around me. Still, I want to know.

“That depends.” The cheeky creature replies, “on whether or not you’re being all high handed and bossing me around.”

I shake my head, shifting my hands to tickle her sides. Ella giggle and squeals, trying to wriggle away from me, but I hold her tight. Soon we’re writhing around on the bed, Ella begging me for mercy as I continue tickling her, and me showing no mercy whatsoever. Before long the came turns to the intimate dance of scent marking, and as our bodies rub sensuously together I realize an unavoidable truth.

If Ella loses control and asks me to go further, there’s no way in hell I’ll be able to deny her now.

A little while later I head downstairs to go to work, but I stop dead in my tracks when I see my brother waiting in the foyer. “What are you doing here?” I question coldly.

Roger arches a brow. “It’s amazing how alike you and your little mate already sound. That’s precisely the way she greeted me the other day.”

A rush of pride flows through me. “That’s because she’s a very clever she-wolf.”

“Or because you’ve turned her against me.” Roger suggests.

“I don’t need to manipulate Ella for her to see through you, Roger.” I remark, descending the last few steps in front of me. “And you didn’t answer my question.”

“I wanted to check on Ella.” He answers easily. “I was worried after the other night.”

“She’s fine.” I reply simply, not feeling he deserves any more information than this. I know he saved Ella, but I still find the circumstances which allowed him to do so incredibly suspicious. I’ve already had a team of investigators out looking for the rogues since the night of the attack, and I was planning on assigning another team to look into my brother’s potential involvement today. And now that he’s turned up like this it’s going to be my top priority.

“Can I see her?” Roger requests, having the decency to look uncertain of the question.

My wolf growls in my chest, and I have to forcibly restrain the impulse to lash out at my brother. "Ella was sick this morning, and besides, I need to speak with you myself. Walk me to work?" I suggest.

Roger frowns but agrees. "Is she alright?"

Something about his interest in my little human's wellbeing makes my hackles raise. It all sounds completely innocent and, indeed, compassionate, but I wouldn't put anything past Roger. He's the king of manipulation and gaslighting, and though I don't think he wants to harm Ella, I don't think his preoccupation with her is innocent either.

"Naturally I'm investigating the rogue attack." I tell him as we head out into the snow, my bodyguards framing us on either side.

"But I wanted to see if you picked up on any particular details which might help us track down or identify the culprits."

He adopts a thoughtful expression, "You mean like distinguishing features or tattoos?"

"Sure, or anything they might have said – really any hints about their identities or who hired them." I clarify.

"The only piece I overheard was them discussing having "fun" with her before they finished the job." He reports.

I emit a violent snarl, and Roger flinches before he can stop himself. I'd be lying if I said I wasn't pleased to have startled him this way. "Sorry," I lie. "You know how it is."

"Actually I don't – you stole my mate, remember." Roger snaps back.

I resist the urge to roll my eyes. "That isn't what I meant and you know it." I answer. "Only that wolves take the front seat when it comes to the ones we care about most."

"Whatever." He grumbles. "I can tell you that three of them were gray and the leader was red once they transformed. Definitely not locals. Their accents sounded like they came from somewhere in the east, but that doesn't mean the person who hired them is also foreign."

I nod in agreement. "And remind me, how did you find her that night?"

"I told you, I didn't know Ella was their target. I simply smelled rogues and took up the hunt." Roger supplies.

"That was incredibly lucky." I tell him. "If it wasn't for you who knows what might have happened."

“I was happy to help.” Roger answers easily, either not picking up on – or not acknowledging – the inherent suspicion in my remark. “Ella is family now, and your pup will be the future of this pack. I’m actually glad you suggested we walk together. I wanted to see Ella, but I also wanted to talk to you. I think it’s high time we put the past behind us.”

“Because of Ella and the pup?” I state, not believing my ears.

“In part.” He confirms. “It was one thing to be at odds when Lydia and the pack was still between us, but it’s been five years since Dad got hurt, and almost two since Lydia left.” He reminds me – as if I could forget. “At a certain point it just seems petty to hold onto old grudges, especially when the future is so bright for our family. I want to be in my niece or nephew’s life, and soon you’ll be King. We should be united if you’re going to rule. The attack made me realize that loud and clear.”

“You know Roger, the bad blood between us has never been on my end. I’ve never held a grudge against you, so I don’t know why you’re bringing this to me as if our conflict is mutual. If you want to stop working against our family then stop.”

Roger’s skin flushes. “How typical of you not to take any responsibility for what happened.” He gripes. “I come to you with an olive branch and you foist all the blame on me.”

I stop in my tracks, turning toward him. “Do you have any idea how many years I spent in therapy to stop blaming myself for Mom’s death?” I demand. “I was a child – I didn’t do anything wrong and she did what any good mother would – which is protect her pup. I know you’ve never seen it that way but I’m done letting you make me feel guilty for taking her from you. I lost her too, you know!”

“If you hadn’t –” He begins, worked up into a true lather now. So much for putting the past behind us – he can’t be that resolved to mend bridges if that little push back sets him off.

“No, Roger!” I snap. “I’m done with this. If you want to move on, then move on and the family will welcome you back – even and especially Ella because she doesn’t have a cruel bone in her body. But if you can’t stop blaming a pup for things out of his control then you better believe I’ll never let you set a foot near mine.”

Without another word Roger turns on his heel and storms away. On one hand I’m proud of myself for finally standing up for the child I once was, and on the other I have to wonder if I just made a terrible mistake. Roger has always had a volatile personality, and he’s dangerous even at the best of times. I hope I didn’t just put Ella in even more danger than she was already in.

Chapter 44 – Bonfire Night

Ella

“Are you ready?” Sinclair asks, standing behind me in the mirror. I have to stop myself from staring at him. He’s dressed down from his standard suit, but somehow he looks even more gorgeous and intimidating than usual. In sleek black slacks and a simple white dress shirt, rolled up to his elbows and unbuttoned to his sternum, he looks powerful and laid back at once.

“That depends, what do you think?” I reply, extending my arms to show him my dress and get his opinion. I’m wearing a sleek velvet dress in ink bottle green. When the dressmaker suggested velvet I was skeptical, but now that I see the finished product I can fully appreciate her vision. It’s simple but sophisticated, not to mention incredibly cozy.

“Hmm,” Sinclair replies, striding nearer. “I think you’re missing something.”

“Like what?” I ask, turning back to the mirror to study my reflection. My makeup and hair are done, I found matching heels despite the infinite challenges of matching uncommon dress colors, and I’ll wrap myself in my new coat (courtesy of Sinclair) before we leave.

“Like this.” He beams, pulling out a thin black jewelry box.

I look down at it in surprise. “For me?”

“And just who else do you think I would be buying jewelry for?” He teases.

“I don’t know.” I shrug. “For all I know you have a girlfriend on the side.”

“Ella.” Sinclair’s impossibly deep voice sounds even richer than usual. “There isn’t anyone else.”

For some reason, this statement makes me feel more uncertain. It’s not like we’re in a relationship or have discussed not dating during the pregnancy to avoid scrutiny. It makes sense that he wouldn’t risk the campaign by seeing someone else when he’s supposed to be happily mated, but he’s expressly told me that everything will be different when he finds his second chance mate.

It seems strange that he should make such a firm assurance in this intimate way, it feels as though he’s blurring the line of our arrangement. The little voice in my head might not mind this, but my heart knows better, it isn’t safe.

Too late I realize Sinclair is watching me work through all these feelings, and he narrows his eyes at me. “What’s going on in that head of yours?”

“Nothing.” I reply simply, nodding towards the box. “Can I see it?”

“I shouldn’t.” Sinclair states circumspectly. “I should make you tell me what you’re thinking first – but we don’t have time.” He sighs, flipping open the smooth black lid. Inside the box is a stunning silver necklace, dotted with diamonds and boasting a matching pair of earrings.

My jaw drops, and I try to cover my gaping with my hand. “Sinclair, this is gorgeous. But it’s much too extravagant, I can’t possibly accept it.”

“Of course you can.” He insists, turning my body back towards the mirror. I don’t know why, but I’m holding my breath as he drapes the necklace over my collar and secures it at my nape. My fingers immediately flutter over the opulent jewels. I can guarantee that I’ve never worn anything so fine in my entire life. “You see,” Sinclair says, beaming at my reflection. “It was made for you.”

“It’s incredible.” I answer honestly. “But I feel like an imposter.”

He frowns, furrowing his brow. “Why do you say that?”

“Maybe because I am one.” I reply, trying to tone down the sarcasm at the last minute. He’s been so sweet and generous, I don’t mean to take out my pregnancy angst on him.

“Ella, look at me.” He instructs, his tone gentle but brooking no argument. I don’t really want to obey, I find Sinclair’s penetrating gaze far too observant at the best of times, and sometimes I want to be able to sulk without my thoughts becoming public. “Now, trouble.” He chuckles, seeing my reluctance.

I do as he says, lifting my gaze to meet Sinclair’s emerald irises in the mirror. I feel like I might become hypnotized in their depths, but his expression is warm and open. “You might not be a she-wolf, but you are carrying my heir, and you are my date for the festival.” He slides his strong arms around my waist from behind, still staring at me through the looking glass, “This is not a sham. This is right.”

I have to admit that side by side, we make a striking couple. Sinclair is so tall and dark, rugged yet classically handsome – as if all his features have been carved from stone. In my heels my head actually reaches his shoulder, and though I look very small and delicate beside him, the fine clothes and jewelry make me look like a woman deserving of all his strength and power, not just some pretty face in the crowd.

Again I feel as though Sinclair is reading my mind, “Will you be upset if I tell you how stunning you look?”

I peek up at him from beneath my lashes, “I don’t know, why don’t you try and find out.”

Sinclair grins, moving his lips to my ear and sending a shiver down my spine before he’s even said a word. He purrs a laugh at the feeling of my body trembling against him, obviously amused and pleased at once by my response. “You look stunning Ella, so stunning it’s very hard not to eat you right up.”

I shiver again, feeling heat pool between my legs and praying that his senses aren’t strong enough to pick up on such an intimate thing. I’m beginning to think he likes getting me all hot and bothered, though it seems terribly unfair of him to tease me this way. Of course, I know Sinclair isn’t completely immune to me either, and suddenly a devious idea sparks in my mind. I lean back into his embrace, squirming slightly as if I’m trying to get comfortable, and intentionally rubbing my round bottom against him.

Sinclair growls in response, but it’s not the dangerous kind he makes when he’s angry. This is low and sultry, and butterflies burst to life in my belly even before I feel him growing hard against my backside. “I suppose I deserved that.” Sinclair murmurs, grazing his lips over the place where my neck meets my shoulder. “Such a mischievous little human.”

“We’re going to be late.” I answer huskily, trying to stay upright as my knees turn to jelly.

“I’m the Alpha, I’m never late.” He jokes, though he releases me at last.

“What, everyone else is just early?” I prompt him, quoting one of my favorite romantic comedies.

He grins, retrieving a glossy white coat and wrapping it around my shoulders. “Exactly.”

The Solstice festival is more beautiful than I ever could have imagined. I know it’s only the first night, but it seems so magical already. I can’t believe that it’s going to get even more magnificent. We’re standing at the top of a snow covered hill, our bodies bathed in the glow of firelight. A huge bonfire is in front of us, but as I turn to gaze out at the sprawling city, I can see hundreds of smaller fires blazing through the pristine winter landscape. The shifter society has gone completely dark, cutting out all electric lights and replacing everything as far as the eye can see with lanterns and flame.

Music unlike any I’ve ever heard fills the air around us, a blend of familiar instruments and exotic ones, set to tunes that feel older than time itself. Suddenly it’s painfully obvious that these people aren’t human, that they’re connected to their deity and nature in ways that defy all logic and science. It truly feels as though I’ve stepped into another world – one far too mystical for me to ever make sense of. I can actually feel the magic in the air, which is definitely not something I've ever encountered before.

Women and men wearing sheer panels of cloth and painted with blue ink whorls begin some sort of ceremonial dance around the fire. They're holding torches of their own, and dancing with the flames as if they were lovers. I'm completely transfixed, but soon the people gathered around the edges drinking mulled wine join in, as an air of unbridled revelry takes hold of the night. I assumed Sinclair and I would stay on the sidelines and watch the evening unfold, but the next thing I know he's pulling me into the crowd of dancers.

"Just let me lead." He teases, pulling me close.

For once I do as he says, letting him guide my body through the unfamiliar steps until I'm so warm between him and the fire that I have to strip off my coat. He does the same, and soon I can feel his hard body flush against every inch of my soft curves. For once I don't find it difficult to let go of my worries and anxiety, Sinclair banished the reporters who tried to follow us into the event, and though we're surrounded by people, I don't think anyone is paying attention to anything but their own partners. I barely even remember that Sinclair and I aren't alone. It certainly seems like we're the only two people on the planet right now.

I'm gazing up at Sinclair as I think all this, and I know I must be telegraphing my every emotion to him, because he ducks his head in the next moment, until our lips are mere inches apart.

He's going to kiss me!

Chapter 45 – First Real Kiss

Ella

I don't have the chance to gasp, because the moment my lips part, Sinclair's mouth has claimed them. His hand is firm on my nape, holding me in place so he can plunder my mouth at will. His tongue teases my lips before delving inside, coaxing my own out of hiding until they're dancing, tangling and massaging each other with ravenous hunger.

My shock passes quickly, and soon I'm rising up on my toes to meet him, my insides turning to mush as I wrap my arms around his neck, moaning when he pulls his lips from mine and begins carving a ruthless path over my jaw and down the sensitive skin of my throat.

I'm out of breath already, completely invigorated and lost to the world around us. As Sinclair's talented tongue snakes out to dip into my clavicle, I take the opportunity to nibble his ear lobe. He purrs and a delicious river of heat pours through me. My body is flush against Sinclair's, and I've completely forgotten about the other dancers. I press myself as close to him as possible, trying not to squirm. I'm desperate to get relief for my suddenly aching breasts and the deep pulsing between my legs, but too shy to truly seek it.

Luckily Sinclair doesn't need to be told, he seems to sense my need effortlessly, and he's not at all shy about seeking his own desires. He grips my hips in his powerful hands, holding them firmly against his and letting me feel his hardness. He gently undulates our bodies through the dance, rubbing me in all the right places under the pretense of following the sensuous steps.

This isn't like our other kisses. There are no cameras around, no eager shifters looking on. I'm sure a few of the other wolves present are peeking our way, but everyone is so preoccupied with their own partners that I doubt we have a large audience. If I had the ability to think clearly right now I might wonder why Sinclair is being romantic when we don't have anyone for whom to put on a show, but that's all beside the point – because I couldn't think clearly if my life depended on it.

I'm sure time stops, that the world stops spinning and everything in it ceases to matter except this singular moment between two people – despite the fact that we could not be more different if we tried. Sinclair's lips are soft as silk, but his affection is rough and merciless, as if he's trying to sear the feel of his kiss into my bones so that I'll never forget the way it feels to be in his arms – to be his. I know he's setting me up for heartbreak in the future – because I won't forget, I'm sure I'll never be able to kiss anyone again without remembering this and feeling infinitely disappointed that nothing can ever compare.

It's also getting carried away very fast, but I can't seem to find the will to end it. Luckily Sinclair does, pulling back a moment later and looking down at me with a fiery gaze that leaves me tingling from my head all the way down to my toes. It's a good thing he has more restraint than I do, because I was about ready to rip off both of our clothes despite the cold. I swear I've never lost control that way in my entire life, and though part of me is worried about the power Sinclair obviously holds over me, it's also impossible for me to be too worried when I'm with him. He makes me feel so safe it's astonishing – and when I finally have the space to clear my head, frightening.

"Why did you do that?" I manage to gasp, still dazed with the aftershocks of his touch.

"Why?" He offers me a wolfish grin that makes my heart do somersaults. "Didn't you like it?"

My cheeks flush with color, "Yes, but –"

"Then what's the problem?" Sinclair inquires, completely missing the point. Before I can think of answering he's kissing me again, stealing the thoughts from my mind and making my insides flutter. This time I do find the will to back away from him, and I'm not even a little intimidated when he rumbles with displeasure... at least, that's how I try to act. In reality his growl has my knees turning to jelly. Why, oh why do I suddenly want to throw myself at his feet and expose my soft underbelly to his mercy?

"Dominic, I don't think this is a good idea." I finally manage to say, even though the little voice in the back of my head is protesting at the top of her lungs. .

"You don't want me to kiss you?" Sinclair arches a skeptical brow, massaging my nape and studying my face so intently I wish I could run and hide.

"I didn't say that." I answer huskily. Lying when he's looking at me this way is not even an option, the best I can do is skirt around the truth and pray he'll let me get away with it.

"So you do want me to kiss you?" He smirks, tucking my body closer against his.

With an exasperated huff, I glare up at the impossible Alpha. "Look, I'm simply not the casual type."

The amusement drains from Sinclair's features at once, as if he realizes I'm truly not playing his game. "And you think I am?"

I want to scoff, or laugh in his absurdly handsome face. I think he's rich and good looking enough to have any woman he wants, and ever since he divorced the tabloids have never once reported him taking the same woman out twice. They haven't named him a playboy exactly, and I know it isn't fair to label him this way because he's obviously a family man – but committing to one’s children is very different from committing to a woman. Plenty of men continue their roguish ways even after becoming fathers.

I don’t say any of this, instead I answer, “I think I’m human and your surrogate. You’ve told me a dozen times that your mate will come along eventually and I’ll step down as Luna. If we have no future, which makes ‘casual’ the only option available to us.” I remind him stiffly.

“Would you want something more – a relationship – if it was possible?” He asks, the gears visibly turning in his head. I find myself reeling back. Why would he ask me such a thing – doesn’t he realize how cruel that is? Is he taunting me? Dangling the impossible over my head for sport? He doesn’t look like he’s being humorous or attempting a joke, he’s also not wearing the playful expression he’s donned when he flirts, but I can’t fathom why else he would go down this path.

“It isn’t possible, so why ask?” I inquire, feeling more and more annoyed by this line of questioning.

“Because I am.” Sinclair replies, with just enough edge to make me rethink a sassy retort.

“No, I wouldn’t.” I snap, and despite my overexcited body – I mean it. I’m woman enough to admit that I couldn’t handle a man like Sinclair. He would chew me up and spit me out... and I’d never survive it, no matter how attracted I might be to him. Rather, I wouldn’t survive it because of how attracted I am to him. The problem is that the heat between us is so much more than physical, I’m getting more emotionally invested every day, and I can’t take anymore. A relationship with Sinclair would be beyond self-destructive, especially given how raw I am after what happened with Mike.

“But you do want me to kiss you?” He presses, his cocky grin covering a countenance which suddenly seems dark and unreadable.

“I never said that.” I remind him.

“Not verbally, maybe.” Sinclair agrees. “Your body on the other hand...” He trails off, caressing one of his huge hands down my ribs, perilously close to the curve of my breast. I’m still plastered against him, on fire from his touch, and it takes all my willpower not to turn and press my aching nipple into his hand.

“You’re impossible.” I grumble, trying to stop myself from lashing out at him. The more he drags this flirtation out, the more I feel like some helpless rabbit his wolf is just toying with for sport. It isn’t fair, or right.

Sinclair sighs then, relaxing his hold on me and dragging one hand through his hair,

“Ella, there’s probably something I should warn you about–”

I shake my head, drawing away from him. I don’t want a warning or lesson right now. I just want to catch my breath and I’ll never be able to do that if I stay with Sinclair. “I’m going to find a restroom.” I announce, cutting him off.

“Ella –”

“The baby is pressing on my bladder.” I declare stubbornly, knowing he’ll do anything to accommodate the pup. Unsurprisingly, he lets me go, and I storm off into the crowd, hoping I’ll be able to find some decent facilities.

Chapter 46 – Setting a Date

Sinclair

I'm watching Ella retreat, wishing I could read her complex mind as easily as I can read her body language. My wolf is angry with me for upsetting her, but I'm not sure what I did wrong. She liked kissing me, there's no doubt about that. I also don't know why she would ever think I'm the casual type – because I'm anything but. Still, she seemed to be telling the truth when she said she didn't want more. What am I supposed to do with that information?

Ella is clearly feeling off-kilter, and it's my responsibility to center her – but if she won't tell me why she's feeling agitated, how am I supposed to help her? I know exactly what I would do if she was a she-wolf, but I don't know if a human would react the same way. My wolf wants me to try – he's completely convinced that Ella is like any other out-of-sorts mate, who just needs a firm hand to remind her who's in charge so she'll share her worries with us. After all, she made me promise to communicate more – shouldn't that go both ways?

I'm so caught up in my head I almost don't realize that the Prince is approaching me, a knowing smirk dominating his features. "I remember those days," He remarks. "When you first meet your mate and you can't keep your hands off each other – when you miss them even though they've only left the room for a moment. It's a wonder you haven't marked her yet."

My blood begins to boil so quickly that I've barely processed his words before my wolf is clawing at the surface of my skin. The only person who knows that Ella hasn't been marked is Roger... if the Prince knows too, it's because my brother told him.

I'm not surprised by Roger's betrayal. He's had it out for me since day one, and his heroics with the rogues was always highly suspect. It was much too convenient that he happened to turn up just in the nick of time when Ella needed him that fateful night, and his overtures of friendship in the time since have been completely out of character. For a moment I wondered if he truly did have a soft spot for the human – if anyone is capable of thawing his frozen heart, it's my Ella, but now the truth is clear.

More importantly, the crown and the Kingdom are on the line. If people think something is off with Ella and I they'll lose confidence in my ability to lead. We have to appear strong and united to pull this off, and Goddess forbid if anyone begins to suspect we aren't truly mated, it could ruin everything. There's no doubt in my mind that the Prince will use this information as ammunition against me in the campaign unless I can convince him it would be a mistake to make it public. If he believes it will backfire on him, he won't share it, and the only way I know how to make him think this is by marking Ella and showing him the evidence, or selling the same lie I told my brother.

The former option is more tempting than I'd like to admit. My wolf is already urging me to mark Ella despite the fact that she's human and it's impossible for her to be my mate. He wants her, and he doesn't seem to care about any of the difficulties or details. Already, I hear his voice growling mine, every time I lay eyes on her. But it can't happen, I'd never be able to mark her without damaging her delicate flesh. For all I know the force of the bite could permanently injure her.

"You know I pride myself on self-control." I finally answer the Prince, shaking myself from my thoughts. "We're waiting until our mating ceremony."

The Prince scoffs, "Self control, or lack of passion? Not a good sign for an Alpha. If your mate isn't taking the edge off, how stable will you be to govern?"

"One thing you don't ever have to worry about with Ella and I, is passion." I tell him, my voice imbued with abject honesty. I don't need to have bedded Ella to know we aren't lacking in that area. She overflows with both sweet submission and fiery passion, and I can't imagine a more perfect fit for my own desires. Sometimes I feel guilty for comparing her to Lydia— but they're so different I can't help myself. Lydia was skilled but always distant in bed. She let me dominate her physically, but never gave herself over emotionally — creating a cavern of distance between us long before she left.

Ella on the other hand... I already know that were she to give herself to me, she would give herself completely — she wouldn't be able to help herself. She throws herself, body and soul, into everything she does — leading with her heart. The challenge with her is convincing her to take the leap. I can see how skittish she is after Mike's mistreatment, and who knows what other traumas she's survived. It's clear she doesn't take the decision to jump into relationships lightly... I wonder if that's why she's behaving the way she is tonight? Does she truly not want anything from me romantically? Is it purely physical for her and she's just not interested in being with someone without an emotional connection? Or does she feel as strongly as I do, but holds herself back out of fear or uncertainty?

"I presume you've already set a date for the mating ceremony, then?" The Prince prompts me, seeming more than a little peeved that he isn't holding my full attention.

"Of course." Now this time I am lying. We've made no such arrangements, making up the story solely for Roger's sake.

"But not before the wild hunt, I take it?" He guesses, even cockier now, "You really think you can get through the night without marking her?"

"As I said, self control." I repeat, though in truth I'm very worried about this. I'd started to warn Ella before she rushed away, but the Prince's mocking makes me more determined than ever to hold out. “We’ll be mated exactly one month after our pup is due – at the summer solstice.”

“An auspicious day.” The Prince nods, looking pissed. He knows as well as I do that royal mating ceremonies are not to be taken lightly, and are often planned around major holidays when the Goddess’s magic – and our own – is strongest. The fact that I named this date implies that I’m already assuming I’ll win the campaign and that Ella and I will have no problems delivering the Kingdom its heir. Besides, the pack will eat up the idea of a Royal Wedding far more eagerly than they would a private ceremony for a contender. Some people might vote for me just for the occasion alone – of course that’s not how I want to win, but this is life or death – I can’t afford to be noble.

“You must be sure of your victory.” The Prince continues, his tone much too smug for my liking. It’s obvious he’s just trying to push back at my own power play, but there’s something about his smirk that makes me worry his confidence isn’t all a bluff.

“It will be an important day for my family whether I win the campaign or not.” I shrug. “Only the Goddess knows what the future will hold in that regard, but I know my mating day with Ella will be one for the ages, King or not.”

The Prince laughs humorlessly. “That’s one way of looking at it.”

“Do you have another?” I bite, before I can stop myself.

“In my opinion a true Alpha makes his own destiny.” The Prince answers ominously.

My spine stiffens as I think about my father. Is the Prince alluding to his attack? To his own father claiming the throne by eliminating the competition through any means possible? Is he confirming that he has plans to pull a similar act of aggression to keep me from winning? Taking credit for the attack on Ella? Of course he’s always been my number one suspect, but it’s one thing to believe this without proof, and another entirely to have a confession rubbed in your face. Surely he’s not so stupid to do such a thing.

“Well as an Alpha with actual experience leading a pack,” I cut, leaving the rest of my sentence obvious but unsaid: rather than lazing around while my Daddy does all the hard work for me. “I can tell you that it’s not that simple. You might be surprised at the unexpected twists life throws at you.”

“Spoken like a man who’s prepared to lose.” He snaps in an undertone.

I arch my brow. “Haven’t you been paying attention? I can’t lose– I lead the strongest pack on the continent, I have an incredible mate and my first pup on the way.” I offer him a wide smile bound to infuriate him. “In my book that’s a win – no matter what else happens.”

It's both the truth, and a misdirect. I do feel as though I have everything I need personally – but I'm not in this campaign for myself. I don't want the power for personal gain, I have to take it in order to protect shifter-kind and the human world from the Prince's tyranny. If he succeeds we'll likely be headed for a civil war and abuses unlike anything we've seen before. And I can't let that happen at any cost.

It's time I buy a ring. Ella and I can't keep pretending she's already marked – by morning everyone in the Kingdom will know she isn't, which means we're going to have to go through with the mating ceremony even if the rest of our relationship is a sham. I might not be able to really mark her – but I can sure as hell marry her.

Chapter 47 – Ella Takes Matters into Her own Hands

Sinclair

I'm resolved to buy Ella a ring tomorrow, but we still have to get through tonight first.

She was distant on the ride home, sitting across from me in the back of the limo rather than tucked up against my side the way I prefer. Moreover she didn't say a word until we got back to the house, and then her only message was that she wanted to sleep in her own rooms this evening.

"Are you angry with me?" I ask, furrowing my brow in confusion.

"No, I just think a little space would be good for us." She answers, hugging herself in a clear defensive move.

Maybe she's right, I think, though it's not easy to hear my thoughts with my wolf snarling in protest. I still haven't gotten to the bottom of her reluctance to indulge our shared desires, and I don't want to press her if she really isn't interested. Even if she is, I think it would be a mistake to push her too hard or fast and risk spooking her. "Okay." I agree eventually. "I'll notify the guards."

My wolf is whining like a pup as I stride away from her, and I can't believe how attached I've become to the sweet human in so short a time. I don't like letting her out of my sight when I know she's under threat, but this is so much more than that. I've gotten so used to sleeping with her warm little body snuggled in my arms or sprawled out on top of me, that I'm not sure I'll be able to rest without her.

As I prepare for bed, I try to make my wolf settle, but it's nearly impossible. In the end, I realize I didn't scent mark Ella tonight, and if anything will calm my wolf, I imagine that will. I pull on a t-shirt over my pajama bottoms and set off towards her rooms, knowing precisely how ridiculous I'm being and not giving a damn.

However when I arrive outside Ella's rooms I immediately pick up on a strange tension among the guards. I look around at them curiously, but their stiff postures are only compounded by their refusal to look me in the eye. A moment later a soft whimper emanates through Ella's door, and I understand. It's not a sound of worry, sadness or fear, but one absolutely dripping with sex.

My ears sharpen towards her door and I hear more sounds: the slight rustle of the bed sheets; the gentle glide of deft fingers sliding over wet flesh; uneven and excited breathing; and pounding pulse. It's obvious what Ella is up to in my absence, and I have to stop myself from groaning aloud.

I silently order the guards away – knowing Ella would be mortified if she realized my men can overhear her touching herself. My own mind is divided over what to do – I doubt she wants me to hear this either, though she probably wouldn't mind if she realized just how open shifters are about sex. Even my men weren't embarrassed, simply nervous over my reaction to them being near Ella at an intimate moment. She might not be my mate, but she is carrying my pup, and that's a claim every bit as powerful and sacred to our kind. They know how possessive I am of her, how protective. They probably thought I'd rip their ears off just for standing in hearing distance. Still it was their duty to guard her, and now it has to be mine until this private moment has passed.

I'm confident that I'm the least objectionable audience to Ella, considering the intimacies we've already shared. Still, I have to keep telling myself this reminder as time passes. Every time I begin to wonder if I'm using her protection as an excuse to eavesdrop, I put myself in Ella's shoes and recall how humiliated she would feel about so many strangers hearing her in this state. Leaving her unguarded isn't an option, so this is the lesser of two evils.

Nonetheless, it's absolute torture to listen to Ella finding her pleasure this way, because every small pant and moan fills my head with a thousand explicit images. I can imagine exactly what she's doing, and the tiny sounds she emits every now and then egg my wolf on. He's in a near frenzy, demanding we go in and put a stop to this immediately. I should be the one pleasuring her, she shouldn't have to take matters into her own hands. This is a mate's job. If she were mine I would march in right now, give her lush bottom a few swats for not making her needs known to me, then bury my face between her legs and feast until she's begging me to stop.

But she isn't mine. I remind myself furiously, trying not to get so carried away by the fantasy that I give in. Still, she's clearly worked up because of the kiss, my wolf reasons, she's probably thinking of us this very moment.

We don't know that. I caution. She didn't want to get involved, remember? Her current need might be related or it might be the pregnancy, her hormones, or simply the fact that she's a living breathing woman with a healthy libido. Either way, we have no right.

Ella's quiet ministrations speed up, and I pray we're near the end of this – I've given up all thought of scent marking her. If I go in there now, I won't be able to restrain myself or my wolf. I'm hard as a rock on my slacks, and as soon as Ella's need for privacy is over, I'll let the guards return and trust her safety to them once more. Afterwards I'm going to have a nice cold shower and relieve me cock the only way I can in my current predicament.

Ella's delicious murmurs finally crescendo, and I wish I'd pressed her harder about her reluctance to start something romantic between us. This is only going to get harder as her pregnancy progresses, and my wolf is quickly running out of patience. I can't understand his behavior. I've had sex with plenty of she-wolves over the years, and he's only ever pushed me to claim Lydia, no matter how much I cared about the women who came before her.

It's like he doesn't believe Ella is human – like he refuses to accept that I couldn't mark Ella even if I wanted to. And I don't want to... right? It's just my wolf going overboard because of the pup.

If only we could mark her somewhere else, He suggests wistfully, completely ignoring my logic. And don't even pretend like that idea doesn't tempt you.

Unfortunately he's right, but it doesn't matter how tempting the idea is. Mating marks are so intimate because they require allowing another wolf to wrap their jaws around your most vulnerable spot. It would defeat the point to mark Ella somewhere safer.

But just think about how amazing it would feel. My wolf urges.

Again I have to stop myself from groaning out loud. The bastard is right. The last thing I want is to hurt Ella, but I'm very experienced when it comes to bringing a she-wolf to the peak of pleasure before sinking my teeth into her. I'm sure I could do the same for her– if only it wasn't her neck I had to bite.

Goddess, stop it! I internally shout at myself. You're losing it! This is crazy talk. It's your cock talking, not your brain or even your heart. You don't really want this, and neither does she.

Right on cue, Ella climaxes, a soft keening escaping her lips. My hands close into fists and I grit my teeth against the intoxicating noise, and it's only as I drag in a few gasping breaths, suddenly worried I might actually burst through her door – that I hear my name on her lips. It's a mere whisper as she comes down from her high, and I have no choice but to get out of there before it's too late. I storm past the guards, waving them back to their posts, and race for my shower.

A little while later I find myself lying awake in bed, my cock hard again despite the release I found in the shower. Ella is the only thing on my mind, and I'm beginning to wonder if I'll ever be able to think of anything else. That might have been the most erotic thing I've ever heard, and I didn't even see it happening. Does she have any idea what she's doing to me? How irrational and crazed I've become about her? I barely recognize myself anymore.

I'm sure she has no clue. Unlike Lydia or some of the other she-wolves I've known, Ella doesn't have a manipulative bone in her body. When others would take pleasure in tormenting a powerful Alpha like myself, Ella would never believe she could. Not because she doesn't realize how lovely she is or lack confidence, she just wouldn't want to and doesn't understand that her allure is strong enough to do so unintentionally.

Even as I think this, a small knock sounds on my door, and as soon as I scent the air I know it's the object of my near... okay, not near, we're way past near at this point – the object of my total obsession.

Has she come to say she's changed her mind about us? Is she going to ask me to pleasure her the way she should have from the beginning? Does she know I overheard her? Will this be the beginning of something new? More importantly – if I let her in, will I be able to control my wolf? There's only one way to find out.

Chapter 48 – The Ring

Ella

“Come in.” Sinclair’s voice sounds even deeper than usual, and I’m wondering if I’m imagining it. I waited as long as I could bear before coming to his rooms after finding some relief for all the pent up sexual tension he’s created in me. Still, I don’t feel nearly satisfied. My sex is still swollen and pulsing with need, and I’m terrified that he’ll somehow be able to tell how erotically charged I am.

The larger problem, however, is that I’m exhausted. I’m desperate for some rest, especially after missing my usual afternoon nap amidst the preparations for the festival. As the pregnancy progresses I can’t help but think how ironic it is that the closer I come to bringing a baby into the world, the more childlike I seem to become: overly sensitive, constantly exhausted, picky about food, sick half the time and struggling with bladder control. Last week I cried because I ate all of my snack and didn’t have any left!

And now this... I can’t sleep by myself. I’m grumpy because I didn’t get tucked in by Sinclair, and couldn’t fall asleep without him next to me. So I’ve abandoned my pride and now I’m actually going to him so I can beg to crawl into his huge, comfy bed with him.

I poke my head inside, and fight back a whimper. His bedside lamp is on, and he’s propped up on his elbows, looking expectantly in my direction with the same dark intensity he always reserves for me. He’s shirtless, his chiseled abs glowing in the lamplight, and his dark hair is tousled effortlessly. There’s a swath of scruff over his powerful jaw, and his green eyes are almost glowing in the dim light. It’s not fair for anyone to look that good, especially not when I’m already squeezing my legs together just to relieve the ache he planted with his kiss.

“Are you still up?” I ask inanely, apparently forgetting that he’s clearly awake and staring right at me.

“I am.” The corner of Sinclair’s mouth curves up, and I’m reminded of how soft and firm his lips had been on mine. “Is everything okay?”

I slip the rest of the way inside, leaning back against the door until it clicks shut and staring at the ground. “I can’t sleep.” I confess, wrapping my arms protectively around my body.

Sinclair sits up a little straighter, frowning with apparent concern. “I can give you a supplement.” He offers. “The doctor left some herbal remedies in case you needed them.”

My heart sinks. “No, I don’t want to take something that’s going to leave me groggy all day tomorrow.” I reason, actually impressed with my ability to improvise an excuse so quickly.

“He assured me they wouldn’t have that effect.” Sinclair states simply, rising from the mattress and coming forward, moving with the lethal grace of his wolf.

“Still, I haven’t ever tried anything like that. I might have a bad reaction.” I suggest lamely.

“Hmm, well we wouldn’t want that.” Sinclair murmurs, closing the final distance between us. “Why can’t you sleep? Are you stressed? You look a bit flushed.” He’s stroking my cheek now, and for the first time I have the sense that he might be wise to my arousal. Naturally this only makes me blush a deeper shade of red. “And your pulse is awfully fast.”

“No, I just couldn’t fall asleep.” I shrug, feeling more frustrated by the second. Why doesn’t he just scoop me up and take me to bed the way he usually does?

Maybe because you told him you wanted to sleep alone and that you weren’t interested in his affection. The little voice in my head snipes, sounding even more bitter than I feel. You wanted him to respect your wishes, didn’t you?

Oh put a sock in it. I think back – I swear my conscience has gotten more and more vocal since I became pregnant, and she’s really not all that helpful at times like this.

“How about a midnight snack, or some ambient sounds.” Sinclair muses, still petting me.

I lean my cheek into his hand before I can realize what I’m doing. I shake my head pitifully, realizing a few things at once. First, Sinclair knows exactly what I want. Second, he’s taking no small amount of pleasure in suggesting all the wrong solutions. Third, if I want to sleep with him, I’m going to have to come out and ask for it.

As if he’s reading my mind, Sinclair says, “Just tell me what I can do to help, Ella. And I will.”

I sigh, fighting the sudden urge to stomp on his big giant foot and only holding back because I remember how much it hurt the first time. My next thought is to turn my lips toward his palm and take a chomp out of him. It’s incredibly tempting, but I have no idea where the impulse comes from. I’ve never contemplated – let alone wanted – to bite another person in my life.

Sinclair narrows his eyes, then smirks, tightening his hold on my cheek. “Don’t even think about it.” He warns, his rich voice full of foreboding – but also amusement, as if he thinks my bloodthirsty thoughts were cute rather than bizarre and inappropriate.

My eyes widen. I'm both surprised that he sensed my intentions and annoyed that he forbade them. It honestly makes me want to bite him even more than ever, but I'm afraid that if I do he won't let me sleep with him – and I need rest more than I need revenge. "Can I sleep with you?" I finally mutter, keeping my voice very low.

"Of course." He agrees easily, finally gathering me in his arms bridal style. I snuggle in and lean my cheek against the hard plane of his chest.

I don't know why, but I feel compelled to make an excuse for myself as he transfers me to the king-sized bed. "Thank you, I think the pup has a hard time settling without you."

Sinclair hums softly, moving his big palm to my belly before I can even think about moving out of reach – not that running away would do me any good. His brow arches a moment later, and I suddenly feel very vulnerable with him standing over me this way.

"The pup is sleeping, Ella."

"Oh." I can't seem to figure out anything else to say, and slide beneath the plush covers, turning my back to the intimidating Alpha. I wait for him to pull me close when he takes his place beside me, but for once he lets me keep space between us. My frustration is quickly disintegrating into crankiness. I know he's doing this on purpose!

Rolling onto my other side, I find Sinclair watching me with one of those knowing looks of him. He's expectant, waiting for my next move. I glare at him, and he smiles back, extending an arm to me. The message is clear. I can have what I want, but I'm going to have to take it myself.

Grumbling under my breath, I sidle over the space until our bodies are flush together, and finally Sinclair wraps his strong arms around me fully. I sigh with relief, and a shiver-inducing growl sounds in my ear. "Would you like me to purr for you?"

"If you want to." I answer, noncommittal. At first I think he's going to make me ask for this too, but it seems I've paid my penance, a steady vibration takes up in his chest and I bury my face against his shoulder, breathing in his addictive scent. The next thing I know, darkness closes in, and I'm fast asleep.

The next night is day two of the Solstice Festival. Sinclair and I haven't talked about any of yesterday's events, and I'd be lying if I said I wasn't painfully aware of the man every time he's near. I feel like I have some sort of sixth sense for knowing when he's close by, and all the thoughts disappear from my head every time he gives me one of those hungry stares.

We're both dressed up again and preparing to leave the house, and though I know part of tonight's event involves delivering gifts around the city, I never dreamed that Sinclair would appear with another present for me when I've given him nothing in return.

Still, before we set out, he pulls me to a stop and offers me another jewelry box.

"Don't tell me I'm not finished again." I joke, gesturing to my necklace. "I'm already wearing your last gift."

"I know." He grins, "this is just a little something extra. I thought it was time we made it official."

At his urging I lift the lid on the box, expecting to find another pair of earrings, however it isn't earrings at all. It's a ring – one that steals the breath from my lungs. There's a stunning silver band, with a gleaming moonstone at its center, surrounded by tiny emeralds. It was unmistakable – an engagement ring.

Chapter 49 – The Prince Interferes

Ella

“Is this...?” I trail off, unable to find the right words.

“I thought if we’re going to pretend to be together, we ought to do it right.” Sinclair smiles, his obvious pleasure at my reaction taking the sting out of his words. This isn’t because he feels anything for me, but he’s happy that I like the gift – and that’s worth something, right?

“It’s beautiful,” I sigh, “But I feel... I haven’t gotten anything for you, Dominic.”

His dark brow furrows, and the next thing I know, he’s turning me towards the mirror at my back. His reflection towers over mine, so dark and sexy in his black dress shirt and trousers. His size and strength are so daunting, and his skin vibrant bronze next to my porcelain complexion and slender limbs. I’m wearing deep purple tonight, and his hand finds my tummy with practiced ease.

“How can you say that?” He demands, gentle but fierce, his lips moving against the shell of my ear as his eyes pierce me through the glass. “Ella, you’re giving me everything.”

My own hand slides to the place where our baby rests, stopping just above his. However a moment later his palm is over mine, pulling our hands just over my belly button. “I wish you could feel what I do.” He tells me solemnly. “You’ll understand when he quickens, when you can feel his movement and moods.” For the first time, the mirror Sinclair pulls his gaze from mine, but only so the real man can turn his head to look at me in reality. My heart stops beating as I turn my face to his, eager to hear what he has to share about our baby. “You’re his whole world – he’s never happier than when he hears your voice.”

“Really?” I squeak, tears flooding my eyes.

“Really.” Sinclair confirms, and I’m surprised and impressed to see there isn’t even the smallest hint of jealousy in his expression.

“Everything I care about, is right here.” He continues, tugging me back against him a little, in a way that makes my delusional mind think that he might be talking about me as well as the baby. “You are making all my dreams come true.”

I’m shaking my head, tears flowing freely now. “Don’t you get it?” I ask hoarsely. “You gave me a miracle too.” I remind him. “It doesn’t seem fair that you should get me so many other gifts too.”

“Then it’s a good thing you aren’t in charge.” Sinclair chuckles, kissing my neck just where it connects with my shoulder and finally turning me back around. He wipes away my tears and slides the ring onto my finger. "Now everyone will know that we're taking vows before the Goddess."

Sniffing and trying to get myself back under control, I ask. "But I thought the mating ceremony was just an excuse for, Roger?"

Sinclair shakes his head. "As I said, it's time to make it official. Now come on, we're going to be late."

I'm in such a whirlwind of emotion as he guides me out the door that I can barely think straight. Sometimes I feel like Sinclair are going around in emotional circles, getting carried away with excitement and joy about the baby and then pulling back when reality sets in. Still, I'll be damned if I know how to escape the maelstrom – let alone how I got in it in the first place. My brain is scrambling to figure out what this all means, what's changed and why this is coming up now. Part of me wonders if it was my rejection the other day, however I don't really have a chance to think it over, because the next thing I know we're heading into the oldest part of the city.

It's a glittering maze of frozen canals, and I can see hundreds of vendors set up on the ice. I'd love to go down and explore them, but ice skating has always been for rich people – not the likes of me.

"In another hour the canals will be full of people for the procession." Sinclair tells me as we look down on the wintry scene. "The processions will start here and weave through the old town until dawn, putting up greenery and decorations to transform the city for the holiday and giving gifts to the residents."

"That's so lovely." I express genuinely. I've never known a holiday as magical as the solstice, and it's only just beginning. "But if it doesn't start for an hour, then why did we come so early? You said we were going to be late!"

"I padded the time a bit – I thought we could take advantage of the peace and quiet and skate a little." Sinclair suggests, keeping one arm protectively looped around my shoulders.

"But I don't know how to skate." I whisper nervously, "And what about the baby – is it safe?"

Sinclair shakes his head, as if I should know better than to ask such a silly question. "I won't let you fall, sweetheart."

Strangely enough, I believe him. I believe he's fast and strong enough to keep this promise, and I know he means it with every fiber of his being. He's as good as his word too. Before long I'm zooming around the rink, unable to stop smiling. Sinclair has stayed glued to my side all night long, never letting me out of arm's reach and holding my hand more often than not. Of course, the more confident I become, the less I want to be leashed to him, and I find myself taking every opportunity to get far enough away to test my wings.

Shifters are constantly approaching him, saying hello, congratulating us on the baby or commenting on the campaign. The media also starts to arrive after someone tips them off about our early arrival, and it's as Sinclair shakes hands with a constituent that I begin to skate away.

Naturally I don't make it five feet before he catches me. "Not so fast, you." He scolds warmly.

"I swear it's like you have eyes in the back of your head." I complain.

"My wolf has special Ella radar." He jokes. "So you just keep on trying to get away, trouble. I'll catch you every time."

I stick my tongue out at him, and flames burst to life in his vibrant eyes. "Are you sassing me, little mate?"

My heart pulses when he calls me his mate, even though I know it's only for our audience. "So what if I am?" I challenge.

"Is that really how you let your woman speak to you?" A new voice drawls behind us.

Sinclair's expression goes very hard, but he doesn't look the least bit surprised to see the Prince hovering over my shoulder. I instinctively lean closer to Sinclair, remembering what he told me about the other man's desperation to take the crown.

"A true Alpha isn't threatened by strong she-wolves." Sinclair growls, emphasizing the first part of his sentence in a way which makes me think they've debated what makes a "true" alpha before.

"There's strength and then there's insolence." The Prince replies snidely. "And everyone knows that a wolf who doesn't discipline his mate properly isn't fit to lead."

"You and I have very different ideas of discipline." Sinclair rumbles. For the first time I realize that we're drawing a crowd.

"If your mate thinks it's appropriate to challenge you in public." The Prince scoffs, "Then I don't think you know the meaning of the word at all."

“My mate feels safe enough to test her limits with me no matter where we are.” Sinclair bites back. “That’s a far better sign of a caring Alpha than one who’s Luna cowers away from him in fear.”

The Prince’s face scrunched up with obvious fury, but he glances at the reporters around us and clearly bites his tongue. “Then again, you aren’t true mates yet. You haven’t even claimed her yet.”

There’s a sudden rash of murmuring through the crowd. I look up at Sinclair in shock. How did the Prince know? And why doesn’t Sinclair look surprised? In fact, Sinclair looks positively triumphant, as if he’d been hoping this would happen when the argument began. “Well thank you for giving me the opportunity to announce the date of our mating ceremony, your Highness.”

The Prince blanches, and I feel my own confusion grow. What on earth is happening? I’m trying to keep my emotions off my face, even managing to smile up at Sinclair when he beams down at me. “Ella and I will be mated one month after we welcome our son. On the night of the Summer Solstice. We’re having an incredibly hard time waiting, but we figured the occasion should be fitting our incredible bond.”

The next thing I know, Sinclair is kissing me soundly for the cameras. A flurry of excitement explodes around us and reporters immediately begin shouting follow up questions as the prince fades into the background. Suddenly I realize that Sinclair has done it again, he’s left me out of key decisions in our arrangement and left me in the dark about too many things I don’t understand. Not only that, he clearly knew the Prince was aware I haven’t been marked and never warned me.

But worse than any of this... is that those blissful moments we shared before we came out tonight, were all just a part of some political ploy. He didn’t want to give me this ring, or make it official – he was simply trying to help the campaign – and he lied right to my face.

Chapter 50 – Ella Demands Answers

Ella

The rest of the evening passes without further drama, but as far as I'm concerned, the night has been a wash. The procession through the city's old quarter would have been magical at any other time— with the traditions, music and palpable gaiety of all those around us. If I'd been able to focus on anything other than my thoughts, I'm fairly certain I would have fallen in love with the occasion, but I wasn't able to give the events the attention they deserved.

I'm exhausted by the time we're finally free to leave, thinking that I'll certainly need an extra-long nap tomorrow even as I climb into the back of the limo. I'm distracted and grumpy, and when Sinclair slides into the car next to me, I vacate my seat, choosing the one facing him instead.

Sinclair arches a brow, but doesn't move to stop me. "You're angry with me." He assesses simply, eyeing my crossed arms and stiff shoulders.

"What was that all about, Dominic?" I inquire, trying not to get too carried away in my temper.

"What, with the Prince?" He clarifies, as if the answer isn't completely obvious.

"How did he know I haven't been marked?" I demand, "And how long have you been aware he knew?"

"You know it would be a lot easier to talk if you were over here." Sinclair coaxes, patting the seat beside him.

"I'm fine right here." I insist. I know how Sinclair works – he gets me within arms reach and the next thing I know I'm being soothed into complacency by his soothing caresses, cozy warmth and gentle purrs. But I'll be damned if I'm going to let him lull me into calming down. I have every right to be upset.

He sighs. "The prince came to speak with me last night at the bonfire. I don't know how he found out you haven't been marked, but he made it clear he planned on using that information against us. So I told him the same story we told Roger."

"And you didn't tell me?" I clarify. "Why, because you didn't find the right time? Or because you didn't plan on filling me in at all?"

"Ella –" Sinclair begins, giving me a beseeching look. I know then he wasn't ever going to tell me, though I shouldn't be surprised. He had every opportunity to share this information with me – like when he gave me the ring.

“Don’t,” I interject, “just don’t bother. I thought we agreed we would be a team from now on? I thought we were supposed to be in this together?”

“Sweetheart we are,” He insists, looking as though it’s taking great restraint not to reach for me. “I just didn’t think this was something you needed to worry about.”

“You didn’t think I should know that I might have to publicly defend our relationship?” I question sharply, “that I might be asked questions about this? What if a reporter had asked me about the mark already knowing your answer, our entire plan could have fallen to pieces because you didn’t inform me, Dominic.”

“It has all happened very quickly, Ella.” Sinclair excuses, “I would have told you sooner or later, but I miscalculated. I really wasn’t expecting the Prince to make an appearance tonight, let alone bring it up. I thought he was smarter than that.”

“Do you know what I’m hearing here?” I bite. “You thought, you expected, you believed and you calculated. You are making all the calls, all the decisions and I am sitting on the sidelines looking like an idiot – Again!”

“I’m sorry.” Sinclair admits. “I told you this wouldn’t come easily for me. I’m trying, but I’m not used to consulting anyone else on this sort of thing. Change doesn’t happen overnight.” He frowns. “That’s not a copout, it’s just that my instincts are still to shield you rather than share the burden. I know that probably seems very patronizing –”

“It doesn’t seem patronizing, it is patronizing.” I correct him.

“No.” He counters sternly. “Patronizing implies superiority. I don’t think I’m better than you Ella.”

“Of course you do!” I burst out. “You’re supernatural – the bias is in the name! I’m just a human and next to shifters we’re primitive, tiny, weak and slow. And on top of all that you’re the wealthiest, most powerful man in the pack. How could you not feel superior?”

Sinclair’s green eyes slice through me, and I have to work very hard to stay still. I feel as though I’m about to receive a lecture, “Because none of those things have any inherent value beyond staying alive and controlling the world around you. There’s no integrity in being fast or rich, and our society didn’t earn any of it. It was handed to us by the Goddess. Yes, we’re more advanced, but not due to our own virtue.” Sinclair continues, still pinning me with his intense stare. “But you, you had to earn everything all on your own. You started from nothing and used your brains and ingenuity to succeed, you had the mental strength to overcome all the trials you faced, and you came out of all that with the purest heart I’ve ever seen.”

I don't think anyone has ever complimented me this way. Cora might, but she's as good as my sister – she has to love me. But I'm certain no other man has ever praised me for such things – or mentioned my positive attributes beyond my beauty. This isn't even the first time Sinclair has made this kind of speech, making me feel valued for the person I am rather than the good looks I lucked into. I feel as though he truly sees me – and I'll be damned if that isn't terrifying.

“I... I don't know how to respond to that.” I admit shyly, my voice barely above a whisper.

He chuckles, the sound filling me with warmth. “You're a far better person than I am, Ella – and you're going to have to get used to compliments because I have no intention of letting you continue to undervalue yourself.”

“If you think these things, why do you keep trying to shield me then?” I inquire, much more docile now.

Sinclair's dark brow furrows. “It's because I think those things.” He explains intently. “I don't want you to have to struggle and worry. You don't deserve more hardship. And it's in my nature besides. I'm dominant – as a man and an Alpha. What you perceive as condescending are the power dynamics that govern all shifters. Dominance is everything to wolves and it makes it my responsibility to protect those less powerful. That's a distinction you'll have to come to terms with if you're going to live among us.”

His words remind me of the Prince's other accusations – calling me insolent and saying I need discipline. A shiver works its way down my spine at the memory, and as curious as I am about that particular part of the conversation, we have more to discuss before I can bring it up. Despite Sinclair's kind words, I'm still incredibly hurt. And I know it's not the fact that Sinclair kept the information from me which stings worst, it's that he didn't give me his ring because he wanted to – he pretended like we were having some intimate moment when really it was just an act.

“Tell me about the mating ceremony.” I request. “As far as I understood, we made up that excuse assuming it would be delayed indefinitely – but you just set a date. What do we do when that date arrives?”

Sinclair's mouth forms a hard line, the vein in his jaw twitching dangerously. “We'll go through with it. Though it will only be for show.”

“What about when your true mate arrives?” I counter. “This all seems very short sighted. How will you explain it when you leave me? Are third chance mates as common as seconds?”

“The endgame is about making it through the campaign. Once I’m king and I have an heir, the identity of my Luna is...

redundant. It’s important that I have one, not who she is or how many I’ve had before.”

Well that’s a slap in the face. I think sadly. I’ve basically just been told that I’m a faceless symbol, and while this is undoubtedly the deal I agreed to when we struck this agreement, it doesn’t take away the ache of hearing I’m basically nothing to him.

“So everything you said to me when you gave me this ring was just bullshit?” I summarize, gesturing to my left hand. “You didn’t make the gesture because you felt it or wanted to, but because of political pressure?”

Sinclair’s eyes flash, and too late I realize I might have shown my hand. I don’t know why I’m so bothered that he didn’t truly want to make things official with me. I might be attracted to Sinclair, I don’t want anything more – so why is it so upsetting? Why is my stomach tied in so many knots? Why is it so difficult to simply breathe?

Sinclair seems to be reading my mind, because in the next moment he inquires, “Why should that matter, you already told me you don’t have any interest in something real with me, so shouldn’t you be happy that it was fake?” His expression has gone truly deadly now, like a hunter closing in on the kill. “Why do you care so much, Ella?”

Chapter 51 – Ella Learns About Shifter Relationships

Ella

My mind goes blank at first. Sinclair is too close to the truth, to figuring out that I'm not as immune to him as either of us would like to believe. The voice in my head is panicking, but I try to keep it together. Praying for calm, I take a deep breath, and as I exhale I recall the ability to speak.

"Because we're supposed to be in this together, and you played me." I murmur, speaking the truth – but not the whole truth. I can't admit to him that I feel utterly rejected by his ploy, that I feel unwanted on a visceral level and it's tearing me up inside for reasons I don't yet understand. "You played me like I'm one of those reporters, or the Prince."

Sinclair's face twists into a grimace, and the next thing I know he's reaching for me, "Please, come here Ella."

"No." I insist stubbornly, preparing to move away if he tries to approach me.

"I'm sorry." He expresses, looking truly remorseful. "I didn't mean to do that. I care about you, I don't want to hurt you that way."

"Well you did." I reply petulantly. I don't know where this comes from. With anyone else I would have accepted the apology and moved on, whether I actually felt better or not. I've always chosen peace over my own feelings – but I find it very hard to pretend with Sinclair. I think he would know that I don't actually feel better, so why should I fake it?

"I know." He nods grimly. "I promise I'll find a way to make it up to you."

"I don't need some sort of reparation." I insist, "Just... do better, Dominic."

"I will." Sinclair vows soberly, "You have my word."

I breathe a sigh of relief, but Sinclair is surveying me closely. I can tell he wants to metaphorically kiss and make up, but as I suspected, he senses my upset is not wholly resolved. "What else?" He prompts.

"Nothing important." I shrug, not feeling brave enough to ask the questions I'm most curious about.

"Ella," He says my name as an admonition, scolding me for not being honest with nothing but those two familiar syllables. "Come on, tell me what's on your mind."

I gnaw on my lower lip, hating that he can read me so easily, but also relieved that I might get my answers. “Alright, what was all that about discipline? Those things the Prince said about my insolence? It didn’t just sound like Alpha stuff... I mean it’s one thing to be insubordinate to a leader, but the way you two were talking... it made it seem like all men expect to be in charge of their mates.”

Sinclair’s lips quirk at the edges, and the energy in the limo abruptly shifts. The air around us goes taut, feeling suddenly tense and electric despite the fact that nothing has actually changed. Neither one of us have moved a muscle. Still I know Sinclair feels it too – it’s all too obvious in his reply. “Such a clever little human.”

“You mean it’s true?” I gape. “Why, because of the dominance thing? But that’s so backwards! You just said that strength and all that doesn’t have true value.”

Sinclair emits a low rumble. “I said it comes down to power dynamics, and that dominance isn’t a virtue – but it is a reality in relationships.”

“So what, because men are physically stronger they get to boss around their mates?” I demand hotly.

Sinclair chuckles, flashing his fangs and clearly enjoying my indignation. “You have to remember that shifters are very primal beings. Whatever instincts humans once possessed have been socialized out of you. You’ve been completely detached from your inner animal. But for us? Our inner animal controls everything, our instincts drive everything.”

“And everyone else has to submit?” I guess, feeling a shiver run down my spine. “Even to their lovers?”

“Especially to their lovers.” Sinclair smirks. “For she-wolves, the best mate possible is the one who can best protect and provide for them. Their instincts drive them to test potential partners in order to figure out who is the strongest. They need to feel their mate’s dominance to know they’re safe, to satisfy their own inner animal. Only then will they submit.” Sinclair shares. “That’s part of why I think you’d make such a good wolf. I think you have some of those same instincts. You may not realize it, but you often test your limits with me, the same way she-wolves test their mates to ensure they have the strongest partner.”

“So all that talk about discipline... that was serious? Literal?” I squeak nervously.

Sinclair is up now, crossing the limo to sit beside me, invading my space with his big body. “Yes.” He rumbles deeply. “It was.

Does that scare you?” I don’t know why, but for some reason, his ominous manner makes me think he wants me to say yes, he wants me to be scared. Oh Goddess, what do I do now?

Sinclair

Ella's eyes are adorably wide, and she's squirming in her seat. However she doesn't look afraid, she looks intrigued – curious. I can see her thighs clenching reflexively, and I can smell the beginnings of her arousal. My wolf howls in triumph. The gendered nature of shifter power dynamics might outrage Ella's human values, but she clearly craves a strong mate just like any she-wolf – whether she realizes it or not. Her body has always responded to my dominance even when her saucy little mouth argues against it.

“So,” her pink lips form a perfect “o” as she tries to wrap her mind around this idea, “if a she-wolf does something her mate doesn't agree with, she just gets abused?”

“Of course not.” I explain, pulling Ella into my lap. “Only weak men assert their authority through violence or mistreatment. That isn't our way.”

“But you said –”

“Consequences, not abuse.” I correct gently.

“What kind of consequences?” Ella asks, a tiny furrow appearing in her brow. I wish I could read her thoughts right now, but it's enough to see the blend of eagerness and apprehension on her beautiful face – she's excited by this conversation, and more than a little interested.

“Well, what does that word make you think of?” I inquire, thoroughly enjoying watching Ella come to terms with these ideas. It hasn't been easy for me to pull back my wolf from treating her like one of our own, especially when she shows so many wolfish qualities. I'd be lying if I said I wasn't hoping this conversation might open a new door in our relationship.

“With the children I nannied consequences were things like time outs and no screen time – groundings for the older kids.” Ella explains.

“It's much the same with our pups.” I say, to Ella's obvious relief. “But mates aren't pups. You aren't a pup.”

“I don't understand.” She frowns, fidgeting nervously. Her silky thighs are still clenching and it's all the more obvious now that she's settled in my lap. The sweet little human probably thinks I don't have a clue what she's up to, but I know perfectly well that she's trying to relieve the ache between her legs.

"Sure you do." I encourage. "Just say the first thing that comes to your mind."

"I mean, dominance and submission..." She trails off, her voice no louder than a whisper. "That makes it sound like... kinky sex stuff."

"It does, doesn't it?" I tease, stroking her hip.

"You mean it is?!" Ella exclaims, looking scandalized.

"You never experimented with that sort of thing?" I ask.

She flushes. "I've only ever been with Mike – he wasn't the adventurous type."

"Well in my book, these things aren't adventurous. They're standard – normal and natural." I relate, my voice low and husky.

"And more fun than you can imagine."

"But it's discipline." Ella argues. "Isn't that only fun for you?"

"Not if you're doing it right." I remark coolly. "And it's fulfilling for us both. She wolves need to submit as much as male wolves need to dominate – it's in our dna."

"That sounds completely sexist. Would a she-wolf tell me the same thing?" Ella asks archly.

"Ask Aileen if you want." I shrug.

"Well it's not as if these things really matter for us." She reasons, straightening up a little. "After all, I'm not a she-wolf, and we're not actually mates." Am I imagining a twinge of disappointment in her voice? But over which part? The fact that she's human?

That we aren't mates? Or is she sad she won't experience these things herself? I already know she never had anyone to take care of her – she's never had discipline or consequences in her life, she only knew neglect as a child. Does she want someone who will give her the care she was denied now?

"True," I agree. "But now that you know the consequences, I wouldn't be too surprised if you get them the next time you act out."

"But we aren't lovers!" Ella objects, her pupils dilating and her breath coming in little pants.

“No, but you’re the mother of my pup, that makes you my responsibility. I’m not saying it would be sexual – I know you don’t want that – but if your behavior needs correcting, you better believe I’ll correct it.” I declare, knowing I’m playing with fire here. This sort of attitude might be catnip for she-wolves, but Ella might take it as a threat.

Her eyes are wide as saucers again, but she doesn’t look frightened, if anything she looks invigorated. “All those times you warned me not to test you, that you were showing leniency because I don’t know your ways...” She realizes aloud.

“That’s right.” I confirm. I watch her closely as my words land, and sure enough, she deflates a little. “You know now, so sneak out again or stomp your little foot on me, and I won’t hesitate to put you over my knee like the naughty girl you are.”

Ella gasps at my blunt words, staring at my lips as though she might kiss me. At first I think I’m imagining it, but then she leans in. She’s going to kiss me.

Chapter 52 – Sinclair’s Warning

Sinclair

At the very last second Ella seems to realize what she’s doing and starts to pull back. Unfortunately for her, the scent of her arousal is filling the small space where we’re confined, and the desire in her eyes is so strong I can’t stop myself. I catch her nape before she can move away from me, claiming her lips in one swift move.

Ella offers me a plaintive little moan then sinks willingly into my arms, sliding her arms around my neck and pressing her soft body flush to mine. I growl in reply, my wolf chuckling in my head when she noticeably shivers. She’s so beautifully responsive, my every touch sending ripples of heat through her small body. It’s only too tempting to continue touching and petting her in new ways, just to see how she’ll react.

Despite her reluctance or disinterest in getting involved with me, Ella shows no hesitation now. I suspect our heated conversation pushed her past her inhibitions or worries. She’s too turned on to think clearly and though I know I shouldn’t take advantage, I’m not a saint. I don’t know any man or wolf who could deny such a sweet offering – and Goddess is she sweet.

Ella returns my kisses with open fervor, parting her lips for my questing tongue and shifting until she’s straddling my lap. Before long her swollen center is pressed to my hardness, separated only by my slacks and her dress. I want to rip the clothes from her body, to expose every inch of her soft skin and finally fulfill my erotic fantasies about her. I’ve become so pent up with sexual tension lately that I’ve found myself making lists in my head, noting all the things I’d like to do with the lovely human if she ever decides to let me into her bed.

It’s practically torture not to escalate our tryst when I know how close I am to making those dreams a reality, yet at the same time I’m overjoyed to simply have Ella in my arms this way. Her lips are completely addictive, and I could happily spend hours tasting her this way. Ella, on the other hand, seems more impatient. She gradually drags her lips from mine and trails them across my jaw and down my neck, her nimble fingers busying themselves with undoing the buttons on my shirt.

When I realize what she intends I catch her slender wrists. “Take it easy, gorgeous.” I advise, worried she’ll regret this if I let it continue. “We’re not even home yet.”

Ella grumbles wordlessly, continuing to lick and nibble her way over my body even as I hold her hands captive. The next thing I know, her little teeth are sinking into my pec – not a nibble or a nip, but a true bite. It seems my sweet human didn’t care for being refused, and she’s reacting like any she-wolf who’s mate isn’t giving her what she needs. I fist one of my large hands in the silky strands of her hair, pulling her off of me before I lose control completely. It takes all my willpower not to throw her onto the seat and claim her once and for all, but somehow I manage. “Fuck, you can’t do that, Ella.” I grit out.

“Why not?” I look down at her, catching sight of an indignant pout so adorable I have to kiss her again.

“Because only mates bite one another.” I sigh when we part. “It’s incredibly intimate, it carries meanings you don’t understand.”

“So explain.” She counters, her brow crinkling in confusion.

Huffing out a laugh, I loosen my hold on her long hair, stroking my fingers through the tresses. “I can’t. It’s a wolf thing. It’s part of our bond, there’s magic that passes between two partners.” I continue. “And you biting me is like an open invitation for my wolf to claim you. It isn’t easy to hold him back.”

I don’t tell her that this shouldn’t be the case. A simple bite from any random woman certainly wouldn’t tempt my wolf, even a bite from a lover wouldn’t tempt him unless he wanted to claim her anyway. But Ella doesn’t know that and I don’t want to overwhelm her. Still, my words have the intended affect, the idea of my wolf claiming her sobers Ella more quickly than anything else, and the tension between us lowers to a simmer.

I carefully extract the sweet bundle from my lap, placing her on the seat beside me. The fog of lust is still covering her eyes, but I can see her slowly coming down from the endorphin high. Her pulse isn’t racing so fast anymore, and I settle my palm on her belly, feeling our pup. He’s awake and giving off pulses of happy contentment, no doubt pleased to have us both near. I tenderly stroke Ella’s stomach, still reveling in our baby’s elusive consciousness. “The pup’s influence is strong – you’re acting more like a wolf every day.” I observe.

“I’m sorry.” Ella finally confesses, looking truly lost now. “Not just for the bite... for all of it. I don’t know what came over me.”

“You don’t have to apologize.” I answer. “I like kissing you.”

“But it’s not...” She shakes her head. “I don’t want that.” Ella insists, gazing up at me. “Thank you for stopping me, I don’t... I’ve never lost control that way. I made such a fuss about us not blurring the lines of our relationship and then I threw myself at you like that... I really don’t know how it happened.”

I do. I think with amusement. I should have expected as much given Ella’s mischievous streak and the way she’s been playfully testing me from the beginning, as well as the times she’s very seriously pushed back at my authority. She needs a firm hand, she craves the kind of care only a strong mate can provide – and it doesn’t matter one bit that she’s human.

"It's okay." I repeat, "And I will always do what I can to make sure we don't get carried away." One huge exception looms in my mind's eye, and after tonight, I know I can't put it off any longer. "But Ella, I really do need to warn you about the wild hunt."

"How so?" She asks.

"The wild hunt event happens on the second to last night of the festival. It's a tradition where male wolves hunt," I'm careful to put this word in air quotes, just in case she misunderstands, "their mates in the forest."

"I know." She breathes. "Aileen told me all about it. She said I would have to start the hunt, but it was okay that I couldn't shift because I'd enter the forest in human form anyway."

"Yes." I confirm, wondering if my beta's wife told her the rest. "And I assume you know what happens when the she-wolves are caught."

Ella flushes scarlet. "Aileen said you celebrate by 'making new wolves'." As embarrassed as she seems to be saying these words, the darling human doesn't seem to be taking it seriously. I understand why she might not think there's anything to worry about in our case, but unfortunately that isn't the reality.

"Right." I agree again. "But you have to understand that I will be shifted by the time I reach you. My wolf will be in control, and he's not as gentle or patient as I am."

"But you'll shift back, won't you?" She inquires, sounding suddenly anxious.

"Yes, but he'll still be at the forefront, and we'll have been on the hunt." I wonder if she comprehends all the implications of this, then realize she can't possibly. Only a shifter could understand. I know I have to be more direct. "That night brings the dawning of the Solstice, when our magic is strongest. Our wolves will be closer to the surface that day than they are almost any other day of the year. I won't be myself, I won't be able to hold myself back without help from you. My wolf will see the mother of our pup and want to carry out the ritual – to make love to you. If you encourage me, I won't be able to stop myself."

"So I won't encourage you." Ella answers, as if the solution is truly that simple.

"It might be harder than you think." I warn. "The pup is changing your behavior already, and the event is very heated from the beginning. We can't let what happened tonight happen at the hunt."

Ella grimaces, "Okay." She nods gravely, clearly taking the matter very seriously.

“There’s one more thing.” I add, my mouth forming a hard line.

“Yes?” She prompts me.

“Once I’ve caught up to you, you have to stop running.” I state, hoping the baby’s influence isn’t strong enough to make her do this. A true she wolf wouldn’t give up until her mate actually pinned her to the ground, but if it gets that far I don’t think I’ll be able to hold myself back. “If you keep going it will send my prey drive into override and I will chase you down... It would be a different kind of encouragement, but every bit as dangerous. So whatever you do – don’t run.”

Ella gulps, “I promise.”

I’m relieved to have this conversation out of the way, to know we’re on the same page. And yet, I saw how curious Ella became tonight about our ways, and I can see the same curiosity in her now. I just have to hope that curiosity isn’t so strong that she decides to test me on the night of the hunt. If she does – we’ll both be in big trouble.

Chapter 53 – Yuletide Feast

Ella

“You look radiant.” Sinclair’s father is beaming up at me from his wheelchair, “how’s my grandbaby treating you?”

“Oh he’s certainly making his presence known.” I laugh, sliding my arms into the sleeves of my coat. Sinclair is holding the garment up for me, then straightens it around my shoulders as if worried I won’t be warm enough. He’s been particularly on edge tonight, and though I understand his agitation, I’m beginning to tire of being treated like a china doll. “Stop fussing, Dominic, I’m fine.”

“I’m still not sure this is a good idea.” He grumbles. “Your blood pressure was much too high this afternoon and you didn’t get nearly enough rest.”

“You’re the one who keeps telling me how important these events are.” I remind him. “And I feel perfectly well.”

He’s still muttering to himself, and Henry chuckles, “You’re fighting a losing battle, my dear. There won’t be any reasoning with him – I was the same way when his mother was breeding and we weren’t campaigning.”

“It’s too much stress.” Sinclair agrees. “All the media and the royal family, on top of the crowds.”

“Not to mention your brother.” Henry adds darkly. It’s true that this is the first time I’m going to be encountering all of these people together, but it’s also far from the last. The Yuletide Feast is only the third night of the festival, and we still have four more high profile events to get through before we can relax. Even then it will only be a temporary reprieve – we still have the rest of the campaign to get through.

“I’ll be fine.” I insist. “You don’t have to coddle me.”

Both men raise their eyebrows, as if to say that this isn’t my decision and I absolutely do need to be coddled. Sure enough, Sinclair shakes his head and overrules me. “We’ll come home at the first sign you feel overwhelmed – and that isn’t up for debate.”

I turn away, rolling my eyes when I’m confident they can’t see my face. However as I begin to step towards the door, Sinclair pulls me back against his chest. The big Alpha lowers his lips to my ear, his deep voice like rough velvet. “I saw that, trouble.”

My stomach swoops with excitement and apprehension, and I try to make my voice sound stronger than I feel. “And?” I challenge him. “I’m not scared of you.”

A low chuckle vibrates in his chest, and I feel very overheated all of a sudden. “Liar.” Sinclair croons, petting me affectionately.

I’m only too aware that his father is only a few feet behind us and can hear every word. I feel my cheeks flush with color, but the elder alpha doesn’t seem embarrassed at all.

“Alright you two, we’re going to be late.”

We pile out the door and into the back of the limo, Sinclair effortlessly lifting his father into the seat and stowing his wheelchair in the trunk before joining us. I’m deeply curious to know more about Henry’s relationship with Roger, especially given the way he warned us about his presence. “Do you see Roger often?” I inquire shyly.

Dark clouds seem to pass over the older man’s features. “No, I’m afraid my son has never forgiven me for naming Dominic my heir.”

“I’m sorry, I shouldn’t have asked.” I apologize, realizing how personal the question was.

“Nonsense, you’re family now.” Henry assures me, looking pensive. “I love my son as any father should,” he shares thoughtfully,

“and when you welcome your pup you’ll learn firsthand that children don’t always appreciate what’s best for them. Roger would not have made a good Alpha, and I had to do what was best for the pack as well as him. Neither would have thrived under his leadership, and I haven’t ever regretted passing the role to Dominic one bit. I just wish it had been possible to do the right thing without sewing so much discord in my family.”

“Roger hated me long before you named me as your heir.” Sinclair interjects, and I can see his protective side coming out in response to his father’s sadness. “He’s been after me ever since Mom died, and becoming Alpha wouldn’t have helped our relationship at all. If anything it would have created more problems. He would have mismanaged things and I would have been compelled to challenge him. You did the right thing.”

“Oh I know,” Henry reaches over to pat Sinclair’s shoulder, “I just can’t help thinking that there might have been a better way, I could have handled it differently, including losing your mother.”

“Everything is easy in hindsight.” I offer gently. “And grief blinds us all, there is no right way to handle it. Besides, it sounds like these cards were already on the table from the start. I’m sure you did the best you could – and that’s all any of us can hope for.”

“Thank you Ella.” Henry proclaims, managing a dim smile. “I appreciate that.”

We continue to the fair in peaceful silence, and I find myself staring out the window at all the lavish decorations which were put up around the city yesterday. I was too preoccupied fighting with Sinclair to notice when we departed the festival, but the old town has truly been transformed for the holiday. Lights, greenery, ice sculptures and ornaments abound, glittering almost too brightly against the stark white mounds of fresh snow.

The feast is happening against the backdrop of the Midwinter Fair, and though I wish we had time to explore the carnival, when we arrive reporters and photographers are clamoring around us the moment we exit the car. Sinclair growls at them in warning when they edge too close to me, and though they back off, they remain persistent in their demands for questions and photos. So we head straight to the feast, eager to cross the velvet ropes that will block the clamoring media from the main party.

We have to greet the royal family first, bowing and curtseying to the King, Queen and Prince and making polite conversation – at least, as polite as one can be with political opponents. Afterwards we move to our assigned places at the head table, relieved to have the tense interaction resolved.

Sinclair pulls out my chair, but I can't bring myself to sit down. "Oh no," I gulp, holding my breath when I see a large platter of grilled fish on the table. "Is that fish?"

Sinclair follows my gaze, quickly growling at a waiter. "Can you remove the fish, please?"

"Remove it?" The man blinks, looking back and forth between us. I've got my hand over my mouth, and my face is probably very pale from holding my breath. I'm about to break, needing air but knowing the scent will be terrible.

"Yes, the smell makes Ella sick." Sinclair explains, getting impatient with the man's slowness on the uptake. "Get it out of here, can't you see what it's doing to her?"

It's too late, at that moment I lower my hand, heaving in a gasp of much needed oxygen, and feeling my stomach turn in the very same second. I shake my head, knowing I've probably turned green and whimpering when I feel my gag reflex engage. I take off for the restrooms, knowing if I stay I'll be sick all over the beautiful table.

I can hear Sinclair coming after me, but I race into the bathroom just as another woman is exiting. I can barely hear their confrontation over the sounds of my own retching, but when Sinclair doesn't enter I know the stranger must have insisted he not set foot in the lady's room. Propriety must have won out, but I don't mind – I hate being sick in front of people, especially handsome men who give me butterflies.

The door opens just as a second wave of nausea overtakes me, and I hear high heels clicking across the floor. "Oh you poor dear." A feminine voice sounds behind me, and gentle hands pull the hair back from my face. “There, that’s better.”

“Thank you.” I croak, miserable beyond words.

“Nonsense,” My savior replies. “We she-wolves have to stick together.”

“Well I appreciate it.” I repeat, looking up for the first time. The other woman is beautiful, with short dark hair and bright blue eyes. She’s elegant and sophisticated in a way I’ll never be, and I feel a twinge of shame. I bet this stranger has never done anything as unseemly as vomiting in public – pregnant or not.

“This is your first pup.” She observes kindly, “They’re always the hardest.”

“Do you have any?” I ask, moving towards the sink to rinse out my mouth.

“No,” She frowns, a dark look crossing her features. “I haven’t been so blessed.”

“Oh I’m sorry, it was insensitive of me.” I realize, flushing with embarrassment.

“Don’t worry about it.” She gives me a long, lingering look full of unspoken emotion. “You’re very lucky, you know.” She murmurs meaningfully, then turns and leaves without another word. I can’t help feeling as though I’ve missed something important. It’s only after she’s gone that I realize I never even asked her name.

When I return to the feast, Sinclair stands to greet me, reaching for my waist. “Are you alright?”

“Yes,” I try to summon a smile, “as long as the fish is gone.”

“Do you want to leave?” He asks, stroking my cheek.

I shrug, leaning into his warmth and pressing my face to the curve of his neck. He smells so good, it’s almost enough to make me forget about being ill. His arms come around me reflexively, and I can hear him breathing in my own scent. However rather than purring or humming with contentment like he usually does, his body goes completely stiff. He pulls away from me slightly, his brow furrowing in confusion as he searches my features.

“What’s wrong?” I ask, feeling uneasy. He’s looking at me as if I’ve grown a second head, and I don’t like it one bit.

“You smell like my ex-wife.” Sinclair grits out, his wolf suddenly glowing in his eyes. “You smell like Lydia.”

Chapter 54 – Lydia’s Return

Ella

It takes me a minute to understand what must be happening. The only woman I’ve been near tonight, is the stranger in the restroom. So if I smell like Lydia... that must have been her. It’s no wonder she seemed so mysterious and sad. I feel for her immensely. I know what it’s like to try for years on end to get pregnant with a partner, only for them to succeed with someone else.

Of course, Sinclair didn’t do to her what Mike did to me, they’d been in their struggle together– but it must still hurt. In fact, my pregnancy probably proves the problems they had conceiving were with her, which is devastating for any hopeful mother.

“There was a woman in the restroom.” I tell Sinclair hesitantly. “She helped me, held back my hair.”

“What did she look like?” He demands urgently.

“Dark hair, blue eyes, tall and willowy.” In fact she was my opposite in just about every way, right down to her perfectly manicured nails and custom designer shoes.

Before I can say any more, Sinclair turns and disappears into the crowd, scanning the feast for signs of his ex. My heart falls, faster and harder than I could have believed possible. I can’t believe how painful it is to see him running after her this way, obviously desperate to find her. One mention of Lydia and I might as well not exist. I feel like crumpling in on myself, though I don’t have any right to feel jilted. I’ve known the score from the beginning – Sinclair never pretended otherwise. So why does it hurt so much?

“You should get off your feet.” Henry says kindly, urging me to take my seat. “You still look very pale.” I follow his gesture obediently, not sure how much longer my legs will support me. Sinclair is out of sight now, no doubt chasing down his true mate to convince her to come back to him. I can’t seem to conjure up any words or coherent thoughts, I’m slowly being crushed beneath the weight of my disappointment.

I’m cursing myself for being so silly, for getting my hopes up when I knew better. It’s obvious now I’ve been lying to myself about my feelings for Sinclair, or this wouldn’t be so agonizing. At the same time, It’s irrefutable proof that I was right not to get involved with him. I was right to try and protect myself – even though I failed. I can’t imagine how much worse this would be if I’d actually started a relationship with him.

Stop this, the little voice in my head scolds. You’re overreacting, he just went after her, you have no idea what he’s thinking.

You’re assuming the worst because you expect to be let down.

I expect it with good reason. I reply bitterly. I learned the hard way, remember?

Sinclair is different. She insists. He's special and he cares about you.

He cares about the pup. I correct her. He's protective of me for its sake and he might be grateful to me for carrying it, but I'll never be a she-wolf. I'll never be in his league and we both know it.

That's your insecurity talking, not your brain. Think of the way he compliments you! You're more than just a surrogate to him. She presses.

And the moment I deliver this baby, I guarantee I'll cease to warrant his attention. I predict grimly. Just you wait and see.

Before my conscience can reply there's movement in my periphery, and a new voice joins the conversation.

"I tried to warn you." Roger appears as if from nowhere, but he obviously saw what happened. "I told you she would always come first to Dominic."

"Roger, that isn't fair." Henry rumbles beside me, giving his eldest son a disapproving glare.

"Oh hello, Father." Roger quips, turning his attention to the former Alpha. "It's been too long – I'm surprised you still remember my name."

"That's your own doing." Henry answers fiercely. "I still call you every week though you never pick up the phone. I'd be thrilled to see you any time you like."

I feel a rush of sympathy for Sinclair's father. I might not be a parent yet, but I know that I already love my baby more than I thought possible. I hate to think of how badly being rejected by him would sting – no matter how old he gets. Most parents would probably give up after a while, to save themselves the pain if nothing else. It speaks volumes that Henry has never stopped trying to be in his son's life, and I'm glad that Sinclair learned how to be a father from him. I might not ever have my feelings for Sinclair returned, but I know my baby will always have his father's love and protection. That's certainly more than I could have said for Mike, and more than many women get from their partners.

However Roger clearly doesn't feel any sense of gratitude for his father's dedication. Instead he turns his nose up in disgust,

"You clearly let that injury steal your dignity as well as your mobility. No true Alpha would shamelessly chase after someone who clearly didn't want to be around them."

“No true father would let a bitter child push him away without a fight either.” Henry growls back, showing a glimmer of his former strength. “Like it or not, I will always be there for you – even and especially when you don’t want me to be.”

“That’s called smothering.” Roger complains, curling his lip.

“It’s called parenting.” Henry counters coolly. “And if I didn’t teach you that well enough then I’m relieved you don’t have pups of your own.”

“Please don’t fight.” I cut in. I hate disagreements, especially between men. That’s another lesson I learned the hard way – men are dangerous when they lose their tempers. In fact, it’s amazing that I’m not more frightened of Sinclair’s temper– given how intimidating he is. Maybe it’s because he’s always so in control, but somehow I know in my heart that he wouldn’t ever raise a hand against me. The more I think about it, the more I realize that I can’t recall ever trusting anyone the way I trust Sinclair. That must be the pup’s influence too, he’s bonded with Sinclair and knows he isn’t a threat, so I don’t fear him either.

“I’m sorry, Ella.” Henry proclaims swiftly. “You’re right, it’s the holidays, we shouldn’t be arguing like this, especially not in front of you.”

“I’m sorry too.” Roger concedes, though he doesn’t sound it. “I simply thought you might need a friendly ear, what with Dom taking off on you.”

“He didn’t take off, he simply went to investigate.” Henry sighs, sounding as though he’d like to scold his son some more and is holding back for my sake.

“Investigate what?” Roger scoffs. “He knows it was Lydia in the restroom with Ella, and he knows she wouldn’t be here if she wasn’t still interested in him. If he went after her, it’s because he wants to see her. He chose her over Ella, just like he always will.”

Henry, who doesn’t have the first clue that Dominic and I aren’t really mates, looks outraged in my honor. “Why in the Goddess’s name would you say such a thing?”

“Because it’s true.” Roger states simply. “I’m not going to lie to Ella like the rest of you. Dominic and Lydia are fated, their bond is more powerful than anything they’ll ever share with another.”

Henry shakes his head. “Then why did she leave? Why did Dominic let her go?”

“Because she thought he couldn’t give her children and he believed it too, he wanted better for her so he didn’t go after her. But now it’s clear he can father pups, they can try again.” Roger surmises, gesturing to my middle.

“They weren’t right for each other.” Henry argues. “And though you don’t want to hear it, she wasn’t right for you either.”

“We were in love – every bit as in love as Ella and Dominic, but as soon as their bond kicked in, none of that mattered.” Roger reminds the other man. “The Goddess doesn’t make mistakes.”

I want to protest, to correct him and attest that Sinclair and I aren’t in love, or tell Henry that he doesn’t have to defend me this way. I want to scream that it’s all just a sham for the campaign – just to make them stop talking about it. It’s no longer the disagreement I mind, I just can’t stand to be reminded of how little I mean to Sinclair over and over like this.

I can see that Roger is biased, but I also feel for him. He lost his mother, he grew up in his younger brother’s shadow and lost his birthright and his chosen mate to him. He was clearly scarred by those experiences, and part of me agrees that Dominic shouldn’t have gotten involved with his brother’s ex – fated or not. Maybe Roger is trying to manipulate me, or maybe he really is trying to help – either way, he isn’t lying. Lydia and Sinclair are bonded in a way I will never be with any man – least of all the father of my child.

Before anyone can say another word, I turn on my heel and walk out.

Chapter 55 – Sinclair Catches Up with His Ex

Sinclair

It doesn't take me long to catch up with Lydia. Once I caught her scent on Ella, it was easy to track her through the fair. I leave the feast pavilion and set off into the twinkling lights, finally spotting her in front of one of the food stalls near the snow maze.

She's standing in line for mulled wine, and she looks exactly like she did the last time I saw her.

I wait for the familiar tug on my heartstrings, for our bond to trigger my wolf – to hear him chanting mine in my head the way he does with Ella. But it never comes. I don't feel compelled to claim her, or even to approach her. If it weren't for the fact that she'd been sniffing around Ella and my pup, I wouldn't even consider going near her. I'm amazed to realize that – after all this time –

I'm finally free of her influence. I'm finally over her, and she no longer holds any power over me.

When did that happen? I wonder. The last time I saw her was over a year ago, and though I hadn't felt anything like affection for her, my wolf had still recognized our mate just like always. There was chemistry between us even though I'd wanted nothing to do with her. Then again, maybe the fact that I felt so much animosity for her then was evidence of lingering feelings. I can honestly say I feel nothing for her now, and that seems much more final than when I still held our past against her.

Taking a steadying breath, I approach. Lydia turns to face me when I'm still a few paces away, and she gasps in surprise.

"Dominic!"

I feel my hackles raise instinctively. I don't believe her show of surprise for one moment. She obviously knew I was here because she helped Ella in the bathroom, and my scent was all over the little human. In fact, knowing Lydia, she'd probably approached Ella in order to engineer this exact situation. I'm annoyed with myself for playing into her hands – but I also couldn't do otherwise.

A jealous female is a threat to a breeding she-wolf, especially when the title of Luna is on the line.

"What are you doing here, Lydia?" I demand coolly, not bothering to greet her.

"Oh come now, Dominic, is that any way to greet your mate?" Lydia smiles, batting her lashes.

“Don’t do that,” I growl. “We haven’t been mates for a long time now, and I know you approached Ella – what are you up to?”

“We might not be married anymore but we’ll always be mates, whether you like it or not.” She reminds me, her smile dimming but not disappearing. “And I was curious. I heard you found a new Luna and I wanted to see my replacement for myself.”

“Ella isn’t your replacement.” I bite back, “She’s nothing to do with you at all.”

“She is a pretty little thing, I’ll give you that.” Lydia sneers in return, flashing her fangs. “But she seems awfully meek for your taste. I thought you liked strong she-wolves, not frail damsels who are afraid of their own shadows.”

“I’m not going to talk to you about my mate, or dignify your comments with a response.” I declare icily. “Where’s your new husband anyway, surely you didn’t come all this way alone?”

“Oh, Sloan is back in the Bloodbane pack. He doesn’t like to travel.” She answers boredly.

“Does he know you’re here?” I inquire, wondering if things are sour enough between them that he doesn’t care, or if she’s sneaking around behind his back. I don’t know an Alpha alive who would allow his Luna to go visit her ex alone, even if they were in an unhappy relationship – it would look too bad for his reputation.

“He knows what he needs to know and no more.” She answers archly, confirming my suspicions.

“You can’t honestly tell me you were willing to go to all this trouble just to get a look at Ella.” I counter. “What are you up to?”

She laughs humorlessly. “I guess the damsel act works, you were never this protective of me.”

“Of course I was.” I hiss. “I loved you with all my heart – even after I realized you only married me for my title.”

Lydia pretends to look offended. “How can you say that, we were fated.”

“Fate didn’t matter to you until after my father named me his heir.” I recall, “remind me, how many years did you stay with Roger after figuring out I was your true mate? And how long did it take you to leave him after realizing he’d never be Alpha?” I don’t need her to answer me. I know the dates like the back of my hand. Roger never realized it, but our bond presented itself when I was just sixteen – two years before my father named me his successor. Lydia broke my brother's heart the very next day. I knew it then, but I was young and foolish. My wolf had been pining after my mate for so long then that I would have done anything to be with her. I couldn't see her for the scheming social climber she is – but I do now.

"You're right." She simpers. "I wasted too many years on him hoping to become Luna. I should have listened to my wolf from the beginning. Maybe if I'd gone to you when the bond first appeared we would have had children and we could have avoided all this drama."

"Or maybe we'd be in exactly the same place we are now." I counter. I wish I could tell her how easy it had been for Ella to conceive with me. That even after the damage Mike did to her ovaries, one simple insemination had done the trick when years of trying hadn't gotten Lydia and I anywhere. I might point it out if I didn't think it was so cruel. For all her faults, Lydia had always wanted pups, and I know better than anyone how much it hurt her not to conceive.

"No." She frowns. "I obviously gave up on you too quickly. I blamed you for our fertility struggles but I was wrong. I think we deserve another chance."

Oh. Of course, now it all makes sense. She's back because she knows I'm not sterile, but she still can't conceive with her husband. "Go home, Lydia." I grit out. "Go back to your husband. You're still young. It wasn't in the cards for us, but it obviously can be with other people. Ella proves that."

"You know she's not strong enough to be your Luna." Lydia whispers in an undertone, looking up at me from beneath her lashes.

"Keep her as a plaything if you like, but don't put her in charge. If you care about her you wouldn't subject her to that pressure.

Let me come back, we can keep trying and if it doesn't work I'll even adopt her pup as my own."

It takes all my willpower not to reel back in shock. I always knew Lydia was calculating and power-hungry, but I didn't think she'd go to this length. I don't even believe this is all about Ella – except that Ella finally gave the Alpha counsel and the allied packs enough confidence in my ability as King to get me elected. Is Lydia here because she thinks I can give her a child after all, or because I might be king after all? Maybe it's both – but either way, she isn't here for me.

Ella isn't here for me either, but her dedication to our baby is undeniable. I know she'd do anything for our child, and I've never seen that kind of emotion in Lydia. Ella has more love in her little finger than Lydia does in her entire body, and that's the mother I want for my son.

"You're out of your mind." I tell her bleakly. "You can't honestly believe I would ever take you back after you walked out on me.

You're the reason I might lose this campaign, and that puts the entire realm at risk. You should have stayed for that duty alone."

"I wanted more than duty, Dominic." She argues, puffing out her lips into a pout. "Is that so wrong?"

"You wanted power." I correct. "You've always wanted power, but never the responsibility that comes along with it."

"You're wrong." She insists. "And I'm going to prove it to you, I'm going to win you back, Dom!"

"You're not, because I'm happier with Ella than I've ever been." I'm amazed to realize I'm telling the truth. We're not even together, but I feel like I've finally found the partner I've been looking for in life. Even if nothing ever happens between us, I know we'll be good parents together, and lifelong friends to boot. I might wish we could be more, but I'm satisfied just having Ella in my life. As I think this, I turn away from Lydia, wondering why I ever let her drag me away from my heart's true desire.

"I'm not going to leave, Dominic." Lydia says to my back, and I can hear other shifters murmuring around us. Our conversation is clearly private no longer, and I regret coming after her. "I'm not going to give up on you."

"I've made my decision, Lydia." I counter, turning away again. "Deal with it."

My good mood only lasts until I get back to the feast table, where I find my father and no sign whatsoever of my little troublemaker. "Where's Ella?"

My father sighs, looking tired and forlorn. "She left."

Chapter 56 – Ella Gets Her Hopes Up.

Sinclair

I stare at my father, not comprehending his words. “What do you mean she left?”

“Well you took off and your brother came along and started whispering in her ear about Lydia and picking arguments with me.”

Dad explains pointedly. “I wasn’t surprised when Ella walked away – the poor thing clearly doesn’t like conflict. I thought maybe she’d just gone back to the restroom, but she hasn’t come back and I haven’t seen hide nor hair of her since.”

“Damnit.” I swear, dragging a hand through my hair and looking around. I don’t see the guards I specially assigned to her, and I can only hope that they’re with her – not searching for her too.

“What were you thinking, running off that way?” My father scolds.

“I had to make sure Lydia wasn’t a threat to her or the pup.” I grit out, wondering just how much damage my impulsivity has done. Between leaving Ella alone, publicly arguing with Lydia and now preparing to walk out before the feast has truly kicked off, it’s entirely possible that I’ve hurt my campaign – not to mention the mother of my pup.

“I understand that but you must know how that looked to Ella.” My father sighs. “And Roger didn’t help.”

“What did he say to her?” I demand, more harshly than I intended.

“About what you’d expect.” Dad grimaces. “That Lydia came back to try to mend bridges and you would dump Ella in a heartbeat to get back together with your fated mate.”

A low growl tears through my chest, and I’ve half a mind to go track down my treacherous brother and make him eat his words.

However my wolf won’t allow that. He’s demanding we see to Ella first – her welfare is more important than punishing Roger.

I make my excuses to the King and Queen, using Ella’s illness as an excuse. No one could fault me for caring for my breeding mate rather than furthering my campaign, and Dad and I return to the limo without much objection. The driver confirms he took Ella home a little while ago, but I won’t relax until I can talk with her.

When I get home, my rooms are empty, and I know it’s a bad sign if Ella is sleeping in her own bed. She only ever does this if she’s unhappy with me or – Goddess forbid, in need of privacy to relieve our sexual tension. Still, after the night we've had I doubt there's much danger of the latter, so I make my way to her rooms without hesitation.

I enter without knocking, finding Ella curled beneath her covers but wide awake. She sits up when I enter, her golden eyes wide.

"You're home already?"

"You didn't think I'd stay after you left, did you?" I inquire, coming to sit on the edge of her mattress.

"I don't know." She shrugs. "I wasn't sure you'd notice I was gone." She winces almost as soon as the words are out of her mouth. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean that – I sound like a spoiled child."

"Don't apologize." I admonish, "not for sharing your feelings."

"But they're so petty." She whispers, flushing bright red.

"You're allowed to be petty every now and then." I tease, brushing the hair back from her face. "it's the least I can offer when you're giving me a baby. What you're not allowed – is to run off without telling anyone where you're going." I continue sternly.

Ella peeks up at me from beneath her lashes. It's amazing how different she and Lydia can seem even when wearing the same expression. Lydia had adopted this look to try and manipulate me, but Ella's shyness is entirely genuine. "You asked me if I wanted to leave, but then you disappeared before I could answer."

"Uh-huh," I hum, sliding my hand around to her nape. I close my hand around the back of her neck, massaging her tense muscles with my thumb. "You don't really think I'm going to let you get away with that, do you?"

"I took the guards with me!" Ella protests, clearly knowing she was in the wrong, but attempting to push her luck. "I didn't break any rules!"

"But you didn't tell anyone where you went." I reply. "My father was really worried about you, and so was I."

"Oh." She frowns, looking truly guilt-stricken. "I'm sorry, that's not what I wanted."

"What did you want?" I press, encouraging her to lean her weight against me.

"I just wanted to get out of there." Ella murmurs, leaning her head against my shoulder.

“Is that really all? You weren’t angry at me? Trying to punish me for leaving you alone?” I suggest, trailing my hand up and down the curve of her spine.

“Not consciously.” Ella reasons, “I just felt overwhelmed, you were gone and Roger and your Dad were arguing, I didn’t know what else to do.”

“And I suppose it didn’t have anything to do with the things Roger said to you about Lydia?” I inquire.

“He didn’t tell me anything that wasn’t true.” Ella remarks, repeating a sentiment very close to the one she’d shared the first time Roger sought her out. I hadn’t cared for her acceptance of his warnings then, and I certainly don’t now, given everything that’s happened between us.

“Oh yeah, like what?” I probe, overflowing with suspicion.

“That you two are fated and I’ll never have that bond with you. He’s not wrong.” She answers blithely. Despite her casual tone, I can see the tension behind her eyes. Perhaps it truly doesn’t bother her but she understands he was out of line, or maybe she cares more than she’s letting on. Is it terrible of me to hope for the latter? To hope she’s sad about this painful truth?

“We’ve talked about this once before, he shouldn’t be saying those things to you – he was trying to be hurtful.” I clarify, wishing I hadn’t been so thoughtless as to leave her alone and vulnerable to his interference.

“Or maybe he was just hurt.” Ella suggests, using a tone I haven’t heard before.

“What do you mean?” I ask.

Ella pulls away from me, though not by much. “Look, I don’t want to get in between you two, and I know you’re right. He lashes out at everything and everyone... but he does it the way a wounded animal does... I can’t help but feel sorry for him.”

My mind reels and I try to keep my wolf calm. Ella sympathizing with Roger bothers me more than I’d like to admit. I love that she has such a big heart, but she doesn’t know even a fraction of his misdeeds, let alone what I suspect about his recent scheming. I guarantee she wouldn’t be feeling sorry for him if she knew he might be behind her attack, or helping the Prince to keep me from winning the throne.

Ella leans closer to me when she feels my muscles tense, and damned if it isn’t effective. It’s very difficult for me to stay in a bad mood when her soft curves are pressed up against me. “He hasn’t gotten what he wanted out of life and he might be wrong to blame others for his misfortunes... but I know what it’s like to be denied that way.” She continues, clearly feeling the need to explain herself.

At once I understand what Ella means. She sees something of herself in Roger, though she fails to grasp the core differences between them. Roger has let his misfortunes twist and corrupt him into a wolf without integrity or morals, whereas Ella has stayed pure of heart no matter what challenges she faced – and I guarantee they were considerably greater than my brother's.

"You did once, not anymore." I correct fiercely, taking her chin and forcing her to hold my gaze. "From here on out you're going to get what you want, Ella. I won't see the mother of my pup denied happiness."

Adorably, Ella places her hands over her ears, as if she might block out the sound of my voice. "Don't! Please don't." She pleads.

"I don't want to get my hopes up, it will just hurt all the more when they fall through."

At once I'm furious with a world that has conditioned her to think this way. I wish I could go back in time and find her when she was a young girl, to take her under my wing and protect her from the cruelties she's faced. I know she wouldn't be the same woman today without them, but I still wish I could spare her the pain.

"Listen to me very carefully, Ella." I instruct, staring into the brilliant pools of her golden eyes, "I'm going to do whatever I can to ensure your hopes aren't ever dashed again. I can't promise you'll never be disappointed, but you have my word that if it's in my power to give you what you want, you'll have it."

"I don't trust this." Ella confesses, not meeting my gaze. "It sounds too good to be true." She slowly raises her eyes to mine, taking a deep breath as she summons her courage. "You sound too good to be true."

"Then I guess I'll just have to prove myself to you, won't I?" I grin, grazing my knuckles over her cheek.

She shakes her head. "I don't need you to be anything more than you already are, just please don't tell me to wish for the moon when I can't even reach the sky."

"That's because you've been reaching on your own all this time." I inform her gently. "It doesn't have to be that way."

"No?" Ella questions, her eyes shuttering. "Then maybe you'd like to tell me what Lydia had to say when you found her?"

Too late I realize I pushed too hard, I promised too much, and Ella is calling me on it. I need to make a decision and fast. Do I tell her the truth and make her fear for our future with our baby, or do I shield her from Lydia's intentions and protect her peace of mind?

Chapter 57 – Sinclair Makes Progress

Ella

I'm holding my breath for the second time this evening, though this time it isn't to save myself from any bad smells or illness.

Now I'm waiting to see if Sinclair will be honest with me about his ex-wife, or if he'll let me down again with another lie. In truth I'm expecting him to disappoint me, though I don't believe he has bad intentions. On the contrary, I think he's much too determined to protect me – but he's very mistaken if he thinks keeping me in the dark is going to make me safer. If anything it will put me more at risk. I don't want to be blindsided again, and after what happened with Mike I feel especially sensitive about dishonesty – however well intentioned.

He sighs, and drops his hands from my face. His green eyes bore into me, and a muscle flutters in his cheek, betraying his agitation over the evening's events. "Roger wasn't entirely wrong. Lydia is back because she wants us to try again."

For a moment I'm so surprised he actually admitted this that I can't speak. At the same time, my heart sinks and swells. It hurts me to know this information, but I'm touched and impressed that Sinclair confided in me. He really does seem to be trying to do better and communicate more, and I appreciate it immensely. As I work through my conflicting feelings I gradually wrap my mind around his words. "Try again." I repeat. "For a baby, or as mates?"

"Both." Sinclair answers simply, shaking his head. "But it's not going to happen."

I blink, "Why not?"

"There's a reason I didn't go after Lydia when she left." Sinclair growls, a dark look overtaking his features. "She might have walked out, but our marriage was over for a long time by then."

"But I thought..." I trail off, remembering Sinclair and Roger's conflicting statements about mates. Roger made it sound like fated couples shared a love deeper than any ocean and no chosen bond could ever compete, but Sinclair described things differently.

He said that he and Lydia hadn't been good for one another, that some chosen couples were happier than fated ones. "You're fated," I finally continue, wondering if I'm asking this because I believe it, or because I'm afraid of the possibility. "Don't you love her?"

The corner of his mouth twitches up into a sad smile, and for a moment I can imagine the boy he once was. I can imagine a young Sinclair diving headfirst into love without any fear at all – driven by his strength and innate confidence. Now he looks as though he learned his lesson the hard way, and though some bitterness remains, there's also acceptance.

"Sometimes I think the Goddess fates some couples because they have to go through the experience in order to become the person they're destined to be, not because she intends them to stay together forever, or even that they're well suited to each other." Sinclair explains thoughtfully. "Sometimes they might be sent to test a chosen couple's bond, or even to break your heart."

There's always a larger plan, though it's hard to accept that the painful parts of life serve any purpose other than tormenting you."

"I actually think that's a comforting idea." I reply, thinking of my own relationships. "I've never believed in fate or destiny before..."

but I'd much rather think that I spent all those years with Mike for a reason I don't yet understand, than believe it was all just a waste – that it was all for nothing."

Sinclair does smile now, pressing his hand to my belly. "That's right. If it wasn't for him, you never would have conceived this baby." His eyes sparkle with mischief, and his grin turns positively canine. "Though I'd still like to let my wolf have a go at him."

"You didn't answer me, you know." I point out, covering his hand with my own and wishing I could feel our child's emotions the way Sinclair does. "You didn't say whether you still love Lydia."

Sinclair makes a low rumbling sound, "I don't want to talk about Lydia anymore. I just want to be here with you and this little one."

I pull my hand away, sensing I've crossed a line. It worries me that he won't answer me, but I prefer his silence over untruths or empty platitudes. Besides, he told me he wasn't going to get back together with Lydia, and I don't feel confident enough with him to press my luck on the matter. I know the look of a man who's said all he's going to say on a subject, and if I keep pushing he'll just double down. There will be time to talk about her more in the future.

Sinclair, meanwhile, is gazing at all the bedding piled around my body. "It's only eight o'clock." He reminds me, his brow wrinkling with concern when he realizes I'm still wearing my feast dress. "Were you too exhausted to change?"

I flush. "No, I was just really cold after the festival. I couldn't feel my fingers or toes."

He tsks, grazing his knuckles over my cheek. "Poor baby, do you feel better now?"

“I did,” I answer, tilting my chin up and shooting him an accusing stare. “Until you came and untucked me.”

His wolfish smile is back, the one that makes me feel like I need to lock myself behind a closed door before he huffs and puffs and blows my house down to devour me. Suddenly the goosebumps covering my arms have nothing to do with the cold air, and everything to do with the predator in front of me.

“Then let’s warm you up.” Sinclair purrs, just before he pounces.

I squeak and cry out as he joins me beneath the covers, and though I’m not sure why, I immediately try to wriggle away. I know he just plans on snuggling with me, but the little voice in my head pushes me to give chase, and my human instincts don’t need any encouragement to run from the big bad wolf. Of course Sinclair catches me easily, tickling and playfully wrestling until I’m giggling uncontrollably.

I barely notice when he strips off my dress, and I don’t complain when he removes his own clothes either. Soon we’re both in our underwear, and my entire body is surrounded by Sinclair on all sides. The blankets are over our heads, and all I can see is the dim glow of his green eyes. “I thought the idea was to warm up.” I say, laughter still filling my voice.

“Body heat needs skin to skin contact to work.” He smirks – I can’t see it, but I hear it in his voice as clear as a bell. “Don’t they teach you humans anything in school?”

“I dunno,” I muse suspiciously. “I think you just like having me naked. I think maybe I should go climb into a nice hot bath instead of letting you take advantage this way.”

Sinclair makes a low grumbly sound that sends delicious shivers down my spine. “First of all, you aren’t naked, not yet anyway.”

He counters, his words a sultry promise. “Second, baths are dangerous business, I think you might need supervision.”

“Dangerous?” I scoff, still giggling.

“Mmm,” He confirms gravely. “Slips and falls, drowning, bath snakes – you definitely need a lifeguard.”

My cheeks hurt from smiling, but I can’t seem to stop. “Did you say bath snakes?”

“Oh yes, we get whole infestations in these parts, they’re terribly venomous.” Sinclair replies, still sounding very somber and serious.

I love this playful side of him, even though this is all starting to get a bit too close to the romantic territory I'm desperately trying to avoid entering. The only reason I can handle this is because it's dark and he's behaving himself. If I have to see him undressed – feel the heat of his gaze on my own body or goddess forbid if he decides to help me wash and starts touching me – I'll be a goner. The idea is incredibly enticing, but I have to stay strong, I can't fall for this man.

A spark of inspiration strikes me then, "But if you're playing lifeguard, who's going to feed me dinner. You know I left the feast without eating?"

Sinclair stills, and I can tell my words did the trick. He might be enjoying flirting, but I know his instincts won't allow him to let me go unfed. I've learned that he considers it his duty as an alpha and the father of my child to make sure the baby and I have enough to eat, and the only way I ever get away with skipping a meal is if I'm sick. "And I lost my afternoon snack at the feast." I remind him.

Sinclair growls, "You're a clever little minx, you know that?"

"You've mentioned it once or twice." I murmur, wondering if he can see my blush.

"Alright, you go have your bath." He sighs, his wonderful heat leaving me as he untangles our bodies and rises from the bed.

"When you're warm and clean I'll have dinner waiting, just be careful." He drops a kiss to my temple and strides out of the room.

"Watch out for snakes."

Once he's gone I flop down on the bed and exhale deeply. "I am in so much trouble."

Chapter 58 – Damage Control

Ella

On the fourth day of the festival we wake to headlines about Lydia's reappearance in Moon Valley. I'm just coming out of the bathroom following my morning bout of vomiting, when I find Sinclair standing in the doorway, glaring at the newspaper. I startle slightly, not expecting to see him in my rooms. I left his bed only half an hour ago, and wasn't planning on seeing him again until breakfast. I'm not sure what's on the front page of the paper, but it must be bad if it couldn't wait.

He glances up at me, frowning deeply. "I thought I asked you to tell me when you feel ill."

"Dominic, it's happening so often now that it would be impossible to tell you every time, and it's not as if I have a lot of warning when it comes on." I argue, though this isn't the full truth. As much as his presence and gentle hands soothe me, I still find it horribly embarrassing to be sick in front of him, and I avoid informing him whenever possible.

Sinclair narrows his eyes, but before he can call me out for bending the truth I cross the distance between us. "What's going on?"

He shows me the paper, which is dominated by a large black and white photo of Sinclair and Lydia by the snow maze. The headlines are in bold black lettering above the image. Trouble in Paradise? Former Luna Returns to Reclaim her Mate.

My eyes widen in shock, and I quickly scan the article. While the media had been kept away from the main feast, they clearly hadn't been barred from the rest of the fair. Worse, it seems like they overheard most or all of Sinclair's confrontation with Lydia.

Though Moon Valley Alpha Dominic Sinclair seems to have won the lottery with his second chance mate, Ella Correntin, his attention wasn't on his bride-to-be at the annual Yuletide Feast in Oldtown. Instead the prospective King was seen chasing his ex-wife Lydia Davis – now of the Bloodbane pack – through the fair, causing his pregnant mate to walk out of the event in protest. Onlookers report that the two engaged in a heated conversation wherein Lydia professed her desire to mend bridges with the Alpha, claiming she still loves him and that his second chance mate isn't strong enough to lead the Moon Valley Pack, let alone the Kingdom. Though Sinclair rejected her advances, Lydia fiercely declared she wasn't going to give up on him, leaving many to wonder if the fated pair might be able to repair their relationship.

"They're all like this." He shares, tension lacing his words. "Every paper and tabloid is some version of this. Fucking Lydia probably planted the story herself, given the way they left out the pieces that might make her look bad."

Guilt washes over me as I realize how leaving the festival must have looked to onlookers, especially given this information. "I'm so sorry I left." I murmur. "I didn't think, I should have stuck it out and waited for you to come back."

Sinclair frowns down at me. "What are you talking about?"

"It makes it look like I was angry with you and we're on the rocks." I explain, my pulse fluttering.

"Ella, none of this is your fault." Sinclair promises. "If anyone is to blame it's me for arguing with her in public, and Lydia for turning up to cause trouble in the first place."

"But –" I try to object.

"I said it isn't your fault, and I meant it." Sinclair interrupts, placing his pointer finger against my lips.

"Is this going to hurt the campaign?" I ask, though it comes out rather muddled since his finger is still pressed to my mouth.

"It's a hiccup." Sinclair states simply, "We'll do some damage control at the festival tonight. I'll invite a few trusted reporters and make a statement refuting all this, but the more important part is that we put on a good show. We'll look so happy and in love that everyone will forget this ever happened."

"Okay." I nod, trying to steady my nerves. "And it's wassailing tonight, right? So all we have to do is drink and sing carols and enjoy the fair."

"Right," he confirms.

"I wish I could really drink." I lament. "I could use a bit of liquid courage tonight."

"You have nothing to worry about." Sinclair croons. "I know it makes you nervous but you always do beautifully at these events."

"When I stay at them long enough to participate, you mean?" I correct him, still regretting my decision to run out yesterday.

"You're growing the pack a prince," Sinclair smiles, "you get a free pass when it comes to all these public responsibilities. In case you've forgotten I was voting for you to stay home entirely until you convinced me otherwise."

"I should have let you coddle me after all." I sigh, "we could have avoided all this."

Sinclair gathers me to his chest, hugging me tightly. "I'm glad to see you're learning that I'm always right." He teases.

Groaning, I try to squirm out of his hold – much good that it does. "You know I regretted it the moment I said it."

"I'm not going to let you forget it, either." Sinclair chuckles.

I laugh, ceasing my struggles and submitting to his petting. "Bossy wolf."

When we arrive at the festival, the media descends almost immediately. Cameras are flashing before we even exit the car.

Sinclair wraps a protective arm around my shoulders, growling softly when the reporters get too close, and eventually they back off, realizing they'll be endangering more than their careers if they invade my space.

"Alpha, do you have any comment about the reports regarding your ex-wife?" One of the reporter's asks, shoving a microphone forward.

"I'll tell you what I told Lydia last night," Sinclair begins coolly. "That I'm happier with Ella than I ever was with her, and there's not a snowball's chance in hell that I would ever take back someone who walked out on their pack when they needed them most.

There's no love lost between us, but I have no respect for a Luna who abandons her responsibilities as a leader."

The reporter murmur and exchange glances, and suddenly the microphone is pointing to me. "Ella, how do you feel about Lydia's accusations that you're not strong enough to be the Alpha's mate?"

I lean into Sinclair, trying to draw on his own raw power to give myself the confidence I need. "I think that Lydia is obviously the kind of woman who believes there's only one way to lead, and one way to be strong. If she believes that compassion and kindness are signs of weakness, well – I think that says more about her than it says about me."

Sinclair leans down, dropping his lips to my ear. "You're too humble." He rumbles affectionately, making me blush. "You ought to tell them how fearlessly you braved those bath snakes yesterday."

I can barely contain my laughter, grinning up at him and whispering, "I can't say that."

Sinclair's cheeks split into a wide smile, and he kisses the tip of my nose before turning back to the clamoring paparazzi, “trust me, gentlemen, this one stands up to me on a daily basis. She might come in a sweet package but she’s got nerves of steel.”

I’m blushing again, but the reporters are eating it up. They’re wearing the ravening expression of hungry jackals, and I suspect they’re thrilled to be getting this on tape. I can already predict the waves this will make – when Sinclair looks at me the way he is now I feel like I’m the center of his universe, and I know it’s all an act. To outsiders it will be beyond convincing. “Is there anything you would tell Lydia, if you could, Ella?”

“I would tell her that if she cares about her life she’ll stay away from my mate.” I growl, surprising myself with my own ferocity.

Where on earth did that come from? “And that the next time she wants to get a look at me she can introduce herself directly, rather than sneaking up on a breeding woman while she’s suffering morning sickness.”

This last statement causes a near frenzy, and Sinclair growls again. I watch as the crowd covers instinctively, tucking their proverbial tails between their legs. “When did this happen?”

“Last night.” Sinclair answers darkly. “Why else do you think I went after her, or that Ella left? We’ve all seen what jealous she-wolves can do at the best of times, and I don’t take threats to my family lightly.” While the crowd immediately begins clamoring for more information, Sinclair raises a hand to forestall them. “Now, I’m going to take my beautiful mate and get lost in the snow maze.” He announces, squeezing my waist. “And don’t be surprised if she’s seeing stars when we come out again.”

Hearty chuckles rise from our audience and though I assumed Sinclair was joking, I quickly learn quite the opposite. He spends the rest of the evening kissing and caressing me for all to see, and by the time we get back to the house I think I’m so turned on that I think I’ll go crazy if I don’t find a release. Unfortunately there’s no chances for that tonight because Sinclair takes me to bed almost as soon as we walk through the door. For the first time I seriously consider throwing in the towel and simply asking him to have sex with me, even though I know it’s just my libido talking. The little voice in my head is whining with need, and I find myself hungrily watching Sinclair as he climbs into bed beside me.

Can I really do this?

Chapter 59 – Dream Date

Ella

In the end my exhaustion saves me. I hadn't realized how tiring the evening was, but the added pressure of putting on our show for the reporters must have taken more of a toll than I expected. I fall asleep almost as soon as my head hits the pillow, but as fate would have it, I can't even escape Sinclair in my dreams tonight.

I know I'm dreaming from the very start. I'm still in Sinclair's bed, but it's no longer in his opulent mansion. It's in the middle of a starlit forest, with nothing but trees and wilderness surrounding it as far as the eye can see. I'm wearing a simple white negligee – more evidence that this isn't real, I don't own anything like it. A cool breeze flutters over my skin, carrying the scent of evergreens and moss, rich amber and... Sinclair. I would know that scent anywhere, even though I can't see him yet.

He appears slowly, moving towards me through the darkness, his green eyes glowing through the trees. He's wearing nothing but a pair of simply black slacks, and for the first time I don't feel shy about appreciating his gorgeous physique. I've always averted my eyes when he undresses in front of me, not that this prevents me from feeling his muscles or the huge member between his legs when our bodies are pressed up against each other in bed. But now I look my fill, raking my eyes over the rugged planes of his face and the contours of his chest. His tall frame is padded with muscles most human men can only dream about – some of which I didn't even know existed.

"Hello beautiful," Sinclair greets me huskily, prowling closer with every ragged breath I take, his naked torso gleaming in the moonlight. "Didn't you get enough of me when you were awake?"

"How could I?" I pout, feeling completely face to express my sullen mood. "You teased me all night long and I haven't had any relief. It's torture!"

"It's not easy for me either." He murmurs sympathetically, crawling up onto the big bed. He moves with such lethal grace, crawling over the plush covers until he's close enough to reach out and touch me, which he immediately does. He lies on his side, encouraging me to come rest in the protective circle of his arms. I don't resist. I slide into his embrace as easily as I breathe, feeling completely at home with this dangerous man wrapped around me. It seems strange to think he terrified me a month ago, now he's my safe space.

"It's not the same." I insist, looking over at him from beneath my lashes.

"Why not?" Sinclair asks, brushing the hair back from my face.

“You don’t know the effect you have on me ” I confess, pressing a bit closer. I might be asleep but my breasts are still aching, and my sex is swollen and dripping with need. It’s rather freeing to be able to rub myself against Sinclair without fear of embarrassment or worries over opening a can of worms.

“Tell me,” He growls, his voice deep and rough. One of his massive hands tangles in my hair, forming a fist in the long silky strands while the other slides down over my bottom, hitching my hips closer, until the pulsing bundle of nerves at the apex of my things is right up against his hardness.

“Even the smallest touch sets me on fire.” I complain. “You holding my hand feels more intimate and arousing than another man kissing me.”

“And when I do kiss you?” Sinclair prompts, encouraging me to move against him, guiding my hips to rock against his.

“I might as well be molten lava. My entire body turns to liquid – figuratively and literally.” I confess, and I know he understands.

My wetness has already seeped through my panties and onto the sleek black fabric of his trousers. “You have a power over me I don’t understand, I’ve never experienced anything like it.”

“You don’t really think it’s different for me, do you?” Sinclair murmurs, lowering his mouth to my throat and brushing his lips over my pulsepoint.

“Of course it is.” I whine, so frustrated that I feel like I might cry.

“Can’t you feel how hard I am for you, Ella?” Sinclair inquires gruffly, nuzzling my skin, grazing his fangs over the spot where my neck meets my shoulder. “How hard I always am for you?” I’m shivering with need now, especially as his words combine with the feeling of his steely length against my clit.

“Well that doesn’t mean anything. You’re in bed with a half naked woman, it would happen with anyone.” I reason miserably.

Sinclair chuckles, “I think you’ve been around human men for too long, they’ve given you a very low opinion of my sex.” He raises his head at last, taking a break from laving the soft spot behind my ear. “Trust me, it doesn’t happen for just anyone, no matter what they’re doing or how lovely they are.”

“But I’m nothing.” I insist. “I’m just a human, I don’t have the kind of power you do.”

“You’re not nothing.” Sinclair growls, a dangerous edge in his deep voice. “And you might be human but you have a power all your own. Don't you know how difficult it is for me to be near you without touching you? How impossible it is to hold myself back when you're in my arms, when all my instincts are driving me to make you mine? Ever since we met I've felt like an addict, and you're my only fix."

"That's probably just the baby." I murmur, sighing when the fabric of my teddy slides off my breast, finally allowing one taut nipple to meet Sinclair's bare chest, teased and tickled by the coarse black hair scattered over his pecs. "It has to be. It doesn't make sense otherwise."

"You don't give yourself enough credit." Sinclair answers, his lips mere inches from mine. "And you give me too much and too little all at once."

"What do you mean?" I wonder aloud, not really wanting him to answer. I just want him to kiss me, to strip off my negligee and finally relieve the terrible ache which seems to have taken over my very soul. I think Sinclair can sense my growing desperation, but for some reason he isn't giving me what I need. He's holding himself back, taking away his kisses and questing hands.

"I don't do casual either, Ella." He catches my hips when I get so distracted rubbing myself against him that I stop listening, too intent on chasing my pleasure. I whimper when the delicious friction I'd been building ceases, and Sinclair clucks sympathetically. Still, he doesn't show me any mercy. Instead he tilts my chin up so I'll have to look him in the eye, "I don't waste my time on people I'm not serious about, or relationships that aren't going anywhere."

"I don't know why we're even talking about this." I relate, "It's not like this is even real, it's just my imagination run out of control."

Sinclair's eyes shutter, and he leans his forehead against mine. "Goddess, sometimes I forget how much you don't know about shifters, how much you can't know."

"Please, Dominic." I beg, needing to move, to perform the carnal dance our bodies were made to create together. "Won't you kiss me, won't you touch me?"

"I'd like to touch you and taste you and all the rest." He grumbles reluctantly, and suddenly his strong hands are gone from my body, and his warm limbs are pulling away from my own. "But I need to leave before I do something I'll regret, something you'll regret."

"I don't understand." I admit, my nose crinkling up in confusion.

Sinclair pauses only long enough to lean over me and run his fingertip down my nose, straightening out the wrinkles. "You will when you wake up."

Before I can say anything more, Sinclair begins stalking away through the dream forest, leaving me alone, and entirely unsatisfied.

When I wake up, I find Sinclair watching me, stroking my hair and gazing down at me with a tender expression. "Welcome back."

I blink and stretch, feeling as though I only just fell asleep. "It's not morning already, is it?" I yawn.

"No." He smiles gently, "You're just coming out of the dream."

"How did you...?" I stop short of finishing my sentence. Logic tells me he must be guessing, or that maybe I was talking in my sleep or some other explanation. However when I look into Sinclair's eyes, I see the truth. He isn't speculating, somehow he knows I was dreaming, and as the seconds tick by it becomes more and more obvious that he knows I was dreaming about him.

Worse, I fear he's managed to decipher some of the details from the fantasy.

"It's okay, Ella." He soothes, petting me as if I'm a skittish horse.

No, oh no. He knows – he knows everything.

Chapter 60 – Shared Dreams

Ella

Sinclair is watching me struggle through the idea that he somehow shared my dream, that he knows everything I said – secrets I would never admit if I'd known he wasn't just some fantasy my sleeping brain cooked up. I just admitted how deeply I'm attracted to him, how much he turns me on. I can't believe how shamelessly I rubbed myself all over him – I might as well have been a dog in heat, practically begging him to make love to me.

I did beg, I realize belatedly, And he left. He walked away even though I was his for the taking. He must have thought my behavior was pathetic. He's wanted to kiss me in the past, he even said he wanted me in the dream, but that was before I debased myself that way. I suppose that sort of thing isn't befitting of a Luna at all.

Suddenly Mike's voice sounds in my head, and I remember the way he belittled me for liking sex. You're a stunner, Ella, but you're too eager. Men don't want a girl whose legs fall open at the first opportunity – show a little class. He never realized it was the physical intimacy I liked, never connected the dots that sex with him was more about conception and closeness than pleasure. It would be different with Sinclair, I can tell that much already. I find more pleasure with him in the foreplay than I ever found with Mike in ten years of being together. He's awakened parts of my body I didn't even know existed – and now he knows it.

Sinclair is still stroking and petting me, and I can't take it. I've got to put some distance between us or I'll lose it. I wrench myself out of his arms, and he lets me go – again, the little voice in my head moans. I climb out of the bed and though my cheeks are already flooded with heat, I can feel myself flushing deeper still. "I... you... that was real?" I stutter, trying to comprehend the impossible.

"No, it was a dream." Sinclair explains. "But we shared it. Bonded mates often visit each other in their dreams."

"But we aren't mates, I'm not even a shifter." I protest. "How did this happen?"

"As you said, it must be another gift from the baby." Sinclair replies easily.

"So you knew, all along, that it was real?" I gape, my embarrassment and shame quickly giving way to outrage. "And that I had no idea?"

"Yes." He confirms gravely. "I knew."

"Why didn't you tell me!?" I burst out, feeling like I might cry. "You had to know I wouldn't have said or done those things if I'd known! I was vulnerable and you took advantage!"

Sinclair rises from the bed, unfolding his big body and prowling after me. I can see now that he isn't as unaffected by this situation as I initially thought. His eyes are blazing and his muscles racked with tension. His hands are closed into white-knuckled fists and his voice is low and husky. "Ella, I might be a shifter, but there are limits to even my abilities." He rumbles. "I would have to be dead not to respond to such a tempting invitation, and you called me to your dream, not the other way around. I got caught up in the moment just like you did. I couldn't resist... not until you reminded me that you don't understand our ways."

"How can I have called you to my dream, when I didn't even know I was doing it?" I question, confusion swirling around me in a dense fog. "And why did you come?"

"Because I wanted to." Sinclair replies, his jaw clenched so tightly the muscle twitches. "I was telling the truth about the power you have over me, Ella. I might keep some things from you, but I don't tell falsehoods. I don't say things I don't mean, even in dreams."

I wrap my arms around myself, unsure what to make of this new information. I want to believe him, as terrifying as that is, but doubts continue to plague me. "Then why did you leave?"

Sinclair exhales, and I can tell his patience is hanging by a thread. "Because you thought it was just a fantasy and I'm trying to respect your wishes."

"Oh." I utter softly, furrowing my brow. That isn't what I expected, and though it should make me feel better to know he took me seriously when I told him I wasn't interested in being with him, part of me is deeply disappointed. I know I'm being contrary and hormonal, but I can't help it. I need more time to process this, and until I have it I'm not going to be making sense – even to myself.

Sinclair's gaze sharpens on me, pinning me in place. "Why did you think I left?"

I shrug, "I thought maybe I was being too eager. I know men don't like that."

The imposing Alpha crosses the floor until he's towering over me. My first instinct is to back away, but I find my feet frozen to the floor, unable to move. I peek up at him hesitantly, and find a fierce expression on his handsome face. "Any man who wants a lover without passion is an idiot. Yours is electrifying, and knowing I can set you alight makes me feel more powerful than anything else. Your 'eagerness' as you call it, is a gift, and I'd like to hunt down every man who's ever made you feel otherwise and beat them to a pulp."

I drop my gaze to the floor, staring at my feet. His words warm me through and through, from the top of my head to the tips of my toes. Still, I can't help thinking that this is very dangerous territory. It's getting harder and harder to resist my attraction to him, and it's especially difficult when he speaks to me this way.

So why are you resisting? The little voice in my head demands. You like him, he likes you, why are you fighting it?

She has a point. I've just been given proof that Sinclair not only returns my attraction, but also that he takes it seriously. Still, I can't help but remember the second half of his statement – he doesn't waste his time on relationships that aren't going anywhere, but that's exactly what we would be. We have no future together, and we both know it, we're just in denial because we want to give into our desires.

Because there's one thing more important than either of us. I remind her, Our baby. We're about to bring a child into the world, and it deserves two loving co-parents who can give it their full attention, not a pair of exes too caught up in their own drama to prioritize their child's best interest.

But why are you so sure you'd end up as exes? She inquires. You're predicting the end before you've even had a chance to begin.

I'm being realistic. The best Sinclair and I can hope for is a temporary fling. I bite back. Maybe we could have some fun together, but at the end of the day he's going to end up with a she-wolf who can rule by his side. I'm playing a dangerous game here pretending to be something I'm not, and it's safer for everyone involved if I fade into the background after the campaign while he finds love elsewhere.

Sinclair is watching me again, and he taps his finger lightly against my temple. "You wanna tell me what's going on in there, trouble?"

"We can't keep doing this Dominic." I state, drawing in a shakey breath. "If we stay on this path, we're headed for trouble."

He nods, cupping my cheek and smiling when I reflexively lean my head into his hand. "Listen Ella," He broaches carefully. "I don't need to know why you don't want to get involved, but I don't have unlimited self control. If you invite me into your dreams in the future, if you offer yourself up to me that way again, I don't think I'm going to be able to say no."

"But I didn't know I was doing any of that." I say, "not for real. I don't even know how I called you to me."

"I know that." He remarks, "I'm just trying to be up front with you about where I am with all this."

“Well we only have to worry about this until after the pup is born right?” I ask, more upset by this thought than I could have predicted. “I’ll lose the connection to you when I’m no longer carrying him.”

“We’ll always be connected through our pup.” Sinclair corrects me, “but yes, I suspect many of these bonds will fade in time.”

My face falls, and I wish I had the same talent Sinclair does for masking my feelings. I’m about to pull away from him when he stops me. “There’s something else, Ella. This may sound terrible to you, but there’s something else you have to understand about shifter relationships.”

“Yes?”

“It’s in a she-wolf’s nature to make her mate prove himself to her. She won’t accept him until she’s been convinced he’s the one.

It’s a sort of mating dance – like the wild hunt, she plays hard to get and he gives chase.”

“Okay.” I gulp, my tongue darting out to lick my lips. “So what does that mean?”

“It means that if you give me reason to think that you do want to be with me but you’re holding yourself back for some reason, my wolf is going to react the same way he would to a she wolf drawing him into the hunt.” Sinclair announces ominously.

“You’re saying that you might stop respecting my wishes if you think I don’t mean them?” I repeat, indignance rising up inside me.

“That’s what being an alpha is all about. Doing what’s best for your mate even when she doesn’t agree.” Sinclair confirms.

“But I’m not your mate.” I say, amazed that I’m having to remind him of this for a second time tonight.

“We’ll see, Ella.” Sinclair purrs, his eyes glowing with barely restrained fire. “We’ll see.”

Chapter 61 – Baby Bump

Ella

“Wait what?!” I exclaim, certain that I must be hearing things. Sinclair can’t have possibly just said what I think he did.

He smiles, tracing circles on the soft skin of my belly. “You heard me.” He teases.

“Completely naked?” I gape, blushing at the idea alone. “Everyone? Even the children?”

“I’ve told you, shifters don’t associate nudity with sex the way that humans do. It’s our natural state.” Sinclair explains gently. “No one feels self conscious, because there’s nothing to be embarrassed about.”

I should have known something was up when he came in this afternoon and woke me from my nap, climbing into bed behind me and sliding his hand underneath the hem of my top so he could feel the baby. I’d whined at being disturbed, but cuddled closer to him anyway, stretching into his tender caresses like a sleepy kitten. Only once I was purring with contentment did he broach the subject he’d come to discuss.

The fourth night of the Solstice festival is apparently devoted to something called moonbathing. I’d hesitated over this idea when Aileen first showed me the schedule, but had been so distracted by the idea of the wild hunt and the masquerade ball that I hadn’t been able to focus on it. Now, however, I can’t focus on anything else. Sinclair has just explained that the moonbathing ritual involves stripping off one’s clothes and anointing our bodies with oil, then laying out in the full moon’s light. I’d been okay with this up until the point when Sinclair clarified that it would happen at a sacred stone circle – surrounded by other shifters.

“But... it’s also natural to be curious about other people’s bodies, doesn’t everyone stare? Doesn’t that bother you?” I squeak, thinking of all the times I’ve been uncomfortable beneath the male gaze when fully clothed, and not wanting to even imagine how much worse it would be naked.

“It doesn’t bother me to be studied or admired,” Sinclair shrugs, looking down at me intently. “But I can understand how that might be different if I was a human woman, and used to being looked at like an object. You have to realize that male wolves don’t disrespect she-wolves that way.”

“So when you were with Lydia, it didn’t bother you for your mate to be naked in front of other men?” I don’t think I would be so generous if the tables were turned, in fact I’m already thinking about all the she-wolves that will undoubtedly be checking out Sinclair and I do not like it.

“No shifter would be stupid enough to lay their eyes on the Alpha’s mate in the manner you’re thinking – not if they want to keep their heads connected to their bodies.” Sinclair assures me. “And if they’re envious, it’s no threat to me. In fact I enjoy having a partner others covet, it just goes to show I won the lottery, and reminds me to be the best mate I can, so that I’ll be worthy of her.”

I consider this for a moment. On one hand I’m very wary of any man who wants a partner they can show off like a trophy – that was exactly what Mike did and I know it’s a far cry from being truly valued or respected. At the same time, Sinclair isn’t talking about women the same way Mike used to. He doesn’t want to show off his mate to make others feel jealous, or feel threatened if someone else glances her way. What’s more, he associates envy with her intrinsic value, not a boost to his own ego or masculinity.

“Now,” Sinclair continues, a sharp edge in his voice now. “If they were to disrespect her, to sniff around her despite my claim, or set a single paw on her...” He growls wordlessly, sending shivers down my spine. “Now that would be another matter entirely.”

I snort when I see the menacing expression on his face. “Sometimes I get caught up thinking shifters are so far ahead of humans, and then you say things like that and I remember you’re just big furry beasts wearing the guise of civility.”

Sinclair chuckles. “We all have our contradictions.”

“I don’t.” I argue, notching my chin up defiantly.

“I beg to differ.” Sinclair replies warmly, his fingers dancing over my bare skin in increasingly sensuous patterns. “You’re the fiercest little ball of mischief I’ve ever encountered, but you’re also the sweetest thing I’ve ever seen,” He purrs, “or held...” His lips drop to my neck, just barely grazing them across my skin. “or tasted.”

“Hey, none of that.” I object, pushing his head away. “I don’t need you getting me all worked up right before I go strip naked in front of a hundred strangers.” I admonish, my voice trailing off as the reality of the event ahead of us sets in.

“It’s gonna be okay.” Sinclair promises. “Besides, all anyone’s going to be doing is trying to figure out if you’re showing yet. This is a royal baby, remember.” He says, tapping a finger on my belly button.

“Well they’re going to be disappointed.” I sigh, though in truth it’s been a few days since I stood in front of the mirror and glared at my middle, willing it to show signs of the life growing within.

“Are you sure about that?” Sinclair arches a brow. “This feels like a baby bump to me.”

I promptly push up onto my elbows so that I can look down at my stomach, even though sitting up puts my neck dangerously close to Sinclair's mouth again. I can almost feel him thinking about stealing more kisses while I'm distracted. Ever since we admitted that we're attracted to each other, he's been more forward about showing me affection, which only makes it more difficult to resist my feelings. If only I didn't enjoy his touch so much, maybe then I could be more forceful about rebuffing his advances.

His oversized hand is sprawled over my tummy, keeping my shirt bunched up beneath my breasts. It's hard to see anything with his palm in the way, so he traces the outline of my womb with a featherlight touch. Sure enough I'm surprised to see the smallest of swellings just north of my pelvis. I suppose part of shifters' short gestation is seeing these changes much sooner than expected, but that scares me too. What if my body doesn't have enough time to adjust, to go through all the changes human mothers spend nine months manifesting.

I think Sinclair can sense my unease, because the next thing I know he's kissing my belly – once, twice, three times.

"I said no kisses." I scold him, earning myself a low rumble in Sinclair's chest, and his green eyes flashing at my challenge.

"I'm kissing the baby." He insists, a devious, wolfish grin on his face. "He likes it."

"Oh sure." I reply tartly, "blame it on the baby."

"He does." Sinclair repeats, kissing me again before slyly adding, "But then he likes it because it makes you happy."

"You're incorrigible." I roll my eyes, but I'm blushing too. And more than that, I'm amazed to think the tiny life growing inside me knows what I'm feeling this way. It didn't seem strange when the doctors told me he could sense my stress, but I suppose I attributed that to him being impacted by the physical symptoms of stress, not truly feeling my emotions. My heart both swells and tightens in my chest as I contemplate this idea, that we have a bond every bit as strong as Sinclair's, I just can't feel it.

Suddenly I'm crying, and Sinclair stops his teasing and crawls back up my body, clucking sympathetically. "What is it sweetheart?"

"Nothing, I'm just being silly." I hiccup, shaking my head. "It's hormones, that's all."

"Why don't you tell me, and then we can decide together if it's silly." He replies, brushing the pads of his thumbs over my cheeks, caressing the tears away.

"I just wish I had a connection to him like you do." I confess. "I wish I could sense what he's feeling. I want you to be close with him, of course. I'm just... jealous, I suppose. You'll always be the better parent, you'll always know what he needs without asking, and I'll be bumbling around blind in comparison."

"That's not silly at all." Sinclair assures me. "It's only natural that you should feel that way. But you're wrong about something, Ella. You'll have a bond with the baby every bit as strong as mine by the time you bring him into the world. Mothers have connections to their babies most fathers – even shifter fathers – can never have, because we don't carry and deliver them. We can't nourish them with our own bodies, we're not the ones who sheltered and protected them in the first and most vulnerable months of their existence."

"You promise it will be as strong as yours?" I ask, sniffing.

"I think you're focusing on the idea of a bond too much." Sinclair muses. "You have to remember that a connection isn't the same as a relationship, Ella. All parents are bonded with their children, but some still have terrible relationships, just like everyone is bonded to their lover, but some couples are much happier than others."

"I think it's difficult because it's just such an abstract idea." I share, already feeling less blue. "I mean, you tell me something is magic and I'm automatically going to assume it's more powerful than natural things."

"But magic is part of nature." Sinclair corrects me. "The Goddess created all of it at the same time. The difference is simply that you didn't know about it."

"Right." I nod slowly, telling myself to keep this reminder at the forefront of my thoughts.

"Better?" Sinclair prompts, stroking my hair.

"Yes, thank you for making me talk about it." I profess, feeling a strong urge to hug the big Alpha.

"Always." He agrees, "Now get ready, we have some moon bathing to do."

My eyes go wide. "Wait, I spoke too soon, I'm not better at all, I think I need to stay home and process this."

Sinclair chuckles, "nice try, trouble. We leave in half an hour." He leans down and kisses the tip of my nose before sliding from the bed, leaving me with a low purr. "And I, for one, can't wait."

Chapter 62 – Moon Bathing

Sinclair

“This is the weirdest thing I’ve ever done!” Ella exclaims, shifting restlessly beside me. We’re just arrived at the festival, and though she’s only wearing a silk robe, she looks stunning. She’s also nearly beside herself with anxiety, and getting increasingly feisty the closer we get to the big event.

“Poor darling, you’re shaking.” I croon, pulling Ella into my arms and rubbing her back. She’s all sharp edges, stiff and grumbling unhappily into my chest, but snuggling into my warmth despite her grumpy mood.

“Of course I’m shaking, it’s freezing. I’m wearing next to nothing and it’s winter!!” She exclaims, gesturing to the snow falling around us. “How are we even supposed to do this ridiculous ritual without getting hypothermia!”

“First because wolves run much hotter than humans.” I answer, catching her hands and tucking them between our bodies so they’ll get warm too. “Second, because the stone circle is surrounded by thermal pools and the base is heated from below by hot springs. I promise you’ll be plenty warm. And if you’re not then there’s always body heat.”

I’m waggling my eyebrows suggestively, but Ella doesn’t laugh. She pouts, peeking up at me, “I thought you were going to respect my wishes.”

“I’m doing my best.” I share, “but it isn’t easy. Especially when you’re so beautifully responsive.”

This much is true, I might have an easier time respecting Ella’s boundaries if she didn’t react so openly and passionately to my advances. But the reality is that she’s obviously affected by me, and it’s hard not to feel encouraged when she melts into my arms like hot honey.

“That’s just my hormones.” Ella insists. “You have to listen to what I say, not what I do.”

“Ah, so ‘actions speak louder than words’ doesn’t count in your book.” I tease.

“That’s right.” Ella answers stiffly, “My body isn’t my own right now, it’s the baby’s. That means you have to take my word over my reactions.”

“Alright.” I agree. “But I hope you’ll give me a little slack when I slip up.”

“I thought being an Alpha was about always being in control.” Ella argues.

“Maybe,” I concede, chafing her chilled limbs with my warm hands. “But my wolf is in charge when it comes to mating, and he's not nearly as patient as I am."

"But there's no mating here!" Ella objects, "In case you've forgotten, I'm human!" Her whispered words are barely audible even to my own ears, but I still glance around to ensure we can't be overheard.

"I haven't forgotten." I answer. I wish I could. It seems if I'm not thinking about romancing Ella, I'm thinking about how vulnerable she is living among shifters. Even now, I'm painfully aware of how fragile she is in comparison, surrounded on all sides by vicious predators. The poor thing is still shivering and I'm worried she might have been right, without a wolf's resilience to the elements, it might be too cold for her to participate. Though in truth, I think it's only partly due to the weather. I suspect she's trembling with apprehension as much as she is with cold.

Guilt washes over me, and for a moment I wonder if I'm doing a terrible thing putting Ella through all this. Not only these events that throw her so far out of her comfort zone and into a world she doesn't yet understand, or even asking her to suffer through the cold and discomfort, but asking her to tell so many lies. Asking her to perform an elaborate fraud, to go against her own honest nature to deceive and trick people. I don't believe it's possible to corrupt Ella, or her life would have already done it, but it feels very hard to forgive myself for forcing her into this situation. In hindsight I can clearly see that's what I did – it might have been her idea, but she'd felt like she had no other choice, for I told her I would take her child away.

I know all the justifications for our scheme – avoiding a civil war, preventing a despot from taking the throne, saving countless lives. And there's no way of justifying ending all this just to save one human some distress – yet I want to. I want to go back in time and tell Ella I will keep her and the baby a secret so that they'll never be in danger from my enemies, and never have to adopt this facade. I want to call off our arrangement so that she won't shiver anymore. Now not only do I think my wolf is broken, I think I'm losing my mind as well.

"What?" Ella presses me sullenly, "Why are you looking at me that way?"

"I was thinking that when this is done we can go home and curl up in front of a warm fire, and then I'll rub your feet and feed you hot chocolate." I answer.

"Why can't we just go home now? We've made an appearance and kissed for the cameras! We should just say I'm ill and make our apologies." Her tone goes from exasperated and sharp, to sounding so small I might believe it belonged to a child. "I don't want to do this."

"I know, baby." I murmur, tucking her head to my chest and stroking her long, silky hair. "I promise we'll leave as soon as we're able."

“But Dominic—” Ella is raising her voice now, and trying to pull away from me. I know she’s only lashing out because she’s feeling so much emotional turmoil. I’m sure the pregnancy hormones aren’t helping, but it’s clear she needs me to help ground her, to calm her down because she can’t calm herself.

I tighten my hands on her, beginning to purr even as I rumble. “This is an important ritual.” I explain, in a tone that makes her visibly squirm. “I know you’re cold and afraid Ella. Honestly, I would spare you this if I could – but missing this isn’t like missing the feast. It would be seen as disrespect to the Goddess.”

Ella is struggling internally, her body responding to my purrs and my dominance, but her mind no doubt consumed with battling thoughts of duty and unhappiness. Her eyes begin to shine, and I fear she might start crying.

No, I hate it when she cries. My wolf complains, not that he needs to remind me. He whines like a pup any time Ella sheds so much as a single tear, even for silly reasons like eating all of her snack. I increase my purrs, and Ella glares at me. “That isn’t fair, I don’t want to be comforted right now.”

“Maybe you don’t want it, but you need it.” I answer sternly, and Ella takes up a mutinous muttering.

“Ella, I’m going to take care of you. It will be over before you know it. I won’t make us stay a minute longer than we have to.”

She’s still glaring, but her plump lower lip is also trembling. “Fine.” She snaps, her voice thick with emotion. “But for the record, I don’t like you very much right now.”

“I know.” I smile, kissing her upturned mouth. I’m not the least bit surprised when she nips me, quickly sinking her little teeth into my lip and releasing them again just when I begin to feel the sting. My wolf growls deep in my chest, loving her fire but not about to let her get away with this. Ella trembles again, but in a very different way this time. Her demeanor is exactly that of a chastised she-wolf, reassured and excited by her mate’s strength.

“Behave.” I instruct, not bothering to soften my tone. The light in her eyes is impish now, rather than sad or frightened, and I’m pleased to see her cheeks flushed with color. “It’s about to begin.”

I lead Ella through the moonlit forest, following paths so familiar to me, yet completely new to Ella. Before long we’re crossing the bridges straddling steaming thermal pools, and crossing into the sacred space of the stone circle.

I pull my robe off, then reach for the belt at her waist. “Just look at me.” I advise, “Keep those gorgeous eyes on mine, and just pretend we’re all alone.”

Ella nods nervously, and I carefully uncinch her robe, pulling the garment from her body and baring her for all to see. I don’t take my eyes off her either, even as I’m handed the necessary oils by an attendant. I drip the slick liquid onto my fingers, then paint it onto Ella’s body. I deposit the sweet smelling substance on her neck, her temples, then use a different bottle for her wrists and palms – then finally I take the third oil, and trace the letters of my name over her heart.

I wish I could look down and watch the oil dribble down between her luscious breasts, to appreciate the beauty of her form, but she needs the eye contact more than I need to satisfy my lustful urges. “You’re doing so well, sweetheart.” I praise, handing her the bottles so that she can anoint my skin. Following my example, she applies the oils without taking her eyes away from mine, going up on her tiptoes to reach my temples.

When it’s done, we stretch out on the heated stone slab beneath our feet, and I pull Ella close, using my big body to block her from view from as many people as I can. Still she doesn’t take her eyes from mine, and I continue praising her, genuinely proud of how brave she’s being.

We lie together under the moon until her eyes grow heavy, and I know it’s time to leave.

When I wake the next morning, I’m unsurprised to be greeted with more headlines about us, though these are a far cry from the last breaking news in which we featured. Every last article is a veritable celebration of our mating, eagerly reporting that we’re so in love that we couldn’t take our eyes off one another.

I’m thrilled, but I know we’re facing a far greater challenge tonight – the wild hunt has finally arrived.

Chapter 63 – Meeting Sinclair’s Wolf

Ella

“How are you feeling?” Sinclair asks, standing in the doorway of my bedroom. The wild hunt is tonight, and I know he’s not merely asking about my morning sickness or fatigue.

“Nervous.” I confess. “Do you think...” I trail off, blushing and unsure if I can actually speak the question I need to ask.

“What is it Ella?” He inquires, coming forward with an encouraging smile.

“Do you think I could see your wolf before we go tonight, just so that I’ll recognize it when I see you?” I whisper, barely loud enough to hear myself, but knowing Sinclair’s wolf ears will be more than capable of picking up on the sound. And so I won’t be scared. I add silently in my head.

“Of course.” He chuckles, “That’s a great idea. I should have thought of it myself.”

His powerful hands move to the buttons on his shirt, and I find myself taking a step back.

“What are you doing?”

“You wanted to see my wolf, I don’t want to ruin this shirt.” He shrugs. “It’s one of my favorites.”

“Right.” I breathe, “Right, of course.”

He continues stripping off his clothes, and I work hard to avert my gaze. So far I’ve been very successful in avoiding temptation by not looking at his body in these vulnerable moments, and I’m not about to change that now – on the day when it’s more important than ever that we practice self control.

“Does it hurt, shifting?” I ask, staring at my fidgeting fingers.

“It does the first time.” Sinclair shares, “The first time is almost unbearable, it takes hours and hours, but once you’ve gotten it over with it happens fast as lightning, too quickly for you to feel the pain of your bones breaking and rearranging.”

“That sounds ghastly.” I feel suddenly lightheaded, “How old are you when you shift the first time?”

“It’s a little different for everyone – most make the change when they go through puberty.” Sinclair informs me, pulling off his trousers.

Already I’m thinking of my baby – my son – eventually suffering through this sort of grisly shift, and I don't like it one bit. "What was yours like, was anyone with you?" I squeak.

"Mine was as painful as anyone else's. But my father was with me, he got me through it, just like I'll do for our son." He states, a promise in his voice.

"Good." I sigh, feeling relieved to know Sinclair will help guide our child through the process. I can imagine Henry was a very gentle and supportive presence for Sinclair, and I know he'll be the same. "I suppose... I probably wouldn't be allowed to help?"

Sinclair offers me a tender smile. "No sweet Ella. I'm afraid it would be much too dangerous." He comes forward, taking my face in his oversized hands. This is probably the first time he's ever been unclothed when I'm not, and I'm amazed at how much stronger I feel with my own body covered. I never realized until now how vulnerable it is to be undressed and exposed when others are not, but Sinclair doesn't seem to mind one bit. He's still wielding the power in this room, and part of me resents his constant strength. "Now, do you want to talk, or do you want to meet my wolf?"

"Yes, sorry." I flush.

"Don't apologize." He murmurs, "and don't get close to me until after I've shifted, you don't want to be within reach of my claws when I make the transformation."

I nod wordlessly, my pulse pounding in anticipation. Sinclair backs away from me, holding my gaze the same way he did last night at the stone circle. I keep my eyes on him, watching with horrified fascination as he ensures he's not near anything breakable, then disappears. There's a loud crack and the air seems to go blurry, I even feel a bit nauseous trying to keep track of the rapid movement. However when my eyes adjust and I'm able to take in the familiar room again, I see that where Sinclair was standing a moment before, now there is only a huge, black wolf with glowing green eyes.

I'm sure my eyes are as wide as saucers, and I feel my jaw going slack. "That's not a wolf that's a bear!" I blurt out, saying the first thought which came to my mind.

The wolf, who is much, much too large – far larger than any natural wolf and probably almost as tall as I am – gives me an affronted look, as if I've insulted him gravely.

"I'm sorry, not a bear!" I quickly amend, still trying to reconcile the fact that the beast in front of me is actually the man who spends every night wrapped around me like a very muscular heated blanket. "But how are you bigger as a wolf than you are as a man!"

He huffs and rolls his eyes, sitting on the rug and waiting patiently for me to recover from my shock.

"I mean honestly, I could ride you." I point out, my head filled with images of me mounted on his back like a particularly deadly variety of horse.

Suddenly Sinclair's expression goes so mischievous and heated that I don't need to hear him speak. I know exactly what he's thinking and his mind is clearly in the gutter. "Not like that! You know what I mean." I'm amazed that anyone could manage to be so suggestive without speaking a word, or even possessing human features. "... what do I do, how do you communicate with other wolves when you're like this. Do you have mental links like you do with the baby?"

He nods, wagging his tail and astonishing me. I never imagined that the imposing Alpha would ever do something so very doglike, but then again his silly side always surprises me. Suddenly it seems positively hilarious that Dominic Sinclair is sitting in front of me with the squirmy energy of a puppy, and I realize that he's holding himself back from approaching me until I'm comfortable with this.

"Can – Can I touch you?" I inquire meekly.

The furry behemoth nods again, and though I don't know how I understand his reasoning, I know he's waiting for me to come to him. It takes a minute for me to find the courage to move my leadened feet, but I manage. I slowly cross the room, feeling terribly anxious to be approaching a creature out of the horror stories I grew up fearing, even though I know it's just Sinclair.

Up close he's even larger than I realized, still taller than me even seated. He looks as though he could snap me up in one bite, and my mind spins with mathematical equations, trying desperately to figure out how his mass increased so much. It defies logic.

You're overthinking it. It's magic – a man became a wolf but you're hung up on how big the wolf is?

"This is weird, this is so weird." I moan, ringing my hands as I close the distance between us. I hesitantly reach out towards him, sinking my fingers into his thick, downy fur. "Oh, you're really soft... I think this is the strangest thing that's ever happened to me."

The next thing I know, Sinclair has pounced, apparently no longer able to contain himself. He gently eases me to the ground despite the suddenness of his attack. He's standing over me then, licking my face and making me giggle and squeal as I try to push him away. Eventually he settles, laying his big head on my belly and pinning me to the floor. Soft purrs rumble in his chest, and I find myself sliding my hands back into his fur, massaging his head and ears and making him groan contentedly.

"You do know that if you crush this baby while it's still inside of me, you'll never get your hair!" I complain, amazed at how heavy his furry snout is.

Instead of removing it, Sinclair nudges his cold nose up under the hem of my top, resting his soft muzzle against my bare belly and peering up at me with those wolfish eyes. The cloth of my shirt rests gently over his snout, and his heated breath dances over my tender breasts, traveling through the tented material and fluttering over my skin. "Dominic, that tickles!"

The wolf makes a sound that resembles a laugh, and the next thing I know, Sinclair is a man again, though his head is still under my top and he's kissing my belly. "All right you," he says after a moment, pulling me up to a sitting position. "Now how are you feeling, still nervous?"

"Yes." I admit, "though not about your wolf."

"You're ready for this, Ella." Sinclair encourages. "You're going to do beautifully. Just remember what I told you..."

"I know." I sigh. "Don't run when you catch me."

"Good girl." Sinclair praises, though he has no way of knowing the second half of this thought – the words still ringing in my head.

Unless I want you to run me down and make me yours. Unless I want you to claim me.

And now the only question is, will I be able to actually stop running when the time

Chapter 64 – Lydia Gate Crashes

Ella

When we arrive at the edge of the forest where the ceremony is set to begin, I'm wearing a shimmering pearl-colored dress, which looks as if it's been spun from pure moonlight. Its straps are so thin it doesn't seem like they should be strong enough to hold up the flowing fabric, which plunges between my breasts, hugs my waist and then cascades out into a wide skirt with a graceful train. It's completely inappropriate for the cold weather, but a cape of plush black furs billows down my back and Sinclair's cozy heat is warming my left side. My shoulders are heavy with the weight of his arm, and I feel thankful the rough forest terrain made wearing high heels impossible.

We move through the crowds of reporters and admirers, pausing for photos and handshakes but not answering any questions.

The press coverage from the moon bathing ritual was truly phenomenal, almost fawning in its analysis, and the crowds are getting bigger every day. Everyone seems to want to glimpse us for themselves, and I'm beginning to feel more like a museum attraction than a person.

It's hard to keep myself grounded when everyone around me is staring, jumping up and down yelling my name. This is business as usual for Sinclair, but I don't think I'll ever get used to it. I also don't know if I want my child subjected to all this attention. "It won't always be like this, right?" I ask, cradling my tiny baby bump as we move past the crowds. "Surely it's just the festival and how new our relationship is."

"Things will calm down." Sinclair agrees, his keen eyes not missing the way I try to shield our pup with my hands. "They'll be excited about the baby too, but they'll keep their distance. They know how protective new parents are, and as invasive as we can be about adult relationships, children are considered off limits."

"Good." I breathe, still frowning. "I don't like it, but I'll endure it as long as they leave the baby alone."

"After the campaign is over we can pull you out of the spotlight." Sinclair offers, "you'll be a new mother, it would be perfectly reasonable for your public presence to be diminished." Just then the wind shifts, and Sinclair scents the air, his muscles suddenly going very tense.

Right on cue, a snide voice sounds on our left, and a figure in white emerges from behind a tree. "What kind of Luna looks for excuses to get out of doing her job?" I don't need to look to recognize the speaker – her tone is completely altered from when she helped me in the bathroom, but there's no mistaking the nasal timbre of Lydia's voice.

Before I can even begin to process her words or get a good look at her, Sinclair pushes my body behind his, taking up a defensive stance between me and his ex-wife. “Are you really so desperate to force yourself in where you’re not wanted, that you’ve been reduced to skulking around like a fox, Lydia?” A murmur moves through the gathered shifters, and I suspect calling a wolf a fox is something of an insult. Though I, as someone who has always liked foxes, can’t help but feel a bit offended on their behalf.

“It certainly took you long enough to sense me.” She complains, sounding more than a little bitter. “Are you really so preoccupied with your little pet that your wolf can’t keep track of his surroundings?”

I’m trying to move back around in front of Sinclair, but he holds me fast, his arm reaching behind his body to lock me against him in an iron grip. I feel a little growl bubble up in my chest, only to be reduced to a trembling mess when he growls back, leaving no room for argument. “I guess that goes to show how little you mean to my wolf these days.” Sinclair counters smoothly. “He doesn’t even notice you when you’re right in front of him.”

I’m trying to peek around Sinclair’s burly arm, but I can only catch a flash of Lydia’s outraged expression before her venomous tongue is back at it, “Well you might not want me here, Sinclair, but as the only she-wolf who bears your mark, it’s my right to begin the hunt with you.”

My slow brain scrambles to catch up, and I gradually understand that she’s trying to take my place in the ceremony. She thinks that I don’t have the right to participate because Sinclair and I haven’t fully been mated, and suddenly I feel outraged myself.

How dare she try to take our place? How dare she try to take Sinclair from us? The little voice in my head is in a full on rage, and any logic I might have used to calm it – like the fact that Sinclair isn’t ours in the first place, so it’s impossible for him to be taken – goes completely by the wayside.

I can’t recall ever feeling jealous or possessive about Mike. Heartbroken yes, but when I learned he was cheating I didn’t feel envy for Kate, only sorrow for myself and all those wasted years. But I feel jealous now. I feel a possessive fury unlike anything I’ve ever experienced. Something raw and primal is building up inside me, and I don’t know how to identify it or reign it in. Is this the pup too? Staking its claim on its father? Or have I lost my mind?

“You’re out of your head, Lyd–”

I surge forward, slipping out of Sinclair’s grasp by ducking underneath his arms and rounding his big body in a fit of righteous indignation. I can feel Sinclair reaching for me again, but I pull myself up to my full height and shoot him a warning glare over my shoulder before giving Lydia the full force of my ire. “The only mark you bear is of the wolf you tricked into marrying you after you ran out on this pack. If you want to participate in the hunt, go home to him – or has he seen you for the snake you are and kicked you out?”

Lydia’s eyes flash, and I wonder if I’ve hit too close to home. I also wonder if her new husband might have realized the same thing she did – that Sinclair was never sterile, so their inability to conceive was probably a problem with her. Would an Alpha reject a mate that couldn’t give him pups? Is Lydia back here because she has nowhere else to go?

Stop empathizing! The voice in my head admonishes angrily, You can feel bad for her later, right now there’s a battle to win!

Who are you?! I cry in return. What battle? I’m not going to publicly humiliate a woman who’s struggling with fertility.

Struggling with fertility doesn’t mean she isn’t a conniving bitch. The voice replies. And she’s trying to take Sinclair. He’s mine.

Ours.

Before I can reply, Lydia snarls and I have to thrust a hand into Sinclair’s chest to keep him from throwing my body behind his once more. “Better the mark of another than no mark at all. You don’t even know what it truly means to be a mate.” She snaps.

I press my palm to my belly again, drawing her attention to my unborn pup. “What stronger claim could there be than this miracle? I don’t need Dominic’s mark to know I belong to him – and I’m willing to wait for it until we can do it right, in a manner befitting a King and Queen.” I declare, notching my chin up.

Lydia’s expression flickered when I mentioned the pup, and again I felt a rush of sympathy for the other woman, but her eyes hardened and blazed when I called myself a queen. The shifters around us are whispering and muttering among themselves, many glaring at Lydia and grinning at me. I know I’ve done well when Sinclair presses his body flush to mine, his hands circling my waist from behind to help me cradle our pup. A satisfied purr rumbles in his chest as his lips move against my ear, “the baby likes it when Mommy’s fierce.” He shares, and my heart flip flops over hearing myself called Mommy for the first time. “And so do I.” He praises.

Feeling a rush of confidence and an inexplicable knowing that I’m close to the kill, I continue, “And we both know that there are many more ways to claim a mate than with a bite.” I say with a sultry grin, sliding one hand up and around the back of Sinclair’s neck, encouraging his affection. I’ve never done anything so brazen in my life, except perhaps the other night at the bonfire... or in that damned dream. At the same time, it feels completely right that we should be fighting this battle together, and showing off our attraction for all to see.

Lydia takes one furious step towards me, and Sinclair emits a snarl so vicious that everyone around us cowers, Lydia included.

I'm the only one able to withstand the force of his Alpha authority, which works well for our purposes. Since no one knows I'm human, they'll all assume I'm truly Sinclair's equal – in spirit if not brute strength.

Lydia shudders and whimpers before turning tail and fleeing in the opposite direction. For some reason, I feel the strangest urge to chase after her, but Sinclair is holding me too tightly. "Not so fast feisty pants, we have more important things to do than chase after bitter exes." I have to crane my neck to look up at him, but his face is full of pride and anticipation as he announces. "It's time."

Chapter 65 – The Hunt Begins

Ella

It's all come down to this.

My mind reels as I stare into the dark forest. For weeks I feel like Sinclair and I have been trapped in the same pattern: flirting, holding ourselves back, slipping up and falling in too deep, then retreating. It's felt like two steps forward and one step back, but the reality is that those one steps have gradually brought us closer to this point. The wild hunt feels like a turning point for our relationship – a critical test to decide whether we become lovers or stay friends – if that's what you can call us.

I know it's up to me to decide. For all his affection, compliments and terms of endearment, Sinclair has promised to follow my lead when it comes to taking things to the next level. I appreciate his restraint, but there's also a part of me that wants him to take the decision out of my hands. It's just one more impulse this pup has given me that I can't even begin to understand. I've never wanted anyone to decide anything for me in my entire life, yet here I am agonizing over my desire for a man I barely know, wishing I didn't have to be responsible for once in my life.

I think that's the problem. The temptation is so powerful that I want to throw caution to the wind, but I know better. I know so much better. So why am I still debating this?

Because it's Sinclair. He's different. He belongs to us. The little voice in my head encourages.

I don't know what drugs you've been taking, but you really need to get a hold of yourself. I counter, feeling more certain now that my conscience has demonstrated just how insane this pregnancy is making us.

This is temporary. It will pass when I give birth. I can't run around writing checks that my heart won't be able to cash in a few months. Focus on the pup, focus on the future.

I look around at the other participants in the ceremony: other she-wolves dressed in gowns like my own, their mates glued to them like velcro in anticipation of the hunt. I'm sure Sinclair and I looked much the same a few moments ago, but now I've stepped forward to begin the ritual. Ethereal music fills the air, a nearby orchestra playing instruments I've never before seen, as drums and singing voices raise towards the full moon. Gooseflesh raises on my chilled skin, and for the first time since this journey began, I understand what Aileen meant when she said shifters can feel the Goddess's magic. I'm probably just imagining it, like someone who believes they've taken drugs and therefore acts intoxicated, but I could swear the very air feels different tonight.

I feel different tonight.

I close my eyes and raise my face towards the heavens, letting the strange sensations grow. Is it crazy to think I can actually feel the moon on my skin, or that the electricity pulsing through my veins is not merely my own excitement, but something more?

I can feel Sinclair's eyes on me, and I glance back at him as one of the attendants hands me a blazing lantern. Sinclair looks as though he's barely holding it together. He's wearing a fur cape like my own, but underneath he's completely shirtless, sporting only sleek black trousers and bare feet. His green eyes are glowing through the darkness, and I can see his claws and fangs extended. His wolf must be right at the surface, and I remember what he told me about his power being strongest tonight.

I won't be myself. He'd warned me. I'm not sure if he's fully lost himself yet, but I can feel the power rolling off of him in heady waves, at least I imagine I can. It must be so much more intense for the actual shifters. I find myself shivering and turning away before the voice in my head can tell me to go steal a kiss or immediately flee. Instead I take a deep breath and set off into the darkness, starting slowly as the music builds. Hundreds of floating lanterns are released into the sky as I disappear into the forest, and as soon as I'm out of sight, I increase my speed.

Sinclair made me promise not to run once he's caught me, but he didn't say anything about beforehand. I've never been a runner, but tonight nothing sounds better than racing through the trees and feeling the cold winter wind on my skin. The deep snow makes it difficult, but the golden light of my lantern casts a warm glow on the dense evergreen trees, and I race forward without hesitation.

I've been running for about five minutes, amazed that I don't feel even a little bit winded, when a piercing howl shatters the air.

For one astonishing moment my body stops dead, trembling and quaking as Sinclair's wolf calls to me. The sound paralyzes me, no doubt giving him a head start as he takes up his pursuit, but once it's over I'm able to carry on. At this point a true she-wolf would abandon the lantern and clothing to shift, but Sinclair promised me no one would notice I don't. All the other wolves are much more concerned with their own hunts tonight, and they won't even enter the forest until Sinclair howls his victory once I'm caught.

I can still hear the distant music, and adrenaline and exhilaration flood my form as I continue running. I'm grinning so wide my cheeks hurt, and actually on the verge of giggling. Why haven't I ever run in the forest before? I had no idea what I was missing out on.

Sinclair howls again, and again I'm forced to stop until the shuddering need coursing through my body passes. This time I understand why I'm shivering and shaking this way, because the mere sound set my body alight. He might as well have been touching me, bringing all of my neglected nerve endings to life the way only he can. I'm beginning to really dislike his howls. I can't let him catch me, if he keeps howling he'll catch me. It isn't fair. The voice in my head wines, throwing off the oppressive weight of his power to continue our flight.

Run, just run. I answer, not knowing where this is coming from. A few minutes ago I was determined to let Sinclair catch me, but now that seems impossible. It's not even an option. I don't want to be caught. I just want to keep running like this forever. I've never felt so free.

Who is Sinclair to stop us? My conscience inquires. He's not the boss of us, I'm never going to stop running and I don't care what he says.

Yes. I think in agreement. You're right, you're so right. We're never going to stop.

Another howl breaks the air, and I prepare myself to halt and battle the call, but for some reason my body doesn't respond this time. It's as if the third howl has no impact on me at all. Surely I haven't become immune? Am I so far away now that it can't affect me? That doesn't make any sense, he's ten times faster than I am – he's got to be closing the distance with every minute.

I'm still pondering this when I hear a distant growl, and it occurs to me that the third howl was a higher pitch than the first two. Is that supposed to mean something? Is he closing in on me? Was that the victory howl?

I cock my ears to the forest behind me, and sure enough I hear more than just music and owl songs. I expect the steady loping of a gargantuan wolf, but the air is muddled with too many noises – distant snarls and strange crashes, whimpers and whines. I thought the others wouldn't start the hunt until our part was finished? I think, a bolt of fear slicing through me. And that doesn't sound like sex.

In my periphery I think I glimpse a flash of movement, but then an identical flash happens on my other side. I start to whip my head back and forth, trying to get a hold of what I saw. Unfortunately I can't do this and keep my eyes on the path in front of me. I have to choose: look for dangers in my surroundings, or make sure I have an escape route.

The voice in my head isn't just urging me to run for fun now, but with the understanding that something is very wrong here.

Finally I hear the steady thud of a wolf on my trail, his paws crashing and crunching in the dense snow much more swiftly than my own clumsy feet.

But when another howl sounds in the distance, once that does nothing to summon my desire but seems to scream at me to run for my life, I realize: The wolf behind me isn't Sinclair, and he isn't alone.

Chapter 66 – The Hunter Becomes the Hunted

Ella

When I realized I was being chased, I threw off my cape and veered off in another direction, hoping that the wolves weren't close enough to see me yet. If I'm lucky maybe I can throw them off my trail, if only for a moment. I throw down the lantern too. The moonlight is so bright that I can see the forest well enough, and the snow is so deep that I don't have to worry about trodding on rocks or sticks.

I take up the skirts of my dress in both hands, running as fast as I can – faster than I've ever run before. I see a narrow creek on my right, a steady stream of water flowing along the banks, releasing steam into the air. I realize the stream must be thermal, like the pools around the stone circle. I momentarily debate jumping into the waters, both craving the warmth and knowing the water will disguise my scent.

But what if I have to get back out into the snow? I fret. I could die from hypothermia faster than the wolves could catch me.

I don't think so. The voice in my head answers. The wolves will catch you first unless you find a way to throw them off. It's not even like you can climb a tree – they can shift and climb true.

You better be right about this. I moan internally, jumping down into the streambed. The water comes up to my waist, and warmth quickly seeps through my dress. I dive beneath the surface, knowing I'll be faster swimming than running. I don't pause to try and track my pursuers, I simply go as fast as I can, praying this crazy plan will have worked – praying that Sinclair is out there somewhere, coming to help me.

I hate being dependent on anyone else and I hate feeling helpless, but I know that's exactly what I am in this situation. I'm at the mercy of these wolves and Sinclair's swiftness, and that would hurt badly enough even without knowing my weakness is threatening my baby's life as well.

I swim until the water becomes too shallow, jumping back into the snow and taking off again. I hear a roar behind me, and I know I've failed. I didn't throw them off at all, I probably just kept them at bay a while. I scan the forest ahead of me, searching for anything that might help me. Belatedly I realize I should have kept my lantern and set the bastards on fire, but then hindsight is always 20/20.

Cursing myself, I zero in on some boulders, catching sight of a narrow crevice between the huge stones. I know it's my only chance. For once being tiny might help me, but only if the wolves aren't strong enough to break through rock. A month ago I would have thought this was a given, but now I'm not so sure.

I wedge my way into the crevice just in time, for now sooner have I wriggled into the tight space that a huge weight crashes into the rock. Snarls and growls surround me, and clawed paws begin scrabbling at the opening in the rocks, trying to make purchase on my skin and drag me out.

The only piece of dignity I can boast is that I don't wet myself, but I certainly whimper and whine like a baby. I'm sobbing with terror, wishing I'd never agreed to this stupid ritual.

This isn't the first time I've thought I was going to die, but this time it matters a lot more. This time it won't only be my life that's lost. I might be able to come to terms with my own end, but I can't bear the thought of my baby dying before it's even had the chance to be born.

"Please," I pray, knowing the Goddess probably won't care about me, but hoping she'll care about my son. "Please help us."

Sinclair

She's running. My wolf howls with delight.

Of course she's running. I think amusedly, That's the whole point.

No, I mean she's not going to stop. My wolf clarifies, loping around in my head. Mine, she's finally mine!

It's taken all my willpower to wait the full five minutes to give my mischievous little human her head start, and as I prepare to shift, I wonder if my wolf knows something I don't. Surely he's just getting ahead of himself. We won't know what Ella decides until we catch up to her, but he seems to think this is a done deal.

I'd known there was a chance Ella would disobey my instructions and run from me tonight, and my inner wolf had certainly prayed she'd give me the excuse to finally make her mine, but I still feel anxious about the situation. I'd much rather take Ella to bed when I'm in full control, and I know as soon as I shift that will be out the window. At the same time, I warned Ella – I did my part and left the decision in her hands.

I know my reluctance and worry will disappear as soon as I give my wolf free reign, so I give him one last order before transforming. We have to be gentle.

He snarls in reply, as if affronted I might think he'd forget. After all, his job is just to catch her, all the rest comes after I've shifted back again. Even so, I know from experience that the haze of the solstice leaves him largely in control, and I won't take any risks

– not with Ella.

With a sudden blur and a loud crack, I transform, only pausing to howl before I take off into the night. The howl is mostly for show – Ella might hear it, but she won't feel it the way a she-wolf does. She won't be temporarily frozen in place, struggling to fight my power over her, my demand that she answer my call. She won't understand that this is her first chance to submit, that raising her own voice into the air would be to accept me as her mate even before I've caught her.

I pick up Ella's scent and her tracks instantly, a thrill of excitement pulsing through my body as I think about everything I'm going to do once I've caught her. Will she protect herself like she should and stop running, or will she provoke me? Does she want to be with me as badly as I want to be with her? Will her base instincts make her surrender to lust, despite her humanity? Either way I'm going to take her home and spoil her rotten for doing so well with Lydia tonight, but the real question is how much fun we get to have first.

With the magic in the air tonight, I wonder why we've been fighting this so hard. I know all the reasons of course, but under the moon and the stars they all seem so silly. I don't care that Ella isn't a wolf, and I don't care that we've started out on a lie. I just want her.

I howl again, but soon after I catch the scent of other wolves; wolves that shouldn't be anywhere near these forests, especially not tonight. I immediately recognize one, remembering his scent from the alley behind the club where Ella was attacked. My wolf snarls at the mere memory and as much as I want to attack, I have to figure out how many there are, as well as where they're located.

I scent the air again, cocking my ears for more sounds and scanning the dense trees. Fury and fear crash into me when I realize there are at least half a dozen wolves in the woods with Ella and I, and that can only mean one thing: The Prince has chosen the hunt to make his next assassination attempt, only this time, I think he's targeting Ella and I both.

There are four rogues tracking me, but the other two are far ahead. I know instinctively that they've gone after Ella. They must have been in the forest waiting for us already, and now my sweet human and my pup might pay the price for my distraction.

Maybe Lydia was right – I've been so caught up in her that I've gotten sloppy.

Or maybe Linda was part of it – she certainly helped distract you. My wolf suggests viciously.

She might be conniving, but I don't believe that of her. After all, if I'm dead she can't be queen. And in all honesty, the failure would still be mine even if she was plotting against me. Like it or not, I've missed threats brewing right under my nose. It's the canal attack all over again, only this time it's a thousand times worse. I'll never forgive myself if anything happens to Ella and the baby – never!

I have to decide quickly. Do I dispatch the wolves nearest to me so I can run down Ella's attackers without added risk, or do I go straight to Ella and face them all at once. Four is certainly easier to defeat than six, but even one wolf against Ella is too much. I have to reach her before they can harm her. If I pause to fight my own attackers, they could easily kill her.

Unfortunately the rogues seem to understand this too. I'm sprinting ahead, racing towards Ella with every bit of strength and endurance I possess, when a huge red wolf barrels into me from the side.

Chapter 67 – Finding Ella

Sinclair

The rogues aren't as smart as they think they are. Their only chance would have been to attack me all at once. Instead they try to lunge at me two at a time, giving each other time to rest and rebound in between attacks. At first – the first five seconds that is – it works. The red wolf crashes into my side while a big gray beta slams into my right. Then the other two charge me, but as soon as I've seen what they're about – I adapt.

The next time a wolf lunges for me I meet him head on, snatching his neck between my jaws and violently ripping into him with my fangs. As soon as he falls I turn on the other, slashing at the other wolves with my front and hind legs while my mouth rips the next attacker limb from limb. I've tasted their blood now, and my worry for Ella and the baby is growing stronger with every moment that passes.

These four would have been outmatched with me on a good day, but the Prince was an idiot to send them on the Solstice, and he was certainly a fool to have them attack my mate at the same time. Normal wolves can do extraordinary things to protect their families – and I'm no ordinary wolf.

Within minutes their bodies are scattered around me, and I don't feel the slightest bit of remorse for killing them. These wolves are probably some of the same ones responsible for the attack at the canal, and while I might forgive an attack on me, I will never forgive an attack on my pack or the woman they believe is my mate.

Even if I was in a forgiving mood, I can't afford to let them get word back to the Prince. The wolves after Ella will know she hasn't shifted and they probably already communicated that with their friends. They'll realize that Ella isn't truly a she-wolf, and that secret is certainly going to die with them.

I sprint through the forest towards Ella and the other rogues. When I find Ella's abandoned coat and realize she's tried to lay a false trail I'm impressed, and when I realize she's gone into the stream I'm both proud and terrified. I can hear snarling in the distance, which means she's still alive. But how long has she been out of the water, and what have they done to her?

Finally I reach the boulders where Ella has taken refuge. The rogues are so busy clawing impotently at the rocks that they don't even notice my arrival. I thought I would be relieved to find Ella alive – and I am – but nothing prepared me for the primal fury I would feel actually seeing these wolves go after my sweet little human. The sounds of her cries egg me on, making me roar out my wrath so that the bastards will get away from her.

My vision turns to a red haze, and I don't even remember killing the rogues. One moment there's nothing but the blood roaring in my ears and the taste of blood on my fangs, and the next I'm opening my eyes to a scene of utter carnage. I can't recall ever inflicting so much damage on an enemy, I've literally torn them to shreds, and only too late do I consider that Ella will have just listened to all of that.

She's still whimpering and crying, and I can hear her teeth chattering as well. Cursing myself, I shift back into my human form and use some snow to wash the blood from my face and limbs. Trying to shake off the violence, I go to kneel in front of the tiny cave into which Ella has forced herself. "Ella?"

A small whine meets my ears, and I try to steady my heaving breath. "It's alright, little one." I promise. "They're gone. They can't hurt you."

I listen for sounds of movement, and I remember the way she went into shock after the first attack. My Goddess, I think bitterly.

Only a month together and there's already been more than one attack. Some protector I am.

"Can you come out to me, Ella?" I ask gently, wishing I could force my way in there with her. I can smell her blood, though it isn't as strong as the rogue's. Of course, that's not saying much, all the blood that was once inside them is now out, but it doesn't smell like Ella is bleeding badly.

Yet she doesn't move, and fresh panic lances through me – she could have broken bones or frostbite and I wouldn't smell a thing. "Are you hurt? How long have you been out of the water?"

Still there's nothing, and I'm becoming increasingly afraid I'm going to have to break through the rocks to reach her. I begin to purr, hoping this will break through her shock enough to lure her out of hiding. "You did so well evading them and finding a hiding place, sweetheart." I praise. "You gave me time to reach you, but now you have to help me and come out so I can take care of you."

Bending down, I peer into the crevice, wondering if she might take my hand and let me pull her out. When I finally see her, however, I know she isn't in any state to help me. Her beautiful eyes are clenched tightly shut, tears streaming down her cheeks as she clamps her hands over her ears, rocking back and forth in the small space. I doubt she can hear me, and I have a feeling she wouldn't see me even if she opened her eyes.

Ella's arms are covered in defensive wounds where she must have been shielding herself from the attacker's arms reaching in after her, and I immediately know reaching in myself will only frighten her more. I purr more loudly, and Ella's body seems to jolt, but just as quickly she doubles down, as if she's trying to block out the sensations – as if she doesn't trust them. I never knew my heart could break just having someone refuse my comfort, but not being able to reach Ella now, when she needs me most, hurts more than I could have imagined.

“Okay, baby.” I decide, wishing there was any other way, “I wish I could let you stay here until you're ready to come out, but it's too cold.” I sigh. “I'm going to have to break through the rocks.”

I know she can't hear me, but I continue talking to her in the hopes that she might come back to herself and understand.

She doesn't.

Instead I place both of my hands on either side of the break in the boulders, and I summon all of my strength to force them apart.

It doesn't happen immediately, but I think of Ella and our baby being trapped in these rocks forever, and I channel all of my power into destroying her makeshift fortress. A thunderous crack fills the air as they split in two, and I snatch Ella out of the cave before any sediment can fall on her.

The moment I lay a hand on Ella her eye's snap open, but there's no recognition in her brilliant irises. Instead sharp, acrid fear pours out of her, and she thrashes against my hold, trying to break free. I wrap my arms tightly around her small body, but Ella fights me like a wildcat, kicking, hitting, scratching and biting for all she's worth. It's amazing how difficult it is to keep hold of her, and if it weren't so horrible I would be proud of the fight she's putting up.

“Shhh, Ella, it's alright. You're safe. You're safe now.” However her sightless eyes and desperate cries make me think this isn't the first time she's fought this way, and I find myself holding back tears as I finally dig my fingers into a pressure point at the base of her throat, stealing her consciousness.

Little by little, Ella fades into a forced sleep, her body finally going limp in my arms. When it's over I slump onto the ground, gathering her precious form in my lap and pressing my hand to her belly. Our babe is whole and unharmed, but severely distressed. I try to send waves of comfort through our bond, beginning to purr again, but I think he can feel my own guilt and misery. He settles slightly, but pulses of anxiety continue to surge through our bond, as well as flashes of the fear and anguish Ella felt during the attack.

I don't stay there long, too worried about Ella catching hypothermia to give into my own body's demands for rest. However for the moment that I do remain, I wonder how it ever came to this: Naked, slumped on the ground surrounded by dead bodies, cradling the mother of my child in my arms and weeping my apologies into her neck.

I have to get her home. I have to make sure she's alright. But as soon as I know Ella and the baby are okay, I'm going to find and kill the person responsible for this.

Chapter 68 – Aftermath

Sinclair

“Dominic?” My beta, Hugo, stands behind me, watching me with a worried expression. “We need you in the war room.”

“I want to be here when she wakes up.” I insist, keeping my gaze locked on Ella. She’s asleep in my bed, her small body curled beneath the covers. Her arms are bandaged from shoulder to fingertip, and bruises dot her fair skin in too many places to count.

Guilt ties my insides into knots just looking at them – some of those bruises were my doing, the results of my efforts to restrain her. Ella had remained unconscious as I carried her out of the forest, but when she woke, she fought me as hard as ever. The doctor was forced to give her a strong dose of a sleeping draft in order to treat her wounds, though he promised the potion would help break her shock.

“I understand, but we’re still cleaning up the scene and we need to make sure no one finds out about this.” Hugo sighs. It was thanks to Ella’s quick thinking and endurance that the attack happened so deep in the forest, far deeper than other couples would be running on the hunt.

I was able to evacuate her on the opposite side of the park, free from the prying eyes of the pack or the media, and my men had immediately rushed in to clean up the bodies before they could be discovered. “Until we can prove the prince was behind it, rogue attacks will just make you look weak.”

“I am weak.” I state hoarsely, wallowing in more than a small amount of self-pity and loathing. “It’s my fault. I didn’t see them coming. I knew the Prince was plotting against us and I still didn’t see them coming.”

“That isn’t fair Dom.” Hugo growls, his voice very stern. “You can only prepare for so much and none of us can foresee the future.”

I’m sure Ella doesn’t blame you.”

“Well she should.” I bite back, emotion clogging my throat. “You know, she was so traumatized she couldn’t even recognize me?”

That our baby was beside itself after weathering all her fear?”

“I know.” Hugo confirms grimly. “But she’s heavily sedated. It will be some time before she wakes, and if you want to make her safe, then the best thing you can do for her is to come to the war room and deal with the fallout. Help us strategize against the Prince. We’ll place extra guards at her door.”

“Not at her door.” I correct, seeing the sense of his words even though I hate hearing logic at the moment. “I want them posted in here with her. And I’ll come to the war room, but there’s something I have to do first.”

“Dominic –”

“If anyone has an inside track on the Prince’s plans, it’s my brother.” I interrupt, scrubbing a hand over my face. “We need intel if we’re going to effectively strategize – and he has it.”

“Alright.” Hugo agrees. “Just try not to lose your temper. Murdering your brother isn’t the kind of PR we need right now.”

I huff a humorless laugh, “Spoil sport.”

The sun is rising over the mountains as I pull into Roger’s driveway, taking measured breaths and conducting silent counting exercises to try and stay calm. In my current mood it wouldn’t take much provocation for me to kill anyone who crosses my path, and Roger is more infuriating than most.

I slide from the car and stride up the garden path, urging my wolf to settle. No violence. Violence is bad. Just think how disappointed Ella would be. I know it’s ironic that I’m urging myself not to resort to violence after the slaughter I committed last night, but that was different. I didn’t have a choice then – I do now.

The door swings open soon after I knock, and Roger’s surprised face appears. He looks so genuinely shocked to see me, I actually contemplate whether he might not have been involved in the attack. Then again, my brother has always been a good actor.

“Dominic, to what do I owe the pleasure?” He drawls, making it clear that my visit is anything but pleasurable.

I push past him, knocking into his shoulder and forcing him back from the doorway as I go. “Were you involved?” I demand, my voice little more than a growl, “Did you know what he was planning?”

Roger blinks, “what are you talking about?”

“Don’t play dumb with me, Roger.” I scowl, “I know you’ve been working with the Prince.”

He offers me a humorless laugh. “You’re being paranoid, Dom.”

“Bull,” I snap, “You expect me to believe you just happened to turn up in the same back alley where Ella was being attacked in the middle of the night by coincidence? Or that the Prince mysteriously discovered I haven’t claimed Ella when you’re the only person who has that information?”

“I think you’re forgetting all your staff – your guards, your doctors, Hugo and Aileen.” Roger counters smoothly.

“My people are loyal – you are the only person who knew who also has a vendetta against me.” I combat.

“That you know of.” He intones ominously.

“Ella was almost killed last night.” I thunder, “I understand you hating me, but how could you be so cruel to an innocent she-wolf!”

“Wait,” Roger protests, visibly paling. “Back up, what happened last night?”

“Stop pretending you don’t know!” The words burst from my chest in a vicious snarl, and I just barely hold onto my temper. Use your words Dominic! “I suppose you ran in to protect her the first time to try and earn her trust, but when that didn’t work you decided to just sacrifice her to the rogues.”

“I don’t have any idea what you’re talking about!” Roger shouts back, losing his own temper. “On my life, Dominic, I had no idea there had been a second attack!”

“Why should I believe you?” I grumble, clenching and unclenching my fists.

Roger raises his hands, his mouth a thin line. To my surprise, he seems genuinely shaken, and I wonder if I underestimated his interest in Ella. “Look, I admit I knew about the first attack in advance. The Prince planned on killing her outright, but I thought saving her might get me some leverage with her. I... I thought if she trusted me I could convince her to leave you.”

“What, so you could have her for yourself?” I bite, fighting the urge to reel back. I’ve never known Roger to admit any of his misdeeds. He must truly like Ella.

“No.” Roger rolls his eyes, “Just so you would lose the campaign. And yes, I told the Prince she hadn’t been claimed, but I swear on my life, I was never going to let him hurt her. I didn’t know about last night.”

“Do you really despise me so much?” I grind out, “That you would rather a tyrant take over the realm just to spite me? Do you have no concept of the damage he’ll do if he wins? The atrocities he'll inflict?"

Roger's face closes off, and I wonder if he truly was so blinded by his resentment of me that he never considered the consequences of his schemes. "I just wanted to hurt you Dom. I admit I was being selfish."

"Well I've got news for you," I declare ferociously. "I plan on winning this campaign, and you can be with me or against me. But you need to decide, because if you continue to make yourself my enemy, I'm going to treat you as complicit to the Prince's crimes." Pacing I let my wolf flash in my eyes. "Further, if anything happens to Ella I will hold you personally responsible – and I'm not talking exile, brother."

"Is she okay?" He gulps.

"Physically, she'll heal." I respond, trying to keep the emotional from my voice. "I'm not so sure if she'll be okay mentally."

He flinches, and I wonder if he really does care for her. "Are you going to tell her what I did?"

"I should." I answer gruffly, "But she's been through enough already." I start to turn away, before changing my mind and whirling back to face him, "You know she actually defended you to me? She feels for you, even though you've done nothing but try to hurt and manipulate her."

Roger's face draws tight, and I see a glimmer of something akin to shame on his features. "I didn't know."

"That's how good she is. She'd be your ally if you let her." I explain, "And instead you chose to terrorize her."

"I'm sorry." Roger professes, ashen-faced. "I know she's good. I saw that in her from the beginning. I think that's part of why I was so angry when you found her. You don't deserve someone so pure."

"It's not my fault I was born stronger, Roger!" I state simply, disgusted at how broken our relationship has become over things that are not my fault. "Or that Mom sacrificed herself for me."

He clears his throat, looking down at the ground. "It felt better, to blame you..." He confesses slowly, "Than to believe it was all for nothing."

I'm both grief stricken and amazed to hear him speak this way. We've never connected like this before, and I know Ella is the reason we are now. "Well if you want to make it up to us, you can go back to the Prince and find out what he's planning next."

Roger raises his chin, looking thoughtful. "You want me to be a double agent?"

"It's not about what I want. It's about whether you want to let a madman take over the Kingdom. It's about whether you want Ella and your nephew to live or die."

"Alright." He nods. "I'll do it."

Chapter 69 – Sinclair Calls In an Expert

Sinclair

It's mid-morning by the time I leave Roger's house, and I dial Cora's phone number, both because she needs to know about what happened, and because I need help caring for Ella. Despite the doctor's promises, I'm worried that Ella won't recover as quickly as he's predicting and if anyone knows what to expect, her sister surely must.

"Mr Sinclair?" She sounds uncertain as she answers, as if she suspects her caller ID might be lying to her.

"Good morning, Cora." I greet her, taking a deep breath. "I'm sorry to disturb you when you're at work, but I'm calling with some bad news."

I can feel the anxiety in her sharp intake of breath, and worry imbues her soft voice, "Is Ella okay? Is the baby?"

"They're both at home resting." I share, hoping this will assuage the worst of her fears. "But there was another attack last night."

"Another one?" Cora squeaks, indignation bleeding into her voice as she continues. "I thought you were supposed to be this all powerful Alpha? You're supposed to be keeping her safe! My sister has known you for a month and she's already had people trying to kill her twice!"

I understand her outrage, and I agree with it completely. "I know. You have every right to be upset with me. I'm not very happy with myself right now... I failed her." I confess, exhaling heavily. "I'm not turning out to be a very good father so far."

"I..." Cora doesn't seem to know what to make of this. "Tsk," She clears her throat. "Well is she alright? Does she need anything?"

"She's a bit scraped up, but I'm afraid the worst damage was psychological. It wasn't like last time. She... she didn't recognize me afterwards." I wonder if the human can hear how upsetting I find this particular detail, but when she remains silent I forge on.

"She's in a deep state of shock – the doctor used the word dissociative, like she completely disconnected from her body to protect her mind."

Cora swears, but she doesn't sound surprised. "I'll leave work right now." She offers, "I can be there within a half hour."

"Wait." I advise, "She's been sedated and I'm not sure when she'll wake up." For a moment I debate whether or not I should voice my next thought. Ella hasn't spoken to me much about her childhood, but I know that she feels very protective of her sister.

Moreover, I remember the way she acted after the attack in the alley, refusing to show her upset to Cora, insisting she was fine.

“And... I don’t want to sound insensitive because I know you love Ella and want to be with her, but I’m afraid if you’re there she’ll be so focused on not worrying you, that she’ll try to pretend like nothing happened and ignore her own wellbeing.”

Cora thinks about this for a minute. “You’re probably right about that. Ella has always been the caretaker... she really doesn’t know how to deal with having the tables turned on her.”

“So I’ve learned.” I muse aloud. “So I think it would be best to give it a couple of days.”

“Alright.” Cora agrees, “But I can still help you. I know all her creature comforts, the things that soothe her best. I can send you a list.”

“That would be wonderful.” I express honestly, thankful I decided to make this call before Ella wakes. By the time she returns to consciousness I can have all her favorite things already on hand and ready to comfort her.

“But Sinclair –” Cora interrupts my thoughts.

“Please call me Dominic, Cora.” I correct gently.

“Dominic,” She repeats patiently. “It’s not my place to tell you the details... but I think you should know,”

“Yes?” I prompt her, having a dreadful premonition that I don’t want to hear whatever it is she’s about to say.

“These attacks aren’t the first traumas Ella has endured at the hands of men.” She explains vaguely, and I both want to demand further explanations and forbid her from saying more. “She went through a lot when we were still children... she endured some of it to protect me and the other kids.” Cora trails off for a moment, sounding positively miserable. My mind immediately floods with horrible images of Ella, even more sweet and innocent than she is now, suffering at the hands of the adults meant to care for her.

“You need to be prepared that she won’t just be dealing with the trauma of the attacks when she wakes – but all the bad memories they’ll have dredged up.”

“That’s why you weren’t surprised... when I told you she dissociated.” I guess, hating every word of this conversation. “You’ve seen this before.”

“Yes.” Cora confirms, sounding remorseful. “But you’re not wrong either. She wants to protect the people she cares about even when she’s in no state to do so.”

Something we have in common. I think bitterly.

“I suppose it’s two sides of the same coin.” I say instead. “Whether she’s doing it to protect herself from the pain or put on a brave face for someone else, it’s still repressing the bad feelings.”

“Oh.” Cora murmurs, in the tone of someone having an epiphany.

“What?” I inquire, not liking this one bit.

“Well when you put it that way... I wonder if maybe we’re wrong about it being for someone else.” Cora shares. “I mean maybe that’s how it started, but at the end of the day it still means she never learned how to cope with these things.”

A wave of understanding crashes into me. If Ella has only ever repressed the bad things in her life, it won’t matter if her sister is there or not, she’ll try to do the same with this – because it’s all she knows. Only now do I realize that Ella didn’t just pretend she was fine with Cora after the first attack. She might have come to me for safety, but she was a hollow shell as I tended her wounds, and when I encouraged her to share her feelings she distracted me with an argument. She never even cried about the attack, only my deception.

Ffuucckk. I think, furious with myself for missing this, for letting the wiley minx outwit me.

“So what do I do?” I ask, hoping Cora will have the answer.

“Well I’ve never been able to refuse Ella anything when she’s hurting.” Cora remarks, sounding disheartened, “Especially not when it’s my fault. Which means I’ve never called out her avoidance, I’ve just... well, I think I’ve enabled her – letting her tell me what she wants and never questioning or pushing back on whether it’s healthy.”

It seems like Cora and I have more in common than I realized. It also seems she’s sharper than I gave her credit for, as I’m receiving her message loud and clear. I might be blaming myself for putting Ella in danger, but I can’t let that guilt me into coddling her. “But you’re an Alpha.” She elaborates. “So maybe you’ll be able to do what I never could – and not let her get away with pretending everything is fine.”

“You can count on it.” I nod, taking this mission to heart. Ella is my responsibility, and it’s in my blood to take care of my pack.

She might be human, but Ella is pack now, and I know her in some ways her sister certainly doesn't. I also know a thing or two about helping stubborn she-wolves find catharsis – and from what I've seen, Ella will be no different.

"Thank you for telling me, Cora." I profess genuinely. "And thank you for the advice. I'll call you as soon as Ella is ready for visitors."

"Good luck." Cora offers, "and just let me know if you need anything else."

"I will." Hanging up, I realize that talking with Ella's sister has completely changed my expectations for what the next few hours hold. I was prepared for Ella to wake up in another fog or to come home to a basket case, but if the doctor is right and she's lucid

– I'll probably be dealing with one very obstinate little human in total denial.

When Cora's email hits my inbox, listing out all of Ella's favorite foods, music, films, and amenities, I make a detour to the store.

Stocking up on candles, essential oils, bubble bath, fancy scrubs and masks, dark chocolate, flowers and various groceries, I plan out exactly how I'll set up my rooms once I get home. I'm hoping I can get everything done before Ella wakes, and also praying we're wrong about Ella's propensity to bury her traumas.

However I know my prayers haven't been answered as soon as I walk into my rooms and discover that Ella is not only wide awake, but standing in the middle of the room instructing her dressmaker to sew sleeves onto her ballgown to cover her bandages. In the midst of all the excitement I actually forgot the masquerade was tonight – but Ella, it seems, did not.

She smiles at me in greeting, but I can only glare in return. "What in the Goddess's name do you think you're doing?"

Chapter 70 – Ella Loses her Temper

Ella

I woke up in a thick haze of confusion, feeling as though I've been run over by a truck, but not remembering why. Muscles I didn't even know I possessed are screaming at me, demanding ice packs and pain killers, and I have a thumping headache. For a moment I wonder if I somehow have a hangover, recalling the groggy morning afters I used to experience following nights out on the town.

Slowly the memories trickled in: the wild hunt taking a horrible turn; the rogue wolves chasing me in the forest; my near scrape with hypothermia; and fighting for my life while knowing it will all be over once they catch me. When I reach the point where I'm reliving being trapped in the boulders, feeling their claws ripping into my skin as I try to hold them off, I rush to the bathroom.

Emptying my stomach into the toilet for reasons that have nothing to do with my pregnancy and everything to do with the sheer terror I feel, I collapse on the tiles and try to force the horrible memories from my brain.

Other unwelcome images crowd into my thoughts even as I struggle to bury this most recent horror, ghosts from my past seeing an opportunity to rear their terrible heads. Breathing deeply, I force them back into the iron safe in the back of my mind, shoving the memories of last night inside with them. It isn't easy, but I'm well practiced at stowing unpleasant things away like this, protecting myself from their torment. When the work is done, I feel dazed and numb, but that's better than wallowing in agony.

Pulling myself up off the floor, I study my bandaged arms in the mirror, realizing they'll clash with my ball gown's off-the-shoulder cut. I call the dressmaker first thing, asking her to hurry to my side. The morning papers tell me that the bloody events of my first wild hunt went undetected from the media and the general public, but today is the Solstice itself – it's more important than ever that Sinclair and I make a strong showing.

The dressmaker arrives shortly, surprising my guards – who apparently didn't realize I was awake. She suggests tight-fitted sleeves the same color as my flesh, to disguise my bandages without compromising the gown's design, and also offers to sew me a pair of matching gloves to help hide my injuries. I agree and she quickly makes the adjustments. By early afternoon the gown is complete, and I'm standing in front of the mirror studying the effect.

When Sinclair barges in halfway through the fitting, I'm expecting him to compliment my quick thinking. I smile at him, feeling proud of my efforts, but he only glares. "What in the Goddess's name do you think you're doing?"

His growling voice sends a shiver down my spine, but I summon a soft chuckle. "Well I can't very well go to the ball looking like a mummy." I answer, nodding towards my white bandages.

Sinclair stalks forward, dismissing the dressmaker with a curt "Leave us." Once the door closes behind her, he bears down on me, towering above me with a foreboding expression on his handsome face. "Ella you're not going to the ball."

"I'm sorry, are you auditioning to be my evil step mother?" I quip, astonished by his apparent anger.

"This isn't a joke." Sinclair informs me sternly. "A few hours ago you were bloody catatonic."

"I'm better now." I shrug, turning back to the mirror and pretending I don't see his thunderstruck expression. "I felt a bit groggy from all the doctor's drugs at first, but that passed ages ago."

Sinclair shakes his head, muttering in something akin to disbelief. "Goddess, Cora was right."

"Right about wh—" I begin, processing his words too late. As soon as I do I turn on him, understanding slamming into me. "You called Cora? You told her? Why would you do that?!"

"Because she's your sister, she loves you and she had a right to know you were hurt." He declares, turning me back towards the mirror and unzipping my gown. I try to wrench away from him but it doesn't work.

"Dominic stop!" I insist, backing out of his reach and clutching the garment to my chest. "You should have talked to me before calling Cora. It wasn't necessary to upset her."

"At least one of you is upset!" He exclaims, baffling me completely.

"What on earth is wrong with you?" I demand, feeling my annoyance devolve into outrage. "Why are you being like this?"

"Well to start with, the mother of my pup was almost killed last night but you're pretending like nothing happened!" Sinclair bursts.

I feel a familiar rush of disappointment to be reduced to 'the mother of his pup', but I'm not surprised.

"I'm not denying it happened," I correct him simply. "But it wasn't a big deal. You're fine, I'm fine. It was scary in the moment but it all turned out okay."

I can see Sinclair wants to reach for me, to grab me and turn me to face him, but he's obviously wary of touching my wounds.

Instead he circles in front of me, again imposing on my personal space with his big body. "Ella nothing about this situation is okay!" He asserts firmly, searching my face for signs that his words are sinking in and becoming even more upset when they don't. "And I don't believe for one second that you are as unaffected by all this as you're pretending."

"I'm not pretending." I insist. "I know you think I'm this fragile thing, but I'm not, Dominic."

He sighs, wearing the beleaguered expression of someone at his wits end. "It isn't fragile or weak to be affected by a near death experience, Ella."

"I know that." I inform him stubbornly, "That isn't what I meant, just that you want me to behave according to your expectations..."

but everyone handles trauma differently."

"Well if I thought you were handling it, I wouldn't care what method you chose." Sinclair grumbles. "What bothers me is seeing you ignore it."

"So what, you want me to be upset?" I inquire, aghast. "Why, so you can rush in and play the hero?"

"Of course I don't want you to be upset!" He rumbles, catching my waist. "But I also don't want you hurting yourself by repressing your feelings. These things don't just go away, Ella, if you don't let them out they fester and grow toxic inside of you."

I notch my chin up, my own blood beginning to boil now. "I have the rest of my life to process what happened, but I'll be damned if I'm going to let the Prince win this campaign. Don't you think he wants us to stay home and lick our wounds?" I demand, surprising myself with the force of my convictions.

I want to convince Sinclair not to coddle me, but I also want to make the Prince pay for trying to harm my unborn child. "He shouldn't get away with what he did last night! I don't care what he does to me, but I won't stand for him trying to kill our baby."

"Well you should care what he does to you!" Sinclair explodes, pacing in front of me and looking as though he can't decide whether to be annoyed or impressed with my defiance. "And your wellbeing is more important than showing him up."

"That's your opinion." I hiss, crossing my arms over my chest. "I disagree."

Sinclair narrows his eyes, pulling my body flush against his and letting me feel the full weight of his disapproval. “We’re not going to the ball, Ella.” He declares, his fingers digging into my tender flesh. “We’re going to talk about this whether you like it or not.”

“You can’t make me.” I combat, my lip curling with disdain, “And I don’t need you to make me feel better, because I’m fine.”

“No, you aren’t.” Sinclair insists, seeming resigned but determined as he looms over me. “I know, because I’m not and it didn’t even happen to me.”

“Just stop it!” I shout, fighting back tears. Why won’t he let this go? Why won’t he just let me deal with it in my own way? I can feel myself spiraling out of control. I can feel the bad feelings hammering against the locked door in my mind, encouraged by Sinclair’s warmth and understanding. Something inside me wants to cave to his dominance, but I can’t let that happen. I can’t release all that darkness – it will swallow me whole. “I’ve made up my mind!”

“Have you even cried, Ella?” Sinclair continues, stalking me across the room. “Have you let yourself feel what they did to you?”

“I said stop it!” I repeat, pushing at his broad chest, “Just leave me alone!”

“I’m not going to do that, baby.” He states gravely, continuing to pursue me.

“Of course not!” I accuse, “You pretend you’re doing this for me but really you’re helping yourself. You don’t care what I want.”

“I do, but what you want and what you need aren’t always the same.” Sinclair says, repeating the same Alpha nonsense he’s been preaching from day one.

Before I can stop myself, I’m surging forward, fueled by a strange and reckless courage. “I am so sick of your condescending bullshit,” I cry, smacking his hands away, “You’re a wolf so you get to boss me around, you’re a man so you know what I need better than I do – well I don’t accept that!”

My feeble swats, pushing back against his attempts to console me, grow more and more desperate, until I lash out with all my strength and strike Sinclair across the face. A loud clap rings through the air, and only too late do I realize what I’ve done.

Sinclair’s wolf blazes to life in his eyes, and I can only whimper, turn tail – and run.

Chapter 71 – Ella Gets a Lesson in Catharsis

Ella

Every instinct I possess is telling me to get away from Sinclair as fast as I can, but he catches me around the waist before I can move two feet. I know I've made a terrible mistake, and I don't have any idea where the impulse to strike him came from. I've never raised a hand against anyone in my life, and certainly not a man as dangerous as Sinclair – a predator who could snap me up in one bite.

When I'm yanked to a stop in his arms, I panic. "I'm sorry! I didn't mean it, I don't know what happened." I exclaim, squirming despite my injuries. He lugs me up against his chest, keeping my body flush against him.

Sinclair emits a dark chuckle, and I realize he hasn't lost his temper. Far from it, he's entirely in control, but he's also not going to let me get away with hitting him. "Tsk, sweet Ella, I know exactly what happened." He purrs, "but you're not sorry – not yet anyway." His lips graze my ear, his deep voice turning my insides to jelly, "But you will be."

"Dominic please—" I beg, squirming in his arms, desperately trying to free myself from his grasp.

"I warned you, little one. This was your last strike." He answers coolly, "Now stop wriggling before you hurt yourself."

At once I'm struck by the difference I feel being trapped in his arms. If one of those rogues had caught me, I would have been too afraid to anger them to risk rebelling. After all, I've experienced the dreadful paralysis that occurs when you're too terrified to fight back against an attacker more than once. Yet I feel no such fear with Sinclair. I know he means to punish me, and yet I feel completely safe.

The ball gown is stripped from my body, and Sinclair settles on the bed, laying my body face down over his lap. "What are you doing?" I whimper, trying to rear up.

One of Sinclair's massive palms settles at the base of my spine, holding me in place as his free hand traces the curve of my bare bottom. "What do you think I'm doing?" He inquires, sounding as though he's taking far too much pleasure in this.

"You can't be serious!" I protest, "This is barbaric! I'm not a child!"

"You're right." Sinclair croons, still grazing his fingers over my skin and making the bundle of nerves at the apex of my thighs swell and plump with rushing blood. "you're not a child, which means you should know better than to throw tantrums and strike people."

“But I’m pregnant,” I remind him, hoping he’ll take mercy. “You could hurt the baby.”

“Trust me sweetheart, if spankings harmed unborn pups my kind would have died out a long time ago.” Sinclair drawls, massaging the tense muscles of my lower back.

“Breeding she-wolves need to feel their mate’s dominance more than anyone else.”

The word “spanking” echoes in my mind, almost as if it’s some foreign term from another language. I know exactly what it means, but it seems impossible that I could truly be in this predicament. I’ve known plenty of punishments in my time, but none like this. None from someone who actually cares about me, and none that excite me despite my better judgment.

“Well that’s fine for you and your twisted were-friends, but I’m not into that sort of thing!” I insist, trying to ignore the flames engulfing my body. I can feel myself growing wet already, and I’m horrified when Sinclair scents the air, a satisfied rumble sounding in his chest. Surely he can’t smell my arousal? Right?

“Is that the story you want to stick with, Ella?” Sinclair questions, amusement heavy in his velvety tones as his fingers dip dangerously close to my swollen sex. No, no, no. I think. It’s too embarrassing! I’m sure I’ve never been this turned on in my life – but what does that say about me? What’s wrong with me that I like this?

I whine, trying to jerk out of his reach. “This isn’t fair, you’re not the boss of me!” Why am I still provoking him? Why am I not begging for mercy?

“We’ll just see about that.” Sinclair intones, still massaging my backside. Belatedly I realize he’s warming my skin, preparing me for his discipline. When the first swat finally lands, I rear up, crying out in protest. I’m sure Sinclair is only using a fraction of his strength, but it still hurts. Even so, I know my reaction is more outrage than actual pain.

I kick my legs and beat my fists against Sinclair’s thighs, but he easily restrains me. This is so confusing, how can I feel safer being confined by his strong arms than I did when I was lashing out wildly? He lands another swat, on the opposite cheek this time – spreading the heat over my raised buttocks equally. He starts slowly, continuing to warm my skin until I’m accustomed to the sting, and then increasing his efforts.

I fight like a hellcat, furious that he’s doing this and yet more turned on than I can ever remember being. Something is wrong with me. I decide. Only someone deeply disturbed would enjoy this. He’s actually spanking me, like I’m a naughty child instead of the mother of his baby. The worst part is his deliciously dirty words, telling me what a bad girl I’ve been, scolding me for my misbehavior and yet praising my arousal – telling me how natural it is, how delicious I smell.

He doesn't let up until I stop trying to escape his hold, until I submit to his discipline and let go of my own control. When his relentless swats finally slow, I catch myself undulating, raising my bottom to meet his hand. With considerable effort, I force myself to still. "Is it over?" I ask miserably, trying to sound as pitiful as possible.

"On any other occasion it would be," Sinclair shares, sounding resigned now. "But you need to cry, Ella. You need to deal with the attack."

"But I don't want to." I moan, feeling very immature now.

"It's okay, I'm going to help you." Sinclair promises, stroking my spine. "And afterwards I promise I'll make you feel good."

"No, please... I don't want to cry." I confess, my voice very small now.

"Why not?" Sinclair asks. "What's so terrible about crying?"

Sniffing, I pluck up the courage to tell him my fears. After all – the man just spanked me, if I can be honest with anyone, it's him.

"I'm afraid if I start I won't be able to stop. I don't want to hurt."

Sinclair clucks sympathetically, clearly understanding that I'm not talking about physical pain. "I'll be with you the whole time." He promises. "I'm not going to let you face it alone."

I try to resist my instincts to submit as long as I can, holding myself tense as the swats rain down on my upturned bottom, growing sharper and more delectable with every volley. I might have been able to resist if it weren't for Sinclair's encouragement.

Now instead of telling me how naughty I've been he keeps insisting it's alright, that I'm safe and he'll take care of me.

It doesn't take much then, a few good swats and I collapse into Sinclair's arms, sobbing out my anguish into his legs until he pulls me up into his lap. I wince and hiss when my sore backside meets with his thighs, but he kisses and croons and rocks me as I work through the pain, and soon I forget about the indignity and outrage of my spanking.

"I'm sorry I was such a brat." I confess, nuzzling my face against his chest and breathing in his scent.

"I love your every mood." Sinclair assures me, "you never need to apologize for being yourself."

I shake my head. “When you say things like that I think you’re too good to be true.” I admit. “I don’t trust it.”

“That’s okay.” Sinclair affirms. “I’m not going to be scared off because you’re a bit skittish, Ella. You’re giving me an heir – I’m in this for the long haul.”

My heart sinks at the reminder he’s only doing this because I’m carrying his son, but I feel so cozy in Sinclair’s arms that I can’t bring myself to protest. He continues petting and cuddling me until my tears slow, though my rear end is still on fire. I’ve never known so many conflicting feelings.

I’ve been thoroughly punished, confronted my trauma and grief, and yet I’m also beside myself with lust. In fact, my desire is the only thing Sinclair has yet to satisfy, and I’m all too aware he vowed to take care of that as well.

As if he’s reading my mind, Sinclair slides his hand between my legs, feeling my sodden core and purring with approval. “Now, would you like me to make you feel good?”

Chapter 72 – Ella have a deal

Ella

Yes, yes, yes! The little voice in my head chants, so forcefully the words almost spill out of my mouth. I stop them just in time, even though I can't stop my hips from jerking up towards Sinclair's hand. Still, I manage to clasp my fingers around his wrist before he can make contact with my aching clit, even as my blood sings for release.

I desperately want to let Sinclair's give me the pleasure he's offering, but I feel so overwhelmed by all this. Too many things have happened in the last 24 hours, and I'm beyond confused by my reaction to Sinclair's discipline. All my emotions have been thrust together, smashed up and blended into a violent, swirling maelstrom– too muddled to differentiate. It's as though I've been completely unmoored, no long understanding my own heart or mind.

I look up at Sinclair, my eyes wide and still stinging with leftover tears. He's wearing that ravenous expression that makes me feel like he's about to gobble me up, but there's a softness in his eyes – an understanding that my body's base instincts are not on the same page with my distraught mind.

"I don't think I'm ready for that." I confess, my voice very soft. How surreal is it, that twenty four hours ago I was ready to give myself to him completely? To let him make love to me right there in the middle of the forest, despite all our efforts to keep our relationship platonic?

Maybe the Prince did us a favor with his attack, I think bitterly. He kept us from taking a step we wouldn't be able to take back – from making a terrible mistake.

How can you say that? My conscience demands. Look at what Sinclair just did for you.

What? Spank me like a child? Make me cry like a baby? I bite back.

You know you feel better now, The infuriating voice replies, It hurts, but hurting is better than feeling nothing.

I'm not so sure about that. The feelings that flowed out of me after the spanking provided an entirely different kind of release than the one I need now, pouring out pent up emotions with no other outlet than tears. However I'm acutely aware that those feelings were only a drop in the bucket, the surface waters of a bottomless well of anguish I am not prepared to face.

Ignoring my conscience, I peek up at the huge Alpha. "Is that okay?"

“Ella, of course it’s okay.” Sinclair answers, studying me closely. “Do you want me to leave you, so you can take care of it yourself?” He offers, though there’s a low, growly quality to his voice that makes me think his wolf doesn’t like this idea one bit.

“No.” I object immediately, grasping for his shirt before I can think better of it. I don’t want him to leave, to lose his soothing touch– but I also have a sneaking suspicion that staying in his lap is a bad idea. I can feel his hardness digging into my sore backside, and I’m both squirming to relieve the sting of my punished flesh and the ache between my legs.

“Easy sweetheart.” Sinclair chuckles, “I’m not going anywhere.” He kisses my hair. Then, seeming to sense the problem, he sets me beside him on the bed. I wince, preferring the feel of his warm thighs over the cool silk of the duvet, but before I can feel too sorry for myself Sinclair slides his palm to my bare belly, feeling for the pup.

“How is he?” I ask, feeling both guilty for not asking sooner, but also afraid of hearing the answer. How much of my ordeal was the pup able to feel? Surely if he can sense my feelings he can feel my fear and pain. Is he also aware that his father just put me over his knee? Oh that is so wrong – no child should have to know those things about their parents.

“I wish you could see your face right now.” Sinclair teases, “But I promise he’s much too young to understand any of this. All he knows is that you were sad, and that you feel better now we’re together. He feels better too.”

“Was he very frightened last night?” I inquire, closing my eyes and leaning into his side.

“He was distressed, because he could feel your fear, but everything he knows is in response to you. And his own feelings haven’t become more complicated than sad or happy – they won’t until after he’s born.” He explains.

“But you could tell what he was making me crave.” I remind him, striving to understand.

Sinclair nods, “Hunger, pain, tiredness, those are all reflexive instincts, not emotions.” I sigh, taking this in and pressing my nose to his chest and breathing in his scent. “You see?” I can hear a smile in his voice. “You’re soothed my scent, so he’s happy.”

“But I thought I liked smelling you because it’s what he needs?” I murmur.

“That’s the way with mothers and pups – that’s why I say you have a connection every bit as magical as my own. Your wants and needs become one in the same.” Sinclair shares.

“Okay.” I breathe, knowing that the harder I think about this, the less sense it will make. The more time that passes, the more I’m learning that magic and logic do not always mix.

We pass the next few moments in silence, and though I’m still so needy I think I might scream, I also haven’t forgotten the reason we fought. My ball gown remains in a puddle on the floor, it’s gauzy, gemstone studded skirts glinting up at me in the low lighting. “Dominic?”

“Yes?” He prompts, running his fingers up and down my arm in the most distracting way. His touch is featherlight, and I know it’s intended to comfort me rather than excite, but I’m beginning to think that it’s impossible to be in physical contact with this man without being turned on. Hell, I was even turned on when he was spanking me – and it hurt like hell. On some level I understand it was his dominance I liked, rather than the pain, but it still seems so wrong.

“I think I need you to stop touching me.” I whisper, hating myself even as I say it.

“Okay.” He agrees, reluctantly shifting my small body away from his. I instantly feel cold and incomplete, and my feelings must show on my face because Sinclair laughs and taps his finger on my nose. “You asked for it, beautiful.”

“I know.” I complain, pulling the duvet up around me so that I won’t feel so exposed. Sinclair watches my movement with narrowed eyes, and I can see he’s holding back some bossy statement. Probably something about not hiding myself from him, though he seems to understand I won’t calm down as long as his gaze is raking over my naked skin. “I want to talk about the ball.”

“Ella–”

“No!” I insist, cutting him off, “Please just hear me out?”

Sinclair exhales heavily, “Go ahead.”

“Look, you were obviously right that I wasn’t okay,” I begin, feeling resigned. “But I wasn’t wrong either. We can’t let the Prince win.”

“We’re not.” Sinclair promises. “But you need your rest. You’ve been through a lot.”

“I’ve been through worse.” I announce, surprising us both. I didn’t intend on sharing that with Sinclair, but I need him to know I’m not going to fall to pieces at the first sign of danger. He doesn’t look surprised, he merely grimaces, as if he hates hearing this but also wants to ask for more details. Sensing this, I forge ahead before he can act on his impulse. “You made such a big deal about the Solstice, about how much these events mean. If we skip it, the Prince will have an advantage.”

“The Prince doesn’t have a breeding mate.” Sinclair counters, “pregnant she-wolves get a lot more free passes in our society than those who are not.”

“But he’ll know.” I state stubbornly. “He’ll feel emboldened, like his plan is working. We have to show him it isn’t.”

Sinclair studies me for a long moment. “Is this truly what you want, or are you trying to prove something to me – because I promise you don’t have to.”

“Not everything is about you, you know.” I answer saucily, feeling a bit more of myself now.

Warmth floods my body at the sound of his laughter. “Careful little one, or I might think you didn’t learn your lesson the first time.”

“Please Dominic?” I request. “I want to go to the ball.”

“Hmm.” He hums thoughtfully. “If I agree, will you do something for me in return?”

“That depends,” I answer warily. “What do you want?”

“Will you promise to tell me about those worse things you’ve been through some day?” Sinclair inquires, grazing his knuckles over my cheek.

I go very still now. “I’ve never talked about those things with anyone. I’m not sure I know how.”

“I could help you.” Sinclair offers, “Like I helped you today.”

“If you think I’m going to let you spank me again –” I begin indignantly.

“Oh so you let me, did you?” He rumbles, sliding his hand around to my nape and making my toes curl. He grins wolfishly, shaking his head. “I hate to break it to you, baby – but that was far from your last spanking, whether it’s to help you tap into your feelings or not.”

“You’re a tyrant, you know that?” I remark, shooting him a sullen glare.

“Is that a no?” He asks, arching a brow.

“But why bother digging into all of that?” I question. “It’s in the past. Surely it’s better to leave it there.”

"I think we both know these things never stay in the past, Ella." Sinclair answers gravely. "I could see them weighing on you before you ever said a word."

"You could?" I squeak, hating to think I'm so transparent.

"Yes." He affirms gently, "And I don't want you carrying all that alone."

"But it's my burden to carry, not yours." I reason, not looking him in the eye.

Sinclair catches my chin between his thumb and forefinger, pulling my eyes up to his. "And I suppose you asked to carry it? You sought out the pain and heartache?"

I can see his point, though I don't want to. I can also see the advantage in keeping this deal some vague promise of the future.

The ball is tonight, so I can agree to share and then put off following through indefinitely. It's not a lie – not really. I know I'm not ever going to be ready to talk about those horrible things with Sinclair, so I just have to tell him as much when the time comes.

"Okay." I finally confirm. "You have a deal."

Chapter 73 – The Masquerade

Sinclair

“Are you sure you want to do this?” I ask, studying Ella.

Her golden eyes sparkle up at me. “Yes Dominic, for the thousandth time.” She sasses, “I’m sure.”

I chuckle, dropping a kiss to her hair. “Imp.”

We’re in the back of a limousine as it rolls slowly down the street, lined on all sides by clambering pack members eager to catch a glimpse of the shifter elite on their way to the King’s palace. Ella is tucked safely against my side, wearing an off the shoulder gown of deepest green.

Layer upon layer of sheer fabric winds around her body in graceful tendrils, leaving small flashes of her fair skin bared and outlining her feminine figure in the most tantalizing design, before cascading to the ground in a waterfall of chiffon. Amber gemstones glitter in her skirts, perfectly matching the delicate jewels of her necklace and earrings. Her hair has been piled up on top of her head, save for a few wisps left free, and her small feet are confined in a pair of sky high heels. Her mask is resting in her lap, waiting for the moment we’ll exit the car and don the intricate disguises required for the ball. Every time I look at her my lungs stop pumping, and I have to remind myself to breathe, struggling to remember how it’s done.

“I know you don’t like being told how beautiful you are, but sometimes it’s hard for me to keep it to myself.” I sigh, leaning down to nuzzle her neck and bask in her sweet scent.

Ella tilts her head to the side, giving me more room to work as I brush my nose and lips over her skin. “It’s not that I mind compliments,” Her breath hitches when I pause to nibble the place where her neck meets her shoulder. “I just don’t like being made to feel like that’s all I am.”

“Well you don’t have to worry there, because as lovely as you are, your beauty is my least favorite thing about you.” I remark, completely serious.

“Sure it is.” She giggles, the sound filling my body with pure sunshine.

“I mean it.” I reply honestly, “Of course, it’s not like that means much because I like all of you. Talking about my least favorite part is like talking about my least favorite dessert – at the end of the day it’s still dessert.”

She doesn’t answer, and when I finally stop exploring the silky curve of her throat, I find a guarded expression on her face, as if she’s waiting for the other shoe to drop.

“Would you like to know my favorite thing about you?” I prompt, offering what she’s either too afraid or too shy to ask.

“I don’t know.” She shrugs, not looking me in the eye.

“Hmm,” I purr, enjoying the way her tightly wound little body immediately melts against mine. “It’s that warrior heart of yours.”

Ella snorts, finally raising her luminous gaze to mine. “No one has ever mistaken me for a warrior before.” She admonishes. “I think you’re just trying to flatter me now.”

“It’s no mistake.” I rumble sternly, not liking her self-deprecating tone. “I know warriors, and I know you. You have a heart that cannot be quelled – you love fiercely, and you don’t give up.”

Ella blushes, her cheeks growing so pink that I want to whisper all my secret desires in her ear, just to see how deeply I can make her flush. She peeks up at me from beneath her lashes. “Do you want to know my favorite thing about you?”

“Tell me,” I invite, not caring one bit whether her answer is about my looks or personality– as long as she has a favorite thing, she could tell me she likes my big toe and I’d still be grateful.

“You listen.” Ella shares softly. “Not because you think you should or that it’s the right thing to do – but because you want to. You want to understand, and you want your people to be happy.”

I can’t stop myself from kissing her, even if it’s only a brief graze of our lips. “I want you to be happy too, Ella.” I tell her, “I know that might feel impossible right now, with everything you’ve been through, but I’m going to make our family safe. And once I do I’m going to spoil you and the baby rotten.”

Her eyes widen slightly when I say, “our family,” and I realize I’ve never talked about us that way. However the more time that passes, the more obvious it becomes to me that Ella and I will be family. Whether we become romantically involved or not, we’re going to share a pup and that will tie us together for life. However, no sooner have I worked through these thoughts myself, than I see Ella’s expression transforming, taking on a decidedly devious glint.

“Does that mean you won’t boss me around anymore?” The minx replies, alight with mischief and desire in equal measure.

“You’ll let me walk all over you and get away with everything?”

I throw my head back, barking with laughter even as I fight the urge to tell the driver to turn the car around so I can take Ella home and finish what we started earlier. “Not even close, trouble.”

As the car pulls to a stop and we put on our masks, I glance at the media clamoring outside and feel Ella do the same. She recoils in surprise, and a rush of protectiveness slams into me. My wolf immediately rises to the surface, and I have to fight the urge to shift.

Let me out. My wolf demands. I’ll kill them before they lay a hand on her.

Calm down! I insist, shaking with the effort of holding him back.

But they’re scaring her! He insists. This was a mistake! It’s too soon.

After last night I don’t want to let anyone come near Ella, and her fear is forcing my possessive fury into overdrive. It’s as though I see threats everywhere I look, and I’d like nothing more than to attack every reporter in sight. Deep down, I also know that I wouldn’t be so on edge if we’d found an outlet for our sexual tension earlier. It goes against my every instinct not to reward my mate after she submitted so beautifully, and I feel as though my job is unfinished. Moreover, I wasn’t able to take the edge off of my own desire – and the need to claim her is suddenly so powerful I want to take her right here and now.

Mine, mine, mine. My wolf chants. I have to mark her.

No! I refuse ferociously. She’s not a wolf, it would hurt her.

Just a nibble? He begs, She smells so delicious.

Somehow I manage to get Ella out of the car and through the crowd, but no sooner have we stepped into the ballroom that Ella turns toward me with an exasperated look on her face. “Dominic, you’re acting like a dog guarding a bone.”

I arch my brows, letting some of my Alpha authority seep into my voice. “Am I now?”

Ella shivers, but doesn’t back down. “You just growled that attendant – the poor man practically wet himself.”

“He came too close to you!” I growl defensively

“He was taking my coat.” Ella reminds me, sounding almost stern. “You’ve got to find a way to calm down.”

"I don't think I can." I grumble, "The man who hired those rogues to kill you is here somewhere, no doubt plotting another attack."

Ella frowns. "Is there nothing I can do to help? You told me mates are supposed to calm each other."

I sigh and hold her tight so that she can't see my grimace. "Sweetheart, the things you could do to help are not things we could do in public, nor are you ready for them."

"Oh..." Ella's eyes go adorably wide as realization strikes. I watch her work through the implications of my words, and without a single word of help, she comes to the correct conclusion. "Would it still be this way, if I'd... if we'd... you know – after?" She trails off, blushing.

"After your spanking?" I supply.

Ella's blush turns crimson, and she leans forward impatiently. "Shhh!" Looking around to make sure no one overheard me, she agrees, "Yes."

"It would have helped me take the edge off, but–"

Before I can finish the sentence, Ella gives me a fierce glare and a delectable pout. "You should have told me, I can still–"

She's about to offer something I might not be able to turn down, so I stop her, softening the force of my growl at the last moment.

"No, this was always going to be the case, Ella. I don't like you being here with all these wolves after what happened last night. If I had my way I would have kept you at home in bed until this campaign is over."

"Then maybe..." she pulls my hand to her tummy, and the tiny bump hidden by her skirts. "Maybe just feel the baby. Feel how secure we are in your arms, how safe I feel with you. Nothing's going to happen, and I promise to stay close."

Warmth washes over me, and I smile down at the precious bundle in my arms, amazed that she seems to know exactly what to say to help me, despite not understanding so much about our kind. However, no sooner have I started to relax, than the Prince enters. He scans the room until his eyes land on Ella and I, then crosses the floor – heading straight towards us.

Chapter 74 – Dancing with the Prince

Ella

As soon as the Prince catches sight of Sinclair and I, his eyes flash with obvious rage. I can tell he's surprised to see us here, though he must have known I survived the hunt. When none of his rogues returned to confirm my death, he would have immediately realized what happened. Still, I'm sure he expected Sinclair to do exactly what he just suggested, and keep me home at all costs.

Despite his fury, the Prince quickly covers his emotions and stalks toward us. I can feel Sinclair vibrating with dangerous energy, and I lean into him, letting him feel my warmth and breathe in my scent. He's making low grumbly sounds, though not the kind he often makes when he's kissing or scent marking me, which let me know his wolf is pleased. These are very different: sharp and vicious, hinting at barely contained aggression.

"It's okay." I whisper. "He can't do anything here."

"I'll kill him." Sinclair snarls under his breath. "You need to leave, before this gets ugly."

I can tell Sinclair is no longer in control and I know his wolf is urging him to protect the baby even if it costs him the campaign. Of course, killing the Prince would get rid of the competition, but I don't think it would comprise very good optics for a future King. I don't understand enough about shifter society to know for sure, but my instincts are telling me that a death match on one of the most sacred days of the year is a bad idea.

"I'm not going anywhere." I answer firmly, digging in my heels.

"Ella, I wasn't asking." Sinclair snaps, pinning me with his most intimidating gaze.

The fine hairs on the back of my neck stand on end, and I feel the sudden urge to cower before the predator towering over me, but I can't bring a pup into the world without Sinclair, and I'm not going to risk him being thrown in jail or exiled. "You can threaten me and punish me however you like." I remark coolly, pretending that my knees haven't completely turned to jelly. "But I promised not to leave your side, and I meant it."

Sinclair's powerful arm squeezes my waist, pulling me even closer against him even though our bodies were already flush. He drops his lips to my ear. "This is not the time to test me, little human."

Before I can respond, the Prince appears in front of us. Acting on instinct, I start to pull away from Sinclair, forcing him to pull me back and keep his hands occupied holding me in place, rather than ripping the Prince to shreds. "Happy Solstice, Dominic," The Prince greets, before turning his wolfish gaze to me. "Ella. You're looking very well."

Another growl rends the air between us, but I move directly in front of Sinclair, making a human barrier between the wolves with my body. I lean my back into Sinclair's chest, encouraging him to wrap his arms around me and rest his palms over the baby.

"Thank you." I smile, trying to sound genuine. "We're so pleased to be here – though I'm afraid our masks didn't do much to disguise us." I laugh falsely.

Sinclair is muttering a steady litany of threats in my my head, using his connection with the baby to make his voice echo in my mind. He compliments me even as he promises to punish me for my interference, and I reach back to run my fingers through his silky hair, soothing him even though I'm making myself the target of his outrage. You're in so much trouble, you magnificent, fearless little angel. What are you thinking?

"Ah well, it's hard to go incognito when you're as famous as you two." The Prince grins, creating a conniving, cruel expression. "It seems like I can't open the newspaper these days without seeing you two staring back at me."

I shrug gently, an audience is forming around us, drawn in by the magnetic pull of watching two competing alphas. "It's amazing isn't it? You'd think people would have gotten bored of us by now."

You're too clever for your own good. Dominic is saying, making it very difficult for me to focus on the Prince's response. I need to make him pay for what he did. I need to kill him.

"Well there's no accounting for taste – especially among commoners." The Prince is snidely remarking.

"Forgive me," I answer boldly, speaking loudly enough for our onlookers to hear. "But weren't you a commoner until your father became King? It seems awfully callous to write off so many people just because they haven't been as lucky as you. After all, that's why you're in this position – isn't it? Luck?" A stark murmur works through the crowd around us. When we get home I'm going to put you right back over my knee and this time I'm not going to let you get away without coming at least three times, you brilliant, impossible creature. At this point I press one of my stiletto's onto Sinclair's foot, needing him to shut up before I become so aroused that the entire room can smell my desire. Of course, he only responds with a low chuckle.

That might work if you weighed more than a field mouse, little one. But that's okay – I won't forget that you tried to stomp on me again.

"What interesting ideas your mate has, Dominic." The Prince comments, looking over my head to speak to Sinclair with barely contained rage. He obviously hates being shown up in public, but he's in the same position as Sinclair, trapped by convention.

“I wonder if you might release her for a dance? I’d be very curious to speak with her further.”

“I don’t think so.” Sinclair growls, before I can respond. “Ella is struggling with morning sickness, too much spinning on the dance floor might trigger it.”

Sighing, I tilt my face up to his, urging him to lower his ear to my mouth. I’m wishing I could speak to him through the baby, the way he does with me, but I also know that the more intimate we appear for the media, the better the reports will seem. “It’s okay.”

I insist. “He won’t hurt me with you watching.”

No. He responds immediately. You’re mine, he can’t have you – even for a dance.

“Dominic, he underestimates me. He thinks I’m a dumb commoner, I might be able to get information from him he wouldn’t admit to you.” I reason. “And it would look good to the council. I doubt they want it to appear like there’s a risk of civil war between the Alphas.”

I hate this. Sinclair complains in my head. I need you to be safe. I need him to be dead.

“You need to win. The baby and I need you to win, and you can’t do that if we make a scene here.” I counter.

Goddess, damn it! The next thing I know, Sinclair has spun me to face him. His mouth claims mine with urgent need, drawing a whimper from my lips as I open for his questing tongue. I’m sure the Prince is still standing behind us, impotently waiting for us to reach a decision. We pay him no mind. Instead I let Sinclair ravish me for all to see, stealing kiss after kiss from my swollen mouth and nibbling my neck before he releases me. I’ll be right here. If you need me, just send me a look, and I’ll be there.

“I promise.” I confirm, “I’ll ask for help if I need it.”

You better! Sinclair claims once last kiss before letting me go, glaring at the Prince over my head. “Make it quick.”

I turn and accept the Prince’s outstretched hand, shaking off Sinclair when he doesn’t immediately release me. Gradually he does, though I can see him in my periphery, following our progress as we move onto the dance floor.

“Dominic is very protective of you.” The Prince observes, glancing at the wolf currently stalking us.

“Aren’t you protective of your mate?” I reply. “I thought all Alphas were that way – all true Alphas that is.”

The Prince’s wolf glows in his eyes, and I know I’ve struck a chord. I’m not sure where I found the courage to question his dominance. Maybe it’s the baby, or maybe Sinclair is rubbing off on me – either way it’s difficult to be afraid of the Prince when I spend all my time with a man who is ten times more powerful.

“Hmph.” The Prince murmurs, barely containing his ire. “I suppose.”

We move through the dance for a few moments, and I try not to pay attention to Sinclair. I try to focus on the steps and not make a fool of myself, but I’m painfully conscious of the emerald eyes glued to my back.

“You know – I had my investigators look into you.” The Prince declares abruptly, as if he’s talking about running an errand rather than invading my privacy

“Did you?” I counter, making an effort to sound nonchalant. However the little voice in my head is struggling not to panic. If his investigators searched for me in the Bloodbane pack, they won’t have found anything. And if they searched for me here, they might have discovered my true identity. “And tell me, what did you find?”

“Well, it’s the strangest thing.” The Prince replies, suddenly looking like a hunter going in for the kill. “They didn’t find anything.

Not a single thing.”

Chapter 75 – The Prince Slips Up

Ella

As the Prince and I move around the dance floor, I'm only too conscious that every eye in the room is on us. Of course, none of those eyes weigh on my shoulders so heavily as Sinclairs. I'm working hard not to accidentally send him any signals that I need to be rescued, but it isn't easy – especially after the Prince just confronted me with one of the many lies I've been telling.

"That's not surprising." I bluff. "I lived a quiet life before coming here."

"There's quiet and then there's nonexistent." The Prince mutters bleakly. "And forgive me but I find it highly suspicious that you made absolutely no impact on your prior pack. After all – one would expect a she-wolf qualified to be Luna to have a high profile."

"Believe it or not," I begin, deciding to tell at least one truth tonight, "but I didn't find my strength until I met Dominic. He's helping me recognize that my power was always there, but sometimes it takes seeing yourself through someone else's eyes to appreciate the parts of ourselves we take for granted. So, no I didn't have a high profile in the Bloodbane pack."

The Prince scoffs. "I wouldn't be so quick to admit that, Ella. Just imagine what the council would think if they knew." His tone implies advice, but his eyes glint with an obvious threat.

"I'll gladly tell them myself." I counter coolly, "I'm not ashamed of my past, and I think people need leaders who can be honest about their journeys. No one starts out in this world as a force of nature; they become one after being molded and weathered by the elements. Dominic and I are examples of how even the strongest of our kind become so through resilience and strife, as well as the people with whom you surround yourself – not blind ambition."

The Prince has been keeping his voice low, no doubt afraid of being overheard, but when I continue to speak at a volume guaranteeing others will hear our conversation, he loses his temper. "Would you keep your voice down?!"

"Why, don't you want people to know our positions?" I counter, feeling an unfamiliar spike of adrenaline. Is this how hunters feel when they know they're closing in? When they've got their target cornered. "Don't you want them to be fully informed before the election?"

"That isn't how things are done!" The Prince snaps, forgetting to whisper now.

"Well maybe it should be." I answer coldly. "Why adhere to outdated traditions just because that's the way things have always been done? Being done doesn't mean they're right or effective."

The Prince growls, and I see the wolves around us rear back in shock. I know I have scant seconds before Sinclair will appear and snatch me away from the Prince so he can attack, so I offer the tyrant in front of me my widest smile, hoping it will convince Sinclair I can handle this.

"See, this is exactly what I mean," I beam, mildly surprised at how little fear I truly fear. "Growling at breeding she-wolves half your size really seems like a practice that should have been left in the dark ages, don't you think?"

The Prince glowers, abruptly stopping and yanking me close enough so he can hiss in my ear, "You dumb bitch, I don't know how you survived last night, but mark my words, I'm going to get rid of you and that brat you're growing one way or another. You should leave while you still can, if you stay I guarantee your days are numbered!"

His claws are digging into my bandaged arms, and I know I can't give into my instincts to growl back at him. I don't care if he's threatening me, but the idea that he's threatening my pup makes me want to rant and rage – to destroy him no matter the cost.

Any fear I might have once felt for myself has translated into primal protectiveness for my child. The problem is that it might cost us the campaign – I know how important it is for me to continue looking calm and unintimidated by the Prince. If I let the people around us see my fear or anger I'll lose the upper hand.

Luckily Sinclair appears in our path before I can lose control and snap back the way I want to. He suddenly steps into our path, all rugged good looks and raw power. My belly swoops and flutters when I see him, and the next thing I know, he's extracting me from the Prince's arms. "I'm going to take my mate back now." He announces with a lethal grin, not waiting for the Prince to agree. "It's been too long."

I laugh, "It's only been a few minutes."

"I meant what I said." Sinclair beams, sending a ripple of laughs around the room as he sweeps me into his arms. We spin away on the dance floor, leaving the Prince to stew in his anger.

Only once we've left our audience behind and I'm swaying safely in Sinclair's arms, does he drop his lips to my ear. "What did he say to you?"

I glance up at him hesitantly. "I'm not sure I should tell you, not here at least."

"If you don't tell me now I'm going to throw a tantrum right here in the middle of the dance floor.” Sinclair jokes, though there’s a sharp edge in his voice that tells me he’s not merely jesting. He might have chosen the words to make me laugh, but I can tell he needs to know the truth if he’s going to maintain his control.

“He admitted sending the rogues after me.” I relate, peeking up at him. “He threatened me and the baby, told me to leave while I still can.”

Sinclair pulls me closer, until I can no longer see his handsome face. Still, I can picture him glowering at everyone around us, staring daggers at anyone who sets eyes on me – like a dragon guarding its treasure. “Don’t worry, Ella.” Sinclair rumbles, his strong hands caressing my spine. “I won’t let him hurt you or the baby.”

“I know you won’t.” I assure him, leaning close so he can feel my solid weight in his arms. “I trust you, Dominic.”

I’m amazed to realize I’m speaking the truth. I do trust Sinclair, despite everything I’ve been through. I know he wouldn’t intentionally hurt me, and I know he’ll keep me safe.

“Thank you, baby.” He croons, sending delicious shivers down my spine. Even as I revel in his warm tone and terms of endearment, his earlier threats are still ringing in my ears, and I have to wonder whether I have another punishment ahead of me.

“Am I still in trouble?” I squeak, not sure whether I’m hoping he says yes or no. There’s something strangely addictive about his dominance, and I’m still aching for his touch. At the time I thought the longing would pass with time, but it seems like my hormones have gotten the better of me. Rather than passing, my desire has only grown, and the flames were stoked ever higher when he began scolding me earlier.

“No, sweetheart.” He answers, donning an indulgent smile. “You kept me from making a terrible mistake. You helped me stay calm when I was completely out of control. You don’t deserve a punishment, if anything you deserve to be rewarded.”

“Oh? What kind of reward?” I inquire, both hoping he’ll give me a scandalous answer, and praying he won’t. I’m not sure how much longer I can resist him, even though I know I should.

He chuckles, sending heat through every inch of my body. “That’s a dangerous question, little one.”

I smother a whimper, even as heat pools in my core. I hear Sinclair take in a sharp breath, and I’m sure he can smell my arousal again. I lean my forehead against the hard muscles of his chest. “What are we doing, Dominic?” I sigh, knowing I’m being terribly contrary. “I’m sorry, I know I’m not making any of this easier – I’m just so confused.”

“It’s okay to be confused.” He promises. “And I think you were right this afternoon. You’ve been through too much. You’re not in any state of mind to make those kinds of decisions today – no matter what your body wants.”

“But my body wants it so badly.” I confess, figuring that I’ve already admitted as much in our dream date, so I have nothing left to lose.

“Mine does too.” Sinclair smiled wryly, “if you could hear my wolf, Ella – you’d be scandalized... maybe even frightened.”

“I’m not sure I could be frightened of you. Not the way you mean at least.” I breathe, “it’s the strangest thing, if you were anyone else I’d be terrified, but it’s like the baby won’t let me.”

“He’s a smart baby.” Sinclair confirms, putting up with pride. “He gets that from you.”

I’m tempted to argue, but I can see a warning glint in Sinclair’s eyes and think better of it. “So what do we do? How do we resist this?”

“We keep at it.” Sinclair decides, “until we can’t any longer.”

“And then?” I prompt him, curious beyond words. “When we can no longer resist?”

“We give in.” Sinclair answers, lowering his forehead to mine. “And pray we can survive it.”

Chapter 76 – Hormones

Ella

It's been three weeks since the ball, and though I can scarcely believe it, it seems like all the campaign drama passed with Solstice. There has been nothing but calm since the holidays, and I'm beyond thrilled that I've been able to relax a bit, even though part of me is waiting for the rug to be pulled out from under us.

I've spent my time pouring over baby books, making plans for our nursery, and brainstorming baby names – and the best part is that I've felt less nauseated and achy every day. In fact, yesterday marked the beginning of my second trimester – since shifter pregnancies are so short – and it seems impossible to think my baby will arrive in four short months. My stress has already eased knowing I'm leaving the most vulnerable phase of my pregnancy behind, and I don't even mind that I've been seeing Sinclair less now that he's gone back to a regular work schedule.

Well, that's not entirely true. I miss him. I miss him much more than I should, but I'm also grateful for the space. It's much easier to resist our attraction to each other when we're not constantly together and taking part in intimate rituals and romantic outings.

I don't know why you're being so stubborn. The little voice in my head mutters. If you're going to give in eventually, why not throw in the towel now and enjoy being together in the last months before the baby comes? You do realize that in another four months you'll never be alone again.

I'm not having this argument again. I decide. We agreed it's better for the baby if we can co-parent without our own relationship drama getting in the way.

You mean you decided and he went along with it because he doesn't know it's such a stupid reason. My conscience snipes.

It's not stupid! I insist. I'm going to be a mother, I have to put my baby first – that's what being a parent is all about.

You keep telling yourself that. The voice derides. We both know you're just a big scaredy cat.

Oh put a sock in it! I exclaim, losing my patience. "Stupid conscience." I mutter aloud, sorting through the clothing racks in my giant closet and trying to choose an outfit for our parenting class tonight. "Uppity, annoying, impossible..."

"Talking to yourself, trouble?" Sinclair's deep voice breaks through my angry diatribe, and I jump about ten feet in the air.

Whirling around, I find him leaning in the closet doorway, watching me intently. "Dominic, you scared me half to death!"

The big wolf tsks, coming forward and pulling me into his arms, petting me gently. "I'm sorry." He croons, kissing my hair.

"Sometimes I forget how weak your hearing is."

"My hearing is fine!" I object, feeling irrationally angry all of a sudden. "It's your ridiculous shifter stealth that's the problem. It's not right that anyone as big as you should be able to move around so quietly."

"Alright." He agrees, and I have a sneaking suspicion he's smothering a smile. "It's my fault, I'm a big hulking beast and I need to do a better job of stomping around."

I pull away from him, narrowing my eyes. "Are you laughing at me?"

Now Sinclair does smile, "Is there any way I can answer that question that won't annoy you?"

I huff, deciding not to dignify that question with an answer. I turn back to my closet, beginning to rifle through trouser options.

"Nothing fits anymore." I complain, eliminating every pair of pants I come across. "I can't button any of these!"

Sinclair's palm rubs over the gentle curve of my belly. The changes are still very slight, but my clothing has gone from being a bit tight to entirely too small. My breasts might not be so tender anymore, but they spill out of all my bras, and my favorite fitted tops now stretch and strain to cover my growing tummy. "That's a good thing, Ella." Sinclair reminds me gently. "It means the baby is growing big and strong."

"Oh enough of that!" I argue, not sure why I'm so determined to disagree with everything he says. "All that means is that your giant pup is coming closer to pushing my body past its limits. Normal women don't show this much at this stage you know." My throat is stinging with the threat of tears, even though I know I'm being unreasonable. I feel like I'm on a roller coaster, I can see exactly what's happening, but I also can't get off the ride.

Sinclair clucks sympathetically, "You're having a rough day, aren't you, sweetheart?" I can hear the guilt in his voice, and it makes me want to cry all the more. He's been working from home a lot and I can tell he feels like he's neglecting us, but there's also nothing to be done. He bears so much responsibility, and it's only going to get worse if he wins the crown. Suddenly I feel terrible for being so grumpy with him, when he's already blaming himself despite doing everything he can to take care of me.

“I’m sorry.” I sniffle. “I shouldn’t be giving you a hard time.”

“You’re allowed.” He promises, pulling a wrap dress from the clothing rack. “Here, no buttons, no zippers. You don’t even have to wear a bra.”

“Thank you.” I murmur, sliding my arms around his middle and squeezing tightly. Sinclair purrs and snuggles me until I’ve had my fill, and half an hour later we’re back on the padded floors of our monthly birthing class, listening to the instructor explain precisely why I’m slowly losing my mind.

“Moms, you’ll be feeling physically better now that you’re out of the first trimester, but this is the time when your hormones really kick into high gear. You may already be experiencing some intense mood swings, as well as physical changes to things like hair growth or skin pigmentation.” She looks around at the couples spread out on the mats, and I see I’m not the only expectant mother looking sheepish or anxious.

“You’ll also experience heightened libidos – something I encourage you all to take advantage of, as you won’t have time for much fun after your pup arrives.”

Oh great. I think bitterly. As if it wasn’t already hard enough to resist Sinclair. I’d known this was part of pregnancy, but I also hadn’t understood how powerless I’d be to my hormones. I’d assumed it would be like PMS mood swings, not these constant extremes. The instructor is still speaking. “Bottom line, mates, it’s your job to keep Mom satisfied and relaxed during these next few months. She’s going to need you to be her rock while she weathers these stormy seas, so I encourage you not to go overboard coddling her – tempting as it may be. Her wolf needs to feel your strength now more than ever.”

Somehow I really don’t think they give the same advice in human birthing classes. I mutter to my conscience.

A warm chuckle rumbles against my back and Sinclair’s voice sounds in my mind. You should see the look on your face.

I look up at Sinclair, wondering how he was able to see my expression in the first place. He grins down at me, then steals a kiss from my pouting lips.

“You also need to create a birthing plan you’re both comfortable with.” The instructor carries on. “By show of hands, who here is considering a home birth rather than a hospital birth.”

I raise my hand hesitantly. I haven’t decided which option I feel most comfortable with yet, but I’m open to either and want to hear what she has to say. However, almost as soon as I put my hand up, a low growl sounds in my ear. “Put that lovely little hand down. You’re going to deliver in the hospital and that is not up for discussion.”

I turn to glare at him. I might not be decided yet, but I don’t appreciate him taking away my options. “You’re supposed to be keeping me relaxed and listening to my instincts.” I state fiercely, mimicking the instructor in a saccharine tone even though the whole class can probably hear us, “trusting my body’s wisdom.”

“Ella, you’re high risk.” Sinclair reminds me sternly, the rugged contours of his face set in a foreboding expression. “We need to be at the hospital in case the doctors need to make an emergency intervention.”

I know he’s thinking of my high blood pressure, not to mention the fact that I’m going to be the first human in recorded history to give birth to a shifter. I also know this makes sense, but his high handed manner is making me gnash my teeth in frustration, “It’s my body.”

His wolf flashes in his eyes, “You’re mine – and so is this baby. I’m not going to let you endanger him or yourself, Ella.”

Without thinking, I offer him a snarl – which on my lips sounds more like the grumble of an angry kitten, but I’m sure my intentions are clear.

Sinclair’s hands tighten around me. His power washes over me, and I wish I had a tail to tuck between my legs. “Did you just growl at me, little mate?”

Despite my trembling spine, I tilt my chin up defiantly. “Why not? You growl at me all the time.”

Before he can respond, the instructor laughs, breaking the tense silence in the rest of the room and reclaiming control over the class. “You see, this is the perfect example of why it’s important to talk about these things together early on. You might assume you’re on the same page but discover you have different ideas.”

It’s also an example of why naughty humans need just as firm a hand as she wolves. Sinclair intones, speaking through his bond with the baby. His mouth is at my throat, his lips grazing the spot where he’ll one day pretend to mark me. I feel a nip from his fangs, and my anger abruptly slips away. All of a sudden my entire body melts, and I realize that the instructor had been right – I do need to feel Sinclair’s strength right now. Then again, maybe this is more hormonal insanity, because why else am I now wishing he could mark me for real?

Chapter 77 – Baby Names

Sinclair

“What do you think about this one?” I ask, pulling Ella’s attention away from the rack of onesies she’s currently perusing.

“Oh, so you care what I want now?” She retorts, shooting me a sulky glare. She’s been pouting ever since we left our parenting class, and despite the instructor’s quick thinking to prevent us having a very public argument, I know Ella hasn’t gotten over my high-handed order regarding a hospital birth. We decided to spend our free afternoon shopping for baby gear before we ever left the house today, or I’m sure she wouldn’t have agreed to stay in my company. The stubborn creature has done her best to ignore me since our disagreement, only allowing me to touch her when required for class and barely speaking to me.

Now, as I’m considering cribs and strollers, Ella has placed herself as far away as she can get without leaving my sight, a line she seemed to understand she shouldn’t cross no matter how unhappy she is with me. Sighing, I cross the small shop until I’m looming over her. “Ella, of course I care about what you want. I didn’t mean to dismiss your feelings earlier, but there are some risks I’m simply not willing to take.”

“I just wanted to consider my options.” Ella grumbles back, crossing her arms over her chest and unintentionally pushing her pert breasts together. “I don’t even know that I would want a home birth, I just thought it was something to consider.”

Dragging my gaze from her lush body, I answer. “I understand that and if our situation were different, I wouldn’t have a problem with a home birth, but our situation isn’t different.” I reach for her, but she backs out of my reach. “If you want a water birth or a doula, we can arrange for those things at the hospital, but we need to be practical.”

Ella glowers up at me, her lower lip quivering dangerously. I have a bad feeling she’s about to cry, and suddenly I’m wishing she would growl at me again. I can’t recall ever hearing such a cute noise except from actual pups. I wasn’t about to let her get away with it, but it had also been very difficult not to smile. “I don’t want the baby to be high risk.” Ella finally shares, her voice husky. “It isn’t fair.”

“I agree.” I tell her seriously, hating the idea of either one of them being threatened. “But it is the reality, and we have to make sure you have the safest birth possible. In fact, if your blood pressure doesn’t come down by the end of the week, I think we need to go back to the doctor.”

Ella nods, fighting back a hiccup. Her golden eyes are shining, and I’m quickly losing my patience with the distance between us.

“Okay.”

“Okay.” I repeat, ducking my head to try and catch her eye. “So are we friends again? Can we kiss and make up?”

Ella willingly comes into my arms, her small, warm body all tension and sharp edges. She snuggles into my embrace and breathes in my scent, though she doesn't give up her sulking completely. “You better not be this bossy in the delivery room.”

I chuckle, low and deep, stroking her long hair. “Oh, you're going to let me be in the delivery room?” I ask, surprised that she wants this, even though I always planned on forcing my way in.

To my surprise, Ella pulls back with a sharp intake of breath. “You are going to be there aren't you?”

She looks so frightened by the prospect of delivering the baby alone that my wolf begins to instinctively purr. “Of course, sweet Ella. I'm not going to let you do it alone – even if you hate me when the time comes and try to kick me out, I won't leave.”

Her racing heart slows, but she eyes me suspiciously. “That sounds bossy.”

“I said I would be there, not that I wouldn't be bossy.” I tease, pulling her close again.

“Tyrant.” She accuses, even as she nuzzles her face into my chest.

“Troublemaker.” I reply, relieved that we're no longer at odds even though I find her feisty nature irresistible. I much prefer keeping our disagreements playful, rather than serious. “We haven't talked about baby names either.” I realize aloud, “We should probably figure these things out before we go back to class. I don't think our teacher appreciated us stealing her thunder.”

“We can talk about names.” Ella agrees, seeming content to stay wrapped in my arms, even though other customers are already glancing our way – smiling to themselves. Oblivious, Ella performs a huge yawn, her lovely lips stretching wider than I thought was possible.

“Mhmm, do you want to keep shopping while we do?” I inquire, trying to keep the amusement out of my voice. “Or do you want to go home and take a nap?”

“We can keep shopping.” She answers, making no effort to move.

“You do know you'll have to let me go in order to do that, right?” I ask, wanting nothing of the kind.

Ella blinks, as if she didn't realize she was already half asleep and leaning all her weight against me. She steps back, smoothing down her dress as she considers the cribs in front of us. "Well, what are your thoughts about names?"

I flash her my most wolfish grin. "How about Thor or Rex?"

Ella gapes, not realizing I'm only making mischief. "You might as well call him butch or spike!" She exclaims, her voice taking a haughty turn. "He might be a wolf but that doesn't mean you have to give him a dog's name, Dominic."

"Well he'll be Alpha one day, so it should be something strong." I reply, still smiling at my indignant little human.

She snorts, "names don't make someone strong – that's about character and integrity."

"Oh really?" I challenge, "so you think calling our son daffodil will set him up for success, do you?"

I've never seen someone so much shorter than me try to look down their nose at me, but somehow Ella manages. "I think if we call our son daffodil, he'll redefine the word for generations to come."

"Maybe, but he'll also be bullied on the playground his entire childhood." I reason, pretending to read the information sheet for one of the strollers.

"Which is why we can't name him anything as ridiculous as Rex." Ella replies, digging in her heels. "I just don't think you should let something as arbitrary as a name decide someone's character."

"Well see that's where we disagree, you see, I believe there is great power in names." I explain, actually meaning my words now.

She frowns pensively, "how about Henry, for your father?"

Suddenly my interest in getting a rise out of Ella evaporates. "That's a very sweet idea." I concede, pinning her with my gaze.

"But do you like the name Henry?"

"It's not my favorite." She shrugs, "but I don't dislike it."

"And I suppose someone who loves children as much as you do – who's been trying for so long... there's no chance you have names already picked out, right?" I guess, already knowing the answer to my question.

Ella flushes a delectable shade of pale pink, but she doesn't say a word.

"Well, come on – out with it." I encourage.

"Why don't you tell me yours first." She suggests, "your real ones I mean."

Laughing, I agree. "I've always liked the name Damon. Then there's Gabriel, or Maxim... but my favorite is Orion."

"Like the hunter, from all the myths?" Ella clarifies.

"Not to mention the stars." I reply, thinking of the constellation.

"I like that idea." She muses, smiling softly. "I always imagine that if I had a son, I'd call him Rafe."

"Rafe," I repeat, rolling the name over my tongue. "You know that means wolf, don't you?"

Ella stops in her tracks, and though I initially suspect that she's merely surprised the name she chose has this particular meaning, when I look over at her I freeze. Her eyes are full of tears, and her hand is pressed to her stomach.

"Sweetheart, what is it?" I ask urgently, closing the distance between us.

"The baby," She answers, her cheeks splitting into an incandescent smile. "He just moved. I think he might have kicked!"

"What!" I immediately move my hand alongside hers, knowing I'm grinning like a fool.

"It was when you said, Rafe." As the name leaves her lips, the tiniest bump flutters against my hand, and suddenly we're both laughing. My own eyes are shining now, and I pull Ella's mouth down to my own. "I think we just named our baby." I tell her ecstatically between kisses.

We stay like that for a long time, repeatedly saying the name and celebrating every time our son kicks in reply. Through the bond I can tell he loves the sound of our laughter and joy, and soon he's kicking just to make us smile. Eventually we give up on shopping entirely. I take Ella home and lavish her with all her favorite things – the self care gifts I'd been unable to give her after the Wild Hunt. We spend the rest of the day curled up in front of a blazing fire, and reveling in our delight over this milestone. I know our future is still so uncertain, but right now everything is perfect, and I'm not going to take a single moment for granted.

Chapter 78 – Ella Eavesdrops

Sinclair

A week after our pup started moving, my brother appears on my doorstep, claiming to bring news of the Prince. I'm amazed to discover that I'm not angry to see him for the first time in years. In fact, as strange as it seems, I'm actually thankful for his presence. I'm still not sure whether he's truly my ally, but my wolf is urging me to trust him, and he's rarely wrong.

Besides, any intelligence – even false intelligence – is still new information, and I can sniff out a lie better than anyone. “How's Ella?” He asks, pulling off his coat.

“She's perfect.” I boast, unable to help myself. I can feel myself beaming, but I can't seem to turn off my smile muscles. “She's napping right now, and we're going back to the doctor tomorrow because her blood pressure is still a bit elevated... but otherwise she's absolutely wonderful. I couldn't have asked for a better mother for my pup.”

“I meant... after the attack.” Roger clarifies, looking slightly baffled by my effusiveness.

“Oh,” I pause, laughing softly. “Sorry, it's easy to get caught up. She's still a bit shaken, but her nightmares are happening less frequently now.”

“You're really in love, huh?” Roger inquires, looking surprised.

I scoff, “Did you really doubt that?” I don't pause to consider this idea. As far as Roger knows we fell in love and chose to start a family together. He shouldn't have any reason to think this is all a lie, and I don't like the idea that he might be onto our scheme.

“I mean, you haven't marked her, I figured you were only with her for political reasons.” He shrugs.

“The politics are just a bonus.” I rumble, and I'm mildly amazed to realize this isn't a lie. At some point the advantages of faking a relationship with Ella shifted, and after more than two months together, I'm discovering that I enjoy her company far more than I enjoy winning the campaign. Winning the campaign is important and necessary yes, but it's always been a duty, not a personal ambition that gives me pleasure.

“Anyway, what of the Prince?” I ask, ushering Roger into my office.

“Well if possible, he hates Ella even more than he hates you.” Roger sighs. “I think there's something about being shown up by a she-wolf infuriates him or emasculates him on some visceral level. He really has it out for her.”

“He's already tried to kill her twice.” I remark coldly, “I'm not sure how much worse things could get.”

“Dom, he doesn’t just want her dead now.” Roger grimaces. “He wants to make her pay first, to punish her, drag it out and make her death as painful as possible. And he wants to make sure you truly suffer too.”

My wolf rises to the surface, and for a moment I have to step away just to breathe. I count to ten inside my head, resisting the urge to shift and trying to block out the furious howls roaring through my head. “Do you know what he’s planning? Why is he taking so long to act if he hates her so much.”

“Because he’s needed the time to figure out how to get her away from you. That’s part of why things have been quiet this last month – he’s been plotting.” Roger shares, seeming truly disturbed to be delivering this news.

Goddess Damn it! I think desperately. This is all my fault, I put her in this danger!

We have to kill him. My wolf snarls, Forget the politics. She and the pup won’t be safe as long as he lives.

We can’t just kill him. His father is the King. He’s bound to take revenge for his son’s murder and unlike the Prince, he has an entire army at his back. Besides, even if he doesn’t – I won’t be considered a suitable candidate anymore and the Alpha council might call off the election. Then the man who paralyzed Dad will be rewarded with a throne he stole!

But it’s Ella. My wolf insists. And it’s the pup. We have to protect them.

“Plotting what?” I growl, my clenched fists shaking with rage as my claws extend and retract.

“He’s going to try and lure her out on her own so he can take her. Right now your guards are keeping his spies at a distance, but he’s planning a campaign event for the Lunas. He thinks if he can guarantee a women-only event then you won’t be around to protect her.” Roger shares, watching me nervously, as if afraid I might explode at a moment’s notice.

“When is it going to happen?” I demand, trying to recall if I’ve seen any sort of invitation matching this description.

“In a couple of weeks.” Roger explains, “He’s planning another rogue attack for the same day, just to be sure you can’t get to her.”

I hear faint movement on the other side of my office door, and I hold up a finger to pause

Roger. He glances in the direction of the soft footsteps tiptoeing towards my door. Ella's scent comes fluttering through the wooden panel, and then a small shadow appears beneath the door jam. My lip quirks with exasperation and amusement. It would seem my little troublemaker is up from her nap, and she's taken it into her beautiful head to eavesdrop.

I move my finger to my lips, exchanging a knowing glance with Roger. I raise my voice slightly, just in case Ella's human hearing needs the volume. "I don't know, if I sell my baby after the campaign is over there's not much the council can do about it."

A soft, feminine gasp meets my ears and Roger smothers a laugh, covering it with a cough. "They can always call for another election, don't forget that's how we ended up in this situation in the first place."

"Maybe, but by then I'll have the army at my disposal." I counter, rising to my feet and moving as silently as I can across the floor.

"They won't stand a chance against me."

I abruptly swing the door open, startling Ella and throwing her off balance. Clearly she was leaning her weight into the door in order to hear better. I catch her slender wrists before she can tumble to the floor, though I'm currently of the opinion that her bottom could do with a bit of soreness.

"Well well, what have we here?" I rumble ominously. "It looks like one very naughty little spy."

Ella's wide eyes flash with emotion as she works through her predicament – processing her shock, fear, confusion and then outrage once she realizes our previous words were solely for her benefit. "You rat!" She exclaims finally, "that wasn't funny!"

"Oh I beg to differ." I reply, scooping her up into my arms. "I think you got exactly what you deserved."

I return to my chair, settling the defiant bundle in my lap. Ella huffs, glaring at me with all the ferocity and indignance she possesses. "Well from the sounds of it I should have been part of this conversation in the first place. You left me out again, Dominic!"

"You were asleep." I state pointedly. "And you need your rest. I had every intention of filling you in once you woke. If you'd knocked I would have gladly invited you in."

Ella deflates slightly, looking suddenly unsure of herself. "Really?"

"Yes, really." I confirm, closing my hand over her nape to let her feel my solid strength.

“You need to know these things as much as I do.”

“But... you were so determined not to worry me.” She argues, her voice very small now.

“That was before – before you helped me understand how it made you feel not to know what was happening in your own life.” I remind her, “And before I appreciated how much being informed would encourage you to be cautious.”

“Oh.” Ella murmurs, blushing deeply. “I’m sorry, I thought...”

“I know what you thought.” I answer, “But you don’t need to worry about that right now.” Just when she starts to relax, I lower my mouth to her ear, “We’ll deal with your bad behavior later.”

Ella shivers against me, her sweet scent growing warm and liquid. Roger rolls his eyes, “You two aren’t very subtle, you know that.”

“We’re not trying to be.” I smirk, loving the way she’s squirming anxiously against me. “Now, if you would please help my mischievous mate get up to speed, I’m sure she’d appreciate it.”

“Yes please,” Ella offers shyly, “I’m sorry I eavesdropped on your conversation.”

Roger shakes his head. “You two are really a pair, you know that?”

“We know.” I beam, pausing to kiss the soft spot behind Ella’s ear.

“Alright, well the bottom line is that you need to be very careful.” Roger sighs, “and you’re going to get an invitation for a women’s event in a couple of weeks. Whatever you do, you have to make an excuse not to attend. Accept the invitation, but pull out at the last second so that they don’t know you’re onto them. In the meantime, I can give you details about the rogue attack so you can stop it before it happens. But the Prince can’t find out I’m helping you or we’ll lose the inside track.”

“What is he planning on doing with me?” Ella inquires, cuddling closer to me for comfort.

Roger and I exchange a meaningful glance, and I imperceptibly shake my head. “You don’t need to worry about that.” Roger replies, “All you need to know is that you don’t want to fall into his hands– at any cost. Trust me when I tell you that if it comes to it and you have a choice between dying and being captured... choose death.”

Chapter 79 – Blackmail

Ella

“I’m very worried about this, Ella.” The doctor pronounces grimly. He’s just taken my blood pressure, and it’s the same high reading we recorded this morning with the home kit. “I know you’re in the middle of a campaign and you’re going through a lot, but you’ve got to find a way to de-stress. If you don’t, we’ll have to put you on bed rest.”

“Bed rest?” I repeat anxiously. “For how long?”

The doctor’s grave face speaks volume, “the duration of your pregnancy.”

Sinclair stiffens beside me, moving the hand at my nape to massage my tense shoulder muscles. “What can we do, other than avoiding high pressure situations?”

“I’m going to prescribe you some medicine that will be safe for you and the baby. Be sure to take it every day, and otherwise just keep up the things we’ve already talked about – healthy eating, regular exercise, activities you find calming or relaxing.” The doctor continues, listing off suggestions. “You can try meditation or breathing exercises, pregnancy yoga is getting very popular.

Sticking to a daily routine can really help when things are uncertain and you’re going through all these changes. And Alpha, help her however you can.”

“The instructor at our parenting class advised us not to coddle our mates– is that still good advice given Ella’s risk level?” Sinclair inquires.

“Yes.” The doctor agrees, smashing the small surge of hope I’d felt to pieces. “Human or wolf, your mate needs to feel like you’re in control, especially in cases like this where so much is out of your hands. She needs you to ground her if she starts to spiral – to show her she can rely on you no matter what.”

I can’t see the logic underpinning his words, but I still don’t like it. What’s so wrong with a bit of coddling? I’ve never been coddled in my entire life. As if he can read my thoughts, Sinclair’s warm breath flutters over my neck, “Just remember how much you hated it when I kept you out of the loop, trying to protect you.”

Oh. I guess I have been coddled after all. I’m about to acknowledge this, but when I look up at Sinclair, he’s smiling at me so affectionately that my heart stops beating. “Besides,” He continues indulgently. “Just because I don’t coddle you, doesn’t mean I can’t pamper you the way you deserve.”

I find myself giggling like a schoolgirl, and the doctor steps out, clearly feeling as though he's intruding on something even though we're only talking. When we get home, Sinclair tucks me in for a nap and returns to work, making me promise to call on the servants if I need anything and vowing to be home as early as he can.

I sleep fitfully. Even exhausted as I am, I find it very difficult to sleep without Sinclair. I swear he's becoming like my security blanket – my body won't relax fully unless he's with me and my nightmares always surge in his absence. I'm getting too attached to him. I think sadly, climbing out of bed after half an hour of tossing and turning.

So? The little voice in my head challenges. He's the baby's father – he's going to be in your life forever. Why not get attached?

Because he won't always be in my life in this way. He's not going to be sleeping with me when he finds his second chance mate – and I have to be able to survive on my own. I can't become so codependent that I need him to take care of me. I answer ruefully.

Maybe he won't find his mate at all. The voice suggests, sounding much too hopeful for my liking.

I scoff at my own naivete, get it together, Ella! You can't start thinking that way – it's just asking for heartbreak.

I've only just opened the door to go downstairs and find an afternoon snack when one of the guards appears at the top of the stairwell. "Luna, there's a visitor for you."

"Really?" I stop in my tracks. "Who is it? I wasn't expecting anyone."

"She says you used to work for her." He shrugs. "I tried to get her name but she wouldn't tell me. Should I make her leave?"

I pause, knowing Sinclair wouldn't like the idea of an unidentified woman entering his home. I don't like the idea myself – especially after Roger's warning. "What does she look like?"

"Tall, dark hair, tan skin – maybe 40?" He lowers his voice to a whisper. "She's human."

My stomach sinks, it does sound like a former employer and if she's human then it's probably true. In fact, she sounds like the heartless woman who fired me so callously after I tried to beg Sinclair for Cora's job. "No, let her in. I'll speak to her."

Be nice, I instruct myself sternly. Maybe she came to apologize, don't be rude just because you're feelings were hurt.

When I get downstairs, Jake and Millie's mother is gazing around Sinclair's sitting room, a hungry gaze on her face. She looks me up and down as I enter, something distinctly spiteful in her open perusal. She speaks before I can say a word of welcome.

"Well, you've certainly come up in the world, Ella. Lord only knows what you had to do to wiggle your way into Dominic Sinclair's bed."

"What are you doing here?" I inquire, no longer feeling any need to play nice. She clearly set the tone of this conversation and though I'm sorely tempted to kick her out now, I need to find out what she wants first.

"Well when I saw your picture plastered across the society section of the paper I could scarcely believe it. I had to come and find out if the rumors were true." She explains simply.

I fight the urge to roll my eyes, the media firestorm my relationship with Sinclair created clearly didn't stop with the shifter news.

Everyone in the human world thought Sinclair was just a handsome billionaire, and he was still a public figure for all his philanthropic work. I should have realized this might happen – my social circle had been very small before discovering the werewolf world and most of the people from my past wouldn't have any reason to be suspicious of my relationship with Sinclair.

This woman, however, knows exactly how at odds I was with my pup's father in the beginning.

"Well now that you've seen that they were true, you can be leaving." I suggest, knowing there must be more to this.

"Oh no, I think you and I have much to discuss, Ella." Her eyes are locked on the curve of my belly. "It's no wonder you were begging outside his gate that day. No doubt trying to get a bit of money out of him to take care of your little problem?"

"My baby isn't a problem." I insist. "And I didn't even know I was pregnant then. I was asking for help on behalf of my sister – she was going to lose her job over a misunderstanding, ironically enough."

My ex-employer studies me for a moment, as if trying to decide whether or not she believes. After a pregnant pause, she snorts.

"So what, you thought because you spread your legs for him he would fall at your feet?"

She guesses, drawing the wrong conclusion. Shaking her head, she arches a brow. “Though I have to give you credit for not giving up when you realized he’d knocked you up. Very enterprising – for a common whore.”

My jaw drops, “Excuse me?”

“I always knew there was something off about you. It never made sense why you wanted to chase after my brats all day anyway.

Now I see the brilliance of your plan.” She nods at my small baby bump. “You were probably selling yourself all over that neighborhood, just waiting for exactly this sort of ‘accident.’”

“Are you suggesting...” I can’t even say the words, unable to believe my ears.

“How much did you charge him anyway?” She questions, venom dripping from her tongue. “I suppose being so beautiful meant you were able to attract clients far above your station, still, it seems backwards that he should be the one to pay for a night with you. And now you’ve won the lottery by conceiving his bastard.”

I’m not sure what upsets me more, hearing her call my pup names, or her accusations about me charging Sinclair for sex. “You come here and insult my baby, then accuse me of being a prostitute, and you think I’m just going to sit here and take it?” I demand fiercely. “You’re not just cruel – you’re delusional. Get out of my house this instant.”

“I’m not going anywhere.” She hisses in return. “Not without a check.”

The room is spinning around me, “You expect me to pay you? Why, to keep you from spreading these lies?”

“I think the tabloids would be very interested in what I could tell them about you.” She smirks. “They’re painting you two as some sort of fairytale romance – just imagine the headlines if they realized you’re nothing but a disgraced nanny who couldn’t even hold onto her job because she was too busy whoring around for wealthy men.”

I grit my teeth, trying to slow my racing thoughts enough to process this. I don’t particularly care what the human papers say about me, and I have enough good references from past jobs to refute what she’s saying. But that isn’t the problem. The real problem is that if the shifter media learns I was here in Moon Valley, working as a nanny for a human family in Sinclair’s neighborhood and not off in the bloodbane pack, they’ll figure out I’m human. If the truth comes out about my real identity, all our lies will be exposed, and the Campaign will be over faster than we can blink. The Prince will win, and the entire realm will be in danger – not to mention that my baby’s life will practically be forfeit.

I have to talk to Sinclair, I have to find a way to stop her.

“Give me twenty four hours.”

Chapter 80 – Roger Learns a Secret

Ella

“What!” Sinclair roars through the phone receiver, his deep voice full of such rage and aggression that it makes me flinch. I’ve just told him about every horrible moment of my conversation with my former employer – though now it’s probably more accurate to think of her as my blackmailer.

I’ll have to change her contact information in my phone to reflect her new title – I can even assign her an ominous ringtone. I fight down the urge to laugh at this insane thought, wondering why my brain always twists the darkest moments of my life into humor.

There is nothing funny about this situation.

“I don’t know what to do.” I whimper. “I don’t care what she says about me—” I’m interrupted by a low snarl, Sinclair’s wolf’s wordless insistence that he cares even if I don’t. “but if she sells this story then everyone will realize I’m human.”

“I’ll kill her.” He rumbles, overflowing with menace. “She won’t find it so easy to speak such filth when her head is no longer connected to her body.”

“You can’t!” I object, still feeling as though he’s missing the point. “That will only call more attention to her – there will be an investigation into her life and eventually they’ll want to interview me. My identity is bound to get out if that happens. Also, you know – murder is wrong, Dominic.”

“She threatened you.” He growls, as if I’ve forgotten. “And there won’t be an investigation if I make it look like an accident. You’d be amazed how many car accidents result in decapitations.”

“Blackmail hardly warrants an execution, and you can’t go around ripping the heads off everyone who is mean to me.” I insist, overwhelmed that this surreal conversation is actually occurring. “You’re supposed to be setting a good example for our son.”

“The example I’ll be setting is how to protect one’s mate from vile, conniving, despicable, foul—”

“Dominic!” I interrupt, raising my voice over his increasing volatile grumbling. “She has children who love her – she may not deserve their love, but if you kill her, they’ll suffer. Jake and Millie don’t deserve that.”

“They’d probably be better off without her.” Sinclair suggests sullenly, his voice shifting then, as if a new idea is occurring to him.

“We could even take them in – adopt them. I know you miss them... just think, we could have three children instead of one.”

“Oh really, are you going to kill their father too?” I inquire waspishly, shaking my head.

“That depends.” Sinclair replies hopefully, “would you be okay with that?”

“I don’t think I really appreciated how bloodthirsty shifters are about their families until now.” I tell Cora a little while later. “The ridiculous wolf actually thought he could win me over to his plan by waving those precious babies under my nose. It was like trying to talk a hungry jackal out of his dinner.”

“I mean he wasn’t completely off base.” Cora jokes, “if it was possible to convince you, bribing you with children is probably how I’d go about it too.”

“Well I told him that he wasn’t allowed to rip any heads off under any circumstances.” I counter.

Cora snorts, “I bet he took that really well.”

“Oh he grumbled and complained, but he got over it.” I laugh, leaving out the part where he threatened to come home and ‘spank my sassy bottom’ until I agreed to his violent plan. That is not the sort of detail I want my sister to know.

“So what’s he going to do?” My sister inquires curiously, sitting across from me in the same parlor where my blackmailer threatened me two hours ago. I called her and asked her to come over after getting off the phone with Sinclair, in desperate need of some moral support.

“He told me not to worry and that he’d take care of it.” I sigh. “I doubt he’ll pay her, but if he can get Mike to turn himself in to the police, he can probably convince her not to make good on her promise.”

“Are you okay with that?” Cora wonders aloud, “I wouldn’t think you’d be comfortable trusting someone else with something so important.”

“I trust Dominic.” I admit, blushing shyly. Cora understands better than anyone what a momentous statement this is for me. She knows I’ve always had to rely on myself, and that I’ve never felt safe relying on anyone else because of far too many bad experiences. “Honestly I felt better just talking to him about it. I know he’ll fix this, and my only concern is that he’ll lose his temper and go overboard protecting us.”

The baby kicks softly, as if he agrees. “Quick, come here!” I exclaim, waving Cora over. She does, and I pull her palm to my belly.

The baby is still now, so I murmur encouragement at my tummy. “Come on Rafe, say hello to your Aunt Cora.”

At the sound of his name, the pup complies, and Cora and I both squeal. She hugs me tightly then, “You’re glowing you know that? I’ve never seen you so happy – and correct me if I’m wrong, but I don’t think it’s just becoming a Mom.”

“You’re not wrong.” I confess, grinning despite myself. “I am happy, even with all the danger and the drama. I didn’t know it was possible to feel this way.”

Cora shakes her head, eyes shining. “God you should see your smile, Elle. I swear I could kiss Dominic.”

I’m amazed to feel a stab of jealousy when she mentions kissing Sinclair, even though I know it’s only an expression. “You don’t think it’s completely deranged?” I ask shyly. “I mean rogues keep popping up and trying to kill me, and a horrible heartless woman is blackmailing me. It seems crazy to be happy in spite of all that.”

“Ella,” She says seriously, leaning forward with her elbows on her knees. “Do you really think it’s crazy, or do you just feel like you don’t deserve to be happy?”

Her words cut me to the core, and I find myself staring at my hands. I ponder her question for a few seconds, shrugging. “I mean, do I deserve it? Not fishing for compliments, not feeling sorry for myself – but what have I done in my life to deserve so much prosperity? In a few months I could be as good as a Queen, even if it is only temporary.”

“Ella, the rich and powerful don’t end up that way because of merit!” Cora argues. “How many of the people running the world actually worked to get where they are? Everyone deserves to be happy... well maybe not the Prince or your old boss, but you do! You might not have done anything remarkable yet, but you’ve also never hurt anyone! You’ve never ruined lives for your own selfish promotion.”

“I haven’t been a complete saint.” I remind her. “I mean I’ve stolen and broken laws, I’m lying to millions of people even as we speak.”

“You stole when we were children. You broke laws to survive and to keep me alive, to protect the other orphans. You’ve taken care of people your whole life and you kept doing it for work because you love it so much. And you’re lying to people so that you can protect them from a monster. You’re still taking care of people now, and you’re risking your life to do it. Trust me Ella, you deserve all the prosperity and all the happiness in the world.”

I peek over at my sister, my throat scratching with unshed tears. Looking at her beloved face, I find the strength to ask a question I've been too afraid to ask until now. “What if I can't do it?”

“Do what, be queen?” She clarifies, her brow furrowed.

“Or any of it? I mean I'm just a human – every day I learn about something else I had no idea existed. And after the baby comes I'm going to lose its scent. What if I can't keep up the act? Or what if I can, but I make some horrible mistake because of my ignorance? I'm going to be responsible for so many people, what if I screw up and someone gets hurt as a result?” I question, swiping at my lashes to keep the tears from falling.

“You're not in this alone, Ella.” Cora murmurs. “Dominic is going to be helping you every step of the way, and so are his people – so will I, in any way I can. You don't have to bear all the responsibility yourself anymore – those days are over.”

I hiccup, nodding and trying to get my breathing under control. “Thank you.” I sniffle. “I needed to hear that.”

Just then a creak sounds on the other side of the door, and I realize we aren't alone. I quickly cross the floor, pulling the door open before our eavesdropper can get away. I suppose this is payback for my own spying the other day, but I'm horrified when I realize who was listening.

It's Roger, and he's just heard every single word of my conversation.

Chapter 81 – Roger Makes a Promise

Ella

I haven't been sick for a few days now, but when I see Roger standing on the other side of the door I immediately turn to one of the ornamental vases in the hallway and empty my stomach. Cora rushes forward to help me, glancing uncertainly at Roger as she pulls my hair back from my face.

I know that Sinclair and Roger are on better terms since the wild hunt, but I also know that their peace is very tenuous. Sinclair hasn't decided whether or not he truly trusts his brother yet, and though Roger has been helpful bringing intelligence from the Prince's camp, he could easily be playing the double agent for both sides – and now he knows my deepest, darkest secret.

This is so bad. I think frantically. He told the Prince that Sinclair hadn't marked me, what if he tells him this too? Forget the blackmail – Roger is more dangerous to me than some bitter ex-employer could ever be!

I wipe the back of my hand over my mouth, straightening with a pitiful moan. I look over at Roger, finding his expression a combination of confusion and concern. "You'd better come in."

"Ella, I'm sorry." He begins hesitantly. "I didn't mean to startle you, and I wasn't trying to eavesdrop. I came over to check in with Sinclair and... well it wasn't difficult to overhear your conversation."

"I know, I know – your shifter hearing is very acute." I grumble. "Trust me, I'm learning just how out of my depth I am every day."

"I don't understand." Roger admits, following me into the sitting room. "How is this even possible?"

I sit down, graciously accepting a glass of water from my sister. "Listen, I'll tell you the truth, but only if you promise me that this conversation stays between us. I know you're been helping us lately, but I'm going to be honest – I'm not convinced you're actually on our side."

"That's fair." Roger admits, looking drawn and pale. "After what I did... I know I don't deserve your trust, or your forgiveness."

"Well I'm sure I don't need to tell you what would happen if this information got out. The only people who know are servants of this house, and my doctor. Not even Henry knows the truth, because if this becomes public information Sinclair's campaign will be over. The Prince will become King, thousands would die under his tyranny – including me and your nephew.” I remark pointedly, holding my hand to my baby bump. “I don’t care what kind of sibling rivalry you have, or how strongly you think you should have Alpha – if you endanger my baby’s life, you won’t only have Sinclair to deal with – I’ll kill you myself.”

“Ella!” Cora exclaims, shocked by my aggression. In truth I’ve shocked myself, but those primal Mama Bear instincts that started coming out at the ball are back in full force, and I don’t regret a single word I’ve spoken. I would do anything to protect my child, including killing to keep him safe.

“It’s okay.” Roger assures her. “You’re very spirited for a human. I can see why Sinclair picked you.” He stares me in the eye, holding the contact as he makes his next promise. “And you have my word that I’ll take this secret to my grave – I swear it on my mother’s grave.”

“Good.” I nod, feeling a bit more relaxed now. “But you’re wrong if you think Sinclair picked me. This all started as a rather wild accident.”

“An accident?” Roger repeats, his brow knitting with confusion.

“It was my fault really.” Cora admits, relating the mix up at the sperm bank. Of course, her confession only leads to more questions, about why I went to the sperm bank in the first place, and how we figured out Sinclair’s sample had been used instead of the donor I chose. When he hears about Mike, I’m amazed to see how outraged he looks in my honor – I suppose messing with one’s fertility is a grave offense among wolves, even more so than with humans.

“So you still don’t know how the samples got switched?” Roger presses, after we move past the Mike of it all.

“No.” Cora and I say in unison. “The surveillance cameras were disabled in the lab – before the samples were switched. And of course we don’t film in the exam rooms.”

“What?” I inquire, “this is the first I’m hearing of the security cameras being tampered with.”

“That’s one of the reasons they eventually let me off the hook.” Cora informs me. “Sinclair ordered them to hire me back, but the investigation didn’t actually move away from me as a suspect until they found the tapes were blank during your appointment. I don’t have access to the surveillance monitors.”

“Does that mean...” I can hardly wrap my brain around this. “We’ve been assuming this was an accident all along, and I could even understand someone erasing them after the fact to cover their mistake... but if someone turned the cameras off before the switch then it must have been on purpose.”

“But why would anyone try to inseminate a human?” Roger questions, aghast. “I mean no shifter I know would imagine it was possible for you to actually conceive. I still can’t believe it myself.”

“I don’t know how it was possible – and honestly I don’t care. This baby is a miracle for me whether it’s a human, or a wolf.” I shrug, though in truth I feel quite uneasy. “But it does make me nervous to think someone might have done this to us. Even if they knew I could conceive, what was their goal? I highly doubt anyone would do this just to make my dreams of becoming a mother – or Dominic’s of becoming a father – come true.”

“True.” Cora nods sympathetically, “I have a hard time thinking their motives were pure, but I also don’t see an opportunity for malice either. How does you having a shifter baby help anyone?”

“This has to be the weirdest crime in history.” I express, absolutely flabbergasted.

“Cora, who has access to both your labs and the security rooms, and who else knew you had Dominic’s sperm?” Roger asks, obviously as curious as we are.

“My bosses.” Cora shrugs, “but they’re also the ones running the investigation. Sinclair has some of his men on it as well, but as far as I know, no one has ever been arrested or charged.”

“I can ask him about it once he comes home.” I suggest, “with everything else going on, I sort of forgot about all this, but I bet he hasn’t.”

“You can count on that.” Roger confirms, cocking his head to the side. “So what happens after the baby comes? You mentioned losing its scent. Has Sinclair talked to you about his plans for keeping your identity secret?”

“We’re just trying to get through the campaign.” I explain, blushing to think of everything he must have overheard. “Afterwards I can step back from the public eye and... I don’t know, we’ll take it from there. If he has plans he hasn’t talked to me about them, but I trust we’ll think of something.”

Roger is staring at me with an unreadable expression, and for a moment I assume he’s judging me. “What?” I ask softly, “You think I’m being too optimistic? Or too trusting?”

“No.” He counters, shaking his head with a look of begrudging respect. “I was actually thinking that you’re incredibly brave to be doing this, and incredibly generous to be helping Dom. You must have been so overwhelmed when he asked for your help,” He clenches his eyes shut, and for some reason I think I sense some guilt when he continues, “and Goddess, those rogue attacks...”

you must have been so terrified.”

“Actually it was her suggestion to pose as Luna.” Cora boasts, focusing on the less traumatic portion of Roger’s statement. I smile at her, thankful she’s looking out for me this way. She grins back, continuing. “He only wanted her as a surrogate at first, but she proved how valuable she could be to him.”

Roger shakes his head, frowning deeply. “I’m so sorry, Ella.”

“For what?” I ask, confused.

“For being so cruel to you. For helping the Prince. If I’d known... I never would have... I’m just so sorry.” Roger professes, looking completely genuine.

“Well, that’s all ancient history now.” I exhale heavily, wondering how much harder it must have been for Sinclair to forgive his brother after all their history, when I find it difficult after only just meeting him. “As long as you’re on our side from here on out – I don’t care about the past.”

“You are too kind for your own good, you know that?” Roger asks, huffing out a laugh. There’s a spark of true admiration in his eyes, a spark that looks dangerously close to attraction as his gaze sweeps from my face and scans my figure.

“I keep trying to tell her that.” Cora declares. “Much good that it does me. She’s a stubborn thing.”

“Well I might be, but I’m not sure Dominic is going to be so calm when he finds out you know my secret.” I advise honestly. “You might want to leave before he gets home – let me break it to him.”

“That’s probably wise.” Roger agrees, rising to his feet. “I really am sorry, Ella.”

“I know.” I nod. “Now go – he’ll be here any moment.”

Chapter 82 – Sinclair Takes on a Blackmailer

Sinclair

When I arrive at the home of Ella's former employer, it takes all my strength to push my wolf down deep. The last thing I need is to actually murder a human, no matter how badly I might want to.

She deserves it. My wolf mutters mutinously, think about how easy it would be. Then she'd never be able to hurt Ella again.

Maybe so, but Ella wouldn't like it. I remind him, recalling how the precious creature had worried for the children, even when her own safety and happiness was on the line.

Hmph, she's got you wrapped around her little finger. My wolf accuses.

Oh, like she doesn't have you in the exact same position? I scoff. I'd like to see you resist her when she's blinking those beautiful big eyes up at you, begging you not to orphan innocent children.

Please, you spoke over the phone! He reminds me, his voice trailing off into growls of longing as he pictures her. You couldn't see her eyes or those plump, pouty lips or the sweet swell of her belly. You couldn't smell her delectable scent or...

And I'm the one who's whipped? I roll my eyes as I knock on the heavy rosewood door.

To my surprise, Jake and Millie answer the door, tilting their blonde heads up to me with excited grins. "Mr. Sinclair!"

My wolf calms as soon as he sees the children, softening like the big teddy bear he is. "Well hello!" I drop down to their level, unable to resist their adorable smiles. "I haven't seen you two in ages, what have you been up to?"

"We have a new nanny." Millie whispers conspiratorially, reaching out to play with my tie.

"She never takes us on walks in the neighborhood." Jake explains, clearly blaming his new carer for our increasingly infrequent meetings. "She's too lazy and she hates being outside."

"That's too bad." I commiserate, pulling Millie into my arms and lifting her up as I ruffle Jake's hair affectionately. "Doesn't she know growing boys and girls need to get out and explore?"

"I don't think so." Millie frowns seriously. "She's not very smart."

"I miss Ella." Jake adds miserably. "Mommy's been saying lots of mean things about her, but we don't believe her. Ella was the best nanny we've ever had."

"Well I know Ella misses you too." I confide. "You know she's living with me now?"

"She is?" Jake gapes. "You mean you get to play with her all day long?"

"Whenever you wants?" Millie adds in awe.

"Well, not whenever I want." I confess. If only they knew how badly I'd like to stay home with Ella all day, both playing and not playing. "My job keeps me very busy, but she's there in the morning and when I get home at night. She tells me how badly she wants to see you."

"Maybe you can convince Mommy to let her visit?" Jake suggests, staring up at me so hopefully I feel guilty for thinking that nothing I could possibly say to their horrible mother will make her come around.

"I can try." I promise, patting the boy on the shoulder, "and you two should know you're welcome at my home anytime."

Maybe we should get rid of their mother after all. My wolf insinuates in my head. Think how happy Ella would be if we brought them home with us.

I'm not stealing children just to make Ella smile. I argue, tempting as it may be.

Spoilsport. His objections are interrupted when Jake and Millie's mother appears at the top of the stairs. She stops dead when she sees me. Her face pales, but she plasters on a phony smile. "Mr. Sinclair, to what do we owe this honor?"

"You and I need to speak." I answer coldly, surprising the children. I set Millie on the ground, smiling widely so that they know my harsh tone is not directed at them. "Your Mommy and I need a few minutes alone, but I'll come say goodbye, before I leave. I promise."

Their mother calls for the nanny, her voice very shrill. The children are swept away by a middle aged woman with a grim face, and I'm struck by how uninterested she seems in her charges. She doesn't even speak to them as she leads them out of the room.

"Well, Mr. Sinclair, what can I help you with?" Ella's blackmailer questions, as if she doesn't already know why I'm here. She guides me into a parlor, gesturing towards a plush couch. "Please, have a seat."

“No.” I declare firmly. “Call me crazy, but I don’t think false politeness is appropriate when you’re threatening my family.”

Her eyes go wide, and her heart rate increases, racing violently in her chest. “I—I’m sure I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Do not lie to me.” I growl, letting some of my wolf’s ferocity bleed into my voice. The woman reels back, shivering for reasons she doesn’t understand. She may have the dull intuition of a human, but even humans know when they’re in the presence of a lethal predator intent on destroying them.

“Please, it wasn’t what you think!” She lies, her voice unsteady and choking with defiance.

“Oh I’d like to hear this.” I state ominously, prowling towards her. “I’d like to know what kind of twisted logic made you think it would be wise to try and blackmail the most powerful man on the continent.”

“But I wasn’t blackmailing you!” She immediately objects, too stupid to realize that I wouldn’t be nearly this angry if I had been her target. “I only wanted people to see that grasping little gold digger –”

“If you have any brains in that foolish head of yours, you’ll stop while you’re ahead.” I interrupt, clenching my hands into fists.

“You may have no sense of loyalty yourself, but where I come from, if you threaten one member of the family you threaten all of them. If you insult one, you insult them all.”

“But that isn’t, I would never –”

“Let me tell you the situation you’re in.” I cut her off again, my voice as deep as it can become without devolving into wordless snarls. “You first fired my fiancée when she did nothing wrong. You deprived your own children of the most loving caregiver they could ever hope for. You spread rumors among your friends to ensure Ella wouldn’t be able to find another job.” The wretched woman is cowering against the wall now, having backed away from me until she could move no further.

I don’t show her any mercy, I continue stalking until I’m towering over her. “Now if it had been up to me, I would have destroyed you for that alone, but not Ella. She’s much too good, not that you ever saw that. So I agreed to let you go on living your obscenely prosperous life without interference.”

I can smell her fear – sour and acrid. “But then you learned that despite your efforts to ruin Ella’s life, she found happiness with me. Now I don’t know if you’re just so bitter and heartless that you couldn't stand to see a hard-working young woman succeed, or if you saw my fortune and decided to try and steal part of it for yourself. But either way, you came into my home and called the mother of my child a cheap whore. You threatened to spread your lies in the tabloids. You tried to extort a man who could take away your wealth and your freedom with a single snap of my fingers, and you hurt the woman I love."

I'm sure my wolf is glowing in my eyes, and suddenly the aroma of urine fills the air. I can see the hot liquid running down the woman's stockings, and my adrenaline spikes with the knowledge that my prey is well and truly cornered. "You also alienated the only person who was protecting you from my wrath in the first place."

"I'm sorry!" She sobs, shaking like a leaf. "I was a fool, I don't know what I was thinking. I'll do anything, just please don't hurt me."

"Shut up, you stupid cow." I bite. "I'm not going to hurt you. I'm not even going to ruin your life, because Ella still loves your children even though they've got a worthless hag for a mother. But mark my words, if I ever see you near my family again, I will destroy you."

I proclaim, speaking with absolute conviction. "If the lies you tried to blackmail us with ever get out, if a single word of your vitriol makes it to a tabloid editor— whether you are the source or not — I will take away everything you care about in the world."

She nods, sobbing and snivelling like a child. "I-I promise. You have my word."

"Good." I growl, starting to turn away. "And for the record, you absolute idiot — I own stock in every press outlet and newspaper from here to the coast. No one will ever publish a story about me without asking for my permission first. You think about that before you ever consider trying to get your story out as leverage against me."

She sinks to the ground, and I leave her to wallow in her own shame and piss. I keep my promise of course, I go to wish the children farewell, and go home to tell Ella the news.

Chapter 83 – Ella Talks Down a Wolf

Sinclair

It's dark out by the time I get home, and I follow my nose upstairs to Ella's room. She's just stepping out of the shower when I walk in, her dripping body wrapped in a fluffy towel. Her rose gold hair is still dry, piled on top of her head and held secure with a pair of chop sticks.

She startles slightly when she sees me sitting on her bed, then rolls her eyes and huffs. "If you're going to move around as silently as a ghost, would you at least announce yourself when you enter rooms, Dominic?"

I chuckle softly, raking my eyes over her wet skin. "Is that any way to greet your knight in shining armor?"

Ella steps forward before she can think to hide her nervous curiosity. "What happened?"

"Come give me a kiss hello, and I'll tell you." I invite, holding my arms open to her. Her muscles relax when she sees my easy mood, and she rolls her eyes again, smiling now. I growl playfully at her sass, and Ella quivers visibly, her thighs clenching reflexively beneath the hem of her towel.

Ella crosses the floor, flushing prettily as she comes to stand between my legs. Her pink lips pucker, and she leans into my warmth, giving every indication that she's about to brush her mouth over my own. However at the last moment she redirects, skirting away from my waiting lips and attempting to drop a kiss on my cheek. She doesn't get very far – clearly the mischievous human forgot to account for shifter speed when she formed this plan. I intercept her mouth with my own, claiming her lips and rumbling my disapproval.

Ella giggles softly, even as I tease the seam of her lips with my tongue, and flip her onto the bed. My clothes grow damp as her towel slips away and the liquid dotting her skin absorbs into the cloth of my shirt and trousers. I slant my lips over hers, delving into her sweet mouth and coaxing her tongue into a dance. Her arms and legs wrap around me in welcome, and I'm sorely tempted to strip so that I can feel her every inch of her naked body against my own.

I pull the pins from Ella's hair, letting it fall down around her face and sending her lovely scent fluttering into the air around us. I continue stealing kiss after kiss, caressing Ella's sides and silky thighs, dragging the sweetest sounds from her lips. My wolf purrs in reply, and I graze my scruffy jaw over the soft skin of her cheek, changing her contented murmurs into a fresh burst of giggles.

Chuckling with dark, sexual intent, I bury my face into her neck and give the velvety swath of skin the same treatment. Pausing to explore the abraded territory with my tongue, I drag one large palm over her round bottom. Squeezing her lush rear end, I continue kissing my way down to her chest. Ella's breath catches as I brush my fangs over the swell of her breast, then yelps in surprise when I nip her sensitive flesh.

"That's for not letting me kill that horrible woman in your honor." I inform her, moving my mouth to the other breast to give it the same treatment. "That's for rolling your eyes at me." This time the playful bite is met with a moan, and her nipples harden into tight buds – dangerously close to my questing lips. Not trusting myself not to suck one of the sweet buds into my mouth, I finish my rebuke with a single swat to her behind. "And that's for trying to withhold kisses I earned fair and square."

"I still haven't heard how you earned them." Ella argues cheekily, squirming against me and making the quickly stiffening member between my legs strain against my zipper. I pull away from her slightly, pushing up onto my elbow to gaze down at her, and wondering if this was actually a bigger mistake. At least when she was flush against me I couldn't see her many charms.

"Well, you don't have to worry about being blackmailed ever again." I assure her, looking down into her lovely face and wondering if there's ever been anyone so irresistible. "At least, not from your former employer."

"Really?" Ella inquires, eyes bright as she props herself up too.

"Really," I confirm, brushing a few stray locks of hair back from her face. "I also saw Jake and Millie. I told them how much you miss them, and they told me all about how horrible their new nanny is."

Her face falls, and suddenly I regret sharing this particular detail. "Did they seem very unhappy?" Ella asks anxiously.

"They seemed as sweet as ever." I share, "and I don't think they're being mistreated. I think she's just not any fun."

Ella nods thoughtfully, peeking up at me from beneath her long, dark lashes. "How did you convince her to drop the story?"

"It wasn't hard." I explain, watching the progress of my fingers as I trace them down her arm, leaving a trail of gooseflesh in their wake. "I simply made sure she realized how foolish it was to threaten a man as powerful as I am. Her imagination did all the rest, but I still would have liked to kill her."

"Well I'm glad you didn't." Ella replies firmly. "We don't need to be inviting more trouble to our doorstep.”

“Oh I agree.” I muse, laughter obvious in my voice as I move my hand to her belly. “My hands are plenty full with you and this little one.”

“Our baby is not trouble.” Ella objects, narrowing her eyes at me.

“Oh I don’t know about that.” I tease. “With you for a mother? I’d say he’s bound to have a mischievous streak a mile wide – though we won’t have to worry about that for some time.”

“And I suppose you were always perfectly well behaved?” Ella counters, arching one smooth brow. “I ought to ask Henry how you were as a boy. I bet he has all sorts of stories to share.”

“I was an absolute angel.” I lie, trying my best to sound self-righteous.

“I don’t believe that for a single second.” Ella laughs.

“You hear that, Rafe?” I ask our son, beaming when a little kick pulses in Ella’s tummy, right on the other side of my hand. “As if your Mommy hasn’t been naughty enough today – now she’s calling me a liar.”

“Dominic?” Ella’s serious tone pulls my eyes up to her face. “Something else happened today, while you were out.”

“What?” I press, sensing that she’s not merely trying to distract me from our flirting.

“Well Cora came over and I was talking to her about everything that’s been going on.” Ella begins slowly, not meeting my gaze.

“And well... the short version is that Roger came over while she was here. He heard part of our conversation and... he knows I’m human.”

“What!?” I explode, surging to my feet.

Ella immediately scrambles out of bed after me. Her tiny hands close around my arms, as if she’s afraid I’m going to run out on her. “It’s okay, he stayed and we talked. I explained the situation and he honestly seemed to listen. He promised not to tell – ever.

He apologized for everything that’s happened, and the only reason he left is because I made him. I thought you should hear it from me.”

“Ella, why didn’t you tell me sooner!” I demand, trying not to lose my temper. “I’m not convinced that Roger is actually on our side and with this information, the Prince could end my campaign like that,” I say, snapping my fingers.

“I know, but you only just got home, and I wanted to hear how things went at Jake and Millie’s.” Her face twists into an accusatory stare, “And I’m not the one who got us all sidetracked with kisses.”

Sighing, I acknowledge that I didn’t give her much chance to tell me this latest development. “What exactly did Roger say?”

“Well, we talked about how it happened and Cora explained that the surveillance footage was tampered with – which I didn’t even know about until today.” Ella shares, an open question in her expression.

I nod, “I knew, but we still aren’t any close to understanding who was behind this– or what they were hoping to achieve.”

“Well, Roger just kind of talked through the possibilities with us and everything. He seemed to really regret helping the Prince, I mean I actually thought he looked as though he felt guilty about working against us.” Ella conveys softly, her hands stroking my arms in long, steady movements – clearly intended to calm me.

“He should.” I mutter bleakly. Ella doesn’t know that Roger helped orchestrate the attack in the alley, and unless Roger becomes a problem, I don’t see a reason to tell her. It would only hurt her feelings, and if Roger is truly on our side then I don’t want more space between them. “And I think you’re probably right. I trust your judgement. But I need to go see him, just to be sure.”

“You won’t hurt him, will you?” Ella presses.

“No sweetheart, I promise I’m in control.” I vow. “Just give me a couple of hours. I’ll go talk to Roger and then I’ve got that bloody,

‘have a drink with the Alpha’ event – but I’ll be home by dinner. We can have a nice night together and forget all this ever happened.”

“Okay.” She agrees, stepping away from me. “I’ll see you soon, then.”

Of course, if I’d known then what I know now... I would never have left the house that night. I would have stayed home with Ella and blown off my brother and the campaign. I could have saved us all a lot of trouble if I had.

Chapter 84 – Sinclair Makes a Detour

Sinclair

When I reach Roger's house, he's not the least bit surprised to find me darkening his doorway. "I was wondering when you were gonna show up." He quips, opening the door wide to welcome me inside.

"Am I that predictable?" I grouse, stepping over the threshold.

"No- I still wasn't sure whether or not you'd rip my head off after you arrived." Roger shares wryly.

"You've been talking with Ella." I assess coolly, recalling the sweet human's objection to me using this precise tactic against our enemies.

Roger snorts. "Not necessary. I grew up with you, I know your MO, brother."

"Well you have Ella to thank for my even temper either way. She seems to trust you'll keep your word and protect her secret." I explain, eyeing him suspiciously.

"And you came to find out if she's right." Roger guesses.

"Is she?" I inquire. "Or is this another one of your tricks?"

"It's not a trick." Roger states simply, leading me into his study. "But I'm not doing it for you – I'm doing it for her."

I absorb this information slowly. It does seem easier to believe my brother would help a stranger sooner than he'd help me, but there's also something in his tone, some unspoken emotion I don't quite understand. "Why do you care what happens to her?" I inquire.

"Because she's exactly what you've been saying she is all along. She's brave and clever and good to her very core. Goddess only knows how you managed to get her, but you certainly don't deserve her." Roger replies, giving me a begrudging look that tells me he's only half joking.

My wolf growls possessively in my head, he likes her.

Good, if he likes her he'll help us. I answer evenly.

But she's mine. My wolf argues fiercely. He shouldn't even be allowed to look at her.

Would you get a hold of yourself? I admonish.

I won't share her! The stubborn predator is digging in his heels, making my hackles raise and claws extend. This is why we need to claim her, so that other wolves won't come sniffing around our mate.

You're acting like a child. I'm losing my temper now, sick and tired of being at odds with my inner animal. She isn't our mate and I'm not going to hurt her with a claiming mark her body can't handle. Besides, even if Roger is interested in Ella, she isn't interested in him. Have some self-respect.

"I haven't got her – not the way you mean." I correct, shaking myself out of my inner conflict. "She's been adamant about that – she's only interested in me as her baby's father." I share, deciding that my brother doesn't need to know how complicated my relationship with Ella truly is.

Roger snorts, "Who are you kidding? That woman is clearly infatuated with you, and I know you want her for keeps. Your wolf is bloody besotted."

"She's carrying my pup, that's changing both of us, neither of us can trust our feelings right now." I reason, using the same logic with him that I've been employing to justify my own restraint. If I let myself believe that everything happening between Ella and I is real, there will be no holding my wolf back, and I don't want to frighten or push her into something she doesn't truly want, or isn't ready for.

"You know as well as I do that pregnancy can't magically make people fall in love, even if they're already interested in each other." Roger scoffs, sounding truly jealous now. "Don't waste a gift, Dom."

I stop dead in my tracks. "Whoever said anything about love?"

His eyes roll into the back of his head. "Honestly Dominic, sometimes I think you don't have a brain in your head."

"We only just met." I remind him. "And we've experienced nothing but drama since then, it's not just the pregnancy that can toy with emotions."

"It sounds to me like you'll take any excuse to deny what's staring you in the face. And if you don't wise up and do something about it, other wolves who aren't so hard-headed are going to start horning in on your territory." Roger warns, sounding as if he'd like to lead the charge. "Ella might not be able to serve as a true Luna, but that's only a concern if you have a pack to lead. No one will care if she's human when she can clearly bear shifter children."

“Is that a threat?” I counter, my defenses riled by the obvious longing in his voice.

“I’m not delusional enough to think that Ella could ever forgive me for helping the Prince plan the first attack.” Roger sighs.

“But you can still hope.” I suggest, letting a note of menace bleed into my voice.

“Dominic, I’m done battling with my own family. From the sounds of it, we’re going to need each other in the months ahead... if there’s to be a war – we can’t be divided.” He grimaces, though I note he didn’t really answer my question. After all, it’s one thing to say you won’t pursue someone, and another to say you don’t want to in the first place.

“I’m trying to win so that there won’t be a war.” I grumble. “But I agree, we’ve been enemies for too long. No woman should come between brothers, and unlike Lydia, Ella would never want to.”

“Lydia couldn’t help it.” Roger defends, some of his old animosity rising to the surface. “It was the bond.”

I purse my lips, trying to decide whether or not I want to tell Roger the truth about Lydia. He’s never been willing to listen before, and I know this is an opportunity to clear the air between us. I also know it could backfire catastrophically. “Roger, Lydia used us both.” I declare, deciding that more lies won’t help anything. “I know what she told you, but she knew we were fated for two years before she left you.”

“What?” Roger gapes, the gears visibly turning in his mind as he struggles to process this information. “No, your bond manifested when you turned 18.”

I shake my head, determined to make him hear me out. “It manifested when I was 16, but Dad didn’t name me his heir until I reached adulthood. The only reason she decided to give into fate was because he announced it on my birthday. Before that she made it perfectly clear I wasn’t good enough for her.”

Roger slumps into a chair. “But, you never said...”

“Why would I? She didn’t want me and I wanted you to be happy. I didn’t want to give you another reason to hate me.” I confess.

“So why did you betray me?” He hisses, his wolf glowing in his eyes. “If you really wanted me to be happy you could have rejected her when she changed her mind?”

“I was a pup!” I exclaim. “I’d spent two years in misery, longing for my mate. My wolf was half mad with unrequited feelings and I was too young to know better. I was blinded by our bond, and it wasn’t until years later that I realized what a fool I’d been. I never wanted to hurt you... I just wasn't strong enough to resist fate. Not then, at least."

Roger sits back, watching me closely. After a few long moments, he scrubs his palm over his face, and I'm shocked to see his eyes are red – on the verge of tears. "I haven't been a very good brother to you, have I?"

"You've been a pain in the ass." I quip, huffing an exasperated laugh. "Roger, when we were little you were my hero. I would have followed you anywhere!"

"But I never let you." He finishes my thought, clamping his eyes shut. "Dad tried to tell me a thousand times that it wasn't your fault Mom died. And I know it wasn't fair of me to treat you so horribly. In hindsight, I don't even think you're the one I hated, I was just so mad at the Goddess for taking her from me, and I needed someone to blame."

"I know." I affirm, remembering our argument after the Wild Hunt. It seems like every other conversation we have these days is some long-overdue emotional blowout. We've poured out years worth of feelings and resentments in a handful of weeks, and already our relationship feels like it's turned a corner. For the first time since I was a child, I feel like my brother is more friend than enemy.

Roger is giving me a watery smile, and I realize he's realizing the same thing I am. "And to think, all it took was one tiny human to finally make us talk all this out."

To my amazement, I'm smiling back. "One tiny, very special human." I correct, thinking of the beautiful creature I left at home.

Roger frowns, "At some point we need to talk about how this all started, Dom. Ella said you still don't know how your sample got switched in the sperm lab."

"That's a conversation for another time." My jaw clenches reflexively. "I haven't told Ella yet, but my investigators have come across evidence which suggests whoever is responsible is very powerful... and they knew exactly what they were doing."

Chapter 85 – Ella Starts to Worry

Sinclair

When I enter the Blood Moon Tavern for the 'have a drink with the Alpha' town hall event, I immediately begin cursing Hugo. My beta may have talked me into this campaign event with good intentions, but I would so much rather go home to Ella. After the way we left things this evening, not to mention my conversation with Roger, my wolf is positively rabid to go climb into bed with her and finish what we started.

However, I made a pledge to my pack that I would come out to this bar and talk with the people one on one, giving them an opportunity to share their thoughts, grievances and questions with me in an informal setting. It's the sort of event the Prince would never consider holding, and also the kind common shifters appreciate most. So I plaster a smile on my face and enter the rustic pub, greeting the assembled pack members as if there's nothing I would rather be doing.

At first I'm completely distracted, preoccupied with thoughts of Ella, our growing pup and whether it might be possible that my brother is right. Could our feelings for each other be more than mere attraction and the connection forged by our pup? Could we be falling in love? I'm not even sure I know what love feels like – of course I imagined myself head over heels for Lydia once, but can there be true love when one partner is only in the relationship for selfish, personal gain? Can a person honestly know what it means to be in love, when it's all one sided?

A burst of laughter and noise pulls my attention away from my thoughts, and suddenly I realize I've been neglecting my conversation with the pack members around me. "I know that look." One of the men in front of me guffaws, slapping his leg. "I'd say the Alpha has his mind on things far lovelier than taxes."

"A certain she-wolf with a swollen belly perhaps?" Another wolf suggests, wagging his eyebrows.

I laugh apologetically, though none of the wolves surrounding me seem upset. They all look as though they understand all too well. "I'm sorry, you've caught me. I have a hard time letting my mate out of my sight these days." I confess, knowing that speaking plainly is far more likely to win me points with this demographic.

"It's no worry." An older man assures me, patting my back. "I remember what it was like when my wife was breeding, and it's always worst with the first."

"When I found out my Mary was pregnant, I actually attacked one of her colleagues when he got too close to her!" Another man shares, "luckily he didn't hold it against me."

I chuckle, "My wolf wanted me to go after Ella's doctor and the nurses when we first got the news – men and women.” I relate, earning myself a fresh round of laughter. “Luckily she’s learned to climb into my arms anytime I start getting aggressive, the clever minx knows I can’t attack anyone if I’m holding her.”

They raise their brows with approval, not just any she-wolf can take on an Alpha’s riled wolf, even when it’s their mate. I swell with pride over their impressed looks, but settle in to listen rather than continue spending my own voice. I’m amazed that this burly group of hardened shifters is so content to talk about she-wolves and babies rather than politics or security, but before long all the rough and tumble bar patrons are exchanging stories of becoming fathers and the antics of their children. I’m suddenly wishing I’d brought my own father along, and thinking that I wouldn’t mind campaign events so much if they were all like this.

I order a second drink as the tales unfold, but set it down after a few sips. Though I requested the same brand of liquor as my first tumbler-full, there’s a strange metallic taste to the liquid that turns my stomach. I wonder if soap was left in the glass after being washed, or perhaps the bartender opened a new bottle, not realizing the liquor inside had turned. Unfortunately I never figure out what’s wrong with the draught, because the last thing I remember is thinking that it tastes off, and then everything is dark.

Ella

When Sinclair doesn’t come home in time for dinner, I assume the campaign event ran long. I’m disappointed, but I know that these things are often out of his hands. Winning the crown is more important than spending time with me, and only a complete narcissist could be upset by that fact.

Says the woman who wants to curl up in a ball and cry because Sinclair cares more about the campaign than you. The little voice in my head remarks dryly.

That’s not fair. I answer, beyond frustrated. Those are more hormones talking, not logic.

Sure, sure. She snips. Blame the baby.

I pat my tummy. “I don’t blame you.” I tell my growing pup, “I do, however, blame my body.”

The baby flutters and kicks against my hand, as if he’s telling me he understands completely. I feel a rush of love so powerful my dour mood disappears, and I can only smile as I get through my meal, content to talk to the tiny being inside me.

Unfortunately, my good mood only lasts until I realize it's almost nine o'clock, and Sinclair still hasn't come home. I decide to call him, but the line rings and rings before eventually going to voicemail. I hang up and send him a quick text: Just checking in, is the event going alright?

Nothing.

Sighing, I put my phone aside and decide to take a bath. I'm worrying about nothing, the sooner I stop thinking about Sinclair, the sooner he'll be home.

I don't know. My conscience interjects, something feels off to me. Are you sure he's okay.

It was an event at a bar, he probably just got caught up. Or maybe he decided to have a night out – he never gets to do anything for himself. He deserves to let loose a little.

True, but I don't think he'd do that without telling you. The voice replies.

It probably slipped his mind. I insist, shaking off the sting carried by the idea of being an afterthought to him.

I fill the huge whirl pool tub in Sinclairs bathroom, choosing to use his rooms instead of my own, just in case he comes home while I'm soaking. I have a sudden, silly fantasy of him walking in while I'm submerged in the hot water and bubbles. I imagine him claiming that he's dirty after his night out and insisting that he needs to join me. I picture him climbing into the tub with me, and settling me between his legs.

As I sink into the steaming water, I slide my own hands over my soft skin, pretending that they're Sinclairs – knowing he'll probably demand to wash me himself, and getting lost in the sensations. My hand lingers over my breasts and between my legs, Sinclair's deep voice filling my head with flimsy excuses about how he has to make sure all my important parts are clean.

Before long I'm breathing heavily and flushed for reasons that have nothing to do with the heat of the bath, and I decide this has to stop before Sinclair walks in and catches me in a much more intimate act than bathing. I wash quickly, settling down enough to soak, but soon the water grows cold, and I have no choice but to get out.

I check the time as I pull on a plush robe. 11 o'clock now. I retrieve my phone, only to find that I haven't had any calls or texts from Sinclair. Feeling truly worried now, I call him again. I know it's not very late, but he promised to be home hours ago, and I've never known him to run late without communicating the delay. When I get his voicemail I try calling two more times, and send a couple more texts for good measure.

Are you okay? I was expecting you hours ago.

Should I wait up?

Why do I feel so anxious about asking these simple questions? I got past my wariness of scaring Sinclair off ages ago, and yet this still feels like a test, like I might be coming on too strong or seem needy for worrying about him.

That's Mike's influence. The little voice in my head reminds me. He would accuse you of being a nagging shrew if you wanted to know when to expect him home, that's not Sinclair. Don't put that on him.

Then why hasn't he called me? Why isn't he responding?

Something's wrong. My conscience insists, more forcefully now.

I decide to call Roger, just to make sure Sinclair actually made it to the campaign event after their talk. He answers quickly, but confirms Sinclair left hours ago. He tells me to sit tight while he goes to the bar, and so I hang up and try to be patient.

In the end, I don't have to wait for Roger to call me back. My phone chirps, and I see a message from Sinclair.

Stop bothering me – I found better company for the night.

Then, immediately following the text, a photo appears. Sinclair is naked in a strange bed, his eyelids heavy over a sultry stare, his clothes from this evening slung over a nightstand. And there beside him, naked as the day she was born – is Lydia.

Chapter 86 – Sinclair Wakes with His Ex

Sinclair

The world is fuzzy when I wake. I sit up, instantly on edge. My wolf knows something is wrong, not that this is any great feat of instinct. I don't recognize my surroundings, and I have no recollection of falling asleep. The last thing I remember is being at the 'have a drink with the Alpha' event and talking about fatherhood with my constituents.

How much time has passed? I wonder, my thoughts trapped in a strange fog. I feel hungover, but I can't imagine I had enough alcohol to render me in such a state. It's already light out, and why do I smell...

"Lydia!" I exclaim, scanning the space for my ex-wife. The entire room reeks of her, and belatedly I realize we're in a hotel. I can sense her presence in the other room, but as I slide from bed I realize I'm completely naked.

She appears in the doorway of the bathroom, leaning against the frame. She's wearing my dress shirt from last night. It's unbuttoned from collar to hem, making it clear that she's nude underneath. I'm sure she intended it to give me tantalizing flashes of her tan skin, but I feel no attraction for her at all. My wolf is roaring in my head, my hackles raising defensively when Lydia flashes her fangs in a lethal grin. "Good morning, lover."

"What have you done?" I snarl, not bothering to hide my outrage and disgust. Slowly, so slowly I feel furious with my own dull wits, a picture is forming in my mind. The puzzle pieces are slowly clicking into place. I feel so groggy, achy and nauseous, not because I'm hungover, but because I was drugged.

That metallic taste in my drink. I realize angrily, wishing I'd had the sense to walk out of the pub the moment I realized something was off. I glance again to the windows, realizing it must be morning already. I have no memory of last night and no way of knowing what I did in my drugged state. Did she give me something that unhinged me enough that I would actually sleep with her? Did I make a scene when I left the bar?

"Dominic, I haven't done anything!" Lydia exclaims, looking offended. "Don't you remember? We ran into each other after your event last night. I guess without your little pet hanging on your arm you were finally able to remember why we're so good together."

Ella! I think suddenly. I promised her I'd be home in time for dinner, she must be so worried! "Where's my phone?" I demand sharply.

Lydia's mouth drops open, and some of her haughtiness sleeps away. "Seriously?!" She bursts out, "that's all it takes, one mention of the little bitch and you just forget I exist?"

Without thinking, I lunge for Lydia, my claws and fangs extended, my shoulders shaking with the effort of holding off the urge to shift. I stop myself short of reaching for her, though my wolf is sorely tempted. "Don't you ever talk about Ella that way. In fact, keep her name and any other foul nicknames you come up with, out of your mouth completely."

"What are you doing?" Lydia sputters, flinching and backing away from me. "I'm your mate. You can't.... This isn't..."

"You think I can't threaten you? You think I can't hurt you if you endanger my family?" I snap. "You aren't my mate anymore, Lydia, and you weren't ever worthy of being Luna even when you had the title." Despite my words, even I'm shocked at how easy I find it to show aggression to her. Everything I know about fated mates has taught me that I shouldn't be able to stomach raising a hand against her, but it's almost as if she and Ella have traded places in my heart. Now my wolf only cares for protecting the mother of our pup, even if it means protecting her from my once-fated mate.

"I haven't done a thing to your disgusting little family." Lydia spits, hissing like a cat.

"You drugged me." I accuse. "What if I let something sensitive slip under the influence? How did you get me out of that bar?"

What if someone saw us leaving together? You might have compromised my campaign!" I thunder, "and that does threaten my family – make no mistake."

"Who are you!" Lydia explodes, furious and cowering at once. "People don't just stop being mates, Dominic! You can't just erase our past because you found a new plaything. You always said I was more important to you than politics... and now it's like..."

Goddess, I don't even recognize you!

"You didn't really think that you could just walk out on me and I'd stay the same, did you? Did you expect me to wallow like a heartsick pup when I have a pack to lead and the fate of the entire fucking realm is on my shoulders? Did you really believe I'd stay here pining for you, and you would be able to walk back into my life like nothing happened?" I rumble coldly, wondering how I ever imagined myself in love with this woman. Ella would never ask me to choose her over the campaign, she wouldn't want me to. "And for the record, Lydia. I said you were more important than politics, not the pack – not my duty to protect my people."

"Well you didn't care very much about your family or your pack last night." Lydia announces spitefully, wearing a cruel smile that looks more like a grimace. "The time apart certainly didn't cost us in the bedroom. You were every bit as ferocious and virile as ever. I might be pregnant already."

I try not to let her see how deeply her words cut me. The idea that I had sex with her under the influence of her drugs makes me sick to my stomach. I have no way of knowing if she's telling the truth. There aren't any marks on her body from hickeys or lovebites, and I don't feel any scratches on my back of physical signs of the kind of rambunctious lovemaking we used to have, but then again – if I was most unconscious then there wouldn't be any of those signs. So while I'm sure her remarks about my ferocity are a lie, I can't rule out sex entirely. The bed is in complete disarray, and she certainly smells like me. Is it just from sleeping together... or did she manage to steal my seed the way she's suggesting.

"What would it matter if you're pregnant?" I say instead. "I already have my heir."

"You know better than anyone that the first born child isn't always the strongest." Lydia answers shrewdly, looking so cunning I wonder how Roger and I were ever fooled by her. "And your current heir hasn't even been born yet. It wouldn't be a bad thing to have a spare. Goddess knows anything can happen between now and the birth." She doesn't say the words as a threat, but it's hard not to hear them that way with all the attempts on Ella's life. However Lydia isn't paying attention to the dangerous line she's walking, she presses on, rubbing her belly as if it's confirmed that she's breeding. "I guarantee any child of mine will be stronger than that pipsqueak's. Soon you won't have any need of Ella at all."

The petty part of me wants to lash out and tell Lydia that if it were possible for us to make a baby together it would have happened in the years we were married. I want to tell her she's delusional if she thinks she can get pregnant at all. But damn it if Ella's silky voice isn't interrupting my thoughts, encouraging me to show compassion even though this monster doesn't deserve any.

Just then I see my phone, balanced on the edge of the nightstand. I snatch it up and turn on the screen, immediately going to my messages. I'm not surprised to see multiple missed calls and texts from Ella, but I'm horrified when I see the response I sent her, and the photo. "You sent this to her?" I roar, thrusting the device towards Lydia's sneering face.

She smirks, "Of course not, that was all you."

I stalk forward, closing the final distance between us. "You better hope you are pregnant, Lydia." I declare icily, "because if you aren't, I swear to the Goddess I will hunt you down and make sure you can't ever come anywhere near me, or my family again."

I storm out without another word. I dial Ella as I race across town, unsurprised when she doesn't answer the phone. My wolf is already in a panic about her reaction to Lydia's taunting message. I don't care how drunk or disoriented I was, I know I wouldn't have ignored Ella that way – not when she's all my wolf wants. Was she very upset? Did it exacerbate her stress to a dangerous level? I only stop for the barest second at a newsstand to make sure there's nothing in the papers about Lydia and I, before continuing to my mansion.

But when I arrive, Ella is nowhere to be found.

Chapter 87 – Ella Runs Away

Ella

“Goddess, Cora, what’s wrong with me?” I moan, burying my head in my hands. “I’ve been thinking Sinclair is too good to be true all along. There cannot be a bigger red flag and I just ignored it. I let him love bomb me and I bought every manipulative word out of his mouth.” I’m seated in my sister’s living room, rocking back and forth in my seat while she looks on anxiously. After I received Sinclair’s text last night, I didn’t waste any time getting out of his house. I went out onto my balcony and waited until the patrolling guards passed by, then climbed down the trellis and out the back gate. There was a vicious thunderstorm roiling at the time, but I barely noticed. I ran through the pouring rain, not stopping until I reached Cora’s apartment.

In hindsight I’m sure I scared her half to death – turning up on her doorstep in the middle of the night, looking like a drowned rat. Nonetheless, she immediately ushered me in and got me a change of dry clothes and a cup of hot tea, but I wasn’t calm enough to actually explain what happened until this morning.

“Ella just slow down, I didn’t think anything had even happened between you two?” Cora asks, watching me with obvious concern.

“I mean, nothing huge.” I clarify. “We’ve flirted and kissed and fooled around a bit... and I’ve insisted that things not go any further. At least, I had enough sense to ensure we didn’t start an actual relationship.”

“And he agreed? You said no and he didn’t push you?” Cora presses.

“Yeah, I mean it’s been hard because we’re attracted to each other, but he’s been trying to respect my wishes.”

“Then how can he have love bombed you?” She inquires, looking confused.

*[I guess that’s the wrong expression.” I concede. “It’s just, you should hear the way he talks to me, and the way he behaves. He’s so affectionate and warm that I got completely lulled into complacency. He just lavishes attention and compliments, and he actually listens and takes criticism. He takes my thoughts and opinions into account, and he has this silly side where he can be so fun and playful, but at the same time he doesn’t let me get away with murder. He calls me on my shit and holds me accountable. Like I said, he’s just too good to be true.”

Cora is frowning deeply, keeping her expression guarded while she processes my words. “Ella

“What? Why are you looking at me that way?” I burst, instantly regretting my sharp tone.

I'm sorry, I shouldn't have snapped at you..." Suddenly I want to cry. "I didn't mean it. I'm just really out of sorts."

"I know, honey." She murmurs, her brows furrowing in sympathy. "And don't take this the wrong way, but none of that sounds very bad. I mean, it's not like he's pretending to be this perfect person. You two started off on terrible footing. Terrible." She repeats for emphasis. He thought you were a gold digger and was going to separate you from your child. You had to learn to get along, and sure that happened fast once you decided to trust each other, but... I'm sorry Ella, but it honestly just sounds like you like each other." She leans forward, resting her elbows on her knees and sending me serious therapist vibes. "Is it possible that you are so used to assholes like Mike, that you assume being treated well is evidence of some sort of trick?"

It takes me a moment to absorb that. Is she right? Am I so unused to receiving genuine affection and compliments that I somehow mistook them for Sinclair grooming me for abuse? Even as I think this, I recall the other things that have happened between us. "That's not all." I confess, blushing scarlet. "Yes he's affectionate and that feels strange to me, but he's also bossy and domineering. He always expects to be in charge."

"Of course he is, he's an Alpha." Cora remarks blithely.

"But, I mean, in charge in... well, I mean..."

Cora rolls her eyes. "Ella, stop beating around the bush, just tell me what happened."

"It's just that he doesn't stop at giving orders, he holds me to them." I confess. "Once, even spanked me."

"Okay." Cora responds, looking as though she's waiting for me to say more.

he

"After the attack on the wild hunt." I explain, offering the information freely now. "I mean... I slapped him first and he said all this crap about catharsis, but I didn't even question it because he said it was normal with shifter couples."

"You slapped Dominic Sinclair?" Cora gapes.

"He was annoying me!" I defend hotly. "He kept saying I should stay home and rest but I wasn't about to let that foul prince win."

"So let me get this straight..." Cora begins, clearly struggling to wrap her mind about this. You were in shock, being obstinate and refusing to take care of yourself, then you attacked him and he responded the way that any wolf would?”

“Basically.” I grimace, rubbing the back of my neck.

“Did he injure you?” She inquires, “Traumatize you?”

“No.” I’m blushing again. “It hurt, but it brought me out of my shock and it really did help me to cry... plus, well I was really turned on afterward.” I whisper, unable to believe I’m actually sharing this part.

Cora chuckles. “So what’s the problem?”

“You don’t find that strange!?” I exclaim.

“Ella, I’ve been around shifters a lot longer than you have.” Cora explains, sighing as though she’s not sure how to make me understand. “Power dynamics are a big part of their culture and from a scientific perspective it makes perfect sense. Dominance means strength and strength means survival. And if you liked it, who cares whether or not other people think it’s strange. You’d hardly be the only human who’s ever wanted that from a partner.

“I didn’t say I liked it.” I object. “Just that it helped me...and turned me on... and I did like feeling how in control he was when I was beside myself.”

“Do you want him to do it again?” She asks, grinning mischievously now.

I throw a pillow at her, laughing with faux outrage. I’m only just coming to terms with the fact that I do want to be with Sinclair that way again, when I remember why I’m here unloading all this on my sister in the first place. My mood dampens almost immediately. “What I want doesn’t matter.”

Cora purses her lips, “Okay, so you haven’t been love bombed, and he hasn’t been mistreating you, and you don’t want a relationship, right?”

‘Right.’ I confirm, thankful that we worked through all this, but suddenly anticipating Cora’s next question.

“Then Ella, why are you so upset about Lydia?” She asks. “You told him point blank that you don’t want to be with him and you agreed to step aside if he finds a new mate from the beginning. I know you weren’t expecting it to be Lydia, but... so what if it is?”

“Because it means he lied to me.” I explain miserably. “It means he’s been lying to me about her for months, and that Roger was right about him running back to her at the first opportunity.”

“Are you sure they were lies?” Cora counters. “Do you think it’s possible he believed what he was telling you at the time, and then changed his mind? We all have blind spots when it comes to our exes. He wouldn’t be the first person to convince himself he hated his former partner to try and protect himself from getting hurt again.”

I shrug, suddenly doubting myself. “I don’t know. He certainly seemed to mean what he was saying at the time, but he’s also a politician, he’s bound to be a good liar.” 1

“He’s an Alpha, not a politician. And he also has the campaign to think about, he might have been resisting her for his sake and the pack’s at once.” Cora suggests.

“Maybe,” I acknowledge, hating how logical this sounds. The longer we talk I’m slowly losing my justifications for being so upset, but I still feel as if my world has come crashing down around me.

“Ella?” Cora calls my attention to her lovely face. Immediately I know she’s coming to the same conclusion I am. “You snuck out of the house and ran through the night, in a thunderstorm, when people have been trying to kill you. You’ve exhausted all the possible reasons to justify this except one, and a few lies on his part hardly seem enough to warrant how devastated you are.”

“What’s your point?” I remark sullenly, already knowing where this is going.

“Are you sure you don’t like him?” Cora asks bluntly. “Not just you’re attracted to him or like the affection, but that you have genuine feelings for him and you’re upset because you think he might not return your feelings now that he’s back with Lydia?”

Her words slam into me one after the other, but before I can give them the consideration they deserve, there’s a sudden pounding at the door.

Chapter 88 – Sinclair takes Ella home

Ella

It was easy to be reasonable when it was just me and Cora. When my sister's low, steady voice was talking me through all my misguided rationalizations, I didn't struggle to stay calm, I didn't have to fight a tidal wave of raging emotions too tangled and convoluted to ever sort out. I was able to listen and really interrogate my assumptions, to use logic and reason without getting caught up in my emotions. However as soon as Sinclair appears, all that goes out the window.

Just seeing his handsome face makes me want to burst into tears, and I'm so miserable and furious that I don't know what to do. A sense of utter betrayal slams into me, and for the first time I understand why I was so afraid of being love bombed. He might not have been manipulating me, but I think I've been falling in love with Sinclair all along – no matter how hard I tried to fight it.

Sinclair's power washes over me the moment he enters the room. He barely pauses to greet Cora, his attention clearly elsewhere as his sharp eyes scan the room, only stopping once they land on me. He immediately crosses to the couch where I'm seated and kneels down in front of me. "Ella," my name is a sigh of relief, and he unwinds my arms from my body so he can look me over, as if he's worried I've somehow been injured in his absence. I try to resist his strength, but he makes a deep rumbling sound and I instinctively surrender. His hungry gaze rakes over every inch of my skin before finally rising to meet my eyes. He takes my face in his hands. "Are you alright?"

Knowing I'm playing with fire and not giving a damn, I shoot him a sulky glare. "What do you care?" I hate myself as soon as the words leave my lips. I sound like such a child.

His brows knit, "That's a no." He assesses gruffly, pursing his lips as if he's internal cursing himself. "I'm so sorry about last night. I can explain-

"I'm fine." I counter sharply, not wanting him to see how badly I'm hurt. "I don't give a damn what you do or who you see when we're not together."

Sinclair arches one dark brow, leveling me with an expression so stern I want to crawl under the couch and hide. "In that case we can go home and discuss the way you snuck out last night, without your guards, without letting anyone know where you were going." His powerful hand slides around to my nape, and something deep and primal in my bones curls in on itself. "Not to mention crawling down trellises in the rain, especially when you're carrying precious cargo."

"I don't want to go anywhere with you." I snap, hating to be reminded of how reckless I was with my unborn child. "I came to Cora's because I wanted to be with my sister and I'm going to stay here."

"Then

you have a choice." Sinclair informs me, his voice like gravel. "Because I'm not leaving you when you're like this. So we can have this out here, in front of Cora, or we can go home and do it in private."

I glance over his shoulder at Cora, who's currently staring at me as if she's never seen me before. I know I'm behaving like a complete brat, but I can't help myself. Sinclair turns me into someone I don't recognize in times like these, and though part of me thinks it must be the baby's influence, I'd be lying if I said it didn't feel right. Pushing back against Sinclair seems like the natural thing to do, something the voice in my head is demanding despite my better judgment.

"You need to leave." I growl, a pitiful rumble sounding in my chest.

Sinclair's eyes flash dangerously, and he flashes his fangs, showing me his inner wolf. "Have it your way." The next thing I know his shoulder is digging into my pelvis, and I'm being tipped upside. Before I know it I'm slung over his shoulder like a sack of flour. I yelp in surprise, feeling the blood rush to my head. Before I can hope to orient myself, my hair spills down towards the ground, completely blocking my vision of everything beyond Sinclair's muscular back. 1

"Dominic! The baby!" 1 object, squirming vigorously.

"The baby is perfectly fine." Sinclair promises, locking his arm over the back of my knees to cease my escape attempts. "You, on the other hand..."

"Put me down right now!" I order, kicking my feet into his toned abs and remembering that his body is constructed of pure steel. The pain in my toes only enrages me more, and so I start beating my clenched fists against his firm backside. "This isn't fair, you tyrant!" I snarl, fighting for all I'm worth.

"That's right, you just get it all out of your system, baby." Sinclair chuckles, patting my thighs. "But you better believe I'm taking note."

He carries me out the door and into the elevator, letting me vent my rage with so little reaction I wonder if he even notices my attack. "Can you even feel this, you ogre!" I exclaim. "Like ferocious little mosquito bites, sweetheart." Sinclair taunts, earning himself another outraged snarl. Of course, the big wolf only laughs. He carts me out of the building and onto the street, where anyone can see us.

"Dominic, people will see!" I object, stilling my movements for the first time.

"Then you might want to stop making all those adorable little growling sounds. People are going to start searching if they think there's an angry kitten on the loose." Sinclair informs me sagely.

"This isn't funny!" I cry, hating him for making light of my misery. Sinclair deposits me into the back of his limo, and I immediately slide over the seats and try to climb out the other side. Unfortunately Sinclair's shifter speed gets the better of me again, and I'm dragged back into the car. Furious, I move into the seat across from him, biting down on my lower lip to stop it. from quivering and betraying how close to tears I am.

"I don't think this is funny, Ella." Sinclair answers, sounding so sober I wonder if this is the same man who was teasing me a moment ago. "This is very serious to me, but I can't help the way your defiance provokes my wolf any more than you can help feeling provoked by me." His glowing, emerald eyes are boring into me, piercing straight through me with so much intensity I can't doubt his honesty. "And I admit, I find you too cute to bear when you get riled up this way... but I don't find anything about the situation we're in amusing

I cross my arms over my chest, and suddenly I taste blood I guess I was biting myself too hard, and now of course Sinclair is beside me, tsking and tugging my crimson stained lip from the prison of my teeth I pull away from him, not wanting to be soothed and coddled when I'm still so furious. Sinclair's jaw clenches, but he lets me go "Ella, If you stopped fighting me for a minute I could tell you what happened."

"You might be able to bully me physically, but you can't make me listen to you." I snipe. Whatever it is you want to say – I don't want to hear it."

More like you're afraid to hear what he needs to tell you. The little voice in my head observes.

So what if I am? I counter. It's not like it will change anything. The writing is already on the wall. I don't need him to tell me how he thought he was over Lydia and didn't realize he wasn't until it was too late. I don't want to listen to his apologies or promises he can't keep, about how this doesn't have to change our plan.

Maybe not, but you could at least try to be less petty about it.

She has a point. I don't know why I get this way with him, I never suffered from immaturity before meeting Sinclair.

You never had the option before. My conscience reminds me. You always had to be the up in every situation you were in.

grown

Then I should be able to act like one now. I think miserably, even though I know it's a losing battle. I'm about to be a mother. I can't regress just because I got my feelings hurt.

Sinclair is still watching me, and I fight the instinct to squirm under his scrutiny. I take a few deep breaths, trying to work myself up to an apology for my behavior, but unsure how I can word it without also opening us up to a discussion. Before I can come up with the right answer, Sinclair's familiar bass breaks through my thoughts. "What upsets you more Ella, the way I handled last night, or the fact that it happened in the first place?"

"What?" I reply, feeling my hackles raise defensively. Surely he's not suggesting what I think he is. 1

A moment later however, my pulse begins to race as Sinclair repeats his question, this time cutting right to the heart of the matter. "I'm asking: are you angry, or are you jealous?"

Chapter 89 – Jealousy

Sinclair

“I’m not jealous!” Ella explodes, almost as soon as the question left my mouth. Her heart is pounding in her chest, so fast and loud that I wouldn’t be able to tune it out if I tried. Her cheeks are consumed by a crimson blush, and my wolf is already celebrating in my head. She’s jealous! She has feelings! She knows she’s mine! Mine, mine, mine!

He has a point. Ella is not a good liar, and though she may be able to disguise her feelings under usual circumstances, her emotions are much too turbulent to allow that now. She sounded about as believable as a fox caught breaking into a henhouse, insisting it only wanted to look at the tasty morsels inside.

I arch my brow skeptically and, seeming to realize how defensive she just sounded, Ella takes a deep breath and tries again. “I’m not jealous.” She repeats, and though she does sound more convincing now, her body is still betraying her. Her color is still so high, and her heart is still racing. “I’m angry because you lied to me.”

I know I should correct her right here and now, explain exactly what happened last night whether she wants to hear it or not. But my inner hunter knows I’m onto something, and there’s no turning off my prey drive. “Then you don’t care whether I sleep with other she-wolves, as long as I’m honest about it?”

Her plump, pink lip – still stained with blood – trembles dangerously, and her voice sounds suddenly tight. “That’s right.”

Liar, liar, pants on fire! My wolf chants, running triumphant laps through my consciousness. He’s zooming around like a puppy, though I can’t let Ella see how excited I am. As thrilling as this revelation is, she is lying to me. I might be able to forgive that since I know she’s trying to protect her tender heart, but forgiveness doesn’t mean acceptance. “Are you being honest with me, little human?” I rumble, pinning her with a stern glower.

Ella’s luminous gold eyes widen and her lips part on a startled gasp. I can see her preparing to answer me, to tell me another falsehood, but before she can say yes, she seems to realize how hypocritical the question is. “Why should I have to be honest when you aren’t!?” She demands fiercely.

“Ella “I growl, a clear warning.

“No! You’ve kept things from me over and over again in the name of protecting me, and you went back to your ex after promising that there was nothing between you.” She accuses. “Last night probably wasn’t even the first time! How long have you been sneaking around with her, Dominic? Has everything that’s happened since I got pregnant been some scheme you two orchestrated to get an heir and win the campaign? Did you arrange the switch at the sperm bank to send all this into motion? What are you planning once the baby comes? Are you just going to steal my child and kick me to the curb?"

I reel back, shocked by the depth of her mistrust. My wolf's jubilation over her jealousy disappears immediately. He whimpers pitifully, devastated to see her so miserable – so undone by fear and betrayal. No, this isn't right! Fix it!

She can't honestly believe any of those things are true, can she? Are these tears that have been building up in her all along? Or is she simply spiraling because of the perceived lie? She's had trust issues from the day we met, and it pains me to think she might have been tormented by such paranoia, but I could also understand how her baggage might turn one trigger into this maelstrom. I want to tell Ella these ideas are absurd, I want to insist that she'd have to be mad to believe these things, but I know that won't help anything.

"Ella." I say firmly, "Look at me."

"I don't want to." She snaps, stubbornly turning her head away from me.

"I'm not asking." I clarify severely, waiting for the power in my voice to do its work. Slowly she obeys, turning her head back and lifting her blazing, terrified eyes to mine. I press my hand to her belly, letting her feel the solid weight, praying my warmth will bleed through her skin and into her bones. "I didn't lie to you, Ella." I state evenly, "I know you don't want to talk about it, but "

To my amazement, flames blaze to life behind Ella's eyes, and she slams her hands over her ears, glaring at me with so much hurt and animosity that the gesture no longer seems childish. A world of pain and betrayal swirls in her brilliant irises, and I remember that she's not only a woman who's been deeply scarred by her past, but also one who is battling a thousand raging hormones. Exhaling heavily, I remove my palm from her tummy in order to pull her hands away from her ears. As soon as I do, her eyes fill with tears, and I realize how afraid she is of having her fears confirmed.

"I didn't lie to you." I repeat, deciding that this will have to do for now. "When you're ready to listen to me, I'll explain everything, but right now I need you to know that everything that has happened since we met has been completely real. I didn't have anything to do with the switch at the sperm bank, and I was just as shocked by it as you were. Sweetheart, you remember how angry and unreasonable I was at the time." I remind her, biting back a smile. "I couldn't fake that if I tried, nor is it how any sane human would act if they wanted to draw someone into a trap." I forge on. "I am not, under any circumstances, going to keep Rafe from you. He came from each of us, and he belongs with each of us. I know I hid some things from you, but I haven't ever deceived you about my feelings, and I haven't been sneaking around with Lydia or anyone else."

Little by little, my words sink in. I can see the change in Ella's posture as she slowly deflates, unwinding the tension from her muscles with every sentence I complete. Of course, the more she unwinds, the closer she comes to falling apart. Soon her tears are falling freely, and she looks utterly ashamed of herself. "I'm sorry, I know I'm being crazy." She hiccups. "I don't even know why I said those things. I think I'm losing it."

"Jealousy can do that to a person." I tease gently, reflexively pulling her closer, trying to draw her into my lap.

Ella's little body goes stiff with outrage, and she pushes my hands away. "I'm not jealous!" She repeats, though her exclamation sounds more like a whimper now.

"Tsk, of course not." I sympathize, overwhelming her struggles and scooping her up. She doesn't come easily, but I gradually trap her defiant limbs until she's completely bound in my arms. I purr softly, and though I know she doesn't want to submit, soon I feel her tearstained face pressing into the curve of my neck, and her pert nose breathing in my scent. "Though it's too bad."

"Why?" Ella demands grumpily, sniffing as she snuggles closer. Petulant as she's feeling, she leans into my touch as I pet her disgruntled form and nuzzle her hair. Her delicious aroma fills my senses, and I feel like I can breathe for first time all morning. Goddess I needed this. When I realized she was missing this morning, I'd panicked completely. Not only because I feared for her safety, hating the idea of her being unprotected in a city full of wolves, but also because I was afraid that Lydia had broken something in our relationship for good.

When I found Ella at her sister's, furious and lashing out at me like a hellcat, I realized there was still hope. She wouldn't be so upset if she didn't care, but I also hated seeing her so unhappy. My wolf wouldn't be calmed until she was safe in my arms again, not attacking me anymore, but seeking my comfort. Yes, this is the way it's meant to be.

"Because of what it would mean if you were jealous." I murmur, finally answering her.

"That I'm a fool." She suggests bitterly, making me shake my head in exasperation.

"That you have feelings for me." I correct, letting some of my own feelings seep into my tone. My hope and desire, the passion that takes all my effort to contain whenever we're together.

“Oh I’m sure you’d love that.” She mutters mutinously. “The big bad Alpha needs all the women to fall at his feet whether he wants them or not. How amusing for the hopeless little human to ”

Before she can continue, I shut her up – claiming her mouth with my own and stealing her ability to speak another word.

Chapter 90 – Feelings

Sinclair

Ella is as stiff as a board in my arms, frozen in shock to find my lips suddenly on hers, cutting off her bitter tirade. Of course, that only lasts a moment. As soon as the stubborn creature realizes what I'm about, she begins pushing at my shoulders, becoming increasingly agitated when they won't budge. She squirms and struggles, clearly outraged that I kissed her when she was trying to be angry with me. I can practically hear her objections in my mind you're not playing fair! She would say, shooting daggers with her eyes.

Damn straight I would answer, my thoughts conjuring the conversation our bodies are already having.

I rumble softly, and Ella whines – it's a sweet, plaintive sound as her body tries to resist the pull of desire, but I ruthlessly gobble it up. I show her no mercy, caressing her lithe body and devouring her soft murmurs of protest until she melts against me, slanting her mouth beneath mine in total surrender. She whimpers when she finally gives in, as if she doesn't know why she even bothered trying to fight this.

I can taste Ella's blood from the cut on her lip, and my inner wolf groans with pleasure. Unlike our horror film counterparts the vampire, shifters don't have any interest in consuming blood. But it's inevitable to taste the blood of one's mate when delivering a claiming mark, and the flavor has an undeniably Pavlovian effect. I may not want the crimson liquid for nourishment, but I certainly crave the taste of Ella's. It's rich and sweet, and instantly has me thinking about how other parts of her must taste.

Ella's salty tears drip onto my questing lips, but though she cries, she also clings to me with all her might. Her arms have locked around my neck, and she's pressing her soft curves against me with an urgency I understand all too well. My tongue slips past her lips as I rearrange her in my arms, guiding her to straddle my lap so that I can feel her plump breasts and beaded nipples against my chest. So that I can slide my hands down to the curve of her bottom and press my hardness into her soft center, to help her move against me and find pleasure – even through the fabric of our clothes.

Ella responds to me so naturally, so passionately. I barely need to apply any pressure to affect her movement. It's as if she's reading my mind, our bodies speaking the same love language, completely in tune with one another. Her fingers slide into my hair, closing around the dark locks as if she's afraid she needs to hold me in place, lest I take my mouth away. I hold her more tightly, letting her feel my strength and purring when a little thump against my abdomen tells me that the baby is awake and thriving.

I could kiss her for a thousand years and never get bored, I realize. Never get tired of her taste, or grow immune to the feel of her beautiful body in my arms. Never want for another.

She's perfect. My wolf agrees. We have to claim her. She's strong enough to handle it.

I won't hurt her. I insist. I'm painfully aware of how delicate she is, how fragile her human form is next to my own. It's enough to make me stop handling her so roughly, suddenly afraid I might break her. Ella growls in protest, that same indignant sound that never ceases to fill my heart with warmth.

You see. My wolf argues. She can take it she needs this too.

I purr in apology, sliding my hand in her long, silky hair and clenching it into a fist, holding her head steady as I continue ravishing her. I steal kiss after kiss from her sweet lips, until they're swollen and red for reasons that have nothing to do with her self-inflicted bite. Our breathing is ragged, and Ella's heart is beating so loudly that I don't have to wonder if it's racing as fast as my own – it is.

The scent of her arousal is impossible to ignore in the small space, and the sensation of her grinding against my arousal is enough to make me fear I might come in my slacks like an inexperienced schoolboy. I groan, dragging my mouth from hers to try and catch my breath. Instead I kiss my way over her jaw and nibble one delectable earlobe, eliciting a sultry moan that makes the hard member between my legs leap with excitement.

Down boy, I think in exasperation. Our first time with Ella is not going to be frantic and rushed in the back of a limo.

Ella pulls away from me then, and I realize she must have been startled by the movement – enough to break out of the haze of lust. Her eyes are red-rimmed and her pupils so dilated that her gold irises are a slender ring around the great black pools. Her skin is flushed bright pink, and her hair disheveled. It's a nearly irresistible sight, one that makes me want to go back on my earlier decision not to claim her. No other man should ever be allowed to see my Ella in this state.

"Dominic, this isn't right." She announces, still trying to catch her breath.

"It feels right to me." I reply, resisting the urge to look down at her heaving bosom to see if her breasts are as flushed as the rest of her. Instead I pin her with my dark gaze, massaging her nape and willing her to come back into my embrace.

"That's not the point." Ella insists, sounding as though she might be on the verge of tears again. "Stop looking at me that way!"

"What way?" I clarify, furrowing my brow with concern. "What is the point?"

“Like I’m a rabbit your wolf wants to eat for dinner.” She exclaims. “And the point is that I’m done letting you jerk me around and toy with my feelings!”

“What feelings?” I question, ignoring the first part of her statement. She’s not wrong – my wolf would undoubtedly like to feast on her, just not in the way she means. Again I know I should clear the air between us, but I’m afraid if I do she won’t confess her true emotions. This misunderstanding has provided me with leverage too valuable to ignore, and I might be an asshole for using it against her, but it’s more important to get to the bottom of this. I’ve suspected that Ella has been holding herself back from me for reasons other than disinterest for some time now, and I’m done letting her get away with it. “I thought you didn’t want to be with me?”

“Dominic, why are you so determined to ask me questions when the answers aren’t important?” She hisses angrily. “You’ve made your choice, that’s all that matters.”

“Just tell me, Ella.” I command, sending some of my Alpha authority into my voice. She might not be a wolf, but her instincts are plenty strong. It might be the baby, or she might just be one of those humans who’s more in touch with their primal selves either way she responds to my dominance as naturally as she breathes air.

Ella shivers as my power washes over her, and I’m amazed to see her fight it. “No!” She bursts out, furious even as she tucks a proverbial tail between her legs. “I don’t have to! You might run the world but you can’t make me open my heart to you. You can’t demand I make myself vulnerable with you that’s my decision.”

—

My wolf wants to growl at her defiance, but I can hear the hurt and fear in her voice. Damn it. I realize. She’s right, I’m being an ass. I want the truth, but I don’t want to hurt her to get it. As I ponder my mistake, the car comes to a stop in front of my mansion, sliding into a parking space on the opposite side of the street from the house.

Before I can apologize for letting this misunderstanding persist to serve my own selfish desires, my driver opens the door to allow us out of the car. Ella promptly slides out, and my chauffeur tactfully averts his gaze from her disheveled state. She stomps onto the paved sidewalk, wrapping her arms protectively around herself as she looks from right to left, checking the road is clear before preparing to cross.

I follow suit, exiting the vehicle and going after her. “Ella, I’m sorry.” I pronounce earnestly.

She pauses, turning back in the middle of the empty street. "Don't be haven't done anything wrong."

you were right, you

The screech of tires fills the air as a car suddenly emerges from a parking spot a few spaces down from our own. To my horror and disbelief, it accelerates as fast as it can, heading straight towards Ella.

Chapter 91 – Near Miss

Ella

I'm so focused on Sinclair, I don't even see the car until it's almost upon me. I'm too stunned to move, not that there's time to get out of the way. The only thing I can do is try to turn my body away from the vehicle, to shield my unborn child from the inevitable crash.

Time itself seems to slow down, and there's a dull roaring in my ears. My thoughts fly by, and I'm amazed at the logical clarity I'm able to find in a single, split second. I tell myself to go limp, the impact won't be as terrible if my body isn't tense with fear. Isn't that why drunk people often survive car accidents that would be fatal otherwise?

Unfortunately I don't have time to unwind my tight muscles, as soon as I've had the thought a huge weight collides with my back, slamming into me with so much force the breath is knocked from my lungs. I'm spinning, twisting as the wall of iron surrounds me, forcing my feet off the ground. A deafening crash fills the air, though it seems delayed. Haven't I already been hit?

Then I'm being thrust forward, or is it backwards? I'm moving, flying through the air and yet my limbs are completely constrained. My eyes are clenched shut, and the sound of wrenching metal and shattering glass explodes around me. It's all so sudden, I don't have time to be afraid, to say prayers for my baby, if not for myself.

I wait for the pain, but it doesn't come. After a few moments of holding my breath I realize I'm not moving anymore. Am I dead? Was it so sudden that I didn't feel it?

I peek open one eye, and sunlight blinds me. Is there a sun in the afterlife? I know shifters have a version of heaven, but I didn't imagine humans got to go there..

There's a click, like a car door opening, and then the sound of racing footsteps. "Catch them!" Sinclair's deep voice snarls, so loud that I think he must be yelling in my ear.

Hope courses through my veins. If he's here then I must not be dead. And why am I so warm? I wonder belatedly, imagining myself sprawled over the hood of a vehicle, in too much shock to feel the impact on my broken body. Shouldn't a car that's been sitting in the snow be cold?

"Ella – Ella, are you alright?" Sinclair is talking again, and I open my other eye, anxious to see him. Instead I see the empty street in front of me. "Please say something." He begs, his gentle hands moving over my body from behind. "Are you hurt? Talk to me baby."

Behind me. I think dazedly. But that means... I sit up, truly looking around for the first time. We're sitting on the hood of the car – at least what used to be the hood. Sinclair's huge body has completely totaled the vehicle. Slowly – infuriatingly slowly, my brain pieces together what must have happened. Sinclair had been fast enough to reach me, but he hadn't had time to push me out of the way.

Instead he'd turned me away from the car and wrapped his own body around me, shielding me from the impact of the car. He'd taken the full force of the crash, and his back had crumpled the bumper and hood beyond recognition, shattering the windshield into a thousand pieces.

I feel nauseous at once, and my body is shaking with fear and adrenaline. "I... I ." I clamber off the crumpled metal surface, my knees giving out as soon as my feet hit the ground. I vomit into the pristine white snow, feeling Sinclair follow me at a pace much too slow for his supernatural strength. I'm afraid to: look at him, but he's hovering beside me, surreptitiously running his hands over my body, searching for signs of injury yet trying not to disturb. "Stop." I choke, "I'm alright... it's you -"" I finally turn to face him, horror and guilt washing over me as I take in the damage.

Sinclair is bleeding, and his body must be covered with bruises. The impact would have killed me, and his shifter strength might have kept him alive, but not even an Alpha wolf can walk away from such an accident unharmed. His handsome face is a tight grimace of pain, but I'm not sure he's even registering the sensations. His attention is focused on me, his green eyes scouring my body for signs of harm.

"Oh Dominic," I choke, my voice thick with emotion as I reach towards his battered body. His shirt has been torn to shreds by glass from the windshield, and I can only imagine how mangled his flesh is underneath. Before I can touch him, I'm distracted by sounds of a struggle in the distance.

I follow the sound with my eyes, catching our chauffeur wrestling the homicidal driver to the ground a few meters down the road. He must have tried to make a run for it when the car stalled, unable to simply plow through Sinclair's iron body the way it would have my own. I immediately recognize the driver as one of the rogues who attacked me in the alley, and suddenly my vision turns completely red.

I forget my concern for myself and the baby, I even forget my worry for Dominic. I feel only a flood of vengeful fury, more violent and feral than any I've known before. That rogue hurt Sinclair. He wanted to end my baby's life and would have taken mine in the process, but he actually did hurt Sinclair. He might have taken my baby's father from us both – from the pack that needs him.

"I'll kill him!" I snarl, pushing myself up on shaky legs and lunging towards the rogue. A steely bar catches me around the waist, pulling me back. "Woah Ella, come here, let me look at you." "No, I want to kill him!" I insist, not recognizing this bloodthirsty woman I've apparently become.

"I do too, trouble, but right now you're more important." Sinclair murmurs in my ear. I can already hear sirens in the distance, loud, shrill, and drawing closer with every moment that passes.

"I'm fine!" I cry, tears spilling from my overflowing lashes. "He hurt you! Let me go so I can make him pay."

Sinclair is purring, but the sound keeps stuttering in his chest, as if the internal engine that fuels his rumbles and growls has been damaged. "I know little one, we'll make him pay, just take it easy."

Sniffing, I stop fighting, turning to face him once he returns my feet to the ground. "You're all bloody." I observe pitifully, wishing I knew how to heal his wounds. "I want to make him bloody too."

I sound like a petulant toddler, though admittedly a very violent one. Still, Sinclair isn't listening, the stubborn man has his palm pressed to my belly, his eyes scouring me for the hundredth time. "The baby's okay." He sighs, but I need you to tell me where you're hurt, Ella."

Before I can answer, an ambulance skitters to a stop behind the wreckage, and EMT's leap from the back of the vehicle, sprinting over to us. They slow down as they draw near, warily approaching us as Sinclair holds me tightly and begins to growl protectively. "Alpha," One of the EMT's has his hands up, to show he means no harm. Belatedly I realize the Moon Valley pack's symbol is blazing on the side of the ambulance, marking it as part of a shifter institution.

Of course the shifters got here faster than the humans. I think with relief. And thank goodness, Sinclair's animalistic aggression would have terrified a human – it terrifies the other wolves already. "It's okay." The EMT continues. "We just want to help, we won't hurt her."

Sinclair scents the air, drawing in their aromas and apparently determining them friendly. Gradually he loosens his hold on me, though I can sense how difficult it is for him to do so. Eventually he offers me up for their examination, delivering a menacing warning in the process, "I'm watching you, beta. One wrong move and I'll make you wish you'd never been born."

The EMT approaches me, still keeping his hands up in clear view. Sinclair paces behind us like an enraged bear, and I try to get my breathing under control. "Luna, where are you bleeding?”

“I’m not!” I exclaim, half-sobbing.” It’s all his blood. I’m fine, he’s the one who was hit.” The EMT look up at Sinclair, searching for confirmation and starting to approach him instead.

“No! Look at her first.” He growls, putting all his Alpha authority into the words and making us all shiver in response. “Dominic, please!” I beg, moving back towards him. “I’m not hurt because you protected me.” I press my palms to his chest, gazing up at him with a pleading expression.

“You did your job, we’re safe.” I continue, praying he’ll listen to reason, or at least be triggered into action by my words. “Rafe and I need you to be okay so you can continue keeping us safe. So we need you to go to the hospital now. We need you to let them help you.”

Sinclair gazes down at me with glowing, uncertain eyes, and I ask one final time. “Please, Dominic.”

Chapter 92 – Stubborn Alpha

Ella

Sinclair finally agreed to let the EMTs administer emergency care, though it wasn't easy. He refused to let me out of his sight, and though he'd tried to maintain physical contact too, the EMTs eventually convinced him to let them strap him onto a gurney for transfer to the hospital. I sat beside him in the ambulance, where he was sprawled on his side, watching me with complete intensity as the EMTs worked on cutting away his clothes.

I stroked his hair as he stoically suffered through their poking and prodding, so he could feel me safe and secure beside him. At first I tried to peek over Sinclair's broad shoulder to see the damage on his back, but he growled as soon as I broke eye contact, and I decided keeping him calm was more important than discovering the extent of his injuries.

The ambulance can't seem to move fast enough, and I'm counting down the moments until we reach the shifter hospital. I can see how tired Sinclair is, his eyelids keep drooping, only to snap back open when he realizes he's falling asleep. I want to help him rest, but I'm also afraid that if he falls asleep he might not wake back up.

"I'm so sorry, Dominic." I murmur, unable to hold in my feelings any more.

"Why are you sorry?" He responds, furrowing his brow. "You didn't do anything wrong." "You're hurt because of me." I remind him, hiccuping and swiping at my tears with my free hand. "They wanted me not you. Why did you do that!"

"Baby, if they could have gotten to me they gladly would have you're just an easier target." He explains, sounding so steady and sure, even as the EMTs dig into his raw wounds. "And! did it because you and Rafe are a million times more important than me."

"But that's simply not true." I argue miserably. "You can find another mate and have more babies –" "A warning rumble vibrates in his chest, but I ignore it. "But if something happens to you then the entire pack, the entire realm would be in danger. I'm replaceable, you're not."

"I beg to differ." Sinclair growls. "And if you keep talking that way you're going to regret it, little mate."

The EMTs exchange amused glances, and I can feel the corner of my own mouth twitching. "Are you really threatening me when you're tied down?"

"If you think I can't break out of a few flimsy straps you're out of your mind, gorgeous." He answers, sounding strong and ominous right up until he winces in obvious pain.

"Tsk, stubborn Alpha." I cluck, still stroking his hair. "Are you in a lot of pain? Be honest."

I add sternly.

“Not nearly as much as I would have been if I’d lost you.” He replies, with utter confidence. My heart swells, but there’s still a knot of pain and confusion tangled at its center. I’m falling in love with this man, so of course I want to hear his affectionate endearments, of course I want him to be alright. But that doesn’t explain away last night. Sweet nothings won’t fix what’s broken between us. I want to ask him where Lydia fits in all this so badly it hurts, but I can’t do that as long as we have an audience.

That mere thought is enough to give me pause. Does he mean any of the things he’s saying, or is he just putting on a show for the EMTs? And if he does mean it, then how could he be so cold and dismissive last night? Why did he sleep with her?

“What are you thinking?” Sinclair asks, furrowing his brow as he takes in my solemn expression.

“I’m just wondering if it’s safe for you to fall asleep.” I lie, using my thumb to smooth out the wrinkles in his forehead. “You look so tired.”

“He should stay conscious if he can.” The first EMT frowns apologetically. “Just until we know the damage.”

Sinclair smiles at me, though it looks more like a grimace. “I already told you I wasn’t taking my eyes off you, that includes for sleep.”

“We’re almost there.” The second EMT assures me. “He just has to hold on a little longer.”

Of course, when we arrive at the hospital it’s more of the same: Sinclair being impossibly stubborn and overprotective, even though I’m perfectly fine and he’s the one who looks like he’s been put through a meat grinder. Once I can see his back, I understand that the entire broad surface was shredded by the glass of the windshield, and hundreds of tiny shards are still embedded in his skin. The sight is enough to send me into a fresh fit of tears, and I’m beyond angry with myself for giving into the emotion. I know me being upset will do nothing, but rile Sinclair’s wolf further.

Things reach an unfortunate crescendo when they try and take him for x-rays, because of course I can’t go with him. They need to assess the internal damage from the blunt force of the crash, and though the logical part of Sinclair realizes that, the combination of so much danger, my upset, and all the strangers around us has his wolf in full control. In the end it takes getting every guard in the hospital to stand watch over me until he comes back from the X-ray, on threat of death if they let anything happen to me. I told him he was being ridiculous, but of course he didn't listen.

When he finally returns we end up caught in another disagreement, with him insisting the doctors and nurses can tend to his back while he's sitting up so he can keep me in his lap, and those of us who still have our sanity intact trying to convince him to lie down. It's a losing battle, and in the end I end up in the bed with him, his huge body draped over me while he pretends not to feel the pain of dozens of tiny tweezers digging into his torn flesh to extract all the shards of glass.

I do my best to distract him, kissing his scruffy cheeks and nuzzling his neck, telling him what a powerful protector he is and guiding his hand to my belly so he can feel the pup.

"I know what you're doing." Sinclair chuckles, catching my lips in his the next time I try to graze them over his jaw. "Such blatant pandering, you ought to be ashamed." He teases.

"It's not pandering." I argue, "At least, not entirely. You saved my life today, you saved the baby again. And after I was such a brat to you."

"You had every right," He acknowledges, "even if it was a misunderstanding."

"Misunderstanding how?" I clarify, stiffening slightly. The text message I received the night before was very clear. "You can't tell me that wasn't real, Dominic."

Sinclair waits until the doctors are finished bandaging his back before he answers. They leave us alone, promising to bring the x-ray results soon. Once they're out of hearing distance, he sighs. "Lydia drugged me, Ella." He confesses, sounding completely ashamed of himself. "I was at the pub, I noticed my drink tasted odd and I blacked out. She sent you that text message. The next thing I knew, I was waking up in her bed."

"Are you serious?" I demand, sitting up in horror. Of all the possible ways I expected him to explain his actions, I never dreamed of this possibility.

"I don't have any idea what happened while I was blacked out and she claims we had sex, but I don't know for sure." Sinclair continues. "But the point is that I haven't been lying to you. I didn't intentionally have sex with her, and I don't want anything to do with her now more. than ever."

"Dominic! Why didn't you tell me?" I cry, outraged that he didn't say anything sooner. "Why did you let me keep spiraling that way?"

Sinclair catches me in his crosshairs, giving me such a searing look of incredulity that I begin curling in on myself. "Oh." I squeak, realizing that he isn't the only one who's been stubborn today. "Because I wouldn't let you?"

"I tried to tell you repeatedly." He confirms, "You wouldn't hear it."

"I'm sorry." I profess, feeling lousy even though the knot in my chest is already beginning to uncoil. "I just got so worked up."

"I know." Sinclair agrees. "With jealousy."

"I didn't say that." I combat, snuggling into his chest. "I can't believe Lydia did that. What in hell was she thinking? Surely she didn't expect that kind of dirty trick to convince you to take her back?"

When Sinclair ignores my continued denial, I know the truth must be worse than I realize. "She was thinking that if she gets pregnant, I won't need you anymore."

Chapter 93 – Proper Luna

Ella

Pain. My first reaction is pain – blistering and hot, like having my body suspended over a pit of flames and slowly roasted. Sinclair won't need me anymore. I'll lose him. For all my resistance, I've become hopelessly attached to Sinclair, and my feelings for him are far stronger than I'd like to admit. The idea of not having him in my life anymore is so excruciating I can't even consider the possibility head-on. I want to run and hide from it, to pretend it isn't real rather than suffer the agony it unleashes.

I breathe through the torment, wondering how much time has passed while I grapple with this news. It feels like hours, but it's probably only been moments. Once the pain passes, there is only denial. Lydia can't be pregnant. She and Sinclair attempted to conceive a child for one night couldn't possibly give them success when years of trying resulted in nothing more than broken hearts and a failed marriage. Right?

years

Of course, it wouldn't be the strangest thing in the world if they did succeed after all this time. My conscience suggests and she's right. How many stories have I heard over the years from well-meaning friends trying to make me feel better about my own infertility struggles? "Just wait, the day you stop trying is the day you'll conceive." they'd say, or, "sometimes the stress alone can keep you from succeeding, at some point you just have to let all that go."

They didn't realize how hurtful it was, almost like they were blaming my infertility on me wanting it too badly. They also didn't appreciate that this might be true for some women, but it's completely false for many others. Some women would never conceive, no matter what they did. Still, they might have been wrong to try and placate me that way, but that doesn't mean those cases never happen. Maybe a blacked out one night stand was what it took for Lydia and Sinclair to finally make a baby together.

What if Lydia is pregnant? I think hesitantly. What if she and Sinclair finally achieved the thing which had cost them their marriage? Could a child be enough to repair the damage in their relationship? Suddenly I see a future where Sinclair and his mate have a child while my own pup and I are able to quietly live in the background no more lies, no more fraud. Completely safe.

Wouldn't that be better than this? Even if I'm heartbroken over Sinclair, isn't my baby's safety more important than anything? Won't I always be sick with guilt as long as I'm continuing this fraud? Isn't it right for the pack to have a true Luna?

No! Something feral and ferocious screams up inside me, Sinclair is ours! She can't have him!

That's selfish. I realize, hating the truth even as I recognize its weight. It's selfish to keep him. for myself if it's not right for him, for the pack. This isn't just about me. It's about millions of people who need Sinclair to lead them.

"And if she is pregnant?" I ask, just barely surfacing from the thoughts attempting to drown

"She's not." Sinclair dismisses easily, echoing my initial thoughts. "we don't even know if I slept with her, and even if I did, we tried for years to no avail."

"But what if she is?" I press, needing him to hear me out. "I mean, if she is pregnant, then you'll have another potential heir, and its mother will be a she-wolf. That's everything you've been looking for. I have to think that a pup with two shifter parents will be stronger than one with a human mother."

"We don't know that." Sinclair digs in his heels, his sharp gaze piercing me. "And you'll make a better Luna than Lydia ever would."

"We both know that's not true." I correct him gently, wanting to slide out of the bed so he can't use his physical proximity to overpower my senses. "Because no matter what I do, I can never be a real one."

"What are you saying?" Sinclair inquires, frowning deeply now.

"I'm saying that if she is pregnant, that might not be a bad thing." I sigh, trying and failing to leave the protective circle of his arms.

"What?" Sinclair growls, with abject disbelief. I'm not surprised by his reaction, because I'm well aware of how strange it is for me to be making this argument. "Ella, you know what kind of woman Lydia is she's narcissistic and power hungry. In some ways she's as bad as the Prince."

—

"I know and I'm not saying she isn't terrible, just that you need a true Luna." I remark with a weak shrug. "And with you there to keep her in check, her worse nature wouldn't ever get out of control."

"Who says I need a true Luna?" Sinclair grumbles, sounding every bit as petty and mutinous. as I must have earlier.

“Says you!” I burst, laughing now. “From day one, Dominic! You’ve been telling me this arrangement of ours is temporary, and only binding until you find a real mate from the first moment we met.”

“Maybe I changed my mind.” He suggests, nuzzling my neck and squeezing me just a bit tighter, as if he’s afraid someone might take me from him. “Maybe I was wrong.”

My heart skips a beat, and butterflies burst to life in my belly. Is that affection all for me? Is he responding to the baby? How is it we’ve built so much intense intimacy between us, and we’ve never done more than kiss?

I decide to test him. “I think Rafe is confusing your instincts, Dominic. It’s easy for you to say this now, but once he’s here with us, I’m going to go back to being just some human you know.”

Testing him, hmm? The little voice in the back of my head interjects. Sounds to me like you’re just making excuses to keep him at arm’s length.

Unsurprisingly, Sinclair growls at me, making me quake and lean into him for comfort even though he’s the one causing my unease. Now that I don’t want to be separated from him, of course, he sees fit to put some distance between our bodies. He shifts me to face him on the hospital bed, keeping his legs straddled over either side of the gurney and staring me down with stern disapproval. “That isn’t true. I know the difference Ella. You and Rafe are one now, but I don’t want you for my Luna because of him I want you because of you.

“But you weren’t wrong.” I insist, trying not to absorb his compliments. It feels wonderful for him to be speaking this way, but the way I feel doesn’t change the situation we’re in. “Because it’s one thing to deceive the pack and the Alpha council for the greater good because there is no other option. But Lydia being pregnant would give you another option. An honest option, Dominic.” I clarify, needing him to understand.

“Is that what you want?” He asks gruffly.

“I want my baby to be safe. I don’t want to live a lie.” I answer honestly. “And you don’t want to perpetuate a fraud like this if you don’t have to.” I add pointedly.

“So you think I should take her back, after everything she’s done?” Sinclair bites, looking furious now.

"If she's pregnant, if there's a she-wolf who can fill this role without lying to the people, you have to choose her." I insist. "Keeping up this deception isn't right, no matter how we feel."

"You still haven't told me how you feel, you know that?" Sinclair points out, his powerful hands massaging my waist, surreptitiously holding me in place in case I decide to make a run for it.

"What does that matter?" I ask, not meeting his gaze. "Last night might have changed everything for us. I know it wasn't your fault," I offer apologetically. "But things are complicated enough already without adding feelings to the mix."

"That may be true, but the feelings are there whether we want them to be or not." Sinclair responds, ducking his head to try and catch my eye.

"I want our son to have two loving parents who can focus all their attention on him, not their own drama." I counter, still evading an honest answer, but feeling dizzy now that I'm away from him.

"Why would our feelings mean that we can't focus on our baby?" Sinclair questions, looking strangely blurry around the edges.

"Because it's already distracting us! We're talking about feelings rather than the real issue here which is that Lydia might be carrying another heir for you already. How is that supposed to work?" I inquire, I reach out towards one of his muscular arms for support. "Would you stop moving, please?"

There are strange spots in my vision, and I try to blink them away, but they don't budge. "Ella?" Sinclair's urgent voice sounds very far away. "Are you feeling okay?"

The last thing I hear before everything goes dark is his frantic call, "I need a nurse over here!"

Chapter 94 – Bed Rest

Sinclair

When Ella collapses in my arms, I can hardly wait for the nurses to come running. I immediately assume we must have missed some injury from the accident, and I'm instantly furious with myself for letting her talk me into being prioritized by the medical staff.

What was I thinking? I know they checked her out and there weren't any physical marks on her body, but what if it was something internal? What if she somehow hit her head amid all the chaos? Deep down I know that doesn't make any sense, she was completely wrapped in my arms when we collided with the car, but my fear isn't logical. It's sudden and violent and overwhelming.

"It's okay, Alpha." The doctor assures me as they move Ella onto a gurney of her own. "It's probably just the stress. There's been a lot of excitement today."

"She has high blood pressure." I warn, "we've been monitoring it daily, but her OBGYN is worried she's developing preeclampsia."

My wolf is growling and whining at once- impatient for the doctors to help Ella, worried for her health, and hating that anyone else is near her when she's so vulnerable. She looks so young and innocent in her unconscious state- so small and fragile. Her rose gold hair is a shining cascade over the flimsy pillow, still streaked with my blood. I stay beside her even after the nurses try to order me away. "I'm not going anywhere." I insist, battling my guilt over whether this is all my fault.

Would she have been so overwhelmed if I hadn't needed her to keep me calm? If I hadn't been such an ogre with the EMTs and the doctors, would she have been free to relax and recover without added stress?

At once, I think about her comments regarding Lydia. On one hand I know she's right, continuing our fraud when there's an honest option changes things completely from a moral standpoint. But beyond morality, if there was a way to protect Ella from all this stress and guilt, from the threats posed by the Prince and being my Luna, shouldn't we pursue that? I've been justifying our arrangement on the grounds that becoming King is the only way to make the pack and my family safe, so the threats she's facing to help me win the crown are necessary. But that won't be true anymore if Lydia conceives.

Should I be trying harder to find a she-wolf to become my Luna? Not for the campaign's sake, but for Ella and Rafe's?

It's not that simple. My wolf insists. The pack aren't going to accept you throwing over Ella for Lydia. You've been doing everything in your power to make them fall in love with the human and it's worked.

That's not because of me. I remind him., stroking Ella's hair as the nurses take her vital signs and hook her up to an IV. She made them love her all on her own, just by being herself.

And Lydia made them hate her by being herself. He argues. If you come forward and tell them you've decided to take Lydia back, it could cost you the campaign, whether she's breeding or not.

You may have a point. I acknowledge.

I don't just have a point, I'm completely right and you know it. He replies haughtily.

Fine. I concede, feeling exhausted by this debate, but that doesn't mean it has to stay that way after the campaign is over. Ella deserves to have whatever life she wants if that's a quiet. existence with our pup out of the public eye, then I want to give that to her, even if it means letting Lydia or someone else be Luna after I'm King. That was the original plan, remember? It's not her fault I got lost along the way.

But you're not the only one who's gotten lost along the way. My wolf argues. Think about how jealous she was, how upset she became over the idea that you'd been with another woman. That has to count for something.

"Dominic?" Ella's soft murmur wrenches me from my thoughts. I breathe an instant sigh of relief how long had I been holding my breath? It doesn't seem fair that such a small, harmless creature can tie all my insides into knots the way Ella can. She thinks she's powerless. I muse, standing to lean over her bed, yet there is no one on earth who has ever had so much power over me.

The doctors had declared Ella dehydrated, stressed and hypertensive, but otherwise unharmed, leaving me to brood over my thoughts while I waited for her to wake. Her OBGYN is on his way in, but until he arrives, we're alone.

"You naughty girl." I tease, stroking her soft cheek. "Fainting to get out of telling me your feelings?"

"It wasn't on purpose." She pouts, looking over me with obvious concern. "Why are you out of bed? What about your x-rays?"

"Don't worry about me, sweetheart." I encourage, "how are you feeling?"

“Sort of hungover.” She admits, trying to sit up. I gently catch her shoulder, keeping her in place. Eventually she huffs, “Dominic, I have to pee.”

“Well why didn’t you say so?” I’m still smiling at her like an absolute idiot, so relieved that she’s awake and talking to me that my tormented thoughts have taken a backseat for now at least. I scoop her up into my arms, unhooking her IV so I can take her to the restroom.

Ella squeaks, holding her hands crossed over her chest as if she’s afraid to touch me. “What are you doing!?! You’re hurt, you shouldn’t be doing this!”

“Don’t worry, trouble. I heal fast.” I assure her, glaring at the nurses we pass, each of whom look as though they’d like to chastise me as well. They all cower beneath my forbidding glower, and a fresh wave of amusement passes over me as I think about how much harder it is to intimidate the human in my arms.

“Not that fast.” Ella insists, gnawing on her lower lip and seeming to forget the cut she gave herself earlier until her sharp little teeth dig into the wound. She gasps with pain, so I tsk and purr.

“If you keep that up I’m going to have to find some way to keep your lips occupied so you can’t keep biting yourself.” I intone darkly, realizing too late that this might have sounded even more lascivious than I intended.

Ella doesn’t seem to mind. Her heart thumps loudly against her ribs, and her pupils dilate with interest. Luckily if there is one thing that can kill a mood quickly, it’s a bathroom. I deposit Ella on the toilet and calmly weather her glares and admonishments until I finally leave her to take care of things in private, making her promise to call for me when she’s done. Instead I hear the commode flush and the sink running, so I push the door open to glare at her, “Ella you’re a fall risk.”

“And you’re an overprotective ogre.” She counters, drying her hands and climbing back into my arms so willingly that my wolf completely melts. Indeed, she comes to me so sweetly I have to fight to maintain my stern demeanor, reminding myself that I musn’t coddle her, no matter how tempting.

“Do you think that just because I’m injured and you’re in a delicate condition I’ll let you get away with defying me?” I rumble in Ella’s ear, chuckling when she shivers in response.

“How long have I been asleep?” The brazen creature asks, ignoring my question.

“About half an hour.” I inform her, “and my x-rays did come back while you were out. I’m going to be fine.”

“Good.” She breathes, sounding as though a huge weight is leaving her shoulders.

“You were really worried, weren’t you?” I inquire, settling her back in her bed.

“How could I not be?” Ella asks in return, blinking up at me with wide eyes. “I mean, I know you’re strong, but that car... it’s a miracle you’re not more hurt after an accident like that.” “I’m fine.” I promise, dropping a kiss to her hair. “You don’t have to worry about me, Ella.”

She shoots me a challenging stare. “I’d like to see you take your own advice.”

flash my fangs at her, but the OBGYN interrupts us, “Knock, knock.” He says, peaking around the curtain surrounding our ER bay. “I hear you two have been causing some real chaos among the nursing staff here, defying all the hospital’s protocols.”

“I’m innocent.” Ella immediately announces, pointing at me. “It was all him.

I throw my head back and laugh, ignoring the pain which ricochet’s down my back. “Oh you’re really determined to dig yourself into a hole aren’t you, baby?” I remark ominously, stroking, her nape.

“I’m just being honest.” She shrugs, a mischievous glint in her eye..

“Well I think it’s safe to say you’ve had more than enough excitement for the time being.” The doctor shares, giving us a reluctant frown. “I’m afraid we’ve reached the point where you need to go on bed rest, Ella.”

Chapter 95 – Returning the Favor

Ella

“Bed rest?” I repeat, glancing nervously at Sinclair. “You mean until the baby comes?”

“No, I don’t think we have to do anything quite that extreme yet.” The doctor replies with a kind smile, “For now let’s start with a few weeks. Beyond that we can take it as it comes.” “What does that mean exactly?” Sinclair inquires, his large body looming over me. His heat, which sometimes reminds me too much of a blazing furnace when we’re curled in bed together, is a welcome balm now, washing over me in a tide of cozy comfort. “She can’t out of bed at all?”

get “No, it’s not that severe.” The doctor assures us. “Ella can get up to go to the restroom, or move around to switch positions. She can take two short walks every day one in the morning, one in the evening but no more than twenty minutes and if you find yourself getting tired or overwhelmed before then, you need to stop. Absolutely no stairs or physical exertion though, and no standing for more than twenty minutes at a time for any reason.”

My heart sinks, and I try not to let my disappointment show. It’s not the end of the world. after all, it just means I’m going to be a bit bored. “Do I have to be completely on my back, or is sitting up okay?”

“Choose whatever position is most comfortable for you.” He continues, looking back and forth between us. “More importantly, no stress whether you’re in bed, on the couch, or wherever you choose. That means no campaign events, no excitement.”

“And if she does get excited, despite our efforts?” Sinclair inquires, an odd note in his voice.

“I’m going to send you home with some sedatives in case of emergencies, and while I would advise you keep sexual activity to a minimum, if the tension is building up it’s better to indulge it than to resist just remind your wolf to be gentle with her.”

I blink. Who said anything about sex? Is that what Sinclair was getting at, but I just didn’t understand the nuance? How is that not physical exertion?

Don’t be daft, you know orgasms are the best stress relievers. The little voice in my head remarks.

Oh Goddess, when was the last time I had one of those? I think back, recalling the last night I slept away from Sinclair, when I was finally free to get some relief from the fire he keeps constantly lit inside me.

Too long, and you have to admit it would be nice to have one you didn't give yourself. The voice answers.

That would be a first, I snort. Mike is the only man I've ever been with, and he'd never seemed to understand that women can't just magically get off with a few thrusts. I always enjoyed sex for the intimacy, and though it always felt good, orgasms had always been my own responsibility mine to seek once he rolled over and fell asleep.

—

You know it wouldn't be that way with Sinclair. My conscience intimates, sparking memories of the few times we've gotten carried away when I've had glimpses of the pleasure he could give me if I would only succumb to his charms. His words the day of the ball after the incident, as I've decided to call it – ring in my mind: Now, would you like me to make you feel good? Nothing about his own desires, nothing about going further – just a selfless offer to fulfill my needs.

Shut up. I think sharply, unsure whether I'm speaking to the memory or my inner voice. Sinclair is watching me like a hawk, and the hungry expression he's wearing makes me worry that my expression is giving away my lurid thoughts. Before he can say a word, I lean into his side, turning my face towards his shoulder so I can breathe in his scent. I'm doing it for comfort yes, but also to hide my blushing features. Sinclair purrs softly, still stroking my nape, and thanks the doctor.

"I appreciate you coming on such short notice. Can I take her home now?" He asks bluntly, as if I'm the injured party here, rather than him.

"Dominic, you're in much worse condition than I am." I remind him sulkily. "We should be asking your doctors, not mine."

He raises one dark brow at my challenge, but otherwise doesn't acknowledge my words. He looks back to the OB, who smiles warmly, "she's free to go as soon as I write this prescription. I'll come and check on her the day after tomorrow, but call me if anything comes up before then."

"Oh fine, ignore me, talk about me like I'm not here." I grumble. "That will keep me calm." "Don't worry Ella, you're in good hands." The doctor replies, completely unphased by my petulant words. "I'll see you soon."

The moment he turns away, Sinclair moves in front of me, sliding his muscular arms around my middle and burying his face in my neck. I'm so surprised by the gesture, that I barely notice I forgot to thank the doctor. Sinclair isn't growling, or scolding me, he's not even kissing me or trying to sneak an intimate caress, he's simply hugging me – squeezing me with barely restrained force.

Sensing that this isn't his usual mischief or bossiness, I wrap my arms around his broad shoulders, returning the embrace and nuzzling his scruffy jaw. "Hey, what is it?" I murmur, holding him as tightly as I can so that he knows I'm asking out of concern, not some desire to be released. It's only when I feel the bandages beneath his shirt that I remember his wounds, but as soon as I try to take my arms away, Sinclair rumbles in protest.

He lifts his face from my neck, only high enough to speak into my ear. "Today was horrible." He says, his voice like gravel, "every last minute of it. And now this."

"I'm okay, though." I answer softly. "And so is the baby this is just a precaution."

"I don't like it." He insists, sounding as sullen as I was feeling a few minutes ago. "You shouldn't have to worry about this on top of everything else... and I hate that I can't... I can't protect you from this."

And here I thought I was the one on a roller coaster of emotions. In a matter of a few hours, Sinclair had gone from rabid protector, to bossy nurse, and teasing, would-be lover. Now here he is, clinging to me like a child might cling to a teddy bear, beside himself with feelings of helplessness in light of my condition. I suddenly realize that his day started off even worse than my own waking up drugged with a psychotic ex, then finding me missing, tracking me down and weathering a tantrum he did not deserve.

"I'm sorry." I tell him, my voice sounding smaller than I'd like. "I'm sorry for the way I acted earlier, and I'm sorry I scared you when I ran, and with the accident, and fainting that way. I wish I could turn back time and undo this entire day and yesterday for that matter."

"It's certainly been an eventful week." He jokes, his deep bass dripping with irony. "But none of it has been your fault."

"I'm still sorry." I repeat, kissing his neck. "You've been killing yourself taking care of me, and I've been a brat. You deserve better." I hate that I'm near tears already, but I don't think my wild emotions are going to even out any time soon. "I think it's time you let me return the favor."

"You already did." He purrs, rocking me ever so slightly as he strokes my hair. "You kept me calm today when no one else could. You probably saved the lives of some of these nurses."

At first I take it as a joke, but after more thought I realize he's probably being completely literal. "It's not enough, I want to do more."

"You just got put on bed rest, little one." Sinclair reminds me, pulling back to take my face in his massive hands. Despite his stern tone, his green eyes soften as he looks down at me. "I appreciate that you want to help me, Ella. But the only thing that could possibly fix this would be for the doctor to walk back over here and tell me his diagnosis was a mistake. I'm afraid I'm going to be feeling this way until our baby is here and you're both safe and healthy."

"You're right" I acknowledge, clasping his wrists and giving him my best puppy-dog eyes. "I can't fix this, but there must be something I can do to make you feel better even on bedrest" I plead, a devious thought occurring to me then. "You know I won't be able to truly relax if I'm worried about you."

Sinclair huffs out a laugh, closing his eyes and shaking his head. "I swear, you're going to be the death of me, trouble."

I peek up at him from beneath my lashes. "Is that a yes?"

Chapter 96 – Ella and Sinclair Reach an Understanding

Ella

“Why does it feel like this is more for my benefit than yours?” I inquire archly, watching as Sinclair pours oils and salts into a large, steaming bath. The clever wolf knows how much I love a bubble bath, especially now that I’m pregnant. After years of constantly being dirty and even living on the street, there is nothing else that feels so luxurious to me and I can’t think of anything more relaxing.

“Hey, I was going to get in with you you’re the one who put your foot down.” Sinclair replies with a wolfish grin, skimming his fingers through the water to check the temperature.

“Because you have open wounds!” I exclaim, exasperated but also impatient for the preparation to be over so I can sink into the deep tub. “The doctors said you couldn’t submerge your injuries until the scabs are gone.”

Amazingly, the gashes on his back have already scabbed over. It seems that he truly wasn’t lying when he told me that shifters heal faster than humans, but I hadn’t expected him to heal quite so fast. At this rate his wounds will be mere scars in a couple of days.

“Which is why I’ll be supervising, not participating.” Dominic shrugs, I wonder if that hurts. him? I ponder, watching the muscles rippling in his back. He certainly doesn’t show any signs of pain.

He’s so strong. My traitorous conscience moons, and for a moment I actually think I see stars in my eyes.

Rolling my eyes at my inner voice, I cross my arms over my chest. “The idea was to help us both relax.” I sigh, guilt gnawing at my insides.

“Believe it or not, Ella, but taking care of you does help me relax.” Sinclair declares coolly, pressing a button that triggers the whirlpool jets built into the tub. A steady thrumming sound whirs to life as the water begins to churn, foaming and bubbling even higher now.

“Oh sure, I’m sure your version of supervision will ensure neither of us get the least bit excited as you and the doctor so elegantly put it.” I snark.

The big wolf flashes his fangs, flames dancing in his eyes as he finally turns away from the bath. “If I didn’t know any better I’d think you were worried about losing control with me.” He observes darkly, “but I can’t imagine why that would be, unless of course your feelings for me are stronger than you’re letting on.”

“Now you’re just fishing.” I accuse, narrowing my eyes at Sinclair, even as he prowls toward me across the tiled floor.

“Am I?” His dark brows incline towards his hairline. “Because I have no problem admitting mine.”

“Don’t!” I interrupt, feeling a sudden spike of panic. “Seriously Dominic, whatever you’re going to say, I don’t want to know.”

“I thought we were past that, sweetheart.” He scolds, “didn’t you learn your lesson about actually hearing me out when I want to tell you something

“This is different.” I insist, “it honestly stresses me out.”

Sinclair pauses, studying me closely. He’s only a few paces away now, but the longer he observes me, the softer his ravenous expression becomes. “Has it occurred to you that part of the reason you’re so stressed is because you’re trying to fight the inevitable, Ella?”

“Dominic, what stresses me out is bringing a wolf pup into a world I don’t belong to or understand, while living a lie and dodging constant death threats.” I snap, before I can consider how the Alpha might take my words. “Can you really blame me for wanting to keep things simple in the face of all that? If we lose focus for even a moment, this could all fall apart.

11

He stops dead in his tracks, and I can see a great wall of guilt slam into him. I know he’s not focusing on my logic, but on the blame I’ve basically just foisted upon him. “Wait... that came fault out wrong.” I try to backtrack. “Dominic, I didn’t mean that any of this is your “You might not have meant it that way, but you weren’t wrong.” Sinclair declares gutturally, his face a full shade paler than it was a moment ago. “It is my fault if I were a normal man, I hadn’t forced you into this situation, you probably wouldn’t have any complications at all.” “No.” I object, my voice thick with emotion. “You didn’t force me into this, Dominic. And there’s no way to know whether any of this is connected. Mike destroyed my reproductive system and plenty of healthy women develop this condition -”

“Maybe so,” He interrupts sharply, “but our situation certainly isn’t making things any better.” Sinclair is pacing now, resembling a tiger in a cage.

"Please don't do this." I beg, hiccupping on a sob. "Please don't blame yourself for this. You're trying to do the right thing for everyone here. Neither one of us planned this, neither one of us could have prepared for what the world would throw at us these last few months. I don't blame you, I just don't want things to get more complicated than they have to be."

At the sight, or perhaps scent, of my tears, Sinclair deflates, closing the final distance between us and pulling me into his arms. "I'm sorry." He croons in my ear, stroking my spine and kissing my hair. "I'm sorry, sweetheart. Here I am, supposed to be keeping you relaxed and I'm making you cry."

My feet are still on the ground, but I don't want them to be. I begin clambering up the huge man like a monkey climbing a tree, until my arms and legs are wrapped around him and I'm weeping into his neck. "It's not your fault." I repeat pitifully. "I cry over everything now."

"Shh," He coos, sitting down on the edge of the bath. "It's okay, you're not going to break me with a few tears, trouble." He says this, but I can hear the pain in his voice, I can still see the horrible expression on his face.

A steady purr takes up residence in his chest as he deftly strips off my clothes. He tries to deposit me in the bath, but I won't let go, afraid that he'll leave if I release him. Instead he manages to pull off his slacks, shirt and boxers without dislodging me, before sinking into the tub with me still in his arms. I try to protest about his back, but he just hushes me and continues submerging us in the hot water.

It's quite some time before my tears slow enough to talk again, and I realize this isn't even the first breakdown I've had today. "I love this baby," I murmur after a while, "but I'm getting really sick of crying all the time."

Sinclair's lips graze my temple. "I don't think that's his fault either. Maybe some of it -"

if

"The bacon." I remind him, thinking of my most ridiculous fit yet.

"The bacon." He agrees, sounding almost amused. "But not the rest. You have every reason to be upset, Ella. I should have listened to you earlier, before you fainted. You tried to tell me this was all too much and I was too preoccupied with romance to really consider how right you were. It's exactly like you said, I'm letting my feelings distract me from what's really important, and that's the campaign. And it's you and Rafe."

"What are you saying?" I sniffle, fearing I know the answer, and unable to decide whether or not I hope I'm right.

“I’m saying I think you were right. If Lydia is pregnant it might be for the best, and if she isn’t I should try to find another she-wolf to be Luna after we get through the campaign.” Sinclair proclaims, his deep voice sounding hollow – almost as if it belongs to someone else.

Luckily I’m still curled around him like a baby sloth, so I hide my face in his shoulder to prevent him from seeing my disappointment. I don’t understand it myself. I know this is the right decision, I know it’s the most logical solution for our problems, and I don’t plan on arguing it but it still hurts. It still feels like I’m being ripped apart from the inside out.

“Thank you.” I breathe, despite my breaking heart. “I’m trying really hard, but I don’t know if I can get through another week like this one with my sanity intact.” I confess, recalling everything that’s happened in such a short time: blackmail, Roger learning the truth, Lydia drugging Sinclair, our fight, the car crash, the hospital, now this. Has it really only been three days?

“Bed rest will help.” Sinclair promises, “just you wait, in a week or so you’re going to be so bored you’ll be wishing for another blackmailer just to shake up the monotony.”

I hiccup a laugh, and finally relax against him as my tears slow at long last.

Of course, after two weeks of bed rest, it’s not a blackmailer awaiting me it’s a text from Lydia. There are no words, only a photo, one displaying the unmistakable image of a positive pregnancy test.

Todave Ro

Chapter 97 – Lydia’s Pregnant

“Well, I guess that settles that.” I muse, staring at the image dominating the narrow screen of my smart phone. Granted, it was sent by the woman I saved as “Satan’s Mistress” in my contacts and is centered right below the photo of Lydia and Sinclair in bed together, but there’s no mistaking the sight of a positive pregnancy test.

I’ve taken enough home tests in my life to understand what the two pink lines filling the small results window mean they’re the sight I wished for a thousand times but never saw.

I’m trying to keep the pain and disappointment out of my voice so that Sinclair won’t know how upset I am, though I don’t know why I bother. It seems he can read me like a book, even at the best of times.

Whether he can sense it or not, I’m devastated to know Lydia is pregnant, that her scheme worked. Even though this solves some of our problems, I hate to think that she’s getting rewarded for her duplicity, and I despise the idea of Sinclair starting a family with anyone else even if it’s in my baby’s best interest.

“Not yet it doesn’t.” Sinclair replies, his big body still wrapped around me in our bed. “Not until I know the test is real, and even then it might not be my pup. I wouldn’t put anything past Lydia at this point.”

“So you have to go see her?” I guess, fighting the strange but increasingly familiar urge to growl.

“Yes.” He confirms, not sounding any more excited about it than I am. He shifts my body beneath his, balancing his weight on his elbows. “I’ll go by her hotel on my lunch break.”

“Are you sure that’s a good idea?” I question, sliding my hands over his muscular chest. What if she tries to drug you again, or pull some other kind of trick?”

LL

“She succeeded last time because she bribed a waitress to put something in my drink.” He reminds me, sharing the details we learned after his guards investigated the staff at the bar he’d visited that fateful night. “I didn’t know she was anywhere in the vicinity, or I would have been much more careful. I’m not going to let my guard down with her.”

“Fine,” I huff, “but if she lays a hand on you I’m going to rip her head off.” I remark, already fantasizing about doing just that.

“Oh I see,” Sinclair answers, a teasing note in his voice. “So you can rip peoples heads off but I can’t?”

“Yes.” I reply primly, “because in my case it’s just a fantasy, in yours it’s an actual possibility.”

Sinclair chuckles, nuzzling my neck and pausing to nibble the spot where it meets my shoulder. “I bet you could rip off some heads if you really wanted to.” He states, sounding as if the idea pleases him very much. “You should have seen yourself trying to go after the driver who hit me.”

“Well I guess we’ll never know, because you didn’t let me avenge you.” I grumble sullenly.

“Poor, mistreated Ella.” Sinclair croons, shifting to dip his tongue into the hollow of my clavicle. “Not allowed out of bed, not allowed to slaughter your enemies. What did you ever do to deserve such abuse?”

“You tell me, you’re the one holding the keys to my jail cell.” I challenge, arching my chest in a blatant attempt to encourage him downward. Unfortunately or fortunately I suppose, he has enough restraint to resist.

“I promise I’ll take you anywhere you want to go just as soon as the doctor clears you, sweetheart.” Sinclair promises, lifting his head from my body.

“What ever happened to that driver anyway?” I ask, realizing that I was so distracted by my medical condition and Lydia’s scheming that I almost forgot about our would-be murderer.

“We can talk about that later.” Sinclair announces, “I have a few other updates for you, but there isn’t time now.”

I slide my knees up so I can tangle our legs together. I know he’s getting ready to scent mark me, which means he’s also getting ready to leave for the day. However, being stuck on best rest has made me a bit clingy, since I can’t see Sinclair except for the times he’s home.

When he feels my legs wrapping around his own, Sinclair chuckles darkly, sparing one of his hands to stroke the length of my leg. “You trying to stop me from leaving, trouble?” He asks, pausing to massage the muscles in my calf.

“Of course not.” I lie, adopting an innocent expression. “I just like feeling close to you.”

“Mmm, I like being close to you too.” Sinclair professes warmly, kissing my pulse point.

“Now be a good girl and let me scent mark you.”

Wanting to stall him, to keep him in bed with me forever, I inquire. “Dominic, if I’m on bed rest then why do you need to scent mark me? I’m not going to be seeing anyone.”

His eyes flash with emerald light, and I know his wolf has risen to my challenge. “We don’t know that for sure, what if some other wolf comes sniffing around the manor?”

“How would they get past all your guards?” I pose, narrowing my eyes with suspicion.

“Mmm, you can never trust wolves.” He declares, his fangs extending in a predatory grin.

“Says the hungry wolf in my bed.” I laugh, trying not to squirm as he drags those fangs over my ear lobe.

“What’s wrong, little human, are you worried I might gobble you up?” Sinclair teases, his voice a low rumble that makes my insides turn to jelly.

“I’m just wondering why I need to smell like you just to lie in bed all day.” I answer, trying to sound nonchalant.

“Because you always need to smell like me.” Sinclair insists, raking his dark gaze over my body with relish. “You’re mine whether you’re in public or private.”

I positively quiver when he claims me for his own, and though my inner feminist wants to be outraged, I can’t deny how delicious it feels to be wanted this way especially by a man such as Sinclair. “Why is it I feel like I’m talking to your wolf right now, rather than you?” I joke, knowing full well that this is exactly the case. From the moment I challenged him about scent marking, his inner animal rose to the surface, pushing the logical man I’ve come to adore into the backseat.

“Baby, my wolf and I are one in the same.” Sinclair reasons, even as he pulls off my night dress and begins to rub his body against mine.

“Maybe, but it’s very obvious when he’s in control. You start acting like a treasure-obsessed dragon who’s mistaken me for some sparkly trinket.”

Sinclair rumbles in protest, pausing to look down at me with a foreboding expression. “How dare you, you’re so much more than some trinket or trophy, Ella.”

“You know what I mean.” I laugh, rolling my eyes.

“I do,” He concedes, eyes glittering. “but the real question is why you’re delaying something you need just as badly as I do.”

The terrible thing is that he's right. I'm trying to delay the scent marking because I know he'll leave once it's over, but I do need him to mark me. I need to feel his claim on me, to feel the proof that I belong to Dominic Sinclair.

The bigger the baby grows, the sharper my senses become. I can smell Sinclair now, the way only a shifter can. It's not like with humans, whose aromas are combinations of body odors, soaps and colognes that linger on the skin. Wolf scents are so much deeper than that; powerful essences that exude from the pores and bear strange and mysterious magics. Sinclair's is all balsam and warm, spiced honey, plus a heady, masculine musk all his own.

I can feel when the strength of his scent fades from my body after a long time apart, and it makes me feel oddly incomplete like I'm suddenly missing a piece of myself. There's also a primal part of me which wants to ensure he doesn't go to see his mate the she-wolf who's carrying another one of his babies without claiming me first.

I'm already fighting a great conflagration of jealousy at the idea that she's carrying his child. I want to destroy her, I want to smother him with my own scent before he goes to her, to stake my claim on him so Lydia knows that he's mine no matter what she does.

Suddenly I find myself doing just that. As soon as the thought occurs to me, I find myself rubbing my body all over his, aggressively wriggling against him, determined to cover every inch of his skin in my own essence. Of course, this is much harder for me than it is for Sinclair. He's so large that he can easily wrap himself around me and cover my whole body. I, on the other hand, have to take extra care to ensure I haven't missed a spot. I don't understand what's come over me, it's like I've been possessed by some wild spirit which won't rest until this man bears my mark then again, much of pregnancy feels this way. I don't have any control over what my body does these days.

Sinclair is purring and chuckling at once, both pleased and amused by my wolfish behavior. I pause, shooting him a suspicious glare, "Are you laughing at me?"

Sinclair grins. "I like seeing you like this. So possessive so much ferocity in such a tiny package." His hands are stroking my sides, exploring the curves of my naked body in a sensual dance that is fanning the flames already consuming me. "It's adorable, and incredibly sexy."

I can feel myself flushing, I can also feel a very familiar and dangerous heat pooling in my belly. If we keep this up, we're going to start kissing, and if we start kissing... well, I'm not sure how much longer either of us can hold ourselves back from one another. This thought is enough to finally cool my overheated blood we've agreed to be friends, not to overcomplicate things.

I slump back down onto the bed, throwing my arm over my eyes so I can't see Sinclair's handsome face or rock hard body. "You should go." I sigh, trying to be strong. "This is getting out of hand."

There's a long beat of silence, but when Sinclair speaks again I know he must have reigned in his own desires, recognizing the slippery slope we were headed down. "I'm sorry, Ella." His weight lifts from the bed, and I feel his soft lips graze mine, "I'll call you as soon as I've seen Lydia. And if you can promise to try and be less irresistible, I'll promise not to go telling you how much you turn me on. Deal?"

I can't help but laugh, moving my arm so I can see his sultry smile, "deal."

Chapter 98 – Sinclair Visits His Ex

Sinclair

When I arrive at Lydia's hotel, I'm still thinking about Ella. We've been doing well over the last two weeks, keeping our relationship affectionate but resisting our shared desires as best we can. So far we've been able to avoid getting more intimate than we'd already become before the doctor ordered bed rest, but the sexual tension is still building – and the suggestion that Ella could be less irresistible is nothing short of ridiculous.

What's more, the baby is making her more wolf-like every day, and I'm worried our restraint can't last much longer. Her efforts to scent mark me today made that only too obvious. Before long she's going to start pushing me like any she-wolf denied her needs, either challenging my dominance or seducing me outright. It will be up to me to resist, even though denying her needs goes against my every instinct.

I know we made the right decision about staying just friends, especially since I've already let my attraction to Ella distract me from the campaign more than once. I was so preoccupied with the beautiful human that I missed rogues pouring into my borders, and it cost the pack dearly. I got drugged and apparently bred like a prize stud because I was too busy gushing about her to a pack of bar flies than keeping my guard up.

–

None of that is to mention the harm I'm doing to Ella and our baby by keeping her in this fraudulent political game. I need to confirm Lydia's pregnancy or find another Luna and whomever I choose would never accept me having a relationship with Ella in private. That means we have to find a way to be together without romance getting in the way, and so far we're failing. I'm failing her again.

I knock on the door of Lydia's room, trying to push down memories of the last time I was here. I can't decide how I feel about this supposed pregnancy. On one hand, the last thing I want is to have Lydia back in my life. On the other, a baby born from her would solve some of my problems the pack would accept me returning to my fated mate more easily than they would understand me leaving Ella for another woman.

Still, I can't help but thinking the best solution to all this would be to find a she-wolf to be Luna after the campaign, and to keep Rafe as my heir. That way we avoid Lydia's awfulness, while still giving Ella the safety and comfort she deserves.

my

Before I can consider the idea further, the door swings open, revealing Lydia in a hotel bathrobe. She's wearing a knowing smirk, and her dark hair is still wet from the shower. "Dominic, I've been expecting you." She preens, dropping her hand to her belly. "Or should I call you Daddy?"

My wolf

gags in my head, and I can't blame him. It amazes me to know how attractive I once found this woman. The idiocy of youth, I suppose, and the cruel tricks of fate.

I promptly scent the air, pushing past the fragrant soaps and shampoos lingering on her skin. I can smell her familiar, distinct aroma: the cloying combination of lemon and pine. At one time it had smelled natural and fresh to me, now it just reminds me of floor cleaner I can't smell a pup in her womb, which doesn't mean she isn't breeding, but it does mean the child doesn't belong to me.

I could smell Rafe from down the hall when Ella was only ten days along, but it's been two weeks since the apparent conception and I can't detect a single hint of my own essence in Lydia.

"Nice try, Lydia, but if you are pregnant, it's not mine." I announce, overflowing with triumphant glee.

"What. How can you say that!?" She exclaims. "I'm not some slut, Dominic, I don't sleep with just anyone."

Belatedly I realize she must not understand how quickly the bond between a father and pup forms. She probably thought she had plenty of time to figure out how to pass of the child as mine, or to conceive one for real.

"Darling, having never been pregnant, you couldn't possibly know this," I state coldly, watching her flinch at my cruel phrasing and imagining Ella scolding me for intentionally targeting her weak spot. "But if you were carrying my child, I would be able to smell it. Even now."

Lydia's mouth opens and closes as she struggles to find the right words. "Are you sure about that?" She finally challenges, "you wouldn't want to risk being wrong about something so important."

I stalk forward, rudely reaching for her middle and uncinching her robe. I press my palm to her stomach, telling myself that she deserves this and more. After all, this is nothing compared to drugging someone and sleeping with them when they can't consent. Again I feel. nothing, no pulse of life, no tiny consciousness or connection. "I'm sure." I proclaim fiercely. "As soon as the egg implants, the bond to the father forms. If you are breeding, it isn't mine."

Her hands close into fists, and she bares her fangs. "Goddess damn it!" She explodes, wrenching her body away from me and yanking her robe closed. "If you had just cooperated. from the beginning -"

"Wait," I interrupt. "What do you mean, if I had cooperated?"

She growls, throwing her hands up in exasperation. "Do you have any idea the lengths I went to in order to drug you, Dom? To get you back here? That was supposed to be the hard part but of course, you never make anything easy! You were out of your head on GHB, and still all you could think about was that little whore of yours! You didn't want anything to do with me, you kept going back and forth between gushing over how wonderful she is and asking for her, trying to leave so you could go find her. I had to practically tie you down just to keep you here, and then nothing I tried got you even a little aroused I should have shown you her photo, I'm sure you would have been hard in an instant!"

—

"So we didn't even have sex?" I clarify, relief coursing through my veins.

"Are you kidding? Your cock was like a limp noodle!" She bursts out, glaring at me. "I swear, that bitch must be a witch. I'm still your fated mate, I ought to be able to turn you on if nothing else."

"What can I say?" I shrug, feeling very smug now. "Now that my wolf has gotten a taste of Ella, you can't expect him to settle for anything less – and you are absolutely, unequivocally less, Lydia."

Her eyes blaze, glowing with her inner wolf. There's anger reflected in her dark irises, but also a world of pain. "Of course I am. How many times did you even fuck her before she got pregnant? Once? Some sluts just open their legs and magically conceive, while the rest of us struggle for years."

"You don't know Ella." I growl. "It wasn't like that, and it hasn't been easy for her." For one moment, I allow myself to feel for her, for this she-wolf who I spent so many years trying to make a family with. Our disappointment and failure was shared for so long, at a time when we both felt like our bodies were betraying us neither able to fulfill their core function of procreation. I've moved past that now, but I know Lydia is still living it. "It's not your fault that we couldn't get pregnant, and I would never never blame you for that." I begin.

Tears well in Lydia's eyes, and she interrupts me before I can continue.. "You say it's not my fault, but the truth is that it was. You knocked Ella up without even trying, didn't you? That means that I was the problem all along."

"I'm sorry, Lydia." I profess, surprised to find I mean it. "But that's not why she's better. The difference is that Ella is good and kind, and she only ever wanted to be a mother because she has so much love to give not because it was a way for her to secure power. I know that doesn't make failing easier, but Ella is truly worthy of being a Luna because she will selflessly sacrifice herself for her people or her family, and you never would."

"I don't need to be pregnant to ruin you." Lydia threatens, tears spilling down her cheeks. "If the pack finds out you spent the night with me it won't matter they'll turn on you all the same." Something truly bitter enters her voice now, and I suddenly realize the depth of her hatred for Ella. "She won them over so easily. She just batted her lashes and they fell at her feet, just like you. They'll take her side if the story comes out, even though you've been Alpha for years."

"So what? You're going to hold a press conference?" I growl.

"I'll leak the story to the papers." She corrects me fiercely. "And they'll believe me, because I have the photographs. I have proof. I'll end your campaign once and for all."

Chapter 99 – Sinclair Tells Ella

Sinclair

My wolf is clawing at the surface of my skin, determined to be let out so he can tear Lydia to shreds. Gritting my teeth, I narrow my eyes at the malevolent she wolf. “Lydia, you are the second person who has attempted to blackmail me this month, and I have to tell you – this is getting really old.”

Rolling my eyes, I continue. “And you seem to be forgetting that I’m on the board of the Moon Valley associated press. I hold shares in every major publication in the city. What’s more, none of the outlets want the Prince to win the campaign, because if he does the free press disappears.”

Lydia snarls, throwing her hands up, “fine, then I’ll simply text it to every person I know! It will get around that way!”

“And I’ll refute it.” I inform her coldly. “I’ll say it’s an old photo from when we were married, and the pack will believe me, because you are a traitor who abandoned them.” As I speak, I scan the room for her phone. If I refute her story, it’s true that the pack will probably side with me, but I honestly don’t want to risk it..

I finally see her device, lying on the hotel bed’s pristine white coverlet. Straightening up to my full height, I stride closer to Lydia, towering over her. “You’ve gone too far this time, Lydia.” I declare, backing her into the wall. “I’m going to let you walk away, but you have to go now. Leave Moon Valley by sunset, and don’t come back.”

“Or what?” She mutters bitterly, tears still hovering on her lashes. “You’ll kill me?”

“You aren’t my mate anymore.” I remind her, “And you never deserved to be in the first place. I will kill you if you make me, but it doesn’t have to be that way. Go back to your husband, adopt a child if that’s what you want, but stay the hell away from my family.”

Lydia shakes her head, still full of defiance, even as the scent of her fear grows stronger with every moment that passes. “I don’t believe you. I don’t believe you’d actually harm me.”

With an abundance of control, I close my fist around her throat, glowering down at her and letting her feel the full force of my rage. “You took my brother from me, for more than a decade.”

I remind her. “You saw fit to ignore fate until you thought you could benefit from it, and you blamed our fertility struggles on me for years.” My voice is barely more than a snarl, and though I no longer feel insecure about this particular slight, it doesn’t change the hurt it inflicted at the time.

I press on, watching the panic grow in Lydia's eyes as her air supply is abruptly cut off. "You left when the pack needed a strong Luna most. You have endangered everyone in Moon Valley with your selfishness, you cleared the way for a Tyrant to claim the throne. You drugged me, tried to steal my sperm, and on top of everything else, you made my Ella cry."

I hiss, amazed to discover my wolf finds this as offensive as Lydia pushing the pack to the brink of war. Of course it was more than just tears, Ella ran away because of Lydia's tricks, she might have been killed if I hadn't found her so quickly. "The only reason you're not dead already is because you were my mate, but that protection is gone now."

I release her abruptly, moving to the bed and snatching up her phone while she remained huddled against the wall, gasping for air. "You have until sunset, Lydia. After that, all bets are off."

—

I storm out of the room, not pausing to look back. I don't need to I can hear Lydia's back sliding down the wall so she can huddle on the floor, sobbing out her pain and fury. Once upon a time the sound of my fated mate so distraught would have brought me to my knees, now it only fills me with satisfaction.

I should have thrown her out of my life years ago. In fact, I never should have started at relationship with her in the first place. Of course, I wasn't strong enough at the time – but I'm strong enough now I have to be, for my pack, for Ella and Rafe, even for Roger.

I want to go straight home to Ella, but I know I need to work off some of this violent energy first. I take my guards to the forest, shifting the moment I'm out of the car, and leading them. on a run through the dense woodland. I don't hold back, sprinting at top speed and leaving my men in the dust. I run until the flames of my fury are finally banked, only turning back once. my wolf is calm enough to think of Lydia without growling

I decide to work from home for the rest of the day, and I finally make my way back to Ella. When I arrive home, she's sound asleep in my bed, curled up in a little ball beneath the covers. At first I think the round lump in the bedding is one of her pillows, but when I notice it breathing I realize that the precious human has burrowed into a cocoon of cotton and goose- down. Unable to resist, I lift the duvet to peek inside, leaning down to kiss her hair when I see her serene expression.

Afterwards I head for the shower, still sweaty from my run. I sigh as the steaming water envelopes me, telling myself that I have to go back to work after I'm clean, no matter how badly I want to crawl into bed with Ella and nap the afternoon away.

Just for a little while? My wolf begs. Five minutes?

You know it's never just five minutes. I grouse. Five minutes turns into fifteen, and that turns into an hour. Besides, Ella needs her rest. I'll probably wake her if I try to join.

But we promised to update her about Lydia. He reminds me, determined to win the argument. And we will. I promise, when she wakes up in her own time.

And so I force myself to dress and go to my study, promising myself I'll come check on Ella. again in a few hours. In the end, however, she ends up finding me. Around three I hear small door. feet padding down the hall, and then a soft knock on my

I cross the room in an instant, swinging it open and looking down at the beautiful human with a furrowed brow. "What are you doing out of bed?"

"I'm allowed two twenty minute walks, remember?" She remarks pointedly. "Besides I wanted a snack and when I asked my guard he told me you were home."

"Mhmm, and how did you get down the stairs?" I inquire, brushing a few locks of hair back from her upturned face.

"Marcus carried me." Ella declares, gesturing to the guard still trailing after her. "What happened with Lydia?"

I glance at the guard in question, telling my wolf we can't be annoyed with the man for following our orders not to let Ella near any staircases, just because we don't like the fact that he touched her. "Let's go to the kitchen and find you a snack, then we can talk." I suggest, scooping Ella up.

"Dominic, I want to walk." She groans. "I've been stuck in bed all day."

"But there are more stairs." I object, secretly thankful for this fact. I know the poor thing must be getting stir crazy, but I haven't gotten to hold her since this morning, and I've missed her even after this short time apart.

"Fine but I'm standing when we get there." Ella declares stubbornly.

"As long as you stand next to me, that's fine by me." I answer, hugging her close as I navigate the corridors. "Did you have a nice nap?"

"It was fine, what happened with Lydia?" Ella presses,

"So impatient." I cluck, striding into the kitchen and setting her feet on the ground. "Food comes first. What were you craving?"

Ella squares her shoulders, crossing her arms over her chest and tilting her chin up defiantly." Dominic Sinclair, I am not telling you anything or eating a bite until you tell me what happened."

I arch one brow, towering over her and giving her my most disapproving look. Ella glares up at me for a few moments, but finally caves when I emit a low rumble. "Fine," she huffs, going to the fridge. She extracts a bag of baby carrots and some of my chef's homemade hummus, pointedly opening the container and dipping one of the orange batons into the rich puree and popping it into her mouth. She chews and swallows, then says, "there, happy?"

"Not yet." I murmur, taking a seat at the counter and pulling her to stand between my legs. My wolf relaxes as soon as she's in the protective circle of my reach, knowing we can catch her if she starts to feel faint. I dip another carrot and hold it to her lips, determined to feed her at minimum of five before finally agreeing to share the latest developments. Ella obediently munches the morsels, and I can tell that she was hungrier than she'd been willing to admit. Her grumpy energy gradually diminishes, until she's eagerly waiting for the next bite. A bit later, I finally announce the news. "Lydia isn't pregnant."

Chapter 100 – Lydia Gets Desperate

3rd Person

Sinclair watched Ella like a hawk as his words landed. A riot of emotions flashed across her beautiful features, first relief, then happiness and finally worry and confusion. “We didn’t even sleep together.” He continued soberly. “She tried, but apparently I wasn’t interested – even drugged.”

“Oh.” The same progression of tangled feelings flitted across Ella’s expression, one which the Alpha understood only too well. He didn’t want a child with Lydia either, and he was beyond relieved he hadn’t actually been intimate with the conniving she-wolf – but there was no denying it would have solved a number of their problems. “So, we’re right back where we started, then.” Ella assessed softly.

“Yes, but I can still try to find another Luna.” Sinclair assured her. “I know it will take longer now, but it’s better this way. Lydia isn’t the mother I want for one of my pups, and she’s definitely not the woman I want for my queen.”

“I know.” Ella replied, leaning into his warmth. “I didn’t want her in our lives either, I’m just ... overwhelmed.”

“I know,” Sinclair sympathized, tucking her against his broad chest. “I’m going to find a way to make it better, Ella. I promise.”

“You better.” She grumbled, snuggling closer and breathing in his scent. As his comforting aroma filled her senses, she closed her eyes and sighed with pleasure, suddenly feeling the strangest compulsion to bite the big wolf. It was almost as if she wanted to mark him again, now that her scent had washed off in the shower now that she knew Lydia hadn’t succeeded. in her efforts to steal him.

Ella nuzzled Sinclair’s pec, nudging his shirt aside and hesitantly parting her lips. She experimentally pressed her teeth into his flesh, but before she could give in to the instinct completely, Sinclair tangled one large fist in her hair and formed a handhold, pulling her head back.

“You bite me, I bite you back, baby.” He purred, looking as though he didn’t have any problem with this idea at all.

Something deep in Ella’s bones melted at this thought, writhing with defiance and lust, eager to make him do just that. However her well-honed instincts for self-preservation forced down those strange feelings, and she blushed. “Sorry, I don’t know what came over me.”

“I do.” Sinclair rumbled, moving his free hand to the curve of her belly. The baby kicked, as if confirming his guilt for influencing his mother's wolfish behavior. "But we have more to talk about, I promised I'd tell you about the driver from the accident."

Ella's dilated pupils sharpened then, as reason returned to her brain. "What did you find out?"

"He was hired by the Prince." Sinclair explained, "No surprise there. He was only supposed to be doing recon, but he also had orders to kill you if he saw an opening to do so."

"So when I walked into the street near his car..." Ella reasoned, piecing together this information with her memories.

"Exactly." Sinclair confirmed. "He thought it was the perfect opportunity."

"Did he know anything else about the Prince's plans?" Ella questioned, any hint of her earlier mischief gone now.

"He was supposed to be on the team of rogues the Prince hired for the attack Roger warned us about." Sinclair shared, offering Ella another carrot.

She took it, but frowned. "Why haven't we heard anything more about that? My bed rest isn't public knowledge, is it?"

"No." Sinclair confirmed, "but Roger said it would be a few weeks. The invitation could come any day now. Of course, now we have a valid excuse to refuse it."

"But do we want people to know I'm on bed rest?" Ella asked, worry obvious in her voice.

"I think it's our best option. No one will question your absence from the event, and I've already increased security here threefold. This house is basically a fortress at this point." Sinclair assured her.

"Well I suppose that deals with the Prince for the time being, but what about Lydia? What if she tries something else?" Ella wondered aloud.

"Lydia isn't going to be a problem anymore." Sinclair proclaimed. "I exiled her, and if she wants to live, she'll leave Moon Valley, and never come back."

Across town, Lydia was fuming.

She'd been striving to become queen since she was a child. Her parents always told her she was meant for great things, so it hadn't been hard to convince them to bring her to Moon Valley as a teenager. She'd sidled up to Henry Sinclair's presumed heir, only to suffer the severe bad luck of choosing the wrong brother twice.

—

It hadn't been easy to resist her fated mate, but she was never going to settle for a second son. Then, when Henry named Dominic his heir instead of Roger, she thought that the Goddess must have been right after all. Lydia dumped Roger and happily gave herself to Dominic, only to suffer one misfortune after another.

First Henry had been attacked in the middle of his campaign, preventing her from becoming a Princess. Then she hadn't been able to conceive an heir, which meant Sinclair would never get elected as King on his own merit. She'd blamed him for their infertility and decided to try and move on to greener pastures, but her new husband hadn't been amused when she couldn't give him an heir either.

At last Lydia thought her problems were solved when Sinclair found that little whore to be his surrogate, but for some reason she hadn't been able to waltz back into his life as if nothing had changed. He'd seemed genuinely angry about her departure, even though it's what any rational woman would have done in her shoes. She'd experience a quick flash of hope when she realized that his sperm was fertile after all, but then he'd ruined her plan to steal it.

Everything had fallen apart, and Lydia was sick of watching all her dreams slip away. She had to do something desperate times called for desperate measures, and she had to find a way to claim her rightful place in society without letting Sinclair know she hadn't left town.

Her first thought was to kill Ella, but without his heir, Sinclair wouldn't be King. Her second thought was to wait until the baby was born and then kill the infuriatingly beautiful she-wolf, but after his reaction that afternoon, Lydia had a sneaking suspicion the Alpha wouldn't take too kindly to the bitch's murder.

In the end, she realized there was only one thing to do. Sinclair wasn't going to take her back, but he wasn't the only wolf in the running to rule the Kingdom. The Prince already had an heir, and though he also had a mate, he didn't seem nearly as attached to her as Sinclair was to Ella. Besides, if Lydia played her cards right, he wouldn't ever know that she had anything to do with the Princess's untimely passing.

Yes, Lydia decided. With the Princess out of the way, the road would be clear for her to swoop in and take her place. She could tell the Prince all of Sinclair's weak spots, and help him win the election. Together they could rule the realm and lead the united packs into a whole new era. The Prince's ideology was much more in line with Lydia's anyway.

She and Sinclair had never really seen eye to eye about things like charity or free speech.

The hard part was figuring out how to get to the Princess when she was frequently surrounded by guards. However, Lydia's experiences with Ella ended up helping there too. She remembered how easy it had been to approach the other she-wolf in the women's restroom where male guards couldn't follow.

Lydia scoured the internet for news about the Princess's planned campaign events and outings in the coming week, eventually discovering that she was going to be the guest of honor at a ribbon cutting for a new primary school in two days time. She spent the better part of the first day trying to figure out how she should go about taking the other woman's life, knowing it would be best if she could find a poison or something with a delayed effect. It would be much easier to get away with the crime if she wasn't present when the Princess actually took her last breath.

Finally Lydia settled on an aerosol toxin which she could hide in a perfume bottle, especially since everyone knew the reigning Luna's signature scent. The Princess had been a model before marrying the Prince, and she starred in multiple beauty ads to this day, but none of which were so famous as her Moonkissed fragrance ads. The perfume was the best selling scent in the realm because of her endorsement.

Thankfully Lydia had the foresight to have the poison she ordered online shipped to a random address, arriving to intercept the overnight delivery before it ever reached the actual resident. From there it was smooth sailing. She bought a fresh bottle of Moonkissed, emptied the contents and replaced it with her toxin. She went to the ribbon cutting and laid in wait in the bathroom, then accidentally crashed into the Princess when she entered, ensuring the Luna dropped her bag.

The contents spilled out over the floor, and then it was a simple slide of hand to switch the perfume bottles. Lydia left immediately afterwards, then waited for the news to break. It took all of 24 hours, until the next time the Princess applied her perfume right in the safety of the Royal Palace. Her death was instantaneous and for once, at long last, Lydia's plans actually paid off. There were no hiccups or unintended consequences, no unfortunate turns of fate. The Princess died just like she was supposed to, and Lydia's path to the Prince was clear. Now all that was left to do was make sure Sinclair lost the election then her future would finally be secure.

Chapter 101 – The Princess is Dead

Ella

Once it became clear that Lydia wasn't going to be the solution to our problems, I decided it was time to call in some backup. I trust Sinclair to take finding a new Luna seriously, but I also know he doesn't have the time. Between running the pack, the campaign, and taking care of me, there's no room in his life to go out hunting for a mate. I, on the other hand, have nothing but time. Bed rest sounds like a nice, relaxing time, but all it really means is that the world is falling apart around me and I'm not allowed to do anything but lie around and get fat.

So I invite Roger and Henry over for a visit, with two main objectives in mind. First, it's long past time that I come clean to Sinclair's father about my true identity. Second, if anyone can be trusted to help me wingwoman the father of my child, it's his father and his brother.

I persuade one of my faithful guards to carry me downstairs just before lunchtime, settling in the main sitting room in anticipation of my visitors. Roger and Henry arrive shortly afterwards, walking or in Henry's case, wheeling in with wide smiles on their faces. I start to get up, but they both immediately protest. "No, don't move, we'll come to you." Roger promises.

"Poor darling," Henry commiserates beside him, "we ought to get you some wheels so you can be mobile even on bed rest."

I hug them both, laughing at Henry's suggestion. "I'd like that, but somehow I think your son would think it's too much excitement."

—

"You may have a point there." The older man concedes with a knowing look, "I do lead a very exciting life rolling around an empty house all day, just waiting for my friends to retire so I can have a social life outside of evening poker games."

"Henry!" I exclaim, sitting up in excitement. "I can't believe I didn't think of this before – if we're both stuck at home all day, we might as well spend the time together! I need company, you need company, and Sinclair would probably love the idea of me having another babysitter the bossy bastard."

Roger laughs, and Henry is smiling, but it's a hesitant look, as if he doesn't want to get his hopes up. "Oh now, I'm sure you don't want to spend all day long with an old man."

“Henry, I would love to spend more time with you I mean, full disclosure: I’m so bored and restless that I’d probably take the company of a serial killer about now, but you are a much more preferable alternative.” I declare wryly.

They both chuckle, “You hear that dad? You beat out the homicidal maniacs!” Roger congratulates him.

Henry is looking less uncertain now, and his smile is verging on a beam. “Really?”

“Of course!” I insist, only hesitating when I remember the reason I’ve asked him over today. “That is... assuming you want to spend time with me.”

“Ella, of course I want to! How could you think I wouldn’t want to get to know my new daughter better? Don’t you know fathers exist to spoil their pups and grandpups?” Henry offers gamely. The smile slips from my face at his words, and suddenly I’m fighting back tears. Henry looks confused for a moment, before a guilty expression identical to the one

Sinclair sometimes dons takes over his features. “Oh Ella, I’m sorry, I wasn’t thinking.”

“No, it’s not that.” I sniffle, knowing he assumes I’m hurt because I’m an orphan and don’t have any experience with fathers. “It’s just that... no one’s ever wanted to claim me as their child before, and you just did it like it was the most natural thing in the world.”

“Ella that’s a good thing.” Roger offers gently, reaching out to squeeze my hand.

“No,” I argue, shaking my head and burying my face in my hands. “I don’t deserve your kindness. I’ve been lying to you, we both have.”

Henry wheels forward, resting his palm on my shoulder. “Oh now, come on dearheart, I’m sure it’s not all that bad.”

“But it is! He knows!” I exclaim, gesturing to Roger and crying, “I’m a fraud!”

Roger’s eyes widen with alarm, clearly baffled by my sudden outburst of emotion, and completely out of his depth. Henry, on the other hand, rolls his eyes at his son and wraps his arms around me, encouraging me to lean my head on his shoulder. I surrender, leaning into him and letting his shirt collar soak up my hopeless tears.

“There now,” Henry murmurs, patting my hair, “why don’t you tell me what all this is about.” Little by little the story pours out of me, in between hiccups and sobs with small assists from Roger along the way. “There, you see?” I moan when it’s all over. “It’s all been a lie.” Of course, Henry is too much like his son to let me wallow in my misery. He continues fussing over me and rubbing my back, and for the first time in my life, I feel the way I can only imagine it feels to be held by a parent – by a father. Of course, this only makes me cry harder.” Poor little mother, it’s no wonder you’re under so much stress. You’ve been making yourself sick over all this haven’t you?”

“Uh-huh,” I nod pitifully. “And I haven’t even told you about Lydia yet.”

When I get through the most recent chapter of our saga, they’re both swearing, and I can barely catch my breath. “That’s why I asked you both over today, I wanted you to help me find a Luna for Dominic, since he doesn’t have the time to search for himself... that is, assuming you can still stand the sight of me.”

“Ella, you listen to me now.” Henry instructs, sounding more stern than I’ve ever heard him. “You’re going to be my daughter whether you marry my son or not and it doesn’t matter one bit that you’re human. You’re giving me a grandpup, and that makes you family forever.”

I pull away from him slightly, tears streaming down my cheeks, “you mean you don’t hate me?”

“Of course not!” He admonishes. “I couldn’t if I tried. You didn’t ask for any of this to happen, Ella. You’re just doing the best you can and for what it’s worth, your best has been phenomenal.”

“He’s right, Ella” Roger agrees “You’re doing incredible. And of course we’ll help you find a Luna for Sinclair’

“Really?” I squeak

“Of course “Roger begins, “we’ll do whatever we can to help, even ”

Before he can finish his sentence, one of the guards walls in, an anxious look on his face. “I’m sorry, but you need to see this.” He picks up the television remote from the coffee table, pressing a button that opens a sliding panel above the fireplace and reveals a big screen TV. The screen flickers to life, and the guard quickly switches the channel to the leading shifter news station.

A picture of the Prince and his wife is dominating the screen, with a bold headline reading: Princess Found Dead in the Royal Palace.

The reporter is speaking in a low even tone, reporting on the brief details available at this early stage. “The Princess was found unresponsive in her bathroom earlier this morning, after she failed to appear for a scheduled campaign event. Her cause of death has not yet been identified, but an autopsy will be conducted to determine whether or not foul play was involved. The Palace has not released an official statement about her passing, other than to request time for the Royal Family to grieve this tragedy in private.”

“Well I guess that solves the problem of the women’s event and the rogue attack.” Roger observes dryly.

“I... what does this mean?” I ask, my voice still husky from all the crying.

“It’s not good.” Henry answers gruffly. “He just went from an abusive tyrant to a grieving, single father.”

“So... even though he won’t have a Luna anymore, this could help him in the campaign?” I surmise, hating that there might be a double standard like this.

“He already has his heir and a spare.” Roger reminds me. “That ensures his wolf is well grounded and balanced even if he doesn’t have a mate.”

“But I thought Lunas were supposed to lead the she-wolves of a pack, won’t he need one eventually?” I inquire.

“Not necessarily.” Henry frowns. “It’s different with you and Dominic, because as long as the mother of his pup is alive, she’ll be expected to lead unless we find someone to take your place. But the pack won’t fault the Prince for being a widower.”

“So basically you’re telling me that as bad as things already were... they just got worse?” I assess.

“Yes, Ella.” Henry confirms gravely. “I’m afraid so.”

Chapter 102 – Sinclair Gets a Scolding

Ella

Sinclair calls soon after the news about the Princess breaks, explaining that he'll probably be stuck at the office until late this evening as a result. He was relieved to hear that Henry and Roger were at the house with me, and made me promise to call him if I need anything.

The three of us spent the afternoon discussing ideal qualities to look for in a potential second- chance mate for Sinclair, which proved surprisingly difficult. Apparently Sinclair had a few serious girlfriends in high school before Lydia came along, then a few more who were more akin to distractions while she continued to date Roger. There hasn't been anyone since they divorced, which is why he apparently always got photographed with different women – because he never wanted to lead anyone on with second dates when he knew it wasn't going to go anywhere.

Combined, this meant that his only serious interests amounted to boyhood dalliances, his evil fated mate, and me a human he can't ever be with. Try making a dating profile out of that. I wish there was some way I could just become a wolf. I think, standing in front of the bathroom mirror and staring at my reflection, just because it's an excuse to be on my feet. In horror movies all werewolves have to do is bite a human, then they're changed forever. I know all that isn't real, but part of me still wishes it could be.

I'd love to transform. My inner voice agrees wistfully. To be free to lope through the forest under the full moon.

Can you imagine what it would feel like to be so powerful? I reply, relieved that we're on the same page for once. I've never felt powerful in my life. It would be nice to know what that's like... at least once.

We're powerful in at least one way. My conscience proclaims, ever the optimist when I'm trying to feel down on myself. We made a baby. We're growing Sinclair's pup. If that's not power, what is?

"You okay Ella?" Roger's voice floats through the door, and I push away my thoughts.

Pulling my gaze from my reflection, I swing the door open, eyeing the waiting wolf indignantly. "You know just because I'm on bed rest, it doesn't mean I can't stand up every now and then."

"And if I know my brother, his response would be that stalling and making up reasons to stay upright every time you have an excuse to be on your feet is cheating." Roger replies, flashing me a grin.

I narrow my eyes at him. That's exactly what Sinclair would say, but whereas Sinclair's scolding has the power to make me shake in my boots, Roger's just irks me. "Well, Dominic isn't here." I remind him, turning my nose up.

"Oh really?" A deep voice sounds from the doorway, and I jolt slightly, turning to find Sinclair watching us with raised brows.

"You're home!" I exclaim, glancing at the clock. It's already ten PM, but I barely noticed how quickly the night passed.

"I am." Sinclair confirms, prowling forward with lethal grace. "And from the sounds of it, not a moment too soon."

11

I willingly melt into his arms when he reaches for me, lifting my feet off the ground as I'm enveloped in a warm hug. "I was only up for a minute." I tell him, breathing in his scent.

Sinclair trails kisses over my hair, "Now why don't I believe you?" He inquires, his amused voice a low rumble in my ear.

"Because you're a suspicious ogre who assumes the worst of people?" I suggest, batting my lashes at him and adopting an innocent tone as I add, "even the mother of your child." The big Alpha chuckles, "Of course, it has nothing to do with the fact that you're a bundle of pure mischief."

Before I can respond, we're given a much-needed reminder that we aren't alone. "I think it's time for us to go, Roger." Henry observes, eyeing us with a guarded expression. "Dominic, walk us out?"

"Of course." He deposits me on the couch with a warning to stay put until he returns. I know I should do as he says, but at the same time, I'm impossibly curious about what Henry might have to say to Sinclair after our visit today. Is this something about the Princess's death? Is he angry with us for keeping the secret about my identity for so long? Was he merely being kind when he told me he didn't care if I was human?

As stealthily as I can, I rise from the couch and tiptoe to the door, pressing my ear against the wood and straining to hear the hushed conversation in the entryway.

"What news about the Princess?" Roger asks, his voice slightly muffled by the distance and the shuffling of donning shoes and coats.

“Nothing yet, but I don’t think this was some accident. The timing is too suspicious.” Sinclair replies grimly.

“You don’t think the Prince would have hurt her to help his campaign, surely?” Henry inquires, sounding aghast.

“I wouldn’t put anything past him, Goddess knows he’s beaten her bloody more than a few times over the years... but I don’t know. It feels awfully cunning for his miniscule brains.” Sinclair assesses.

“I agree.” Roger confirms. “So far I haven’t seen him come up with anything more creative than hiring thugs to try to take out the competition.”

“Well, we’ll see what the autopsy says, and I’ll try to get some of my own investigators to look into it as well.” Sinclair shares. “How were things here?”

There’s a tense silence, and then Henry’s voice rises, sounding more authoritative than I’ve ever heard it. “Well you have much bigger problems than the Prince.” He bites, “Do you have any idea what this game of yours is doing to that poor girl?”

“Of course I do.” Sinclair replies sharply, his own voice growing harsh. “And it upsets me more than you could imagine.

“What were you thinking, asking her to get involved in our politics?” Henry scolds, sounding furious “And don’t you tell me it was her idea, she thought she was going to lose her baby. Besides, you knew how dangerous this was going to be from the beginning she didn’t!”

“I also know that without her, I would lose the election.” Sinclair growls back. “I know I don’t need to remind you what the Prince will do to her if he wins – he’s already trying to kill them and he’s come damn close a few times without an army behind him. Besides, you’re the one who taught me my duty comes first. I couldn’t very well put one person over the well-being of the entire realm, no matter how much I care about her.”

“If you’d told me the truth we could have found another way – a she-wolf who could fake a relationship and a pregnancy so Ella could stay hidden.” Henry combats, and I’m amazed to realize that he’s taking my side over his own son’s. He’s defending me, even though I’m just some random human. As touched as I am, I also feel a nearly irresistible compulsion to defend Sinclair. I don’t like the fact that Henry is blaming him for all our problems, he already blames himself enough.

Without thinking, I push through the door and join them in the entryway. Henry and Roger blink in surprise, but Sinclair narrows his eyes at me. “You’re getting stealthier by the day, little one.”

I ignore him, defiantly crossing to stand between him and his father. “I appreciate you standing up for me Henry, but this isn’t all Dominic’s fault. It was my idea, and I wouldn’t take no for an answer. I put myself in this situation with full agency and I don’t regret it.” I continue, looking up at the hulking Alpha behind me. “Yes, I’m stressed and overwhelmed and hormonal, but I’ve survived much worse than this. You have no idea what my life has been, and this is the safest and most secure I’ve ever felt.”

“Ella, you don’t have to do this,” Sinclair tries to say.

“I know that.” I assure him. “And I’m not saying any of this for your sake – I’m saying it because it’s true. I’m an adult, I made my own decision. I know it’s hard to remember that when I’m crying like a baby, but you have to understand that even being free to cry is something I’ve never had before. I’ve always had to do everything myself, I never had the luxury of falling to pieces, I never had anyone to comfort me. It sounds backwards, but the fact that I’m a mess rather than just repressing everything is progress. It’s a good thing, and that’s all down to you, Dominic.”

I can see that he’s recalling my behavior after the attacks at the club and the Wild Hunt, that he can sense the truth in my words. He softens slightly, and I hear Henry sigh behind us. “I’m happy to hear that, Ella.” The elder man begins carefully. “You’re right, I didn’t know. But I still don’t like this.”

“None of us like it, Dad.” This time it’s Roger who’s speaking. “But we all have to make the best with what we have, and we can’t go back now. There’s no space for could’ve, should’ve, would’ve. We just have to keep moving forward together.”

Henry nods. “You’re right. I’m sorry I gave you a hard time, Dominic. I know you wouldn’t do anything to hurt Ella or the baby.”

“Thanks Dad.” Dominic leans down to hug him. “I’ll call you tomorrow. For now, my little human and I need to have a talk about the meaning of bed rest.”

“Good luck Ella.” Henry and Roger laugh, exiting the house and leaving me with one very large, very unamused wolf.

“Well, trouble?” Sinclair asks, crossing his arms over his chest. “What do you have to say for yourself?”

Chapter 103 – Flirtation

Trigger warning – mention of sexual abuse (not explicit)

Ella

I peek up at Sinclair from beneath my lashes, trying to gauge his frustration level. It's obvious. He's displeased that I defied him, but I can tell he's also glad to be home after what was certainly a very long day. Moreover, I think my words to his father helped assuage some of his guilt, and he's feeling more affectionate towards me than he might have a few minutes ago. "I have to say that I missed you?" I profess, sliding my arms around his neck. "And you're the most handsome man in the whole world?"

Sinclair flashes his fangs, emitting a dark chuckle and swinging my legs up into his arms. "Flirting with me isn't going to get you out of this, sweetheart." He ducks his head and steals a kiss before mounting the stairs up to his room, "though it's very cute to watch you try." "Who said I was just flirting?" I object, leaning my head against his chest, "I really did miss you."

Sinclair doesn't pause as he carts me up to the fifth floor, never breaking a sweat or getting short of breath. The way he acts you'd think I'm as light as a feather – though with his supernatural strength it probably feels that way. "I missed you too." He finally replies, pushing through the bedroom door. "I hate being so far from home when these things strike." "You must have had a really rough afternoon." I observe, studying his drawn features and fatigued demeanor.

Sinclair drops onto the sofa, keeping me in his lap, "Rough is an understatement." He sighs, sounding as though the weight of the world is on his shoulders. Of course, this isn't far from the truth. I snuggle closer to him, wishing there was something I could do to ease the monumental burdens he's shouldering. A contented rumble vibrates in his chest, and Sinclair smiles down at me. "It's getting better by the minute though."

I tilt my face up to his, silently asking for a kiss. He arches a brow and for a moment I'm afraid he'll reject my affection, but I needn't have worried. Sinclair lowers his lips to mine, and my heart begins to race. The moment our lips touch electricity zings through my body, setting my nerve endings alight. It's every bit as thrilling and all-consuming as the first time, and I quickly find myself getting carried away in the experience. Unfortunately it ends much too soon. Sinclair pulls back, leaning his forehead against mine and purring, "You can't distract me with kisses either, little one."

He grimaces, and I know I'm not going to like what he says next. "Besides, kissing is a gateway drug. We've got to try to stop." His arms tightened around me as he spoke, as if his body didn't agree with his words or maybe it was his wolf.

Adopting an innocent expression, I reply. "I have no idea what you mean. A gateway to what?"

Sinclair laughs, kissing me again even though he just said we shouldn't. This kiss is longer than the first, because just like he said, it's getting harder and harder to stop the longer we continue. My blood heats to a sultry simmer, and wetness pools at my center as Sinclair's lips, teeth and tongue go to work, making me forget that anything exists outside of this moment Goddess, why couldn't you just be a wolf?" He breathes when we part.

A sharp sting punctures my elated mood, bringing me crashing back down to earth. It's a crushing reminder that I'm not enough for him that I'll never be enough no matter what I do. Seeing the hurt painted over my face, Sinclair winces. "Oh Ella, I'm sorry, I didn't mean that."

"Yes, you did." I murmur, trying to keep my voice steady. "And you're right I'm not."

Sinclair is shaking his head, looking miserable. "I didn't mean that I want you to be anything other than what you already are just that it would mean we could actually be together, and I want that more than I can say."

—

I nod, fighting back tears as I disentangle myself from his arms, and move to the cushion beside him. "It's okay, Dominic, you don't have to explain."

"I shouldn't have said it." Sinclair insists fiercely, reaching for me as if he wants to pull me back into his lap. He stops himself when I stiffen, seeming to realize I need some space at the moment. "I'm truly sorry, Ella."

I nod again, not meeting his gaze. If I try to talk about this now I'm sure I'll start crying, not to mention I'm still so turned on that I'm finding it difficult to sit still. The last thing I need is for Sinclair to know how excited my body is, when he's just hit me in my weak spot.

Sinclair's nostrils flair, and his eyes begin to glow. I wonder if he's scenting my arousal, but a moment later he's cursing and rising to his feet, "I'm going to go take a shower. You should try to get some rest. We can talk about your bed rest tomorrow."

I watch him retreat into the bathroom, feeling strangely dismayed. Apparently flirting and kisses can't get me out of trouble, but acting like a wounded butterfly can.

That's a good thing, right? It means we got away with it. Despite the statement, the little voice in the back of my mind doesn't sound pleased at all.

I know the feeling. Then why in the Goddess's name am I so disappointed?

3rd Person

Across town, in the hallowed halls of the royal palace, the Prince sat in darkness.

The news of his wife's death had been a blow, but the true outrage had come when he learned the medical examiner's analysis. They hadn't conducted an autopsy yet, but the coroner had immediately declared suspicious circumstances upon seeing the Princess's body. Apparently there was some sort of rash on her skin, and the perfume bottle in her hand made him. some kind of topical poison.

suspect

This was unacceptable. The Prince wasn't an overly sentimental man, but his wife was his. The idea that anyone would have the audacity to lay a hand on the Princess – on his property was an unforgivable offense. He couldn't believe that anyone would dare to do something so brazen, and his rage was spiraling out of control. As soon as he figured out who was responsible for this crime, he was going to make sure they paid in the most painful way possible.

He strode to the window then, glaring out at his city. His wolf was pacing back and forth in his head, positively rabid in grief and fury. She hadn't been his fated mate, but he'd claimed her all the same. And though he certainly had other lovers, the Princess was always his favorite.

As Prince he could do anything he wanted with the she-wolves in his bed – whether they liked it or wanted to be there in the first place. But none of the others responded so perfectly as his wife. It truly was like she was made for him she cried when he wanted her to cry, screamed in exactly the right way to make his blood sing, and she never fought or tried to put on a brave front.

While he stood there, growing hard just thinking about the way she'd begged him for the last time they were together, a shaft of light abruptly reflected in the window. The door mercy was opening behind him, and a woman's silhouette appeared in the frame.

It took a moment for him to recognize Lydia, but once he did, he growled, "How did you get in here? I told my guards I wasn't to be disturbed."

"I have my ways." Lydia shrugged, striding into the dim study.

"What do you want?" The Prince demanded.

"I wanted to offer my help." Lydia replied, taking on a gentle tone that didn't suit her in the least. "I know what it's like to have someone taken from me."

"Then you ought to know it's too soon for you to be here." The Prince growled. "It hasn't even been 12 hours."

"Maybe, but I didn't think you would appreciate me keeping the information I possess to myself." Lydia answered. "Since I know who killed the Princess."

The Prince surged to his feet, "Who?"

"Who else, but Dominic?" Lydia barely refrained from rolling her eyes, remembering who she was speaking to at the last moment.

The Prince paused, not convinced. "Why would he? He has to know this will help my campaign."

"I don't think it's about the campaign." Lydia suggested slyly. "It's payback. You've been trying to kill his mate, haven't you?"

The Prince narrowed his eyes. "How do you know that?"

"Because I'm not an idiot. And neither are you – it's exactly what I would do in your shoes." Lydia shared.

"So you're guessing." The Prince observed. "Are you guessing about Dominic too? How do I know he's actually behind this?"

"Because he threatened to kill me – his own fated mate- over the bitch and I never laid a hand on her." Lydia explained.

"But why her, why not come after me directly?" The Prince demanded, admitting to himself that few other people would have the motive to target his wife, even if he didn't understand the bigger picture yet.

"He won't risk the election. He thinks that if he steals the throne by force the Alpha Council will unseat him the way they're unseating your father." Lydia related.

The Prince snorted, Sinclair and his father were one in the same. They wanted the power, but they weren't willing to do what was necessary to keep it. "And how do you expect to help me?" He grouched, eyeing Lydia curiously.

"I know things about Dominic and the Sinclair family. I know their secrets, I know their weak spots I know how they think. And I'll tell you everything for a price."

“And what price is that?” The Prince inquired.

—

“Protection.” Lydia stated simply, deciding that it truly was too soon to suggest he take her as his replacement Luna. All that would come in time, right now she just needed to get her foot in the door. “If you keep me safe, I’ll make sure you win this election.”

The Prince nodded, “You have a deal.”

Chapter 104 – Three Little Words

Ella

“Ella, I love you, but you’re driving me crazy.” My sister’s voice floats through my phone, sounding more exasperated than irritated. After his shower, Sinclair went to his office, and I promptly called my sister for advice.

“What do you mean?” I inquire hesitantly, I’ve just finished explaining

“I mean,” She sighs heavily, “Who are you, and what have you done with my sister? You’ve always known exactly what you wanted and done whatever was necessary to make it happen. You are a strong, independent woman not some bratty, indecisive, emotional basket-case who’s too caught up in a man to know her own heart.” She groans.

I wish I could argue with her assessment of my behavior, but I know she’s right. However, before I can acknowledge as much, she continues, “It’s like: you like Sinclair, you don’t like Sinclair. You want to be with him one moment, and the next you’re trying to foist him off on another woman – just make up your mind! I swear, I don’t even recognize you anymore!”

“Can’t you see that’s the problem! I don’t even recognize myself anymore.” I exclaim, rubbing my sore neck. “My entire life has been turned upside down -”

“I know! Because that’s all you ever talk about anymore.” She bursts, interrupting me. “Do you have any idea when you last asked me about my life? That you showed interest in anything other than your own problems?”

Her words sting, and I realize she’s right. I have been so wrapped up in my own drama that I’ve been neglecting my sister. I hate to think it, but the truth is I don’t have any idea what’s going on with her. “I’m sorry, Cora. What’s going on with you?”

“Nothing, but it would be nice to know you care!” She snaps, sounding more than a little petulant.

And she had the nerve to call us bratty! The little voice in my head observes.

“Are you serious?” I hiss. “People are trying to kill me, Cora. A psychotic bitch drugged and attempted to rape the father of my child. I’m committing a fraud of epic proportions in order to save an entire fucking species from civil war. And you’re pissed because for the first time in our entire lives, I’m not ignoring my own needs to take care of yours?”

“I never asked you to do that!” Cora argues, “you made that choice all on your own.”

“Because I had to!” I growl. “I had to be the strong one because you always fell apart at the first sign of trouble.”

“Then maybe you should have let me fall apart!” Cora counters defensively, “maybe if you had, I would have learned to stand on my own rather than relying on you.”

Nausea seizes my stomach, and I clench my eyes shut. “You know what I went through in order to protect you.” I finally say, my voice hoarse. “Do you really wish that I hadn’t? Was I supposed to stand by and let my sister be abused?”

A shaky breath vibrates against the receiver, and Cora’s voice is small when she speaks again. You know that isn’t what I meant... but I have to live with the guilt of knowing you were hurt because of me. And sometimes I just think that maybe... maybe if you hadn’t protected me then at least we would have been in it together, rather than you being all alone.”

I

“And I would have never forgiven myself if I had.” I share, even as a wave of sorrow swells inside me to learn how she struggles with guilt. “Why haven’t you ever said this to me before?”

“Because you’ve never been willing to talk about it.” Cora scoffs. “I suppose that’s one thing I can thank Dominic for. Trust a bossy wolf to make you finally unlock your emotions.”

“He really did.” I acknowledge wryly. “I think maybe that’s why this is all so hard for me. I feel so... raw. I don’t think I’ve ever been so emotionally vulnerable, and I don’t have the first clue how to cope.”

“I can tell.” She laughs. “And it’s not your fault that you never learned how to handle feelings Ella, but you also have to take responsibility for learning now that you recognize the problem. You do realize this is why you’re having so many issues with Dominic, right?”

“No, it’s that our situation is insane.” I object pointedly. “It’s not like this isn’t the first time I’ve been in love.”

Oh my goddess, I think belatedly. I’m in love. I admitted that I was falling for Sinclair a while ago, but this is the first time I’ve been able to acknowledge that I passed the point of no return even to myself. I’m not just falling, I’m completely in love with Sinclair, and avoiding a relationship with him isn't going to change that.

"I swear El, if you call your relationship with that little weasel love, I will come over there and smack you right in that beautiful face of yours." Cora threatens, completely serious.

"Hey, I know it wasn't great in the end, but it's not like it started out that way." I defend, wondering if I'm being honest even as I say the words. "I did love him."

"Ella, let me ask you something. Did you ever feel even a fraction of what you feel for Dominic, for Mike?" She inquires.

pause. It's been so long since I even thought of Mike, and I've been in such deep denial about. Sinclair that I haven't even considered comparing my feelings for the men. As soon as I think back on the relationship, I see the truth glaring back at me, "No." I exhale sadly. "Never." "And why do you think you believed you were in love with him for all those years?" She presses. "Why do you think you let him treat you so terribly?"

I grimace. "Because I didn't have the first idea what a healthy relationship looked like?" I suggest.

"Bingo." She agrees. "That little shit preyed on you from day one we were just too young and inexperienced to realize it at the time." She has the grace not to say "I told you so." The fact is that Cora tried to warn me about Mike more than once over the years, but I was too stubborn to listen to her. Instead she continues, "I wish I could go back in time and kick him in the balls before he could ever introduce himself to you."

"Me too." I chuckle, shaking my head.

"Now the real question is: What are you going to do about Dominic, now that you've figured all this out?" Cora asks sternly.

"What can I do?" I question, feeling very overwhelmed all of a sudden. "I mean, so what if I do love him? So what if my baggage is causing all these mixed-up feelings? That doesn't change the situation we're in. I can't make myself a wolf, and I can't make him a human or non-alpha I probably wouldn't even if I could, because then he wouldn't be the same man I fell for."

"Are you sure you're not just trying to protect yourself from getting hurt?" Cora questions. "I mean I know you're in hot water with the campaign and everything, but is it possible those are just excuses?"

The gravity of our circumstances looms above me, and I know that we made the right decision. Even so, I'm woman enough to admit that my sister isn't wrong. "I think it's both." I murmur sadly. "I have been afraid, and I haven't trusted him. But Dominic and I don't have the luxury of being selfish we're going to be parents, he's going to be a king. Our responsibility is to the pack and our baby not our feeling:

"That's fair." Cora concedes. "But is knowing that enough to help you move forward and stop torturing yourself?"

"I don't know." I moan. "It just feels so unfinished. We never even talked about our feelings... I mean, he tried and I..."

"Ran away?" Cora surmises. I hum in confirmation, and her voice takes on a sympathetic note. "I'm afraid if you don't make peace with the decision, you're going to keep being confused and indecisive, El. You need closure."

"I wish there was some way for me to get it without making things worse." I agree. "I mean if I tell him, knowing Dominic he'll go all wolfy on me and insist we can find a way to make it work... assuming he even loves me back."

"Hey, he's not the one that's been avoiding this." Cora reminds me. "At the minimum you know he wants you. And I wouldn't discredit him without even giving him a chance to prove. you wrong, Ella. You're making excuses again."

"Maybe." I sigh.

"Maybe definitely." She snorts.

Suddenly, as if a lightbulb goes off in my head, I realize there might be a way for us to steal a night together. "Cora, I just remembered! Wolves can meet in their dreams. I accidentally called Dominic to me once. Maybe if I can figure out how to do it again, I can tell him and we can be together without complicating reality."

"That's amazing!" She exclaims, "Do you think you can figure it out?" "I don't know, but I'm certainly going to try."

Chapter 105 – Dream Shift

Ella

As I start to doze, I force my brain to think of nothing but Sinclair, willing myself to dream of him. I don't let my mind focus on anything else or get distracted, I just keep telling myself to call Sinclair, to make him come to me.

Darkness closes in, and then I'm back on that bed in the forest. Yes! I think, this is where we were last time! It worked!

It takes a few minutes for Sinclair to appear, but I tell myself to just be patient. He wasn't asleep yet in the real world. I have to wait for him to rest to see him this way.

I'm not sure how much time actually passes, but eventually he comes stalking through the trees. He's in his wolf form this time, but he shifts when he reaches the bed, giving me a tender smile. "Hello trouble."

"Hi." I answer, feeling suddenly shy. "I wasn't sure this would work."

"You mean you meant to call me this time?" He inquires, arching a brow.

I nod, feeling a hot flush work up my cheeks. "I want to tell you something."

"Okay." Sinclair replies, coming to sit on the plush duvet, but not reaching for me the way he usually does. A moment of doubt plagues my heart, but I'm sure he's just trying to use restraint.

I'm fidgeting, and staring at my hands in my lap, but I slowly work up the courage to speak." I know I've been all over the place lately, and I wish I could tell you that it was all the pregnancy, or all the stress of our situation... but the truth is that it's a lot more than that. Those things are making all this more difficult, but I would have been a mess anyway."

Taking a deep breath, I continue, "You know I was orphaned, and that I never really got a childhood as a result. But I also never experienced love from anyone but Cora. I was so starved for it, that I basically jumped at the first chance I had. I spent years just trying to get over my fear of men, and in hindsight, I'm not sure I ever really did. I think maybe I just got so desperate for some affection that I simply closed my eyes and leapt, and of course the person who caught me was Mike. I was a perfect mark for him young, naive, and willing to do anything to finally feel wanted. I had no idea what a healthy relationship was, and he groomed me to believe that everything he did and said to me was normal."

Sinclair is frowning deeply, and I can see questions weighing on his tongue, but he holds them back. "Of course, I eventually wised up... and then I met you." I share, my voice suddenly very small. "And my heart trusted you even though my brain screamed at me not to. Everything I've experienced in my life conditioned me to believe that if I let myself be vulnerable with you you would break me. It taught me to believe I wasn't worth love, so anyone showing me kindness must be out to trick me. So I tried to convince myself that what I've been feeling with you wasn't real. And at the same time, all those parts of me that I kept buried for so long burst out because my body somehow knew you wouldn't hurt me if I acted like a child, or broke down and let you see my sadness and anger. It knew you wouldn't use those things as weapons against me."

"You've been so patient and accepting. You've taken care of me like no one ever has even when I hate you for it. But I still couldn't tell you." There are tears in my eyes now, and I can see Sinclair's closed fists trembling with barely held restraint. His wolf is still glowing in his eyes, and I know how hard he's trying to let me simply speak my fill without interruption. I've been a coward. I've been hiding behind the challenges facing us, using them as excuses to avoid ever having to be brave... Even when you've tried to tell me your own feelings, my brain just defaulted to defending myself. I knew if you told me, I wouldn't be strong enough to resist."

And I know nothing has changed and that a relationship is still impossible for us... but I don't want to be a coward anymore. I want to be brave just once in my life." I take a deep breath as I continue, "So I thought that if I could tell you here... that if we could be together in our dreams, then maybe it wouldn't hurt so badly that we can't be together in real life." I explain, tears spilling down my cheeks.

"I'm... I'm in love with you, Dominic." I whisper, too timid to look him in the eye.

There's a pregnant pause filled with the sound of my pounding heart and my blood rushing in my ears. Then Sinclair's hand is reaching towards me. He catches my chin between his thumb and forefinger, pulling my gaze up to his. I sob when I see the expression on his face. His eyes are shining not with his wolf – but with tears. There's so much affection and understanding on his rugged features, that I feel like he's wrapped me in a hug without even touching me. "I love you, Ella. I think I've been in love with you from the moment your stomped your tiny foot on me. You have no idea how hard it's been to hold my wolf back." "Really?" I sniffle, because even though I was expecting him to tell me he had feelings, I wasn't prepared for love. I certainly wasn't prepared to hear that his wolf wanted me too. My stubborn mind is still amazed the man could be interested in me, let alone his inner animal. "Really." He confirms firmly, "and if you don't get over here and into my arms this instant, I'm going to let my wolf out so he can pounce on you."

Something inside of me perks up at this thought. I remember all Sinclair's warnings not to run from him at the Wild Hunt, and I remember how thrilling it had been to be chased... until everything went wrong. I think we need a do over. The voice in my head suggests slyly. And I can't help but agree.

I think Sinclair can sense my mischief, because his eyes narrow at me with suspicion as I lean towards him on the bed. Luckily, while he might sense I'm up to something, he doesn't realize what. At first I worry he might reach for me before I can jump onto the ground, but when I change direction at the last moment, he's not quite fast enough to catch me. I immediately break into a sprint, and at first I hear the low rumble of Sinclair's laughter. A moment later, however, I hear his wolf's howl, and I know the hunt is on.

As I start to run, I feel the same intoxicating exhilaration that consumed me at the Wild Hunt. My legs stretch as far and fast as I can make them move, and I'm amazed at how much ground I begin to cover. The night wind whips through my hair as I dash through the trees, an ecstatic smile stretching across my features as my feet crash into the snow.

Somehow I'm not the least bit bothered by the cold, and when Sinclair's howl shatters the night, it's all I can do to stay on my feet. I stop and shudder every time he does it, but it only drives me to run faster and farther to force him to prove himself by catching me.

I don't know where these instincts came from, and while I might not be able to explain them, there's no denying how right this feels. Why have I never run barefoot through the woods before? Why have I never bathed in the light of the moon? Every second I spend in this wonderful wilderness makes me feel as though I've been living in the wrong skin my entire life-like a piece of my soul has been returned even though I never realized it was missing.

I'm so caught up in the race that I don't even notice when my body begins to blur around the edges. My bones quake, my soul soars, and suddenly everything changes. A starburst of white light consumes me, and for a moment I'm blinded by its brilliance. When my feet hit the ground again, there are four, and I seem much lower to the ground. I look down in shock, amazed to discover fur covered paws where my hands used to be. I glance behind me to discover a bushy, white tipped tail swinging behind me, helping me maintain my balance as I speed through the darkness.

I'm a wolf.

I don't let the change slow me down. This is a dream after all of course magical things are possible. I can move so much faster on four legs, and if I still had the ability to laugh aloud I'm sure I'd be overflowing with euphoric giggles. Instead I howl gleefully into the chill air, leaping over the fallen branches and rocks dotting the forest floor. I'm free, I'm free!!! The voice in my head cries, loping gracefully through the wintry landscape, determined to never stop.

A deep, familiar howl sends me stumbling. I was so thrilled to transform that I almost forgot about Sinclair. I suppose my own howl tipped him off. It wasn't meant to – I was only celebrating. My conscience pouts.

I know, but now he's onto us. I think quickly. We have to move.

I don't know why it's so important that I don't let Sinclair catch me, but right now the only thought in my head is to get away. I have to make it as difficult for him as possible... for some reason. That's no problem, my inner voice brags, now that I'm free he'll have his work cut out for him. He might be big, but I'm fast.

Then let's go! I insist, spurring her on. Within seconds we're galloping through the snow, even faster than before. Somewhere in the back of my mind it occurs to me to cover my tracks, but I realize Sinclair will be following my scent anyway. It's hard for me to focus on him as distracting as he usually is my heart is soaring and for once it has nothing to do with the Alpha. I can't believe I thought I'd felt free on the night of the hunt. I'm beginning to realize I didn't even know the meaning of the word until now.

My paws, paws, can you believe it!? splash through the ice of a frozen creek, but I carry on without a care in the world. After all, wolves don't have to worry about silly things like frostbite I even have fur between my toes!

I can hear everything too! I can hear the distant pounding of Sinclair's feet, the low calls of owls flying overhead, and even mice and rabbits burrowing in the ground beneath my feet, with all their clicks and tiny squeaks. Then there are the smells who knew water had a smell! Sinclair's smell is more familiar, but it's doing things to this form which are nothing short of scandalous. The stronger it becomes, the more my insides seem to turn to mush, and wetness pools between my legs.

Too late, I realize why his scent has grown so strong.

He's caught up. One moment I'm flying through the night like a wild thing, the next I'm skidding to a stop when he bursts out of the trees ahead of me I what! How did you do that? I demand

To my amazement, his own voice rings in my head, Because, sweet Ella, I'm a hunter. I know how to drive my prey into a trap without them knowing. Besides, He adds, his deep rumble softening with affection, You were too caught up reveling in the fact that water has a smell to notice.

How do you know that? I inquire suspiciously, not sure how I'm managing to communicate with him.

You were shouting it at the top of your lungs. He informs me smugly.

Hmph. I narrow my eyes at the cocky Alpha, trying not to think about how powerful he is in this form – how majestic. My body is urging me towards him like we're a pair of magnets, but my wolf isn't ready to give up. We're not done running yet, and if he wants to catch us, he's going to have to do more than stage an ambush. I lunge towards the trees on my left, but Sinclair bounds forward in a single, graceful leap. He's blocking my path, so I try to lunge in the opposite direction. To my fury he manages to block me again.

Glaring at him, I glance at his massive body, realizing that his legs are so long that I could probably slide right beneath him. Pure mischief fills me to the brim, and I pretend to timidly approach him. Sinclair isn't convinced, watching me with the same ravenous hunger he always manages to evoke in his human form.

I've almost reached him when I dive between his legs, sliding on my belly through the snow and thanking the goddess for the slight slope which lets me slip right between his proverbial fingers. Overjoyed with my own brilliance, I rise to take off again, but before I can a huge heavy weight pins me to the ground.

Such a clever little she-wolf. Sinclair's deep voice is all praise, and I can feel his tongue swiping kisses across the back of my neck.

Still, I'm not amused to have him interrupting my fun. I bare my fangs, and scowl at him. over my shoulder, a pint-sized growl rumbling in my own chest.

And so vicious. From the sounds of it you'd think I was as cute as a button, and not a dangerous predator with built-in knives in my mouth and paws. But you're caught, baby. It's time to shift.

Chapter 106 – Caught

Ella

No, I just got out! My wolf rails defiantly. I want to run more! Let me go!

The kisses cease, and now Sinclair's fangs close around my scruff, applying pressure.

I immediately realize what he's doing. If he applies enough pressure – especially if he lifts me off the ground-I'll be completely immobilized. I said shift!

I don't want to! You can be a wolf whenever you want – but this is my only chance. I protest fiercely, snarling as ferociously as I can. Let me go you big bully.

I can tell the games are over now. Sinclair pulls me up, and suddenly I'm hanging from his jaws, my feet kicking helplessly. Yield Ella! I feel his authoritative growl deep in my bones, and even though I didn't agree to surrender, my rebelling limbs suddenly still. I go limp, and when Sinclair returns me to the ground I roll onto my back, showing him my belly.

Good girl. Sinclair's huge black wolf gazes down at me, his emerald eyes blazing with unbridled emotion.

My wolf whimpers in my head. Why does his praise make me feel so incredible?

Because you're mine. His gravelly voice answers, and I realize that I've spoken aloud again. Mine, mine, mine. Before I can think more about his statement, Sinclair is groaning in my head, just look at you, he croons. Al rose gold and sass. I know he's talking about my fur now, which is the same metallic sheen as my strawberry blonde hair.

And your little white tummy. He adds, nuzzling the patch of white fluff above my navel.

Mmm, my pup. My Ella. He sounds like a caveman, but his next words prove his mind is as sharp as ever.

Shift mate, it's time to finish this.

Finish this? I practically squeak.

Oh yes, Sinclair confirms darkly, his words are so animalistic that I tremble in response. I'm going to mark and claim you before you can get away again. You're mine, and the whole world is going to know it.

All at once, I realize that the Sinclair I know is not in control. This is his wolf talking now, and suddenly I realize why he warned me not to run from him on the night of the Wild Hunt. The rational part of my brain understood. at least I thought it did... but it's one thing to imagine it, and a very different matter to experience it.

The last time I met his wolf, I hadn't been able to hear Sinclair's thoughts. I hadn't understood how different the two beings were – though it makes perfect sense that his most primal self would come out when his inner animal is in charge. Still, I can hardly recognize the Sinclair I've come to know and love in the beast towering over me. Then again, I hardly recognize myself right now. This is all so surreal.

He wants to claim us. My own wolf swoons, yes, yes, yes!

Listen to her, mate. Sinclair orders, she knows what you need.

I shiver With anticipation, but as soon as I contemplate shifting I realize that we have a problem. Dominic, I don't know how to shift. I don't even know how this happened.

Sinclair's hulking black wolf studies me for a moment, before nodding once in understanding and determination. Don't be afraid, sweet one. I'm going to help.

Before I can contemplate what this might mean, a wave of pure Alpha energy washes over me.

Sinclair lifts his muzzle and howls into the night, and my body shudders and jerks, slowly returning to its human form. I feel a sudden and devastating loss to be back in this skin, but the next thing I know Sinclair is a man once more. He bends down and scoops me up in his arms, carrying me back towards the bed we abandoned at the beginning of the dream.

I'm staring at the bed with wide eyes, amazed to think that we're finally going to be together the way I've been dreaming about for so many months.

Do you have any idea how long I've been waiting for this? Sinclair asks huskily, dipping his head close to mine.

Feeling far braver than I can ever remember being, I grin. Yes, but that's done now.

We don't have to wait a moment longer.

His own beam is full of sultry promise. Thank the Goddess.

My heart is hammering against my ribcage as Sinclair lays me down on the plush coverlet, and for the first time, I realize I'm naked. My night dress must have shredded when I shifted, and though I've been naked with this man dozens of times before, this is... different. It feels so momentous, because I know this time will be unlike any of the others.

Sinclair towers over me, his heated gaze raking over every inch of my bared flesh as if he's been starving for the sight of me. It feels impossibly vulnerable, to be spread out in front of him like a feast to be devoured. I've never known a man who could light me on fire with a single look, but Sinclair manages it without even trying.

I allow myself to peruse his own form in return.

I've always avoided this in the past, but now I let my gaze travel south of the contoured muscles of his abdomen, to the huge, hard length standing at attention against his navel. I can feel my eyes widen in alarm – I've always known that Sinclair is twice my size, but this just seems like overkill.

There is no way that thing will fit inside me.

Then the wolf's deep laughter is washing over me. A fresh rush of defiance sparks in my chest, and I briefly consider fleeing, but Sinclair shakes his head, still laughing.

"Oh no you dont, you naughty girl. You've surrendered. That means you're mine to do with as I wish."

"Tyrant." I accuse, shooting him a sulky look.

"Little wolf, you haven't seen anything yet." He responds ominously. "You're just lucky I'm not putting you over my knee for running like that."

"Oh please, you know you wanted to chase me." I quip saucily, keenly aware of the way he continues to survey my body, a lethal glint in his green eyes.

It feels incredible to know that I have this power over him, that his huge member is hard and pulsing just for me. Feeling devious, I shift on the bed, stretching out my legs and arching my back a bit, showing off my charms. For the first time in a and from very long time, I'm enjoying my beauty the low purr Sinclair emits, so is he.

"You trying to tempt me, minx?" He rumbles appreciatively, the corner of his mouth quirking up. "Don't you know that isn't necessary? I need no encouragement to eat you up."

The sound of his pleasure encourages me, and I bat my lashes, adopting an innocent tone. “You could have fooled me – you’re taking forever.” I trail my fingers down the valley between my breasts, drawing his eyes to their path. “You haven’t even touched me yet.”

A fierce growl rips from his chest, and the next thing I know he’s pounced. I suppose it serves me right for challenging his wolf, but I’m not complaining. He settles in the bed with me, balancing his weight on his elbows and settling his hips between my spread thighs. Sinclair lowers his head, his lethal grace belying the crushing force he applies as he slams his mouth into mine.

Any thoughts I had of teasing him further disappear the moment our lips connect. I immediately yield to his dominance, feeling butterflies that have nothing to do with the baby I’m carrying, explode in my belly. I give myself to Sinclair freely, parting my lips to let his tongue delve into my mouth.

I wrap my arms around his neck, nibbling on his lower lip and earning a playful growl in return. The world spins and freezes at once, and all my nerve endings are frayed by the surge of electricity he’s sending through my veins. When Sinclair tries to draw his lips away I chase them, suddenly incapable of remembering how to breathe without him.

He tsks and shushes me with stern affection, kissing his way down my body. He pauses to lave the soft spot behind my ear, and then to suck each of my beaded nipples into his mouth.

I’m not sure if it’s the pregnancy, or if it’s just Sinclair, but I swear I could come from this stimulation alone. His talented tongue flicks over the hard nubs, sending pulses of desire straight to my core. I wonder if Sinclair is still able to hear my thoughts, because he sets up camp here and doesn't move on until I'm whining and moaning in desperation.

Finally he moves down and hooks his arms beneath my thighs, though he still doesn't show me mercy. Instead he nibbles the inside of my thighs, moving closer and closer to my center and drawing away at the last moment. Seeming to know exactly how badly I need his touch, his own mischievous streak takes over. "Every time I've scented your desire, I've dreamed of this." He informs me, "of tasting the source. I kept telling myself you couldn't possibly taste as sweet as you smell, but I can already tell I was fooling myself."

"Dominic, please!" I finally beg, feeling close to tears.

"Poor darling, why didn't you ask sooner?" He teases. I want to reach down and smack him, but before I can he sucks my needy clit into his mouth, and I explode.

For someone who has never reached Orgasm with a partner at all, Sinclair's skill is overwhelming.

He's only just touched my most intimate flesh, and I'm already falling to pieces. Maybe it's just been a long time coming, and it's certainly true that my body has been wound tight as a spring amidst the sexual tension building in our relationship. Still, I'm seeing stars and all I know is that Sinclair is to blame.

The most devastating part is that he doesn't stop there. I'm still reeling from my release, panting and trying to push him away from my sensitive skin, when he simply dives deeper. One thick finger enters me as his tongue continues to devour me, and I can only whimper. “Dominic, it’s too much.”

Another deep chuckle meets my ears, and I know I’m in real trouble. “Sweet, naive mate, we’ve only just begun.”

At that, a second finger stretches my channel, thrusting and scissoring apart in a movement that tells me he’s trying to make space for the massive member between his legs. I forget how to breathe, and when the vibrating motion of Sinclair’s tongue is joined by the crook of his fingers inside of me, I fall over the edge again, crying out.

“That’s it.” He praises me. “Come for me, Ella.

Good girl.”

I barely know my own name by the time he looms above me again, claiming my mouth so that I can taste my own honey on his tongue. Velvet wrapped steel presses at my entrance, so thick I’m sure it will never fit, but little by little Sinclair eases his cock into me – proving me wrong.

With endless patience, he rocks into my heat, and too late I realize his thickness wasn’t the true problem. His length seems endless, and I’m sure I can feel him in my throat. By the time Sinclair has buried himself in my sheath, I’m a heartbeat away from coming again – though such a thing should be impossible.

“Fvck Ella,” Sinclair swears, dropping his head to the crook of my neck. “It’s like you were made for me.”

I disagree, though I don’t say it. Any woman made for Sinclair would surely be closer to his own size.

And though he is so large that I'm fairly certain I'll be ruined for all other men, I can't deny how delicious it feels to be possessed by this powerful Alpha.

Sinclair begins to move, thrusting in and out of my slick heat with a feral energy that might have frightened me mere weeks ago, but now I simply wrap my legs around his back, urging him deeper.

His pace increases, and his thrusts tilt upward, slamming into that special spot inside me.

I fall over the edge again, and Sinclair purrs, "greedy girl, haven't you come enough yet?"

I can only whimper, because by now I've realized that I'm a complete goner. My body belongs to Sinclair now, and I'm just along for the ride.

I lose track of time, so consumed in the feelings coursing through me that I can't even remember my own name. I know only that I'll never be the same – in dreams or reality. Sinclair encourages and praises me every step of the way, even though he must know that no woman can withstand this much pleasure – at least, no human woman.

His thrust become more and more forceful, and then I feel his fangs at my throat. He waits until the moment is perfect, until I'm teetering on the edge of an Orgasm stronger than all the others. I'm beside myself, but he seems completely determined. Just as I topple over the edge, he sinks his canines into the tender flesh where my neck meets my shoulder, marking me as his own.

White lights burst in my vision, and warmth floods my body. I'm finally complete.

Chapter 107 – Claimed

Ella

My eyes jerk open, and I surge up in bed.

A moment ago Sinclair was buried inside me – in more ways than one. My hand frantically clamps down on the spot where my neck meets my shoulder. I can still feel Sinclair’s fangs slicing into my flesh, but there doesn’t seem to be a wound in reality.

I’m not bleeding, and it doesn’t hurt – though it hadn’t hurt in the dream either. All of a sudden I’m remembering Sinclair’s ominous words about how a mating mark wouldn’t hurt if it was timed right, and now I understand all too well.

I’m still on an emotional high from the dream, I can’t believe I became a wolf! It had been the most incredible feeling, unlike anything I could have imagined. And then there was Sinclair. My body is flushed with heat, and my heart is still pounding.

It felt so real, and I’m so glad that we stole that moment. At the same time, I wonder if the sex was only so good because it was a fantasy? It had to be, there’s no way anyone could actually be that amazing in real life... right?

The more I think about it, reliving every touch, every word we spoke, I quickly find myself crashing back down to earth. I’m so grateful and ecstatic that it happened, but I’m very quickly feeling depressed that it’s over. Before those feelings can truly take hold, however, I hear pounding footsteps. In the blink of an eye Sinclair is there, standing in the doorway and raking his eyes over me in concern.

“Ella” my name is a relieved sigh on his lips. I realize that he must have fallen asleep in his study, rather than coming to bed – but he’s here now. He crosses the floor quickly, reaching for me as soon as he’s close enough. “Are you alright? You disappeared from the dream so quickly!”

I nod weakly, my face framed in his hands. I’m still feeling sad that our stolen night has come to an end, but I don’t want Sinclair to know just how pitiful I’m feeling. “I don’t know what happened, one moment we were...” I trail off, flushing, “and the next I was here.”

“Goddess, I can’t believe this. Come here” Sinclair settles on the bed, pulling me into his lap. He presses a lingering kiss to my upturned mouth, then rests his forehead against mine, gazing lovingly into my eyes. “My poor little mate, you didn’t even get a chance to come back down to earth.”

Pain blooms in my chest to hear him calling me his mate, but I snuggle in, eager to steal a few extra moments of affection. “Well maybe if you hadn’t ravished me so completely I wouldn’t need so much recovery time.”

“Surely you aren’t complaining about too much pleasure?” Sinclair teases, kissing me again. “If you weren’t such an insatiable little thing then I wouldn’t have had to work so hard to satisfy you.”

I start to laugh at his ridiculous statement, but just as quickly, it verges on a sob.

“Don’t.” I plead, “I’m already struggling to cope with the fact that it’s over.”

“Over?” Sinclair repeats. “What are you talking about?” He pulls back far enough to stare down at me in disbelief. “Stars, Ella don’t you realize what this means?”

“It doesn’t mean anything.” I argue. “It was just a dream, that was the point. A way for us to get closure without complicating things in the real world.”

“Ella, you shifted, you became a wolf! That wouldn’t have been possible if you were truly a human.” He reasons, as if it should be obvious. “But I am a human.” I remind him, feeling increasingly frustrated.

To my utter shock, Sinclair’s face lights up like a firework. He’s grinning down at me so widely it’s difficult not to return the expression, “No baby, I don’t think you are. I was too caught up in claiming you in the dream, but now that my wolf is satisfied I can think a bit more clearly. Don’t you see – this would explain everything: the reason I was so interested in you before you even became pregnant; the fact that you were able to conceive my child; how obstinate my wolf has been about claiming you; your smell; how wolfish your behavior is.” He continues excitedly. “I’ve been attributing everything to the baby because I didn’t have any other explanation, but now it finally makes sense.”

“What makes sense?” I exclaim, not following his logic at all. It seems like he’s operating with far more information than I possess myself. “And what do you mean you were interested in me before, and that your wolf wanted to claim me?”

Sinclair chuckles, and I have to fight the urge to growl at him. “I’m sorry sweetheart, I forgot you didn’t know. Yes, I always noticed you- it was annoyingly distracting every time I caught sight of you in the neighborhood. Every time I did, I’d end up thinking about you for hours afterwards, and I even started hoping I would run into you and the kids. I never did anything about it because I thought you were human.”

“Then why the hell were you such a jerk to me about Cora, and when we found out I was pregnant?” I demand grumpily.

Sinclair exhales heavily. “I was in a bad place. I’m not proud of the way I acted, and I know there’s no excuse for it. I can only say that I was an idiot. But my wolf is the reason I agreed to your plans in the first place, that’s what I meant when I said I’ve been holding him back. He wanted you for his own long before I was willing to acknowledge my feelings for you.”

“I still can’t believe you love me.” I whisper, feeling shy now. I told myself those sentiments would stay in the dream, but there’s a very silly, insecure part of me that needs to hear it again. As if I’m afraid the dream was just my imagination, even though I know it wasn’t.

Sinclair’s expression softens, his eye crinkling at the edges. “How could I not?” He croons, making me melt. “You’re everything I could hope for in a mate, Ella.” I’m thrilled to hear these words, but I’m also confused. I know I’m being very slow on the uptake, and it’s hard not to feel stupid, but I simply don’t understand what he’s on about. I would know if I wasn’t human, wouldn’t I? Seeing my expression, some of the elation fades from Sinclair’s features. “I should have looked into this ages ago. but I suppose hindsight is 20/20. In very rare cases, it’s possible for wolves to be hidden, buried so that a person doesn’t even know it’s there.”

“How?” I press eagerly, seeming to need this answer as badly as I need to breathe.

Sinclair removes one of his hands from my body in order to rub the back of his neck, and I find myself glaring at the movement, affronted that he took away the comfort of his touch. Sinclair catches the look on my face and arches a foreboding brow, forcing me to soften and avert my gaze. It feels the way it had when I showed him my belly in the dream, and I understand that something inside me is instinctively responding to his dominance.

Only once I've submit, does he continue. "The strange thing about all this is that normally when a wolf is dormant, it's manifested in children who were separated from both their family and the pack. They grow up thinking they're human, but when they reach puberty and go through their first shift, their wolf drives them to find their own kind." He grimaces. "We call it dormant, but really it's just when a child is too disconnected to know why they're different. When they eventually figure it out a young teenager shows up at a pack's doorstep – confused and traumatized to be sure, but finally understanding why they've always been an outsider among humans. I've never heard of a case where someone reached adulthood without their wolf manifesting."

"But you think that's what's happened to me?" I clarify, needing to hear him say it.

"You think I'm a wolf, and somehow that part of me just hasn't been able to come out?"

"Yes, trouble." Sinclair beams, all the confusion and mystery forgotten for a moment.

When he looks at me this way I feel like I'm the center of his entire universe, and 'll be damned if it isn't addictive. "I don't know how or why yet, but it's fairly clear to me that you're the one I've been waiting for all along. The Goddess sent you to carry this pup because you're my second chance mate."

His hand moves to my belly, and Rafe kicks in reply. "You can be my Luna. We can finally be together – and not only in our dreams."

"Really?" I squeak, not wanting to believe my ears, just in case they're wrong.

"Really." He confirms. "We're going to figure out how this happened, and then we're going to wake your wolf for real.”

Chapter 108 – DNA Test

Ella

Sinclair and I stay up late into the night talking, reveling in this new discovery. I'd believed our dream date would give us closure, but it turns out it wasn't the end at all – it was the beginning. "It's no wonder you've been feeling so off-kilter."

Sinclair consoles, trailing his fingers up and down my naked back. When he'd started stripping me, I thought we were going to make love again something I was only too eager to experience outside of my dreams.

Unfortunately he'd informed me that his wolf wouldn't be able to resist marking me for real, so we'd better wait until we know it's safe. Of course as soon as he mentioned claiming me, the little voice in my head had gone wild with excitement. I'd attempted to change his mind, showing off my curves and plying him with kisses.

However when my hand snuck down to close around his hard length, he'd put a quick stop to my tricks, seizing the offending limbs and pinning me in place. I'd whined and growled, but he only growled back, giving my bottom a few hard swats.

Now I'm sprawled across his chest, chastised and sulking, and he clearly thinks he can make me feel better by sympathizing – the tyrant. "It's not just the pregnancy or the stress. You've finally found your own kind, and your inner wolf has been coming out more and more."

I sniff, preparing to argue, but then his words sink in. My inner wolf.. the little voice in my head.. she's the one that's been urging me to behave so oddly lately. I can never recall her being so vocal before, or so unreasonable. I always assumed it was my conscience, but in hindsight... are consciences usually so defiant? Do they usually have personalities of their own, and feel separate and part of you at the same time?

Suddenly I remember how that same inner voice had cried out her joy at being free when I shifted in the dream. Conscience? I think hesitantly. Are... are you my wolf?

Well duh. She responds dryly. It certainly took you long enough to figure it out. Why didn't you tell me! I exclaim in reply, exasperated. I thought you knew! You're always talking to me! She counters hotly. Sinclair is watching me closely, a knowing look on his face. "Wolves can be very contrary at times."

"I... I've always had this voice." I share softly, my eyes wide, "I had no idea." He nods. "When you grow up among wolves your elders teach you that voice is your inner animal, that's part of why it's so important that shifters are raised among their packs."

"I still don't understand." I admit, feeling completely overwhelmed. "If this is all real, then why did I ever shift when I was old enough, why is she only coming out now?"

"I hate to say it, Ella." Sinclair begins gravely. "But I think it's likely that someone did this to you.. that they bound your wolf so she couldn't get out."

"What do you mean?" I inquire, my muscles tensing nervously. "You have to understand that if a pack knows a child exists and something happens to their parents, then the pup will be placed with a relative or a shifter family willing to foster them.

Our children are incredibly important to us, and it would be neglect of the worst kind to knowingly let them be raised among humans.

The only time it happens is when the parents didn't have any connections in the shifter world, usually they're rogues or outside their own territory. Every case I've ever heard of a dormant wolf begins with a child being found by humans at the sight of an accident, or wandering unattended in the wilderness or a strange city." Sinclair explains stroking my hair with a pitying expression. "Okay." I nod, not sure where this is going. "So maybe my parents were from a different pack?"

He shakes his head. "Sweetheart, I looked into your records at the orphanage when all this began. You weren't found by the humans... you were given to them. Your parents surrendered you directly to the orphanage. There weren't any names in the file – which shouldn't have been allowed, but it's part of why I never entertained the idea that you might be a wolf. I thought if you were dormant it would have shown years ago, and that no shifters would ever give their pup to the humans." It surprises me how badly this information hurts.

I'd never known my family history – I left the orphanage before I reached adulthood, and it wasn't the institution's policy to share details like this with children. Still, I don't know any orphan who hasn't concocted a fantasy that their parents would come for them one day. No one wants to believe they were just abandoned... unwanted."

"Why didn't you tell me?" "Because I thought it was in the past, and that it would only hurt you." Sinclair frowns, using the pad of his thumb to wipe away a rogue tear. "But now that we know the truth... it suggests that something much bigger is going on here, Ella. I think your parents must have been trying to hide you for some reason, and they cut you off from your wolf to make sure you wouldn't be found"

"So how do we find out for sure?" I ask, not sure how to feel about this idea. Is it worse to just be abandoned, or for people who are supposed to love you most, to intentionally cut you off from your true soul?

Sinclair hugs me close, seeing how badly I need his comfort. "We get a DNA test, to start.” He proclaims. “And then we take it one step at a time.”

The next morning I find myself sitting in the familiar doctor’s office, with two very serious looking wolves towering over me. The nearest one, Sinclair, looks as if he’s trying to glower the physician into the ground, and I suspect he’s feeling particularly protective after watching the man withdraw my blood. Apparently his wolf can’t stand seeing me bleed, even if it’s just for a test.

I lean into his side, not sure whether it’s to soothe him or myself. “Well, it’s confirmed.” The doctor confirms, “You’re a wolf, Ella.”

Sinclair’s arm squeezes my shoulders, and I feel his lips graze my hair. “Then why didn’t I know, why can’t I shift?” I inquire, only sounding a little petulant.

“I don’t know.” He purses his lips regretfully. “All this test tells us is that you have shifter DNA. I can refer you to a geneticist to try and decipher a particular family line, traits, whether you’re an alpha or omega, but unless someone else in your family has given samples, we won’t know who you are or how this happened. That’s probably something you’ll have to figure out yourself.”

“Do you know how we can wake her inner wolf completely?” Sinclair questions. “It’s obviously been coming out since we met, especially with the baby, but it’s still buried deep.”

“Well the bad news is that you’ll probably have to wait until your pup is born.” The physician informs us. As soon as your wolf does wake, you’ll probably go into your first shift. Normally it’s perfectly safe for breeding she-wolves to shift because it’s instantaneous. But a first shift breaks all the bones and tears muscles – as you know, Alpha. There’s no telling what it would do to the baby.”

“But I shifted in the dream, and that was instant.” I remind Sinclair.

“It’s not the same, sweetheart.” Sinclair shakes his head sadly. “Pups can dream as their wolves too, the first time is still awful.”

“You mean I have to give birth and have all my bones broken sometime in the near future?” I demand indignantly. Before Sinclair can reply, the doctor chimes in, let’s just hope it’s not the same day, Ella.”

“What?” both of our heads jerk towards the man, and my heart stalls in my chest. “Well, uh – that’s the thing.” The doctor hedges, watching Sinclair warily. A low growl is rumbling steadily in the Alpha’s chest, and I wonder if it wasn’t meant to be a purr to calm me, only he wasn’t calm enough himself to manage it. “A couple of things could wake her wolf naturally. If you were to claim her as your mate, or giving birth.

It's also possible that neither of those things will do it and you'll have to find another way." He holds up his hands. "These are just guesses mind you, but the fact that her wolf has been coming out in response to you and the baby would indicate that her mate or he child might be enough to break whatever binds her wolf. So if birth triggers it, it might be... well, back-to-back."

"Why would you tell her that with so little tact." Sinclair snarls. "She's already under enough stress. " "I'm sorry, Alpha, these are uncharted waters for all of us." The doctor says, tucking an invisible tail between his legs. "It just came out."

"And I suppose you have no idea how we might bring out her wolf if those things don't work?" Sinclair interrogates through gritted teeth.

"No. I've never seen a case like this. I think you need to go to the elders, if anyone knows about this kind of magic, it's them."

Sinclair growls, scooping me up off the table. "

Then we'll go to the elders."

Chapter 109 – The Elder

Ella

“What do you mean she’s not a wolf?” The elder to whom Sinclair brought me to meet looks vaguely familiar, and I’m sure I’ve met him at some event or another. Still, I’m in such a daze with all this new information, that I can barely keep up. I feel like my brain isn’t working properly anymore. I feel slow and stupid, but Sinclair is beside me every step of the way, being patient and loving, scowling every time I suggest there’s anything wrong with my mind.

Now this elder is looking at us with barely contained horror, and I can only burrow deeper into Sinclair’s arms. I’m in his lap again, though again isn’t really correct – since he hasn’t put me down once. I’m technically still on bedrest, but I’m not complaining. I feel safe when I’m in his embrace, and I need that security now more than ever. “She is, but it’s dormant. We only just found out.” Sinclair sighs, scrubbing a hand over his face. He slowly shares our story with the older man, all the way from the beginning.

With every word out of Sinclair’s mouth, the elder pales a little further. When he’s finally caught up, he glowers, “You should have come to me the moment she conceived, I could have told you no human could bear a shifter child. You young pups,” He shakes his head in exasperation, “You think you know everything!”

“I’m hardly a pup.” Sinclair responds dryly, though he doesn’t truly seem bothered. The elder looks down his nose at him. “I’d already been roaming this world a hundred years by the time you were born, boy. I might not have your power, but I possess wisdoms you could only dream about.” My eyes widen when I hear him share his age.

I knew that shifters lived longer than humans, but I didn’t realize it was this long. The man in front of me only looks about seventy.

“That’s why we’re here now, Adolpho” Sinclair answers smoothly. “I didn’t come before because I thought protecting the secret was too important.” His hand trails to my tummy, setting over the small bump of our pup. “I just wanted them to be safe “

Adolpho softens slightly, observing our closeness. “Aye, I know how it is. Breeding is an emotional time for mothers and fathers both” He wags his finger, “You can be forgiven for protecting your mate, but the deception is another matter” He’s on his feet and pacing, again proving how remarkably spry he is for a 135 year old, “Do you have any idea what you’ve risked here? If this gets out, your campaign will be over. The pack loves Ella, they’re obsessed with your romance, if they think this has all been a lie- it will be a betrayal of the worst kind.”

“My campaign was already going to be over before Ella came along. The only reason I’m winning is because of her.” Sinclair responds fiercely. “I don’t like lying to the pack either, but I was between a rock and a hard place of the worst kind”

“The Alpha council aren’t fools. If it truly looked like the Prince was going to win, they would have come to your aid” Adolpho suggests tiredly.

“Neither the people nor the council were going to put a bachelor on the throne – especially not one they believed was sterile.” Sinclair insists, “We’re in this situation because King Xavier died without an heir – they want stability for the crown.. and they’re right to”

“Still, we could have found another way” Adolpho insists, sounding resigned now. Like Henry, he seems to be wishing for a solution that doesn’t exist – another way to have handled this, though no other options are presenting themselves.

If you want someone to blame, you can blame me” I interject. “It was my idea. I thought I could help Dominic win, and I was afraid for my baby if he didn’t. I was afraid to everyone. You were protecting the pack before you even realized it.” Sinclair praises, kissing my cheek. “

And the way I see it this is what the Goddess intended. The fact that Ella appeared and conceived my child right when I needed her most?

That this baby might save the united packs from a cruel, blood-thirsty tyrant? If that isn’t fate, I don’t know what is.”

“Maybe. The elder acknowledges, “or maybe it was the design of someone else. You said yourself that someone powerful was involved in switching the sperm samples, and now that you have this piece of the puzzle? He surmises, gesturing to me.

Whoever it was must have known Ella wasn’t truly a human. And the fact that she was sent to that bank, right when your deposit was made-“

What do you mean, sent?” I interrupt. “I went there because my sister is a scientist at the lab. My boyfriend My dear, the reason you couldn’t get pregnant with your boyfriend is because he was human and you are not. The elder answers, almost as if he read my thoughts. “It also means that human medications are unlikely to have damaged your body whatsoever.”

“But the doctor told me-“ I begin to object, trailing off as I recall the horrible conversation that started all this, that sent me running home to discover Mike’s deception. The doctor who told me that I had to conceive immediately – that very day even though I know better than to believe such a thing. I'd been so shocked and frightened I hadn't questioned it, but is anything ever truly that cut and dry when it comes to fertility? "Oh my Goddess, I've been so stupid."

Adolpho offers me a small nod, watching my expression. "Let me guess, was this the first time you'd seen this specialist?" "Yes," I gulp, "my usual doctor was sick and so another physician stepped in."

"And your sister – did she examine you?" He presses. "No." I shake my head, feeling dizzy now. "She just looked at the report."

"Wait," Sinclair interrupts, in a tone that makes my stomach drop. Oh Goddess, what has he figured out? I don't think I can handle any more surprises." If her body wasn't actually damaged... are you saying that Ella might be able to have more children?"

I freeze in place, looking to the older man with something between fear and hope. Everything is changing so quickly, I'm not sure how many more surprises I can handle – good or bad. "A shifter physician would have to examine her for sure, but I can't see any reason why not." The elder observes.

I can hardly breathe. Sinclair is hugging and kissing me, and then his hands are on my face, wiping away tears I hadn't realized I've been shedding. "I can't believe this." I murmur, looking up at him, needing to draw on his strength. "It's too much." "I know." He assures me, purring softly. "It's okay, we don't have to talk about it now."

"But we do! We have to find that doctor." I realize abruptly. "If you're suggesting that they knew what I really was, and that they sent me running to Cora knowing that Dominic's sample was at her lab... I mean, it's all too crazy to be true. Who could possibly know so much, predict so much?"

"I suspect Dominic is right in part – the Goddess did play a hand in this. But she didn't do it alone." Adolpho agrees. "More importantly Ella, if the people responsible for this knew you were a wolf, it means they know who you really are."

"Then, you don't have any idea about what her true identity might be?" Sinclair inquires, watching the elder closely. Adolpho extends a hand to me, and I clamber out of Sinclair's lap, going to stand in front of the old wolf. His gaze sweeps over me, his eyes lingering on my own gold irises and strawberry-blonde hair. "

Her fur, in the dream?" He inquires. "The same color as her hair, except for a splash of white at the tip of her tail and on her belly."

Sinclair answers, Sounding reverent as he describes my wolf Adolpho smells me then, and I try not to move or squirm. He shakes his head in defeat. "There is something there... it's familiar, but I can't place it.

A rare smell for a wolf in these parts. I expect it will be easier to tell once your wolf wakes completely."

"Do you know a way to make that happen?" I inquire anxiously, "other than Dominic claiming me, or giving birth?" Adolpho nods, "give me a minute."

When he returns a few minutes later, he's carrying a small ceramic box, painted with mysterious patterns I don't recognize, but which seem strangely familiar. He slides the lid open, revealing a collection of dried flowers. "Our people have used these herbs for centuries in rituals to the Goddess, they're meant to trigger a transcendent journey, a way to get in touch with your innermost spirit. If anything can reconnect you to your wolf, it will be them but I think the doctor was right to advise you to wait until the pup arrives."

I accept the box gingerly, and Adolpho continues. It should only take a few. Wait, but keep it close... you might need them in an emergency, whether your baby is ready to be born

Chapter 110 – Nesting

Sinclair

I decide to work from home for the rest of the day. I'm so amazed by everything that's happening, and overwhelmed by how much our lives have changed in the last 48 hours. Two days ago I was grieving the relationship I believed was impossible, wishing against all logic that Ella could be a wolf.

Now all our dreams have come true, yet I feel reluctant to trust these changes. It's all too wonderful, even if mysterious forces have clearly been at work – pulling the strings of our lives from far away.

I hate the idea that someone has been watching and manipulating us from afar – even if it is the Goddess. Still, the Goddess isn't what frightens me most. The thing that frightens me most is knowing that someone out there knows the truth about Ella, they know secrets she and I have yet to uncover, and might use them against us.

True, it seems that bringing us together was for our benefit, but the picture is never clear until it's complete. Shifters in this city know exactly how vulnerable Ella is right now, and we can't wake her wolf for another three and a half months, at least. Around seven I realize that I'm not going to get any more work done this evening.

Instead I head upstairs to my bedroom, expecting to find my sweet mate resting before dinner. Instead, I walk in to find Ella out of bed and pacing, overflowing with anxious energy. The second thing I notice is that every pillow, blanket and cushion in the linen closet has been piled onto the bed, and the canopy curtains drawn closed.

Ella stops in her tracks when she sees me, wringing her hands. "Baby, what is it?" I ask, crossing over to her. "You're supposed to be in bed."

She shakes her head. "It's not right. I've been trying to fix it but I can't.. it's not right."

I pull her into my arms, purring softly as she tucks her head against my chest and breathes in my scent. "What's not right. How can I help?"

"The bed." She huffs, gesturing to it sullenly. "It's not cozy enough. Your pillows are terrible, and none of the blankets are soft enough."

For a moment I think she's lost her beautiful little mind, but slowly it clicks into place. How many times have I heard about other fathers coping with a mate in this exact state? These instincts are as powerful as all the cravings and mood swings, and they're also further proof of Ella's true identity. I chuckle happily, and Ella stiffens. "Are you laughing at me? This has been a really stressful day you know, I don't need to be laughed at."

“No trouble, not at you.” I promise. “It’s just that you’re nesting.” “Nesting, like cleaning everything and setting up a nursery?” She clarifies, her adorably brow furrowing in confusion, “but that shouldn’t come until later, and we’ve already picked out most of the baby stuff.”

“No, it’s a little more literal with wolves, Ella. These are just more of your maternal instincts coming out.” I explain. “It’s probably made worse by the bed rest, you’re stuck in this room with nowhere to go, it’s only natural that you want to make yourself as cozy a spot to welcome the pup as possible.”

“Except that I can’t because your dumb bed is giant and everything is wrong.” She complains, unbuttoning my shirt so she can nuzzle her face against my bare skin. I hum in sympathy, scooping her up. “Well then let me help.” I suggest, my own alpha instincts urging me to settle her. I deposit her on the bed, then move to the intercom by the bedroom door, sending my guards for every pillow and blanket in the house.

They gradually cart them up over the next half hour, and I dutifully let my sweet little mate direct me as she creates her nest. I hand her pillows and blankets, then accept them back if they don’t fit the indescribable qualifications she’s seeking. I have no idea what’s going on in her mind, but I know enough to realize this isn’t a matter of logic.

Her inner wolf is pushing her to satisfy a powerful craving that she probably doesn’t understand any more than I do when my wolf urges me to scent mark her. It’s all feelings and one word commands, primal and powerful – not to be ignored.

When the bed is finally right she climbs in, preening with maternal pride and offering me a satisfied smile that makes me want to kiss her so badly it hurts. “Am I allowed in there with you?” I ask, beaming down at her. Ella frowns for a moment, obviously contemplating this, She narrows her eyes, “As long as you don’t mess it up.”

Laughing, I kick off my shoes and move onto the bed, careful not to dislodge any of her carefully placed pillows. Right as I settle beside her, I accidentally knock one of the overstuffed poufs out of position, and a kittenish growl rises in her chest. That’s when I snatch her up, replacing the offended cushion as I pull her small body onto mine.

For a while I simply kiss Ella, elated that I’m finally able to be with her so freely. Every other time we’ve gotten carried away with affection, it’s filled me with guilt and distraction about our tenuous future. But now it simply feels right.

“I keep daydreaming about what it will be like when your wolf finally emerges completely.” I share a little while later. “It was distracting me all day long.” I admit, stroking her spine as she nibbles my ear. “You’ve shown such ferocity already, and you have so much love to give – you'll truly be the perfect queen." I exalt, loving the shy blush that colors her cheeks. "We'll usher in a new era for the united packs, while we raise a whole litter. I'll give you so many babies that she won't know what to do with them."

Ella offers me a sultry giggle, squirming against me in a way that tells me she's getting excited just talking about this. Still, she sighs, a familiar look of hesitation on her lovely features. "Don't, we don't know what the future holds yet. And I'll be happy even if it's just the three of us."

"But you'd like more if you can get them?" I guess, understanding her reluctance to get her hopes up.

I know only too well how hard it is to let yourself dream after so much disappointment. "I've never shared a bloodline or DNA with anyone ..I've never had that bond. Rafe is the first person in my life who ll experience that with." Ella confides, "it's part of why I wanted a child of my own. To be biologically connected at least once.

And I love being pregnant... but I don't need all my babies to have my genes."

"What if I want my babies to all have your genes." I tease, sliding my hand down over her luscious behind. "They're damned good genes."

Ella laughs but holds firm. "If we can't have more pups on our own, I know how many orphans out there need a good home." There's something haunted in her last words, and I find myself squeezing her more tightly. Still, despite her pain, an incandescent smile takes over her features, and she buries her head in my neck, laughing. "I can't even believe this is real." She exclaims. "I never imagined that we'd get to have a life together.. I wanted to be a wolf so badly, and I never thought I would be."

Ella can't see my face, so I don't hide my grimace. "

I'm happier than I've ever been with you, you know that?"

She peeks up at me, a spark of mischief in her eye. "You're sounding awfully emotional there, Alpha. You're not going to start crying, are you?"

When I only frown, the spark in her eye flickers out, and I hate myself for dampening her high spirits. "I think we've been putting off talking about your past long enough, Ella. It's more important than ever now." "But I don't know anything." She insists, looking confused again. "I was a baby when this all started."

"I know sweetheart." I confirm, "but if we're right about this.. then it's likely the people behind this have been watching you for your whole life. The answer to all of this could be somewhere in your own history.” I explain. “And besides, I need to know because... because you’re my mate. I can’t take care of you if I don’t know what you’ve been through. You did promise to open up to me eventually.”

Her face falls, and I realize the naughty creature probably hadn’t intended on actually following through on that particular promise. Ella looks up at me from beneath her lashes, as if she’s testing my resolve. When I only stare gravely back, she sighs. “I don’t even remember everything.” She confesses softly. “I’ve blocked so much of it out.”

“Then we can work with a therapist, or a hypnotist, but maybe you can tell me what you do remember?” Looking as though she’s headed to the gallows, Ella nods. “Okay”

Chapter 111 – Orphan Gang

Ella

“Cora tell me what happened.” I demand, crossing my skinny arms over my chest. I’m eight years old, glaring down at my surrogate sister with a stern expression. It’s always been this way between us.

She’s a year older, but I’ve always had the dominant personality. “It was nothing.” She insists, averting her gaze from my own. “You’re lying.” I counter stubbornly. “I can always tell, you know.”

“No, you think you always know.” Cora answers sullenly, though we both know I’m right. I can read my sister like a book.

“Would you just tell me?” I press, sighing with exasperation. “Fine, it’s not even a big deal, it was just some of the big kids being jerks.” She explains gravely.

“Which ones?” I respond immediately. “Point them out.” It could be anyone, considering the fact that even children our own age tend to be bigger than us. It seems like the orphanage physician labels us undersized and undernourished every year, though nothing ever changes.

Reluctantly, Cora points toward a familiar gang of kids, ranging from age eleven to fourteen. The ringleader is a beefy thirteen year old who always wears a cruel leer as if he’s ever on the lookout for someone to bully to tears – just for the fun of it. “

You see, there’s nothing we can do about it- they run this place.” “I beg to differ.” I answer, tilting my chin up defiantly. “We don’t have to be bigger than them just smarter. Now tell me what they said to you?”

Cora’s voice is so low I almost can’t hear her speak. She stares at the ground, her shoulders slumped in defeat. “They called me a worthless gutter rat and said no one would ever adopt me cuz I’m too ugly.”

Protective fury boils up inside of me. This is the weak spot for any abandoned child. None of us know what it’s like to be wanted or unconditionally loved, and the only thing that keeps us going is the hope that we might get parents one day. As far as I’m concerned, targeting my sister’s biggest sensitivity deserves a serious punishment.

“I’ll kill them.” I seethe, my tiny hands closing into fists. “Ella no.” Cora argues, completely disheartened. “I mean, maybe they have a point. We’re getting old now, and you know how it is. Parents only ever want the babies. I mean you might have a chance – you’re so pretty... but I have to be realistic.”

“Cora, I want parents just as badly as you do, but I’m not gonna leave you for anything.” I vow. I’d like to see any grown up try to take me away from the orphanage without her. “We’re sisters.”

“It’s easy for you to say that.” Cora offers me a hesitant smile. “You adopt all the outcasts.” This isn’t the first time she’s said this to me. I do have a way of taking the most skittish and rejected of our peers under my wing, but it’s not as if I can just stand by and let them be mistreated, or leave them to fend for themselves. We all need each other.

“Everyone here is an outcast.” I remind her. “Why else do you think the big kids are so mean. They’re mad that no one ever picked them and they take it out on us cuz they think we might still have a chance.”

“Does that mean you’re going to let them off them hook?” She asks, arching a brow. “Of course not, I’m just gonna remind them that we’re in this together.” I answer reasonably, trying to calm my own ire. Cora’s teeth flash in a pearly grin. “And if they don’t listen?”

“Then I’ll kick them in the pants.” I sniff, turning on my heels to march up to the bullies in question. Cora trails along behind me, whispering anxiously about what a bad idea this is. I don’t listen, determined to defend her no matter the odds.

“Hey you, didn’t anyone ever teach you to pick on someone your own size?” I call while we’re still a few meters away. The older children turn around, then laugh when they see I’m the one who spoke. The ringleader rises to his feet, then scoffs, “Even if they did, that ain’t you, pipsqueak.”

“It is if you account for brains.” I bite back. “You shouldn’t be mean to Cora just cuz you’re unhappy. That isn’t fair and she doesn’t deserve it.”

“Oh yeah, and what are you gonna do about it, brat?” He stalks forward, looming over my small body with malicious intent. “A scrawny little thing like you? You’re even more useless than she is.”

He reaches out and shoves me, both of his hands slamming into my shoulders. At first I stumble back, but something is rising up inside me, something powerful and fearless. I snarl and pounce, scrabbling up the older boy’s body and attacking him tooth and nail, He screams and flails his arms. “What – hey! Get her off me!

What is this!” I don’t relent. Hands grab for me, but I dig my nails into his flesh, biting and scratching with all my strength. As I come back to the present, I realize how strange my behavior had been that day. Normal human girls don’t act like that – do they?

“You did that?” Sinclair asks, the corners of his mouth quirking upwards. I nod, “The way

Cora tells it, that's the day I became the de facto leader of the orphanage, just by being scrappy enough to take on the big kids. When it was over I tended his wounds, and from then on they were all loyal to me. My own little gang."

"You made your own pack." Sinclair observes, massaging my tense shoulders. His words sink into my mind slowly, but I gradually recognize the truth in them – not only the wolfish group I formed, but the fact I was able to wrangle the other children in the first place.

"It all makes sense now." I muse aloud. "I was able to beat him because I'm a wolf.. I mean I'm sure I wouldn't have been any match for a pup that wasn't dormant, but the human kids still weren't as strong. I never understood how I won before."

"Strength isn't everything – from the sounds of it you were a born leader, and that has nothing to do with being a wolf – not alone at least." He praises, dipping his head to deposit a few lingering kisses on my neck. "My fierce Ella."

"Yeah well, that was before." I answer, my voice taking on a hollow quality I hate. "Before what?" Sinclair questions, his huge body going still beside mine.

I shrug. "It was easy to be fierce before I knew how much there was in the world to fear." I share hesitantly. "I didn't know how much worse it could get back then. It reached a point where I couldn't protect the other kids anymore." I confess. "Or myself.."

I'm fidgeting now, unable to look Sinclair in the eye. "What Cora said about me being pretty... she didn't come up with that on her own. She was just repeating what she heard from the grown ups. I mean, I know that's not why.. " I'm stumbling over my words now, changing tracks and not making any sense, but I can't help it. "I know those things happen to lots of girls no matter what they look like.. but it's what they always said when..." I shake my head, unable to finish the thought.

Unwanted images are flashing through my vision, and I force them away before they can consume me completely. A new thought occurs to me then, a revelation I hadn't been able to focus on earlier, but which now makes our circumstances seem even more surreal. "Dominic, I'm not sure we're on the right path with all this. I don't think anyone was keeping track of me after I was given to the humans."

"Why do you say that?" He inquires curiously, only seeming willing to be distracted because this is so important.

"Because if they'd been watching me... then they would have known everything that was going on in the orphan age." I explain, "And I can't believe they would have just stood by and let those things happen to a child they cared about."

Sinclair is up on his elbow, looking down at me with a furrowed brow. His powerful hands are stroking my side, but I think he knows there isn't anything he can do to make this better. "What things, sweetheart?"

I take a deep breath, but it comes out shaky and weak. I clench my eyes shut, and a stray tear escapes. "I'm sorry, I don't think I can do this."

"You don't have to if you aren't ready, Ella." He cuddles me closer, and I hiccup in thanks. "We're going to get to the bottom of this. But for now, I'm here and you're safe. I'm not going to let anything hurt you ever again."

I lean into his warmth, stunned to realize I believe him. Even though the Prince and all his henchmen are out to kill me, I feel completely secure with Sinclair, and that's not a feeling I ever expected to experience with any man. I'm overflowing with love as I smile up at the huge Alpha, "I know."

Chapter 112 – Ella Tempts Fate

Ella

“Sometimes it amazes me that I can even be with you this way.” I tell Sinclair, nuzzling his shoulder.

We’re still in his bed, and I’m not fully recovered from our conversation yet. I’m beginning to think a hypnotist might truly be necessary in order to open the doors to my past, but for right now I’m merely thrilled to revel in the heady glow of our love nest. “I learned to trust Mike with my body – but I could never tell him any of this...

then again, he wouldn’t have wanted to know.” Sinclair purrs, “Well if you hadn’t already figured it out, I think it’s fair to say you’ve made a serious upgrade from that weasel.”

“oh I know it” I reply, my head whirling with emotions. I still feel a bit fragile, but I’m also aching to feel close to Sinclair. I need to feel his steady strength, and I want to stop dwelling in the past. I want to make new memories with this man – good memories to replace all the bad ones hanging over my head. “You are better in every way, Dominic.” I tell him in a sultry tone, moving to straddle his waist.

Sinclair chuckles, running his hands up my thighs and underneath the hem of my night dress, settling on my hips “Are you trying to seduce me, trouble?”

“I’m just curious to see if reality can live up to my dreams.” I shrug, trying not to feel too embarrassed by my brazen behavior. “You know, that was the first time I’ve ever had an orgasm I didn’t give myself.”

“Oh really?” His pupils dilate, black pools slowly eating up his emerald irises. “You really weren’t kidding about Mike’s shortcomings.”

I bite my lip and shake my head, lowering my body to his until the tips of my breasts graze his muscular chest. “And I haven’t even experienced it for real yet.”

Sinclair groans, his fists compulsively squeezing my bare skin. “Baby, we’ve been over this. If we start this, I won’t be able to stop.”

“Start what?” I inquire innocently, kissing his neck as I deftly unbutton his shirt. Inch after inch of his contoured abs appear, dusted with a swath of dark hair. I slide my palms over the hard planes, pushing the fabric of his clothing out of the way. I nibble his jaw and lean up to press my lips to his, but before I succeed I find myself flipped onto my back. Suddenly the massive Alpha is hovering over me, his eyes glowing with untamed desire.

“Ella, we can’t.” He insists, but the words are dragged out of him in a ragged growl. “If I claim you it might wake your wolf.”

That was a mistake. The moment he mentions claiming me, the little voice in my head goes wild, Oh yes, please. My wolf begs. I need to be his. I need his mark.

She's not the only one; suddenly all I can think about is Sinclair sinking his teeth into that special spot. I need to feel that one-ness with him, the white light which burst in my soul at the height of our shared dream. I was already turned on, but now my desire skyrockets. I'm going wild with need for him, and all other thoughts have disappeared.

Make him claim us! I'll go crazy if he doesn't. "But we don't know that it will. There's only a chance, right?" I suggest. It's not that I don't care about the risk to my baby, it's simply that this need has knocked all the logic out of my head.

The doctor was only guessing – no one really knows how this all works." I press, reaching for him again. Sinclair promptly catches my wrists and pins them above my head. I'm completely immobilized, which I would have expected to frighten me or trigger a panic attack, instead it fills me with a sense of utter safety. I peek up at him from beneath my lashes, "don't you want to?"

"Goddess Ella, I already want to claim you so badly it's killing me." He rumbles, sounding as though he's barely hanging onto his control. "Please don't make this harder than it has to be. The risks are too great." His sharp eyes are piercing straight through me, and his raw power is washing over me in waves, urging me to submit even as it fuels my lust. "Make no mistake, I can't wait for your wolf to emerge, but not at the cost of the baby."

My lower lip begins to quiver as I realize I'm truly playing with fire. No, not the baby. We can't hurt the baby. My wolf insists, sounding more conflicted than I've ever heard her. Rafe, my Rafe.

The horrible thing is that, as guilty as I feel about potentially endangering my unborn child, I'm still positively squirming with need.

"I don't want to hurt him either." I tell Sinclair, my voice a mere squeak. "I know, little one." Sinclair assures me, "I never thought you did. It's just your instincts. I'm afraid that dream was a blessing and a curse – we know what you are now, but your wolf is also fighting harder to come out now that she's tasted freedom. She's going to push us both, Ella."

"So what do we do?" I ask anxiously. "How do I keep her at bay?" A low growl sounds in my head, and I realize the predator in question does not appreciate this suggestion. Oh hush. I scold her, you're not helping things.

"I'll help you." Sinclair promises, flashing his fangs at me in a way that's both ravenous and reassuring. "I'll give you the relief you need, and if your wolf pushes me to claim her, I'll remind her who's in charge here." His dark promise sends a delicious shiver down my spine, but Sinclair is still speaking low in my ear. "It's the most natural thing in the world that she wants my mark, but it's my mark to give, not hers to take."

I writhe in his arms, whimpering pitifully. When I speak, it's as if the voice in my head is speaking out of my own mouth. "But I want it."

"And I'll give it to you when the time is right, mate." Sinclair purrs, his husky tones vibrating through my body with utmost authority. This isn't the first time I've felt as though I'm speaking directly to his wolf, but it is the first time I've experienced my own inner animal taking over in response.

I arch my back, pressing up against him, and wind my legs around his waist, rocking my hips up towards his hardness. He growls, but I extend my neck, showing off the slender column and all but begging for his bite. I don't even recognize myself in this moment: I'm feral and wanton, and I don't even care.

"Keep it up, Ella." He warns, shackling both of my wrists in one of his large hands so that the other can glide down and close over my undulating bottom. "And you're going to get yourself a punishment instead of a reward."

The creature inside me isn't sure which she would prefer. I remember how incredible it felt to be dominated so completely by Sinclair. Another mystery explained: of course I enjoyed him taking control that way – since it's exactly what she-wolves need from their mates. Still, right now the word reward is far more tempting. Sinclair has made it clear he isn't going to cave, so I can keep pushing him and earn another demonstration of his power, or I can just let him make me feel good.

Sinclair's expression softens as he watches me deliberate, but only just. "You're going to have plenty of chances to rebel in the future, mate. Tonight, let's just be together."

"You're really going to make me wait until after the baby arrives?" I clarify, sounding horrified. "When my body will be a disaster zone and we'll be completely sleep-deprived, not to mention have a kingdom to run?"

"We'll manage it, Ella. You'll see." Sinclair vows, softening his hold on my body, and pressing a lingering kiss to my lips.

When we part I can only gaze up at him with liquid eyes. "And in the meantime?" I ask hopefully, thinking again of his promised reward. Please let that mean he's going to touch me!

He chuckles, glancing at the bedding around us. In the meantime, you're not the only one who wants to see if reality lives up to dreams.” He rears up, stripping off my flimsy night dress and sliding my body up onto the pillows. “I think it’s long past time that I taste you again.”

As he settles between my legs, hooking his arms beneath my thighs and lowering his mouth to my aching clit, he pauses to give me a final, wolfish grin. “Try not to get too wild, my love – we wouldn’t want to destroy the nest”

At first think he’s exaggerating, after all – if he’s only going to pleasure me and we’re not actually going to make love- how rambunctious can things get? But in the end he proved me wrong – we had to remake the nest.

Chapter 113 – Not Even In Our Dreams

Sinclair

When I wake, it's to the feeling of Ella's round bottom undulating against my hard cock. Her back is flush to my chest, her naked body perfectly cushioned by my much larger form on one side, and the boundary of her nest on the other.

I have no doubt I was already swollen with arousal when she roused, as sleeping beside her every night is an ever-increasing challenge, especially now that our relationship has become overtly romantic. I fell asleep with her honeyed nectar still lingering on my tongue, after yet another session of pleasuring Ella unconscious to try and pacify her wolf.

I open my eyes, tightening my arms on the sweet bundle and trying to silence the excited growls of my wolf. Such a needy little mate. He's crooning.

My Ella. Mine, mine, mine. It hasn't escaped his notice that my mouth is mere inches away from her lovely neck. So close, it would be so easy, so simply. Just one little bite.

I rumble in sympathy, pressing my lips to that special juncture where her shoulder curves up into the graceful column of her throat, but forcing myself to go no further.

This is my consolation prize. I can kiss her claiming spot all I want, I can even give it the "updated by jobnib.com" occasional nibble. maybe a frequent nibble... or a little nip.. just a tiny baby bite... NO! I quickly break myself out of the reverie, cursing Ella's delicious scent.

This is torture. My wolf complains. I can't believe the Goddess would send us a mate then refuse us the ability to claim her. It's sadistic – criminal even!

Ella, for her part, isn't making the situation any easier. The naughty creature is still rubbing her bottom suggestively against me, but she's also pretending to be asleep.

She's taking determinedly even breaths, much too intentional and heavy to compare to the gentle sighs of her usual dozing.

I've spent much more time than I'd like to admit watching this little wolf sleep, and I know an act when I see it. The nerve, I think in complete amusement. As if all her rocking and wriggling is just tossing and turning, and not a calculated assault.

"I know you're awake, trouble." I purr in her ear, quickly rewarded with a small giggle. Chuckling myself, I prop myself onto and elbow and roll Ella onto her back, both relieved and disappointed to lose the stimulation of her lush behind.

I duck my head and claim her lips, dragging my palm down to her swollen breast as I steal the breath from her lungs. Ella moans and arches into my hand, and I drag my thumb over her beaded nipple. We carry on this way for a while, saying good morning with our bodies instead of our voices, and enjoying every last moment.

When I finally pull back, bumping her pert nose with my own, I fall headfirst into the bottomless pools of her golden eyes. “Well, imp? What do you have to say for yourself?”

“It wasn’t my fault.” The brazen thing actually bats her eyelashes at me, the very picture of innocence. “I woke up and it was practically stabbing me, what else was I supposed to do?”

In hindsight I realize she might have done much worse. If I woke up first and found Ella aroused, there are about a dozen different and completely debauched ways I would have chosen to wake her.

The possibilities are already racing through my mind: images of Ella splayed before me, whimpering in her sleep, coming before she even – Get your mind out of the gutter!

“You were supposed to wake me up so I could get things under control – not try to seduce me.” I grin, flashing my fangs so she knows I’m only half joking. Ella drops her head back and groans. “It isn’t fair.”

She complains, “you get to touch me all you want, and I never get to return the favor!” “Because I don’t trust myself not to lose control.” I remind her for the tenth time, already anticipating her usual rebuttal of: but you’re always in control. “All bets are off when it comes to you, Elia.”

Ella huffs, but peeks up at me curiously, “I was thinking.” She begins hesitantly, her slender fingers toying with the dark hair scattered over my chest.

“Mhmm?” I prompt, tracing my fingers down her tummy. “Maybe we could have more dream dates.” Ella muses hopefully. “Then we could both get some fun out of this.” I blink in surprise. “Sweetheart, do you imagine that I’m not getting fun out of this?”

“That I don’t enjoy giving you pleasure?” “No, I know you do.” Ella answers, her skin flushing bright red. “In fact I think you might enjoy it too much.” She adds ruefully, earning a laugh in reply. I know she’s been overwhelmed by my dedication to making her see stars as often and frequently as I can, but I don’t feel the least bit sorry about it. She deserves all this and more.

“But I like giving pleasure too.” She finally admits, “and I feel guilty that you never get... you know, rewarded”

I should have realized that someone as generous as Ella would want to give affection as much, if not more, than she wants to receive it, but I wasn't joking about my struggles with control. “Im sorry, baby.” I profess honestly, pressing a deep, lingering kiss to her lips. “I know it's difficult. And believe me, I wish things were different. I wish I could be buried in your sweet p-

“Dominic!” Ella exclaims, cutting me off and looking scandalized. “Tsk, poor little wolf,” I chuckle, “raised by those prudish humans.” Ella grumbles one of those adorable kittenish growls, and I mentally debate how often is too often to outrage her sweet sensibilities.

I love her blushes, and I never want to lose the ability to shock her this way. For the time being I decide that dirty talk is only going to make abstaining more difficult. “The point was that I wish I could be buried in you 24/7, but we can't” “Not even in our dreams?” Ella inquires earnestly.

“Maybe if we dream in different beds.” I concede, “ but I think it would be dangerous to try while sleeping together. If I can actually feel you in my arms, while I'm making love to you in my head... it would just be a recipe for disaster. I might even claim you while unconscious.”

Ella lowers her gaze in disappointment. “Okay, I suppose that makes sense. “It's only a few more months.” I say, hoping to offer her some comfort. “And towards the end you probably won't want me anywhere near you. You'll be so uncomfortable and ready to get this baby out of you, that you'll probably want to rip my head off just for putting it here in the first place.”

Ella frowns, and at first I think I've put my foot in my mouth. However a moment later she inquires, “Can I ask you something?” “Anything.” I agree, much too quickly. She really does have me wrapped around her little finger.

“When we first met and the doctor was worried about the baby being too small, you mentioned that your mother had been told the same when she was carrying you.” Ella reminds me thoughtfully. I hum in confirmation, and she continues.

“I've just, I've never had any women in my life to help guide me through this. I mean there's plenty of nonsense online, but a billion women arguing with each other about what's best and which experiences are accurate... it's just not the same as hearing from someone you trust. Do you know much about your mother's experience?”

I find myself smiling, my mother's beautiful face appearing in my head. “She used to tell me that story all the time. About how all the doctors were convinced I was going to be a runt, but I proved them wrong and ended up being one of the healthiest, strongest pups they'd even seen. Every time I doubted myself, or felt like a failure, she reminded me that nothing in life ever stays the same, and you never know how a story will turn out when you're still in the thick of it."

"How old were you, when she died?" Ella questions gently, snuggling a bit closer to me, no doubt to lend her comfort.

"I was only six." I share softly. "I don't remember much about her, but I remember that story, and I remember her smile. I learned a lot of the other pieces second-hand from my father, but those memories are the ones I know are my own." Ella offers me a bittersweet smile. "Would you tell me... I mean, only if you want to, I'm just..."

"How she died?" I guess, knowing Ella is curious but reluctant to make me share a difficult story. I nod. "That seems only fair, since I've been asking you about all your traumas." "Still, you don't have to tell me unless you want to."

Ella repeats firmly. "It's okay, baby. You should know – it's only right." I take a deep breath, transporting myself back to all those years ago, and begin

Chapter 114 – Sinclair Visits the Past

Sinclair

“Hmm, where oh where could my little pup be?” My mother’s velvety voice sounds just on the other side of the cabinet where I’m hiding. I press my hands over my mouth to try and silence my giggles, but a few small sounds still escape.

“Aha!” Mom whips open the cabinets two doors down, shouting with triumph only to soften her tone into another thoughtful hum. “Not in there.” She muses aloud, and I can almost see her rubbing her chin in thought.

As she moves closer I climb along the shelves, clambering over towels and wash rags to settle in the cabinet she just searched and found empty. A shaft of light bursts into the dark cupboards as my mother pulls open the doors where I’d just been sitting, another delighted cry on her lips. She doesn’t seem disappointed to have failed again, on the contrary she sounds impressed.

Ahh, he’s a sneaky little sausage.” She observes sagely, “That’s very good. All the best hunters can track their targets as silently as a ghost.” I can hear her footsteps circling, and I know she can smell me in the room, but I’m doing my best to outsmart her.

“In fact the very best predators can sometimes trick their prey into thinking they’re the ones doing the hunting... when really they’re about to be someone’s dinner!” Her voice rises at the end as she lunges for another cupboard. It’s getting harder and harder to hide my giggles as she fails to find me, but I know she’s enjoying this just as much as I am. I shift again, crawling silently to the very last cupboard in the mansion’s huge laundry room.

“What was that!” My mother’s voice sharpens, and I can see her freezing through a small crack in the door. “Oh I wish my fierce little wolf was here to protect me! I think I’m being watched.” She frets loudly. “I certainly hope something terrible isn’t about to jump out and scare me.”

Right on cue I leap out of the cupboard with a ferocious roar, pouncing on her and toppling her right to the ground. She cries out dramatically, throwing her arm over her eyes to protect herself from the terrible sight of her attacker. “Oh no! A Vicious rogue, please don’t eat me!” She begs, “I have pups!”

“Mommy it’s me!” I laugh hysterically, trying to pull her arm away from her face. Slowly she lowers her arm, blinking down at me in surprise. “Oh Dominic, thank goodness! You’ve gotten so big and strong I didn’t even recognize you. I was sure I was a goner!”

Her shock and relief only lasts a moment, and then she sits up, a familiar spark in her green eyes. “Such a rascal – scaring me that way.” She prowls toward me, wagging her fingers in obvious threat. I back away, my pudgy hands outstretched in preparation to ward off the imminent attack. "And you know what happens to pups who play tricks on their Mommies don't you?"

They get a visit from the tickle monster!" She lashes out and snatches me up, her hands fluttering over my tummy, tickling me mercilessly.

Within moments I'm on my back, squealing with mirth and trying to push away her hands. When I'm laughing so hard I can no longer breathe, I pounce again, putting a stop to the tickle monster's relentless assault. I'm only six, but my mother is so little that I already stand as tall as her shoulder, and I must be at least half her weight.

I flatten her to the laundry room floor, Sprawling on top of her and resting my cheek on her breast, breathing in her familiar Scent as I try to catch my breath. Her arms come around my back as I snuggle in, gentle fingers stroking my hair.

"There's my sweet boy," she murmurs, hugging me tightly. "Mommy, I'm a fierce hunter." I correct her indignantly, rolling my eyes at her silliness. There are some things Mommies just don't understand. "Deadly pred-ters are not sweet."

"Says who?" She inquires, sounding slightly affronted.. "Um, says everyone." I explain, as if it's the most obvious thing in the world. "Alpha warriors don't come home from battle and run to their Mommies for cuddles. They go drink and hunt and kiss she-wolves."

"And what do you know about drinking and kissing she-wolves?" My mother counters, playfully narrowing her eyes. "Have you been sneaking out to the pub at night?" She gasps, gripping my arms. "How many wives do you have, tell me right now!"

"None!" I laugh, "I promise!" Of course, she doesn't need to know that I already have a girlfriend. Knowing how mothers worry, she'd probably overreact to learn how fast I'm growing up.

"Listen to me very carefully Dominic," Mom replies after a moment, trailing her fingertips up and down my back, "The best Alphas and the best warriors are the ones who know that fighting is a last resort. They don't do it because it's tough or manly, they do it because they have to protect their pack.

They do it for love of their family and people – nothing else." She explains sternly. "You can't ever forget that duty, or that your power is a grave responsibility. Love is not a bad word, and sweetness is not weakness – these things are your greatest strengths. You have to promise me that you never stop coming to me for cuddles no matter how old you get, that you'll never hold yourself back from showing the people in your life how much you care about them. Never lose this side of you, Dominic."

I nod, feeling the truth and conviction in her words, and secretly feeling relieved that I don't have to act like I don't care in order to be strong. I don't want to stop hugging my Mom, I just thought that it wasn't allowed in order to be a real man.

"I promise." I agree easily, thinking of my father then. He's always touching and flirting with Mommy, and always tells Roger and me how much he loves us. He makes time to play with us and read bedtime stories, and always comforts us when we're hurt or scared.

He never shames us for those feelings, even if the rest of the world makes those things seem wrong. But then again, he's the most powerful wolf in the pack, so if he can do it, it must not be wrong. Maybe it's everyone else who has things backwards.

We're still lying there when the fire alarm begins blaring. Mom sits up with me still in her arms, scenting the air. We both smell smoke at the same time, and she immediately jumps to her feet. She sets me on the ground and leads me up the stairs, her eyes scanning the manor around us with hawkish intensity.

When we reach the front hallway, with the door only a few meters away, she releases me and nudges me towards the exit. "Get outside, baby. Go straight to the guardhouse, and wait for me there."

"But what about you?" I ask anxiously, my heart pounding in my chest. "I have to find Roger." She explains, gazing towards the upper stories. "Just go sweetheart, I'll be there before you know it."

She kisses my cheek and dashes away up the stairs. I start to run outside, when I hear the sound of a cat yowling in the distance. Oh no! Pancake! I think frantically, picturing our new cat. He must be trapped!

I change directions, following the sounds of the frantic meows. They carry me deeper and deeper into the smokey house, until I can actually see the flames climbing up the outer walls. Fear slices through me, but I know Pancake is close and I can't leave him to die. I finally find the terrified animal cowering under the china cabinet in the dining room, a blazing inferno surrounding him.

The door had been closed, and there hadn't been another way out, but I still find myself scolding the young tabby. "Pancake what are you doing? Don't you know about fire alarms? They mean you have to get out!" Shaking my head, I scoop up the fluffy creature, "What are you doing in a locked room anyway?"

When I turn back to the door, I finally remember my school lessons about what to do in the event of a fire. When I opened the door I'd let a bunch of air in, feeding the riotous flames. A wall of fire is blocking the door, and all I can do is tuck Pancake inside my shirt, and hope I'm fast enough.

I sprint forward and leap through the flames, batting out sparks that linger in my hair on the other side. I'm choking and coughing, and belatedly remember to crawl on the ground where there's more oxygen.

I'm still crawling along on one hand, using the other to hold Pancake still, when I hear my mother's frantic screams. "Dominic!" She cries, Dominic where are you!"

"Mommy!" I call back, suddenly seeing her ahead of me. She has a wet rag pressed to her mouth, and her eyes are wide with terror. "Dominic! What are you doing, I told you to get out!"

She scolds, running towards me. "I had to save Pancake! I cry, holding up the petrified feline. Mom's expression softens, "Oh, of course! Poor pancake" She takes my hand and begins leading me out. "Come on, now, we have to go."

My heart eases now that my Mom is here. I'm still scared, but I know I'm safe as long as she's here. I don't know how the fire started, but it's amazing how quickly the flames consumed the house.

Everywhere I look is black with smoke and suffocating heat. I've never felt anything like it. I feel like my skin might blister just from being in the same room with the fire.

We're almost to the entryway when there's a horrible rumbling and cracking sound above us, and before I understand what's happening, I'm being thrown forward through the air. An explosion rocks the mansion as I crash into the ground, and when I turn back I understand what's happened. The ceiling caved in behind me, but Mommy is still trapped on the other side.

She must have used all of her strength to toss me out of harm's way, even knowing she would probably end up stuck. I can barely see her through the flames, only her glowing green eyes remain. I wonder if she might shift, but I know better – highly flammable fur is not any protection from a fire. "Go!

Dominic!" She shouts through the whirring conflagration.

"No," I yell, horrified. "I won't leave you!

"Go now!" Power rolls off of her in powerful waves, carrying an authority I'm not yet strong enough to defy. I don't have a choice. My feet are moving without my consent, even as tears pour down my tear-stained cheeks. "No, Mommy No!"

"It's okay, baby." She cries, and I can hear tears in her voice. "This is the way it should be. It's okay." She insists again. "I love you! Remember who you are!"

I've barely stepped clear of the inferno when the entire house collapses in on itself, sending a black mushroom cloud into the sky. Firefighters and guards are surging around me, pulling me to safety, but I hear nothing but my own screams for my mother – even though I know there's no point.

She's gone.

Chapter 115 – A New It Couple Emerges

EllaTears are streaming down Sinclair's face as he relives his Mother's death, and I'm doing my best not to burst into outright sobs. My heart aches for the little boy he once was, and for the burden he obviously still carries today. Hearing this story, I understand that his last conversation with his mother had truly stayed with him over the years, shaping him into the man before me now.

"Afterwards, I leaned that she'd gotten Roger out of the house only to realize that I wasn't there."

Sinclair Continues, wiping his eyes. "She ran back in to get me, even though the guards tried to stop her." Sinclair relates, "So you see, that's why Roger always blamed me... he wasn't wrong. If I'd listened to her the first time, if I'd gone outside when she told me to, she would still be alive now."

"But Pancake wouldn't." I remind him thickly. The corners of his mouth quirk up, "It was almost thirty years ago, baby. Pancake is long gone."

"You know what I mean" I chide him. "And your mother understood because you were doing exactly what she was trying to teach you – to protect those more vulnerable than yourself."

"I know." He confesses. "I spent years in therapy, Just trying to come to terms with the fact that it was her choice. I was a child and couldn't have understood the danger, and she didn't have to come after me."

"But she was your mother, it wasn't even a question for her." I murmur, twining my limbs with his so he can feel my solid weight in his arms. "She wanted you to live much more than she cared about her own survival."

He nods wordlessly, his eyes still distant, as if he hasn't truly returned to the present. "I understand that, but sometimes I still think that if it wasn't for me, she never would have needed to make a choice in the first place. My decision that day took her from Dad and Roger and the pack."

"Did you ever find out how the fire started?" I ask softly, running my fingers through the dark, thick locks of his hair.

"In the weeks after the fire, it became clear that it was arson." Sinclair explains hoarsely. "Dad was away on pack business, and it was well known that Mom was home with the pups. We were never able to prove it, but we always suspected the attack was political. King Xavier was on the throne then, and my father was his right hand and next in line. All the politics that are playing out today – they were already under way back then."

“You think it was the King – the current one, I mean?” I inquire. Sinclair sighs, his emotions less potent now that we’ve moved on to politics. “The problem with being the biggest and baddest wolf around is that it puts a colossal target on your back. And the worse thing is that you’re so hard to kill and people are often so afraid of taking you on directly, that they go after your family instead.” Sinclair shares. “It might not be as effective as killing you, but Alphas who lose their mate and pups rarely recover fully.”

Sinclair pauses to nuzzle my neck and caress my belly, as if reminding himself that Rafe and I are safe. “It could have been anyone, but I actually think Xavier is a more likely suspect than the current king – my father was younger and not quite strong enough yet to rule, but it was clear he would be soon. Xavier didn’t have heirs and though he still had a lot of time left to try and make them, I think the writing was already on the wall. My father was too strong and too well liked.”

“Dominic, if it was arson then it wasn’t your decision that took your mother, it was Xavier’s, or whoever was responsible. It wasn’t some tragic accident, it was murder.” I argue, hating the guilt still dominating my mate’s expression.

He gazes down at me tenderly. “You don’t have to worry, Ella. I’m okay – I forgave myself a long time ago.”

“But Dominic, there’s nothing to forgive.” I insist, near tears again. “It wasn’t your fault.” I pull back far enough to look into his emerald eyes. “I can tell you right now, that if it came down to me or Rafe, I would choose him every time – even tiny as he is. And I wouldn’t ever want him to think that my sacrifice wasn’t worth it, or to blame himself”

“Shhh,” Sinclair tucks my head under his chin, stroking my spine. “It’s okay, little wolf. I know.”

“Stop comforting me! I’m supposed to be comforting you.” I complain. Trying and failing to wriggle free. “You are.” Sinclair lies – the rat. “It comforts me just holding you this way.”

Settling, I decide to change tactics. “Do you have any idea how proud your mother would be, if she could see you today?” I ask him softly, hoping to help ease his pain but speaking with complete honesty. “You became exactly the man she hoped you would. You never lost sight of what matters most, even when the whole world was working against you. You lead with love instead of fear, and you don’t confuse strength with cruelty.”

“Now you’re just flattering me.” Sinclair rumbles with amusement. “I’m not.” I bite back. “Do you remember when we first met, and you still thought I was a scheming gold digger?”

“Oh yes, I’m sure that would have made my mother very proud.” Sinclair jokes.

“When you realized you were wrong, you owned up to your mistake.” I continue determinedly. “And when you saw I was hurting, your first instinct was to hug me. You didn’t even think about it. I remember being so shocked, because here was this huge, terrifying predator – and you held me more gently and with more compassion than anyone in my entire life.”

A pleased purr vibrates beneath my hands. “You make me sound like my father, that’s exactly how I used to think of him. He could go from being a grizzly to a teddy bear in the blink of an eye.”

“Exactly.” I confirm. “I wish you could see yourself the way I do, Dominic. If you could, you’d know I’m not just trying to pump up your ego – which, for the record, I wouldn’t do because it’s already big enough.” I quip, yelping when Sinclair pinches my bottom.

“I’m telling you how proud your mother would be, because I believe it with every fiber of my being.”

“Thank you, sweetheart.” Sinclair professes, kissing me. I eagerly return the gesture, tilting my head to give him full reign of my mouth, and pressing my curves closer to his hard body.

We’re just starting to get carried away when a knock sounds at the door, and Hugo’s reluctant voice floats through the wood. “Alpha, it’s urgent.”

Sinclair reluctantly extracts himself from my arms, and strides to the door, as naked as the day he was born. I hide my own nudity beneath the covers, burrowing deeper into my nest as the Beta stalks into the room, not batting an eye at the scene awaiting him.

Instead he goes straight to the TV console against the far wall, clicking the remote and bringing the screen to life. He flips the channels until the device lands on a breaking news report.

An image of Lydia and the Prince appears in the top left frame of a news report, above a headline reading: No longer in mourning? The Prince spotted in Old Town with former Moon Valley Luna, Lydia Sinclair. My jaw drops, and my brain scrambles to piece together the implications of this news.

I'm momentarily distracted by the way the reporters identified Lydia using Sinclair's name, feeling a rush of indignance for this slight. I pull the sheets from the bed, wrapping them around my body and moving to Sinclair's side. He tucks me under his arm as Hugo increases the volume on the television.

"Mere weeks after the unspeakable tragedy of the Princess Angeline's murder, her widower and political candidate Prince Damon was seen out and about with Moon Valley's former Luna. When asked for a comment, the pair reported that they are just friends, sharing that Lydia stepped forward to offer the Prince comfort in his time of need – being no stranger to tragedy herself.

Despite the platonic nature of their relationship, onlookers could help but notice how cozy the couple appeared, with many expressing hope that the prominent she-wolf can offer the grieving Prince solace at this difficult time. Are we witnessing a new it couple in the making? Is Lydia's friendship with the Prince going to throw off Dominic Sinclair's campaign? And where is the Moon Valley Alpha and his new mate Ella? The pair haven't been seen publicly in weeks, and speculation is brewing. All this and more, when we return."

"Turn it off." Sinclair rumbles, exhaling when the Screen goes dark again. The three of us exchange worried glances as the sound disappears, and I can tell we're all thinking the same thing. "What the actual fuck?"

Chapter 116 – Reeling

Ella

Hugo, Sinclair and I are all staring at the television with wide eyes and slack jaws, unable to process the images flitting across the screen. It seems like every time we manage to take a few steps forward, Lydia and the Prince find a way to send us reeling back – and this is no exception.

“This doesn’t make any sense.” Hugo expresses, obviously overwhelmed. “Why would he risk losing the pack’s sympathy by parading around another Woman so soon after his wife’s death?”

“Trust me, Hugo – Damon isn’t the one calling the shots here. This is all Lydia.”

Sinclair states gruffly. “She’s going to force her way onto the throne one way or another. Right now she’s playing the doting friend, but mark my words, by the time the election ends she’ll be in his bed.”

“How bad is this?” I ask, looking up at Sinclair’s handsome face, “Does she have information that could hurt you?”

Sinclair Squeezes my shoulders, “She knows some secrets.” He relates, “but luckily nothing I could imagine as a smoking gun. In fact most of what she knows would be more harmful to the Prince things like my father’s attack, Things the public believes were accidents but our private investigators proved malicious.” His mouth flattens into a hard line. “The real danger is that she knows how we think, how we operate. Not to mention that the Prince doesn’t have more than two brain cells to rub together, but Lydia has plenty.”

“So what do we do?” I ask anxiously, my head replaying the news reel over and over again. “My bed rest isn’t common knowledge, and they’re making it sound like my absence from the public eye is suspicious. Do we tell everyone about my condition?

Or do we make an appearance?”

“I’m afraid making an appearance might play right into their hands. This could be some sort of attempt to lure us out of hiding.” Hugo advises, looking very grim indeed.

In the distance I hear the front door open and close – a fact which comes as quite a surprise, since my hearing has never been so sharp before. Wheels roll over the door jam, and then Henry’s voice floats up toward us, “Good Morning!”

“Henry!” I exclaim, both taken aback yet unsurprised we stayed in bed so long. Sinclair’s father has been coming over almost every day since we agreed to be invalids together, and he's been an invaluable help, since I learned my true identity.

I grab some loungewear and disappear into the restroom to change. I might be a wolf, but my human modesty is too deeply ingrained to allow me to strut around nude the way Sinclair does – and I'm definitely not changing in front of Hugo.

When I emerge, Sinclair is also dressed, though much more formally than I am.

We go downstairs together, Sinclair carrying me despite my protests. My blood pressure is improving more and more every day, but it isn't enough to free me of bed rest yet. We all gather around the breakfast table, the men analyzing these recent developments in low, serious voices, and me feeling like an outsider eavesdropping on matters I can't begin to understand. It's not that they exclude me, I just feel so out of my depth.

"What do you think, Ella?" Sinclair asks, turning his blazing emerald eyes to me. They've been going around in circles for more than half an hour, debating how we should respond to this crisis.

I gnaw on my lower lip thoughtfully, trying to ignore the flash of emotion in Sinclair's eye as he observes the nervous habit. Releasing my swollen lip, I sigh, "Do we ever know what happened with Lydia's husband? I mean the Princess is dead, but Lydia's still married to some other Alpha, right?" I clarify. When the men nod, I continue.

"Where is he in all this? Even if he doesn't want her anymore, it must make him look bad for her to be gallivanting around another territory with another Alpha."

"That's a good point." Henry praises, maintaining a straight-faced expression which reassures me that he's not giving out false compliments. "Maybe we've been going about this the wrong way."

Instead of trying to understand their motivations, we can simply leave it at knowing they're corrupt and respond without playing into their hands.

After all, they'll be expecting some sort of countermove to challenge the media's narrative, but we might be able to spin ourselves out of the hot seat and refocus the attention onto them – where it belongs."

"Keep them busy and distract the pack by rustling up her husband and causing drama" Hugo nods approvingly. "Good idea, Ella."

Sinclair squeezes my hand in support, but when I look over, his features are still drawn with worry." I still don't like it. I think it's the best hope we have, but something about this entire situation just doesn't seem right."

"Well of course not." Hugo scoffs, "You don't need to convene a blue-ribbon committee to tell you this is all fucked six ways to Sunday." "No, I mean, I feel like I'm missing something."

Sinclair replies drying. "There's something bothering me and I just can't put my finger on it." "Well, you've been saying from the beginning that Princess Angeline's death felt off – like a political scheme." I contribute softly. "Right, but one the Prince is too unimaginative to have orchestrated." Hugo confirms.

Sinclair's eyes widen almost imperceptibly, and then he clenches them shut, closing his hand into a fist and swearing up a storm. "What?" "You know who isn't too unimaginative?" Sinclair growls, scanning our concerned faces.

"Lydia." Henry supplies easily. "And while Prince Damon might have seen his mate as little more than a trophy, he's not the type to impulsively destroy one of his prized possessions. But Lydia wouldn't have any reservations about getting the Princess out of the way."

"Are you saying what I think you are?" I gape, both certain I've understood and yet unable to believe my ears..

"As crazy as it seems, what other explanation do we have?" Sinclair inquires, rising to his feet and pacing back and forth behind the dining table. "If the Prince had lost his temper and beat her to death, I wouldn't question it. And if there was some sort of violent attack, you could make the case for rogues or vengeance for some slight committed by Damon. But poison? That's a woman's weapon."

"True, and if it was a political scheme you would think the royal family would have staged her death and spun the details in a way that benefitted the campaign beyond Damon looking sympathetic."

Henry agrees. "Instead it just seems... odd." "Exactly." Sinclair confirms. "If it was planned, then why haven't they jumped on the golden opportunity to lay blame and cast aspersions? Why haven't the Prince and his son been parading their grief around Moon Valley for all to see?" He gesticulates, getting more and more enthused now.

"I don't think anyone in the palace knew this was coming. I think Lydia got rid of her competition and slid into the role of 'concerned friend' in order to ingratiate herself to the Prince." "You really think Lydia would go to that length?"

Hugo asks skeptically. "Don't forget the way she played my sons for so many years." Henry cuts in, his low voice as harsh as I've ever heard it. "Lydia is a cunning she-wolf who proved herself willing to do anything for power. And if she can ruin her fated mate's life without a shred of remorse, I guarantee she won't have qualms about ruining others."

Sinclair looks ready to argue with the idea that his life is ruined, but this isn't the time.

"Okay, so let's say all this is true," I suggest, trying and failing to wrap my brain around the idea that anyone could be so calculating and cruel. "What does it mean for the campaign?"

"It means that we have some decent ammunition to use against the Prince and Lydia."

Hugo assesses simply. "But surely we have to be careful about using it?" I question. "I mean they need to look like they're in this together, otherwise the story becomes heartless bitch takes advantage of grieving widower.' If we play this wrong the Prince could end up looking even more sympathetic than before"

"That's a good point." Sinclair acknowledges, the corner of his mouth twitching at my made-up headline. "And you'd better believe that Lydia is going to have plenty of dirty tricks up her sleeve.

We might have figured a few things out, but if we're right it means things are even more complicated than before."

"So what's our move?" Henry presses, watching his son with the expression of a proud father wolf who knows his pup already has the answer. First things first, we track down Lydia's husband and encourage him to remind the realm that she isn't the concerned citizen she seems." Sinclair decides firmly.

"Second, we quietly get proof that she was behind the Princess's death, even if we don't plan to use it, we need to know for sure.

Finally, we make sure the pack remembers exactly what kind of mate the Prince was to his wife. He might not be guilty of her murder, but he's certainly guilty of other crimes against her and the people need to see what he calls protection and caring."

"And us?" I ask anxiously, looking up at my mate. Sinclair offers me a grim smile, "We sit tight, focus on keeping our pup and your wolf safe inside you, and hope we don't have to do anything desperate ourselves."

Chapter 117 – Ella Asks Henry for Advice

When Sinclair and Hugo finally leave for the pack headquarters, Henry and I move into our favorite sitting room, returning to the puzzle we began solving together earlier this week. Seated across from the older wolf, I pretend to scan the scattered puzzle pieces for matches, while really sneaking peeks up at him. “So what do you make of all this?”

I ask curiously. “Lydia and the Prince?” Henry grimaces, “I never liked that woman. But trying to argue with headstrong young Alphas’ convinced they’ve found their mate is like beating your head against a wall.”

He offers me a tender smile. “You’ll see soon enough. You can do everything in your power to try and teach your pups the important lessons and prepare them for the real world – but at the end of the day you have to let them make their own mistakes – it’s the only way they learn.”

“Does it ever hurt any less? Or get any easier to watch them go down the wrong path?” I inquire softly.

“Not a damn bit.” Henry shares grimly. However despite his grim look, his eyes sparkle when he looks over at me. “Luckily, that doesn’t seem to be despite his grim look, his eyes sparkle when he looks over at me. “Luckily, that doesn’t seem to be a problem for me anymore. Lydia is out of the picture, my boys are friends again for the first time since losing their mother, and Dominic is on his way to being King.”

“Dominic just told me how his mother died this morning.” I confess, reaching for the old wolf’s gnarled hand. “Im so sorry you went through that.

It must have been terrible for you to be left alone with a pack to rule and two young boys to raise on your own, in the midst of all your grief.”

He nods, “looking back I don’t have the first idea how I survived it. The grief almost destroyed me... and I’m ashamed to say I let it destroy Dominic and Roger’s relationship.” Henry sighs. “I haven’t always been the best father, but I can tell you right now that it was a hell of a lot easier to be one when I had my mate.”

I know what he means. When I thought I was going to be bringing this baby into the world alone, I’d been terrified. Very few people who plan for children expect to end up alone with the responsibility, and though I’d been one of the rare few – it certainly hadn’t been by choice. I was thrilled to finally succeed, but the stakes seemed a thousand times higher without a partner.

I’m still afraid of course, but it feels so much better to be part of a team. I know that as long as Sinclair is alive, I will always have someone to lean on and my pup will have two loving parents to guide him through the world.

"I never Would have believed I could do it without her, and I'm proud that I managed..." Henry continues, his mouth a quavering line. "but I will never stop being haunted by the knowledge that the wrong parent died... they would have been so much better off if Juliet had been here instead of me."

"Please don't say that." I beg, feeling tears in my eyes for the second time in as many hours. "Why not? It's true." Henry shrugs, his dark eyes shining. "There's no use denying it or letting ego get in the way. You'll see that too – nothing humbles you like being a parent."

My mind scrambles for an argument, not because I want to invalidate his feelings, but because I know in my heart that losing any parent is never the answer. "Has Dominic ever told you about his last conversation with Juliet?" I finally ask, "before the fire started, before everything went wrong?"

Henry thinks for a moment, "No, not that I can recall." Slowly, careful to get the details right, I repeat the story Sinclair shared with me this morning. Dominic's mother gave him permission to ignore what society dictated," I summarize at the end."

But he already had the example you provided to guide him. He was only six, and he might always have remembered those words because they were her last, but he lived them because of you. He is the Alpha he is today because of you. Because you showed him every day how to walk the walk."

"You know that all happened right here?" Henry inquires thoughtfully, his expression far off as he looks around the room. "I moved the boys to a new home after the fire. But when Dominic grew up and made his fortune, he rebuilt the original manor in her honor."

"I didn't know," I admit, looking around the huge mansion. "Was it always this grand?"

Henry chuckles. "It was even grander in my day – Dominic isn't the only one who did well for himself, you know."

"I know." I laugh, snatching up a distinctive puzzle piece belonging to my current focus area. But I think I got us distracted. I was asking you about Lydia."

"Darling, when you have all day, diversions are a blessing, not a curse." Henry advises warmly, patting the arms of his wheelchair. "The first year I was in this chair, I would have begged for a lovely young she-wolf to distract me from the monotony."

"And now I feel like you might be distracting me intentionally." I remark slyly. Henry chuckles again, but it's the defeated laugh of a man who knows the game is up. "Oh Ella, you are too clever for your own good, you know that?"

Just tell me, Henry.” I request gently. “Whatever is worrying you can’t be as painful as reliving your mate’s death.”

His brows arch and he flashes his fangs in agreement. “It’s just that I’ve seen this film before” He finally admits. “I’ve seen what happens when there’s this kind of competition for the throne, and it never ends well for anyone.”

“Isn’t it always like this?” I inquire, not caring that I might be showing my ignorance of shifter politics.

“No, it isn’t.” Henry explains. “Normally the Alphas of each pack in the union are pretty evenly matched. They battle it out on the campaign trail, the people vote and the Alpha’s who don’t get enough points return to their council duties. The problem is when you have a few extremely strong Alphas competing at the top, forcing all the pack Alpha’s to choose sides and form alliances rather than competing themselves. It focuses all the pressure and all the danger on the one or two men who actually stand to win.”

“So when there are lots of wolves in the running, they’re so busy keeping an eye on all their opponents that they can’t afford to zero in on anyone in particular. But when there are only a few, it results in all the stuff we’ve been facing?” I question, searching for clarity. “The assassination attempts and death threats?”

“Yes.” Henry confirms. “And the divisions are worse because Dominic and the Prince are two very different animals. The Prince has the edge for being the King’s heir. He has wealth and a clear willingness to throw thousands of ordinary wolves under the bus to benefit his friends. He’s famously corrupt, and everyone knows he can be bought for the right price. For a certain type of person, that’s a very tempting type of King to place in power.”

“But Dominic is the exact opposite.” I realize slowly. “So those same people who would benefit if the Prince wins, suddenly stand to lose in a big way if an honest, incorruptible wolf takes control.”

Henry nods. “You’re starting to see now. Dominic views all this as the fight between good vs evil, and in some ways he’s right.”

“But in others?” I press, feeling my heart beat faster with every word we speak. “The world isn’t split up into angels and devils, Ella” Henry sighs, “it’s full of complicated and flawed individuals with a thousand different motives guiding them forward.”

“I thought.. it sounded like the united packs and the Alpha council want stability over everything else though.” I object, rubbing my, suddenly aching, neck. “Yes, but what is stability?" Henry challenges.

Dominic believes it's peace, but there are a lot of people out there who see it as preserving the status quo; ensuring that those currently in power remain in power to avoid constant turnover in leadership." "Why are you telling me all this?" I ask, my mouth suddenly feeling very dry.

"Because I know my son, I know the way he talks." Henry answers seriously. "Dominic grew up in this world and he's suffered the harsh realities it creates. He understands all this even if he doesn't make it explicit. But you're not from this world, and I want to make sure you know what you're truly up against."

"You're saying that I shouldn't assume we're going to win." I assess shakily. "I need to be realistic about the possibility that we'll lose."

"Yes, Ella." Henry confirms sorrowfully. "I hate to say it, but the more we learn about your past, about Lydia's schemes and all the chaos that has happened in between. this is feeling less and less like a journey to the top, and more like a bomb waiting to explode." My hand gravitates protectively towards my belly. "I think I'm going to be sick."

Henry reaches for me, looking worried now. "I'm sorry, dear one. Should I have kept my mouth shut?" "No." I breathe, trying to calm my gag reflex. "I needed to know. And now that I do -I can start to prepare."

Chapter 118 – Ella Takes a Stand

Ella

I've been replaying my conversation with Henry all day long, repeating the exchange over and over in my mind and trying to decipher if the old Alpha was trying to want me as a mere precaution, or because he really believes we have something to be worried about. After Henry left this evening I got online and started looking into the actual mechanics of the election – something I should have done from the very beginning.

It all looks fairly simple on paper. All eligible Alphas compete in the public arena and all the shifters in the realm vote on election day. This usually results in two or three frontrunners, and the Alpha council makes its selection based on the remaining competitors. If there's a wide margin and a clear winner, they usually just reinforce the popular Vote, but when there are ties or controversies, they provide an important check on the system.

Once elected, the Alpha King will remain in power until they die, coronate one of their heirs, or are removed from power by council decree.

Historically elections are actually very rare, because most King's belong to an existing dynasty and pass down the title through the generations of their children. As I'm reading, I discover that the current King is the only the third ruler in history to ever be removed from power, and his own election five years ago was the first in 200 years.

The fact that the wolves are already having another Vote is absolutely unprecedented. The knot in my stomach tightens as all this information comes together. I realize that Henry was right to warn me, after all. "What are you frowning at so intently, trouble?"

Sinclair inquires, striding out of the bathroom and ruffling his wet hair with a towel. Another Swath of terry cloth is slung around his hips, and water drips down his bare torso. My mouth waters as I take in the sight of his rippling muscles and powerful physique, but the heavy weight in my stomach is preventing my inner wolf from getting too distracted.

"Dominic, what will happen if we lose the campaign?" I inquire hesitantly, still sitting in bed with the computer in my lap. Sinclair's face pulls into a grimace, and he crosses the distance between us, peeking at my screen.

Seeing a dozen tabs worth of dry political research open in my browser, he slides his hand around my nape, massaging my tense muscles. "Doing some research?"

"Yes." I confirm gravely. "And I have to admit, I'm worried." He sits on the edge of the bed, still cradling my head in his oversized hand. “What’s bothering you most?” “I just feel like everything is getting more confusing and out of hand every day.” I share.

Your father explained a little of the history to me, and when I stop and think about all the secrets, conspiracies and crises that keep popping up.. it’s hard not to feel like something seriously sketchy is going on. I’m beginning to feel like a pawn in some game I didn’t even know I was playing.” Sinclair pauses, his hands stilling on my body.

Am I making you feel that way?” “No, not you.” I assure him, closing the laptop and sliding closer to Sinclair. “But I also don’t know who is pulling the strings here. I feel like we’re being swept up in something much bigger than us, and it scares me.” Sinclair nods in understanding, “I’m scared too.”

He admits, shocking me. “You are?” I squeak, scooting even closer and practically climbing on top of him. Sinclair purrs and pulls me all the way into his lap.

“Of course I am. I have a lot to lose.” He proclaims soberly, squeezing me tightly so that I know he’s talking about Rafe and me. “But that’s not a bad thing. It’s a constant reminder about what’s really important. It helps me keep our family safe and pushes me to take precautions I might not otherwise.

It’s the reason I can’t accept defeat in It’s strangely comforting to hear this huge Alpha confessing his own fears. On one hand it should terrify me to know that he doesn’t feel as indomitable as he always seems, but I like knowing that I’m not alone in this – that I’m not just being silly or cowardly.

I understand that you have to approach the campaign as if losing is not an option.” I tell him, moving to straddle his thighs and take his face in my hands. I stare up into his fierce green eyes, brushing my thumbs over the layer of scruff covering his stony jaw.

“But it is a possibility, and I need to prepare for that. I need to know what to expect, I need to know the plan.”

Sinclair exhales heavily, his hands clenching and unclenching on my waist. His rugged mouth is set in a hard line, and I quickly see that he doesn’t want to add to my fears by putting new possibilities in my head. “You must have one. You’re too smart not to prepare for the worst case, even if you don’t plan on letting it come to pass.”

He drops his head to the crook of my neck, breathing in my scent and rumbling deep in his chest. “If I lose the campaign..” He begins slowly, his voice like gravel in my ear. “It will all depend on how fast the Prince moves, and where we are when it happens.”

Sinclair doesn’t say any more, and I nudge his head up, forcing him to look me in the eye again. But you must have some idea -“

“Ella, I have dozens of contingency plans in place.” Sinclair interrupts, sounding as though he’s run out of patience. “I have plans for getting you out of the territory while I stay behind, I have plans for us being exiled together, for my imprisonment, my death, your capture. If you can think of it, I have a plan for it, sweetheart. But we don’t know how this is going to play out yet, and I can’t tell you which plan we’re going to need if the worst happens.”

My lower lip quivers dangerously, and I can’t help the fresh bloom of hurt that blossoms in my chest. “Why didn’t you tell me you were this worried? I thought we agreed that I can’t avoid danger if I don’t know it exists.”

Sinclair takes a deep breath, appearing to calm himself. “All Alphas have plans like this, Ella.” He explains. “Whether Or not there is a campaign, Alphas always have targets on their backs. I had these plans for Linda when we were married, and I have my men drafting new plans as the situation develops.”

“Oh.” I murmur, my pain easing a little. “So you just didn’t consult me.” “Baby, I don’t even know all the plans.” Sinclair counters. “These are emergency scenarios which our guards spend countless hours developing and memorizing. I notify them every time a new threat or vulnerability develops, and they build it into their equations.”

This makes sense, but my bullshit barometer is still flashing red in my mind. “But you must know the most likely ones – you must have directed your men about how to care for the baby and me if you can’t be there to protect us yourself?”

“Yes.” Sinclair concedes, lifting me off of him and rising to his feet. He’s pacing now, giving off the feral energy of a caged animal. “And I didn’t tell you because I’m already going out of my fucking mind with worry about all this! I can’t stand thinking about these possibilities myself, so I certainly didn’t want to frighten you with them too.”

”He glances at me regretfully, raw emotion blazing in his brilliant irises. “I couldn’t stand the idea of looking you in the eye and telling you I might not be able to protect you and this baby the way I’ve promised I always will.”

My heart softens, and not for the first time, I realize just how much stress Sinclair is under. Moreover, I realize just how much he downplays his own anxieties and fears in order to prioritize mine. “Listen to me, Dominic. I know you have your Alpha pride and you get to make the rules and all that other nonsense.”

I summarize impudently, climbing out of bed and approaching the big wolf. “But I also know Lunas are supposed to share their mate’s burdens and soothe them when they’re being impossible and stubborn. We know I’m not just some weak human now. I can handle more than you're giving me credit for."

The corner of Sinclair's mouth twitches, and I whip my pointer finger toward him in warning, "It's time you let me help you." I declare imperiously, notching my chin up. "So tell me what I can do to make you feel better, and I'll do it."

As I glare up at Sinclair, I suddenly realize that I might have bitten off more than I can chew. His eyes are glowing now, and his fangs extended. His scent has deepened and grown even richer, and all of a sudden I find my body hitched up against his.

The finger I'd been pointing at him is now trapped in his powerful fist, and the breath is wrenched from my lungs as his growl washes over me. "You know the problem with all this, little wolf?"

He asks, sending shivers of delight down my spine. "When I told you she-wolves soothed their mates, I didn't mean they did it with kind words and cuddles. What I need is to feel in control even though the world around me is falling apart. What I need is to calm the wolf clawing his way out beneath my skin, rabid with the need to claim his mate"

I gulp, feeling my own wolf roll right over and expose her soft underbelly to him. "Well,

Chapter 119 – Ella Panics

Ella

The next thing I know, Sinclair is prowling forward across the room, backing me towards the bed. He seems barely human, barely in control of his wolf – but I understand now why he hasn't sought more comfort from me. I'd gotten so used to his sultry innuendos and dark promises that I forgot how serious these matters truly are to wolves. But now I see the truth. I pushed him, forced him to admit things he was trying to shield me from, then challenged his authority, demanded that he let me do my job.

My inner wolf is a veritable basket case. She's both excited and intimidated, thrilled and daunted, eager to please and utterly defiant about the idea of submitting to anyone – even Sinclair. For weeks now she's been begging for Sinclair's mark, and now that the ridiculous creature is about to get it – she wants to play hard to get. The backs of my knees collide with the bed, and Sinclair lifts me as though I weigh nothing, tossing me back into the plush comfort of my nest.

I scramble onto my hands and knees, baring my teeth at the bossy wolf and emitting a soft growl. I don't appreciate him messing up the safe cocoon I created for our pup, and though something deep down inside of me is quivering with appreciation for his dominance, I don't care for his high-handed behavior.

Sinclair unslings the towel still wrapped around his waist, an ominous chuckle on his lips. "Such a fierce little mate." He observes, his eyes hooded with desire. "Have you already forgotten how desperate you've been to bare my mark?"

I narrow my eyes as he crawls onto the bed, climbing over the overabundance of pillows and blankets. He lashes out and catches my ankle, deftly sliding my legs out from under me and pulling me towards him over the mattress. I yelp in surprise, but the next thing I know "updated by jobnib.com" I'm on my back with Sinclair looming over me, blissfully naked. My eyes scan his chiseled form: from his glorious bronze skin, which glistens in the low light; to his devilishly handsome face; and all the way down to the huge, hard member between his legs.

Suddenly I find myself stretching out so he can appreciate my curves, shifting and writhing against the silken sheets. It's as if the mere sight of this man was able to steal my sanity, to make me forget my resolve to make him work for his prize.

"There she is." Sinclair croons, extending a single claw and dragging it down the front of my top, only deep enough to tear the thin fabric without touching my delicate flesh.

"All fire and feistiness until you get a peek of something you like." I gasp, feeling another flash of indignance even as heat pools low in my belly. His claws eviscerate my sweatpants as well, and now I'm naked before him.

His ravenous gaze travels every inch of my exposed skin, and his pupils dilate with unbridled lust. "I have to say I know the feeling." He croons. It should be a crime to be so gorgeous."

His compliments make me preen and show off even more. I don't understand why I'm behaving this way, but my wolf is calling the shots now. I rise up onto my knees, sliding my hands up his bare chest and nibbling his pecs. I planned on kissing him once I reached his mouth, fantasized about dragging him down to the bed and making him forget his own name.

Then one of Sinclair's powerful fists forms a handhold in my hair, and he tilts my head back, holding me captive. His free hand trails down to the curve of my belly, settling over our pup. "Im not going to claim you, Ella." He rumbles, sternly and a needy whine escapes my lips. Sinclair's lips graze mine as he speaks, his eyes boring into my oWn, absorbing every ounce of my frustration and desire.

"But I am going to take you up on your offer." He informs me huskily. "Im going to take control, Ella. And if you test me, I will treat you exactly how I would treat any other naughty she- wolf." He proclaims, softening his tone but not his hold. "I need you to promise you'll tell me if I cross a line."

"And if I said you already have?" I challenge, not meaning a word of it, but wanting to see how far I can push him.

"Then Id remind you that I can smell your arousal." Sinclair purrs, sliding the hand on my tummy between my legs. His thick fingers immediately sink into the wetness soaking my cleft, and I can barely restrain my moan of delight." And your mischief," Sinclair adds, knocking his nose against mine, "and your fear."

I snap my teeth at him, feeling wilder and more fearless than I can ever remember being. Sinclair only chuckles, removing his fingers from my aching s3x – despite my outrage. "So that's the way it's going to be, hmm?"

It wouldn't be true control if you didn't have to take it. My wolf answers in my head, apparently not quite ballsy enough to speak to Sinclair directly.

Seriously? I demand. You brazen little – Hey, don't slut shame me. She answers indignantly. There's nothing wrong with knowing what you want and going after it.

Excuse me, but do you actually know what you want? I silently scoff. One moment you're provoking him and the next you're writhing around under him like a cat in heat.

Hey, don't call me a cat – that's offensive. She snipes. Besides, It's all part of the game, silly. I can practically hear her rolling her eyes. You'll see. He needs this, and so do I. That's easy for you to say. I complain. You're writing checks but my ass is the one who has to cash them.

Don't act like you were some shrinking violet before you found out about me, she accuses. You were getting yourself in trouble long before you knew your true nature.

Forcing myself back into the present, I realize that Dominic has been watching the emotions flitting across my face, waiting for me to respond.

Amusement is clear in his wolfish smirk, but he doesn't show me any mercy. "What's the matter, baby? Your wolf giving you trouble?" His strong hands are moving over my naked form, caressing me almost reverently, even as he taunts me.

This time my wolf does respond for me, "No, I've simply changed my mind." I reply with a sniff. "I don't want your mark anymore. I think I'll go out and try to find a different mate instead. One who's not afraid to claim what's his."

Horror floods me as I realize what I've just said, and suddenly Sinclair's hands are anything but reverent. He rotates his neck as if he's having to physically force his instincts down, and when he returns his gaze to me, he looks absolutely lethal. "Well in that case, I'll just have to make sure you can't get away."

Sinclair pounces, and the next thing I know, I'm flat on my back on the bed. His mouth crashes into mine, and from then on the only sounds I make are whimpers and moans. I know this is just the beginning. I know I pushed Sinclair so far that he's going to find some diabolically sexy way of punishing me, and Goddess help me, but I can't wait. I slide my arms and legs around him, holding his body to mine as he steals kiss after kiss. When my lips are swollen and red, he moves on, kissing, licking and nipping his way over my jaw and down my neck.

I rock my hips into his, thinking how incredibly easy it would be to slide myself onto his hardness right now. After all, there's nothing between our bodies anymore, and my slickness is already coating his thick shaft from all our grinding. I try to lift my hips high enough to hook his tip inside my channel, but Sinclair realizes what I'm doing and clamps his hands around my hips, forcing them back down.

Sinclair shakes his head, sounding amused but also as though he's barely clinging to his own self-control. "Such a bad girl." He admonishes, leaving the soft spot behind my ear. Sinclair's fangs graze my sensitive earlobe, followed shortly by the deep vibrations of his voice. "Tell me, sweet Ella. Has anyone ever tied you up?"

With those simple words, the entire world is wrenched right out from under me. I'm no longer safe in my nest with Sinclair. I'm twenty years and a hundred miles away, forced back into a past I never wanted to revisit.

I must have gone completely stiff in his arms, because Sinclair's steady weight lifts away from me, and his worried face appears above me.

"Sweetheart, what is it?" I push him away, sitting up and heaving in panicked breaths as the blood rushes in my ears. The room around me has disappeared, replaced by the wretched halls of the orphanage. I'm shaking from head to toe, and no matter what I do, I can't seem to get enough air to breathe.

"Fuck," Sinclair curses under his breath, and I feel his strong arms wrapping around me. "Ella, it's okay. You're safe."

I clamp my eyes shut, trying to banish the sights and smells assaulting my mind, the memories I've tried so hard to forget. Sinclair hesitantly shifts me into his lap, rocking me back and forth. He repeats the same words over and over again. "You're safe. I'm here"

It takes some time but eventually I believe him. I come hurtling back down to earth at the speed of a meteor, crashing into a crater of despair. Still Sinclair doesn't stop telling me that I'm safe and that he loves me. I cling to him like a liferaft, praying that this solace will never cease, but knowing it must. There's no avoiding it now. When I'm calm enough I'm going to have to explain – and that's the very last thing I want to do.

Chapter 120 – Sinclair Walks Out

Ella

When my panic attack finally eases and I can breathe again, I peek up at Sinclair, tears burning in my eyes. “I’m sorry.” I murmur weakly, hating that my stupid brain ruined our moment.

“Why the hell are you apologizing?” Sinclair counters, still petting me. He hadn’t let me go even once as I weathered the storm of anxiety and despair, only pulling the pillows and blankets of my nest closer so I would feel secure.

“Because I screwed everything up.” I explain thickly. “I was supposed to be helping you and I fell apart at a mere suggestion.” Shame is coursing through my veins, not because of the panic itself, but because of what it might mean: that I’m too fragile, too broken, to be Sinclair’s Luna.

“Ella, don’t be silly.” He replies, and though I understand he didn’t mean to dismiss my feelings, the words still sting. Sinclair opens his mouth to continue, undoubtedly with some trite platitude about how ‘these things happen’ or similar, but I cut him off.

“I’m not being silly!” I insist with exasperation.

What good am I as a mate if I can’t even be there for you when you need me? I get to lie around all day doing nothing while you’re out saving the world. You are constantly taking care of me on top of all your other worries, and I never give you anything in return. It’s not right. You shouldn’t have to comfort me when you’re the one who needs to decompress!” I burst, throwing up my hands. “All this time we’ve been convinced that I can’t be your Luna because I’m human, but we never even considered that I might not be up to the task, even as a wolf.” My voice is shaking with fresh tears, and I can’t look at Sinclair as I continue, “But now... what more evidence do we need?”

Sinclair doesn’t make a sound, and when I look at him, he’s positively fuming. His heavy breathing and black expression tell me he’s barely holding onto his temper, and the hands which were caressing me mere moments ago are now stationary and stiff. I watch as he struggles to quell his anger, even though I’m not sure what I said to infuriate him this way. After a second he shakes his head, apparently surrendering the battle. “I need a minute, Ella.” He finally growls, “I need to go for a run, but I don’t want to leave you unless you’re alright.”

“Stop it!” I burst, my voice cracking. I’m out of the bed in a heartbeat, pacing back and forth in front of the bed. “This is exactly what I’m talking about! Stop protecting me from reality. If you’re angry with me, then be angry! Let me deal with the consequences of my weakness!”

Sinclair leaps out of the nest, stalking forward with white-knuckled fists. "I'm not going to yell at you when you've just had a panic attack, Ella. If you want to be upset with me, fine, but I need to let my wolf out and run off this temper." He turns and charges for the door, bypassing me completely.

Then, at the last moment, he turns back, his wolf glowing in his eyes. "And for the record, this isn't special treatment." He rumbles angrily, "I don't believe in arguing or taking action when I'm out of control this way. If you need anything while I'm gone, just ask the guards."

With that, Sinclair disappears, and I can hear his wolf racing away down the hall. For a while I simply stand there, staring after him. I'm shaking again, and I'm trying my best not to dissolve into a fresh bout of weeping. I consider calling Cora, but I remember the way she accused me of selfishly unloading my problems onto her, and I refrain.

My wolf is pacing anxiously in my head, whimpering like a pup and feeling just as raw as I am – if more feral. She's begging me to do something, to fix this, but I don't know how. I might have felt terrible for falling apart when I was supposed to be soothing Sinclair, but my wolf seems much more distraught about Sinclair's anger.

We should go after him! She begs. I can't stand it, we have to fix this. We can't. I grumble in reply. Even if I wasn't on bed rest and it was perfectly safe, we'll never be able to catch up with him. Besides, he'll only be angrier if we leave the house.

She whimpers in understanding, though she's still beside herself. I climb back into bed, curling into a little ball and pulling the blankets over my head. I haven't felt this way before, though Sinclair has certainly been angry with me in the past. Hey, I ask my wolf after some thought. Why weren't you this upset when he accused me of being a gold digger, or when he spanked me or dragged me out of Cora's?

All those times were different. She argues. I was barely awake in the beginning, and when he's been angry in the past it's been protective. This is the first time he's really been hostile .. and the first time he's walked out. What if he doesn't come back?

Of course he'll come back. I assure her, but there's a small part of me that fears the exact same thing. Logically I know he has to come back, even if he only returns to end our relationship – after all, he lives here. But somewhere deep down inside of me there's a frightened orphan who imagines I'll never see him again. But what if he decides we're not worth the trouble, and simply takes off for greener pastures? My wolf presses.

You're being ridiculous! I shout at her. His entire life is here. His pack is here. He has too much integrity to abandon his duty that way. But what if? She digs in her paws. It wouldn't be the first time. He told us no wolf would ever willingly abandon their pup, especially with humans – but our parents did.

Something must be seriously wrong with us – what if he's finally figured it out too? What if this was the last straw? "Stop it!" I cry aloud, clamping my hands over my ears, even though her voice is inside my head. "

Stop it, stop it, stop it!" A sob wrenches from my chest, and the more time that passes, the more convinced I am that she's right. I almost feel as though I've left my body and am watching all this take place. I've had out of body experiences before, so I know that this isn't what's happening, but still – I'm both conscious of how irrational I'm being, but unable to do a thing to stop myself from spiraling deeper into my fears and insecurities.

When I finally hear Sinclair's footsteps climbing the stairs, the violent fist clenched around my heart starts to relax, but only just. If he's back it must be to end things. My wolf wails. I want to shush her, but instead I focus on trying to look as though I haven't just spent the better part of two hours crying like a baby. I whip the blankets off and straighten my body, dragging my fingers through my hair and wiping the accumulated salt from my eyelashes.

So when the door opens and Sinclair walks in, still naked but considerably dirtier than he was when he left, I'm sitting up in bed pretending to read a book. I look up at him, cursing my lower lip for trembling. He certainly looks calmer now, but there's an undeniable tightness around his eyes as he looks me over. He comes over and moves to sit on the edge of the bed, but my wolf sees the dirt on his golden skin and a growl surfaces in my chest.

Seeming to understand that he's not allowed to sully my nest, Sinclair reaches his hand towards me, "come take a bath with me." I glance at his muddy feet skeptically, and he sighs. "I'll rinse off in the shower first."

"Then why not just shower?" I suggest, not wanting to put myself in a situation where I have to feel his body against mine as he breaks my heart. "Because I want to have a bath with you." Sinclair answers gruffly, "and I can tell you're still upset. We could both use it."

"Can we just get this over with?" I huff, Wrapping my arms around myself to hide my trembling." There's no reason to draw it out, Dominic. Just tell me what you decided," His face crumples into a grimace, "Decided about what?"

"Whether or not you're going to keep me!" I exclaim, knowing that I'm completely failing in my attempt to seem calm and collected. Just like that, Sinclair's face closes off, and my heart sinks. Oh Goddess, I was right! My wolf howls mournfully. However instead of agreeing to my request, Sinclair glares and issues a single command, "Bath. Now."

Chapter 121 – Ella's Past

Trigger Warning: This chapter contains experiences of abuse and sexual assault, nothing explicit, but please take care reading..

Sinclair

Ella's small body is completely stiff in my arms, even though we're in her favorite place. I've only bathed with her once before, but it didn't take a rocket scientist to figure out how much she loves a bubble bath. She takes at least four a week, and when she's upset I've known her to have a bath even after showering.

Until I spoke with Cora about Ella's self-care practices, I didn't understand the connection to her childhood experience of neglect, but now that I know I'm determined never to deprive her of the comfort even if my water bills go through the roof and the city goes into a drought.

"Are you ready to talk this out, trouble?" I inquire, resting my hands on her round tummy and feeling a pulse of stress from the baby. A fresh spark of worry assails me, and I know that Rafe is channeling his mother's fraught emotions. Ella doesn't respond to my question, and I press on, realizing that the poor little wolf isn't going to relax until she knows I'm not going to reject her. Sweetheart, it never even crossed my mind to end things. I love you Ella's muscles tighten further, though I didn't think such a thing was possible.

"But..She stammers, twisting around to look at me, "but you left!" I'm sorry that I walked out." I reply gently, grazing my knuckles over her cheek. "But it wasn't because I ever had doubts about us." I share, wondering about my sweet mate's reaction.

I know some survivors of child abuse view any confrontation as a disaster or threat, but Ella has weathered my anger in the past without any signs of a trauma response. "I was angry that you thought you don't contribute anything to our relationship, and my wolf lost it when you suggested you couldn't be my Luna. The idea of losing you pushed me over the edge, and I needed to calm down before continuing."

Ella's brow furrows, and I can see her grappling with her emotions. "Dominic, I didn't just think you might end things." She whispers, staring at the water. "I wasn't even sure you'd come back.. think.. I think maybe I have some abandonment issues I wasn't completely aware of. And Mike's betrayal and learning that I'm a wolf has thrown them into very sharp focus."

Understanding washes over me, and I gently flip her body the rest of the way over. When Ella is facing me completely, I snuggle her to my chest, lowering my knees so that she can straddle my lap. "I'm so sorry, baby." I profess, kissing her head and stroking her spine. "I shouldn't have left you when you were already upset, I just don't trust myself not to say things I don't mean when I'm that angry.

The same way I would never make a pack ruling or deliver a punishment in the height of a fury. I think taking some space in the heat of the moment can be healthy, but maybe we can find some way to take breaks in fights without too much physical distance." I suggest. "But even if we can't, you need to know that no matter how far I go or how long I stay away, I will always come back to you, Ella."

Ella whimpers, and her arms tighten around me. "Thank you," She hiccups, "and I'm sorry I said I couldn't be your Luna, but you have to admit that I'm not pulling my weight here. This isn't the first time I've tried to be there for you and failed."

"Ella, look at me for a moment." I order, sliding my finger under her chin and pulling her eyes up to mine. "First of all you take care of me all the time. You saved my campaign. You keep me calm when I'm being an ogre You stand up to bullies like the Prince and Lydia, and you share my burdens even when I don't want you to. Moreover, I need to dominate my mate. It's in an Alpha's DNA to nurture and protect. If you didn't let me comfort and take care of you, I would be a mess."

Ella frowns. "But I didn't let you. I panicked. "That's the other thing." I sigh, recalling the terror that came over her beautiful face when I suggested tying her up. I've growled and grumbled at Ella a thousand times.

I've put her over my knee and overpowered her countless times without any issue. In fact most of the time her wolf responds to my bossiness like a bee to honey. "I think we both know this didn't happen randomly. I accidentally triggered something specific, didn't I?"

I'm still holding Ella's chin, but her eyes look anywhere but at me. Slight pressure nudges my fingers as Ella gives a slight nod, and then her wide gaze returns to mine, suddenly so vulnerable that my heart aches. "Do we have to talk about it?"

I wish I could tell her no, promise that she won't ever have to relive her painful memories, but I know that wouldn't help anything. "We're in a sexual relationship, Ella. I can't avoid your triggers if I don't know what they are." I reason, "and keeping these things buried only causes them to fester.

Tears well in those brilliant gold orbs, and I hate knowing that I'm causing my mate to cry for the upteenth time today. "Do we have to talk about it now.

I think so." I resolve gravely. "It's never going to hurt any less, and the sooner you tell me, the sooner it will be over with."

Ella nods again, and I let her rest her cheek on my chest as she begins to speak.

“The orphanage had these dormitories that were divided by age. So the youngest children would share a room, and the older we got, we would move up accordingly. Cora is a year older than me, but when she turned eleven and was going to be moved into a dorm with the older girls we both panicked a bit. We’d always been together and didn’t want to be separated, and she also used to crawl into my bed at night when she had nightmares – which was most nights.

She was afraid that the older girls would make fun of her, and I didn’t want to leave her without a friend when monsters visited her dreams. Long story short, I pitched a fit so they would allow me to move with her.”

“I remember being surprised at how easily they agreed, but the dormitory matron seemed really pleased to have me.” Ella pauses, taking a deep breath. “She was always telling me how pretty I was.. and that she’d had her eye on me for some time. I didn’t understand what she meant, but she always gave me a really uneasy feeling. In hindsight I think that might have been part of why I was so determined to stay with Cora... I think my instincts were warning me that the new dorm wasn’t safe.”

As Ella speaks, my wolf is growling louder and louder in my head, his energy becoming more vicious and unhinged by the moment. We both know what is coming, and suddenly I’m doubting whether or not I’ll be able to stay calm enough to hear this.

“The first night in the dorm seemed normal at first. Lights out was at eight, so everyone got in bed and everything shut off. But when the clock struck midnight, everything changed. I remember waking up with Cora beside me, and all the other girls were out of bed and slinking away.”

“I watched them sneak behind curtains, in cupboards, behind furniture and into any nook and Cranny they could find... They were hiding.” Ella explains hoarsely. “I tried to ask what was happening, but no one answered. I had enough sense to realize something was very wrong, so woke Cora and told her to hide. She climbed into the laundry basket, and I got under my bed and held myself up off the floor, balancing my hands and feet against the underside of the bed frame”

“The matron came in about a minute later, and she didn’t say a word, she just began searching. She must have been excited that there were new children to prey on, because she found some of the veteran girls and just ignored them. She would open a cabinet, peer inside, and cluck when she saw the trembling child inside, then close it up as if nothing happened... Then she found Cora.”

Ella’s eyes are clenched shut, and I’m trying to calm myself down enough to purr for her, but it isn’t easy. “I didn’t know what was going to happen, but every instinct I possessed was screaming with alarm. I knew that it was bad and I didn't want Cora to be hurt. so I jumped out of my hiding spot and made sure she saw me. I told her...

I told her to take me instead."

Chapter 122 – Ella's Past Part 2

Sinclair

Don't shift, don't shift, don't shift. I think manically Ella needs you. Listening to Ella recount her childhood always makes me furious, but this time is worse than all the others. I've suspected that Ella suffered terrible traumas for some time now, but before this night I'd been able to pacify my outrage with the hope that I'm wrong. No longer.

As Ella speaks, I wonder how she could ever imagine herself weak. I can't even stand to listen to her story, but she actually lived it. She sacrificed herself for her sister, and she survived things I can only imagine "When the matron realized it was me, she smiled so cruelly that my stomach turned she was only too glad to take, me instead of Cora." Ella continues, shuddering with the memory. Her unease gives my wolf the push he needed to put aside his own rage and comfort her. I finally manage a weak purr, and Ella presses her nose to my chest, breathing in my scent.

"She took me to her own room and put me in her bed, and then she got in with me and.. started touching me in ways I didn't like or understand.

She made me touch her too, and she never stopped talking She told me how pretty I was over and over, and kept asking me if I liked it. I said no, but she just insisted that this was a special, secret game I was lucky to play. She said everything I was feeling might be confusing, but it was good and right and natural. She said it took practice, but that we'd have plenty of time.. Afterwards she took me back to the dorm with a reminder not to share our secret. Cora asked me what happened but I didn't know how to explain."

"The next day I went to the doctor in residence, and I told him what the matron had done. I'd never liked him much, but in my heart I knew what had happened was wrong, and I didn't know who else to tell. I thought that since it was about my body, the doctor was the one who could help.

There was no such thing as sex ed at the orphanage and no one else ever talked to us about our bodies. At first I was relieved to tell someone. The doctor seemed very concerned, and agreed that it sounded strange."

"Then he told me that he needed to examine me. Ella's words are coming in starts and stops now, and her shaking is getting worse. The bath is still steaming around us, so I know she isn't cold and I know the worst isn't over yet. "He took off my clothes and put me on the exam table. and then I'll never forget the way he said, 'now it's very important that you be still, Ella. This is a different kind of exam than you're used to, and if you move too much I could hurt you.

Tears stream down Ella's cheeks as she quotes the doctor, and it takes all my strength to contain my wolf. "Then he said, I know little girls can have a hard time staying still, so I have these nifty straps to help you. He pulled out restraints from under the table and strapped me down. and then he asked me exactly what the matron did, and when I explained he would touch me exactly how she had, saying like this? and if I didn't answer, if I cried or objected, he would only do it rougher and demand I tell him".

"After the first minute or so I figured out what he was about, and I didn't want to answer his questions anymore, but if I didn't speak he would start guessing more and more abuses, always demonstrating them on my body. They were far worse than anything she'd done.. So I answered. I told him how to hurt me." Ella is interrupted by my ferocious snarl, and she looks up at me for the first time since she started speaking. Her eyes are overflowing, but she offers me a bitter smile and reaches up to stroke my jaw. "It's okay, big bad wolf, it's almost over.

My snarl becomes a whine, and Ella determinedly forges on. "I was too young to understand why they did those things, but I knew how it made me feel: guilty, tainted, defiled.. I never wanted it to happen again, but I was already broken, and there were other girls like Cora who weren't yet.

Oh no. No, no, no tell me she didn't! I have a horrible sick feeling in my stomach, and I wish could go back in time and whisk Ella away from that horrible place before anyone could hurt her.

Of course, that only would have meant other children would be hurt, which is how I already know what Ella did. My brave, brilliant little mate would never stand by and let another child be abused... even if it meant being abused herself.

"So I stopped hiding at night. I gave myself up so the others wouldn't be touched.. I figured I couldn't be ruined more than I already was, and it was better than allowing someone else to be destroyed." Ella shares, confirming my fears but also magnifying my despair by explaining her logic. "The matron came almost every night... and the doctor would call me in for check ups every few weeks. I hated those visits worse than anything. the matron was sort of gentle, and she never tied me down or gagged me. She didn't want to inflict pain, she seemed determined to make me like it."

The doctor was different. He was a true sadist; he loved my fear, loved my pain. And he escalated over time." Ella hides her face in my neck as she concludes her horrible tale "When I was twelve he r*ped me, and that's when Cora and I ran away. I invited the other girls to run with us, but most were more afraid of living on the street than they were of the matron. Luckily they didn't know about the doctor, and I warned the ones who stayed behind to never confide in him."

My hands are clamped so tightly on Ella I'm afraid I must be hurting her, but she doesn't complain. She's still crying, but her muscles have unwound now that her story is complete. There are tears in my own eyes, and I can only kiss and caress my sweet mate as I process everything she shared. “

Are they still there? The matron and the doctor?” I finally ask, my voice a dangerous hiss.

“No.” Ella replies. “Cora and I could only live outside during the summers, and we tried to stay away through the first winter, but eventually the police found us squatting in an abandoned building and returned us to the orphanage. When we got back they had both been fired. Apparently a state inspection was run and the entire staff was booted out. The new regime wasn’t much better, so we kept running away in the summers, but it was safe enough to return each winter.. I have no idea where those two are now.

I’ll hunt them down.” I decide, bloodthirsty fantasies already racing through my mind. If it’s possible, my wolf is dreaming of even gorier revenges than I am, particularly for the doctor.

We’ll just see how he likes being tied up and gagged. How much he enjoys pain and having things shoved.

“You don’t have to do that.” Ella interrupts his disturbing plans, nuzzling my throat. “I survived, and I’m safe now.” She says it almost as though she’s trying to remind herself more than me, and I scold myself for turning to vengeance when she still needs comforting.

“You are safe.” I confirms, stroking her hair and depositing kisses everywhere I can reach. “You’re safe and loved and the only way anyone will ever hurt you again is over my dead body.” I don’t add that I still plan on finding her abusers, if not for vengeance than to ensure they never harm another child.

I’m painfully aware of the fact that other children might be in their grasps at this very moment, but Ella doesn’t need to hear that Ella pulls her head up, narrowing her red eyes at me “Dominic, I would rather be hurt than lose you.

No. I proclaim, the corner of my mouth twitching up. “I will lay down my life before I allow you to get so much as a paper cut. I will throw myself to the wolves if you even stub your toe.

Ella manages a small laugh, and the pain in my chest eases slightly She peeks up at me from beneath her lashes “But if you’re not here then who will kiss my injuries better? Who will keep me from bumping into furniture and bruising myself?

Hmm, you make a good point." I decide, "perhaps we can negotiate the level of injury that warrants my death."

"How gracious of you" She smiles, sighing as I run my hands up and down her sides. I'm infinitely relieved that Ella has finally relaxed, but I can't get over what she told me.

"You're incredible, you know that? I inquire, knowing she doesn't want to hear it, but shushing her objections. "I mean it, Ella. I know you were angry with yourself for panicking when you were trying to help me, but the fact that you did is the direct result of the sacrifices you made to protect your family. It's not a sign of weakness Sweetheart. It's evidence of your strength your resilience. I lean down to kiss her You were born to be a Luna, and you will be mine.

Chapter 123 – Rogue Attacks

Sinclair

After Ella shared her story with me, we spent a long time just kissing and cuddling, talking through our feelings and reaffirming our love. Still, Ella wasn't entirely soothed.

I could tell she was still beating herself up about her panic attack, no matter how many times I promised her it was all right I just want to be able to give you what you need. Ella moans after a while, sounding as miserable as ever.

"I don't need to tie you up, baby. I promise, wondering if I'll ever be able to convince her that she's enough for me exactly as she is. "There are plenty of other things we can do."

"But the idea of being tied up with you doesn't frighten me." Ella confesses, surprising me. "I think it was just the way you asked. Because it wasn't about you and me, it was about what had been done to me in the past.

I frown, unsure if she's being completely forthright. "That's possible." I agree. "But the chances are that if the question was that upsetting, feeling it would be worse."

"Not if I know it's coming, and not if I'm handcuffed or something. The straps on a medical table are different." Ella argues. "I'm not saying I want to try it right this second or when you're really stressed. It would probably be better when things are calmer so that if I do panic it doesn't ruin everything, but I think I would like to try sometime."

"You really don't have to, Ella." I assure her "Not for my sake. It should be fun for both of us, not something you have to endure."

"I'm not just saying it for you Ella insists. "I don't like thinking that they still have so much power over me. Maybe if I can get over that fear by replacing the bad memories with some good ones I can take my power back."

I narrow my eyes at the little minx, wondering if this is another tactic to convince me. Ella knows I'd do anything to help her, and it would certainly be clever to turn the tables on me this way.

However when I look into her shining eyes, I see only sincerity. "Okay, one day when things are calmer, we can try" I decide, running my hands over her slick skin. "But if you give me reason to think you're just humoring me, you're going to be in big trouble, baby."

"I'm not" Ella insists indignantly, sitting up and giving me a delectable view of water dripping down her bare breasts. "I don't know if it's my wolf coming out or what, but the more time that passes, the more I find myself craving your.. well, your dominance.”

She flushes bright red as the words leave her mouth, and I'm relieved to see that all the heavy emotion of the last hour is starting to fade in favor of flirtation.

“It might be your wolf.” I confirm with a grin, sliding my palms up to cup her sensitive mounds running my thumbs over the tight buds at their center. Ella shivers and arches into my hands, delightfully sensitive amidst her raging hormones.

“Or maybe you've always been a secret sex friend, and you just needed time to tap into that part of yourself.”

Ella blinks, dropping her gaze for a moment before looking back up at me in surprise, as if she's just realized something. “Do you remember when we first found each other, and I was confused because I felt like a different person with you? You said I was becoming the person I was always meant to be, and it just hadn't been safe for me to come out of my shell before.”

“Mmm,” I rumble fondly, needing no help to recall our food fight. “As I recall you thought I was full of it.”

“But you were right.” Ella muses, sliding her arms around my neck. “My wolf recognized you even before I knew she existed.”

“Are you saying I'm right now too, and you are a sex friend?” I joke, beyond pleased when her beautiful laugh meets my ears “only for you. Ella grins, making my inner wolf swell with pride.

“

Well you never have to worry about getting my dominance, trouble.” I tease, dragging her forward for a kiss. “You know exactly how to bring it out” I nip her plump lower lip and claim her mouth again, the passion always simmering for this incredible woman surging to a sudden boil. I'm already fantasizing about how I can create the most pleasure for us both without losing the stranglehold I'm keeping on my mating instincts.

when the bedroom door crashes open in the distance I smell Hugo before I see him, which is the only reason I don't react more forcefully.

Instead I simply pull my mouth lips from Ella's, my wolf going into high alert. If Hugo is barging in this way it must be an emergency. Ella yelps when my Beta stalks in a moment later, Ella is hiding her face in my neck, almost as though she thinks

Hugo might not be able to see her if she can't see him. I offer her a soft purr, but I look up at my second-in command with instant anxiety, "What's wrong?"

He glances nervously at Ella, but I nod for him to continue. "One of our spies in the border territories just called in an urgent warning. Apparently a coalition of rogue wolves is planning an assault on Moon Valley. Their numbers are in the hundreds and they're coming at us from all sides. This isn't just some raid it's a highly coordinated attack and you can bet they didn't organize it on their own.

"When?" I demand sharply, already reaching for a towel. I slide Ella's body off of mine, concealing her beneath the bubbles of the deep bath and rising out of the water. "Tonight." Hugo sighs in exasperation. "We have maybe two hours to get reinforcements to our scouts."

I swear viciously, the borders of Moon Valley extend for hundreds of miles, we don't have enough time to reach our most remote outposts, and those are probably the ones the rogues will be targeting first. "Call in everyone you can and immediately deploy those already on duty. Send them to the most vulnerable outposts first, and make sure everyone is fully briefed.

Deploy the warning sirens and release a bulletin to all the media outlets in the city, order an immediate lockdown and roll out the emergency helpline for anyone who sights or encounters rogue aggressors. Tell them to issue reminders on shelter locations, and set closing times for two hours from now. Have the hospitals initiate their own emergency protocols and put out a call to any willing and able wolves who want to help defend the city, but make the dangers damn clear. No one under 18.

The words flow from my lips out of pure reflex, and Hugo immediately turns on his heel to carry out my instructions. When he's gone, I turn back to Ella, who is looking up at me with wide eyes. I pluck her out of the bath and wrap her in a towel. "

Listen to me, Ella. Your guards are going to take you to a safe house and it's critical that you stay there until the danger has passed. I'll come for you as soon as I can, but listen to the guards and don't set a single foot outside until the all clear orders have been given. Don't open the door for anyone, and don't even think about doing anything heroic.

If you see an injured child lying in the street, leave them for the guards to help. Do you understand me?" Ella furrows her brow, unease flowing off her in waves "But where will you be? What are you going to be doing?"

"I have to stand with my men." I explain. "We're going to need all the help we can get."

“Fighting, you mean.” Ella clarifies. “You’re going into battle?” Yes.” I answer simply, knowing I can’t shield her from the truth. “I wish I didn’t have to leave you, but I can’t let other wolves defend my city without me.”

Ella’s lower lip, still swollen from my kisses, is trembling. “Do you promise that you’ll come back to me?”

“I’m not going to let some dirty rogue get the better of me, baby.” Taking her face in my hands, I continue, “Now give me your word that you’ll do as I’ve asked” I command. “Go to the safe house, listen to the guards, and wait for me.”

Ella nods shakily, and I pull her into my arms. Our lips collide with sudden desperation as if we’re both thinking the same thing. Just in case it’s for the last time. Suddenly I realize I never walked Ella through the contingency plans she requested, like what to do if I’m killed. Unfortunately there’s no time for that now. Her guards know what to do if the worst happens, and that will have to be enough for the time being.

“I love you.” I profess, stealing one last kiss. “No matter what.” “I love you too. Ella answers, tears spilling down her cheeks. “Please be safe, Dominic.”

“Don’t worry, trouble. We’ll be together again before you know it. I answer, but we both know that’s not a promise I can make. Every time I go into battle, I do so knowing it might be the end, but I’ve never had more of a reason to survive than I do now, and I’ll be damned if I’m going to let this be my last moment with Ella. I’m going to make it – I have to.

Chapter 124 – Lydia Gives Advice

3rd Person

“Another rogue attack?” Lydia scoffed, circling the Prince as he studied his plans for the invasion, “haven’t you attempted enough to realize they aren’t going to work?” “This one is different.” The Prince groused in reply. “I’m not just targeting Sinclair’s bitch or a few tourists. The entire pack will be in shambles and Dominic will be held responsible.”

A moment later the emergency sirens began blaring through the city, and the Prince surged to his feet, “What! No! How did he find out?”

Lydia swore under her breath, “because he keeps spies in the neutral territories, just like you do – just like all the Alpha’s do.” She promptly crossed the floor and snatched up the television remote, flipping to the news where an emergency bulletin was dominating the screen.

An anxious reporter read off a teleprompter, his voice full of urgency. “Moon Valley is facing imminent attack from rogue actors. Take shelter in your home or at your nearest designated safety point. Alpha Sinclair has ordered an immediate lockdown until the “all clear” chime can be rung.

Pack enforcers are on their way to meet the threat and hopefully force back the rogues before they can breach the city, but extreme caution is advised for all citizens. The human mayor has been informed and is instituting a city shut down under the guise of a gas leak...”

The reporter carried on in the background as Lydia turned back to the Prince, annoyance dominating her features. “How much time is there before the attack?”

“They won’t reach the city for another three hours at least, if they make it into the territory at all.” The Prince explained, overflowing with agitated energy. “Where are they striking?” Lydia pressed, her mind racing for a solution to this crisis.

“Their scouts have identified half a dozen stretches along the border with the least patrols and easiest access.” He shared, pressing a button on the underside of his desk to summon his beta.

“That’s exactly where Dominic will go.” Lydia gritted out. “They should be targeting more mid-level outposts.” “But they’ll have a harder time breaching those.” The Prince argued obstinately.

“Yes, but they might actually get through with a few losses. The way you’ve organized this, all the reinforcements are going to meet them head on and they won’t actually be able to get into the city!” Lydia exclaimed, losing her patience with the man’s stupidity. “Well it’s too late to change plans now, so I don’t know what you expect me to do!”

Prince Damon exploded, equally sick of the bossy she-wolf’s criticism. He paced back and forth, dragging his hands through his hair in frustration. “He’ll be out there fighting with them... the self-righteous bastard...” He mused after a moment. “I could send some of my own enforcers under the guise of helping fend off the attack. With enough men, they might be able to kill him and frame the rogues.”

Lydia’s heart fluttered nervously. She wanted to destroy Sinclair, but he was still her fated mate. The idea of his death made her wolf writhe inside her chest, still, she might have gotten over that. She couldn’t get over the idiocy. “It will never work. Even if they were strong enough to overpower him, he’ll have an entire army at his back.

Besides,” She pointed to the television, where the bulletin still flashed violently on the screen. “They’re calling for able-bodied wolves to join the fight, which means there will be dozens of witnesses even if you do somehow manage to succeed!” “Then I’ll go after his whore!” The Prince lashed out, slamming his fist into his desk. “He won’t be there to protect her this time!”

Lydia shook her head, “She’ll be in a safe house. Besides, haven’t you learned you lesson by now? Think of your own situation, if she dies he only looks more sympathetic.” “But he won’t have an heir.” The Prince insisted.

“But people know he’s not sterile now – he can make another.” Lydia explained. “Look, you can’t defeat him. Every time you try, he manages to outmaneuver you. You can’t overpower him because he’s too strong. You can’t outsmart him because he’s too clever. And you can’t out charm him. Look at everything that has already happened.”

Lydia gestured to the television again, as camera footage of Sinclair leading a charge of wolves to the border played across the screen, looking like scenes from some high - octane action movie. The Prince’s beta finally entered as they watched the video, his mouth set in a hard line as he assessed the scene.

“What are your orders, sir?” He asked hesitantly, seeing the obvious jealousy and rage on the other man’s face.

The Prince looked to Lydia, who he was coming to hate for her intelligence, but whom he also realized he needed. When the campaign was over he’d cut her down to size, but for the time being he needed her on his side.” Your ratings are at an all time high and he’s still beating you.” Lydia reminded him, trying not to think about how powerful Sinclair looked on the screen and keep her attention on the matter at hand.

“So what? What am I supposed to do?” The prince thundered, not needing this reminder. "If you can't beat him, the only option available is to force him to step down. Make him take himself out of the running." Lydia advised slyly, clearly pleased with herself.

"How?" The beta inquired curiously. "You weren't wrong about his weakness." Lydia answered coolly, thoroughly enjoying making these powerful wolves stew. "You've just been going about it the wrong way." "I don't understand." The Prince growled, losing his patience.

Lydia rolled her eyes. "Use Ella. Don't kill her, hold her hostage and make the ransom his campaign. Tell him that unless he steps down, he'll never see her again, you'll do terrible things to her."

The Prince paused, liking the sounds of this – particularly the opportunity to have Sinclair's beautiful mate at his mercy. "What makes you think he won't give her up?"

The self-righteous bastard might sacrifice her for the greater good, and that's assuming I can even get my hands on her." "Trust me, I was married to the man for more than a decade. He's not as much of a goody two shoes as you think. He's extremely possessive and he won't be able to help himself – his wolf will get the better of him. Either he'll give up the throne or he'll try to stage a rescue. Either way, you'll win." Lydia shrugged.

"How do I win if he stages a rescue?" The Prince demanded sharply. "You make it a trap." Linda answered, thinking that it wouldn't be very hard to arrange with someone in possession of a brain behind the wheel." Assemble enough forces to overpower him, ensure he has to go in alone, and don't leave anything to chance."

"It's not a bad idea." The beta approved. "We need to stop trying to fight him and just play dirty – shoot him with a tranquilizer and kill him while he's unconscious." "That's a coward's move." The Prince countered fiercely.

"Maybe, but it's also the only way you'll ever kill him." Lydia responded, becoming more and more immune to the idea of Sinclair's death the more they discussed it. After all, he rejected her publicly, he humiliated her, chose that little bitch over her. "Fine. Let's say we can make all that happen – we still need to get to Ella and you just said she'll be in a safe house." The Prince reasoned.

"She will, until the 'all clear' is given." Lydia answered with a diabolical smile. "But Sinclair isn't the only one who can give the 'all clear.'" She reminded him. As Prince, Damon also had the power to raise alarms and call off the danger, though he had never before needed to do so.

The Prince's eyes lit up, if I can make the city think the attack is over, they'd all come out of hiding before it's actually safe. The attack could still work – and Ella will return to the pack house.” 1 “And she'll barely have any guards because they'll all still be out fighting.” Lydia nodded smugly. ‘This is the best chance you're going to get to take her.’ “We'll have to wait a while, if we call the all clear too soon, they won't believe it.”

The beta warned. “And the news coverage?” The Prince asked. “Won't people be able to see the danger isn't passed?” “It doesn't matter if some of the pack don't come out, the one who really matters is Ella, and I know for a fact that all of Dominic's safe house are off the grid.

They have no technology, nothing that might be used to trace the location.” Lydia replied smoothly, more than a little pleased with her own cunning.

A terrible smile stretched across the Prince's face as he observed the calculating shewolf. ‘You might be of some used to me yet.’ He informed her arrogantly. Lydia smirked. “Just you wait. Before this is over you'll be wondering how you ever survived without me.”

Chapter 125 – Ella Hears the All Clear

Ella

The waiting is horrible.

I did exactly as Sinclair asked and followed the guards to the safe house, taking only a few essentials. We left our phones and technology behind, and then I was piled into the back of a car and hidden under a blanket just in case someone found a way to glimpse through the black out windows.

We drove for more than half an hour, making all kinds of twists and turns. I'm sure some of it was just evasive driving to make sure we weren't being followed, which worries me more than I'd like to admit.

As I lay there I realized that Sinclair must have been afraid that this attack might be used as a distraction for the Prince to make a move against me, and that possibility seems more and more likely the more I think about it. Hadn't the Prince been planning a distraction just like this before the Queen died? It's no wonder Sinclair hadn't wanted me to stay at the house even though it's the most secure building in the city next to the Royal Palace.

When we arrived at the safe house I was relieved to discover it was a veritable fortress. It didn't even look like a house, in fact, when the car pulled to a stop in front of a huge rock wall on the side of a mountain, I assumed one of the guards needed to use the restroom or something.

I couldn't have been more surprised when they all exited the car and began pressing on the rocks, moving their hands around on the granite until they found the right spot and pushed in. It took all four of them, each pressing on a specific spot in perfect unison, before the mountain itself opened up. The rock wall slid inward, even though it had looked completely solid from the outside.

One of the guards lifted me out of the car and carried me inside, and all but the driver entered with me. Just before the wall closed behind us, I saw the car speeding away again. It had all happened in about 30 seconds, and when I look around I'm amazed to discover that the interior of the mountain is as luxurious and comfortable as the mansion. Despite being an actual cave, electricity lights the sprawling rooms, which are fully furnished and decked out with amenities.

When I look back at the entrance I discover a keypad mounted in the rock, but no sign of the door. A flash of claustrophobia overtakes me and I worry about how I'll get out again, but I take a deep breath and try to comfort myself with the knowledge that no one could possibly find me here.

There are books and games filling the bookcases, as well as a space to exercise, but little other entertainment. I investigate the kitchen and find only a pantry full of canned goods, as well as a freezer full of frozen food.

I decide to try and distract myself by baking, thinking that I might be able to welcome Sinclair home with some homemade cookies or something similar. However when I move towards the pantry, my head guard Gabriel crosses his arms over his chest. "You're still on bed rest, Luna."

I arch my brow at him, experiencing a familiar rush of annoyance to be bossed around by someone who is not my mate. "I can be on my feet for twenty minutes. After that, I'll sit at the counter."

He rumbles wordlessly, as if he's unsure whether or not he should allow me this work around. I notch my chin up defiantly, cradling my belly. As if he could ever care more about my baby's well being than I do. I think grumpily. Besides, an extra five minutes on my feet when I'm doing something that relaxes me.

"If you're that concerned then you can bring me all of the ingredients and do the clean up." I suggest slyly, perfectly happy to let him take over the less fun job. "Alright." Gabriel agrees, seeming pleased to have a task. "What do you need?"

I rattle off a list, and begin opening ingredients as Gabriel collects bowls and measuring cups. "Has something like this ever happened before?" I ask after a moment, wondering if he resents the fact that he's trapped here with me instead of out fighting with Sinclair and the enforcers.

"Not in my memory." Gabriel replies grimly. Centuries ago this sort of thing wasn't that uncommon. Bands of rogues would join up and even form coalitions at times. Under a powerful rebel leader, rogues have tried to take down entire packs before, but the idea that this is happening in this day and age is unheard of. "How bad is it going to look for Dominic?" I inquire, measuring out flour and sugar.

"I'm not sure." He answers, taking a packet of butter from the freezer and setting it in the microwave for me. "If he's able to prevent the attack entirely he'll get celebrated for protecting the pack, but it doesn't look good that the rogues felt emboldened enough to take him on."

"Like people might think he's not providing enough of a deterrent to keep them out, that he looks weak to outsiders?" I clarify, trying to understand. "Exactly." Gabriel confirms. "I can guarantee that's how the Prince will spin this."

"That isn't fair." I argue glumly, beginning to cream the thawed butter. "I hate that he keeps causing all this trouble but Dominic is the one who pays the price."

Gabriel frowns. "Being Alpha is a thankless job most times. When every thing goes right no one notices, because he's just doing his job. But if something goes wrong then he gets dragged through the mud." I catch myself growling, "Dominic does everything for his people, they ought to recognize that."

"I agree." Gabriel replies, smothering a smile. "How long will this all take?" I inquire after a pause. "The state of emergency? It could be hours, or days,- depending how serious the situation is." Gabriel explains with a grimace.

"Do you wish you were out there with them?" I ask, watching his expression closely. Gabriel blinks, looking surprised. "Of course not."

He answers, seeming amazed that I should even ask. "You have to admit this is a lot more boring than being in the thick of it." As the words leave my mouth I realize how insensitive they might sound.

"I mean I know battle is a terrible thing, but it can't be easy babysitting me when everyone you care about is out risking their lives."

Gabriel had been carefully closing the bags and boxes of ingredients once I finished with them, but now he goes still. "Do you have no idea what an honor it is to be assigned to guard you? The men in this room are here because the Alpha has deemed us the fiercest warriors in his guard – the ones most trusted to protect you if he can't. Our positions are second only to his beta."

"Oh." I breathe, processing this information. "I didn't realize." This information dances through my head, trying to make sense of this. "And you don't resent the fact that you might be hurt for my sake?"

He shakes his head, giving me a look that says he thinks I'm crazy. "You're new to all this, but you have to understand that without you, the pack is weaker. A pack's Luna is incredibly important sacred not only because she gives us heirs and the next generation of Alphas, but because she leads the she-wolves, she is the Alpha's rock.

The Alpha might be the pack's backbone, but the Luna is its heart. Any of us would gladly lay down our lives for you."

"But I don't want anyone to die for me." I murmur softly, staring at the cookie batter in front of me. "of course you don't." Gabriel smiles. "That's what makes you a good Luna."

I find myself blushing, barely able to utter my thanks. Gabriel and I continue baking in companionable silence, and soon cookies are coming out of the oven piping hot, with melting chocolate sticking to the baking tray. The other guards appear as the scent wafts through the house, and before long I have to confiscate the remaining cookies so that there will be some left over for Sinclair.

Soon after the cookies finish, a deafening chime sounds outside, and all the guards sit up in surprise. "That was fast." One of the other guards, Sean remarks in surprise. "Is that the all clear?" I ask curiously. "Yes, but maybe we should wait for Sinclair."

Gabriel suggests. "He told us to bring her home at the all clear." Sean counters. "I don't know," Gabriel hesitates. "Something feels off." "We have our orders." Sean insists. "I say we follow protocol and take her home." "Alright." Gabriel agrees with a heavy sigh.

We move into a room I hadn't noticed before, which leads to a small garage. We climb into a waiting vehicle and Gabriel presses a button on something which looks suspiciously like a garage door opener. For the second time that day, the mountain opens, and we take off into the night.

Of course, this is a decision I'll come to regret terribly. I wish we hadn't left the safe house. I wish we'd waited for Sinclair to come for us. If we had, my guards might still be alive... and my own life might have gone very differently.

But we did leave.. we left, and walked straight into the Prince's trap.

Chapter 126 – The Kidnap

Ella

The streets were all but empty as we drove through the darkened city. I suppose everyone is still inside watching the news or waiting for more information to be released about the attack. I understand that we needed to be off the grid so no one could track us electronically, but I wish I had my phone. I wish I knew what had happened. I'm impatient to see Sinclair, to hear what happened and make sure he isn't wounded.

My wolf is whining in my head, eager to be reunited with her mate. I've been trying to avoid thinking about the danger Sinclair has been facing while I was safe and sound with my guards, but now that the crisis has passed the possibilities consume me.

I'm imagining returning home to find Sinclair covered in blood, his powerful shoulders crumbling under the weight of the lives he took tonight. He's going to need me, and I'm already wondering how I can possibly comfort him when I don't have the first clue what it's like to go to war. My guards are clearly focused on a very different train of thought. "Something still feels off to me."

Gabriel grumbles, scanning the deserted streets "If the all clear is ringing, why hasn't anyone come out yet?" He mutters, dragging a hand over his face. "I think it feels off because it was a crazy situation to begin with." Sean answers. "There's never been an attack of this size in living memory."

"Which is precisely why this is too soon for the danger to have passed." Gabriel shakes his head, slowing the car. "I don't like this. I think we should go back" Just as the words leave his mouth, the sound of screeching brakes shatters the quiet.

A black SUV with tinted windows skids to a stop in front of us, cutting off our path. Gabriel slams on the brakes and the car lurches to a violent stop. The guard beside me throws his arm out to prevent me from slamming into the back of the driver's seat.

His hand catches me in the sternum, stealing the air from my lungs. Before anyone can say a word, Gabriel curses and throws the car into reverse. We only make it a few meters when the vehicle slams to a stop again, this time colliding with a deafening crash. My body is jolted and jostled, and I whip around to see what we hit. A second SUV is behind us, blocking our escape route. "Fuck." Gabriel explodes, "It's a set up."

I realize that there are other cars around us, blocking our path. Terror slices through me as understanding sets in. The battle isn't over yet.

We've walked into a trap, and Sinclair isn't here to protect me this time. He's so far away that there's no chance he might make it back in time to help me. I have to trust that my guards will keep me safe, even if my pounding heart and the blood rushing in my ears warns me that this is all going to end very badly.

"Ella, hold on." Gabriel instructs. "We're not going to get out of this without a few scrapes." He forces his foot down on the accelerator, and the car surges backward at full speed. There's nowhere to go, so our only option is to try and push the other car out of the way. It rocks and slides, nearly toppling, becoming dented and smashed inward as it hops up onto the curb.

The noise is deafening, and I feel like a ragdoll as my body is thrown around wildly, yanked back and forth by gravity. I'm restrained by my seatbelt and the guard's arm, but we'll all fairly helpless to do anything but try to minimize the damage to our bodies.

Glass shatters somewhere on my left, but I'm still just trying to get my bearings. I've never been in a car crash before, and I've heard people say that time slows down in this sort of accident. I wish time would slow down, everything is happening all at once, and I can't keep up.

The car behind us is almost out of the way now, but the SUV on our right rams into the passenger side door, pushing us further away from safety.

Gabriel keeps trying to maneuver the vehicle around to give us an escape route, but the other cars have us completely surrounded. My head cracks against the window when the car ramming our side slams into us right as Gabriel attempts to reverse through the tiny opening between the rear car and the bollards protecting the footpath from errant vehicles like our own.

My vision goes black for a moment, and the next thing I know, everything is still. My guards are climbing out of the car and shifting into their wolves, and Gabriel gives me one last order. "Whatever you do, stay inside, Ella."

The world around me has gone very fuzzy, and I'm horrified when I look out the window and see how many wolves are waiting to fight my guards. I count at least three dozen, and part of me is furious that the Prince chose to send his best fighters here, when the people he hopes to rule are facing an imminent threat. I know he's the one who created the threat, but he could at least put on a show and pretend to care, to help defend the city I feel very nauseous all of a sudden, and it only gets worse when the fighting begins. I've seen more than a little violence in my life, but not like this.

Never like this. Gabriel, Sean and my other guards form a tight circle, their backs to one another as they bare their fangs and snarl at our attackers. The Prince's men shift, and then they're clashing viciously with my guards. Blood sprays over the pavement, and I see flesh ripped and torn, bodies tossed onto the street like bags of bones.

There are a couple of sick bags tucked into the seat-back pocket in front of me, and I snatch one up, emptying the contents of my stomach into the plastic sack. I blink tears from my eyes, unsure whether I want to close my eyes and hide from the horrific scenes outside my window, or if I should watch.

When I peek outside I'm proud to see that Gabriel wasn't exaggerating when he told me how fierce he and his men are. It's obvious that they truly are Sinclair's best, because they look entirely unharmed even though half a dozen wolves already lay dead around them. Of course.. they're still vastly outnumbered, and the longer they fight, the more tired they become.

Sean is the first to die. I clasp a hand over my mouth to try and smother my scream when I see the other wolf rip out his throat. I'll never forget how his eyes swung to me with regret, even as the light winked out of them. Sobs burn in my throat, and when the second guard dies, it becomes too much.

I can't just sit here and let them die for me. I'm the one they want I think desperately. I have to do something. If you go out there now you'll distract them, and then they will die. My wolf responds.

Let them do their jobs! But they're completely outnumbered. It's only Gabriel and two others now. I shake my head stubbornly. I have to! They'll kill us! She reminds me ferociously, they'll kill the baby.

They're going to kill us anyway. I argue desperately, undiluted fear writhing in my belly. But my guards don't have to die too.

As I look back out the window, I see Gabriel thrown through the air before he lands in a heap near the back of the car. He tries to get up, then crumples with a groan. Six wolves descend on him, and he tries to rise again, only for his legs to give out.

I'm out of the car before I know what I've done. Stop!" The descending wolves turn to look at me, and I hear a warning snarl from Gabriel. If he was in his human form I'm sure he would be yelling at me to get back in the car, but I can't make myself do it. "

Leave them be – I'm the one you want."

I'd like to say I sounded strong or brave in this moment. Instead, I'm speaking through tears with the hoarse tone of a woman who's just been violently ill. I'm sure I look as intimidating and powerful as a door-mouse, with blood seeping down my cheek, and my hands shaking with fear.

One of the wolves who stayed in his human form comes forward with a cruel grin. "I'm glad to see you've come to your senses." He tells me smugly. Unfortunately though, we can't have any witnesses, can we?"

He nods to the wolves by Gabriel, and I scream when they lunge forward and tear their teeth and claws into his tender belly. Blood and organs spill out of him, and I charge for the wolf who gave the order, trying to claw his eyes out with every ounce of wrath I possess. He catches me around the waist, laughing at my rage. I thrash against him, calling him every foul name I can think of, threats and curses pouring from my tongue.

I'm still wriggling and fighting when they push me into the car, and though I should be trying to escape, all I want to do is destroy them. "Goddess she's a pill." The man in charge mutters, climbing into the car after me. I Snarl and lunge for him, but he cocks his fist back and brings it down on my head, knocking me out cold.

Chapter 127 – Sinclair Comes Home

Sinclair

The battle lasted for hours. By the time we reached the border, rogues were already pouring into the territory. I fanned my men out in a wide net to intercept them, hoping that Hugo, Roger and my other squadron leaders were doing the same at the other borders.

This was the first time I'd been in a fight without Gabriel and Sean, and though I was confident my warriors were up to the task, it felt strange to be in battle without them. Of course it was completely worth it, I wouldn't trust Ella with anyone else.

Just before the fighting began, I forced myself to put Ella and the baby out of my thoughts. If I let myself worry about them I would be distracted from the battle, and that could be deadly. What's more, if I focused on my sweet mate or what she might think of the violence I was committing, I might not be able to do what was necessary to win. War is brutal and ruthless – there's no room for softness or tender feelings, and Ella inspires nothing but.

I told myself that I'd let myself feel the toll of violence when it was over. I had to turn off my emotions in the moment in order to protect my pack and my family, and I could live with the callousness of being a cold-blooded killing machine for a few hours. I wouldn't be able to live with myself if I failed.

I lost count of how many rogues I killed, how many lives I ended with nothing more than my fangs. As the fighting dragged on, I focused only on the next step, the next target. I took my fair share of blows, becoming beaten and bruised as the night continued.

Claws sliced into my ribs, teeth dragged down my back, and my own blood and sweat blended with the mud and fluids of dying rogues.

When it was all over the earth suddenly seemed too quiet. I'd gotten so used to the sounds of aggression and pain, the blood rushing in my own ears, that I worried something might be wrong with my hearing. Shaking myself, I recall that the wilderness should be serene and still – if anything is abnormal it's the blood soaking into the ground as far as the eye can see.

I look around the forest, watching my wolves patrol for signs of survivors with a sense of grim pride. It hadn't been easy, but we did our job. For the first time I take an inventory of my own injuries, noticing the lingering pain in my ribs, and the beginning of a wicked bruise on my leg.

I can't relax until I know that the other fights succeeded as well, so I shift and race back to the car to retrieve my phone. Roger, Hugo and the other commanders all sent messages saying that their areas were secure, and the former two are already on their way here to provide backup in case we need it. I call them off, instead turning to the reporters who followed us into the field, filming the battle.

I look into the nearest camera, trying to hide my impatience. I want to send the pack reassurance, but I need to get back to Ella too. I know she made it to the safe house alright and that nothing will happen as long as they're there, but this entire ordeal has been incredibly unnerving.

"I'm pleased to report that the invasion has been successfully stopped. My enforcers have pushed back and eliminated the rogue threat, with minimal losses on our side. I will provide more details in the hours and days to come, but I want to assure everyone that Moon Valley is safe, and the all clear signal will be issued as soon as possible."

The reporter standing next to the cameraman frowns, raising his hand to his ear.

"Alpha, headquarters is saying the all clear was already given – hours ago."

"What?" I demand, my face crumpling into a grimace. "That's not possible."

"I don't know how it happened, but they're certain. It doesn't sound like anyone took it seriously because they could see from our footage that the threat was ongoing, but the signal was definitely given."

I pause, trying to wrap my head around this idea. The only people in the territory who can issue emergency orders (or call them off) are myself, the Alpha council and the King. As I process this, something else occurs to me. Everyone with access to technology would see the footage, but we keep the sirens and all clear signal systems for people who don't or who aren't connected in the moment.

My safe houses are technology free for very good reason – because when the Prince attempted to assassinate my father, the hitman tracked him through his devices.

A horrible possibility enters my head then. If the all clear went out then Gabriel and Sean would have followed protocol and taken Ella home.

What if our fears were right, and this was a distraction? My wolf growls. If the King can call for the all clear the Prince probably found a way to use his father's authority to give the order, and then Ella would have come out of hiding.

Damn it, this is Lydia's doing! I think bitterly. She knows our protocols, she knows the systems. If everyone else was still inside hunkering down, the Prince's men could have intercepted Ella or waited for her at the house, and no one would notice a thing.

"I have to go." I declare gruffly, turning on my heel and striding back to the cars. I call Hugo and Roger and brief them along the way, beyond furious with myself for not foreseeing this possibility. They try to assure me that it's probably nothing, but I won't have it. I can feel that something is wrong in my gut.

We race back to the city, breaking every speed limit possible along the way. I'm silently praying to the Goddess the whole journey, begging her to let me be wrong.

Of course, I wasn't wrong.

When we get back to the house, I discover one of the guards in charge of protecting

Ella lying in a bloody heap on the doorstep. "Alpha." He groans, clutching a wound in his stomach. "I'm sorry."

"Shit, help him." I order, slipping my hands under his arms while Hugo takes his feet and we cart him inside. We lay him out on the couch and Roger leaves to call for a doctor. "Jeremy, where are the others?" I ask sharply, trying to stay calm even though I'm fairly certain my entire world is about to end.

"Dead." He moans, tears burning in his eyes. "Gabriel, Sean... they're all dead."

"What happened?" I inquire, my hands clenched in fists at my sides. He hadn't said

Ella's name, but if her protectors are dead and she's not here... only a fool would hold onto hope in such circumstances.

"They ambushed us, surrounded us so we had no choice but to fight." He coughs, and crimson liquid stains his lips. "We were so outnumbered... we never stood a chance. And then Ella... they were about to kill Gabriel and she must have known we'd lost. She got out of the car and told them to leave us alone, she gave herself up to save us."

That did it. The leash I'd been holding on my emotions snapped as my entire world shattered. An agonized roar bursts from my lips, and I crash to my knees, unable to believe my ears. I've never known such pain, to not only lose my mate but our pup, and to think it happened when I left her alone. No! She can't be gone. My wolf howls desperately. I would feel it, I would sense it. I don't believe this. I spiral into denial right along with him, it can't be true. It's too horrible. What was she thinking – impossible, noble little fool. Why would she sacrificed herself!

"They killed Gabriel anyway, and she was so furious... she just attacked them." He shakes his head, as if he still can't believe how fearless she'd been. "I'm so sorry, Alpha." He groans, "they took her."

I've entered a strange fog, and it takes me a moment to understand. My head jerks up, 'Wait a minute – they took her?'

'Yes.' He nods, 'They put her in the car and drove off.'

'They didn't kill her?' I demand, needing to be certain I understood him correctly.

'If they did, they didn't do it in front of me.' He murmurs regretfully.

'Dominic?' Roger says, looking at me with obvious concern.

'This is Lydia.' I hiss. 'The Prince isn't this strategic.' A moment ago it had felt as though everything I knew and loved was breaking into a million tiny pieces, but now the destruction halts. Nothing is fixed or restored, the collapse is simply stalled, with my heart hanging in the balance. Now the ridiculous kernel of hope burgeoning in my chest surges forward, and I find myself forming a plan. 'I want to talk to them – right fucking now!'

Chapter 128 – Ella wakes

Ella

When I wake, I'm amazed to realize I'm alive. I was sure the Prince's men were going to kill me.

My hands immediately got to my middle, running over my slight baby bump with urgency. Everything feels normal, but I wish I had Sinclair's link with our pup. I wish I could feel what he's feeling, know for sure that he's unharmed. I'm sure the events of the last 12 hours or so haven't helped my preeclampsia, and I'm worried for my son.

Even as I think this, a tiny thump meets my palm, and I clamp my eyes shut with relief. "Hello angel." I greet him gently. "You can tell Mommy's freaking out, huh?" Another kick flutters beneath my hand and I hiccup with unshed tears. "I love you so much." I whisper. "I'm going to find a way out of this, I promise."

After my baby, Sinclair is my greatest concern. Fear for my mate permeates the fog of confusion, worry and grief consuming my overwrought mind. At best he'll be beside himself with guilt and rage that we've been taken. At worst he never made it out of the battle at all. I'd been anxious for his well being when the all clear rang out, but now I realize we might have lost.

I stagger to my feet, cradling my stomach and wincing as a dozen aches and pains assail me all at once. I hadn't noticed them when I was lying down, but upright I feel as though I've been flattened by a steamroller. My vision blacks out as blinding pain pierces my skull, and muscles I didn't even know I possessed are screaming at my brain, my eviscerated nerve endings begging we cease moving. I slump back onto the edge of the bed, trying to breathe through the agony.

Of course, as soon as I close my eyes, images of all my slaughtered guards fill my mind. I moan as I recall Sean's remorse in the second before he dies, and Gabriel's agonized howl as his insides were spilled into the pavement. I'm so lost in my thoughts that I barely hear the door open. "Oh good. You're up." Lydia's familiar and wretched voice cuts through my thoughts and I crack my eyelids open to see the she-wolf prowling into the room with a smug smirk on her face. "How are you liking your rooms?"

For the first time I look around and realize I must be in the Royal Palace, because my surroundings are actually quite lovely. "What, no dungeons?" I quip snarkily, trying not to let her see how much pain I'm in.

I'm baffled at how Lydia could possibly march in here sounding like an attentive hostess when I've just been kidnapped, but she manages without any visible difficulty. "Don't be silly. You're a Luna. We have to show you due respect... even if you are a conniving little whore." Lydia announces, sounding more and more bitter with every word out of her mouth.

“More like you need to keep me in good condition so that Dominic doesn’t gut you like a fish when he finds me.” I counter sharply. It’s mostly a test, a trick to get her to reveal Sinclair’s fate. If she tells me he’s dead, I’m not sure I’ll believe her – surely I would feel it if he was no longer here? Still, if she acknowledges that he’s still alive then at least I know there’s hope.

Lydia snorts. “You don’t get it, do you?” She snipes. “Dominic isn’t going to find you at all.” A stab of fear stops my heart, but it eases as she continues. “And this isn’t some shoddy shake down. We’re brokering a deal, and you’re simply out ace in the hole. I think you’ll find it’s all very civilized. Just wait, in a few weeks, you’ll be back with Dominic safe and sound.”

Relief and distrust war for control in my heart, and my wolf snarls at her suggestion. “Civilized?” I grit out. “Is that what you call hiring rogues to attack your own people and murdering my guards?”

“I call that an unfortunate necessity – collateral damage.” Lydia shrugs, showing so little concern for the loss of human life I wonder if she has a heart at all.

“And what exactly am I supposed to leverage for you? If you expect Dominic to give up his life for mine then you’re going to be sorely disappointed.” I bluff, smothering a terrible feeling that this isn’t actually true. I’d like to think that Sinclair knows his survival is much more important than my own, but matters of the heart rarely bend to logic.

Lydia scoffs, “Of course he would. Dominic has always been too noble for his own damned good. Besides – weren’t you listening. I said you’d be together. We just need him to give up his campaign, that’s all.”

I shake my head. “What the hell happened to make you this way? Don’t you care about what will happen to the pack if the Prince wins? To all the packs?” I hiss, not understanding how anyone who had been part of the Sinclair family – who believe in nothing if not selfless duty – could be so heartless.

Lydia rolls her eyes, “Why should I care about a bunch of commoners – I’ll be on the throne.”

“You can’t control him, you know.” I warn, feeling only the tiniest ounce of concern for the psychotic creature in front of me. “He beat his last wife, only a fool would think he’ll be different with you.”

Lydia turns her nose up. “Angeline was weak, she didn’t know how to manage him like I do.” She reasons stubbornly.

“And your own husband?” I demand. “What will he have to say about this?”

Lydia blanches. “He’s out of sight and out of mind. The Prince outranks him, he can dissolve our marriage when the time comes.”

I don’t miss the flicker of uncertainty on her lovely face, and I store away that knowledge for the future. “Is power really worth all this?” I inquire, gesturing to the rooms around us. “You’ve been seeking it your whole life, and where has it gotten you? Are you happy, Lydia?”

She bares her teeth at me. “Happiness means security, and security means power. If you had any idea what it feels like to be powerless you might understand that. But no – here you are having skated through like on your looks, everything and everyone falling at your feet because you’re perfect Ella,” She sneers, “but it doesn’t work that way for everyone. I’ve had to struggle, I’ve had to fight every day for what I have.”

It takes all my willpower not to laugh in her face. She’s far from the first person to assume I’ve had a charmed life because of my beauty, but this is the first time anyone has ever been quite so far off the mark.

“You know, I find that those who have truly struggled tend to learn a little empathy. It’s only the self-centered narcissists who try to blame their cruelty on being a victim.” I observe coolly.

“How dare you -” Lydia begins, color flooding her face where moments before she had been as pallid as a sheet.

“How dare I what?” I interrupt, mocking her haughty demeanor, “Tell you a truth you don’t want to hear? Tell me what is your great tragedy? Have you never gotten over being born as one of the dirty commoners you so revile?”

Never got over your jealousy that some people were born luckier, and so you decided to steal what they had? Or is it your infertility? Is that what all this hatred comes down to? The fact that I am giving Dominic what you never could?”

I’m not proud of myself for this. I promised myself a long time ago that I would never assume I knew someone’s pain based on appearances, or weaponize their heartbreaks. Even with Lydia, I’ve always refused to bring up her fertility struggles, knowing how difficult these things are. But today she pushed me too far. She killed my guards, she probably cost Sinclair any number of his men, and she would have thrown the entire valley to the rogues – shifters and humans alike -the elderly, women and children.

Before I realize what she’s about, Lydia storms forward and slaps me across the face with all her strength. My head snaps back, my ears ringing, but when the shock passes and I look up at the fuming woman above me, I only blink. "Is that the best you can do?"

Lydia screeches and lunges for me, her claws extended in threat. I brace myself for the impact, wondering what I was thinking, pushing her so far when I don't have a wolf to defend myself. Just then a masculine voice interrupts her, "Lydia!" We both freeze, looking to the open doorway and the man framed at its center.

The Prince has arrived.

"How dare you -" Lydia begins,

Chapter 129 – Ella Plays Politics

Ella “What the hell are you doing?” The Prince snaps, his usually cold features alight with rage. He storms forward, aggression pouring off him in waves.

“Nothing!” Lydia squeaks, whirling around and adopting an innocent expression. “I-she...” The she-wolf stammers, red faced and shaking.

‘You’re the one who went on and on about leaving the bitch unharmed so as not to further provoke Dominic!’ Prince Damon rumbles furiously. He looks down at me with cold disinterest, and I immediately recognize that I’m dealing with two very different kind of monsters here. Lydia is pure cunning and lacks any sense of conscience, she’ll do anything and hurt anyone to achieve her goals. The Prince however, he gives off the energy of a man who enjoys hurting others – not as a means to an end, but for the pure pleasure it inspires.

I look back to Lydia, still too angry to bite my tongue and wanting his attention anywhere but on me. “Or maybe she just meant those rules for you. I get the sense she expects special treatment – even above royalty.”

I watch as my word lands, feeling more than a little smug when Prince Damon sneers. “Leave us.”

Lydia gapes, horrified to be ordered away. “But-”

“I said leave.” He repeats fiercely. Lydia hurries out grumbling under her breath, and my heart clenches with newfound anxiety. Maybe it was my inner wolf, but I felt the strongest compulsion to challenge Lydia, to establish dominance. Of course, I feel no respect for the Prince, but my instincts warn me that he has no qualms about hurting me. In fact, I’m sure he would enjoy it. Lydia might want to harm me, but she attempted to show restraint in the interest of avoiding Sinclair’s wrath, but I have the impression the Prince has never had an impulse he didn’t indulge.

At the same time, I don’t want to show him any weakness. Next to Sinclair, he’s nothing, and the more my wolf comes out, the more determined I feel not to submit to anyone but my mate. So instead of cowering, I give him my defiance. Notching my chin up, I glare at the despicable man. ‘This won’t work, you know.’ I tell him, wondering if I’ve lost my mind. “Dominic will never give up the campaign for me.”

‘You doubt his devotion so much?’ prince Damon remarks, arching a brow.

“Would you have given up the throne to save your mate?” I ask curiously, a new idea occurring to me now. If I can sow discord between Lydia and the Prince, maybe I can distract them enough to escape. He doesn’t have any clue that Lydia is probably responsible for the Princess’s death, but if anything could tear them apart – that will.

“Of course not – but Dominic is a sentimental fool.” The Prince chortles to himself. “We are a completely different caliber of wolf.”

“I agree.” I state simply, knowing he probably won’t catch the inference that my mate is far superior. ‘Though I am sorry for your loss.’ I share, channeling the sympathy I feel for his motherless children, if not for himself. “It was such a shocking death – and poison!” I exclaim. ‘What kind of man deploys such a cowardly weapon? Do you have any leads on the suspect?’ I worry I might be laying it on too thick, but when he doesn’t bat an eye, I know I need to press harder.

“I’m not here to talk about Angeline.” He grits out, beginning to pace back and forth in front of me. “And if you think you can help yourself by playing on my own loss, you’re sorely mistaken.”

‘That wasn’t my intention.’ I refute honestly. “I just thought it was interesting that she was killed in such a feminine manner.”

“Feminine?” He repeats, bewildered. “Are you saying you think a woman killed her?” His eyes narrow and too late I realize that he’ll probably assume I’m trying to take credit, ‘You?’

“Of course not!” I hold up my hands. “I’ve been on bed rest, and besides, why would I help your campaign? I don’t stand to gain anything by making you a winner.”

I hope I’ve said enough to get the gears working in his tiny brain. I don’t want to come out and accuse Lydia. He’ll assume I’m making things up to distract him or help myself somehow. Of course, that’s exactly what I’m doing, but it’s also true. He needs to reach the conclusion on his own.

‘Then who?’ He inquires, as if I’m not the one who’s been asking the questions.

‘Well, who would benefit?’ I ask simply, folding my hands in my lap. I try to telepathically force Lydia’s name into his thoughts, but I’m not sure it’s successful.

He pauses thoughtfully, then he shakes his head, disappointing me. “I don’t have time for this. I came to tell you not to get any bright ideas about escaping. We’re calling a meeting with Dominic. If he agrees to our ransom then you’ll be back home in no time, so just sit tight and behave yourself. We even brought your things for you from the scene of the accident.” He gestures to the go-bag I’d taken to the safehouse, which now sits on the bureau.

“The accident?” I repeat coldly. ‘You mean the kidnapping? How did you even cover it up? A confrontation of the size, with all that noise?’

He snorts, 'The pack was under lockdown, and we it was on a block in the commercial center with no residences.'

"How did you even know we'd be there?" I hiss.

'We set up a full perimeter around Sinclair's mansion, we just got lucky with the route you chose. There were no witnesses to silence, and we cleared it so well no one will ever know anything happened there.'

I cross my arms over my chest, beyond outraged that he's getting away with so much violence and corruption. All the while Sinclair plays by the rules, even though the odds are stacked against him. I once asked him why he didn't publicly accuse the Prince of his crimes, and he merely answered that we didn't have a leg to stand on without proof. The Prince would call it a smear campaign and Sinclair would look weak for lobbing accusations rather than taking action to stop him. There are just some things I'll never understand about wolves, but I suppose I know better than to think an accusation can stand alone. How many powerful men in the human world have actually been held accountable for their crimes when there isn't evidence against them?

"Fine. I won't do anything stupid." I finally agree. "Is that all?"

"For now." He says, looking me up and down one final time before stalking out. "And Ella," he adds, pausing at the door. "If you do try to get away... I will make you regret it."

"I believe you." I reply, smothering the urge to shiver.

When he's gone I creep after him on tiptoe, hoping I might be able to hear something through the door. Sure enough, after a few moments I hear his voice raised with Lydia's as they argue in the hallway. "She doesn't think it will work!" He growls in an accusatory tone.

"Of course she says that. She's trying to throw us off. Besides, we know this was a possibility." Lydia counters reasonably. "If he refuses the ransom and tries to stage a rescue we'll simply plan another ambush.

Either way, we get rid of him."

'This had better work.' The Prince snarled.

"It will, you'll see, Damon. You can trust me." Lydia simpers, and I can imagine her batting her lashes at him.

"Can I? It seems you've been getting a lot of perks out of this friendship of ours." He observes, and a flash of triumph pulses inside me.

“What are you suggesting?” Lydia’s offended voice replies.

The Prince growls, “I’ve got my eye on you.” I hear his footsteps retreating, and then Lydia’s shaky breath.

Just in case she decides to come back, I move away from the door, heading straight for my go bag. I don’t think I have anything inside which might help me out of this situation, but it’s worth double checking.

I pull out my clothing and toiletries, doing a quick inventory of the items. I shake my head with disappointment as I sort through the bag, but there at the bottom is the ornate tin holding the herbs to trigger my wolf’s awakening. I’ve been keeping them with me at all times – just in case – and when we packed for the safe house I tossed in the tin, I clasp it tightly in my hand, wondering if I’d somehow known I might need to defend my life in the near future.

I press my hand to my belly, feeling guilty for even considering it. I’m not in any imminent danger, though I am terrified about what I just heard between Lydia and the Prince. I know our situation just got incomprehensibly worse, but I’m not so desperate that I think I need to waken my wolf. At least... not yet.

Chapter 130 – The Prince’s Ransom

Sinclair

I’d been ready to storm the Royal Palace when I learned the Prince had taken Ella, and if I had been sure of her location, I would have already done it. It would be the very definition of hubris to imprison her within his own home, though I don’t put anything past the Prince. More importantly, my mate and my pup’s lives hang in the balance, and I can’t be too careful.

After I calmed down enough to stop envisioning all the ways I’d like to maim the other man, I had Hugo call in my best warriors, even though they’ve only just come off the battlefield. Next to Gabriel, Sean and the rest of the slaughtered team, the chosen men are the best fighters I can assemble at my back – and I have no doubt I’m going to need them. When they arrived I was still too rabid to conjure actual words, so Hugo explained the situation to them. I watch the horror and outrage spread across their weary faces and I’m touched when – one by one – they all stand and promise me their allegiance in the fight ahead.

I didn’t even have to ask, and a tiny part of me had been afraid they would view the assault on my mate as a reflection of my own weakness. It was bad enough that the Prince was able to find enough rogues to take on the city, and now this? What kind of Alpha can’t even protect his mate? I feel like an utter failure for not keeping Ella and Rafe safe, for not considering that the royal family might declare the danger passed in order to target my mate.

My wolf hasn’t stopped howling in my head, in between bursts of deadly snarls and pitiful whines, he simply howls and howls as if he’s hoping her own wolf might hear him telepathically. He’s drowning in his pain, but I’m drowning in my guilt. I promised she would always be safe and I couldn’t do it. Goddess only know what they’re doing to her at this very moment.

My father is here too – he came at Roger’s request after we arrived home, and I’m grateful for his steady presence. My own wolf might be on the verge of going completely berserk, but I know my father will talk me down if I start to truly lose it. He must think I’m nearing that point, because he wheels over and rests his hand over mine. “Whatever you’re thinking, stop. Beating yourself up about this won’t help anything.” He frowns sympathetically, letting me know he understands even though he’s not going to condone my wallowing. “Ella needs your strength, not your self-pity.”

I nod, appreciating his calm reminder. Feeling sorry for myself won’t fix anything. “I’ve already called the Prince’s beta.” Hugo is explaining to the men. “They’ve asked for a meeting, and we agreed to let them set the time if we set the place. We won’t release the location until fifteen minutes before the rendezvous.”

“What’s the plan once we’re there?” The biggest wolf in the group asks. “Are they bringing her along?”

“Unlikely.” Hugo sighs, ‘This is just to collect intelligence. They’re probably going to request a ransom, and we need to try and glean as much information as we possibly can in the meantime. Everybody needs to be observing every detail possible – the words he uses, the way he organizes his own guards. Watch their facial expressions as the Alpha’s speak, try to pick up on any ticks or body language that might hint at a clue to her location or their plans.”

“When is the meet?” The same guard inquires, nodding along with the instructions.

“It’s in half an hour, which means we only have a little while to prepare. I know it’s soon, but we didn’t want to give them any time to scheme further or try to figure out the destination in advance. It means we don’t have time to set up an ambush as well, which is unfortunately a concession we had to make.”

“But we can call for backup.” Another wolf suggests, “I bet you they’ll do exactly the same thing once they know where it is.”

“We will, but this is a very delicate situation. In all likelihood they’ve set up some kind of contingency in the event that the Prince doesn’t return from the meeting or they take too long before checking in. Your Luna’s life is at stake – we can’t be too careful.” Hugo explains.

I step forward, pleased to see how eager my men are to help. “I appreciate your dedication and your bravery tonight. We’ve already been through hell in the last few hours, and I want to make sure that everyone here is up to another fight if things come to a head. This isn’t the time to play the hero – if you’re too exhausted, injured or simply unable to be at your best, tell me now. I don’t want any more unnecessary bloodshed.”

The first man steps forward, a hard look on his face. “All do respect, Alpha, but Gabriel trained me, he was one of the best fighters I’ve ever seen, and he saved my life more than once over the years. That cowardly bastard probably had to outnumber them five to one just to take him out. And targeting a breeding she-wolf is as low as it gets. I won’t step a toe out of line, but I’d be lying if I said I’m not hoping he’ll give us a reason to cut him down where he stands.”

“I agree.” The wolf beside him nods, “We all want to make him pay, and we’ll be damned if we’re going to let you go in there alone.”

“Thank you.” I profess earnestly, feeling genuinely touched by their support. “Now let’s move out.”

By the time the Prince arrives at the meeting point half an hour later, I've got more than a hundred wolves spread out around the periphery of the scene, just waiting to move in or track the Prince after he leaves. When Damon enters, sniffing at our surroundings – a deserted warehouse in the old industrial district – I can't stop myself from prowling forward with lethal intent.

"Where is she?" I thunder, feeling as though my wolf is clawing at my skin, actually spilling my blood in his desperation to get out."

"Uh, uh, uh," The prince mocks, wagging his finger at me. "If anything happens to me, I guarantee you'll never see her again."

"What the hell are you up to?" I change course, my gaze flitting to the bastion of guards at his back. He's got about a dozen men around him, but I know his guards are second-rate fighters compared to my own men.

It would be so easy. My wolf suggests hungrily. He could be dead in an instant, and then we could hold his men hostage and torture them until they tell us where she is.

The Prince is eyeing me closely, undoubtedly reading my bloodthirsty thoughts. "You should know I've arranged to check in with your mate's guards every fifteen minutes like clockwork. If they don't receive my call – they'll kill her and your unborn whelp."

I silently curse. We figured something like this would happen, but it's still fucking inconvenient. "I see you've been taking pointers from my ex-wife." I remark harshly, hoping to piss him off enough to put a dent in their alliance. "I didn't think you had it in you to take a woman's advice... then again, when she's ten times smarter than you are, you'd be a fool not to. Still, it's a bit embarrassing – don't you think?"

Damon's face flushes with color, and his jaw clenches tight. "I admit she's a tiresome creature, but even I have to admit she's had a few good ideas... like this one."

"And what was her brilliant idea? To distract me with the rogues, to make me look like a fool for losing my mate?" I inquire, prodding for information more than anything else.

The Prince scowls. "You're going to give up your campaign, Dominic.

Resign, abdicate – whatever you want to call it. Take yourself out of the running and leave the territory. If you do that, I'll give your little mate back and you two can run off in the sunset together."

"Why should I believe you'd actually return her to me?" I press. My insides have been tied into knots since this all began, but they clench even tighter now, settling in my stomach like rocks.

“Because I am nothing if not a man of honor.” The Prince replies haughtily, “You have my word that she will be safe and sound as long as you play by my rules, Dominic.”

“I don’t believe you.” I say sharply, even though I have no intention of agreeing to his ludicrous terms.

‘You should. I’ve shown her nothing but kindness so far and I’ll continue to do that.’ He shrugs. “I have nothing against either of you as people – the problem is that you’re in my way.” He growls, his eyes flashing. ‘You have always been in my way.’ 1

“How do I know she’s really unharmed? She could be in some dungeon at this very moment, suffering Goddess only knows what.” I snap. “If I’m going to consider this offer, I want proof of life.”

“Alright.” He shrugs. “Give me 24 hours. We can set another meet. I’ll bring proof of life, and you can tell me your decision. Just no that if you say no to me – I’ll kill her faster than you can blink.”

Chapter 131 – Ella Dreams of Sinclair

Ella

Sleep! I beg my manic wolf. You have to keep your strength up! We need sleep!

I can't rest when there's danger. She argues stubbornly, and though I'm frustrated, I understand. I'm so exhausted with fear, anxiety, and pregnancy that I'm barely hanging onto my sanity by a thread, but I know it's the right thing to do. I need to keep my wits about me.

I haven't heard anything since the Prince visited my rooms. The servants brought me food and fresh linens, but I didn't trust them enough to actually eat, and as comfortable as the bed looks, it's a far cry from my beloved nest. I don't feel safe here, so how am I ever supposed to let my guard down enough to rest?

If only I could talk to Dominic, to know that he's alright and warn him about what I learned. As soon as the thought enters my mind, I realize what a fool I've been. There is a way! Of course there is!

I pull one of the blankets off the bed, scanning the room. I've circled the space about two dozen times already, memorizing every nook and cranny. Three guards are posted outside my door, and two more are posted on the ground below my third story window. In the end I clamber into the large wardrobe, needing to be hidden from sight – to feel walls around me even if they aren't truly strong enough to ward off an attack.

I toss and turn, trying to get comfortable and calm my wolf. My mind is still reeling, but the knowledge that I could soon be lost in a dream with my mate gives me the determination I need. When I open my eyes again, I'm in the same moonkissed forest I've visited in our other dream dates, and I pray that Sinclair has the sense to sleep too.

It happens slowly.

The more time that passes, the more I fear he's too frantic to rest, but after what feels like hours, I feel the air around me change, sparking with sudden electricity. I know he's here before I hear his voice, but it doesn't make the sound of his deep bass any less beautiful. "Ella!" Footsteps are racing towards me, and then I'm out of the bed in the trees, sprinting towards the sound of his voice.

When I see him I feel as though time itself slows down. My vision blurs with tears, and I'm crying out for him too, "Dominic!"

He's charging towards me beneath the stars, his ravenous gaze locked on me with such avid determination that part of me wants to turn and give chase – but I push those instincts far away. We're both wearing the same curious clothing that always appears on us here, but the closer Sinclair comes, I can see he's got a black eye and fresh scratches covering his skin. I'm worried for the wounds hidden beneath his clothing, but he's alive – and he's here.

When he's only a few feet away, I launch myself into his arms, feeling not a single shred of pain as my battered body collides with his. Powerful arms lock around my body, clutching me so tightly I can't breathe, but I don't care. I want him to hold me even tighter, and so I cling to him with all my strength, wrapping my legs around his waist and burying my face in his neck. His scent fills my senses, and I'm crying with sheer relief. He's okay.

The huge Alpha is nuzzling and petting me, murmuring sweet nonsense as he trails his lips over my skin. "Ella, my Ella. I've been so worried." I can only whimper in reply, running my hands through his hair and hoping he can feel my love as powerfully as I can feel his. "Such a clever mate, to think of our dreams! So perfect, so sweet." He drops to his knees, and though I'm trying my best to fuse our bodies together, he begins tugging at my limbs, "I'm so sorry, my love. Are you alright?"

I whine and squeeze him tighter, but his inner caretaker has claimed full control and he drags my body away from him with utmost ease. "Let me see, let me look at you."

With an agonized expression, his eyes sweep over the gash where my head hit the window in the car, the black bruise on my temple where the wolves knocked me out, and the blooming blue shadow on my cheekbone from Lydia's slap. His wolf whines as if my pain is his own, and Sinclair studies and fusses over each mark, dotting them with kisses and murmurs of sympathy. "Poor baby, what have they done to you?"

'The baby.' I hiccup, shaking my head and dragging his palm to my belly. He lets me guide his movement, obviously equally concerned. "He's kicking but I can't tell... is he alright?"

Sinclair dips his head to my neck as he focuses on the pulses of energy through his bond with our son, nibbling the spot on my shoulder where he claimed me the last time we were here. "He's okay, but he's stressed." He finally confirms, "he can feel your anxiety."

It's not the best news, but it's still an incredible relief. I'd been terrified that he might have been injured in the crash. 'There,' Sinclair croons, stroking my tummy as he breathes in my scent. "You see, that's better already. Oh my sweet mate, you must have been so afraid."

"What about you?" I sniffle, "are you hurt? What happened in the battle?"

But Sinclair shakes his head, ignoring my question as he rises and carries me to the bed. He pulls off my night dress, apparently determined to examine every inch of my body for injuries because he can focus on anything else.

He growls every time I try to object or push him away, running his hands over my bruises with featherlight tenderness, then following them with kisses.

I'm sorely reminded of a pet who can't be dissuaded from investigating every last scent on their owner's clothes after they come in from outdoors, albeit a very growly and affectionate one. Of course, I would ever voice such a comparison to Sinclair. He won't be satisfied until he's checked me from the top of my head to the bottom of my feet, switching back and forth between words of love and threats against the Prince. When he's finally finished, he pulls me into his lap and wraps me up in a tight embrace, purring intently.

"I want to look at you, too. It's my turn!" I complain anxiously, trying to wriggle enough to reach the buttons on his shirt. He huffs but eventually allows it, and I strip him the same way he stripped me, a fresh stab of pain slicing into me with every new scar and abrasion I find. His ribs are positively purple, and I feel guilty for squeezing him so tightly before. Still, when I try to keep my distance he simply reels me back in, holding me so tightly I have no hope of escape.

"How are you?" Sinclair inquires, still with such urgency despite the time which has passed since we reunited.

"Really?"

"I'm scared. For you, for me and the baby." I confess, "They killed Gabriel and the others just for trying to protect me. I gave myself up and they still killed them!"

Sinclair growls, but this time I sense a flash of anger directed towards me." They were always going to kill them, that's why you never ever surrender yourself. Never, you know better than that, Ella. What were you thinking?"

"I just couldn't stand there and do nothing!" I exclaim pitifully, hating his disappointment in me. I don't ever want Sinclair to be angry with me, but it hurts especially badly right now, when I only want cuddles and support.

"Yes you could!" He corrects me firmly. "And when I get you back I'm going to make sure you never consider doing anything so reckless again. Not for me, not for anyone." There's a threat in his voice, but the strange thing is that I find the suggestion of his dominance more calming than anything else. I suppose it tells me that he still loves me enough to care – not to give up on me for a single mistake. "What else?" He inquires, still in protector mode, needing to know every last detail.

A fresh wave of sobs threaten as I consider the things which have occurred since I arrived here. "Lydia's an abominable cow and the Prince is as dumb as a brick... and I miss my nest." I burst at the end, breaking down completely.

Sinclair clucks, purring louder for me. "I know, baby. I'm so sorry."

'Why is this happening?' I squeak after a minute, hating my weakness.

"The Prince is getting desperate." Sinclair answers, kissing my hair. "But don't worry, I'm going to make it right."

I'm going to come for you. Where is he keeping you?"

"I can't tell you." I state abruptly, thinking of the conversation I overheard earlier.

Sinclair stills, seeming to pick up on my sudden tension. "You can't tell me, or you don't know?" He clarifies.

"I know... but I can't tell you." I clarify, feeling the sudden urge to cower. I peek up at him from beneath my lashes and see the foreboding look on his handsome face. My wolf tucks her tail between her legs, but I dig in my heels.

"I won't tell you."

Sinclair growls, and I know I'm in big trouble.

Chapter 132 – Ella Warns Sinclair

Ella “What do you mean, you won’t tell me?” Sinclair rumbles, full of foreboding. He’s glowering down at me, emitting raw Alpha authority and unflinching disapproval. The idea that anyone would keep me from him – even me myself – seems to be more than he can handle. Still, I know I have to – if he comes after me the Prince will kill him.

I set my jaw trying to look fierce and determined, even though my wolf is whimpering in the face of his ire. “I won’t! I don’t care what you do or what you say, I’m not going to tell you.”

“Ella, what are you talking about? Why not?” Sinclair demands, his hands tightening reflexively on my body and then easing when he realizes how tightly he’s holding me.

“I heard the Prince and Lydia talking, they know you won’t give them their ransom. They think you’ll try to stage a rescue instead, and when you do, they’ll be waiting. It’s all a set up. If you come here they’ll kill you.” I whisper frantically, knowing this won’t dissuade him, but hoping my explanation will at least help him understand why I can’t answer his question.

Sinclair’s eyes glow neon green, and he bares his fangs, “So what would you have me do, Ella? Just leave you as his prisoner?” Before I can conjure any kind of response, he continues, “Not fucking likely, trouble.”

“I don’t have the answers.” I moan, leaning into him in hopes that he’ll calm down. Unfortunately he knows what I’m about, and keeps me at arm’s length, “I just know that rescue is not an option. I’m not going to let anyone else die for me – especially not you!” My throat is itching, my voice thick with emotion as I look up at my mate. “I can’t lose you, Dominic.”

“Sweetheart, if I know there’s an ambush waiting I can prepare for it.” Sinclair reasons, sounding gentler now. I think my upset has calmed his own temper, because he tucks my head under his chin and begins stroking my spine in long, soothing strokes. “I know you’re scared and you probably feel horribly guilty about your guards, but their deaths were the most honorable kind for a warrior. They joined my ranks because they wanted to defend the pack at all costs.”

“You didn’t see them.” I hiccup, “it wasn’t – they thought they’d failed. They died believing they hadn’t done their jobs, that they hadn’t protected me.”

He tsks, pressing his lips to my hair. “They will be remembered as heroes, Ella. They fought until the very end, even when the odds were so stacked against them that they knew they couldn’t win.”

“But I don’t want you to die too!” I cry. “I need you, the united packs need you.”

“Shhh, I have no plans of dying anytime soon.” Sinclair promises, caressing the curve of my belly. “But you need to tell me where you are so we can make a plan... so we can avoid that at all costs. Did you overhear Damon and Lydia because you’re in the Palace?”

I stubbornly shake my head. “I’ve made up my mind, Dominic.” I insist. “I’m better off in captivity than I would be if we lost you. Fear of you is the only thing keeping them from hurting me.”

Sinclair growls low and deep, brushing his thumb over the bruise on my cheek. “Is this what you call unhurt?”

I lean my face into his hand, nuzzling and nibble his palm, “it’s not so bad.” I insist, “A few bruises are nothing in the grand scheme.”

He grumbles, ‘They’re something to me, and he’s threatening to do much worse if I don’t end my campaign in the next 24 hours. We don’t have time to waste.’

“I’m sure he threatened to kill me, but even Damon isn’t that foolish. As long as you’re out there making life difficult for them, they’ll need to keep me as leverage.” I reason, hoping that I’m right.

‘That’s not a change I’m willing to take, Ella.’ Sinclair counters firmly. “And even if you are right, I can’t help you through this pregnancy if we’re separated. You’re already high risk, being a prisoner could make your condition even worse and endanger the baby.”

He’s using the baby against me. I realize, admiring his sly strategy. He knows I’ll let myself suffer, but the idea of our pup being harmed... I emit a pitiful moan, hating how right he is. ‘There has to be another way. Maybe I can escape on my own.’ The Prince’s threats ring in my mind, but I’m smart enough not to repeat these things to my mate. I know in my heart that if anyone is going to put themselves at risk, it should be me. The possibility of my baby’s death is too painful to contemplate, and my inner mama bear lashes out at the thought with primal rage. Still, Sinclair is the one who has to rule, he’s the one responsible for protecting millions of shifters and humans alike.

‘That’s an idea.’ Sinclair is watching me with narrowed eyes, and too late I realize he’s still got one hand on my tummy, no doubt channeling my feelings through the baby. “But what aren’t you saying, trouble? What aren’t you telling me?”

I summon a growl, hating his perceptiveness. “Look, if I try to escape and I’m caught, they might rough me up a bit, but they won’t kill me.” I assert, convinced the Prince wouldn’t give up such a powerful bargaining chip – or perhaps praying that I’m right, since I’m not willing to endanger Sinclair. “I’ll be able to try again. But if you try to rescue me and they get the better of you, they'll kill you. The risk is less if I try to do this on my own."

Sinclair fumes, and his fists clench and unclench on my body. "Listen to me, now. We only have a few more hours to work this out, and one way or another, you need to tell me where you are. I'm not saying I'm going to ride in there on a white horse to save you, but I can't find solutions if I don't know the situation."

I peek up at him sulkily, feeling a ferocious desperation to keep him safe no matter what. "What time exactly do you have to give your answer? Are you meeting him in person?" I question, thinking that if I try to escape when the Prince is out of the house with all his guards, I might actually be able to succeed.

"Why?" Sinclair demands, his voice like gravel.

"Because I'm trying to figure this out." I reply vaguely, knowing he's getting more and more frustrated with me by the minute.

"Tell me where you are and I'll help you." He repeats forcefully, practically shaking with the effort it's taking to control his wolf. "This is not the time to test me, little one."

"No." I repeat stubbornly, not able to meet his eyes. "I've made up my mind, Dominic. I'm not going to tell you."

Sinclair's hand clamps around my nape with unrelenting force, pulling my reluctant gaze up to his own. "Let's get one thing straight, beautiful. You are not going to keep sacrificing yourself to protect the people around you – you've given up enough in your life and it is my job to make sure you never have to do that ever again. I couldn't prevent you from doing it with the guards, but I'll be damned if I'm going to let you do it for me." There's something feral in his emerald eyes, a wildness I've never before encountered. "I'm hate to do this, but you're really not giving me another choice."

At first I don't have the first clue what he means, but the next thing I know, a wave of ruthless dominance slams into me, nearly bending my body in two with the force of his power. I gasp in shock, not understanding, "I – What are you doing to me?"

"This is the authority I hold over other wolves." He growls unapologetically, "I don't enjoy using it against my mate, but I will if I have to. Now tell me where you are." He commands mercilessly.

To my shock and horror I feel the words rising up inside my throat, balancing on the tip of my tongue. I fight with all my strength, amazed and devastated that he might steal the words from my lips without my permission. I always knew Sinclair was powerful, but I've never felt the full force of his dominance before. I didn't realize he could force someone to do something against their will, with only a few words.

“No!” I plead, tears streaming down my cheeks. “Please... don’t make me, they’ll kill you.”

‘Tell me.’ He says again, and to my misery, the force of his order only increases. I’m a begging, blubbering mess, but Sinclair doesn’t relent. I hate him for doing this to me, for making me say the words that might send him to his grave, but I can’t help myself. I’m powerless to stop him.

I feel my mouth opening, and then the words are spilling out.

Chapter 133 – Ella gets angry

Ella

“I’m in the Royal Palace.” I finally burst out. “The third floor, my windows look out over the southern gate... it’s a corner suite.”

At once the crushing weight of his orders dissipate, and I’m left a puddle in his arms. “Good girl.” Sinclair praises me, and I feel positively sick to my stomach. “It’s all going to be okay.”

I can’t stop crying. I’m beating my fists against Sinclair’s chest, angrier than I can ever remember being with him. “How could you, how could you?” I moan, my entire body shaking with the force of my weeping.

“I’m sorry, Ella.” He lets me attack him and never moves to defend himself, only holding me steady as I vent my feelings onto him. “When this is all over, I promise I’ll make it up to you, but I stand by what I said. You’re done hurting yourself for the sake of others.”

“But the world needs you! Not me!” I explode, finding it more and more difficult to take in air. “And what do you think they’ll do to me if you die? How is that going to help anything?”

“I need you, Ella.” Sinclair argues, “I need you as my mate, as the mother of my pups – my Luna. I’m not going to die, Ella.” Sinclair promises. “And neither are you. We’re not going to let him win, sweetheart.”

“You don’t know that!” I combat, heaving in another sob. “I will never forgive you for this, Dominic. Not for as long as I live.”

“The point is that you will live, trouble.” He murmurs, his lips against my temple. “That’s what matters most. I’d rather you hate me and live, than love me and die – and for that, I won’t apologize.”

“Well I do hate you!” I try to say, but it sounds about as fierce as a wounded butterfly.

“Do you really?” He inquires, a teasing note in his voice. “You don’t sound convinced.”

“Just don’t die.” I beg, and I realize that I stopped fighting him at some point. Now I’m clinging to him the same way I had been when he first arrived in my dream, and part of me wishes we could never leave this fantasy realm. We’re both safe here. I can be my wolf here without harming my baby, he can claim me and we can be together forever – just the three of us.

“Shh,” Sinclair croons, cuddling me to his chest. “We can work with the Palace, Ella.

There are passages in and out of the building intended for Royal emergencies. There's a chance there might be some in your rooms, and even if there aren't, I might be able to find some in order to get inside."

"But how are we supposed to tell each other if we're able to find one?" I sniffle, more confused than anything else. "It was hard enough to fall asleep the first time – I'm in a cupboard."

"A cupboard?" Sinclair repeats, a note of amusement in his voice.

"It felt safer than anything else." I defend hotly, knowing he probably can't understand the logic of my swirling hormones and trauma. "The point is that I can't guarantee I'll be able to fall asleep again, and neither of us has any time to waste. You can't plan if you're asleep."

"Well, I can tell you this much," Sinclair muses aloud. "The safest option for everyone would be if you can find a passageway. Often the royal family are the only ones who know they exist, which means they won't be guarded.

Moreover, they're used for evacuations, which means they lead outside the palace walls."

"Really?" I whisper, my tears slowing now.

"You see, sometimes telling me the truth has its benefits." Sinclair states, only slightly smug. The worst part is that he's right. I always feel better after I've come clean to him about my secrets, and the cocky bastard knows it.

"How do you know all this?" I inquire curiously.

"You forget that my father was almost King once, and we keep very close ties with the pack elders. Besides, the royal family and the Moon Valley Alpha are supposed to function as each other's backup in times of emergency – we know the protocols for evacuation and everything else in case the worst happens, even if we don't know the specifics."

"But what if there aren't any passages in my room?" I ask nervously, knowing it will mean I have to wait for his rescue.

"Then I come to you." Sinclair shrugs. "Hopefully you'll be able to get out before that's necessary. If you can escape then you can get in contact and let us know to call it off."

"Call what off?" I fret, blinking up at him with wide eyes.

“The Prince is waiting until the end of the day to hear from me. I’ll set the meet and tell him the location fifteen minutes before the planned rendezvous – just like we did the ransom meeting.” I’m surprised to hear that Sinclair already met with the man, and that the Prince is still standing afterwards, then again, he has a very strong trump card as long as I’m in his grasp. “But instead of going to the meeting, my men and I will infiltrate the palace. I’ll reach out to Adolpho and see if he knows any of the passage entrances.”

“And if he doesn’t?” I press, seeing far too many ways for this situation to go wrong.

Sinclair drops a quick succession of kisses to my cheek. “You’re just determined to poke holes aren’t you? If he doesn’t then we’ll do this the old fashioned way and go over the walls. If you find a passage then leave some sort of hint for us in your room – draw the curtains closed and unmake the bed.”

“Why, if you get there and it’s empty then won’t you know that I managed to get out?” I object, trying to follow his logic.

“No, they could move you to another location, or we could end up in the wrong room thinking it’s yours and accidentally leave you behind. If we arrive and see the room in that state, we’ll know we’re in the right place but we need to retreat. Is there anything else distinctive about your room? A color scheme, or something?”

“The walls are green.” I share, “and there are yellow flowers on the armoire.”

“Okay, that’s even better.” Sinclair nods. “Actually, it would be good if you can try to leave some sort of clue about where the passage was – so we can follow you out that way and catch up.”

I shake my head in awe, not understanding how he can be so calm about all this. Our very lives are on the line, but Sinclair is the cool and collected strategist, working out the problem as if it’s a jigsaw puzzle. “What kind of clue?”

He pauses to think. “Is there anything in your room you can use to write a coded message?”

“I think there’s a notepad and pen by the desk.” I recall.

“Then write a message to the prince, but spell out the location of the passage using the first letter of every sentence.” He instructs, and I can see the gears whirring in his mind.

“Okay, where should I look for passages?” I inquire, trying to picture the opulent bedroom.

“Start with any furniture or decorations against the walls – the back of your cupboard, paintings, fireplaces. Pull down vases, cot hooks, anything that might trigger a wall opening. Do the same in the bathroom. Pay attention to scuffs on the floor from sliding furniture, or drafts of air. If that doesn't work then just start pushing on the walls – you remember the entrance to the safehouse?" I nod, and he continues. "It could be a pressure sensor like that."

"How can you possibly be so calm about this?" I breathe, feeling my pulse fluttering in my veins.

"I'm not calm, Ella." Sinclair corrects me, looking down to meet my gaze. Sure enough, I see fire blazing in his brilliant irises, and a muted rage I know he's saving for the Prince. "Trust me, I'm the farthest thing in the world from calm, but the best thing I can do to help you right now is figure out a plan, so that's what I'm doing."

I nod, clenching my eyes shut. "How much time do we have?" I inquire, having a bad feeling that our reprieve is coming to an end.

"If you don't have any more questions then I should go." Sinclair says regretfully. "I wish it was otherwise, but I need to start getting plans in motion, and you need to start searching for your escape."

"Okay," I murmur, trying not to fall apart again.

"I love you, trouble." Sinclair replies, tilting my face up to his and claiming a deep kiss.

"I love you too." I answer, just in case this all goes terribly wrong. I don't want to let my earlier proclamation of hate to stand. "I'm sorry I said -"

"I know," He assures me, kissing me again. "It's going to be okay. Now wake up – the sooner you do, the sooner we can be together again."

I wake with tears in my eyes, but with fresh determination. I climb out of the wardrobe, and begin the hunt.

Chapter 134 – Ella Finds a Passage

Ella

I wipe the tears from my face and scan the room, Sinclair's voice ringing in my mind. I'm still upset with him for making me share my location, but I'm determined to escape before he can endanger himself coming after me. If there's a way out of this room, I'm going to find it. i Let me help! My wolf requests eagerly, as exhilarated with adrenaline as I am.

You are helping. I roll my eyes. Whose instincts do you think I'm using here? Certainly not my useless human ones.

And it's true, The stronger my wolf has become, the stronger all of my senses have become. My ears are cocked for the sounds of anyone approaching the room, my eyes are hawkishly raking over every nook and cranny in the bedroom, searching for the tiniest details on the walls and floors. My nose is scenting the air, trying to determine if there are strange draughts of air beyond the interiors of the small space.

More than anything, I'm tapping into the strange and mysterious gut feelings which have recently been becoming more and more pronounced, hoping this sixth sense will help point me in the right direction. These are all things I wouldn't have been able to do before – at least not in the same level of sharpness.

I pat my belly. "Mommy has a silly wolf, Rafe." The canine in question snorts in my head, Not as silly as his fathers.

You may have a point there. I remark fondly, thinking about Sinclair's possessive, overprotective inner animal who has a conniption if his scent fades from my skin or tries to bribe me with stolen children so I'll let him avenge my honor. A deep pang rises in my chest the more I linger on my mate, love and long overwhelming me all at once.

It's okay, we're going to see him again. My wolf assures me, every bit as heartsore as I am – if not more so. The sight of Sinclair's battle scarred body is fresh in my memories, and the pain I feel for the pain I love suffering thus is almost too much to bear. I'll never forgive myself if he's hurt worse than he already is because of me.

You're right. I answer with renewed determination. "Mommy's going to get us out of this." I add to Rafe, rubbing my navel.

I begin to walk along the interior walls, checking behind every painting, lifting every vase, shoving at the bookcases and tilting and tugging each and every book. I scour the space with a fine-toothed comb, feeling along the plaster and trying not to get dissuaded when I come up empty handed. Still, it's difficult not to feel a little pessimistic when everything I attempt fails.

At last I come to the fireplace, poking and prodding at the mantle, applying pressure to the heavy grey stones and lifting the grate. Nothing happens. I run my fingers along the underside of the square opening, praying that I find some sort of button or handle, but again I find nothing. Still, something is telling me to keep trying. I've been hopeful with the other objects and furniture, but now I have the surreal sense that this is right.

As a last ditch attempt, I begin fiddling with the tools situated next to the fireplace, lifting the brush, spade and tongs. Finally I attempt to lift the poker, but it won't budge. I yank at the handle, but it remains firmly in place, as if it is glued to the floor. My heart begins to race, and instead of lifting, I try to pull it from side to side. With a forceful tug, it finally deploys, shifting towards the floor with a pronounced click. There's a rumble and the scaping of rock against stone, and suddenly the back wall of the fireplace disappears.

It takes all my restraint not to jump up and down and cheer. My spirit soars, and I hurriedly flit around the room, pulling the curtains closed and unmaking the bed. I'm listening intently for the sound of anyone approaching, terrified that a guard might walk in while the passage is open, but also afraid of making more noise than I already have by closing it. I dash to the desk and frantically try to figure out what to write. The cipher Sinclair suggested isn't the problem – the question is what on earth I should say to the man who abducted me.

Eventually I settle on the following: To His Royal Highness and Her Unholy Pain in the Ass, Lydia, For what it's worth, your plan wasn't the worst idea. It was, however, an absolute miscalculation to think I would just sit here and accept my fate. Really, if you're going to kidnap someone, you honestly ought to learn a few things about them first.

Even though I may look like a helpless damsel, it's not in my nature to surrender. Please consider doing more research in advance of your next scheme, or I'm afraid you might be doomed to fail again. Losing may be what you're accustomed to, but if you just apply yourself and put in the work, you'd be amazed at what you can achieve.

And while I offer this humble advice for your diabolical schemes out of the goodness of my heart (I do worry that if you continue to be such an utter and complete failure, it might further degrade your mental health and you're already plenty psychotic), I must warn you against targeting me again. Continuing to move against Sinclair is not only dangerous, it is phenomenally stupid. Eventually he will lose his patience with humoring your pathetic schemes and fight back – and you will die an excruciating but well-deserved death.

Sincerely, Ella Sinclair P.S. Go fuck yourself.

Dropping the pen, I pause to glance at the go-bag I took to the safehouse. I don't want it to weigh me down, but I can't afford to lose the herbs Adolpho gave me. I grab the tin, leaving the rest behind, and tuck it into my pocket. I quickly return to the fireplace and slip inside, every nerve in my body singing with excitement. We did it! This is actually going to work!

My wolf howls with delight, and I search for a way to close the passage from the inside, soon finding a similar lever as the one disguised as a poker. The stone closes behind me, and suddenly I'm in utter, complete darkness. If my wolf was fully awake, I'd probably be able to see through the pitch black tunnel, but instead I can only make out dim shadows.

Still, it's certainly better than nothing. Thanking the goddess for the first step of my escape, I pray that this passage leads me straight out of the palace and that I don't have to navigate a complicated maze of tunnels that might let me out in another room or worse... get me lost. If I want to get notice to Sinclair before he can stage a rescue, I have to be quick.

I set off at a trot before remembering I'm supposed to be on bed rest. You'll be more stressed by remaining in danger than you will by a little exercise. My wolf reasons, but I'm not sure. I slow to a quick walk, telling myself that this is better anyway in case the ground is uneven or I come across an unexpected step.

I'm relieved when the tunnel continues straight on ahead with only a few twists and turns, but no intersections with other passageways. However my relief soon turns to fear, because I walk further and further into the darkness with no end in sight. I'm not sure how much time passes, but seconds turn to minutes, and minutes turn to what feels like hours. I have no way of knowing if my mind is merely playing tricks on me, or if I really am walking as far as it feels.

The longer I walk, the more I begin to feel paranoid about my plan. What if there is no end? What if I just keep walking forever and never get out? 1

You're being irrational. My wolf answers in a soothing tone. This tunnel is here for a reason, it can't go on forever and the fact that it's so long is a good sign, there's no way we're still in the palace.

But where is it going to let out? I fret. At this rate I'll never be out in time to get in touch with Sinclair.

We'll figure it out. She replies. Don't stress more than you have to. Think of the pup.

I nod in agreement, and apologize to the tiny being inside me. "I'm sorry, Rafe. It's okay, I'm okay."

I wish I could say the tunnel ended soon, but instead it goes on for miles. I walk until my legs are weak with exhaustion, and when I finally reach the end, I'm so relieved that tears fill my eyes. Of course, my tears transform from happy to horrified when I finally emerge from the passage.

If that tunnel was meant for evacuation, then it certainly did its job. It empties out into the frozen wilderness of the mountains outside the city, so far from civilization that I can't even see Moon Valley in the distance. It's the coldest month of the year, and the landscape is buried beneath a thick blanket of snow. I'm wearing the simple clothes the Prince provided so I could change out of the dirtied and bloodied outfit from the kidnapping: no coat, no gloves, hat or scarf.

Suddenly I'm praying that Sinclair staged his rescue earlier than planned, because if he doesn't find me soon... I'm going to die out here.

Chapter 135 – Sinclair Stages a Rescue

Sinclair

After waking from my dream with Ella, I immediately get to work trying to find a way into the Royal Palace. I'm hopeful that Ella might be able to find a way out on her own, but I'm leaving nothing to chance. I call Adolpho and my father for insights on secret passages while Hugo and Roger assemble a small army of our best fighters.

None of us have slept much since the battle, and I know this is another of Lydia's tactics. The Prince and his men will be well rested and fully energized, while mine will be running on fumes. Still, Ella and the baby are all the motivation I need to push through my exhaustion.

Adolpho tells me about a tunnel near the river which can help us breach the Palace without a loud, violent assault bound to draw attention from the public and the media alike. This is good – it was going to be hard to explain why the Moon Valley Alpha was sending forces to attack the Royal Residence, but I'd been willing to do it if there were no other options. When I share this logic with my father, he frowns thoughtfully, and I pause. "What is it?"

"Are you sure you want to keep this quiet?" He questions, rubbing his jaw." Maybe this is the opportunity we've been waiting for, to show the world Damon's true colors. No one would blame you for attacking if they knew the Prince kidnapped your mate, and after you defended the territory against the rogues so valiantly – no one would accuse you of being weak for calling him out."

I consider his words carefully. We've always kept our shadow war with the royal family secret because accusations without proof or action are more likely to backfire than make progress. However this time there's been plenty of action, and the early "all clear" along with Ella's testimony and injuries could be the proof we need.

I don't know what happened to her guards' bodies and we checked the CCTV cameras in the area of the accident only to find all the footage erased, but we might not need a smoking gun if we can get Ella back safely. 1

We will get her back safely. My wolf corrects me fiercely. And then we should kill Damon and Lydia both. Just think of the possibilities, he suggests slyly, gearing up for a bloodthirsty rant. We can tear off all his fingers and shove them up...

I tune out the violent images suddenly filling my mind. Not for the first time, I'm surprised at my wolf's willingness to harm our fated mate, but I can't help sharing his desire to exterminate the Prince. Granted, this is another idea which has historically been very tempting, but I've held back for much of the same reasons. Shaking my head, I groan, "I fucking hate politics." 1Dad's lip quirks, "Care to share your train of thought?"

“If I accuse him without doing anything about it. I’m weak. But if I kill him without authorization from the Alpha Council, then I’m an anti-government rogue – a usurper.” I explain gruffly. “Sometimes I think the old ways were better. No diplomacy, no voting – just taking the power which is rightly yours.”

My father clears his throat and arches his brows, patiently waiting for me to work through my frustration and reach the right conclusion on my own.” I know, I know!” I gripe. “That’s what they did. That’s the kind of ruler from which we’re trying to protect the united packs. But it still makes me want to rip my hair out. I hate that we have to play by the rules just to prove ourselves worthy of the position they stole through flouting them at every turn.”

“But we do, because at the end of the day our responsibility is to do right by the people, and we can’t do that if we get exiled or deposed.” Dad reasons calmly.

This reminder, more than any of the possible implications for my campaign, makes the decision for me. “And I have to do right by Ella, which I can’t do if I get distracted with the politics. The most important thing is bringing her safely home, and that means I have to go with the plan which gives us the best chance of doing that. It’s riskier to stage a full on incursion. The surest bet we have is to sneak in through the evacuation tunnels and keep a low profile.”

“Alright then,” Dad agrees with a proud twinkle in his eye, “And afterwards we can consider how to handle the Prince moving forward.”

I nod, feeling a little calmer now that we’ve rationalized our plan. I spend the rest of the day strategizing and waiting with baited breath for Ella’s call. Every time the phone rings or I get a notification my heart leaps in my chest, and every time it falls when I see that it’s just one of my men or a news blurb.

We’ve been getting non-stop requests from the media ever since the rogue attack, and even though I’m worried about the optics, so far I’ve refused to hold a press conference or make a statement. I sent Hugo to issue a press release while I focus on the rescue mission, hoping that will be enough to calm the clamoring public.

I wait until an hour before the Prince’s deadline to finally call him to set our meeting. At this point it’s been eight hours since I woke up, and I figure that if Ella hasn’t found a way out by now, she’s not going to. I use the same protocol from our first rendezvous, promising to send the location just prior.

Meanwhile I mobilize my team to the site of the tunnel entrance, and send backup squadrons to surround the palace. Nearly every enforcer I possess is ready and waiting to infiltrate the palace if the plan backfires, and I can only hope that the Prince empties the palace of guards in order to take them to the meeting.

We see the second they move out, truckloads of shifters rolling out of the main gates and heading off in the direction of our meeting point. I don't waste any time guiding my forces into the passage, traversing the narrow space at a steady trot. It's only about a thousand meters to the tunnel entry, which lets us out into the opulent palace library through a bookcase.

I've been in this library before, and I know it's in the east wing of the estate. Luckily it's unguarded, so I move to the windows as quietly as I can, trying to gauge our exact location. I'm not going to be able to pick up Ella's scent until we're closer, the sprawling palace is simply too large.

"Okay, we've got some ground to cover, boys." I state determinedly. "Keep your eyes and ears open."

I open the door and peer outside, clearing my corners before emerging into the corridor. We stealthily sneak through the halls, peeking around corners and sneaking up on unsuspecting guards posted along the way.

For every wolf we dispatch, we try to drag their unconscious bodies out of sight to avoid detection, but the fact is that our scents are going to give us away just as quickly. When we cross the second floor atrium I finally catch Ella's scent, and then it's merely a matter of following my nose. I keep one eye on the world outside the windows as we go to ensure our path matches up with the location of the room Ella described to me.

When we finally reach the third floor corridor in question, I know we're in the right place by the guards posted at Ella's door. I deal with them quickly letting my enforcers drag their bodies into hiding while I storm inside.

The room is exactly as Ella described, and her scent is everywhere. I scan the area for her, noticing the drawn curtains and unmade bed. Worry pulses to life in the pit of my stomach... if she found a way out then why haven't I heard from her?

I catch sight of a piece of paper on the desk, covered in Ella's scrawling script. I can't help but chuckle when I read her sassy note, even though it gives me no comfort to know that she found a passage when she hasn't yet made contact. Either she ended up getting lost somehow, or she's been caught.

I pick up the note and fold it, placing it in my pocket. Ideally when the prince returns, he'll catch the scent of my team in the room and see the disabled guards in the corridors, then assume we took Ella out the same way we got in. In reality we'll be somewhere else entirely.

“All right, let’s move.” I order. It takes a minute for us to figure out how to open the passage, but once we do my team storms into the fireplace, forced to duck our heads below the low ceiling. The last man inside shuts the passage behind us, and darkness closes in. Ella’s sweet scent fills the air, in fact, she’s all I can smell for miles ahead.

Miles... I realize with a fresh stab of fear. My little troublemaker is only supposed to be on her feet for twenty minutes at a time... what if she isn’t lost or recaptured, but somewhere further down this tunnel experiencing a medical crisis... or worse?

‘We’re taking this at a run.’ I announce, my voice echoing in the dim space. ‘Try to keep up.’ With that I take off into the darkness, hoping against all hope that we aren’t too late.

Shuffle! Shuffle!

Chapter 136 – Ella's dilemma

Ella

I gaze around at the icy mountains, squinting up at the sky. The sun is high overhead, only halfway through its daily journey from East to West. That means it's about noon... three hours from when I found the passage, according to the bedroom clock. The Prince's deadline isn't until dusk, which means there's still time to get word to Sinclair, assuming I can figure out how to get back to the city.

Suddenly I'm kicking myself for leaving my go-bag behind. My coat wasn't there because it had been stained and damaged, but I had other clothes inside, things I could layer onto my body to try and provide myself some warmth. I might move faster without the weight, but lightness won't help me if I drop dead from hypothermia.

Just keep your blood moving. My wolf advises, as long as your heart is pumping it will keep you warm.

Not if I'm sweating. I counter, the liquid will just freeze and kill me faster.

Then stay active, but not so active that you're sweating. You don't want to stress the baby anyway. She advises, Alright. I agree. How far do you think the valley is?

Well, it's nowhere in sight, so we must be on the wrong slope of the mountain. My wolf reasons, making my heart sink.

So what? I have to go over it? I ask in horror, looking up at the snow covered peak. There's no way I can make that sort of climb without gear, and it would certainly take more time than I have to spare. Besides, I'd probably fall into a crevasse or get buried in an avalanche. There is no way in hell I can survive that journey.

I think we have to give up on the idea of reaching Sinclair before he can come after us... we need him to come after us. All we can do is try to stay warm and hope he attempts a rescue sooner rather than later. She suggests.

I hate to admit it, but I know she's right. I'd wanted to prevent Sinclair from encountering any more danger than he already has, but beggars can't be choosers, and right now I'm certainly a beggar. So do I stay put and walk in circles, or try to descend? I wonder. I don't want to stay out in the open like this, in case the Prince figures out that I've escaped before Sinclair comes for me, but the closer I am to the tunnel, the faster I can be rescued.

I could just go back into the tunnel and hope that the Prince doesn't figure it out. I realize, a light bulb bursting on in my head. It's a risk, but the tunnel had been warmer at least, surely I'd have a better chance if... My thoughts trail off as I turn and see that the rock wall where I'd emerged is tightly shut. Like the fireplace, an interior lever had opened the exit to the passage, but unlike the fireplace, this one seems to have closed behind me.

Panicked, I rush back to the granite slab, pushing at it the way I'd seen my guards to at the safe house. I try and try to open it again, looking around for anything that might trigger the internal mechanism and finding nothing. In the end I'm throwing my body into the rock, tears of frustration streaming down my cheeks. "No!" I cry out angrily. "No, no, no! It isn't fair. Open, damn you!"

Nothing happens, and I end up collapsing into the snow with a wordless scream of outrage and misery. Get up! My wolf orders sharply, lying in the snow is going to soak your clothes and then we'll really be screwed.

Knowing she's right, I jump back onto my feet. The tears from frost on my cheeks, and I rub away the crystalline particles, trying to keep my wits about me even though I want nothing more than to rage at the Goddess and the universe for putting me in this situation.

At a loss, I stare down the mountain. The treeline starts about a mile below me, and though I know the sun will keep me warmer than the shaded forest, it's also lower elevation and I might find shelter for the night. Even as I think it, I know I won't make it through the night... not in my current state.

There are always the herbs. My wolf reminds me softly, her voice heavy with regret for making the suggestion. If you wake me fully we'll be able to handle the elements. Wolves are made for the wilderness... you'll be ten times harder to kill.

No! I argue immediately clutching my belly. Not unless we have no other choice. Those herbs are a last resort.

I don't like it any more than you do. She remarks sorrowfully, but this is life and death. If you don't make it, Rafe doesn't either.

I know that! I insist ferociously. But I can't... there's still a chance that we can find another way. Maybe Sinclair can catch up before it's too late.

Maybe there's a cabin somewhere in that forest... in fact, I bet there is! If the Royal Family uses this tunnels in emergencies I bet there's some sort of emergency shelter nearby! It would be crazy not to when things get like this in winter.

Okay, then. My wolf approves. We keep moving and we look for shelter.

Calmer now that I have a plan, I rub my belly and give a word of comfort to my growing pup. "It's okay, angel. Daddy's going to come for us, and until then I'm going to keep you safe and sound."

It takes me ages to reach the forest. I force my tired legs through the deep snow drifts, sinking down into feet of fresh powder with every step I take. I try to use my sharpened senses to detect a path or signs of opening in the dense trees, but I can't seem to decipher anything but ice and snow. I'm already exhausted, and my skin stings with the bite of the glacial wind. I experience some relief when I move into the dense woodland, scenting the air for any signs of wildlife or civilization – no matter how distant.

The snow isn't as deep in the forest, and it isn't as cold as it had been on the exposed snowpack, but it's getting harder and harder to keep moving. I want to rest so badly, but I just keep my mind on Sinclair and Rafe, and force my body to continue fighting.

I stumble forward for what seems like hours, and when night falls, I realize that it has, in fact, been far longer than I understood. I haven't found any signs of shelter, and the air around me grows more frigid as the darkness sets in. "Where are you, Dominic?" I ask aloud, my breath coming out in a white fog around my face. I try to comfort myself with the knowledge that he will certainly know I escaped by now, and he's probably on his way... but that tunnel was so long, and I've been walking for hours since.

He's not going to make it in time. I suddenly realize, with dreadful certainty. He must have waited until he couldn't any more... I begged him only to rescue me as a last resort and he listened. Now it's too far, and I'm too weak. He's still hours away, and I can barely put one foot in front of the other... I can't even feel my toes anymore.

As the horrible reality overtakes me, I give up my trek. Shivers wracking my body, I curl up on the ground, clutching my limbs in a little ball. There's only one thing left for me to do... but I can't bear the pain of knowing saving my life will mean ending my baby's.

"I'm sorry." I sob pitifully, cradling my tummy. "I'm so sorry. I don't want to do this." I tell Rafe. "I tried... I tried so hard to save us."

Though it had been her suggestion, my wolf is keeping mournfully in my head, every bit as devastated as I am. "I love you so much. If there was any other way... I would never hurt you." My breath is heaving so violently that I can no longer breathe, "You were my dream... you were everything I ever wanted... your Daddy and I were to give you such a wonderful life..." I share through hiccups. "You were never going to want for anything, or doubt how deeply we loved you for a single second. You were my entire world, and Dominic's too..." I can't bear that I'm already referring to him in past tense. "

I'm so, so sorry... you will always be my little prince. We will never forget you, Rafe."

I continue crying my eyes out until I can feel my eyelids drooping and my heart rate beginning to slow. I don't move until I know that there's no more time to waste. If I don't do this now... my baby won't be the only one who dies.

It's time. My wolf murmurs, sounding too far away for comfort.

My heart shattering into a million pieces... I swallow the herb.

Chapter 137 – The Herb

Ella

My grief keeps me awake far longer than I'm sure I could have managed otherwise. I'm alone, so I don't bother trying to quiet my keening, wailing my despair into the night air. I'm not sure how long it will take for the shift to take hold, but I pray that the violent transformation will generate enough heat and energy to allow me to survive.

The possibility that it might fail seeps into my mind and suddenly I wonder if I should have just let myself fall asleep, rather than meeting my end in agony.

Oh Goddess, I should have taken the herb hours ago. I think woefully. Now it's probably too late.

This thought only makes me cry harder, but there's also a growing kernel of warmth in my belly, pulsing inside me and radiating the strangest sensations through my body. Suddenly the entire forest explodes into a cacophony of sound – chirping crickets, croaking frogs, the low hoot of an owl, and other things I can scarcely recognize. I can hear small animals scurrying below the snowpack, and the sound of the wind rustling through the trees for miles away. It's too -overwhelming, and I'm amazed by the images that appear in my mind, explaining each sound with a clarity I couldn't have possibly imagined. It's almost as though I can see sound.. and I realize this must be how it is for wolves all the time. The herb is working.

Then I hear something else, pounding footprints crunching through the snow. "No! No, no, no." I moan desperately, my mind slowly piecing together the puzzle of information. If I hear footsteps it means... it means either Sinclair or the Prince has finally caught up with me. Either way...

I'm going to be found imminently, which means didn't have to take the herb after all. I find the strength to push my body up on my hands and knees, sticking my fingers down my throat and trying to make myself vomit.. to undo the horrible.

That's how Sinclair found me a few minutes later, sobbing and gagging, begging the Goddess to take back my rash actions. "Ella!" He shouts, racing towards me. "Oh thank the stars." His voice pierces my skull at a terrifying volume, and I clamp my hands over my ears, crying out.

"Ella, it's okay, I'm here." Sinclair assures me, misunderstanding my pain. His voice is still too loud, but the pain in my heart is even more excruciating than the pain in my head.

"No," I cry again, my chest heaving. "No, you..

You're t-too la -late."

Sinclair crashes onto his knees in the snow beside me, wearing head to toe tactical gear that no doubt kept him perfectly warm through his own alpine trek. His arms reach for me, but I jerk away from him, my adrenaline spiking again now that my baby's life is in unnecessary danger. I'm crying so hard I can't catch my breath, but I still can't make myself vomit. The surreal power swirling in my stomach only grows stronger, and I know there's no reversing this. I jerk my head to Sinclair, and he reels back when he sees my wide, glowing eyes.

"I thought... I thought I was dying" I try to explain, my words coming out babbled and slurred. "I didn't th-think... I had.. a ch-choice."

Understanding makes Sinclair's brilliant green eyes go wide with alarm and pain. He swears under his breath, looking over his shoulder at his second in command. "We need an extraction right now. Call for a chopper." I hear the man pulling out his phone and the dial tone is as loud as a blaring fog horn.

I'm shaking my head as Sinclair reaches for me again, my words unintelligible in the height of my "anguish. "It's okay, baby. It's gonna be okay."

Sinclair croons, dragging me into his embrace even though I fight tooth and nail. "Come on, let's get you warm." He unzips his coat and pulls me against his overheated body before zipping it up again.

The man on the phone is speaking now, giving our location, and I'm amazed to discover I can detect the pilot's voice just as easily. Sinclair's heart beat is pounding against my ear, and the sounds of his men's hearts and breath fill my head as well. "Too loud." I whimper, "It's too loud."

"I know, baby." Sinclair whispers, but it sounds like a yell. He chafes my body with his hands, generating heat through his thick jacket. "We don't have much time." He says then, clearly talking to his men. "She's about to enter her first shift."

"Her first -" One of the men starts to question, clearly not in on the secret of my suppressed wolf.

Sinclair cuts him off, "I'll explain later, we need to get out of the woods."

He stands, cradling me in his arms, and I sob into his neck. "Th-the p-pup." I moan. "I-I've k-killed him."

"Shh, little one." Sinclair, purrs, but I can hear the "grief in his own voice. "Let's just get you someplace safe. Fuck, you're frozen solid." He takes off at a run, and suddenly I understand how he reached me so fast. Even carrying me on two legs, he and his men are five times as fast as a human, and probably ten times faster than I'd be stumbling and falling through the deep snow in my exhaustion.

The world starts to go fuzzy then, and I feel as though I've swallowed a glowing ball of light. Other senses are starting to sharpen – my eyes are tightly shut and blurred with tears, but my nose is suddenly every bit as overwhelmed as my ears.

Sinclair's familiar aroma has been magnified by a thousand, deepened and more complex than I've ever experienced before. It's so strong I almost feel intoxicated with it, but I can smell other things too, things I never imagined having scents – like the sweat of the men surrounding us, and my mate's fear for my well being. Bad things too, like the decay of dead animals trapped in the ice, or the scat of a lynx somewhere off in the distance.

It seems as though I've been moving through the world in a bubble my entire life, and now that protective, insulating barrier has finally popped and everything is coming into severe focus reminds me of birth, of a child existing in its dark, -fluid filled sac until it's abruptly introduced into the harsh world with no warning. I suppose this is a rebirth for me, but the comparison sends my spiraling emotions even further out of control. The cost of my own reincarnation is depriving my pup of his own life... he will never have the chance to experience life outside of my womb.

My shivers only worsen with my grief, and though Sinclair's scorching skin is buffering my icy limbs,

I can't get warm. We're out of the forest in an instant, and then a horrible, violent whump whump whump, fills my ears. I scream in response to the noise of the helicopter, more painful than anything I've yet experienced.

Sinclair attempts to help by pressing one of his hands over my own. "Just hold on, Ella." He encourages. "I've got you."

He leaps into the back of the aircraft, taking me into a far corner and strapping himself in. I'm trying to plug my ears again, but it won't work. His men clamber into the chopper with us, and then we're leaving the ground, gaining altitude and rising up into the heavens. The motion makes me feel sick to my stomach, but my body seems incapable of rejecting the contents of my stomach, as if the herb congealed my insides and formed an immovable rock to ensure the metamorphosis takes hold.

"Let me see your hands, baby." Sinclair requests, dragging one of my palms from my ears to examine my fingers. He curses again, and I realize it's because my extremities have turned blue with frostbite. He does the same with my feet, and I can't even bring myself to care that I might lose my fingers and toes. I would gladly trade them for my baby. Sinclair tucks my frosty fingers under his arms and grips my toes in his hands, trying to radiate his own warmth into my system. "Im sorry," He murmurs as quietly as he can, his voice thick with emotion. I smell salt unlike my own tears or the others' sweat, and I realize they're Sinclair's tears. "Im sorry it took me so long to reach you."

I've been keeping my eyes tightly shut, terrified of adding more sensory stimulation to my already overloaded system, but I force myself to look up at him. It's dark in the helicopter, which is a true blessing. I can see Sinclair as clearly as I normally would have in the light, his features are strained with the weight of his guilt and sadness. I can't stand it, this isn't his fault and I know he's going to torture himself for my rash decision. "I sh-should have waited... been stronger."

Sinclair's face crumples with pain. He starts to purr then stops, remembering my sensitivity to noise. He opens his mouth to respond to my statement, but before he can get a word out something explodes inside of me, and I scream at the top of my lungs.

Sinclair grips me tighter, ordering the pilots to hurry up. "Faster! Her shift is beginning."

Chapter 138 – Ella Shifts

Sinclair

I don't remember much about my own experience shifting for the first time. I remember the blinding pain, the torment of having every bone in my body broken, every muscle torn to perform the strange alchemy of reshaping my into a wolf.

I remember it feeling as though it lasted forever, the certainty that it would never end... that I was surely dying. I didn't understand how anyone could survive such torment, but my Father was beside me every step of the way, holding me, comforting me and promising that it would be alright. I recall the rumble of his steady, reassuring voice more than anything else, but I never imagined how hard it must have been for him to watch me suffer thus.

Now I understand only too well. It's worse with Ella, because all her senses are coming in at once – the entire world suddenly becoming too sharp, too bright, too loud. And her agony is deeper, because in becoming her wolf she's also losing our baby, the baby she waited and longed for over so many years.

I'm devastated to know our son won't survive, and I can feel his immense stress through our bond as Ella's wolf emerges, but the worst part of all this is knowing I can't fix it. I can't protect either of them from the brutality of nature.

I would gladly take on Ella's pain myself. I would gladly suffer so that she doesn't have to... but I can't, I can only be there for her and try to ease her distress. When the helicopter lands on the roof of the mansion, I carry Ella down to my room, struggling to hold onto her as her small form jerks and spasms with more strength than she would ever be able to manage normally. She's still shivering with cold, and though her wolf is waking up, I'm worried that it may not be fast enough to save her fingers and toes.

"Look baby, look – it's your nest." I tell her, unwrapping her from my coat to deposit her on the bed.

Ella is still in the beginning stages of her shift, still lucid enough to know where she is and what's happening. It won't stay that way, of course. In a few hours she'll be so consumed by pain that she won't know her own name anymore.

She peeks through the darkened room, taking in her surroundings. With a pitiful moan, she weakly crawls deeper into the pillowy haven, both relieved to be in her safe haven and heartbroken to know she won't need a nest much longer. I quickly bury her trembling form in blankets, and drop a kiss to her tear-stained cheek, promising to return shortly.

I leave her only long enough to fill the bath with warm water, trying not to think about how different this might have turned out if I hadn't waited so long to go in after her. I'd been trying to respect her wishes, to make her escape as safe as possible. Instead she ended up alone and helpless on the frozen mountain.

The sounds of Ella's inconsolable weeping and whimpers of pain provide a tortuous soundtrack to my internal diatribe, and I return to the bedroom to find her writhing in discomfort under the blankets. When I try to lift her she resists, "N-no." She cries, shoving my hands away. "I w-want to stay. If I h- have to l-lose him, it sh-should be here."

"I'll bring you back." I vow, realizing what a mistake it was to offer her this comfort and then try to take it away – even if it is only temporary. "We have to get you warm first, sweetheart."

But Ella won't have it. She fights me tooth and nail as I forcibly remove her from the bed, as vicious as a tiny hellcat despite her exhaustion and depleted state. It breaks my heart to be so ruthless with her, but I know it's for her own good. I can't get her to be still long enough to undress her so I tear her clothes away and drag her into the bath. She goes in with a great splash, then whines as the warm water meets her numb extremities, no doubt sending pins and needles through her limbs.

Ella immediately tries to escape the tub, and I hold her down, wishing there was any other way. I've called for the doctor, but until her shift is over, administering any kind of care to her is going to be harrowing.

Ella lashes at me the only way she can, telling me she hates me, that I'm a monster and she'll never forgive me for this. I know she's not herself, but I'd be lying if I said these words didn't hurt, digging into my already aching heart like so many knives.

I can't even purr for her, because the noise alone will make her pain that much worse. The sounds and chaotic scents of the city have already amplified the pain she was feeling in the forest, and I'm trying my best not to add to her plight. I wish I could get some food into her to help provide her energy for what is yet to come, but I know it will be impossible. It's probably for the best anyway, since her taste buds will be just as oversensitive as everything else.

Suddenly Ella's back bows violently as a horrible crack fills the air, and I know we're out of time. She howls with pain as she enters the second stage of her shift, and my wolf whines helplessly, rabid with the need to ease her torment. I pull her from the bath and return her to the nest, letting her feel my nearness and praying this will comfort her.

Ella's shouts of anger transform into wails and begging for me to make it stop. I can only hold and pet her, whispering sweet nothings and reminders that it's only temporary. "I know, baby. I know it hurts. I promise it will be over soon."

At some point, Ella turns her eyes to me, her pupils dilated so wide with pain that her irises are nothing more than a glowing gold ring around pitch black pools. "I don't want to be a wolf anymore." She whimpers, her fingers digging into my skin with incredible force. "Just make it stop."

"I would if I could, little one." I answer miserably. "I'm so sorry."

She turns her head away from me and seizes up as all her fingers break at once, her mouth opening in a silent wail, beyond the ability of making a sound. "Shh," I croon uselessly, "Shh, I know."

By the third hour of the shift, Ella's begging has ceased. Instead the pain wracks her body with vicious sounds of breaking bones and rending flesh, contorting her into unnatural shapes as she wavers in and out of consciousness, screaming herself hoarse when she's awake and falling limp when the darkness finally takes her again.

My father enters after one such episode, finding me cradling her sleeping, broken body. I rock her and mutter in her ear, hoping she'll be able to hear me somewhere deep down. "I love you, Ella. You are loved, so so loved."

"You need to take a break, Dominic." My father encourages gently, rolling close enough to place a firm hand on my shoulder.

"No – I can't leave her." I insist stubbornly, my wolf snarling at the very suggestion.

"Will you at least eat if I bring you something?" He requests, using his sternest "Dad" voice. "You're coming off of a battle, a kidnapping, and a rescue operation on top of everything else." When I still don't respond, my attention laser focused on my mate, he adds. "You've got to keep your strength up if you want to help Ella."

This finally makes me agree, and when he brings me a heaping plate of food a little while later I scarf it down so quickly I'm worried I've made myself sick. I didn't realize how ravenous I was until the meal was in front of me, and I immediately feel revived – physically if not emotionally.

The food gives me the endurance I need to support Ella through the rest of her shift, When it's over and Ella is finally still – a pint-sized rose gold wolf curled in the wreckage of her nest, passed out from sheer exhaustion – I stumble out of the room and into my father's arms. I collapse against him, crying harder than I can remember doing since my mother died.

He purrs and consoles me the way he did when I was a pup, and I can only blubber my thanks to him – not only for this comfort, but for his own suffering helping me through this process when I was a boy. Ella might be my mate rather than my child, but I understand what it means now to guide someone through their first shift.

In return, Dad assures me it won't be this bad when I finally become a father. "Today you did something no parent has ever had to endure." He shares, rubbing my back. "This was so much more than just a first shift, and I've never been prouder of you, son." This only makes me weep harder, and he clucks in sympathy. "Go be with your mate, Dominic. You need the rest every bit as much as she does."

Cried out, emotionally and physically spent, I do as I'm told. Returning to the bedroom, I strip of my clothes and shift into my wolf, before jumping onto the bed and curling my big body around Ella's. The moment I close my eyes, I'm asleep.

Chapter 139 – Ella's Wolf

Ella

Everything is different the moment I open my eyes. I don't really want to wake up, to face a world without my baby in it, but my grief is momentarily dimmed by my wolf's elation to finally be free. The temptation to bury my sorrows deep down and let myself be distracted is incredibly alluring, and I throw myself into denial with full force.

I feel as though I've been asleep for days, and maybe I have, but I feel stronger and sharper than I have in my entire life. The lights are searing bright, and the city is still too loud, but it's not excruciating like it was before.

My body must have acclimated while I rested, becoming used to sensing the world around me in ultra-high definition. My limbs are delightfully sore, and I revel in the feeling of thick, downy fur covering my body. I flex my fingers and toes, experimenting with my sharp claws and running my tongue over my fangs.

Being a wolf is even better than it was in my dream, partly because I know it's real this time, but also because the world around me seems completely new. It's as if I'm doing everything for the very first time, and it's impossible not to be excited and thrilled despite the dark cloud hanging over my head.

I've been so caught up in my own head that I didn't even realize that I'm not alone until a familiar, rumbling purr sounds beside me, and then a large tongue swipes over my velvety muzzle. Good Morning Little Wolf. Sinclair's voice sounds in my mind, and I practically jump out of my skin. He chuckles and nuzzles his nose against mine, How do you feel?

I look up at the giant black wolf uncertainly, feeling guilty for my joy when... when... I can't even think it. If I acknowledge what I've lost, then I won't be able to pretend anymore. If I acknowledge it, then it becomes real, and I'm not prepared to face my sorrow. A whimper slips out of my mouth, and understanding washes over Sinclair's canine features. Listen baby, how many heartbeats do you hear?

His question is more complicated than it should be, because I feel like I can hear every heart beating in the mansion. Still, I focus my attention on this room, not yet realizing why he instructed me thus. The gentle pulse of my own heart reaches my furry ears a fraction of a second before the steady pounding of Sinclair's... and there, softer and tinier than both, is a precious thump in my womb.

Rafe? I think in amazement, certain I must be dreaming. I twist my body so I can press my nose to my belly, and I can smell him! Like a blend of Sinclair and myself, with something else all his own. I've never smelled anything so wonderful in my entire life – even Sinclair, who smells good enough to eat. Tears form in my eyes, but I'm still not convinced this is real. Am I hallucinating? Is this some sort of psychosis brought on by the trauma of losing him.

He's okay. Sinclair's deep bass intrudes on my thoughts, overflowing with happiness. The doctor was wrong.

But how!? I think, unconsciously directing the words at my mate and stunned when I realize he can hear them. I'm not sure how I knew how to communicate this way – it was simply second nature. I was so sure – how could he have survived that?

The Goddess works in mysterious ways. Sinclair answers with a shrug, before searching my face with his glowing green eyes. Can you feel the bond?"

At first I'm afraid the answer is no, but then the pup flutters in my tummy, and a wave of contentment and relief radiates through my mind. I'm stunned to realize these emotions aren't my own, but my baby's. He's relieved that I'm happy again, that I'm no longer in pain. I suddenly understand the connection Sinclair described to me, not cohesive thoughts but bursts of emotion distinct from my own.

Even though we're feeling some of the same things, there's something about his which are uniquely his. Now that I'm aware of it, it's impossible to miss. No wonder I was able to distract myself so easily! I realize belatedly. It wasn't only my own joy I was feeling, but Rafe's too.

My eyes widen in ecstatic excitement, and all I can do is launch myself at Sinclair, wagging my tail and yipping with excitement. He's okay, he's okay! I chant blissfully, momentarily thrown off balance when Rafe sends signals of happiness up at me, responding to my enthusiasm.

I can feel him. I tell Sinclair in awe, stopped in my tracks and on the verge of tears again. I can feel you, my darling. I add to Rafe, overwhelmed when he pulses with pure love.

Sinclair offers me a wolfish grin, Done celebrating already, trouble? He teases, and then he pounces, playfully wrestling and tussling with me – until we're rolling around on the bed like a couple of care-free puppies. I can hear his laughter in my head, just as I'm sure he can hear my uproarious giggles as he pins me and tickles my feet with his tail.

I nip at his ears when he tries to nuzzle my neck, earning myself great slobbering kisses in reply. Eventually I manage to jump up, energy flowing through me, accompanied by an irresistible pull to take to the forest. Somehow I know it's night without seeing outside, and the moon is calling to me in a way I can't explain.

Let's go for a run! I suggest eagerly, my body wiggling with excitement. Can we, can we? Sinclair gazes lovingly up at me as I dance around on the bed. We can, once you've got some food in your tummy. No! I throw my head back defiantly. I want to go now.

Sinclair shook his head and rises to his feet, giving me an imperious look as he towers over me. You haven't have anything in at least 72 hours, and you've been through hell in the meantime. It hasn't been that long! The Prince fed me. I argue, thinking he's miscalculating.

You've been asleep for two days, Ella. Sinclair informs me gently, bumping my nose with his. It won't kill you to wait, the forest will still be there in an hour. When I still don't look convinced, he adds, Besides, don't you want to fix the nest so that it's ready when we get back.

For the first time I look around and realize that my shift did quite a bit of damage to my nest. My teeth and claws must have been lashing out during my transformation, because my beautiful pillows and soft blankets are shredded to bits.

I whine with sudden distress, at once beside myself to know my baby is alright, but I have no safe haven in which to grow him. Sinclair shifts back into human form, and I'm amazed by how different he looks through my wolf eyes. He's always been annoyingly good looking, but somehow he seems even more handsome than ever.

His bronze skin almost glows in the bright lights, and the rugged planes of his face and body seem sharper, more powerful now. "It's okay, sweet mate." He murmurs, stroking my cheek. "I'll have the servants bring new pillows and blankets while I fix you something. Are you craving anything in particular?"

I shake my head in denial, too preoccupied with my ruined nest to focus on anything else. In the end, the time passes in the blink of an eye, as I fuss and fret over remaking the space perfectly. Sinclair has to literally drag me away in order to convince me to eat, and only the promise of a moonlit run convinces me to walk away completely.

When we get to the forest Sinclair shifts again, and I immediately provoke him into a chase. Now that my wolf is awake, his power is starker, more visceral, and I feel it constantly. For some I supposed it might be frightening, but for me it's nothing short of thrilling.

It excites me and reassures me at once, while also tempting me to no end. I want to poke and prod at it, to see if it's really as vast as it seems. It's as if his dominance and authority is a giant red button saying "do not push" and Goddess help me, but all I want to do is push it.

I don't think I've ever been happier than I am in this moment – even though the last few days have been a nightmare. I'm finally the person I was always meant to be, I have a mate who loves me, and a baby on the way. I feel so incredibly free, and when Sinclair catches me and pins me to the ground with a sexy growl, I only feel more fulfilled.

It's time to go home, trouble. He commands huskily. But I don't want to shift back. I complain, not for the sake of challenging him anymore, but because I'm genuinely afraid of the process. Why not? Sinclair inquires, nibbling my nape.

I'm scared... it's going to hurt. I admit. No, sweetheart, not this time. From now on you'll be able to shift in only a few minutes, and the more you do it, the sooner it will be that you can change in a split second. It will hurt a little – but not like before. He explains tenderly.

I don't know how to do it. I object then, purely making excuses. Well that's too bad. Sinclair replies, giving me a sly look as he feigns nonchalance. Because I can't claim you until you shift back, i Claim me? I respond curiously, my wolf perking up with sensual interest. That's right. He confirms, a flash of fire in his sultry gaze. Unless you no longer want my mark?

No! I correct him, embarrassingly quickly. I want it. Then shift, mate. He orders again. And I'll give it to you.

Chapter 140 – Foreplay

Ella

“This isn’t fair.” I complain, sitting naked in the back of the limo, glaring at Sinclair. “You said you would claim me if I shifted.” “Greedy mate.” He teases, kissing the soft spot behind my ear. “I didn’t say I would do it in the middle of the forest.”

He hadn’t, but I was still very displeased when – instead of ravishing me the moment I finished the painful but brief shift back into being a human – he pulled me to my feet and strolled back to the waiting cars and guards. “I don’t see why not.” I grumble, “I like the forest.”

“Because we’d be too exposed in the forest, I wouldn’t be able to really enjoy myself because I’d be too on my guard.” He answers in a low rumble. “And it’s our first real time together, I’m not going to make love to you up against a tree.”

“Then how are you going to do it?” I ask, peeking up at him and discovering his eyes already glue to my sulking features. “In the back of a limo, maybe?” I suggest, stroking his muscular thigh and batting my lashes.

“No, you naughty thing.” He chuckles, pulling me a little closer, even though we’re already flush. He pauses to claim my lips, then trails kisses over my jaw until his warm breath is fluttering over my ear. “I’m going to take you home and lay you out on my bed–”

“My nest.” I correct him, not caring for this mischaracterization.

Sinclair emits a wordless rumble, heavy with amusement. “Fine then. In your nest. I’ll lay you out like my own personal feast, and then I’m going to kiss every last inch of your lovely body before I even consider touching your sweet pussy.” He declares, his deep voice turning my entire body into liquid fire.

“And when you’re so desperate and needy that you’re all but begging for relief, I’m going to make a home between your legs and absolutely gorge myself on your honey. I’m going to make you come so many times that you think you can’t take any more pleasure... and then I’m going to prove you wrong.”

His big hands trail over my naked body as he speaks, stroking and caressing me with such intense focus that I feel like I’m the only thing in the world... in his world. Suddenly I understand why he hadn’t wanted to do this in the forest, where he has to worry about safety or privacy, where he can’t disappear into the moment. “And every time you beg me to go faster, I’m just going to go slower.”

He continues darkly, sending delicious shivers down my spine. No one has ever spoken to me this way, and there's something about it that feels so forbidden that I can't help but feel even more turned on. "And when I finally drive my cock into you, and stretch your tight little sex until you're full to bursting, I'll let my wolf take over."

Oh Goddess, I think, my body flushed and smoldering simply from listening to him speak. Is it possible to climax from words alone?

"I'm going to take you so fiercely, so ruthlessly, that your own wolf is going to come to absolute pieces." Sinclair states huskily. "I'm going to possess you so completely that you won't even feel whole again unless I'm inside you." I shudder and he purrs, cupping my breast and brushing his thumb over my beaded nipple.

"That's right, gorgeous. I'm going to make you crave me as wildly as I crave you, and only when I've brought you to another climax on my cock, when I've gotten so lost in your beautiful body that I won't be able to hold back any longer – will I claim you."

Sinclair drops his head to the spot where my neck meets my shoulder, grazing his teeth over my sensitive skin. He closes his fangs over my flesh, applying gentle pressure, and my wolf begins howling with need. How can a man touching such an innocent spot cause so much pleasure? So much desire?

I whine aloud when he releases me, and an amused rumble accompanies his next words. "I'll bring you back to the edge and sink my fangs deep. I'll claim you as my one and only mate for the rest of our lives... the force of the bond will scare you, but you won't have to worry because I'll be right there, holding you tight."

He promises, filling me with an entirely different kind of warmth. "It will send us both into the fucking stratosphere, and when it's over we'll sleep for a while, but then we're going to wake up and do it over, and over, and over again."

I'm nothing more than a puddle in his arms at this point, and the smug Alpha knows it. When I look up at him his wolf is glowing in his eyes, and even though he's turned my brain to mush, I can't help but notice that I'm not the only one who's gotten excited by his dirty talk.

He's as naked as I am, and I have to fight not to gape at the size of him. Surely he hadn't been that big in our dream? Either way my wolf is preening with the pride of knowing his desire is for me and me alone. I have the strongest impulse to reach out and take his hardness in my hand, and my mouth positively waters. "And will I finally be allowed to... to touch you?" I inquire shyly, not brave enough to use the same blunt terms he does.

"If you ask very nicely, and you tell me exactly what you want to do." He replies, pressing his mouth to mine and nipping my plump lower lip.

My heart skips a beat as I realize he wants me to speak as he is, to be explicit about my desire and shrug off my inhibitions. I want so badly to give him pleasure, especially after all these weeks of receiving his selfless affection and not being able to return it. Still, I've never spoken about sex this way – even with Mike.

At best he would ask if I was in the mood, then lie on top of me for a few minutes before groaning out his release and patting my bottom to reward me for a job well done. In hindsight I hate that I was such a doormat with him, but I didn't know what sex could be like until I met Sinclair.

The car pulls to a stop in front of the house before I can conjure a reply, and Sinclair wraps me up in a robe before donning one himself, and carrying me inside. He bounds up the stairs to his bedroom, then sweeps into the bathroom and sets me on the ground. "Bath or shower?" He asks, pulling off my robe.

"What? But I thought..." I stammer, thinking of his promises in the car. "Are you so eager to get your nest dirty?" Sinclair inquires, quirking his lip and gesturing to the conifer needles and streaks of mud on our legs. I forgot we'd been romping through the forest as our wolves, and even the snow couldn't keep the dirt away entirely.

"No!" I immediately object, despising the very idea. I try to focus on his first question, but the thought of a bath raises images in my mind, fuzzy memories of being held down as Sinclair tried to warm my frostbitten fingers and toes.

"Dominic," I murmur, for the first time coming out of the joyful haze that has consumed me since realizing my baby survived the shift. I'm quickly recalling everything my mate did for me in the last few days and worse, I remember the horrible things I said to him in that episode, and horror washes over me. "I'm so sorry for the things I said when you were trying to help me, I didn't mean them, I—"

"Later." Dominic presses a finger to my lips, stroking my hip with his free hand. "We have all the time in the world to talk about it, Ella. And that's the last thing I want to do right now."

I nod, gulping down my welling emotions. "Shower." I decide, more determined than ever to show my mate the same generosity he showed me.

We wash ourselves quickly, or perhaps I should say we wash each other quickly. Sinclair insisted on cleaning me himself, and it's no surprise when his attention gets sidetracked, his powerful hands taking detours to my breasts and between my legs as he extracts fevered kisses from my lips.

I eagerly do the same to him, and he kneels in front of me, kissing my belly and breasts as I try to clean his shoulders, face and hair. Of course, when I try to pull the same trick he did and reach for his hardness, he catches my wrist. "Ask me, baby." He rumbles sensuously.

My eyes widen with alarm, and my cheeks flush with color. I can't! I can't talk about these things the way he does... Can I?

Chapter 141 – Ella Learns to Talk Dirty

Ella

Sinclair is towering over me, his wolf eyes glowing as he watches me work through my feelings. I gnaw on my lower lip as I try to find the bravery to ask him for what I want, and he purrs deep in his chest, cupping my cheek and tugging my lip free of my sharp little teeth. He doesn't rush me, doesn't make demands, he simply lets me process the dilemma and keeps me from breaking my skin with my new fangs. His gentle affection gives the confidence I need, and I shift a bit closer, craving his steady strength.

"Can I please touch you?" I inquire shakily, peeking up at him from beneath my lashes.

"Touch me where?" Sinclair replies, his deep bass vibrating through my overheated body as his lip quirks up.

I feel as though I've been doused in boiling water, and I'm sure he knows it. "Here." I say, gesturing to the huge hard member between his legs.

"Uh-uh trouble, if you want to do it, you've got to give me the words." Sinclair replies, stroking my spine with his free hand. "It's just you and me, angel. There's nothing to be afraid of."

"Please, Dominic." I try again, licking my lips, "Can I touch... your C-cock."

Part of me wishes the floor would open up and Swallow me whole, but the member in question pulses as the word leaves my tongue, and I'm amazed to realize that I have such a powerful effect on this man. He holds the entire world in his palm, but one word from me and his body responds..

"See now, that wasn't so bad, was it?" Sinclair purrs, gazing down at me with such pure adoration that I forget my embarrassment. "Of course you can touch me, Ella."

I start slowly, tracing my fingers over his thick length and running my thumb over the purple head, curiously exploring the sinewy contours and feeling bolder by the minute. I can feel the muscles in Sinclair's chest and shoulders tense in response to my ministrations, but he doesn't say a word. When I look up I discover that his eyes are on my face rather than my hand, and when I close my fist around him he has to smother a satisfied groan. I pump my hand up and down the considerable length, loving the way his hands tighten on my body in response. Sinclair hisses in a breath of air, dropping his head to the curve of my neck and kissing my throat, breathing in my scent. "Goddess, I love you." He mutters, his wolf making the most delightful grumbly sounds of contentment and desire. "My mate, all mine."

I gingerly drop to my knees, and I'm genuinely shocked when Sinclair goes from tender affection to sudden foreboding. He tangles his huge hand in my hair, pulling my head back, "And just what do you think you're doing?" He demands ominously, his dominance rolling off of his massive form in powerful waves.

"I-I was going to use my mouth." I murmur, suddenly feeling unsure of myself.

"I don't recall you asking permission." He answers, arching a skeptical brow.

My wolf quivers and roils at once, and I notch my chin up defiantly, "Can I use my mouth?" I say, but my tone is less of a question and more of a challenge.

Sinclair's eyes flash dangerously and he shakes his head, calling my bluff. "Use it how? Do you want to kiss it?"

A wave of pure Alpha power has me shuddering with submissive instinct, and I know exactly what he wants to hear me say. If I wasn't so drunk on passion I might not be brave enough to manage it, but I'm beyond the point of no return now. "Please Dominic," I gasp deliriously. "I want to suck your cock."

He nods in approval, guiding my lips to the flared tip of his manhood. "Go on then, beautiful." As I swipe my tongue over a bead of moisture emerging from his slit, I revel in the way I'm able to enjoy being complimented. For so long, comments about my looks only brought my trauma to the surface, but I feel so safe with Sinclair that I'm able to enjoy being admired the first time in my life.

After lapping my way along his length, I close my lips around the head of Sinclair's huge cock, sucking in my cheeks and pulling him into my mouth. Sinclair hisses with obvious pleasure, and I feel so utterly powerful. It's one thing when such formidable being chooses to get down on his knees for you, and another entirely to bring him there through your own vigor – to make him lose control with a simple touch.

I slide my lips and tongue up and down his shaft, using every bit of skill I possess to pleasure him.

Maybe it's strange to be so turned on by an act that doesn't offer me any physical satisfaction, but I love seeing how I affect Sinclair. His grip tightens on my hair, and I lift my eyes to his, letting his gaze bore into me as I work my mouth over him.

"Touch yourself, Ella." Sinclair commands, his voice hoarse with barely restrained lust. "Spread that sweet pussy so I can see how wet you are for me"

I freeze, thrown off balance by the idea of pleasuring myself in front of him. At the same time, my wolf urges me to be brave. It's what he wants, he's going to like it even if you're nervous.

Sensing my unease, Sinclair gives me a low purr of encouragement, and I slowly move my hand to my swollen sex, unsure of whether or not I can go through with this. I've never touched myself in front of anyone, and part of me is surprised Sinclair would ask for this. When I finally make contact, carefully parting my nether lips for him, he speaks as though he's read my mind.

"That's it, baby." He groans, his hips twitching with the effort of holding himself back. "This is the only time you get to do this. Your pleasure is my responsibility, so from now on I expect you to tell me if you need affection. But damned if I don't love seeing you make yourself feel good."

I quiver and suck him harder, emboldened enough to play with my sensitive clit. I whimper around Sinclair's hardness, and he pulses against my tongue, clearly enjoying the vibrations. He's thrusting into my mouth now, beyond the point holding back, so I increase my pace, intent on bringing him off.

Sinclair has both hands buried in my hair now, and my excitement only increases. I forget my doubts, pleasuring myself the way I would if I were alone while he thrusts into my mouth. I reach up to grip the base of his cock, squeezing tightly because I know it's beyond the capacity of my small mouth. I work my tongue over the underside of his length, rocking into my hand as I try to focus on satisfying my mate over my own release.

After a few minutes Sinclair tenses and swears, "Fuck, stop or I'm going to come." He attempts to pull himself free of my lips, but his admission only drives me to work harder, and I cease touching myself to focus all my energy on him. I surge forward, taking him into my throat and cupping his heavy balls, rotating them between my fingers.

Sinclair curses again, fisting his hand in my hair as he explodes with a guttural growl. I swallow him down, determined not to let him down, and Sinclair shakes his head. "Are you trying to kill me, woman?" He inquires, pulling me to my feet.

I grin up at him. "I owed you." I state smugly, more "That's for me to decide." Sinclair answers darkly, cuddling me to his chest. "Naughty mate."

"It was only fair." I tell him, snuggling in. "You've been taking care of me all this time and getting nothing in return."

"Well you know what you've just done, don't you?"

Sinclair inquires mischievously, caressing my waist as he nibbles my shoulder.

"What?" I ask, still flushed and squirming with my own need. Tomorrow I might be embarrassed about all the things I've said and done, but right now my inhibitions are gone. As far as I'm concerned, we are the only people in the world, and nothing else matter.

"You just made it possible for me to last quite some time before I come again." He replies, "And that means I can completely devote myself to you without worrying about my wolf losing control."

A wave of anticipation and trepidation wash me. I was already overwhelmed by Sinclair's plans for the night, but now it sounds as though he's even more determined to make my claiming as overwhelming as possible. I'm excited beyond belief, but I'm also anxious about whether I cope with his fierce passion.

Sinclair is watching me again, a wolfish grin stretching over his features, "What's wrong, little mate- you look nervous."

I gulp in a deep breath, trying to appear tougher than I feel. "Well that's where you're wrong. If anything I'm wondering what's taking you so long?"

As soon as the words are out of my mouth, I want to take them back. In an instant I have a huge Alpha looming over me, and I've just questioned his devotion and virility, which is nothing short of a recipe for disaster.

Whoops.

Chapter 142 – Claimed

Ella

At first I think Sinclair is angry, but then his lips part in a lethal grin and a growling laugh vibrates in his chest. He slides his hand over my cheek and around my nape, tangling his fingers in my wet hair. “Do you know what it means, to top from the bottom, little wolf?” He inquires ominously, his thumb massaging my neck in steady circles.

“No.” I reply, shifting nervously from foot to foot. His demeanor is so predatory, so foreboding, and I know I’ve miscalculated in my attempt to hurry him up.

“It’s when you try to get your own way by provoking or manipulating me, using reverse psychology.” He explains darkly, “It’s an attempt to take control from your Alpha, your mate, without them realizing you’re doing it.” Sinclair prowls forward, and I instinctively retreat, moving backwards until my back collides with the tile wall.

My heart hammers in my chest, and Sinclair rumbles with satisfaction as he watches me try to cope with his dominance. “I was willing to let you get away with making me come too soon because I know how hard it’s been on your generous heart to always be on the receiving end in the bedroom, but your mischievous wolf needs to know she can’t trick me into doing things her way.”

“And h-how are you going to teach her?” I ask nervously, a shiver racing down my spine when his green eyes flash with some unnamed emotion.

“Well, I was planning on taking things slowly but making it as fun for you as possible.” Sinclair shares, sliding his knee between my thighs. “Now I think I might just drag it out, make you work for your pleasure. What do you think about that?”

I’m tempted to roll over and simply accept my defeat, but my traitorous wolf rankles at his suggestion, I can feel her rising up inside of me, and I revel over how different it is to exist in this body now that I’m sharing it with a full-fledged wolf.

In the past my inner voice has been a comfort or friend, and more recently a conundrum, now I feel like she’s at the wheel and I’m merely along for the ride. “I think that’s a terrible idea.” I hear myself reply, my voice decidedly sullen. “I shouldn’t have to wait at all when I’ve already been without your mark for so long.”

Sinclair chuckles, reaching behind his body to shut off the shower tap. He sweeps my feet off the ground, carrying me out of the shower and not bothering to dry me off before unceremoniously tossing me into my nest. I hiss and bare my fangs at him for the offense, but all this does is cause Sinclair to roll me over and pepper my bottom with swift spansks, holding me in place with a hand on the small of my back. I howl and protest, but he doesn’t listen.

Despite myself, I can feel heat pooling between my legs, and there's something so satisfying about feeling Sinclair take me in hand this way. I blame my wolf – the ridiculous creature loves his dominance in a way I don't quite understand, but she and I are one now. I find my hand trying to sneak down between my legs as he punishes me a jolt of utter rapture pulsing through me when my fingers connect with my clit.

Realizing what I'm doing, Sinclair flips me onto my back. "I thought I told you that your pleasure belongs to me, mate." He rumbles, seizing my hand and sliding my fingers into his mouth, licking the wetness from my skin. "I see I'm going to have to take things up a notch." Sinclair pins my hands on either side of my head, "Tell me now, baby. Will you be okay if I restrain you?"

Unlike before, his phrasing doesn't trigger my past. Instead it sends my foolish wolf into a fresh fit of rebellion. "I'd like to see you try." I challenge, wriggling against his hold.

Before I know it, my wrists and ankles are cinched to the four corners of the bed, and I'm spread-eagle on the mattress, immobile and completely vulnerable. For a second I start to panic, but the moment Sinclair hears my heart rate increase, he rests his palm on my belly and leans over me so I can see his face. "You're okay, trouble. I'm right here. I've got you."

My wolf settles, knowing she's safe in her mate's hands, and I submit myself to Sinclair's retribution. "So lovely." He observes, petting my swollen sex. "So slick and sensitive." His thumb works tight circles on my clit as he leans down to tease my nipple with his tongue, and I lift my hips to meet his touch, biting back my needy moan.

I'm already so turned on from the shower and his spanking, so it doesn't take long before I'm teetering on the edge of an orgasm. Unfortunately Sinclair is so tuned in to my body's cues that he senses my imminent peak, and pulls back at the last moment.

I cry out in frustration when his stimulation disappears, whining into the air and glaring at my mate. I know he's planning on doing the same thing over and over again, but this knowledge only makes me more defiant. Sinclair lowers his lips to mine, stealing a kiss as he croons, "Such a fierce little wolf."

I nip his lower lip, hard enough to draw blood, and he swats my neglected cleft, obviously not the least bit concerned with the crimson liquid pooling at the corner of his mouth.

Over the next hour, he manages to repeat the same tortuous pattern over and over again. Using his hands and mouth he brings me to the very edge of ecstasy before pulling back at the last second, leaving me disappointed and desperate. I arch into his touch wherever it's offered, eventually begging him for the release he withholds. Still he doesn't give in, continuing his relentless pleasure campaign until I have no more defiance to wield against him.

Only when my eyes are full of tears and my vicious snarls have turned to whimpering moans does he untie my hands and feet from the bed. He rolls onto his back and encourages me to sit astride him. Finally free to climb atop him and seek my own pleasure, I balk at Sinclair's massive size.

I'm not sure if I can take him all, but Sinclair sits up, cupping my face in his hands and stealing breathless kisses from my lips. "You're in control, baby just this first time." He intimates gruffly.

But I only have so much control. If you don't act soon, I'm going to take you whether you're ready or Being ready isn't the problem, I think wryly. I'm so ready I could scream. The true issue is whether I can handle such a man, but I suppose the only option I have is to try. I carefully center the flared head of Sinclair's cock at my entrance, certain that I'm going to come to pieces the moment he's inside me.

It doesn't actually happen that quickly, because it's no easy feat cramming his girthy length into my tight tunnel. Still, as soon as my hips settle against his, Sinclair rocks up into my heat, rubbing his cock head against that special spot inside me and setting off fireworks in my body. All of a sudden the last hour of stimulation crashes over me in a stunning haze of lust and I detonate around him.

"That's it." Sinclair encourages, beyond caring about anything other than our mutual release. "

Such a good girl, coming all over my cock." I toss my head back and cry out as he lifts my hips and begins thrusting into me at a relentless pace, even though I'm the one on top. It doesn't take much to send me over the edge again, and Sinclair's deep voice and dirty words only egg me on.

"Fuck, you're so tight, baby." He purrs. "I could stay here forever. Night and day." Sinclair kisses his way down my neck, and all I can do is hang on for dear life. "Perfect, just like that, gorgeous."

I lose track of how many times I climax, but Sinclair has certainly broken his own record. At what feels like the end of an eternity, he grazes his fang over the spot where my neck meets my shoulder and sinks them in deep. I scream as a bright, white light takes over my vision, blinding me figuratively and literally. Love, fate and pure magic intertwine, consuming us both as our bond cements. Before I can think better of it, I sink my own fangs into the muscles of Sinclair's pec, staking my own claim as surely as he's staked his own.

In the delirious aftermath, I can only float in Sinclair's protective embrace, finally feeling complete after so many years of searching. All in all, this feels like a new beginning for us, and even if it isn't, surely becoming mates in every sense of the word gives us a connection that can never be broken. We're a true team now, and that has to be an advantage in the upcoming campaign.. right?

Chapter 143 – Lydia’s Revelation

3rd Person

There was a time when Lydia had dreamed about witnessing a Prince’s temper tantrum – mostly because she always imagined it would be her son, and she would have been so thrilled to be a mother and queen that she wouldn’t have cared about a childish outburst. Seeing a fully grown man, an Alpha she was hoping to seduce, rant and rave was a different thing entirely. Prince Damon had arrived back from the failed meeting with Sinclair to discover that Ella was long gone, and promptly torn her bedroom to shreds in the heat of his anger.

Walls punched, curtains torn, furniture toppled and broken – at this point it looked like a tornado had swept through the room, and Lydia was both disgusted and alarmed.

She wasn’t sure whether she should make her presence known or not. The guards had fetched her after they returned and filled her in on the situation, but Damon’s destructive fury worried her. Ella’s warnings about the man abusing his mate rung in her ears, and right now she had no trouble believing it. Lydia was furious with herself for not noticing the small army infiltrating the palace, but she’d been preoccupied trying to plan a romantic dinner for the Prince once the ransom was completed. In her mind Damon would have returned to the palace to retrieve Ella once Sinclair agreed to surrender, completed the trade and come home to celebrate with her. However now she was more worried that the Prince would blame her for concocting the plan and missing the invasion.

Lydia tried to make herself as small as possible, hovering just inside the doorway and praying to become invisible. He wouldn’t kill her.. would he?

The way he was shouting and cursing sounded much like an overwrought toddler, but this man was twice her size and could easily snap her like a twig if he wanted to. What have I gotten myself into? She thought anxiously, true doubt assailing her for the first time.

Right on cue, the Prince whirled around and saw Lydia, cowering with her arms wrapped around her slender body. Her body language reminded him so much of his late wife that a fresh wave of Wrath slammed into him. He didn’t need to be reminded that his mate had been taken from him, especially not by this schemer. “You!” He seethed, jabbing an accusatory finger in Lydia’s direction, this is all your fault! Where the hell were you!”

Her eyes widened, “I-” Before Lydia could say another word, the Prince crossed the room and slammed her back against the wall, wrapping his powerful fist around her throat.

“Shut the hell up.” He ordered ferociously. “You stupid bitch, you come here bragging about being able to help me because you know Sinclair so well, but your plans have done nothing but backfire! I told you he wouldn't give up his campaign that easily! I told you he would stage rescue!"

Lydia wanted to snap back at him, to tell him he never would have even had the opportunity to kidnap Ella if it wasn't for her. After all, his rogue attack had failed miserably, and she'd been able to tell him exactly how Sinclair's emergency protocols worked. She was the reason he was getting so much sympathy in the press, the reason his ratings were so high. But she couldn't say any of this, because he was still shouting at her, his claws digging into her throat.

"You've been a pain in my ass since the moment you arrived!" He related, "Honestly, you have some nerve – waltzing in here as if you aren't just the barren reject of a lesser man."

Lydia's jaw dropped, and despite the fact that she could barely breathe, she argued, "How dare you – that isn't true!"

"Oh give it up!" The Prince countered, a sadistic glint in his eye. He'd always preferred to inflict physical pain, but there was no denying how pleasurable it could be to destroy a woman emotionally. "I called your husband, you know. I wanted to rub it in his face that you'd transferred your allegiance to me and you know what he told me? He told me that you came slinking onto his doorstep after you left Sinclair, promising to give him a whole litter of pups and bragging about all your experience as a Luna. And when he realized you were just a lazy gold digger who couldn't conceive an original thought – much less a baby, he kicked you to the curb." Damon informed her maliciously.

"You didn't come back because Sinclair upgraded a younger, prettier she-wolf, you did it because you had nowhere else to go." Tears burned in Lydia's eyes as the cruel man taunted her with her worst failures, but this only seemed to egg Damon on. "And I let you stay because I thought, I thought, your knowledge of Sinclair could still hold some value for me, but it turns out you're as useless a strategist as you were a mate."

His grip on her throat was getting tighter now, and Lydia dug her fingers into his hand, trying to pry it away so she'd have the space to breathe. "Please."

She begged. "I- I can still help you."

"I don't see how." The Prince scoffed, "if anything you being close to me is weakening public sympathy for me." He paused, a dawning light overtaking his features as Ella and Sinclair's clues about Angeline's murder swirled through his mind. "Why is it that you waited until my campaign was already on the upswing to offer your assistance anyway?"

Lydia's already pounding heart sped up as she realized Damon was starting to suspect her true ambitions to replace his queen, and the crimes she'd committed in order to make it happen. She knew she had to think quickly, and her mind raced through possible distractions. Like the Prince, there were details hovering at the edge of her consciousness, just out of reach. She knew she had the key to her own survival within reach, she just had to pull the puzzle pieces together. The longer she stayed silent, the angrier the Prince became, but she could risk saying the wrong thing when he was already determined to hurt her.

The Prince's threatening growls were growing louder and louder, and Lydia felt his claws break the skin of her neck. Hot, thick blood trickled down her clavicle, and she fought back a whimper instinctively knowing he would enjoy the sound.

At the very last moment an idea clicked into place, and Lydia's panicked body relaxed with a sudden confidence that absolutely rankled the seething Prince. Fortunately for Lydia, she forced the words out before he could act on his feelings.

"I've got a better question for you." She gasped hoarsely, "Why is it that no one had ever heard of Ella until after she was already pregnant with Sinclair's child? He's the most famous man in the territory and the tabloids follow him constantly, but no one ever heard a single word about him dating someone new. And if Ella is supposed to be a cousin of Aileen Crentin's, why did I never meet her? I was at Aileen and Hugo's wedding, and I can tell you right now that Ella wasn't." She hurriedly explained.

"You think they're lying about their relationship?"

The Prince blinked, processing this idea. He only gives it a moment of thought before shaking his head. "They said she hadn't known about her relatives here until recently, besides I've never seen a pair of mates more in love."

"Then why hasn't he claimed her?" Lydia hissed, something in her gut telling her she was on the right track. "Don't you find it suspicious that they can't keep their hands off each other in public but he's letting her run around unmarked? The most possessive, dominant wolf in the world"

Prince Damon's grip loosened slightly, and he rumbled pensively, "So what, you think he hired her? That it's all been a show for the campaign?"

"Maybe." Lydia shrugged. "You have to admit it makes sense, things start going bad for him and all of a sudden he conjures a breeding mate out of the air? It's more than a little suspicious."

"You have a point." The Prince nods, his wolf flashing in his eyes. "Maybe it's time to call in Roger again."

“Roger?” Lydia scoffed, unaware of just how much Sinclair’s relationship had changed with his brother in recent months. “I’ve got news for you, Roger is the absolute last person who Dominic would confide in about his relationship – or politics.”

“Then who am I supposed to ask? His men are too loyal to be bribed and the Goddess knows his security is too tight at the mansion to get a bug in.”

The Prince questioned in frustration.

“If Ella is who she says she is then she’ll have connections in the Shadow pack, even commoners have work histories and educations, I think need to verify hers.” Lydia mused aloud, so utterly relieved to have successfully turned her assailant’s attention to the other woman.

“You’d better be right about this.” The Prince snarled, abruptly releasing Lydia’s neck. The she-wolf crumpled, trying to steady herself against the wall as her legs gave out. “This is your last chance, Lydia. One more slip up, and I’ll kill you where you stand.”

Rubbing her neck, Lydia tried to hide her trembling. “I believe you.”

Chapter 144 – Ella Begs for Mercy

Ella

When I wake, my body is filled with the most exquisite soreness. My hand immediately leaps to my neck, where Sinclair's mark is seared into my skin. Being claimed was the most intense experience of my life, and it feels remarkably as though Sinclair and I are no longer separate people, but two halves of the same whole. His big body is wrapped around me as he dozes, and I'm amazed to realize I can sense his inner Wolf's pride and satisfaction even while he rests.

I can't really explain how the bond feels. In some way it's like my bond with the baby, except instead of flashes of hazy emotion I can constantly sense Sinclair's feelings, in a deep form of empathy that is confusing and overwhelming at times.

Our hearts beat in perfect sync now, and I know we can communicate telepathically when we choose, even though we haven't had the chance to test this particular gift. So far we haven't done anything but make love. In fact my new mate woke me up three times during the night to take me again, and my poor sex is so swollen and sensitive that I'm afraid of Sinclair waking up and lavishing more attention on my exhausted body.

I try to sneak out of bed while he sleeps, but his powerful arms tighten around me, and then there's a low rumble in my ear. "And just where do you think you're going?"

"Just to the bathroom." I lie, realizing at once that this is a mistake. If I can sense Sinclair's feelings then he can certainly sense mine.

"Tsk, tsk," He clucks, rolling me onto my back and looming above me. His voice is stern but there's only love, amusement and desire in his eyes. As soon as I see these emotions, I feel them as well, blended with my own and yet entirely distinct.

Lying to your new mate already, trouble?" Sinclair teases, caressing my cheek. "And trying to sneak away from me?" "I thought you'd try to be intimate if I woke you." I explain, only slightly sulky.

"Be intimate?" Sinclair repeats, a devilish glint in his emerald eyes. "You mean you thought I'd try to rut your sweet pussy again." I blush and shiver, certain I'll never get used to hearing him speak this way. It scandalizes me and turns me on all at once, and I know that's why he does it. If only I could hide my reaction from him – but that's more impossible than ever now. "Well was I wrong?" I demand indignantly. "I'm too sore to take any more of your wolf's affection, Dominic."

Sinclair's brow furrows and he sits up completely, "Baby, why didn't you say so?" He moves between my legs and gently rumbles when I try to clench them shut. "Come on,

let me see, sweetheart.”

I don't trust the sly wolf's intentions, and when I try to sense his emotions through our bond in order to decipher whether or not this is a trick or genuine concern, I realize I can't. “How are you doing that?” I inquire curiously, more than a little intrigued to realize there might be a way to shield my feelings from my mate.

“You can learn to withhold some things from your mate, but it takes practice.” Sinclair answers huskily, prying apart my thighs with no trouble at all. “Though I'm not sure I want to tell you how.” He adds wryly.

I clamp my hand over my center, my suspicions raised. “And why are you hiding your feelings from me now?” I inquire, now convinced this is all just a scheme.

A rush of worry assails me, and I relax slightly. “It's an old habit.” Sinclair shares reluctantly, “It's not in my nature to let others feel my anxiety, especially not my mate.” He tenderly pulls my hand away so he can examine my abused flesh, purring sympathetically and crooning when he sees how red and swollen I am. “Poor little wolf.”

He murmurs, carefully spreading my lips so he can take a closer look, “I've been too rough with you, haven't I?”

No! My wolf exclaims, and Sinclair's masculine smirk tells me I've just managed to successfully communicate telepathically. I roll my eyes at the silly canine, who loves his dominance too much to risk him going easy on us. So I sassily add, This is just what happens when you try to shove a battering ram into a keyhole.

Sinclair chuckles, his hot breath fluttering over my exposed skin. Poor, mistreated mate. His voice sounds in my head, cursed with an Alpha too well endowed for your little body to take. Amusement is heavy in his voice, and he arches a brow at me as he continues. Though I didn't hear you complaining when you were coming all over me last night.

I giggle despite myself, because he's right and both know it. I love how small and delicate I feel beside Sinclair, even if those values are misplaced by the human society that raised me, and I've certainly enjoyed myself with him in bed. My thoughts are interrupted when Sinclair moves his mouth dangerously close to my body. Here angel, let me kiss it better. Alarms go off in my brain, but then it's too late.

Sinclair's talented tongue swipes up the length of my sex, lapping up the wetness accumulated at my entrance and flicking over the tiny bundle of nerves at the apex of my mound. “Dominic no- ohhh.” I exclaim, sighing as a fresh wave of heat consumes me.

A moment ago I thought my clit might fall off if Sinclair touched it, but the pain he invokes is edged with a deep pleasure I don't understand. I abruptly realize that the worry he'd shared with me is long gone, replaced only with cunning and triumph.

With his mouth occupied, my mate continues using our mind link. The sound of his dark laughter fills my head, soon followed by the words, I wasn't lying about sharing my worries, but perhaps I left out the fact that you can also learn to project things that aren't there, or only reveal some feelings while keeping others hidden.

I'm panting as he continues lavishing affection over my sex, my fingers tangled in his hair as confused, needy whimpers are dragged from my lips. Still, his words manage to penetrate the haze of lust and disorientation consuming my mind, and I feel a burst of relief. I'm immensely glad to know that I'll still be able to surprise and trick my mate, just as he's done to me now.

Another rumbling laugh sounds in my thoughts, You've got a long way to go before you'll be able to pull one over on me, mate. But I'd be lying if I said I'm not excited to see you try.

You just want an excuse to spank me again. I answer, trying and failing to sound offended by the idea. Sinclair pauses his ministrations to look up at me, his eyes glinting with lethal hunger. Damned straight.

When Sinclair is finished having his wicked way with me, I leap out of bed and pull on my robe, putting as much distance between myself and the bed as possible. Sinclair blinks, realizing I'm no longer sprawled like a ragdoll over his chest, before narrowing his eyes at me, "I don't recall giving you permission to leave my arms, little one."

"You stay away from me." I order, pointing at him and trying to sound firm. "My body is off limits until it's had a chance to recover, is that clear?"

Sinclair smirks, and I realize I've essentially managed to challenge him. He rises from the bed and begins prowling towards me. "Is that so?"

"Dominic, I'm serious." I say earnestly. "I'm exhausted. I haven't gotten out of bed all day and I already need a nap. Think of the baby." I encourage, knowing that if this doesn't work, nothing will.

Sinclair searches my face, then softens visibly. He reaches for me, and I hesitantly go to him. "I'm sorry, my love." He purrs, snuggling me close. "My wolf just finds it difficult not to get carried away with you. Have a lie down and I'll bring you something to eat."

My stomach growls right on cue, and I detect a pulse of guilt from Sinclair. He feels like he's been neglecting me, and as pleased as I am to know my body is safe from another onslaught of lust, I can't stand this. I send every bit of denial in my heart straight back at him. "Dominic, I can't thank you enough for everything you've done for me these last few days.

You saved my life again, you took care of me through the worst day of my entire life – the worst emotional and physical pain I've ever known. You forgave me even when we thought I'd killed our baby." I continue, my voice breaking as I recall that pain. "You've done the exact opposite of neglecting me." I proclaim passionately, "I love you so much, and I've been in such heaven the last 24 hours, I just need a break."

Sinclair cuddles me closer. "Thank you, sweetheart," He professes tenderly. "But there's one thing we need to get straight. I love our pup more than life itself, but if I had to choose to save one of you over the other, it wouldn't even be a question for me. We can make another baby, but I can't make another you."

My heart feels full to bursting, and some of the guilt that has been gnawing at me since I was forced to make that terrible decision fades away. I realize that I'd been so afraid of losing Sinclair for trying to save my own life, especially after we'd started out our relationship deeply opposed over my consideration of an abortion.

Something cracks open inside of me, and the next thing I know I'm crying out all the pain and fear – the trauma of everything I've just survived and the joy as well. Sinclair purrs and rocks me in the safe cradle of my nest, and I realize he's crying too. The last few days have been a gauntlet for us both, and we desperately need the catharsis.

Unfortunately, our healing is cut short when Hugo walks in a little while later, a grim expression on his face. "We've got a problem."

Chapter 145 – Damage Control

Sinclair

As soon as Hugo walks into the room, I thrust Ella behind me, a vicious snarl on my lips. My wolf is on high alert from having claimed his mate so recently, his possessive instincts spinning out of control and stronger than I've ever experienced.

She's mine. He thinks angrily, He shouldn't even be allowed to look at her. I can't even process my beta's words, because I'm too preoccupied with guarding Ella – despite the fact that I know my old friend isn't any threat. Still there's no reasoning with a protective wolf, and all mine knows is that another male is in the vicinity of my precious, breeding mate.

Ella, troublemaker that she is, only wriggles her way back into my lap, putting herself between me and the target of my wrath. She pulls my glowing eyes down to her own, both of her small hands framing my face. I glower at the insolent creature, not all pleased that she's stopping me from attacking the interloper, but Ella stares back with unwavering calm. Stop being ridiculous. Her silken voice sounds in my head. It's only Hugo, and I don't have eyes for anyone but you.

It's not your eyes I'm worried about. My wolf replies grumpily. He'd be a fool not to want you and he can't have you. I lower my mouth to her fresh, red mark, breathing in her scent and gently nibbling her tender skin. Mine, mine, mine. A noticeable shiver runs down Ella's spine, and my wolf puffs out his chest with masculine pride.

Naughty mate, I rumble, positively crowing when she shudders again and the scent of her arousal wafts up to me. Her body might be exhausted, but her wolf is as insatiable as my own. Challenging me, pretending to be all can and reasonable when you crave my dominance every bit as much as I need to exert it. Come on, let me bite him just a little – a warning bite, so he remembers who you belong to.

You're impossible. Ella's amused voice accuses, tempting me to turn her over my knee and remind her who's in charge. If I want to attack my Beta, who is she to stop me? Doesn't she realize how special she is, how invaluable? Besides, he said there was a problem. We need to hear him out – what if the Prince is getting ready to stage another attack. He must be furious that we thwarted his plan.

This thought brings reason crashing down, subduing my wolf and focusing my attention back on Hugo, who's been watching our silent exchange with understanding but also quickly waning patience. "What is it?" I demand, snuggling Ella a little closer.

"We just got a report that the Current is getting ready to publish a story about Ella's background." Hugo announces, referencing one of the few newspapers in Moon Valley that aligns politically with the Prince. "Apparently the Prince sent his spies to the shadow pack to investigate her past... and they figured out that we've been lying about her identity. They don't know she's a human, but they know we haven't been honest."

"What?" I hiss, horrified and devastated by the fear and guilt I feel radiating from Ella. I instinctively begin to purr, but when I look down at my mate she's frozen in place, her beautiful gold eyes wide with horror. "How did this happen?"

"I don't know." Hugo sighs, "If I had to guess I'd say this is another of Lydia's schemes – because of the timing if nothing else."

I let out a volley of ferocious swears, interrupting my purring and startling Ella. My wolf whines in regret and I move my hand to her round belly, checking on our pup. I feel a tiny pulse of unease, and immediately resume my purrs, not speaking again until both mother and child have relaxed. "I should have killed that bitch when I had the chance." I continue a moment later, "What's the Current's angle?"

Hugo looks reluctant to speak, but eventually he says, "that you've been running a morality campaign and the entire time you've been lying to the people and the Alpha council. They're suggesting your entire relationship is a fraud and that Ella is a paid surrogate – they want to know if you have a comment."

"Can we stop it?" I ask. I own some shares in the paper, but I'm afraid that my economic holdings won't do much good if the pack turns against me. "Do you know if anyone else has hold of the story?"

"Not yet." Hugo relates grimly, "And I don't think there's anything we can do to convince them not to print it. They have proof that Ella and Aileen aren't related and that no one with her name ever resided in the territory."

"Damn it." I murmur, trying to wrap my head around this. "Dominic, what do we do?" Ella looks up at me with so much trust and hope, and I realize that she's looking to me for the answer – the solution. This incredible woman, who has only ever been able to rely on herself and fix her own problems, trusts me so much that she's giving me that responsibility. I can't let her down.

"Well..." I begin slowly, working through the possibilities. "The way I see it, we have three options. We can try to get ahead of the story and release it ourselves – say that Ella was a suppressed wolf and our love is real but we hid her past because we were trying to figure out how to wake her wolf.

We can deny it, but if we do then they'll probably start looking closer to home – working backwards to discover how Ella and I met and come to the conclusion that she's a human. We can disprove that now, but it will be even messier if they figure out the truth and we've spent all this time insisting the story is false. Or we can simply say no comment, and hope that the story doesn't make an impact."

"But it will make an impact – you know it will." Hugo counters seriously. "The other papers will pick it up when they see the evidence, and your refusal to acknowledge the reports will only allow the Prince and anyone else who opposes you to make up more and more outlandish accusations."

He paces back and forth while I absentmindedly croon and pet Ella, who has tears in her eyes for a very different reason than she did a little while ago. I hate that our nascent joy is already coming to pieces... I hate that she's known nothing but fear and stress since coming into my life and that yet again, I can't protect her the way I want. The way she deserves.

"I think our only move is to try and get ahead of the story, control the narrative by framing things ourselves." Hugo advises, looking worried despite his confident tone. "The pack will be more outraged if they think your relationship is fake, than they will if they believe you were just trying to protect your mate when she couldn't access her wolf."

"I think Hugo is right." Ella pipes up, her voice hoarse. "We can spin this in our favor only as long as we get the word out first."

I know they're correct. The problem is that I have a terrible feeling that this scandal might be my downfall. In many ways the Current's reporters are telling the truth. I have been running a campaign on the basis of honesty and virtue, and I have been lying to everyone in the interest of winning. Does it matter that my motives were noble? That my only interest in being King is to keep a tyrant off the throne? That I never asked for this duty, but I'm not going to shirk the responsibility that comes with my power?

My stomach is in knots, but I slowly nod, knowing that this is the only path forward, even if it leads to a dead end. "Call a press conference." I instruct Hugo. "We'll say we're announcing Ella's claiming, that her wolf has been dormant but with the help of the pack elders, we were able to wake it."

If they ask about her past we'll admit that we don't have any answers, and we're just thrilled that we've finally found each other and that we're welcoming a son. And if they accuse us of playing politics, we'll say that I believed Ella would have become an even bigger target if people knew how vulnerable she was."

"And the Prince?" Hugo asks, fully aware of the conversation I had with my father before we went to rescue Ella. "Do you want to come out in the open about his misdeeds – distract the press by claiming he was already trying to kill Ella and the babe, that the only reason you risked waking her wolf while she was pregnant was because he kidnapped her?"

For the first time in a very long time, I'm passed caring about taking the high road. The Prince has been getting away with his crimes for far too long, and it's time the people knew about it. "Fuck it." I growl, squeezing the sweet bundle in my arms, "Let's do it."

Chapter 146 – Press Conference

Ella

Dominic, I'm scared. I confess, speaking through our bond. It hadn't been easy to convince him to let me join the press conference, since I'm technically still supposed to be on bed rest. My blood pressure was still too high when we checked it this afternoon, but it remains to be seen whether that's because of my condition or the stress of the pack finding out about our lies. I've been hoping that the preeclampsia was just a side effect of my wolf being trapped, but what good will that do if our lives fall apart the moment she's freed?

I know, baby. Sinclair purrs, rubbing my back. But I've got you. I'm going to take care of you no matter what happens.

I nuzzle his chest, finding that spot where his scent is the strongest and pressing my nose to it. I breathe in his wonderful scent, taking comfort in his presence and powerful embrace. I know. I tell him, my wolf rising to the surface and taking control of my words, cuz I have the strongest mate in the whole wide world... so handsome, so powerful and caring.

Sinclair's warm chuckle fills my head, and for one blissful moment, I forget why I was upset in the first place. Sinclair is like a ray of sunshine on the darkest day, and that sensation only gets stronger the deeper our connection grows. I am still falling for this man, I realize with surprise.

Despite the fact that I keep thinking I couldn't possibly fall any deeper in love with him, my heart continues to prove me wrong. It seems like every time I think I've reached the bottom of the well, it falls away and introduces me to a new layer of complexity and emotion.

Silly mate, Sinclair murmurs, and I realize I've been unintentionally projecting my thoughts at him again. I feel myself beginning to blush, but when I look up at him, there's only profound understanding on his rugged features. Don't you realize there is no limit – no end to this bond? We're going to keep falling harder and deeper every day together, and we have a lifetime to learn all the different ways we can adore each other.

My heart melts as his words hit home, and I squeeze his middle tightly. It probably feels like nothing to him, but I'm using all my strength. I want him to feel the sheer force of my appreciation for him, and he doesn't leave me hanging.

I feel it, trouble. Don't worry. If I were an outsider observing us right now, I'd probably think we were silly – drunk on our own romance... and maybe we are, but I can't bring myself to care because I'm not on the outside looking in. This is my life and I'll be damned if I'm going to deny myself this joy – not when I've worked so hard and been through so much to reach this place.

The baby flutters in my womb, and his own happiness in response to our lovey dovey exchange fills me with hope and optimism. We can get through this. I decide, taking strength from my pup and his father. I don't even have to worry about explaining my train of thought to Sinclair, because I'm sure he's felt every step of my feelings journey through our bond. This press conference is just another bump in the road, if we can survive rogue attacks and kidnappings, we can survive a few reporters.

I pull back when Sinclair doesn't respond. I can still feel his outpouring of love, but I realize I can't sense how he's feeling about the imminent conference. Dominic? I ask hesitantly. Am I wrong? Does he think his campaign won't be able to recover from this?

We're going to fight. He tells me, implying his doubts without actually admitting them. If they want to take down our campaign, we're not going to make it easy for them... and no matter what happens, we'll get through it. I'll keep you safe Ella.

I feel myself tremble with unease, despite my faith in my mate. If he's anxious enough to hide it from me, we must be in more trouble than I realized. Hugo walks in, his grave expression only increasing my worry. "It's time."

A sea of reporters spans out in front of us, cameras rolling, recorders held aloft and pens poised to write down every word we speak. As far as I know, no one knows why we've called this conference, so right now the tension in the room is limited to Sinclair, Hugo and I. My mate's arm is secured around my waist, his hand splayed over my belly as I lean into his side.

"Thank you all for coming out today." Sinclair begins, nodding to the various media figures. "Ella and I have an announcement to make, as well as a confession. It pains me to tell you that we haven't been completely honest about Ella's past, because the truth is that when we met and fell in love, her wolf was dormant." Muttering explodes throughout the room, and a number of hands shoot into the air. Still, Sinclair continues in the same steady tone.

"We're not sure how it was able to stay suppressed for so long, only that she was surrendered by her parents to a human orphanage here in moon valley when she was just a baby." The shockwaves Sinclair's words send throughout the room are visible and visceral, and I recall the details he shared with me about the value of shifter children in their society – the neglect such an act would be. "My incredible mate suffered greatly in the hands of the abusive system, forming her own pseudo pack at a young age, and constantly sacrificing herself to protect the other children from harm."

Sinclair pauses to kiss my temple, apparently unable to speak about my childhood traumas without offering me affection. For the first time I'm able to feel his wolf's fury and vicarious pain for the things I went through, and I'm astonished by the scale and severity of his feelings about it all. I can't help but nuzzle his shoulder, earning myself another kiss. The press all seem too thrown off guard to know what to do, but a few appreciative murmurs reach my ears.

"Ella has always been an Alpha female without ever realizing it, and when we met her wolf finally started to emerge. Until very recently, we believed that it wouldn't be possible to wake her wolf without harming our baby, so we decided to wait until after our son arrives to attempt it." Sinclair explains, his voice as deep as I've ever heard it. I know what's coming next, and I can only hope that it will pay off.

"I've been greatly concerned about Ella's safety throughout this campaign and with good reason – my brave Luna has survived multiple attacks orchestrated by the opposition, becoming a target after the news of her pregnancy was released."

Every hand in the room is now up, and our rabid audience is running out of patience. Sinclair has to raise his voice over the volley of questions in order to be heard. "Most recently, the rogue attack on the city was designed and carried out by Prince Damon.

It started as an attempt to make me look weak, and was later used as a distraction so that the Prince could kidnap Ella and hold her hostage. The Prince rang the all-clear notification early to bring Ella out of hiding, then intercepted her when she attempted to return home – killing all but one of her guards in the process."

Every reporter in the room is shouting now, but Sinclair growls with pure Alpha authority and they quickly pipe down. "I will answer questions once I've completed my statement." He appeases them. "The Prince attempted to force me to end my campaign to be King as ransom for my mate, but he underestimated Ella.

She escaped her captivity only to find herself alone and unprotected in the mountains North of the valley, with no way to reach me. When I finally found her she was frostbitten and near death, having waited until the last possible moment to try to save herself by waking her wolf. She took a sacred herb provided to us by pack elders just before I arrived, and went through her first shift thinking we'd lost our son.

Fortunately this was not the case, and our pup is safe and sound, continuing to grow stronger in his mother's womb." i

"My public silence since the rogue attack was caused by my mate's kidnap, then getting her through the shift, and finally claiming her the way we've both been dreaming about for so long. I realize the things I'm telling you are shocking, and I can only offer my deepest apologies for my dishonesty. I assure you that I would never have lied to you if I felt I had a choice.

These last months have been incredibly difficult for Ella and I, and though we are overjoyed to finally be bonded mates, we couldn't in good conscience continue to let you believe a lie that was no longer necessary, or to remain in the dark about the kind of ruler Prince Damon would be."

He gazes around at the stunned audience with the air of a predator about to pounce, and I have to fight back the urge to smile. "I'm pleased to report that we finally have proof of his crimes, so my question for you is whether you'd like to move on to questions – or would you like to see the evidence against him?"

Chapter 147 – Evidence

Ella

The room erupts with noise, as various reporters cry out, “What evidence!?” Sinclair nods to the side door, and his father wheels into the room, followed by a group of grief-stricken she-wolves and my surviving guard. “The evidence is the lives the Prince stole to kidnap Ella, the widows who don’t even have the ability to lay their husbands to rest because he hid their husband’s bodies.

The children Damon rendered fatherless in pursuit of the throne. The evidence is the eye-witness testimony of Ella and her guard, of myself and my men when we met Damon to set the ransom. The evidence is the all-clear chime everyone in the valley heard even though the battle was still waging on their television screens. The evidence is my father’s paralysis, which was the result of an attack orchestrated by the King during his own campaign – a strategy he clearly taught his son.”

The door opens again, and a number of shackled rogues are brought into the room, looking furious and sullen. “The evidence is the rogues Damon hired to attack his own people, whose financial records show lump sum deposits from off-shore bank accounts just before the battle.

It’s even in the Prince’s inaction when the people he claims to love were under attack. And for anyone who might discard the testimony of these people for being my allies or in compromised positions, then I offer you the video footage of the Prince arriving at our hostage meeting, unbeknownst that Ella had already escaped and I was on my way to find her.”

Sinclair and I move away from the podium to give the room full view of the screen against the back wall, where a black and white image has suddenly appeared from a projector mounted on the ceiling. When Sinclair told me that he’d sent a few enforcers to the second ransom meeting to observe the Prince and notify him of the other man’s movements, he hadn’t mentioned that he’d also had them transmitting footage of the set up to Roger, or that his brother had recorded it.

I’m honestly not sure he remembered, as chaotic as everything has been, because it wasn’t until Roger offered the footage after learning about the press conference that he even realized it might be useful as evidence.

As the feed begins to play, a timestamp appears on the bottom corner of the screen, revealing the date for the audience. The Prince is shown with an army at his back, pacing back and forth in frustration through what appears to be an abandoned warehouse. “Where the hell are they?” He demands, “They should have been here by now!”

“Sinclair’s probably just trying to set up his own perimeter.” His second in command suggests. “Then why haven’t any of our lookouts sighted him?” Damon hisses. “No, I don’t like it. Something is off here.”

“You think it’s a trick, or a trap?” The beta inquires, rubbing his jaw thoughtfully. The Prince stomps his foot. “I told her! I told that dumb bitch he wouldn’t just give up his campaign – even for his mate. He’s up to something.”

“But what, a rescue? An Ambush?” The other man presses, clearly agitated by his Alpha’s foul mood. “Maybe both.” The Prince growls. “Move out, and I want eyes on the girl right now, get in touch with the sentries we posted outside her room.”

The video goes dark as the Prince and his army exit the warehouse, but from the heavy silence in the room, it seems as though the footage was compelling enough to give our critics pause. I admit I’m amazed about how damning the scene was, despite being so brief. They actually managed to catch the Prince referencing Sinclair by name, as well as the ransom. No one might have said my name, but it’s difficult to find another explanation than the one we’ve provided.

The utter stillness is shattered after a pregnant pause, as all the reporters seem to come back to their senses at once. They surge to their feet, shouting questions over one each other in such a way that it makes it impossible to hear. Sinclair leads me back to the podium, pointing towards a man in the front row.

“Alpha, if there have been other crimes then why haven’t you ever accused the Prince before now?” He asks eagerly.

“For a long time Damon and I have been caught in a shadow war. I’ve known what the Prince is capable of for years, which is why I’ve been so devoted to opposing him. Still, it wasn’t until Ella came on the scene and he realized he might lose that he started to escalate his tactics. My father taught me that you don’t make accusations of this sort with evidence, and until now, I’ve only had my wolf’s instincts to rely on.

This is the first time I’ve had the proof to bring our war out in the open, but trust me when I tell you that I haven’t let his offenses go unchecked. My strategy might be different, but I’ve defended this pack and my family with force when required, and done everything in my power to keep Moon Valley safe.”

There’s another uproar, and then Sinclair points to another reporter for the next question. “Ella, how did you escape the Prince? Were you mistreated when you were his captive?”

I’m slightly startled to be addressed directly, but Sinclair gives me an encouraging squeeze. I take a steadying breath, “The Prince kept me in the Royal Palace, and I was able to contact Dominic through a dream –”

“Because she’s the cleverest, most resourceful she-wolf I’ve ever met.” Dominic praises me, puffed up with Alpha pride.

“Not now, Dominic.” I sass, pushing at his scruffy jaw as he tries to kiss me again. He rumbles in warning and I shiver, sending a wave of laughter through the crowd.

“Anyway, I told him where I was and he explained about emergency evacuation tunnels in the Palace and how to find them. Luckily I was able to find one in my room, but unfortunately it was incredible long and landed me in the wilderness very far away – as my mate said.”

I look around at the curious faces before continuing, trying to decide how to explain my new traumas. “And the worst part about being held hostage came before and after. I was devastated when my guards were killed... I tried to prevent it, to save them but it didn’t do any good, and after –”

“How?” Someone shouts, “I thought your wolf wasn’t awake yet so how did you defend them?”

I freeze for a moment, and my surviving guard steps up, emotion thick in his voice. “She sacrificed herself for us, thinking they would stop the attack once they had her. I was only able to get away because they thought I was dead.”

“We were so outnumbered that I knew there was no chance we could win. I didn’t realize that they only meant to kidnap me, but I knew my fate was sealed... I figured theirs didn’t have to be, and I was wrong.” A runaway tear slips from my lashes and I quickly skype it away, trying not to break down in public.

“And after escaping, I kept going as long as I possibly could, but I didn’t have a coat, let alone my wolf... and eventually I had to make the decision no mother should ever have to contemplate. Whether to save my own life and end my baby’s, or to let us both die from hypothermia. Nothing the Prince and Lydia said or did to me could ever compare with that pain.”

I might be imagining it, but I can see nothing but sympathy and admiration in the faces around us, and then another reporter shouts, “if he’s been attacking your mate, then why not kill him? What kind of an Alpha would just stand by and let him try again?”

“Because I believe in the rule of law.” Sinclair rumbles, his wolf glowing in his eyes.

“Believe me, I wanted nothing more than to kill him and still do, but if I did I wouldn’t be any better than he is. The ability not to rashly act on my impulses is what sets the Prince and I apart –”

“That and having a conscience.” I add saucily, earning a wolfish grin from my mate. “Our system of governance is what allows us to maintain peace in the united packs. It’s the reason we advanced out of the dark ages, and I’ll be damned if I’m going to undermine it with my own personal vendetta. Some might call that weak, but if you ask me the far weaker move is to target a breeding she-wolf because you’re too spineless to take on your opponent directly.”

Murmurs of agreement travel throughout the room, and I feel my heart leap. This is working – they’re all so distracted by the Prince’s crimes that no one even seems to care about our lies. Of course, as soon as I think this, another reporter asks, “Ella, if you didn’t know you were a shifter, how did you and the Alpha meet?”

I look up at Sinclair, unsure of whether I should tell the truth. We discussed this beforehand, knowing the question might come up, but we hadn’t reached a solution. Instead we decided to decide based on the feeling in the room, and now here we are. If I tell the truth it could unravel this whole thing, but if I lie it could backfire and dig us into even deeper trouble.

What should I say? I silently ask my mate. It’s your call, baby. I trust you. I look back at the crowd, trying not to telegraph my uncertainty. They’re all waiting expectantly, and I need to decide quickly. Do I lie, or do I tell the truth?

Chapter 148 – The Prince’s Fury

3rd Person

Prince Damon stared at the television screen, apoplectic with rage. He didn’t know how Sinclair found out about the story he’d leaked to the Current, and he didn’t really care. The end result was the same: Here was the Moon Valley Alpha and his wretched little Luna on live TV, accusing him of corruption and murder. What was worse, the reporters were eating it up without any semblance of concern for the lies Sinclair had been telling these last few months.

The Prince’s own investigators hadn’t figured out that Ella had been living as a human all these years, and now it seemed there wouldn’t be any need for them to continue digging, because she was about to explain how this all began.

The glowing she-wolf exchanged a nod with her mate, before turning back to the crowd. “The truth is that the beginning of our relationship is a mystery to us both. We were both desperate for children, after years of trying and failing with our partners. I didn’t know it at the time, but I wasn’t conceiving because I was with a human, and long story short, I went to a sperm bank thinking it was my last chance to get pregnant. Dominic had sent his own sperm there for analysis, and somehow it ended up getting mixed up with the sample from the donor I’d chosen.”

“When Dominic scented his heir in my womb a few days later, we didn’t understand how I was able to conceive a shifter’s child, and now of course the mystery is who or what led to that fateful mix up, because we might not have created this baby the traditional way, but we fell in love so fast and fiercely that there’s no doubt it was meant to be.” She explains, her silken voice full of warmth as she gazes up at the Alpha in question. “All we can say is the Goddess works in mysterious ways.”

Excited mutters about the goddess and fate wove throughout the room, and Prince Damon gripped the back of the sofa so hard that his claws ripped into the upholstery. This was unbelievable. Why didn’t anyone care that they had been lying all this time — they’d just confessed they didn’t even know each other when the bitch conceived and the press was still fawning all over them. Romantic fools! He thought bitterly. What was wrong with this species? So brainless that they could be swayed by starry eyed fantasies and fairy tales about the Goddess.

He shut the television off when one of the reporters obsequiously cried, “When did you realize you were in love?”

“Bring Lydia to me, right now.” He ordered the guard beside him, “ Then tell my father to clear his schedule. We need to talk.”

When Lydia walked in a little while later, her demeanor skittish and uncertain, he could only growl wordlessly. “What’s happened?” She asked, clearly balking.

“Sinclair’s outmaneuvered us again. He just announced that Ella’s wolf was dormant and that he lied about her past to protect her.”

The Prince explained. “Then he accused me of planning the rogue attack and kidnapping her, and he had footage of the second meeting!”

Lydia’s eyes widened in horror, and she began backing away from him warily. “The current must have called them for a comment on the story.”

“A comment! A comment!” Damon ranted. “And you didn’t think that Sinclair would take the opportunity to beat us to the punch!

Nobody even cares that they lied because he turned it into a fucking romantic comedy! I told you that this was your last chance, you stupid cow!”

‘But it wasn’t my fault!’ Lydia cried, fear rolling off of her in waves. “All I’ve ever done is try to help you!”

“I never would have kidnapped Ella if it wasn’t for you — they would never have had that footage, Sinclair would have continued to quietly counter us in private if we hadn’t pissed him off so much!” The Prince thundered, stalking Lydia across the room, his wolf glowing in his eyes. “You’ve done nothing but screw things up from the first moment you walked into my life, and now you’ve ruined any chance I had at being King!”

“Then I’ll leave!” Lydia offered frantically, correctly sensing the mortal danger she was facing. “I’ll go away and you’ll never hear from me again, you have my word.”

Women. Damon mused bitterly. Always so eager to stick their noses where they don’t belong, but never willing to take responsibility for their actions. Never willing to get their hands dirty themselves. In that moment, the hints Ella had dropped about the Princess’s murder suddenly clicked in Damon’s mind.

Poison. He thought, that’s why Ella said it was a feminine tactic, because it’s passive. Maybe it was the way Lydia was cowering in front of him, but Ella’s next clue suddenly seemed only too obvious. Who would benefit from her death?

Understanding crashed into Damon, and suddenly all of Lydia’s actions since she had inserted herself into his world made sense.

He realized that she’d always attached herself to powerful men, bouncing from one to the next every time they became wise to her treachery. “But you don’t have anywhere to go, do you?” The Prince responded in a snarl. “Your husband tossed you to the curb, Sinclair rejected you. You've never worked a day in your life, it must have seemed like a golden opportunity when I suddenly became single, right when you were on the verge of losing everything. In fact, that was quite some coincidence, wasn't it?"

Lydia trembled violently as the Prince moved nearer, circling like a bird of prey. She turned as he moved, afraid to let him out of her line of sight. "W-what do you mean?"

"Well it strikes me that she was killed in a woman's restroom. And no male wolves were scented around her body." He reasoned sharply. "And poison... such an non-confrontational weapon."

"Listen, I know what you think, but it isn't true." Lydia stammered. "You're letting them trick you. I know Ella put these ideas in your head."

"The only way you could know that is if you were eavesdropping." Damon accused angrily. "And they're not the only ones who have been trying to manipulate me." He continued, thinking of Sinclair's comments about Lydia's interference. He might be a despicable, self-righteous, mongrel — but he hadn't been wrong about his ex-wife's insolence. "You probably thought you could make me fall for you eventually, if you played your cards right. Tell me, did you want to help me or yourself, Lydia? Did you care if I became King, or did you just want to be a queen and you were willing to go through anyone and anything that stood in your way?"

"It wasn't like that!" Lydia insisted desperately. "And besides, Angeline's death helped your campaign more than all of your efforts to discredit Sinclair combined."

"So that's your defense? You killed my mate, but I shouldn't be bothered because it helped me in the polls?"

"No! Of course not!" Lydia pleaded, knowing she was backed into a corner now but helpless to think of a way out. "I didn't... I didn't kill her. I would never do such a thing, you have to believe me!"

"You were willing to let your own fated mate die for your ambitions." Damon reminded her. "You didn't care about attacking a breeding woman and killing her unborn pup despite your supposed love for children. So why should you give a damn about my mate?"

"Because I respect you too much to ever cross you." Lydia professed, dropping to her knees. "You're my Prince, I would never do anything to displease you."

"And when did that begin? You helped Sinclair oppose me for years with no such loyalty. Let's be honest, Lydia. Your allegiance goes to the highest bidder, the man who can offer you the most power and status." The Prince grumbled, unable to see her true colors now that they'd been revealed. "You're a scheming, gold-digging, narcissist, and you saw fit to take my mate — your princess — from me, for your own selfish gain.

Lydia tearfully shook her head, knowing she'd lost. "Please, just let me go, I'll do anything."

"It's too late for that." Damon snapped, closing the distance between them. "I should have done this the moment you tried to tell me how to run my own fucking campaign."

"Please, have mercy." Lydia begged, sobbing now as she tried to scabble away from the approaching predator.

"Shut the hell up!" Damon snarled, lashing out with his claws. He wanted to make her suffer — it was, after all, the only thing she-wolves were good for in his mind, but he didn't have time to waste. He needed to speak with his father and do damage control before the Alpha Council could think to issue a warrant for his arrest, and torturing the worthless creature in front of him would only cut into that — no matter how pleasurable it might be. His claws caught Lydia neck and dug deep, ripping out her throat and ceasing her pitiful moaning once and for all.

Her lifeless body fell at his feet, and he stepped over her and strode out the door, wiping her blood on his trousers. "Clean that up." He ordered the stone faced guard at the door, before he disappeared down the hall, headed for the King's study.

Chapter 149 – The Prince’s Gambit

King Andras was watching the press conference when his son stormed in, blood dripping from his claws. When Damon entered, the conference was winding down, with Sinclair thanking the press for their support and apologizing again for their deception. He called for action against the Prince, stating that the fate of the united packs was at risk if the Alpha Council did not act.

‘You idiot.’ He growled at his son, clicking off the television. ‘What the hell were you thinking?’

‘I took the wrong advice, but I’ve dealt with that now.’ Damon answered snidely, ‘I got rid of that no-good bitch once and for all.’

‘That’s what you get for taking the advice of a woman.’ The King grouched. ‘And if that weren’t bad enough, your incompetence has just cost our family the crown!’

‘Me!’ Damon exclaimed in outrage, ‘You’re the one who’s being removed from the throne, the only reason I’m in this position in the first place is that you were too weak to fight the council and instead expected me to save your ass and the family legacy! You weren’t even going to let me rule if I won! You expected me to be your fucking puppet!’

‘Because you don’t have what it takes to lead!’ King Andras shouted. ‘You do shit like this! Thinking violence can solve all your problems, acting without thinking, taking strategy from a traitorous whore with more cunning than common sense!’

‘Oh like you’re so different!’ The Prince scoffed cruelly. ‘You stole the crown exactly the same way I tried to, so if you want to blame anyone for my mistakes, look in the damned mirror!’

He charged towards his heir, rage coloring his face bright red. ‘I had the wisdom to know when to strike and who to target. I didn’t go after an innocent she-wolf, I went after my enemy himself and I pulled it off because I planned and accounted for every last contingency. I didn’t just take it into my head to kill Henry Sinclair and start lashing out at him any way I could, regardless of the collateral damage! I didn’t risk the lives of the citizens I rule or align myself with extremists! I didn’t commit treason! I made a single, strategic strike and took out the competition. It’s not about morality or nobility, it’s about using your bloody head, Damon!’

‘Weil if you’re so smart, tell me how we’re supposed to get out of this without taking extreme action!’ Damon shouted, livid that his father wasn’t taking his side.

King Andras shook his head in disbelief. ‘There is no getting out of this, boy. The damage is done and if you think the council will overlook your traitorous plots you are out of your mind. The only option you have now is to run before they can take you into custody.”

“Run, go into exile?” Damon spat, “that’s your grand plan? Don’t you care that Sinclair will become King? That our family will lose everything?”

“Of course I care, you insolent pup.” Andras snarled. “But a good Alpha has to know when they’re beaten, and trust me when I tell you that we are.”

“Not if we gather the royal army.” Damon insisted petulantly, stomping his foot. “If we act quickly we could overthrow the Alpha council, Sinclair, all of them. Without their interference and regulations, our power could be limitless. No more quibbling diplomacy, everyone shouting over one another in order to be heard and get their own way. Total authority.”

‘You mean total tyranny.’ King Andras replied, so shocked by the Prince’s suggestion that he had to sit down. ‘You’re suggesting we undo years of peace, throw out the constitution and reform the united packs as an empire ruled by nothing but your own greed.’ The horror in his eyes was obvious to his son, and he made no effort to hide it. “In all my years I never ... where did I go so wrong with you?”

“So you would rather give up, tuck in our tails and accept defeat? That’s pathetic.” Damon derided. “Clearly the council was right to unseat you if this is how you respond to a challenge. You don’t even have the will to fight, to defend what’s rightfully yours!”

“Maybe you’re right.” Andras grimaced, feeling overwhelmed with the depth of his failure as a father. “Because Goddess help me, but right now I can’t help rooting for Sinclair. If the only alternative to my rule is yours or his, then I would gladly choose him.”

“No!” Damon roared, his adrenaline spiking. “You can’t do this! It isn’t fair! I’m your heir! The throne is supposed to be mine! He can’t have it and I will not run scared!”

“You don’t have another choice. You made this bed and you are the one who has to lie in it.” Andras declared firmly, “I won’t protect you from the consequences, Damon. As far as I’m concerned, you are no longer my son.”

The king sat back in his chair, mind reeling, still at a loss to process the shock of this conversation. He’d known Damon was not fit to be King for some time now, but he didn’t realize the boy was so unhinged. He thought he could control him, teach him, and it had just become painfully obvious that neither would ever be possible.

Still, he didn’t expect what was coming next. He never would have imagined his only son might turn his violence onto him, but that’s exactly what he did. While the King was still sitting there, a grim expression on his face, Damon pounced. He shifted in a flash, sinking his fangs into his father's exposed throat before the King even knew what was happening.

The king was dead in an instant, and unable to defend himself or conceptualize this new betrayal. When Damon shifted back into human form, spitting out his father's blood and wiping his mouth with the back of his hand, he looked down at the older man with smug triumph. "Now you are no longer my father, what do you think of that, Dad?"

Moving quickly he swept out of the room and found a fresh change of clothes, before going to his beta with the news of the King's demise." Announce to everyone that Sinclair invaded the palace and killed the king, and get rid of the body so they can't analyze the crime scene." He ordered. "Whatever you do, don't make the announcement until the scene has been swept."

'Then mobilize the Royal Army, if they question my authority then tell them that I'm my father's heir and the United Packs are under attack, that I'm King for all intents and purposes until the Alpha Council can choose another. You can also tell them that the sentence for insubordination will be death... I also need poison" Damon decided, thinking that as cowardly as Lydia's tactics were, there was no doubting they were effective. The average soldier wouldn't be any match for the Alphas on the council, but the overblown leaders wouldn't ever anticipate a poisoning.

"We have to get rid of the Alpha Council if we're going to pull this off. Find the most potent poison you can and send a team to the council chambers – they're bound to be meeting in order to determine what to do about Sinclair's accusations. If we act quickly we can take them all out at once. Slip the poison into the coffee service before the servants take it up."

"But if we're poisoning the council, why do we need the army?" His beta interrupted, seeming overwhelmed by everything that was happening, but clearly not feeling brave enough to push back at his Alpha.

"Because the army is for Sinclair." Damon explained through gritted teeth, not having any patience for being questioned.

"I thought... isn't Sinclair on the council?" The beta questioned.

'Yes but he won't be present if they're debating his accusations – he has a conflict of interest. We're going to have to go after him on his own turf, and it's going to take as many soldiers as we can summon." the Prince snapped. "And once he's out of the way it's going to take the full force of the army to squash any unrest in the united packs."

“Damon, are you sure about all this?” His beta questioned hesitantly. “You’re talking about a full on coup.”

The Prince rolled his eyes. “I just killed my own father, do you really think I care about the alpha council or a load of peasants?” He demanded severely. “We’ve got a huge task ahead of us and I need to know that you’re with me, because if you aren’t. I’ll find someone who is.”

“No – no I’m with you.” The beta promised, fear dilating his pupils.

“Good. By this time tomorrow we’ll be the most powerful men on the continent. We’ll have the entire world at our feet.” He turned to the window, looking out on Moon Valley with a cold, rapacious gaze. “First the Alpha Council, then Sinclair.”

Chapter 150 – Flight

Ella

“Ella, Ella wake up.” Sinclair’s urgent voice invades my dreams, just as the ground begins to tremble beneath my feet. As I’m wrenched awake, I realize the ground wasn’t trembling at all, instead my sleeping body was being shaken by my mate. Sinclair’s handsome face hovers above my own, his eyes glowing as his hand rests on my shoulder. “Come on baby, we’ve got to go.”

“I- what? What do you mean?” I mumble groggily. “We’re under attack, we have to go, sweetheart.” Sinclair explains, pulling me up. “There’s no time to take anything with us, just get dressed.”

“But I don’t understand, under attack from who?” I ask, feeling as though my mind is dragging. When we went to bed tonight we’d been overjoyed with our victory at the press conference, thinking we were out of the woods at long last. We made love and I passed out to the blissful sound of Sinclair’s contented purrs. What he’s saying simply doesn’t make any sense.

“The Royal Army, I promise I’ll explain everything later, but right now I need you to just do as I say.” He strides to the closet in a flash, returning with my warmest sweater and a pair of fleece lined leggings, as well as my coat and a pair of boots.

Clearly sensing that I’m too shocked and drowsy to keep up with the crisis threatening us, he dresses me with cool efficiency, only pausing to retrieve a pair of thick wool socks from the dresser before lacing up my boots.

Sinclair returns to the closet to dress himself while I sit on the edge of the bed in a daze, belatedly realizing he forgot to provide me with underwear. I open my mouth to tell him as much, but he simply scoops me up in his arms, “We’ll buy you some once we’re safe, trouble.” He promises, then sweeps me out of the room. Sinclair carries me down to the mansion’s basement level, surrounded by guards.

Hugo comes running up to us just before we enter an evacuation tunnel I didn’t know existed. “I got word to Roger and your father. They’ll meet us there.”

“Where’s there?” I ask anxiously, my wolf reaching out to Sinclair’s to try to get a sense of his feelings. Once again I realize he’s blocking off his emotions from me, only this time he’s not letting the good things shine through. I can’t get any sense of his feelings at all, feeling as though I’m reaching into an empty void. “We’re leaving the continent.” Sinclair informs me tightly.

“Leaving the continent?” I repeat, stunned. This is unfathomable to me, I’ve never been off the continent in my entire life, and the idea that Sinclair would be leaving his pack behind just doesn't compute. If the situation is severe enough to force us out of Moon Valley, why wouldn't we just go to another territory, a neighboring pack?

'Things are bad baby.' Sinclair murmurs, not slowing his pace as we continue through the tunnel at a jog. The tunnel lets out into a darkened garage, and we pile into a collection of jeeps reinforced to look more like army tanks than standard vehicles.

As we speed out of the city, Sinclair is in constant communication with his men, going over our route and making preparations for the journey ahead. It's not until the logistics have all been sorted out that he finally turns to me.

He rumbles with concern and drags me into his lap, and I tuck my head against his shoulder. Sinclair takes a deep breath, then tells me. 'The Prince has taken over the united packs, Ella. The King is dead, the Alpha council are all dead. It would seem our decision to call him out and the threat of losing his position pushed him over the edge.

He's deployed the royal army to lock down Moon Valley, and likely sent assassins to take out the betas of the other packs so they can't coordinate against him as a shadow council. By this time tomorrow, he will have total control of the pack armies as well as his own.'

'Oh my Goddess.' Tears burn in my eyes. This was everything we'd been afraid of, only worse. All the shifters and humans left in the Valley would – 'Wait!' I exclaim frantically. 'Cora! We have to take her with us!'

'Roger and Dad are picking her up on their way out of the city.' Sinclair informs me gently, purring to try and ease my distress. 'She'll be okay, and she'll be with us soon.'

I feel so grateful for my mate in this moment that I could kiss him, but he's holding me too tightly to move. Instead I kiss his neck and thank him profusely as he cuddles me like a human security blanket. When I'm done showing my thanks, I'm able to turn my thoughts to the future. 'Dominic, what are we going to do?'

'We're going to go west, to the hidden territories.' Sinclair answers decisively. 'I have some allies there, and the Prince will have his hands so full just trying to suppress the unrest his coup will cause that he won't be able to spare forces to come after us.'

'Where are the hidden territories?' I ask, trying to imagine which points on the human maps might align with such a name.

'Between here and the Veran continent.' Sinclair shares, confusing me to no end.

'But there isn't anything between here and Vera.' I remind him, trying to figure out if he's lost his mind or perhaps I've lost mine. "Only the ocean."

"That's why they're hidden, trouble." Sinclair explains, pressing a few kisses to my forehead. "The lands were previously uninhabited, and were settled by wolves who were tired of having to keep their true natures secret – they wanted to live away from humans, so they formed a federation of shifter- only societies. Shifters have always had more advanced technologies, so this all happened before the human populations began exploring the world, and when they started, the wolves in the hidden territories made sure the continent couldn't be found."

"But now we have satellites and cross the oceans in airplanes and everything." I say, not entirely understanding how this could be possible. Then again, I went my whole life living with shifters right under my nose and never knew they existed, so I suppose it shouldn't seem quite so outlandish.

"Yes, but we have shielding technology that makes it impossible to detect the territories from all sides. The shields project whatever images one would expect to see from their particular perspective, so from above it simply looks like more water." Sinclair explains, rubbing my belly and making Rafe kick up a storm.

"Okay." I can accept this explanation, since I've seen first hand how far ahead shifters are when it comes to technology, but this doesn't account for everything. "And what about boats? If they're sailing along and the captain only sees open ocean ahead, why don't humans sail into them?"

"Because it doesn't just look like open ocean, the shields project the image of a massive storm so that sailers won't enter the territory's waters, they'll sail around the storm and if they get too close their equipment starts going haywire." Sinclair tells me, seeming more and more relaxed the farther we get from Moon Valley. Instead of simply clutching me against his chest his hands are gradually beginning to explore my body, though I suppose this could be another comfort mechanism – ensuring that I'm whole and unharmed. "That's where all the human legends about the Dark Triangle come from." 1

My jaw drops with amazement, every child in the world has heard tales of that mysterious point in the ocean where magic seems to routinely disappear ships and aircraft. "You mean we're going there? To the Dark Triangle?" I exclaim with excitement, momentarily forgetting my distress due to the sheer astonishment of hearing I'm going to a mythical land.

Sinclair's lip quirks, "If I'd known that's all I needed to say to ease your mind I would have started with it. Yes, sweet mate, we're going to the Dark Triangle." He confirms, "though the people there might be offended if you call it that. In truth we'll land in a territory called Vanara. It will be very different from home, but it will be safe."

"I... are we-" I'm not sure how to ask my next question, and in the end I just blurt it out. "Is this forever?"

"No." Sinclair replies firmly. "Once we arrive I'm going to rally the Alphas of the federation to move against the Prince. I'll take whatever support they're willing to give, and I'll use my spies back home to form a citizen army... a rebellion. When the time is right we'll return." He pauses and looks down at me with regret. "At least I will."

"You mean... alone?" I inquire, aghast.

"Yes." He sighs, and he opens a floodgate of emotion to me, revealing how much he hates this thought. "Because when I go back, I'll be going to war."

Chapter 151 – Exile

Ella

The journey to the hidden territories was swift once we reached the coast. We boarded a small plane and ascended into the heavens at top speed, and I swear Sinclair didn't relax until we were cruising at 30,000 feet. I didn't realize how tense he'd been even after we left Moon Valley, until we were out of danger and his muscles finally unwound.

The flight took more than six hours, though I slept most of the way. When we finally landed Sinclair gently untangled our bodies, which instantly woke me. I emit a sleepy moan, looking up at him blearily. "Are we there?"

"Yes," He confirms, leaning over to cup my cheek. "But stay here until I can make sure it's safe, okay?"

Without another word, he disappears out the door with his men, descending the small staircase leading down to the tarmac. I lurch to my feet, moving to the windows to look outside. My first glimpse of the hidden territories takes my breath away; the horizon is dominated by a glittering lake, framed beneath the towering peaks of snow-capped mountains. At the center of the lake, looking as though it's floating on the water, is an opulent city which is only visible at certain angles. The rest of the time it looks like nothing more than a ball of light.

Eager to get out and explore, I quickly spy my mate, prowling around the area with Hugo and our guards to make sure no danger is hiding just out of sight. In the distance I can also see a line of shiny cars waiting for us, and I roll my eyes. Overprotective wolves.

I emerge from the plane and breathe in the foreign air, my newly awakened senses assailed by strange and unfamiliar scents. I cradle my belly in my arms, feeling a wave of curiosity from my pup. Rafe may not know what's going on, but he knows I'm feeling alight with interest. "Are you ready, my darling?" I ask him, "We're going on an adventure." He flutters in my womb, and I feel thoroughly encouraged.

I don't even get to the end of the platform before Sinclair turns and sees me. A wave of disapproval assails me, and then his voice sounds in my head. I told you to stay put.

What, so you can protect me from all this fresh air and the beautiful landscapes? I sass in reply, taking the first step down the stairway. Sinclair bounds to my side in an instant, scooping me up and growling deep in his chest. "Naughty mate, you have no idea what dangers could be awaiting us."

"Oh, like the bath snakes you once warned me about?" I ask archly, finding it impossible not to smile at the memory.

'That was a joke. This isn't.' Sinclair grimaces. 'We're in unknown territory now – quite literally. Don't ask me to take your safety for granted because I won't do it, Ella.'

'We have to feel safe somewhere, Dominic.' I reply gently, stroking his jaw. 'Otherwise we'll drive ourselves crazy with worry.'

'The only place I ever feel you're safe is when you're in my arms.' Sinclair shares, and suddenly I understand why he's always touching me. It's not only for affection, but his own comfort as well.

'Then what on earth were you doing leaving me alone in a plane?' I tease, nuzzling my face against his neck.

My mate shakes his head with an indulgent purr, 'how we ever thought you were human, I'll never know.' Sinclair remarks dryly. 'Only she-wolves can manage to be so insolent and so sweet at once.'

I giggle as he carries me down the steps, belatedly realizing that we probably left the secrets of my past behind and out of reach. Of course, thoughts of my past only make me think of my sister, 'When will Cora arrive?' 1

'Soon.' Sinclair promises, kissing my brow. 'They were coming from the shadow pack.' I don't need more explanation. When we fled we took different paths for the sake of safety, and Roger, Henry and Cora had gone east while we'd gone west. It makes sense that the others had a longer journey.

As Sinclair carries me towards the line of cars, the back door to the middle vehicle opens, and then a distinguished looking man emerges. He's probably five or six years older than Sinclair, and thus a decade older than me, but he welcomes us with a wide smile and open arms. 'Dorn!'

'Gabriel!' Sinclair replies, flashing his fangs but showing no aggression. He puts me down only long enough to embrace the other man, then promptly tucks me under his arm. 'This is my mate, Ella. Ella, this is King Gabriel Montclair of Vanara.'

My eyes widen when I hear this man is royalty, but then again my mate was almost a king as well. I extend my hand to him, 'Pleasure to meet you.'

Gabriel clasps both of his hands around mine. 'It's an honor.' He replies warmly, a somber note entering his expression as he looks back and forth between us. 'I'm so sorry for all you've been through.'

'Why? You didn't do it.' I quip, before I can think better of it.

Gabriel's tender expression cracks, and then he's throwing his head back with laughter. "Well I see why you picked her, Dorn." He expresses to Sinclair, even though the mood has been permanently dampened. "But I do feel for you. It's all over the news and I can't believe it. How one man could take out the entire Alpha council, all the betas. It's unthinkable."

"Well he didn't do it on his own, or honorably," Sinclair grumbles. By now I've been caught up on all the developments regarding the Prince's coup, and I know these wolves consider the use of poison a cowardly, disgraceful tactic. "Still, it is hard to fathom." He agrees, squeezing me a bit more tightly. "But we're here now, and we can only move forward."

"Damn right." Gabriel confirms, gripping my mate's shoulder. "Come on, we've got a welcome party awaiting you."

I dig in my heels. "But what about Cora and Henry?" I ask anxiously. "What about Roger?"

"A couple of the cars will stay behind to collect your family once they arrive." The King announces, surprising me. He certainly seems very clued in to our affairs. Though I suppose this should be the case, since he's made all the arrangements.

I'm still not convinced, and though Sinclair could easily sweep me along against my will, he turns to me and rests a hand on my tummy. "We need to get settled and find you a doctor. As soon as the others arrive we'll meet them."

"Why a doctor?" I demand indignantly, feeling defiant for reasons I don't understand.

Of course, Sinclair doesn't seem to have any issues understanding. He simply purrs and shifts nearer. "You haven't been examined since your wolf woke, and we've been through a lot. You need a check up."

"But Rafe is fine." I insist, notching my chin up.

"He might be, but I want to know about you." Sinclair murmurs in a firm tone. "Don't you want to find out if you can come off bed rest?"

I peek up at him from beneath my lashes, sulking even though he's right – or perhaps because he is. "Yes." I murmur sullenly.

Sinclair rumbles out a knowing laugh, sweeping my legs back up into his arms. "That's what I thought."

Sinclair gives me the window seat in the car so that I can stare out at my new surroundings, marveling at the incredible lands which turn everything I believed I knew about the world upside down. Sinclair has been here before, and he's more concerned with talking logistics with the King, so he simply strokes my spine as I turn my whole body to the glass and gaze out in awe. It's beyond surreal. Once upon a time I suppose people had to travel in order to know what the rest of the world looked like, but with modern technology I thought I'd seen photos and videos of just about every corner of our planet. Now I'm learning I was very wrong.

"What do you think, trouble?" Sinclair asks as the Alpha's come to a pause in their conversation.

We're currently speeding over a mirrored bridge which makes it feel as if we're driving right across the surface of the lake, and the closer we get to the city, I realize why it seemed to glow: It's a city made entirely of glass. It reminds me of the intricate ice sculptures I've seen at winter fairs, when artists create entire worlds out of the beautiful but impractical substance." It's incredible." I breathe. "I've never seen anything like it... but how is it possible? I would have thought glass was too fragile for such complex structures."

"Ah, but it's not glass." King Gabriel corrects with a wry smile. "It's a rare crystal found only on this continent – called Vanarium. It's stronger even than diamonds, and conducts energy so that the city powers itself without any need for polluting fuels or alternative energies." 2

"Amazing." I murmur, my heart skipping a beat as we finally enter the gates of the city. The cars wind through glittering, peaceful streets which are so clean I feel I could eat off the pavement without complaint. All the people turn and wave as we pass, and I wonder if the King's vehicles are different enough from the common peoples to be so obvious. I'm surprised when I see some shifters in their wolf forms, who gallop alongside the car by way of greeting. They all look so happy, but I can't help feeling as though something is missing here.

"There are no forests." I realize after a moment.

"Not all wolves are forest dwellers." Sinclair explains, "each pack has their own element – the Vanarans draw strength from water and prefer wide open spaces."

"Oh." I deflate a little, and Sinclair gives me a squeeze. "Don't worry, little wolf. We'll find you some trees to frolic in."

"Actually, we have different biomes set up around the city for wolves who immigrate here from around the world. And at the palace we can turn your rooms into a miniature Moon Valley, if you like."

"Where is your palace?" I inquire with interest.

Gabriel gives me a wide smile and points at something through the center of the front windshield. "There."

I follow the direction of his finger, and feel my jaw drop in astonishment...

Chapter 152 – Check Up

I never imagined being in exile would look like this. King Gabriel's palace is the most extravagant display of luxury I've ever seen, and it's not as if I'm a stranger to mansions and palaces. That thought alone is enough to send me reeling... who would have ever dreamed that poor orphan Ella would end up rubbing elbows with the most important figures in the land, or have the social capital to become a political threat?

As we exit the cars and enter the building, I can only stare around myself in awe. The wealth here makes the wealth back on my home continent look like nothing, and the air seems to vibrate with the energy of the strange crystals which form the city. We get a brief tour of the palace, and then we're escorted up to a sprawling suite of rooms, even more expansive than the master suite in Sinclair's manor.

However the size of the space isn't what leaves me dumbstruck, it's the feeling that we're suddenly deep in the alpine forests of my home. The walls are all comprised of giant screens, each one displaying a live feed of some dense woodland – or so it seems. Even the ceiling displays a realistic view of the sky, a light dappled canopy which projects actual rays of sunlight down to the floor. Tucked in the farthest corner of the room is a large, round bed with sheer curtains around the edges. Blankets and pillows are waiting to be piled into a nest, and I feel as though I'm in one of my shared dreams with Sinclair.

His arms slide around my waist, and his lips graze my ear. "Do you like it?" All of a sudden I realize that he instructed the King to have our rooms prepared this way, to give me a safe space while we're in exile.

I can't help myself. I turn and climb into his arms, not satisfied with a simple hug and instead scrabbling up his huge body as if it were a tree. I wrap my arms and legs around my mate, rewarded with a low purr. "We're going to find a way back home, Ella. I promise."

"I know." I tell him honestly. "I trust you."

I realize that Gabriel has stepped outside, leaving us alone. I tilt my face up to Sinclair's, finding his gaze already on me. It's so intense, so heated, and I couldn't escape it even if I wanted to. He claims my lips in a deep kiss, and only the sound of a knock on the door tears us apart.

The doctor who enters is warm and gentle as he greets us, showing no small amount of sympathy for our plight. Still it takes quite a bit of cajoling to make me leave my mate's arms, and only concern for my baby convinces me to leave him. The physician takes my blood pressure and vitals, and sits patiently as we explain the story of my suppressed wolf and traumatic shift. Sinclair stays by my side throughout the examination, and when they wheel in an ultrasound machine and Rafe's tiny, three dimensional image appears on the screen, I begin to cry for no other reason than how much I love him.

The physician then draws my blood, to the soundtrack of Sinclair's grumpy growls, and there's only one final set of tests to run when a guard sticks his head into the room. "Alpha, they've arrived."

Sinclair nods in acknowledgement, but I perk up with excitement. "Who's arrived?" I inquire eagerly. "Cora and Henry and Roger?"

"They'll still be here after your check up, trouble." Sinclair declares, massaging my nape.

"But I want to go see them." I insist, trying to squirm free of Sinclair's firm hold and the doctor's gloved fingers. "I have to make sure they're okay." Ever since my wolf woke up I've been feeling even more protective of my family than usual. Cora might trigger the strongest response, but my inner canine has also claimed Henry and Roger as part of her pack and there won't be any dissuading her.

Sinclair emits a warning growl, sending a shiver down my spine. His strong hands hold me in place, and I shoot him a sullen look as the doctor continues poking and prodding me. When I settle out of nothing more than sulky acknowledgement that I can't out-muscle these men, Sinclair leans down to kiss my cheek. I jerk away from him, baring my fangs with an insolent snarl, and Sinclair only arches a foreboding brow before claiming my mouth instead.

In my head I feel a wave of dominance, followed by the dark rumble of his wolf, behave, sweet mate.

Bite me. My own wolf replies, speaking before I have a chance to consider the wisdom of these words.

Gladly. Sinclair replies, nipping his claiming mark where my neck meets my shoulders. My wolf immediately lights up from the inside out, and the doctor gives us a quelling look. "I can't very well perform a cardiac stress test when you're making her heart race like that, Alpha."

"Don't look at me." Sinclair remarks, his eyes glowing. "She's the one challenging her mate." My little imp. He adds silently, for my benefit alone.

Rolling his eyes, the doctor finishes his tests, gradually rising to his feet as he puts up his equipment. "Well, I think you're safe to return to most of your normal activities, Ella." He instructs, holding up a staying hand when I immediately jump up with excitement. "I don't want you doing anything strenuous, especially not when you've been through so much, but I think waking your wolf has helped your condition. All that said, the first moment you start to feel faint, palpitations, spots in your vision or any of the other symptoms you experienced when your original doctor gave this order, you need to contact me immediately.”

“Is there anything I can do to support her?” Sinclair asks, and I feel a silent wave of anxiety from his wolf.

“Just continue giving her wolf what she needs. Protect her, care for her, but don’t spoil her if she’s challenging you – the challenge is a sign she needs you to make her feel as if you have everything under control.” He advises.

“Thank you.” Sinclair professes, shaking his hand and escorting him out of the room.

I’m already out of bed and readjusting my clothes when he turns back, and I quickly bound over the floor. “Let’s go!” I demand.

Sinclair chuckles and hooks an arm around my body, slowing me down even when I grumble at the pace. Still, mere minutes later we’re in the entrance hall and my beautiful sister is running into my open arms, followed shortly by Roger and Henry. “Cora!” I exclaim, squeezing her tight. “How are you, are you okay?”

Cora is crying into my neck, her shoulders shaking beneath my hands. “I’m so glad you’re here.” She sniffles, letting me rock her back and forth. “This is all so crazy – one moment everything was fine and then... and then...why is this happening?”

“I know.” I croon, turning worried eyes to my mate. He’s greeting his family with hugs and hushed words, grim expressions on their faces. But Cora is still weeping and hiccuping, waiting for me to answer her. “I’m sorry, I never wanted you to get mixed up in all of this.”

“How long are we going to have to stay here?” She asks, reminding me so much of the little girl who used to crawl into my bed when she had a nightmare that my heart positively aches.

“I don’t know.” I confess, kissing her hair. “But it will be okay. I’m just so glad you’re here and your safe. Was it hard getting out of the city.”

Cora shakes her head, pulling away from me at last and wiping her eyes. “Roger came for me before the news even broke, but we weren’t sure if you got out until Dominic sent word. I was so afraid that you weren’t going to escape.”

I’m safe.” I assure her, framing her face in my hands. “We’re both safe. That’s all that matters.”

Even as I say the words I look back to Sinclair, who is once again shielding his feelings from me. Despite what I tell my sister, I know I'm lying. Our safety isn't all that matters – because the millions of people we left behind are probably suffering untold terrors at this very moment. I can only imagine how heavy the burden Sinclair feels for being here when his pack remains under the Prince's thumb. At the same time, I feel how necessary our escape was. Sinclair can't help anyone if he's dead, and nor can I.

When he looks over at me, I can sense the anger, worry and fear rolling off of his body, even as he tries to shield me from it. I realize that while Sinclair might have been the one asking how to support me as a mother mere minutes ago, I have to do the same for him. My job is to support my mate in the darkest day of his career as Alpha, and though he might not want me to do so, I decide right then and there that I'm not going to give him a choice.

Chapter 153 – Late Night Comfort

Ella

“Won’t you come to bed?” I inquire, leaning over Sinclair’s back and wrapping my arms around his neck. ‘You need to rest.’”

My mate is sitting at his computer drafting emails and marching orders, secret correspondences to his allies and spies across the continent. He’s been trying to figure out some way to get a message to the people of the united packs, to let them know we’re alive and will not forsake them. So far the best plan we’ve come up with are for willing rebels to post bulletins and spray paint messages throughout the various cities, as well as antiauthoritarian propaganda. No one likes the idea of civilians endangering themselves in order to get the word out, but we don’t have much choice. This is a whole new world we’re living in.

“In a while.” Sinclair murmurs, rubbing his scruffy jaw against my cheek before turning to kiss me. My wolf is reaching out to his, trying to get a sense of his emotions, but she just keeps coming up against a brick wall.” You go get some sleep, baby.” “But I want to sleep with you.” I complain, not even caring that I’m whining. I know I can’t help Sinclair unless he lets me, and I’ll stoop to any low in order to convince him.

“I know, trouble. I’ll be there soon.” He replies, kissing me again. “I just want to finish a few things up first.”

I begrudgingly agree, and slink off towards the sumptuous bed – my new nest – and climb inside. It doesn’t feel right without my mate, and I realize that I associate Sinclair with safety the same way he does with me. Our wolves don’t feel content unless they’re together. I decide to try to call him to me in a dream, wondering if this will make him fall asleep. Instead I fall into a fitful spell of dreams searching for my mate, only to be let down when I cannot find him time after time.

Eventually I wake again, and as I blink my eyes open and reach for Sinclair, I realize I’m still alone in bed. I glance at the clock, seeing that it’s almost three in the morning – four hours since I went to bed. I climb out of my nest and groggily stumble towards the door.

As soon as it opens I hear the distant buzz of a video, though I’m not sure what’s happening in the feed. It sounds like scenes from a war zone, and I follow the sound with growing worry.

Sinclair is sitting on the couch with his laptop on the table before him, his attention focused entirely on the screen. I follow his gaze and see a very grainy video playing, of the Royal Army pouring through the streets of Moon Valley, forcing people out of their homes for interrogations and tests of allegiance to the former Prince... now Emperor. It doesn’t look like high quality news footage, and I slowly understand that this video has been taken in secret. “What’s going on?” I murmur, rubbing my eyes.

“He’s shut down all the media outlets.” Sinclair responds, reaching out for me. I happily go to him, pouring myself into his lap and snuggling in. “He’s setting up his own state run news agency to spread his propaganda, and the people are risking their lives to get the word out.” As we watch, the shifter taking the video gets the attention of one of the soldiers, who storms over demanding to see what they’re filming. The soldier raises his fist and then the video turns to black and white static.

My stomach pitches and rolls as I realize the implications of this development. My wolf howls with the knowledge that these are members of our own pack, suffering terrible abuses and without anyone to protect them. I can only imagine how much worse this feels for my mate, even though he’s shielding me from actually feeling it.

“Please don’t shut me out, Dominic.” I beg, peering up at his stony face. “I know you’re hurting and I want to help. Don’t push me away.”

Sinclair purrs, dragging his lips over my brow. “I know you want to help, sweetheart. The problem is that there isn’t anything to be done. This isn’t going to get better until I find a way to make things right, and I’m afraid that won’t happen for some time.” “You can still talk to me, let me support you.” I encourage. “I’m your mate, that’s the way it’s supposed to be.”

Sinclair shakes his head with a low groan. “You’ve got enough to deal with, without me dumping my problems onto you as well.” “But your problems are my problems.” I argue. “We’re in this together.” “Trust me, Ella, I’m well aware of that.” I’m surprised by how harsh his tone becomes, even though it isn’t directed at me.

“What do you mean?” I inquire anxiously, not liking the dark note in his voice.

“I mean the only reason that you’re in this situation in the first place is my fault.” Sinclair growls. “If you’d never met me you could have had a normal life. A safe life.” “Dominic, if I’d never met you I would be back there.” I inform him sternly, pointing at the computer screen.

“I would be bankrupt, heartbroken, thinking I was barren, with a trapped wolf and nothing but an abusive employer and deadbeat ex-boyfriend – and that would have been before all this chaos happened. There’s no telling what might have happened if you hadn’t gotten me out.”

Sinclair winces, “you also wouldn’t have been kidnapped, blackmailed, attacked by rogues, or been forced to flee the only home you’ve ever known.” He counters severely, his jaw clenched with self-fury. “You wouldn’t have been in the position of having to choose between your life and our baby’s.”

I can't stand the way he's blaming himself for the Prince's crimes. "Listen to me." I demand sitting up and refusing to continue until he looks me in the eye. Because of you I am safe and loved, I'm about to fulfill my lifelong dream of becoming a mother.

You freed my wolf – opened my eyes to my true nature, gave me insights into my own past which I never knew existed before." I insist. "And I'll tell you something else. You didn't trick me into walking away from my old life. Your wolf, as irresistible as he is, didn't lure me away with promises of sunshine and rainbows. I convinced you to take me on, do you remember that? I started all this."

"And you had no idea what you were getting into." Sinclair replies coolly, echoing a sentiment he's made a few times before. "But I did. I was so determined to win the election that I took advantage of a desperate, innocent woman."

These words make me so angry that I wrench myself out of his lap and stand in front of him with my hands on my hips. "Shut up." I hiss angrily, surprising my mate with the force of the words.

He arches an ominous brow at me, "You might not like hearing it but "I said: Shut. Up." I repeat fiercely, ignoring the flash of his wolf in his eyes." I am not going to let you twist our past because you're feeling guilty about the coup. You weren't some ne'erdoowell who saw a damsel in distress and pounced at the opportunity to take advantage. I am not your victim, and do you know how I know that? Because I have been a victim before, I know what that feels like and it isn't this." I state, my voice strong and sharp.

"I went into this with my eyes wide open and maybe I didn't know all the implications, but you protected me every step of the way." I remind him." You loved me and cared for me from day one, and if I'd known then what I do now, I would gladly do it all over again.

I don't want Damon in power any more than you do and I would gladly sacrifice myself if it means protecting the millions he'll abuse in his reign." Sinclair's eyes glow as he looks up at me, an unreadable emotion in his eyes. "Are you finished?"

I cross my arms over my chest, 'That depends, are you going to keep being an unreasonable, block-headed, patronizing Before I can finish my list of choice words, Sinclair leans forward and presses his shoulder into my hips, gently tossing me over his shoulder. I squeak as he carts me off to the bedroom, slamming the laptop shut along the way.

The next thing I know I'm on my back in my nest, with my powerful mate looming above me. "You will not be sacrificing yourself for anyone." Sinclair rumbles, his voice gruff and gravelly. "Not for me, not your guards, not the whole kingdom." "That doesn't make sense, Dominic." I roll my eyes, "I'm not more important than all our people combined."

“When you were kidnapped and you gave yourself up for your guards, I told you that I was going to make sure you never did anything so reckless again,” He pauses, letting the memory sink in. “but I let you off the hook because of everything we went through afterwards... but maybe that was a mistake.”

He muses, hunger blazing to life in his eyes, the vibrations of his Alpha power sending shivers through my prone body. “From the sounds of it, you haven’t learned your lesson yet, mate.”

Chapter 154 – Ella’s Lesson

Sinclair

Ella is squirming beneath my towering form, and I can sense her wolf’s conflicted feelings. She’s pleased with herself for distracting me from my brooding thoughts, while also anxious about my intentions and excited by my dominance. She’s giving off waves of defiance and desire at once, and since the mischievous little wolf hasn’t yet learned how to censor the thoughts and feelings she sends to me, I suddenly hear her sweet voice in my head. Bossy Alpha. Trying to tell us what to do, as if it’s his choice and not ours.

Oh but it is my choice, mate. I reply, and Ella’s eyes go wide with shock, then accusation when she realizes what happened. You belong to me, and that means I get to decide whether or not you throw your precious life away for someone else.

You shouldn’t be listening to my thoughts when you know I can’t control them. She tells me indignantly.

If you don’t want to get in trouble for them, then you shouldn’t be thinking such naughty things. I reply, climbing onto the bed and looming over her on all fours. Besides, I think maybe you wanted me to hear that. You haven’t been projecting all your other thoughts towards me, only that last one.

Why would I intentionally provoke you? She huffs, and the beautiful creature beneath me tilts her head and exposes her neck to me, rubbing and writhing deeper into the thick bedding. She may not understand what she’s doing, but her instincts are driving her to put on a show for me, entice me with her would-be submission.

Very alluring, I praise her wolf, a deep chuckle rolling through my chest like thunder. My adorable mate preens, and I can sense Ella’s confusion at her own response. But if you didn’t want to provoke me then you wouldn’t have been telling me to shut up and rolling your gorgeous eyes at me either. I lower myself between her legs, stroking her silky thigh with my free hand.

I don’t know what you’re talking about. Her wolf insists, turning her snout up.

Well it doesn’t really matter if you intended it or not, the end result is the same, trouble. I declare, dipping my head to nibble the lovely offering of her neck. Ella is trembling with anticipation and barely contained lust, the scent of her arousal floats up to me, reassuring me that I’m not pushing her too far after so much excitement. Granted, I was hardly gentle when I claimed her the first time after she shifted, but that was before our entire world came crashing down.

Ella moans as my teeth nip her sensitive skin, arching her back and sliding her arms around my back. You might be a tyrant, but you certainly know how to make me feel good. She confesses. I'll never get tired of this.

Oh baby, you don't even know what this is, yet. I reply, shifting off of her. I lean back against the stacked pillow of Ella's nest, then pull her over my lap, moving so quickly that she can't keep up. She gasps with surprise when she finds herself face down with her luscious bottom on display, then quickly tries to squirm free. "Uh-uh trouble, you're not going anywhere." I tell her sternly, keeping one hand on the small of her back, while the other caresses the curve of her lovely backside.

"The first time we did this it was to help you break the dam on your feelings. The second time was just for fun." I remind her, images of our delirious first night together filling my head. "But now I'm going to give you a taste of what will happen if you ever recklessly endanger yourself again, whether you have noble reasons or not."

"Dominic, please don't." She requests, batting her long lashes at me. However at the same time her wolf growls at me in challenge, belying Ella's sweet plea. "I didn't do anything wrong."

"Oh I beg to differ." I rumble, massaging the perky globes beneath my fingers. "Your job is to protect yourself and our pup at all costs. The guards I assigned to you were more than willing to give their lives for you, and your death would only have made theirs in vain. That isn't what anyone would have wanted."

"But-" She protests, wriggling in a way that sends blood straight to my cock.

"And that's nothing to mention the way you disobeyed me today by getting off the plane before it was safe, arguing with me about seeing the doctor, or the way you challenged me tonight." I shake my head. "In fact, the more I think about it, the more I realize I've been going easy on you for too long. You've been pushing your limits with me more and more since your wolf woke, and I haven't been giving her what she needs, have I?" I inquire, still warming the fleshy canvas soon to suffer my itching palm's punishment.

Ella looks up at me with wide eyes, "I'm sorry, I promise I'll be good!"

However her wolf has other thoughts about this. Speak for yourself, why should we follow his rules if he's not even going to enforce them.

Would you shut up! Ella tells her wolf, either not realizing or not caring that I can hear this too. You're only making things worse.

The saucy canine shrugs with disinterest, and I know my instincts were right. Her wolf needs this as badly as my own. "Mmm, I think we might have to make this a nightly routine." I suggest, mostly joking because I want to see her reaction. "With such a naughty wolf at the helm, you're going to need all the correction I can provide."

Ella's jaw drops, but her thighs clench together, trying to ease the ache at their center. You wouldn't dare!

"Mm-hmm." I observe, slipping up her night dress and slowly pulling down her panties. When I see the pool of wetness soaking the cloth, I purr with satisfaction. "I can see how distasteful you find this idea."

When her own scent reaches her nose, Ella presses her hands over her blushing face. "You shouldn't tease me! I don't even know what's happening to me."

"It's okay baby, because I do." I promise, raising my hand to deliver the first of many swats. 'This is the way of wolves, it's only natural that you crave it.'

Ella jerks and cries out when the first spank lands, but her arousal spikes with her adrenaline as if the two are tethered. By the tenth spank she's begging me for mercy, with the twentieth she's lashing out and calling me names, fighting like a hellcat. By the thirtieth she slumps over my legs, crying pitifully even as the well of shared desire between us is all but overflowing.

When it's over I slip my hand between her legs, my fingers sinking into her wetness. I can't help but bring my fingers to my lips and suck her sweet honey from the digits. "Such a delicious, mate." My wolf croons, hovering at the surface of my skin. Ella moans with embarrassment but rocks her hips into my hand as my fingers return to her center. It barely takes anything to make her come, she's already so turned on. "Good girl." I praise her, continuing to stroke her tight sheath as she comes down from her high. 'Think you can take some more?'

Ella shudders and nods, and I slide my legs out from under her. I move behind her and pull her up onto her knees. I free my hard member and drive myself to the hilt in my mate with a single thrust, making her cry out with the sensation of being so deeply impaled at the same time as my hips collide with her red bottom.

I take her fast and hard, eventually pulling her back up to my chest so that I strum her clit and sink my fangs into my mark as we both cry out in ecstasy. I spill myself into her body, as she clenches and clamps around me, tears streaming down her cheeks at the overwhelming sensations.

Afterwards, when her tiny body is tucked against mine and my hand rests on her pregnant belly, our son rolls around in her womb, pressing his hands and feet against the wall of her uterus in ways that make her gasp and murmur with something between surprise and discomfort. I suppose he was roused by our activity, but when I reach through the bond all I sense from the pup is tranquility. He likes it when his Mommy is so euphoric and content, and he likes feeling my touch.

I know Ella can feel it too, and as she regains the ability to speak, she turns her head over her shoulder. She grins up at me, overflowing with love and triumph. "I knew I could get you to come to bed."

"Oh," I beam in return. "Is that what this was? Did you pull one over on me, trouble?" I tease, tapping her red bottom.

Ella hisses and pulls away, her cheeks flushing crimson. "Well, not the way I planned to." She admits sheepishly. "But it worked all the same."

"Such a clever, sly little mate." I praise her, knowing that while she may not have been expecting this particular outcome, but appreciating that she's right. If she hadn't come to get me I would still be sitting out in the living area watching that horrible footage. I need my rest to win this war, and my beloved Ella found a way to make sure I got some sleep. My last thought before I fall asleep – is how lost I would be without her, and how fucking grateful I am that I don't ever have to be without her again.

Chapter 155 – The Vanaran Capital

Ella

When I walk into breakfast the next morning, I have to try and hide my wince as I sit down. My bottom is sore and stings when it meets the chair, but the bite of pain also sends a pulse of heat through my body, calling up the memories of what came next.

I feel my mate's eyes on me, and when I look up, Sinclair is watching me with a knowing smirk. He looks so wolfish in this moment that I find myself wondering how I ever thought he was anything but a ruthless predator. Is there a problem, trouble? He asks in my head.

I don't know what you're talking about. I sniff, turning my nose up at him.

This earns only a smug chuckle in reply, and I have to fight to hide my blush. "Well you two certainly found each other." The king observes warmly. "You'd think there wasn't anyone else in the room."

Feeling a spark of inspiration, I jolt, "Oh, your majesty, when did you get here?" The entire table laughs, and Sinclair slides his hand onto my thigh, sending zings of pure affection through our bond.

"Please call me Gabriel, Ella. There are no formalities in my household." The King replies, smiling widely. "How did you sleep last night?"

"Very well." I answer happily, and the steady weight of Sinclair's hand shifts as his fingers begin to trace circles on my inner thigh.

As we continue making small talk he slides his hands even higher, slipping right up my skirt between my legs. No one would ever know from looking at him that he's doing anything under the table, but he can barely smother his hungry growl when he realizes I'm not wearing panties. Going commando, you bad girl?

I didn't intend to, but when I tried putting on my panties the fabric just irritated my... skin. It's a struggle even to get the words out. I can feel my skin heating with excitement and embarrassment, shocked by my own daring. I can't believe he's touching me this way with so many people around us, when we could be discovered at any moment.

Oh come on, Sinclair teases, circling my clit. You can do better than that.

My heart rate is increasing, and I'm sure the others can hear it, surely Sinclair isn't going to actually continue this teasing. If it goes on much longer everyone will be able to smell my desire. Before I can think to reply, the King speaks again, pulling our attention away from one another. "I do hope you'll join our tour of the city today, now that you're off bed rest.”

“I can’t wait.” I answer honestly. I’d been jealous when he first offered to take our group around today and show us the capital, assuming that I wouldn’t be able to join. Now I can’t wait. After everything we’ve been through, we could use some normalcy – even if it’s only for a day.

“You’ll have to take notes of your favorite things so you can tell me all about them later.” He tells me, and I blink in surprise.

“You mean you aren’t coming?” I clarify, my wolf whining with unhappiness. He sends back a silent purr, and I lash out at the comforting sound.

“I wish I could, sweetheart.” Sinclair frowns. “But I have too much work to do. The news last night... things are even worse than I feared.”

“I know everything is terrible, Dominic. I was just excited to spend the day with you.” I reply, giving him my best puppy dog eyes. “When was the last time we got to be out together without the campaign looming over us, have we ever?”

Sinclair’s wolf groans in my head. “Don’t give me that look, baby. I can’t stand it.” His hand goes still, retreating from my intimate flesh to rest on my thigh. “Every minute counts here. Every second we waste is another moment the people in the united pack suffer. Mere minutes could be the difference between life and death for too many to count.”

“But you can’t help them if you burn out, Dominic.” I argue, recalling the wave of appreciation he’d sent to me last night just before we fell asleep. I’m fully embracing my duty to help my mate decompress and find small ways to feel in control amidst chaos.

“Your mate is right, Dorn.” Gabriel echoes, “You all have been through far too much. You need to take a breather so that you can come back for your people stronger than ever.”

Sinclair looks as though he doesn’t like this idea one bit. His face closes off, and I can feel his stubborn wolf digging in his heels. “I appreciate what you’re both saying, and I can even acknowledge that there’s some truth in it. But being able to disconnect is a privilege the Moon Valley wolves simply don’t have right now, and I wouldn’t be able to forgive myself if I did when they need me most.”

“Son, you should listen to your mate.” Henry sighs. “At the rate your going you’ll run yourself into the ground before the week is out.”

Sinclair only frowns deeper, and his hands close into fists. “I appreciate your concern but-”

"If you appreciate our concern then listen, Dorn." Roger interjects.

I can feel his frustration rising, and the higher and higher it builds, the more uneasy I become. Sinclair abruptly slams one of his fists on the table before opening and closing his mouth. In the end he pushes away from the table and storms out without another word. I know he doesn't have his wolf in control and he's leaving to avoid lashing out, but I follow him anyway.

"Ella let him go," Hugo advises, "He needs to work through this alone."

I pause in the doorway, looking back at my father in law. "I have to." I shrug, before stalking after my mate.

I find him in our suite, pacing back and forth, breath heaving. I suspect he wants to shift, he came up to our forest sanctuary to try and satisfy his inner animal, so that he wouldn't be forced to take off on a time consuming run. He looks up when I enter, "You don't want to be around me right now, little wolf."

"Yes I do." I reply, swaying my hips as I glide forward. "I always want to be around you."

"This isn't a game, Ella." Sinclair growls. "I'm this close to losing it." He shares, holding his finger and thumb an imperceptible distance from one another.

"So lose it." I order. "How many times have I lost it around you?"

"That's different." My mate grumbles, "you losing it isn't a threat to me."

"You won't hurt me." I say confidently, moving closer even as he scowls at me. "I can feel your love for me too strongly and I'm not made of glass."

Sinclair huffs, "I know that, but-"

"Lose it." I press, putting some force behind the words now. "Tell me what you're thinking."

I can see it the moment he snaps, the moment his resolve gives way. He snarls and glares at me as the words are wrenched from his lips. "I'm thinking that it's easy for Gabriel and my father and brother to sit there and tell me what to do, when they're not the ones who are responsible for a pack in crisis. I'm thinking that you shouldn't be worrying about me and the fact that you are means I'm failing you! I hate that I can't spend time with you when we're so newly mated, that I'm missing out on seeing you create a miracle." He continues, gesturing to my midsection.

Sinclair continues to vent, getting louder and louder with every word. "I hate everything that led us to this place. I hate having to sit by and do nothing, because war takes time. I'm thinking I should have stayed and fought, even if there was no chance of winning. I'm thinking I'm a traitor for abandoning my people." He pauses, looking so feral I honestly feel a little afraid. "And I'm thinking that if Damon were in front of me now I would rip off his manhood, then rip off his fingers and toes one at a time. And I'd keep going that way until he was just a headless torso, but I'd keep him alive for as long as possible to maximize his suffering."

He throws the last words out in a fit of rage, and after he just glowers at me, heaving in ragged breaths of air. Sinclair's heartbeat is pounding and I can feel his wolf's erratic energy, his worry about frightening me. At the same time, I can feel the tension draining out of him like a valve just opened and sucked out all the toxic energy from his veins. He's watching me closely, waiting for a response, and I slowly approach him. "Feel better?" I ask, knowing very well how cathartic it can be to simply shout your grievances to the heavens, even if nothing comes of it.

Sinclair shakes his head and offers me an exasperated laugh. "Yes, you impossible thing," He confesses, dragging one powerful hand through his hair. His entire mood transforms before my eyes, "I do, are you happy?"

"I'm happy if you're happy." I murmur, sliding closer and wrapping my arms around him, "You aren't failing me. But if you don't give yourself a break, then you're going to end up failing the very people you're fighting for." I profess, and just in case, I add. "Besides, are you really going to let your breeding mate wander around a strange city without you? Who knows what terrible things might happen to me."

Sinclair chuckles and claims my lips, "Alright trouble, you win – just this once."

Chapter 156 – Sightseeing

The Vanaran capital feels like a different planet. Everywhere we look crystals tower over us, carved into the most intricate forms I've ever seen.

The shifters populating the city are friendly and open in their curiosity, and we frequently stop so Gabriel can chat with the locals and introduce us.

It's all so easy and peaceful, no lies, no secrets, just wolves living openly together in harmony. Watching Gabriel, I see a leader who is strong but compassionate, ruthless but open-minded.

He's intelligent and has as much raw power as my own mate, though he lacks Sinclair's dangerous edge. I expect Gabriel would be quite deadly if pushed, but he's much more easy going than my own brooding Alpha.

Then again, he's not the one exiled and preoccupied with planning a revolution. Still, for a moment I envision a future world where Sinclair is the King of the united packs, and Damon's regime is a long-forgotten nightmare.

In my heart I know this is the kind of society my mate could create as leader; Gabriel's utopian world could be our own, if only we could take back our home.

Maybe it's naive to think a traumatized society could recover completely and achieve this sort of easy comfort...After all it's not like Sinclair could simply snap his fingers and undo all the suffering caused by his predecessor.

No, if we can win this war we'll have a monumental task ahead of us in terms of healing and rebuilding the united packs, and earning the trust of an oppressed people.

But I believe that if anyone can achieve this goal, it's Sinclair. I turn to look up at the man in question, so inspired by this vision that I want to share my hope with him.

However when I see his face he looks a million miles away. His granite jaw is clenched and his gaze is hawkishly scanning our surroundings.

He manages to smile and greet the various people we meet, but his grip on my waist never loosens, and he never loses the hardness in his eyes.

I lean into his side as a cool breeze flutters through the square, carrying the scent of rain. "What good is coming out if you're not going to actually be present?"

I inquire, poking his muscular chest. The huge Alpha looks down at me with dry amusement, closing his powerful hand around my offending finger.

“I said I would come along, I didn’t promise to forget my worries.” “That’s cheating.” I inform him, narrowing my eyes to a scowl. “Is it now?”

He asks, arching his brow in response to my accusation. “Need I remind you that you’re the one who pointed out how dangerous unfamiliar territories can be? Especially for mischievous little wolves too clever and too brave for their own good.”

“You agreed to take a break.” I counter, ignoring the bait he put out for my wolf, and laying a bit of my own. “And if you get to break your promises then I don’t see why I should have to keep my own.”

I know he doesn’t need more explanation. Before we left Gabriel’s palace Dominic made me vow to stay close to him, never go out of sight and tell him the moment I sensed anything off.

I knew he was just being cautious — and rightly so after everything we’ve been through, but now those same promises are providing me with the perfect button to push.

Sinclair growls, his wolf is naturally responding to my own, and in an instant I realize that the best way to get my mate out of his shell, is to do it literally.

“Ella—”

Sinclair warns, using my name as if it’s an admonishment. “We should shift.” I suggest, cutting him off. “Half the people here are in their wolf form.” I say, gesturing to the people cowering around us.

It’s true, it seems the Vanarans are so comfortable and secure in their secret lands that they feel no danger shifting in public, let alone in broad daylight. “Your wolf is too inexperienced to be around so many strangers.” Sinclair cautions, shaking his head.

“It’s not a good idea.”

My wolf doesn’t care for this one bit. Now that I’ve made shifting a possibility, she’s clawing at my skin, begging to get out.

Yes, yes, yes! Freedom! Sinclair grips my nape, I said no, mate. Too late! My wolf sings defiantly, and my body shudders as the painful shift begins.

Cursing, Sinclair shields me as I tremble, jerk and whimper through the next few minutes.

It’s over quickly, and soon I’m sitting in front of him as my wolf, my dress in tatters on the ground.

I wag my tail as I look up at my mate, who stands there with his arms crossed over his chest, disapproval rolling off of him in waves.

I jump up and brace my paws on his rock-hard abs, wishing I was tall enough to lick the frown right off his face.

Instead I swipe my tongue over his neck and nuzzle his chest with my snout, Come on, Dominic.

Come play with me! I beg, Please, please, please.

I am not amused by this, Ella.

His grumpy voice sounds in my mind.

Ignoring him, I jump down and bound around his legs, nudging him and repeating my pleading over and over.

It's around the time that I nip his ankles that the stoic Alpha finally caves, his massive wolf bursting free with a roar.

My wolf is in charge, and she only wants to celebrate.

Yay!!! She cries, pouncing on him the moment the shift is complete.

Sinclair's foreboding energy is tinged with humor now, and I know I've won.

We wrestle and play for a moment before he pins me beneath him, plopping his heavy body down on mine so that I'm completely trapped.

Is this what you wanted, trouble? He teases, mouthing my neck affectionately.

No, I want to run! I whine, squirming under him but finding myself stuck.

Hmm, I don't know.

I kind of like having you right here, your little paws in the air, completely at my mercy.

He informs me huskily.

Your mercy to do what? Suffocate me? I complain, trying to dislodge his enormous form.

How can anyone be this heavy? Sinclair doesn't budge one bit from my efforts, but he does release my neck and shift his weight so he can investigate my belly with his nose.

Look at this tummy.

He croons, ignoring my outraged question and burying his snout in the downy white fur.

So soft, so precious.

Despite myself, the baby sends something that feels like laughter to us both, and I melt, wanting more of this.

I suppose now that Sinclair is out of his head and in a playful mood I shouldn't mind that he's lying on my like a living wolf rug. I should just let my mate enjoy himself at my own expense...at least, the human part of my brain can acknowledge this.

My wolf on the other hand, she's still dying to run.

Dominic come on, let me up! She moans.

I want to play.

We are playing.

He replies slyly.

This is a game I like to call pin the naughty mate. Don't you like it? No! I respond indignantly.

"You two do realize we're in the middle of the street, right?"

Roger observes, appearing in my periphery and interrupting my outraged reply.

Don't look at me.

Sinclair says to us both. She started it.

Dominic, it's not fair! I've barely ever shifted, I just want to run around a little! I say, trying to sound pitiful.

Can't you feel how much I need it? The black beast stares down at me with glowing eyes, and I can feel him reaching through the bond to sense my emotions.

His sharp eyes soften then, and he swipes a few licks over my face.

Alright trouble, but you're going to stay with me, right? He questions, rising off of me so I can regain my feet.

That depends.

I hedge, feeling a rush of excitement as a new idea strikes me.

I dance away from my mate and his brother, unsurprised when the former prowls after me with a hungry look in his eyes.

Depends on what? Sinclair inquires, his voice dark and deep.

On whether you can keep up! I take off before the words are even out of my mouth, and Sinclair immediately gives chase, responding to my challenge out of instinct rather than thought.

I can't contain a gleeful giggle as I take off through the streets, and though Sinclair catches up to me quickly, he doesn't pounce again He runs alongside me, even when I playfully bump into his side to try and throw him off course.

He simply nips at my heels and spurs me to run faster.

I feel like a child again, so utterly free that I might as well be flying.

When I reach out to sense my mate's feelings, I find his heart and mind open for once, completely consumed by this moment.

He's not thinking of anything else but this moment, and pride fills me for a job well done. Maybe I can do this Luna thing after all

Chapter 157 – Cora Confides in Roger

Cora Confides in Roger

3rd Person

As Sinclair and Ella raced away through the winding streets of the Vanaran capital, Roger found his gaze lingering on Cora. The human was staring after her sister in amazement, as if she couldn't believe her own eyes. The wind fluttered through her black hair, carrying her now-familiar scent to the rugged wolf.

Roger had been sticking close to Cora ever since they fled Moon Valley. When he first turned up on her doorstep telling her they had to flee the territory, she'd been too stunned to respond. He'd ended up packing a bag for her while she looked on in shocked silence, only speaking in response to direct questions. In the car he and Henry had explained the situation to her in as much depth as they could manage, but he could feel her fear as if it was his own. It called to his protective instincts, and he felt a strange affinity for this woman – like him, she was watching her younger sibling take the world by storm, and though she never expressed any dissatisfaction with her lot in life, Roger did wonder.

Moving beside her, Roger watched as the frolicking pair became no more than tiny dots in the distance, "Amazing, isn't it?" He remarked, startling the preoccupied woman. "A month ago we didn't even think she had a wolf – and now this."

Cora shook her head, "I can't even wrap my head around it. I've known Ella my whole life... and she's always been different, but I thought that was just... Ella being Ella."

"What do you mean?" Roger inquired curious now.

Her mouth stretches into a wry smile. "I don't need to tell you what it's like growing up in someone's shadow." She murmured after a thoughtful beat. "And don't get me wrong, Ella made incredible sacrifices for me, she cared for me through thick and thin. But I'd be lying if I said I never resented her for being so much better at everything, for being strong or brave enough to face the things I couldn't." Cora paused, clamping her eyes shut for a moment with obvious regret. "I'm not proud of it but sometimes I even blamed her for protecting me rather than letting me suffer – how's that for ungrateful?"

Roger shrugged. "It's natural to want to fight your own battles." He empathized, catching her gaze, "and just because you aren't proud of a feeling doesn't make it invalid."

Cora's eyes widened slightly as Roger's eyes bored into her own, and she felt a slight flutter of excitement in her tummy. When had anyone ever watched her so intently? As if they were looking straight through her to the very core of her being? Roger's wolf perked up when he sensed a spark of interest in Cora's chocolate eyes, and he shifted closer as she forged on. "Well either way it makes sense now." She continued. "Why Ella always seemed to draw people to her like a magnet, why she was always the smartest, strongest and fastest even though she's the size of a doll."

"I get that." Roger nodded, looking after Sinclair and Ella one more time before turning away and encouraging Cora to do the same. "But making sense doesn't make seeing it any less surreal."

"You can say that again." Cora chuckled, wondering why she'd followed the man's movements so naturally. "And the funny thing is that the wolf isn't even the strangest part – it's how different she is with Dominic."

"How so?" Roger asked, leading Cora towards an ice cream parlor with a firm hand on the small of her back.

"In the best way." Cora smiled, though it didn't entirely reach her eyes. Roger didn't know Ella and Cora's full story, but he knew enough to realize there were some skeletons in their closets. He was sure he was seeing some now, some past darkness that hung over the sisters even in their happiest moments. "I always knew our lives... the way we grew up... took a toll on Ella, but she's always kept it bottled up. She's never trusted anyone enough to rely on them and she's never known how to open up or be vulnerable."

As they stepped into the shop, Roger processed this information with dawning understanding. If there was one thing he knew about his baby brother, it's that Sinclair would never stand for his mate keeping him at a distance or facing her troubles alone. "I knew all that, but I didn't realize how it weighed her down... trapped her. The Ella I grew up with wasn't playful or free-spirited. She was brave, defiant and darkly funny at times, but this Ella? The one who throws off her humanity in the street and goes running off into the sunset to play, even though the world around us is on fire?" Cora shakes her head. "No one deserves such happiness more than Ella, and I hate that I've never seen this side of her before now."

They hovered in the doorway of the parlor, and Roger studied Cora closely, trying to read between the lines of her words. "Do you feel guilty? That you weren't able to bring out this side of her?"

Cora huffed a sardonic laugh. "I feel guilty for a lot of things," she confessed ominously. "But not this. She needed to find her mate in order to feel safe coming out of her shell. That's not something I was ever going to be able to do for her."

"And you?" Roger asked slyly, guiding her to the service counter. "What would it take to make you come out of your shell?"

Cora blinked at him in surprise. "What makes you think I haven't already?"

Roger chuckled, taking notice when Cora blushed bright pink at the sound. "A lifetime of experience." He finally answered vaguely.

"Well it's not exactly easy." Cora hedged. "I'm on the run in a country I didn't even know existed until yesterday."

Roger flashed his fangs, "So? That's not stopping your sister."

"My sister is drunk on love." Cora reminded him. "Dreams she never even knew she had are coming true left and right."

"And your dreams?" Roger pressed, his demeanor growing more and more predatory by the moment. He wasn't sure what it was about this human, but the more she spoke the more intriguing he found her. The more he wanted to push her buttons, just to see how she'd react.

"What can I get you?" The teenager behind the ice cream counter was smiling at them, completely oblivious that he was interrupting a conversation Roger was finding increasingly fascinating. Cora, on the other hand, was more than happy to jump at the distraction. They ordered, and Roger followed Cora to a table out front, keeping his father and Gabriel in his periphery. The old Alpha and the King were in deep conversation, and though Roger felt he might be slacking off his pack duties, he simply couldn't drag his wolf's focus from the human.

"So what do you think of all this?" Cora asked when he sat down, gesturing to the glittering city surrounding them.

Roger chuckled, "You can't throw me off the scent that easily, Cora." He liked the feel of her name on his tongue, and he rolled it this way and that – almost experimentally – before finally releasing the final syllable. The sound seemed to surprise Cora too, who smothered a shiver.

"I don't know what you mean." Cora lied, earning a low rumble from the wolf seated across her. Her jaw dropped in outrage. "Are you growling at me?"

"That's what happens when people lie to me." Roger informed her coolly, arching a brow.

"Oh like you're so perfect?" Cora accused, crossing her arms over her chest. "I know you were working with the Prince against your own family. You expect me to believe you never lied to further your political games."

“And now you’re shifting the focus onto me,” He observed. “I won’t deny the wrongs of my past, but if you expect me to talk about them then I expect your honesty in exchange.”

Cora, thoroughly frazzled and both affronted and excited by the shifter’s behavior, pushed back from her chair. “Look I don’t know why you think you have the right to speak to me this way, but as far as I’m concerned, I don’t owe you anything – least of all my honesty.”

“No? I did save your life just a few days ago.” Roger reminded her, a spark of mischief in his dark eyes.

“Only because Dominic asked you to.” Cora argued, “don’t pretend you would have thought about me otherwise.”

Roger dipped his head in acknowledgement. “You may have a point.” He acceded, but as he continued his eyes flashed with his wolf “but make no mistake, little human, that’s the last time I’ll ever fail to think of you again.”

Cora, unsure what to do or how to interpret this, turned on her heel, and fled.

Chapter 158 – Refugees

Ella

“What do you mean, you lost my sister?” I demand, baring my fangs at Roger. Sinclair is holding me by the waist, preventing me from lunging at his brother the way my wolf is currently demanding.

Roger held his hands up in defense. “She’s probably back at the palace. We were talking and she got annoyed with me and left.”

“Then why didn’t you follow her? She is the only human on an entire continent of wolves, and you just let her run off on her own?” I hiss, lashing out with my claws. Sinclair purrs and takes a step back, causing my hands to swipe through nothing but air. “She doesn’t know her way around or have any contacts here!”

“You ought to give her more credit. She’s a big girl, Ella.” Roger tells me, with infuriating confidence. “She’s also known about and been working with shifters a lot longer than you have. She’s used to being the only human in the room.”

“How dare you tell me how to feel or think about my sister. She is my sister, not yours. You don’t know the first thing about her.” I accuse, getting more annoyed by the minute. “Why I oughta—”

“Alright trouble, why don’t we go back to the palace and make sure Cora is home safe. If she isn’t we can go out looking, and I’ll even let you beat up Roger. How does that sound?” Sinclair suggests, his lips moving against my ear.

“I heard that.” Roger informs us, thoroughly exasperated.

“Can I still beat him up, even if she is back at the palace?” I inquire, batting my eyelashes at my mate and ignoring the impudent wolf in front of us.

“Hmm, I’ll think about it.” Sinclair promises, kissing my upturned lips. Besides, Cora isn’t the only one who ran off into the unknown today. I think maybe you’ve been a bad influence on her. He adds in my head, his voice more than a little sultry.

My jaw drops at this accusation as I turn to face him. He immediately pulls me close, even as I protest. That isn’t fair! I haven’t learned to control my wolf yet.

Sinclair’s dark chuckle rolls through my mind, don’t pretend like it was an accident, little mate. I know you too well.

Big bully. I accuse, nibbling his pec and delivering a particularly sharp nip when his emerald eyes meet mine.

I know I'm pushing my luck, and I don't care. After so much running, playing and flirting, we both need a release. As soon as we locate Cora I fully expect Sinclair to close us in our suite and not emerge until morning. I'm eager and ready for him already, and the knowledge that our love making will keep his mind off the war is only a bonus. Making Sinclair take a day off requires constant and continuous effort – and I'm more than happy to let my body pay the toll.

Luckily Cora is waiting at the Palace when we return, though she won't tell me about what happened with Roger no matter how many times I ask. Eventually Sinclair drags me away and, thanks to his ravenous wolf, I soon forget my anger with his brother. In fact, he works me over so well that I can barely remember my own name by the time we're done. I can only lay sprawled over his chest, near comatose as he strokes my spine and whispers sweet nothings in my ear – some more scandalous than others.

My eyelids grow heavy, and I try to push myself up, painfully aware that if I fall asleep Sinclair will probably go back to work. Sinclair's arm locks around me, and I whine with annoyance. "Let me up, Dominic."

"You were projecting your thoughts again, trouble." Sinclair informs me, encouraging me to settle. "You need your rest and you're not going to lose it for my sake."

Damned bond. I think bitterly, and his growly laugh wraps around me like the coziest blanket. "Will you at least nap with me?" I request, too exhausted to argue, let alone actually move. If I were as enormous as my mate then lying on top of him might just trap him in bed, but I know that's not the case. Instead I have to hope that I can snuggle in so completely that he won't want to risk waking me by moving.

Such a mischievous little wolf. Sinclair teases, nothing but praise in his deep voice. I'll rest for a while, but I can't promise I'll stay for the whole nap.

Realizing this is the best deal I can probably hope for, I surrender, falling asleep to the sound of my mate's purrs.

When I wake my body is sated and sore, but I'm alone in bed. I glance at the clock and realize I napped most of the afternoon. Even so, I know I'll probably crash again in a few hours. I rub my baby bump with a sigh. "I love you, angel. But these constant naps of yours do get in the way of Mommy's diabolical plans."

Oh sure, blame the pup. My wolf jokes, Never mind the Alpha who pleasures you into a coma every few hours.

She has a point. If I didn't know any better I might think Sinclair was using sex to exhaust me, but this is the way it's always been with his wolf. He never seems to get enough of me, and I know he wouldn't turn his attention from the war at all if he could help it. This is pure instinct, and I'm not complaining one bit.

I pull on a robe and wander into the other room, where I can hear my mate talking with Hugo, Henry, Roger and Gabriel. Sinclair's eyes lock onto me the moment I walk in the room, following my movements with total focus. I yawn and stretch as I approach, unwittingly emitting a sleepy moan, and I see Sinclair's pupils expand with desire. You're playing a dangerous game to tempt me in front of all of these wolves, sweet mate. Flaunting your delectable curves, those sexy little sounds. His wolf is clearly taking over, and I feel a rush of pride that I can affect him this way.

I'm just stretching. My wolf mutters back honestly, as I crawl into Sinclair's lap. He welcomes me with open arms, wrapping me in a tight embrace and kissing me hello— as if we're the only ones in the room. I can feel his hardness digging into my bottom, which still stings from my earlier discipline – but it's a delightful ache that sends pulses of heat straight to my core. If we're not careful the entire room might soon know just how out of control our libidos have become since we mated. It might not surprise or bother them, but I still have enough human hang ups to try and avoid it at all costs.

Luckily, Sinclair doesn't seem any more interested in putting on a show than I am. How was your nap? Sinclair inquires, changing the subject.

Lonely. I complain. I fell asleep all warm and safe and satisfied, and then I woke up cold and alone.

Poor baby. Sinclair croons, caressing my round belly. You know I would have liked nothing more than to stay and snuggle with you.

But more important things came up? I sniff, playing up my pitiful tone.

Nothing is more important to me than you and Rafe. Sinclair rumbles fiercely, softening his tone as he reluctantly continues. But there were more pressing things, yes.

I'm not sure how to respond. Of course I know that the war is more pressing than anything else, and it's not that I'm not heartbroken or worried. I was just so pleased that I'd been able to convince Sinclair to give himself a break,

"Sweetheart." He says aloud, pulling my attention from my thoughts. "Refugees from the continent started arriving in Vanara today. Gabriel is working on setting up shelters, but things are escalating quickly. We've been discussing plans for me to travel north and meet with the other rulers here... to start trying to build alliances and pool resources."

"Oh." I murmur softly, "are the other rulers here likely to be sympathetic to our cause?"

Gabriel speaks first. "I think they will. The noble ones will want to help their fellow wolves. The selfish will fear Damon getting powerful enough to try and expand his empire here into Vanara, or at least worry about the strain of taking in a continent's worth of refugees. I think there's a very strong chance you'll be able to garner the backing you require."

"That's good." I assess, yawning again. "So when do we leave?"

Sinclair's mouth tightens, and one by one the other men rise from the table and leave the room. I know this isn't a good sign, but I don't want to contemplate what it might mean. Of course, that knowledge can't be avoided. Sinclair cups my face in his huge palm, stroking my cheek with the pad of his thumb. "Ella, it's clear I have to go... but I'm not sure if I can take you with me."

Chapter 159 – Separation

Separation

Ella

“What do you mean, you might not take me with you?” I demand, barely processing Sinclair’s words. “We’re mated, where you go I go.”

“Baby, I don’t want to be away from you.” Sinclair sighs, sending a wave of genuine regret through our bond. This isn’t the first time he’s done this – let me feel his emotions to confirm their veracity, but this is the strongest I’ve ever experienced them. With the help of our connection, I can sense how terribly Sinclair hates the idea of leaving me behind when he travels. It’s making his wolf positively rabid with anger, worry, and sadness. Even as the emotions are filtering in, I can already see a way to use them to my advantage. If he feels this strongly, surely it won’t be too difficult to convince him to take me with him.

“The problem is that I have no idea what I’m walking into with a lot of these meetings.” Sinclair explains. “I’ve been to Vanara before, and know a few of the Alphas, but most of the packs I’m visiting are complete unknowns. I don’t know the territories or threats, I don’t know how rough the conditions will be or how well we’ll be received when we arrive.”

“How much time are we talking about?” I question, needing to get a handle on the scope of this potential separation.

“Weeks, maybe a month.” He shakes his head, and I can feel his frustration. “I’ve been trying to figure out which terrifies me more, taking you with me and putting you in danger as a result, or leaving you behind where I can’t get to you if something happens.”

“It’s definitely safer to have me with you.” I inform my mate confidently. “You’re the one who said the only time I’m truly safe is when I’m in your arms.”

Sinclair laughs warmly, squeezing me closer. “Why do I feel like you’re not the most objective opinion on this?”

“Because you’re so blinded by your love for me that you assume I’m in the same boat, but don’t worry because I am completely unbiased.” I declare, shifting to straddle his lap.

“Oh, so you aren’t blinded by your love for me?” Sinclair teases, stroking my sides.

“It’s different.” I hedge, “I’m not exactly sure how at this moment, but there’s no doubt in my mind that it is.”

“You do know that being adorable won’t make me change my mind, don’t you?” Sinclair asks gently, grazing his knuckles over my cheek.

“That makes it sound as if you’ve already decided.” I murmur, my insides tangling into knots. My wolf whimpers in my head, and before I can think about whether or not I’d shared the sound with my mate, he responds in a way that guarantees he did. He begins to purr, gathering me to his chest and tucking my head under his chin.

“I haven’t decided anything yet. I’m honestly very conflicted, Ella.” Sinclair admits. “I’m leaning towards leaving you here with Gabriel, Roger and Dad. I trust them and I trust the security here. I want you with me, I just can’t help but feeling it would be irresponsible... honestly it feels selfish, like I’m choosing my own comfort and happiness over your safety.”

“But I want to be with you too. So if it’s selfish, let’s be selfish together.” I beg. Pushing away from him, I make my eyes wide and push my lower lip out into a dramatic pout. “Please don’t leave me behind, Dominic.” I continue, trailing my hands down his chest as inspiration strikes. “My wolf won’t obey anyone else, you know I’ll just get into more trouble without you... and when I do there certainly won’t be anyone to bring me back in line.

A growl vibrates in Sinclair’s chest, so fierce the hair on the back of my neck stands on end. His hand closes over my nape a second later, applying just enough pressure to make me quiver with the instinct to submit. “I have news for you, trouble. If I do go without you, I’ll have the others keep track of all your mischief so that I can hold you accountable when I get back.”

I fight back a shiver as his authority washes over me, so I change track. “Fine, but if you’re not here then who will give me pleasure when I wake up in the middle of the night... aching for you?”

Sinclair laughs aloud, dragging my mouth to his. I gasp as our lips collide, and Sinclair takes the opportunity to slip his tongue inside, tangling it with my own. Only when my mouth is red and swollen, and I’ve forgotten our conversation entirely, does he release me. He keeps our eyes level, massaging my head through my thick rose gold tresses. I loll my head into his hand, and he takes the opportunity to dip his tongue into the hollow of my throat. “When that happens you’ll call me to your dreams, and tell me exactly what you need. And then I’ll happily ravish you to my heart’s content.”

“You mean my heart’s content?” I clarify.

“No. I meant exactly what I said.” He answers with a smirk.

I laugh and drop my head to his shoulder. “Alright, big bad wolf.” I concede, even as he continues to run his fingers through my long hair. “Just promise me you’ll think about this. We’ll both be happier together. We’ll both be less anxious. I’ll always be in your sight or reach. That’s worth a lot.”

“I’ll think about it.” Sinclair agrees. “There are a lot of advantages, I just need to make sure it’s right.”

“Thank you.” I exhale, so comfortable and cozy that I already feel as though I might doze off again. Maybe I’m being a wild optimist, but I truly think I’ve gotten through to my mate. I can feel how strongly he wants to take me with him, and I think this conversation went a long way to convincing him to trust those impulses.

The next day I go to visit some of the refugees arriving at the port. Sinclair stayed at the Palace to plan, but Henry, Roger, Cora and I set out with a contingent of Gabriel’s royal guards. The refugees are arriving in much the same way we did, cramming into small passenger planes carrying all their earthly belongings, arriving lost and depleted at the air base outside the city. Gabriel is trying to figure out where to send them all and has thus far been relying on local Vanarans who are willing to open their homes as shelter, but I’m determined to help – to find the best solutions possible for our people.

As we cross the Vanarium bridge spanning the crystalline waters of the lake, I can’t help but feel a renewed sense of awe at our stunning surroundings. However my admiration quickly fades when our cars pull up outside a group of large white tents erected to triage the incoming shifters. As I understand it, some of the refugees are arriving injured and in need of urgent medical care, others have been separated from their families, while others still are grieving the loss of their home and loved ones.

I try to brace myself for the harrowing experience ahead, only to become distracted by Cora’s incessant fidgeting beside me. It hasn’t escaped my notice that my sister is behaving very oddly today, she keeps shooting Roger wary looks, then pretending like he doesn’t exist if he returns the gesture. This morning she would fall silent or walk away if Roger came near us, and though my instincts aren’t sending up red flags about the interaction, I’d have to be blind to miss them.

So when we exit the car I sidle up to my brother-in-law, “Would you like to tell me why my sister keeps taking off like a startled hare every time you glance her way?” I mutter under my breath.

“I don’t think she’s a very big fan of mine.” He concedes.

“Why not? What did you do?” I inquire, unable to keep a note of accusation from my voice.

“Why do you assume I’m the one at fault?” Roger jokes, pretending to look affronted.

“Because I know my sister and I know you.” I snort, only partly serious. The truth is that my sister is as flawed as anyone, but I’m predisposed to take her side.

Roger shrugs. “We got to talking the other day, and I have the feeling she thought my questions were too personal.”

I pause, surveying him closely. There’s an odd note in his voice, one I haven’t heard before. For the first time it strikes me that Roger’s interest in Cora might not be entirely innocent. “What kind of questions?”

Roger laughs. “Nothing bad, I asked about her dreams and ambitions. I think she might be having a hard time with all this.” He says, gesturing around us. “Leaving her job and life in Moon Valley.”

A stab of guilt pierces me. Some sister I’ve been. I haven’t even checked in with Cora about how she’s doing. I’ve been so preoccupied with my own life and the war that I forgot that this transition won’t have been any easier for her. I make a note to talk to her as soon as possible – about fleeing and Roger’s interest. Still there’s no time for that now. There are dozens of wolves waiting to see us, and though I’m more than a little apprehensive about the sorrows and abuses to which I’m about to bear witness, I know my people deserve to have their stories heard. I have to be strong – I have to make my mate proud and do right by the pack, no matter what.

Chapter 160 – Refugees

Ella

I'd known it wasn't going to be easy. I was prepared to hear from grieving widows, wounded warriors, and heartbroken families. I was prepared to see their gruesome injuries and desolate faces, to hold their hands while they wept. I was not prepared for the orphans... or for the parents who lost their children.

When we first walked into the main tent, the refugees had been too caught up in their own worlds to notice us, but that quickly changed. As soon as they realized that not only the Vanaran King, but myself, Henry and Roger were present, they were on their feet, gathering around us in eager throngs. I'm not sure why it surprises me, but they seem even more thrilled to see me than the others, and soon a pink blush is covering my cheeks as they cry out my name.

"It's Ella! It's our Luna!" More than one wolf throws their arms around me, and despite everything these people have been through, they only express worry for me and Sinclair. "We're so glad you're all right. Is Alpha Dominic—"

"He's safe." I promise. "He's in the capital trying to build the war effort." I share, raising my voice so I can be heard over the melee. "

He would have come along to see you but he's spending all his time planning and trying to make alliances. He's determined to take back the continent from Damon before anyone else can be harmed ... but it's slow going."

Murmurs of understanding move through the crowd, and I'm ushered in to sit at the heart of the group. A hollow-eyed woman moves all the clothing and personal items from her cot so that I can sit down, ignoring my protests. Soon I'm seated in a large circle, with shifters gathered around on the floor or other cots. The people seem to want to hear the story of our escape, but I can't allow this.

"Dominic and I got out very early, because the Royal Army was on our doorstep. We don't know what's been going on at home except for the few videos people have managed to get out past the media blockade. What we need most is to hear from you, we need to know how the pack is doing, we need to know what we can do to help you feel at home here. And your stories can help us understand the situation on the ground so we can fight back where it counts."

The refugees exchange a few mournful glances, before they start speaking one by one. Over the next few hours I hear so many stories of tragic loss, violations and abuse, that it's all I can do not to fall to pieces. I listen with all my attention, trying not to steal focus by making a scene and crying like a baby, no matter how badly I want to. I thank the people for sharing their experiences, giving hugs and making notes for myself so I can work with Gabriel on finding places for all these people to stay.

I'm actually proud of how well I manage to keep it together, until we visit the tent where the orphans and unaccompanied children are staying. My first thought when I enter is that it's much, much too quiet. I believe any place where children reside should be loud and messy, chaotic with the energy and playfulness of little ones.

Instead I find a room full of pups who have aged well beyond their years in the last few days, and my heart cracks open in despair.

There are pups ranging from infancy to young teenagers here, though the group seems to skew younger overall. However, unlike the adults, the children don't seem to care that they have visitors, or even notice that we're here. There are neglected toys sitting in the middle of the tent, and when I can't get a single child to meet my gaze I simply go and sit down on the floor in front of a tower of blocks.

Gabriel, Henry, Roger and Cora stand at the entrance and watch me with baffled expressions, but I simply begin to play with the toys, first building a tower and then grabbing a couple of dolls and staging my own small-scale production of a popular fairy tale.

I'm sure I seem like I've lost my mind as I begin speaking in silly high pitched voices and ridiculous dialogue, but soon enough a small herd of hesitant pups have gathered around me. I pretend not to see them at first, then pause, "If only I had someone to play the witch." I muse aloud, tapping my finger to my lips.

"You could use this one." A little voice murmurs beside me, holding out a third doll. "That is an excellent idea." I agree, smothering my pleasure and pretending like this is no big deal. "But I only have two hands... do you think you could help me?"

The little girl balks slightly. "I dunno the story." "Well that's okay." I reason. "We can make up our own story. Sometimes that's the best thing to do when things don't go as planned."

She still looks hesitant, so I bounce one of the dolls in my hand over to her, pointing it in the direction of the offered doll. "Hmm, are you a good witch or a bad witch?" I say in the doll's silly voice.

The corner of the child's mouth twitches up, and then she drops her voice to it's lower octave and says, "I'm a bad witch of course, mwahaha."

I pry up each of my doll's hands so that they're raised in the air above it's head. "Aaaahhhh, it's a witch, it's a witch! What do we do! Somebody help!"

Right on cue, a little boy steps up and grabs a fourth doll, "Don't worry, I'll save you!" Now I do grin, and little by little the other children join into our game of make believe, until they're enjoying themselves so much that I'm able to back away and look on with the others.

I feel tears burn in my eyes as I watch them, but instead of tears of sadness these are tears of cold fury. I'm so angry at the man who caused so many little ones such pain, that suddenly my wolf is entertaining gorey fantasies of her own. I'm so caught up in my wrathful fantasies, that I almost don't notice a pale woman near the edge of the play area.

She's got great black circles beneath her eyes, and her arms are wrapped tightly around her body. She's watching the children with an expression of such longing and heartbreak that my stomach roils. I have a terrible suspicion that I know her story, and I carefully approach beside her. "What's your name?" I inquire gently.

She was so caught up in the pups' game that her eyes jerk to me in surprise, then drop to my round belly almost as quickly. Something inside her hardens, and she barely grits out her name, " Isabel."

"I'm sorry that we're meeting in these circumstances, Isabel." I reply softly. "I'm Ella." "I know who you are." She answers, shooting me another sullen glance.

I debate what to say next. First I consider sharing the story of the day I thought I'd lost Rafe, and how unimaginable the pain was... but in the end I think my own happy ending might just remind her that she wasn't so lucky. Instead I nod towards the pups.

"These little ones need more than the volunteers here can provide, more than shelter and food." I sigh, letting my genuine concern and sadness bleed into my voice. "They need what they lost — love and nurturing, the protection of a parent." I watch Isabel closely, seeing the way the well of grief in her eyes deepens at my words. " I'm wondering whether you might be interested in helping here..."

Her eyes widen, but she still watches me with a begrudging expression, as if she's determined not to like me. "We could arrange a salary for you —"

"I don't need to be paid to care for orphaned pups." She snaps, affronted by the suggestion. I shrug. "You may not want it, but there may come a time when you could use the funds. We can put it aside for a rainy day."

She gives me a noncommittal shrug, then looks back to the pups, her longing tinged with hope now. "Go on." I encourage, "whether you want to think of it as a job or not, don't let your love go to waste. You have it to give, and they need it."

Isabel's lower lip trembles, and steps forward uncertainly. I can see that she wants it so badly she can taste it, and I try to nudge her forward with my nascent powers. Isabel pauses, casting a final glance over her shoulder. "I know what you're doing, you know."

"Then you know there's nothing to fear by accepting." I reply, not the least bit bothered by her scowl. I know what it's like to feel anger or jealousy for women with children when I didn't have any of my own, and I can only imagine the pain one must feel to have had a child taken, and how much deeper those feelings of resentment must run.

Still, as I watch the childless mother enter the circle of little ones, her entire demeanor transforming as she introduces herself to the pups, I feel a sense of profound rightness deep in my bones. When

Henry wheels up beside me, there's only one thought on my mind. "Dominic needs to see this. He needs to meet these people and hear their stories for himself. I'll never do them justice."

"I agree." Henry murmurs. "Though I doubt you'll find it easy to convince him." I set my shoulders, determination pumping through my veins. "Just watch me."

Chapter 161 – Approaching Sinclair

Ella

When we return to the palace I go straight upstairs to the office Sinclair has been using as his war room. Of course, there was a war room in his mansion back home too, but that one had been for the campaign, this one is only too literal.

When I walk into the tense space, I find my mate standing over a large diorama of the continent, a to-scale model of the territories, terrain and cities of our homeland. Tiny figures are scattered throughout the lifelike reproduction, forming armies, groups of civilians, rogues and refugees. A group of warriors surround the table supporting the miniature world, listening as Hugo delivers the evenings brief.

“Our spies report that despite their alliances during the campaign, Damon’s armies have now turned against rogue forces in the neutral territories.

Apparently his conquest of the united packs is complete enough that he’s able to turn his attention to other threats, and he’s not hesitating to do just that.” Hugo explains. “Any resistance in the packs has gone underground because of his severe crackdown, and more and more shifters are attempting to escape. These are mostly those who have reason to fear the Prince due to their politics or status in the pack, but others flee for no other reason than the loss of their homes and loved ones. The people recognize that any future under Damon’s rule is bound to be bleak, so they’re leaving instead.”

“I can’t believe he’s done so much in so little time.” One of the warriors pipes up. I recognize the man as Sinclair’s third now that Gabriel is gone, but I can’t quite recall his name. Philip? Phelan? Phineas?

‘To your point, Philippe, Damon has moved very quickly. He hasn’t just gone after the Alpha council and their betas, he’s been taking out the elders in each pack as well, plus any wolves that might be strong enough to make a claim for Alpha. He’s eliminated any and all competition, created a power vacuum everywhere but on the throne. It’s nothing new in terms of authoritarianism, but it’s damned effective.”

“Do we know if any of the elders have survived?” Sinclair inquires, his handsome face twisted into a grimace.

“If they have then they’re in hiding or attempting to escape.” Hugo sighs.” Essentially anyone who might have helped us has gone radio silent out of fear of detection, and rightly so.”

“So basically we’re on our own.” Sinclair assesses gravely, “Even if we can dredge up some alliances in Vanara, we’re likely going to be going in blind when we return home.”

I feel a pang of deep sympathy for my mate, one I apparently sent through the bond, because no sooner have I processed the feeling than Sinclair's head jerks towards the door, eyes searching. I realize he was so focused on the task at hand that he didn't even realize we'd entered, and I try not to feel a sting of hurt. How can I possibly blame him for being preoccupied with all this going on?

Hiding from me, trouble? His voice sounds in my head, and I immediately understand why he might suspect this.

I'm standing behind Roger and Gabriel, completely blocked from view. There's also a fan directly across from us, blowing our scents down the hall rather than allowing them to permeate the small space. Of course not.

I reply, wishing I could go climb into his arms. We just got back.

Any doubt I'd felt about my place among Sinclair's priorities disappears when the meeting comes to a stand still for our exchange, and the next thing I know his fierce gaze is ordering the men in front of me to move so I might pass. I slip between them and try not to blush under the scrutiny of so many wolfish eyes, melting into Sinclair's side as he tucks me under his arm. I feel calmer at once, filled with his warmth and surrounded by his muscular embrace.

Only once Sinclair has turned my face up to kiss me senseless, does the meeting continue. I'm a bit surprised that my overprotective mate is allowing me to be part of such a stressful and disturbing briefing, but I'm also grateful. I need to know what's going on for my own peace of mind and so that I can support my mate. It's right that I should be here.

I would be lying if I said the details I learned didn't weigh on me terribly, but soon enough Sinclair is leading me back to our forest suite, and it's all I can do to hold my tongue until we're alone. I have so much to tell him about my visit with the refugees, and I can't wait to take him back to the camp.

Of course, my mate seems to have little interest in talking when we're finally alone. Instead he pulls me into his arms and slams his mouth to mine with an urgency that frightens and delights me. Goddess I missed you, today. He admits in my thoughts. My wolf was furious that I let you go out into the city without me.

Hmm, just think about how furious he'd be if you went gallivanting around Vanara and left me here all by my lonesome. I reply saucily, nipping his lower lip with my fangs.

Sinclair growls and delves his tongue between my parted lips, gripping my hips and pressing me into his hardness, letting me feel how badly he needs me through physical exertion, as well as our bond. Careful little wolf, He warns. If I didn't know any better I'd think you were trying to manipulate me. I arch into him, my blood heating to a steady boil as he extracts kiss after kiss from my lips.

I would never dream of it. I answer, earning an indulgent chuckle from the ravenous predator.

Impudent mate. A little while ago I planned on convincing Sinclair to visit the refugees before climbing into my nest for a late afternoon nap, now those things are the farthest things from my mind. All I can think about now is joining with my mate, letting our two bodies become one and disappearing into the rapture of being claimed by this powerful Alpha.

Sinclair is always a fierce lover, but today he seems particularly on edge. I'm not sure if it was the meeting or my provocation, but I can tell he needs this even more badly than I do. He strips off my clothes right there in the entrance of our rooms, then lifts me into his arms and guides my legs around his waist, before pressing my bare back into the door. He's still fully clothed, but when I reach for the buttons of his shirt he merely grumbles and I instinctively retreat.

There is no foreplay, no dirty words or teasing. Instead Sinclair slips his hand between my legs to make sure I'm ready for him, before freeing his cock and driving himself deep. He takes me without restraint, fisting his hand in my long hair as he withdraws his full length before slamming back into me over and over again. His feral need is contagious, and soon I'm as wild as he is, rocking my hips up to meet him as he closes his teeth around my mark. I cry out when he sinks his fangs in, cresting a wave of pleasure from nothing more than his possession. When he spills himself inside me moments later, I find myself unraveling once more, uncontrollably clenching and clamping around his hard member.

When Sinclair kisses me in the delirious aftermath, I can taste my own blood on his tongue, and I'm surprised to find it strangely erotic. Breathing heavily, Sinclair pulls me from the wall and carries me to my nest, dropping tender kisses to my hair. "Sorry about that trouble. I think I got carried away."

"Don't apologize." I tell him with a sated smile. "I love it when you get carried away."

"Do you now?" He purrs, stroking my hair as he lies back onto the thick bed of pillows.

"Mhmm," I sigh, snuggling in as he pulls a blanket over us. Only now am I permitted to unbutton his shirt so I can feel his bare skin against mine, and press my nose to his chest to breathe in his scent. "It makes me feel very powerful... knowing I can make my mate lose control."

"Only you, Ella." Sinclair professes, and I can feel his love for me blazing through our bond. "You're the only one that can do this to me."

I flush with feminine pride, nuzzling his pec and giving it a nibble. "Are you feeling better?" I inquire drowsily. He hadn't said a word or let me feel his stress, but it's obvious he was struggling. Between the grim briefing and my absence, is it any wonder he was so on edge?

"Much." He assures me, continuing to purr as he rubs my back. I'm sure he senses how ready I am for a nap, but I won't be discouraged from my mission.

"You have to come meet the refugees with me tomorrow." I tell him. "I've decided I'm going to go every day, and I think it would be really good for you to see them too."

To my immense surprise, Sinclair goes stiff beneath me. "I don't think that's a good idea."

I rally my strength to lift my head from his chest, "why not?"

Sinclair frowns deeply, still petting me, but he won't look at me. "I just don't." He answers distantly.

"Dominic, talk to me." I beg. "Why don't you want to go?"

"Because," he clamps his eyes shut, and I feel a rush of annoyance from him, frustration that I'm pushing him. I don't care, if I know anything about this stubborn man, it's that he needs a good push every now and then." Because it's my fault they're even here. The Prince didn't start this war... I did."

Chapter 162 – Knocking Some Sense into the Alpha

Ella

“Dominic, what are you talking about?” I ask, shocked beyond belief by his last statement. Any tiredness I’d been feeling after my long, emotionally draining, day dissipated the moment Sinclair claimed responsibility for the war. Just in case, I push myself up into a sitting position so that I can’t be lulled unwillingly to sleep by my crafty mate.

Sinclair takes a deep breath, not quite meeting my gaze. “If I hadn’t called that press conference, if I hadn’t publicly accused him of treason, none of this would have ever happened.”

For a moment I ponder this, testing it for validity. I don’t want to invalidate Sinclair’s feelings, so I’ll consider his statement and give him my honest assessment. Unfortunately for him, it doesn’t take long for me to come to the opposite conclusion. “That’s ridiculous.” I object, apparently forgetting my intention not to invalidate him. “Dominic, if you hadn’t called the conference then the press was going to firebomb your campaign in the morning. We would have lost and he would have come to power anyway. You did everything in your power to prevent that from happening.”

“Yes, but if we’d just let them run the story and accepted the consequences of our lies, he wouldn’t have needed to stage a violent coup, he simply would have won the election. The King, the Alpha council and the Elders would all still be alive if I hadn’t tried to beat him at his own game.” Sinclair reasons miserably, shifting my body off of his so that he can sit up as well. To my immense hurt, he turns his back to me, though I know he’s only acting out of his own guilt and shame.

“We couldn’t have known what would happen, my love.” I state gently, crawling up behind him and massaging his broad shoulders.

“No, I should have known!” Sinclair exclaims. “I knew what Damon was — I knew what he was capable of. I let my anger and hatred get the better of me and lashed out instead of using my head.”

“And tell me. What would using your head have looked like?” I demand, hoping that working through the logic will show him that we did the best we could with the information we had. “We were between a rock and a hard place, you were trying to protect your family and your people. What were we supposed to do in that situation?”

“I should have killed him when I had the chance.” Sinclair grumbles. “I would have lost the throne but at least all of the people he’s murdered and tortured would still be here. It didn’t have to be me.” He shakes his head, his hands curling into fists. “It was my fucking pride, my ego — thinking it was my duty and mine alone. Trying to fulfill my father’s unfinished work.”

The depth of Sinclair’s anguish sends me reeling, and suddenly I realize why he’s been shielding so many of his feelings from me since we arrived. I thought he was protecting me from his stress, and then his guilt for my own plight, but it was so much more.

He wasn’t just blaming himself for bringing me into his world... he was blaming himself for the entire war. My wolf begins to howl in my head, and I have to fight back tears. I can’t make this about me.

If he thinks I’m upset by his pain, he’ll shut it away again and focus on comforting me, and I will not allow that. My brave, selfless mate is suffering, taking the entire world on his shoulders and raking himself over the coals simply because he tried to do right by his people.

Taking a deep breath, I try to make my voice firm and even. “You did the best you could with the information you had.” I begin, proud of my steady tone. “None of us could ask for any more from our leaders —”

“Good intentions don’t negate all the pain, death and chaos I caused!” Sinclair interrupts, surging up from the bed and abruptly ending my massage. “I could have done more. I could have worked harder, been better, smarter! It didn’t have to be this way.”

My temper is straining now, because not only is this twisted logic harming my mate, but it simply isn’t fair. “Maybe you’re right.” I snap suddenly, surprising us both. “Maybe you do have an ego problem, because if you think that you’re so powerful and all-knowing that you could have stopped all this on your own, then you’re clearly delusional.”

I climb out of bed, following my brooding Alpha. “Stop giving yourself so much credit, Dominic. You weren’t alone in this. Where was the Alpha council, the elders when Damon was campaigning? This government is supposed to have all these checks and balances, and you still ended up out on a limb, and it wasn’t because you were the only one who could. You were alone because no one else had the balls to stand up to him!”

“They didn’t act because I didn’t share what I knew!” Sinclair argues, glaring at me with barely contained ire. “If I had gone to them with my concerns then maybe we could have stopped this.”

“Anyone with two brain cells could tell that man was an unhinged lunatic.” I scoff. “You saw how easy it was for the reporters at the conference to believe our claims, to turn on him. Everyone knew what he was capable of all along, but no one wanted to upend the status quo.”

“Including me!” Sinclair explodes. “I went along with the campaign when I should have just taken him out!" He clenches his jaw as if trying to hold back, then adds. "And the worst part of all is that I left my people! I abandoned them as soon as things turned for the worse. I could have stayed and fought for them and instead I saved myself and ran!"

Stop blaming my mate for things that aren't his fault! My wolf snarls, her volume so staggering that I wince.

Sinclair blinks in surprise, and I don't blame him. I've never been one to yell, and I've certainly never been this furious with my mate. "I won't stand here and let you torture yourself for Damon's crimes." I grit our, employing all the ferocity my small body possesses.

"You have only ever tried to help, care for and protect the united packs. You gave up having your own ambitions or dreams because you felt the weight of responsibility that came with your power, and you have never once tried to shirk it. Even now, you're so devoted to them that you won't eat or sleep or employ basic logic!"

"You didn't do this, and you didn't set it in motion either." I'm growling and baring my fangs, and I can feel my wolf clawing to get out. Meanwhile Sinclair's glowing gaze is locked on me as I stalk around him, his hands clenching and unclenching as if he wants to reach out and grab me.

"The only person who is responsible for this war is Damon, and if you'd killed him and let someone else take the throne, then there's no telling what other unforeseen consequences might have happened." I shake my head, setting my jaw. "And if we hadn't left, the Royal Army would have killed us—"

"I didn't mean you, I was always going to get you out." Sinclair interjects, his voice like gravel. "Oh, so it's okay for me to run away so we can fight another day, but when you do it, you're a coward?" I bite, shooting daggers at the impossible man.

"You have a bad habit of taking on guilt for everything that goes wrong in the world, and I hate to break it to you, but even you aren't that powerful, Dominic." I close the distance between us, notching my chin up to glower at the man I love.

"There is no use torturing yourself for things that were out of our control and that we cannot change. And I would thank you to stop saying I and me and my when we are in this together." I add spitefully, beyond annoyed that he keeps acquitting me of any blame with his ridiculous statements.

"Stop hogging all the guilt." I enunciate, jabbing my finger into his chest with each word. Sinclair's wolf is growling in my head, but I'm not finished yet.

"And another thing," I hiss. "The people that are fleeing here need to see you. They need to see their leader and you aren't helping them by staying locked up here plotting violence. They're hurting and grieving and it might be some comfort for them to know you are too." I gnaw on my lip as I consider my next words, not wanting to undermine my previous statements.

"And if you are so determined to blame yourself — which is idiotic, by the way — but if you are, then the least you could do is look them in the eyes and face the consequences of your actions. Hiding from the fallout wouldn't just be a disservice to them, it would be a betrayal, and you're better than that."

Sinclair continues to tower over me with the same foreboding, enraged expression, but I cross my arms over my chest and dig in my heels. "And if you want to spank me or tie me up or whatever other kind of twisted punishment your wolfy brain can think up for challenging you, then go right ahead. But I won't apologize for saying or thinking any of this because it's true and you know it!"

I begin backing away from him little by little, painfully conscious of the line I've just crossed now that the adrenaline is fading. The corners of Sinclair's mouth quirks up, and he prowls after me, all predator. I'm getting ready to turn tail and run, when he pounces, scooping me up into a bear hug.

The next thing I know he's purring in my ear, his love pouring over me in a tidal wave through our bond. "Thank you." He breathes in my ear. "I needed to hear that."

I blink, squeaking. "Really?" "Yes, baby." He croons, kissing my forehead. "You're exactly right. First thing tomorrow I'll come with you to the camps. I'm sorry I've been such an ogre."

"You know if you'd told me you were feeling this way, I could have yelled at you sooner." I quip, clinging to the huge Alpha with all my strength. Sinclair chuckles and pinches my bare bottom. "Don't push your luck, trouble."

Chapter 163 – Sinclair Visits the Refugees

Sinclair

When we arrive at the air field, I do my best to keep Ella from feeling my nerves. As loathe as I am to admit it, part of me is still terribly afraid that my people will blame me for everything that's happened. My angel of a mate did wonders assuaging my own guilt, but I know how grieving and heartbroken people often need someone to blame for the world's cruelty.

The Alpha in me kind of wants them to lash out at me, because I know I can take it and at the end of the day the responsibility is my own. The man in me, however, is beyond agitated by the thought of the pain this would surely bring.

Ella glances up at me as we move towards the tents, leaning her slight weight into my side and sending a rush of affection through our bond. It will be okay. Her precious wolf says to mine, and an image of the rose gold canine cuddling up to my brooding black beast appears in my mind's eye. I pull her a bit closer, purring my thanks in her mind. I know. I assure her. I'm always okay when I'm with you.

Ella's cheeks flush pink, and while this usually might put all sorts of ideas in my mind about how to make her blush more, the matter at hand is much too serious. When we enter the first and largest tent, a hush falls over the sprawling space.

Whispers of the Alpha start fluttering through the air, and I force myself to meet the eyes of each of the refugees. I'm mildly surprised to realize that the shifters in front of me come from all corners of the continent, far beyond the borders of my own pack. Yet they all call me Alpha with the same tone of reverence.

"I'm sorry I have not visited sooner." I state, raising my voice to be heard at the far end of the tent. "My beautiful mate convinced me that constantly focusing on war wasn't good for me or fair to you, and as usual, she was exactly right."

An appreciative chuckle travels through the crowd, and sweet Ella turns her body into mine, hiding her embarrassed face in my shoulder. I rub her back and drop an amused kiss to her hair, my wolf purring through the bond, What's wrong trouble, you only like my praise in private?

Apparently feeling emboldened, her wolf answers. Oh so you want me to share my blushes with all these other wolves? I would have thought you wanted them all for yourself but if you insist— before she can turn back I lock my arm around her waist, holding her in place.

Naughty mate. I tease, both amused, provoked and thankful that Ella is relieving some of my tension exactly when I need it most. Feeling heartened, I continue. "I cannot express the depth of my sorrow and fury for what has happened to our home.

None of you should be here, none of you should have been forced to flee your ancestral lands, especially not at the hands of the person who is supposed to protect and care for you most. Damon's actions are a betrayal of the very worst kind, and though I cannot undo the damage that has already been done, I want you to know that I am doing everything I can in order to bring him down."

I pause, looking around the room to see how my words are being received. I see only wide, hopeful eyes, so I continue with the statement that scares me most of all. "I also need you to know how difficult it was for me to leave Moon Valley, and that I never would have done so if I saw another option.

It goes against every instinct in my body to flee rather than stand and fight, but I could see the writing on the wall. I could see that the Prince was going to win this battle and that if the united packs were to stand any chance of winning the war, then we had to survive and fight another day."

A few murmurs of approval bolster my spirits. "I am working hard to build alliances here in Vanara and am continuing to work with my connections to keep apprised of events on the continent, and when the time is right you have my vow that I will return to lead the rebellion against Damon. We will take back our home, and we will do everything in our power to make this right." Emotion is making my voice grow thick, and Ella opens her emotions to me so I can feel the depth of her pride.

"In the meantime, I want to hear from you all. Any intel you have to share, any concerns you need to voice, any needs you require to be fulfilled. I want to hear it all – good or bad." I continue, my voice growing strong again amidst my mate's encouragement. "I may not be able to visit as often as I like, but as long as we are here in Vanara, my door is always open to you, and I will set up channels to ensure you all have a way to reach me or Ella if you cannot find us in person."

As I finish my impromptu speech, I task Hugo with taking notes and Ella and I move throughout the tent, meeting with each refugee and family individually. Some are angry, as one might expect, others have problems or grievances to air about the camp or people they left behind.

However the vast majority of people have only kind words and thanks to share. My heart grows lighter and lighter as more and more shifters express how grateful they are for what we're doing, and that they understand why we left. However it's not until we meet a young couple with a pair of twin toddlers, that I finally forgive myself for leaving my pack behind.

While the children play on the floor in front of us, their parents sit wrapped in each others' arms. They are from the shadow pack, and escaped because the man was targeted by the Prince's forces for being a possible contender to replace the murdered Alpha. "You must know what a symbol you two have become back home." He shares, looking between Ella and me.

My mate, who is thoroughly distracted by the little ones at her feet, takes a moment to process his words. "A symbol?"

"Yes." His wife confirms earnestly. "At first it wasn't clear that you got out, but then Damon put a bounty on your heads, blaming you for the murder of the King and the Alpha council, and of course in doing so he basically told everyone that you'd managed to escape."

"Bloody idiot." Her husband mutters. "He made it possible for the entire resistance to form around you. Everyone knows you're out there somewhere, plotting, waiting until the time is right to return. You are a beacon of hope for the entire continent."

Ella squeezes my hand, and I can barely contain my shock. "You mean... people aren't angry that I set all this in motion... that I left?"

The couple exchange shocked glances. "Of course not. You are the only thing keeping them going." The she-wolf expresses, still sounding bewildered. "The way they see it, you were brave enough to risk everything, including your own campaign, in order to do right by the people. And trust us, everyone would rather you run and be alive to lead us when the time comes, than for you to have been a martyr and left us alone in this fight."

I can't help myself. I plant my elbows on my knees and crumple in half, lowering my face into my hands and breathing an aching sigh of relief. Ella's tiny paw settles on my back, stroking my spine in long, soothing lines as her silken voice sounds in my head. See, you impossible wolf. I told you so.

I chuckle, turning my face to the impudent creature and feeling my heart stop in my chest from the mere sight of her smile. I catch her nape and pull her in for a fierce kiss, and my stationary heart leaps back to life until it's racing too fast to contain.

When we finally part, Ella and the she-wolf take the pups for a diaper change, and I find myself staring after my mate as she cuddles the little boy in her arms, making silly faces and nodding along as he babbles excitedly in baby language. When I turn back to the father, I find him watching me with a knowing expression. "It's amazing isn't it. How the tiniest look, the simplest gesture, can send you over the edge? It's pure witchcraft if you ask me."

I nod. "I never knew I could feel this way about anyone, and I've been with a fated mate."

The man chuckles darkly. "Just wait until your pup comes. If you think you're a goner now..."

I shake my head. "I can't wait... but I'm also terrified. And I can't stand the thought of welcoming a pup while we're at war."

He nods, "How are you holding up, having Ella caught in the middle of all this?"

"Not very well." I admit, thankful to talk about this with someone who understands only too well. "I'm trying to figure out what to do about building alliances, whether I should bring her along or leave her under lock and key. I hate the idea of being apart but..."

"But it's not about your happiness, it's about her safety." He surmises.

"Exactly." I groan miserably. "And at the end of the day she's safer here."

He purses his lips with grim understanding. "I would feel exactly the same way in your shoes."

Nodding I emit a heavy exhale. "She's going to hate me for this." I admit.

The other man pats my shoulder. "Better her hating you alive and well, than loving you six feet under."

Truer words have never been spoken.

Chapter 164 – Sinclair’s Decision

Sinclair’s Decision

Ella

I’m on cloud nine when we return from the refugee camps. My wolf is practically crowing with her success supporting our mate in his darkest and most thick-headed moment, and even my sister’s troubles with Roger aren’t enough to bring me down.

I take a quick shower before dinner, my mind swirling with ideas to surprise Sinclair this evening. He’s been going through so much and trying to bear it all alone, and all I want is to be there for him. I decide to sneak away while he’s finishing up his work so I can task a few servants with collecting some romantic items for tonight: massage oils so I can work the knots out of his tense muscles, chocolate and candies to indulge his sweet tooth... and maybe spread over my body for him to devour, candles and rose petals to set the mood, even some sexy pregnancy lingerie to tempt him.

I’m so excited to put my plan into motion that I’m grinning when I exit the bathroom, still toweling my hair dry. Unfortunately I stop dead in my tracks when I see him waiting for me, seated at the end of the bed watching me with a somber expression. Instantly I know that something is wrong, but I can’t imagine what it might be after we had such a great day.

“Sit down, trouble.” Sinclair instructs gently, patting the bed beside him.

My anxiety immediately spikes. I can count the number of times my mate has been in our bed without touching me in some way on one hand. Still, I gingerly cross the floor, cradling my pregnant belly in my hands, and perch beside him. I’m sure he can sense my unease, but instead of sending me waves of comfort in response, I feel only regret pulsing through our bond.” What is it?”

Sinclair gazes down at me with grim determination. “I’ve thought about this a lot, Ella. I’ve tried my best to be objective and not let my own wants sway me, and I’ve decided that when I leave on my diplomatic mission... I can’t, in good conscience, take you with me.”

My heart sinks, and my wolf whines pitifully in my head. “Why not? You promised you would think about it.”

“I have, baby.” Sinclair insists. “And it wasn’t easy. But I’d rather trust you with the devil I know than the one I don’t. I know the security risks here, I know the guard set up and emergency contingencies, I know Gabriel. I can’t say that about any of the places I’m going. I tried to work out some way to bring you along but at the end of the day I simply can’t trust unknown wolves with your safety, and I have to think that the Royal Palace is the most secure place in Vanara, whether I'm here or not."

"But if I came along I wouldn't just be hovering in the background." I argue, pulling both of my legs onto the bed and turning towards him. "Think about how much I benefitted the campaign. If you need to schmooze and charm the Alphas, I can help!"

"I know." Sinclair confirms. "I thought about that, but I'm not sure the advantage you provide would outweigh the risk."

"You mean I might be able to help, but not enough to really matter?" I say, feeling my heart fall.

"That is not what I mean." Sinclair corrects immediately. "I mean that I would rather try my best and fail, than for both of us to try only to end up losing you or Rafe."

"But what about the third possibility?" I press. "Where you take me and we win them all over and no one gets hurt?"

Sinclair's mouth quirks, his eyes crinkling with affection. "It's still not worth risking the second option, little one."

I can feel my lower lip beginning to quiver, and I hear his wolf whine in my head, agitated by my imminent tears. "So you'd rather lose the war, than let me take just a fraction of the risks you are?"

"Ella," Sinclair murmurs, sliding his hand around my nape. "I believe that I can build the alliances we need, whether you are with me or not – not because I don't appreciate how much value you bring to the table, but because I'm determined to get it done no matter what. I have no plans on losing the war, and I know you don't need to be protected and spoiled, but I care about you too much to do otherwise. So please let me do this."

"But we're supposed to be a team." I insist, staring at my lap.

"We are a team." Sinclair professes emphatically. "But most teams require the players to fill different positions to support one another. I'm helping the team by meeting with the Alphas, and you'll be helping the team by helping Gabriel make arrangements for the refugees arriving from the continent, and helping Hugo respond to developments back home – plan countermoves when I'm out of reach. Not to mention growing our pup so that we have an heir when it's time to take the throne."

My thoughts can barely keep up with this. Until now, Sinclair hasn't mentioned anything about me acting as his official Luna in all this, but then again we've had little opportunity to talk about my role since my wolf woke up. "You mean, you're going to let me help strategize? To sit in on policy and warmaking meetings?" I ask, astonished.

Sinclair blinks incredulously. "Of course. You don't think I'm going to waste that brain of yours, do you?"

"But you've been so concerned with shielding me from stress." I reply, trying to justify my confusion.

"I'm learning, trouble." He chuckles. "It took a while but I've figured out that being out of the loop only makes you more anxious. Besides, your wolf is awake now, and I may have a hard time dumping my own worries on you, but I know you're more than capable of handling this role."

I'm touched, and beyond proud that he believes in me this much, but there's still one problem. "But part of being a Luna means taking care of you too." I state sadly. "I can't do that if you're thousands of miles away."

"We'll be in constant contact, Ella." Sinclair promises. "I'll call you every night and every morning, and we can always meet in our dreams."

For a moment, I feel pacified. Maybe he's right. Maybe it's smarter to divide and conquer... but, my wolf interjects, that's not what this is. He isn't suggested we separate so we can tackle different problems. He's doing it because he thinks we're too weak and vulnerable to withstand the risks he's going to be facing all on his own.

Her words ringing in my ears, I clamber to my feet, shaking my head." Dominic, I know I'm new to this and that I'm not as strong as you are, but I'm never going to grow into my power if you don't let me try. If you keep me in a bubble I'm just going to stay weak and dependent on others to get by." Suddenly Cora's words the day we fought are ringing in my ears, and though I don't regret looking out for my sister, I'm beginning to understand what she meant about constantly being sheltered.

"You aren't weak, Ella." Sinclair corrects me sternly. "And you are the least codependent person I've ever met."

"But I am dependant on others for protection in this world." I argue. "On you and my guards – and I will be until I learn to stand on my own two feet."

"Then maybe being apart will be good for you." Sinclair counters slyly, completely missing the point. "You can spread your wings without me hovering over your shoulder."

"That isn't what I mean. You might be leaving but you're still sheltering me... shielding me and coddling me." I insist. "You're keeping me in the safest circumstances possible and ensuring I don't have to fight or take risks." Sinclair unfolds from the bed, crossing his powerful arms over his chest." Well Goddess forbid that I should want to make my breeding mate safe after everything we've been through." He growls sarcastically. "I promised I would take care of you, that I would make sure you never had to suffer poverty, abuse or neglect again."

"I know that," I sigh, "and I love you for wanting to give me only the good things in life... but that isn't our reality anymore, Dom. We're exiles and we're about to go to war. I can't, in good conscience, sit idly by while everyone risks their lives for me. I want to help, I want to prove myself worthy as your Luna."

"You have already proved yourself worthy a hundred times over, little wolf." Sinclair assures me, closing the space between us. "And I'm sorry that I can't take you with me, but I promise it's for the best."

My wolf is getting more frustrated and angry by the minute. "I might have proved myself to you, mate." I snap, "but I wasn't talking about you. I was talking about proving it to myself! I want to do this and I want to be there for you – And the fact is that you could take me if you chose, you're just not willing."

Sinclair clenches his angular jaw. "I'm not going to apologize for protecting you Ella. And you can be mad at me all you want, but I'm not going to change my mind."

"You know, except for our really early days together, I've always felt like you were in my corner. That you would support my goals and interests whether they aligned with yours or not. Then again, this is the probably the first time we've really been put to the test, so I guess all that was just wishful thinking." I shrug, fighting back tears. "And I've been wrong before, but you know what? I can't ever remember being so fucking disappointed." With that I turn on my heel and stalk out of the room, leaving my mate without a backward glance.

Chapter 165 – Kindred Spirits

3rd Person

When Cora walked into the palace's opulent dining room, she expected to find the table packed with people. Ever since they'd arrived in Vanara, Gabriel had been entertaining different statesmen and potential allies for the war, in addition to their own party. However this night the dining room was almost entirely empty. Not only were Gabriel and his coterie of powerful friends absent, but so were Ella, Sinclair and Henry. Only Roger sat at the long, shining table, a glass of amber liquid in his hand.

"Where is everyone?" Cora asked, standing frozen in the doorway.

"The King had a prior engagement – some charity gala for the hospital." Roger answered, not looking the least bit surprised to see the lovely human. "Dad was exhausted and decided to take supper in his rooms, but I don't have any idea about Dom and Ella."

"Oh." Cora replied simply, relieved by the thought that her sister would probably arrive any moment. After he'd badgered her with personal questions on their excursion into the capital, the last thing Cora wanted was to be alone with Roger all evening long. She didn't like the way he looked at her, the way his eyes darkened and his attention lingered with unnerving focus. He made her feel as if she were a particularly scrumptious rabbit bound for his hungry wolf belly, but only after he'd chased and taunted her to exhaustion.

She gingerly crossed to the table, painfully aware of the way his eyes followed her every move. She sat down and made a show of spreading her napkin over her lap, refusing to look at the wolf seated across from her." So, how was your day?" She asked, striving for some semblance of small talk to kill the time.

When Roger didn't respond, Cora finally dragged her eyes from her empty plate to look up at him. When her gaze finally reached his face, he offered her a knowing smirk. "Oh, so you can look at me." He teased, "I was beginning to worry."

She narrowed her eyes, not caring for being called out when she was only responding to his behavior. Still, not one for confrontations, she muttered a sulky, "sorry."

"Are you?" Roger inquired slyly, "because you look annoyed."

"I'm trying to be polite." Cora replied, forcing the words out through gritted teeth. She glanced to the door for the dozenth time, willing Ella and Sinclair to appear and rescue her.

"Why?" Roger asked, flashing his fangs. "I hope not for my sake – I'd much rather have your honesty than some fake nicety.”

Cora wasn't sure what to do. Unlike her sister, she had never been the sort to offer up her opinions to people whose reactions she could not predict. She didn't mind sharing complaints or venting with Ella, who she knew would always love her unconditionally, but this man was another matter entirely. It wasn't that she was afraid of him per se, but she certainly couldn't foresee how he would respond to her criticism – and that was a dangerous thing, especially knowing how violent some men could be when challenged.

Roger watched the emotions flitting across Cora's face, listening to the way her heart pounded and raced. He recalled her words about Ella repressing her feelings and trying to do everything on her own, and it struck him that while their struggles might be different, Cora was far from unscathed by their difficult upbringing. He decided to give her a push. “Come on, what's the worst that could happen?” He purred, his wolf sitting up at attention, curious and eager for her response. Roger mentally shook his head, why was his inner animal so fascinated by the woman?

Cora's eyes widened, and her cinnamon skin blanched slightly. Belatedly Roger realized this might have been the wrong question to ask – knowing what the human orphanages were like, it wouldn't surprise him if honesty was sometimes met with terrible things. Luckily Cora recovered rather quickly. She crossed her arms over her chest, unintentionally pressing her breasts together, and notched her pert chin upward. “You know, I think you're trying to provoke me. Politeness is a perfectly normal default among people who don't know each other very well.”

“We're hardly strangers, Cora.” Roger replied easily, his wolf flashing in his eyes. “We're practically family – in-laws for all intents and purposes. If you can't be honest with family, then who?”

“My family is Ella.” Cora answered stubbornly, flipping her raven curls over her shoulder. She couldn't believe the gall of the man, he betrayed his father and brother but somehow he saw fit to lecture her about family?

Besides, she doubted he even believed his own words, the way he'd been looking at her lately was far from brotherly.

Roger arched his brow, “And she's all you've ever needed, hmm? You've never wanted more?”

Cora was beside herself. Why was it that everytime they were alone together, Roger seemed intent on interrogating her deep personal feelings? “Why do you keep asking me these things?” She exclaimed, staring at her lap. “I'm just trying to mind my own business here, so why won't you let me?”

“Because I want to know you.” Roger shrugged, ducking his head to try and catch her eye, but failing. “Is that so wrong?”

“But why?” Cora repeated in exasperation, peering up at him at last. “What interest could you possibly have in me?”

Roger sat back in his chair, assessing the disgruntled human with cool detachment. “Why shouldn’t I? Because you’re human, or because you don’t think you have anything to offer?”

Cora flushed, “I didn’t say that... and you didn’t answer my question.” Roger’s lips unfurled into a lethal smile, and suddenly Cora realized that she might not actually want to hear his answer. “I find you fascinating, Cora.” He confessed, noting the way her heart skipped a beat. “I see a kindred spirit in you. I see someone who landed in many of the same circumstances I did, but rather than letting them define you or pollute your heart, you found a way to turn them into strengths and make your own way in the world. I admire that... I want to know how you managed it.” He paused, eyeing her “Not to mention you’re beautiful and clever, and cute as a damn button.”

Cora fought the urge to scoff. “You don’t know me as well as you think you do.”

“So correct me.” Roger invited, leaning forward in his seat. Now that he’d captured Cora’s gaze, he was determined not to break it, hoping his wolf’s power might compel her to open up.

She shook her head, emitting a small huff of disbelief. “I didn’t make my own way in the world, and as much as I’d like to say otherwise, my relationship with my sister defined me every bit as much as yours did with Dominic. I got where I am in my career because Ella shielded me from things that would have destroyed me and gave me the space to find my own ambitions, the freedom to dedicate myself to my school work without any ghosts hanging over my head.” Cora’s mouth flattened into a hard line. “I stood on her shoulders my entire childhood and I show my gratitude by blaming her. She saved my life by bringing me here, but all I can think about is the fact that the life I built in Moon Valley has been taken away, probably forever.”

She looked away for a moment, but Roger waited patiently, sensing she wasn’t finished. “And if anything proves just how fucked in the head I am, it’s that I can’t even take a compliment. Because while you might tell me I’m clever and beautiful, all I can think is that I’ll never be as clever and beautiful as she is... plus now she’s an actual mythical creature – how the hell am I ever supposed to stack up?”

Roger didn’t smile this time, he didn’t tease or try to refute her logic. He simply said, “I know exactly how you feel.”

Cora blinked in surprise, feeling a strange sense of disappointment. "Well there you go. Mystery solved... nothing to admire here." She tried to feign a laugh, but it came out sounding hollow.

"I didn't say that." Roger countered sharply. "The way I see it, there's even more to admire than before. And you better believe I'm going to keep doing it."

Cora's eyes widened, "But... I thought..."

"I know what you thought." Roger assures her, "you thought your honesty would dissuade me, in fact you hoped it would. Unfortunately for you, now I want you more than ever."

Cora visibly bristled, "want me?"

Roger cocked his head to the side, "I'm sorry, didn't I make that clear?" He rose to his feet, his dark gaze raking over Cora's form, "I'm not interested you as a friend or confidant, and certainly not as a sister-in-law. I'm interested in you as a lover."

"But I'm human." Cora objected, so shocked her jaw actually dropped.

Roger rounded the table until he was standing over her. He took her chin between his thumb and forefinger and gently closed her mouth, feeling a zing of electricity pulse through his fingertips. "And I'm still an Alpha, even if I don't run a pack. It's in my nature to go after what I want with every fiber of my being, whether it makes sense or not."

"What exactly are you saying?" Cora gulped, butterflies exploding in her tummy. She couldn't remember ever feeling so aware of another being, or so electrified by a single touch. She'd always found Roger handsome, but she hadn't imagined he would be able to turn her into a puddle with so little effort.

"I'm saying that if you want to push me away you can go ahead and try, but one way or another, I'm going to win you in the end, Cora." Roger declared huskily, "So what will it be? Do you want to surrender now? Or do you want to keep pretending like you don't feel this thing between us?"

Chapter 166 – Ella Broods

Ella

After leaving our rooms I sneak down to the kitchens, hoping the palace chef will take pity on me. My stomach is grumbling with a hunger so fierce I feel dizzy, but the last thing I want right now is to be social. I love my family and King Gabriel is growing on me by the day, but faking smiles and pretending I haven't just had the biggest fight in the history of my relationship with Sinclair sounds absolutely dreadful.

I'm not sure why this fight feels so much worse than the ones before. After all, we got through Lydia's attempted assault and fake pregnancy, as well as countless other small battles about Sinclair's overprotectiveness, my defiance, and shared communication failings. Still, this is the first time since we met that Sinclair has suggested we separate for any length of time, and maybe that's the real reason I'm so hurt.

I probe my own feelings for fears of abandonment or doubts about his devotion, and I'd be lying if I said I came up entirely empty. Part of me, a very small and irrational part, does fear that Sinclair might not return for me if he goes away. An even larger and more ridiculous part of me wonders if he's leaving me behind because the magic has faded now that we're officially mated.

You're right. That is ridiculous. Sinclair growls in my head, and I realize I accidentally projected my fears through our bond again. My mate sounds furious at the very notion, and apparently he was so affronted by this idea that he couldn't stay silent. You know how crazy I am for you, trouble. You know I'll always come back. You put those doubts out of your gorgeous head this instant.

Get out of my thoughts! I order bitterly, trying to imagine a great granite wall shutting over our mental link. I'm not sure if it works entirely, but Sinclair doesn't speak again. I return my focus to my tangled emotions, and though I am a bit hurt that my mate can stand the idea of being away from me, I quickly confirm that my greatest upset is due to his lack of support. I believe I can handle the challenges of this journey and that it's important for my wolf to get experience in the real world – so why doesn't he? Does he really believe I'm so weak that I'll fall apart at the first sign of trouble?

Baby, I told you it isn't like that. Sinclair chimes in again, and I feel the full weight of his hatred for the idea of separating us, as well as his love and belief in my abilities. I just need you to be safe. If we can get through this we'll have a lifetime of opportunities for you to-

I said get out! I repeat angrily, imagining a giant lock on the granite wall, and mentally slamming the bolt into the ground before wrapping it up in thick chains. I'm still not sure if it fixed the problem, so I decide to test my sneaky mate. Dominic, I want you to know you're a great big dummy. You smell terrible and your wolf has fleas.

Silence. Beautiful, utter tranquility. Finally. I think in exasperation. I know blocking the bond with Sinclair will get easier the more I practice, but now it takes almost all of my strength in order to keep him out. As I pass the dining room on my way to the kitchens, I hear Roger and Cora talking in tense voices. I slow down, feeling both guilty for eavesdropping but also impossibly curious about their conversation. I haven't had a chance to ask my sister about the tension between them yet, but it's so palpable that you'd have to be blind to miss it.

Roger's husky voice floats through the door, and I can hear one racing heartbeat and another, much steadier one. "So what will it be, Cora? Do you want to surrender now? Or do you want to keep pretending like you don't feel this thing between us?"

I press my hand over my mouth to smother my gasp. I can't believe Cora hasn't told me that Roger has been pursuing her this way. I thought it had just begun, but from the sounds of it this has been building for a while." Just because you feel something, doesn't mean I do," Cora replies, her voice shaking. "And for the record, if you're going to be chasing after humans you should know we don't believe the word 'surrender' belongs in discussions of romance. It's generally reserved for battlefields and arrest warrants." She adds primly.

A few months ago I would have agreed with her, the word surrender used to evoke images of violence and animosity for me. Now it only evokes the blissful release of being at my mate's mercy, of letting him take control of my body and trusting him to take care of me.

Roger chuckles darkly, his voice going soft and gravelly. "Haven't you ever heard that love is a battlefield? I'm pretty sure your kind have written entire songs about it."

"Who said anything about love?" Cora gasps, sounding even more shocked and alarmed than before.

"Maybe I'm getting ahead of myself." Roger murmurs, and I can practically picture him brushing Cora's hair back from her face. "Or maybe not." He adds in a low purr, seeming amused by some reaction or expression of hers – perhaps a shiver?

I hear a chair push back from the table, and then Cora's fleeting voice. "I have to go."

"No." Roger objects, sounding gentler now. "You stay, I'll go." His footsteps recede into the distance, then pause. In my mind's eye, I see him turning back for one last look at my sister. "I'm sorry if this caught you off guard, but it's not in my nature to pretend I don't have feelings for someone when I do. I'm letting you off easy today because I know this wasn't easy for you, but don't expect the same lenience in the future, Cora. Pretend all you want, but I know you feel the same, and I'm not going to let you go without a fight.”

I hear one of the interior doors open and click shut, and once I'm sure Roger is gone I decide that I don't need to avoid the dining room after all. They clearly weren't having that conversation in front of a crowd, and I want to check on my sister.

When I enter I find Cora sitting with her face in her hands, and I can see her red cheeks through her parted fingers. Her breathing is ragged and shallow, and she jumps out of her seat when I rest my hand on her shoulder. “Hey, it's okay, it's only me.”

“Oh,” She exhales shakily, her dilated pupils slowly zeroing in on me. There's a faint scent of arousal in the air, and I know it isn't my own.

Interesting. I think, trying to mask my features so as not to mortify my sister with this information. As soon as Cora's surprise passes, she swats my arm. “Where have you been?!”

“I'm sorry, Dominic and I had a fight.” I explain, “I was planning on skipping dinner entirely until I realized everyone else had the same idea. Are you okay?”

“No!” Cora moans, frowning deeply. “Roger is... he's... well basically he just made a pass at me.”

“I heard.” I say with a wince, not wanting to lie to her. “I thought something might be up with you two but I didn't want to assume.”

“You heard the whole thing?!” Cora exclaims, eyes wide. “Why didn't you do something?”

“Not the whole thing, just the very end.” I assure her, wondering how long they'd been talking and what exactly ‘the whole thing’ comprised. “But what would you have had me do?” I inquire curiously, recalling the way she accused me of never letting her fight her own battles and finding it incredibly contrary that she should now hold it against me.

“Interrupt him, bite him, sic Dominic on him... I don't know.” She sighs, winding down a bit as she works through the options and seems to realize how ironic the request was. “I'm sorry, I know that's not your job and I should be able to handle one nosey wolf on my own... I just, I think I'm in way over my head.”

Her skin is still flushed, and I have to wonder if she would be anywhere near this agitated if she wasn't interested in Roger. “In over your head because you don't like him?” I begin hesitantly, wondering how to word this. “Or because you do?”

“Wha- I...” Cora trails off looking stunned. “Of course I don't.” She exclaims, much too quickly and sharply to be believable.

“Cora.” I say pointedly. “I know you. I’ve never seen anyone get you worked up this way.” In fact, I’ve never known Cora to date anyone. She’s been with men, but only ever in one night stands with no strings attached.

“Well I’ve never been hit on by a wolf.” She counters indignantly. “I mean you should have seen him, all cocky and smug... like he knows everything and can read me so well.”

“Can he?” I ask simply, for the first time wondering whether her detached romantic life hasn’t merely been a healthy woman in her twenties sowing wild oats, but a way of avoiding a deeper connection.

“Absolutely not.” She answers firmly, shaking her head.

“Okay. Do you want me to talk to him for you?” I offer, even though I don’t really want to give her such an out. I love my sister and I don’t want Roger to pressure her if she’s truly uninterested, but my instincts are telling me it might be a good thing someone is finally pushing her out of her comfort zone.

“No.” Cora replies after a moment, seeming to dislike the idea of me fixing her problems again rather than handling this herself. With an expression of resignation, she meets my gaze with renewed determination. “Leave Roger to me.”

Chapter 167 – Going to Bed Angry

Ella

After dinner with Cora, I visit the Palace library, searching for any excuse to avoid Sinclair as I continue to work through my feelings. My sister's troubles with Roger offered some distraction, but I'm not sure a distraction is what I needed. My anger and frustration with my mate hasn't lessened at all, and I haven't had the chance to think about our conversation in any depth.

I browse the bookshelves absentmindedly, more caught up in my head than actually paying attention to the available selection. Eventually I spy a Vanaran history book on the top shelf, and my curiosity is piqued. I'd love to learn more about this mysterious territory, but it's very high up and there's not a ladder anywhere in sight. If my mate were here he wouldn't have any problem reaching it for me, but he's not here.

And he's not going to be. My wolf pouts, He's leaving, and we're going to have to get used to doing things on our own again.

Part of me is ashamed I've become so reliant on a man when I spent my whole life taking care of myself and others, and suddenly it feels ridiculous that I should seek out another to solve this problem. Licking my lips, I take a quick visual measurement of the shelves, and look around the room for a chair to stand on.

Finding a plush armchair, I pull it over to the bookshelf and clamber up onto my knees on the cushioned seat. Making sure I'm steady, I slowly get my feet under me, but unfortunately this doesn't make me tall enough to reach the top shelf. Testing one foot on the arm of the chair, I determine that it won't topple under my weight. Stretching as far as I can, my fingertips only graze the spine of the book, and I huff in frustration.

Keeping one foot on the arm of the chair, I balance the other on one of the shelves, pushing myself up to grasp the book. Just before my fingers close around the old leatherback, a thundering voice shatters the silence.

"What do you think you're doing!?" Dominic demands, his disapproval slamming into me full force.

Yelping in surprise, I lose my balance and begin to topple backwards. I try to hang on but my fingers slip, and I use my free arm to cradle my belly as I fall. I see a whir of motion out of the corner of my eye, and suddenly strong arms surround me. Gasping for air, I look up at my mate with relief, quickly followed by outrage. "Why would you startle me that way!" I exclaim, swatting his chest.

Sinclair's foreboding gaze bores into me, and suddenly I'm squirming beneath the weight of his scalding temper. "Is that really what you want to say to me right now?" He inquires ominously, looking me over with concern even as he sends waves of Alpha authority through our bond to chastise me. “Goddess, Ella. Were you trying to break your neck?”

“I would have been fine if you hadn’t snuck up on me!” I argue, trying to wriggle out of his arms. However as soon as I begin trying to escape he simply holds me tighter.

“You have no business climbing on anything, especially not when you’re alone. That chair could have toppled or you could have simply lost your balance. You risked yourself and the pup.” He lectures, carrying me back towards our room.

Guilt washes over me, not for my own sake, but for my baby’s. The last thing I ever wanted was to risk Rafe. I rub my belly, trying to sense his mood. I feel pulses of uncertainty, but not due to any harm I’ve inflicted. He’s simply responding to my guilt and Sinclair’s anger. “I’m sorry.” I answer hoarsely, not sure if I’m apologizing to my pup or my mate. “I wasn’t thinking, I just wanted a book.”

Sinclair rumbles wordlessly, a clear note of suspicion in his growl. “Are you sure about that? Are you sure you weren’t trying to get back at me for leaving you behind.”

“What, by injuring myself?” I scoff, finding the mere suggestion preposterous, even though I know he’s not completely off base.

“No.” Sinclair corrects sternly. “But you warned me your wolf wouldn’t obey anyone but me, maybe this was your way of proving it – making me think you’ll get up to too much mischief without me.”

Now that’s an interesting idea. My sly wolf ponders. Maybe it’s not too late to change his mind. She has a point, but that wasn’t what happened and Sinclair will know if I lie. “I didn’t even know you were there.” I remind him sulkily, “And not everything is about you, Dominic.” I add spitefully, trying to drown out the swell of tangled emotions rising up inside of me. I feel like I’m all over the place, my moods swinging back and forth between sadness, worry, anger and resentment, muddying my mental state.

As if trying to prove just how hormonal I am in this moment, my brain veers away from irritation, moving to regret and guilt from the knowledge Sinclair is displeased with my behavior. Is there a worse feeling than when one’s mate is angry and disappointed with you?

I didn’t realize I sent the question through our bond until Sinclair’s wolf replies. How do you think I feel? His arms tighten reflexively on my body. But there is a worse feeling, and it’s failing to protect them or help them when they need you.

My heart softens toward him, especially when he lets me feel how distressed he’s been by my own unhappiness. My guilt increases, and suddenly tears are burning in my eyes.

I feel so overwhelmed and I'm not sure how to put my feelings into words. I also don't want snatches of chaotic emotion to reach him through the bond in case they send the wrong message, so I pull the mental wall down between us, locking it tight.

Sinclair frowns, clearly disliking the fact that I've cut myself off from him. Still, he doesn't complain and when we finally reach our rooms he asks. "If it wasn't about me then what was it?"

"I don't want to talk about it." I sniffle, wallowing in self-pity. "I just want to go to bed."

Sinclair moves into the sitting area, settling on the couch and arranging me in his lap. "We're not going to bed angry, little wolf." He informs me, firm but gentle.

"But I want to be angry with you." I share petulantly, knowing how childish I sound and not caring. "It's your fault that I've become so needy and dependent. I used to do everything for myself, and now I can't even get a book without asking for help."

"Mmm," Sinclair purrs sympathetically. "And my departure has thrown that into perspective, has it?" He nods. "I hate to say it, but that still sounds like it's about me, trouble."

"I said I don't want to talk about it." I repeat stubbornly, trying to get up so I can go crawl into my nest.

To my surprise, Sinclair lets me stand, but once I'm on my feet he traps me between his legs, keeping his hands on my hips as he looks up at me. "Ella, I'm leaving the day after tomorrow."

My knees wobble, suddenly feeling weak. "So soon?"

"There isn't any time to waste." He confirms gravely. "And I don't want to go without settling things between us. I know you want to prove to yourself that you can handle the challenges and risks of being a Luna, but that's obviously not everything." He assesses shrewdly, softening his tone as he strokes the hair back from my face, cradling my head in his large hand. "I can't make it better if you don't tell me what's bothering you, baby."

As I look into his deep green eyes, I feel at a loss. The capricious, contrary part of me doesn't want him to make it better at all. If I ask him to fix this, I'll just be relying on him to solve my problems for me – again.

I don't know what to do, because there isn't a right answer this time. If I stay behind then I'll be on my own, but the only challenge I'll face is getting through the day without my mate. If I go with him I might have a chance to prove myself, but I'll also be staying in the safe cocoon of his protection. So which is worse?

'This isn't going to get better, Dominic.' I finally reply, wrapping my arms around myself. "I don't want you to go without me. I'm no use to you or the pack if I'm here alone." I take a shaky breath, my throat itching. "And it does scare me to realize how much I need you, but not only because it makes me feel vulnerable, but because you're running off into possible danger and I'm terrified that if something happens and I'm not with you..." I trail off, not able to put my riotous emotions into words.

Sinclair exhales deeply and stands, his thumb brushing back and forth along my cheek. "And that's what I'm afraid of." He admits. "If something happens to me, I want you as far away from that danger as possible."

I gnaw on my lower lip, averting my eyes as tears well. 'Then there's really no way I can change your mind?' "No, Ella." Sinclair confirms. "My mind is made up." He towers over me, his wolf flashing in his eyes. "Now, about this climbing bookcases business..."

Chapter 168 – Sinclair Prepares to Leave

Sinclair

“She’s still mad at you, huh?” Gabriel remarks, glancing pointedly in the direction of my sullen mate.

Ella is curled up on the couch reading the Vanaran history book she risked her precious life to reach last night, and occasionally glancing up to shoot me vengeful glares.

“You can say that again.” I chuckle humorlessly, my wolf reaching out for her through our bond, only to hit a granite wall. The clever minx certainly learned how to shut me out quickly, and though part of me is proud, my wolf is not the least bit amused. Still, as much as I hate the idea, I’m trying to give her some space. I know how mixed up Ella’s emotions have been the last few days, and I realize that’s to be expected between the pregnancy, our exile and her wolf waking – she’s truly been through more than most people could bear lately.

At the same time, I can’t let my desire to spoil the sweet creature sway my judgment. Thus, Ella was beside herself when I refused to change my mind about embarking on my travels alone, and she was furious when she realized I wasn’t going to let her antics in the library go unpunished. Today I am definitely paying the price. The wiley she-wolf snuck out of bed before I woke this morning, and she hasn’t spoken to me all day.

“She’ll come around.” Gabriel assures me hopefully, patting me on the shoulder.

“Spoken like an Alpha without a mate.” I remark dryly. It would be one thing if Ella were merely angry, but the horrible part is knowing that her vexation is covering a deep well of pain.

“So how are you going to make it up to her?” Gabriel inquires, looking back and forth between us.

“Well, I’m leaving Philippe as her head guard, but I’ll take as many men as you can spare to watch over her.” I request, knowing I’m going to need most of my own men for the journey ahead. I don’t like the idea of leaving Ella in the care of men I don’t know, but Gabriel and I have been friends since we were boys, and I trust him implicitly. “I think it’s really important that she continue visiting the refugees. There’s no one better to oversee their relocation and she needs to maintain those relationships herself. The people will take comfort in her presence, and they’ll trust her with things they won’t tell Vanarans, or even my own men.”

Gabriel nods in agreement, “They really do adore her, you know? You would have thought she’s been their Luna for years.”

“That’s Ella for you.” I smile, unable to suppress my pride. “My little love magnet.”

Gabriel laughs, “What else?”

“I’ve been thinking that it might be good to plan some sort of event at the end of my trip. That way I can go to the Alphas and make my case without demanding an immediate answer. I can invite them to the capital in two weeks for a summit or festival or something, and they can come with their decision after having time to consider the alliance fully.” I muse aloud, sharing this thought for the first time.

“Are you sure you want to give them the time to think?” Gabriel inquires. “It’ll be harder for them to say no if you’re there in front of them.”

I shrug. “I’ll be in front of them anyway, and I don’t want to form these alliances through fear or intimidation. If people are going to go to war for my cause, they need to be on board of their own volition.”

“Alright.” Gabriel concedes, though I can tell he thinks I’m being too noble. “And where does Ella fit into that?”

“She can plan the event – if she’s up to it.” I amend after a moment, recalling how tired she’s been lately. The bigger the baby grows the more often she naps the afternoon away, and I want to give her responsibilities without exhausting her or piling on too much stress.

“You know she’ll force herself to be up to it if you give her the chance.” Gabriel warns, clearly having a good sense of my mate’s determined personality.

“If it becomes a problem let me know and I’ll set her straight.” I decide, making mental notes for myself in anticipation of sharing all this with Ella. “Besides, I’m only going to be gone for a couple of weeks and she’ll have plenty of help.”

My gaze stays locked on the she-wolf in question as we speak and, as if she can feel my scrutiny, Ella looks up and finds me staring. She narrows her beautiful gold eyes and her grumpy voice sounds in my mind, Take a picture, it will last longer.

I know she means it as a barb, but I have to admit this isn’t a bad idea. I think maybe I will. I’m going to miss seeing your stunning face and gorgeous curves while I’m gone. How about I take you upstairs and strip you naked, and we have a photoshoot.

She flushes visibly, but she only bares her sharp little fangs in my direction. Not a chance. You don’t get to be rewarded when you’re abandoning me.

My wolf instinctively rises to the challenge. Oh really, and how are you going to stop me, trouble?

I'll bite you. She threatens sassily, her own wolf rising to the surface. Hard.

Is that a promise? I purr, watching as my mischievous mate shivers in response. My blood heats, and I'm sorely tempted to abandon my conversation with Gabriel and go scoop her up this instant.

"Whatever you two are talking about, I don't want to know." Gabriel observes, shaking his head.

I chuckle, breaking the connection with Ella and returning to the matter at hand. "Sorry, I suppose I got carried away."

"You think?" He jibes, grinning at me.

Still laughing, I continue, "there is one more thing I could use your help with." I explain, sharing the details of Ella's mysterious past. "We were planning on investigating her parentage back home, and I think that's mostly on hold for now. Still, there may be other ways we can try to find out what happened to her."

"Like what?" Gabriel asks, sounding a bit confused.

"Well blood tests for starters, they were supposed to do genetic analysis in Moon Valley but we left before we could get the results. And how do you feel about hacking the government servers on the continent? If we can find a birth record to match Ella, we might be able to identify her parents." I suggest.

"I'm not opposed to it." Gabriel admits, "but I'm not sure this is the time to play that card. I'm sure my tech engineers can manage it, but if Damon gets wise to the hack then he might patch any weak spots or back doors into his systems, and you may need those for the war. I know you want to find out about Ella's past, but I don't think you want to compromise the revolution by doing so."

"You're right," I sigh, scrubbing a hand over my face. "We're probably going to need to hack him at some point or another, and I don't want to risk making our jobs even harder."

"Ella doesn't remember anything about her family?" Gabriel questions, and I appreciate that he's still searching for solutions.

"She was a baby when they gave her up." I explain, mentally sorting through all the conversations we've had up until this point. "There's a chance some details from her childhood might have been repressed, and we even talked about going to a hypnotist to see if we could uncover anything, but I don't know if she's ready for that."

“I don’t know if it’s ever possible to be ready for that sort of thing... especially not if her parents intentionally bound her wolf for so long.” Gabriel assesses. “But I can put some feelers out for hypno-therapists, and if she starts looking into her past while you’re away and wants to try going down that path, I’ll be prepared.”

“Thank you.” I breathe, feeling relieved already. I know none of this is going to resolve our fight, but I have to hope that staying busy and having her own purpose will help the next few weeks pass more easily for Ella. Part of me worries that I’m piling on too much, but that’s why I’m going to stay in close contact and make sure she has all the support she could want. Of course, I would have told her all this – asked her opinion and consulted her – if only she would speak to me.

I catch myself glancing back to Ella, who stubbornly pretends that she can’t feel my gaze. We only have a few hours left together, and I don’t want to leave on bad terms. Ella might not want to kiss and make up, but I’m not going to give her a choice. There’s no telling what might happen in the next few weeks, and we can’t take a single moment together for granted.

My wolf rumbles through our bond, and Ella’s rose gold head jerks up, her eyes wide as my words slip past her defenses. You have until this evening to sulk, little one. After moonrise we’re going to go for a run, and we’re going to settle this as wolves. Then I’m going to bring you home and claim you as many times as it takes for the message to sink in.

What message? Ella squeaks, and I can feel her heart racing through the bond.

That I’m only leaving you because I love you so much. I answer fiercely, my voice dropping to a gravelly purr. I’m going to rut you so hard that you won’t be able to walk normally the entire time I’m gone. So that every step you take and you feel that ache between your legs, you’ll think of me and remember exactly who you belong to. And when I come home, we’re going to do it all again. Do I make myself clear?

Once her shock wears off, Ella’s eyes harden and she scowls at me. You’ll have to find me first.

You do not want to hide from me mate. I warn her, my hackles raising.

Her wolf immediately rises to the challenge. Watch me.

Chapter 169 – Ella Hides

Ella

“Ella, why are we doing this?” Cora inquires in exasperation, her legs treading the steaming water of the palace baths.

“Because I’m avoiding Dominic and water is the only way I know to hide my scent.” I answer primly, swimming around her in circles. I’m wearing a borrowed swimsuit, and I’d even showered with Cora’s soap and worn her clothes on the way here – anything to try and disguise my scent.

I then persuaded Gabriel to show me some of the hidden passages in the Royal residence so that Sinclair couldn’t track me through the halls, and as far as I know my mate doesn’t even know these baths exist. They’re a relic from a bygone era, when it had been in fashion to bathe socially rather than in private. I wouldn’t know about them if I hadn’t asked. Luckily the King seems so amused by my schemes that he hasn’t shown any reluctance to help me, regardless of his friendship with my mate.

“This is silly,” Cora complains, rolling her big brown eyes. “He can’t make you forgive him if you’re not ready.”

I snort with laughter, rubbing my belly and sharing my amusement with my unborn pup. “Try telling that to an Alpha.” I retort wryly. “As far as Dominic is concerned he can declare our fight over and sex me into complacency.”

“I still don’t see why you should have to hide. I mean he might think that but it’s not like it could actually work...” She trails off, studying me closely. “Right?”

“Well not the way you mean.” I admit flushing deep pink. “It’s not like it would change my feelings or make me forget why I’m upset, but I also won’t be able to resist him.” I confess, heat pooling in my belly at the very thought. “He has this power over me, Cora. Even though I want to stay angry because I feel in my bones that I’m right, part of me still wants him to find me, because he’s my mate and it’s right that he should.” She still looks confused, so I continue, “It’s a mark of his power, proof that I don’t ever have to worry about being lost because he’ll always find me. And it’s the same with sex... I respond to his dominance on an instinctual level, and when he employs it against me... I don’t stand a chance – which I hate but also secretly love.”

“So if he does figure out you’re here and drag you off like a caveman, you’ll cave?” Cora surmises, shaking her head. “My lionhearted sister? No, I don’t believe it.”

“Believe it,” I sigh mournfully. “Til be putty in his hands and afterwards I’ll be all sated and sleepy and he’ll start sweet talking me... and the next thing you know I’ll be cuddling up to him instead of kicking him out of bed to sleep on the couch where he belongs.”

“That sounds diabolical.” Cora frowns, sharing my indignation with such ruthless tactics.

“Just you wait.” I chuckle, “If you don’t find a way to dissuade Roger you’ll be in the same boat soon.”

“No, actually I think he got the message.” Cora denies, and an image flashes into my mind of an ostrich sticking its head in the sand. “He hasn’t made a move or mentioned it again.”

I can only scoff, “It was just yesterday, Cora.” Briefly I wonder if I’m making things better or worse by warning her. The more I’ve considered it, the more I think a wolf like Roger might be good for my sister, and if she knows what’s coming she’ll be prepared. She’ll also probably resist her feelings all the more, which will egg his wolf on like nothing else. “I guarantee he didn’t give up that quickly. In fact, the more quiet things are the more worried I’d be. Knowing wolves he’ll wait until the very moment you think you’re safe before jumping out and snatching you up.”

“Very well put, mate.” Sinclair’s rumbling voice sounds behind us, and Cora and I both jump a foot into the air. I don’t know how he managed to sneak up on us, when I’m as attuned to his scent as I am, but damned if he didn’t find a way. Cora and I swim to the other side of the pool, determined to make a break for it, but Sinclair is too fast. He’s there waiting when I reach the water’s edge, and before I can consider turning to race away in the opposite direction he plucks me out of the sunken bath.

“Dominic, let me go! This isn’t fair.” I object, wriggling and writhing in his arms.

“I disagree.” He purrs with dark amusement. “These were your terms baby, you set the challenge and I rose to it. And before you try to pretend otherwise, you should know I can feel how satisfied your wolf is. She knows this is the way it’s supposed to be.”

He’s right, the tyrant. My wolf is all ready to roll over and show him her belly, to invite his own inner animal to ravish her as if she’s not every bit as upset as I am that he’s leaving – if not more so. I’m muttering mutinously under my breath now, but Sinclair doesn’t seem to mind, he simply hitches me up into his arms and nods to Cora before carting me out of the room.

“You’re dripping water everywhere, you know.” I tell him bitterly, crossing my arms over my chest as we move through the halls.

“I am?” He inquires, sounding much too pleased with himself, the rat.” From where I’m standing it looks like you’re the one making a mess of the King’s lovely parquet.” He has a point. I am the one who’s all wet, but I took a towel to the baths and he abandoned it in his determination to be an ogre.

At the same time, his wolf is growling in my head, making sultry declarations that have my own wolf squirming with anticipation and need. Such a naughty mate, hiding from me, disguising your delectable scent... wasting the precious time we have left together making me search for you ... fighting me when all I want is to take care of you. What am I going to do with such an unruly little she-wolf?

You could release me and apologize for being a big bully and not letting me do my job as your Luna. She sasses in reply. If I'm unruly it's only because you're being especially unreasonable.

Sinclair strides into our rooms, and sets me on the ground, closing the door behind him. He stands before me with his hands on his hips, looming so close that mere inches separate us. No, it means you're frightened and hurt and lashing out at me when all I'm doing is trying to protect our family. He corrects me sternly.

Sinclair prowls forward, and I back away, bracing myself for more admonitions. Instead my mate's features soften as he reaches for me. And that's okay, because I don't like it any more than you do and I know how important stability is to your sense of wellbeing – especially now that you're breeding. He shares, surprising me with this show of empathy. I also know that I represent stability and safety to your wolf, so while you may be expressing your frustration about your role as my Luna, the real issue here is separation anxiety. Sinclair concludes firmly. Am I wrong?

No, I squeak, so caught up in our conversation that I can't stop to think how strange and right it seems that this is all happening in our heads.

I thought not. Sinclair nods, never taking his eyes off me. I know it's frightening to feel so attached to me, when you've never relied on anyone this way before – but what you need to understand is that this is what being mated is for wolves. It's not a sign of weakness or unhealthiness, it's a tribute to the depth and strength of our connection. I feel the same dependance on you, Ella, but it doesn't scare me because I know it's right.

For a moment I'm truly startled by how well he seems to understand my feelings, but I quickly realize how foolish this is. Of course he knows, I've probably sent half of these things through our bond. Still, it's more reassuring than I could imagine to feel so seen by the man I love.

Sinclair is still going, still bearing down on me as I instinctively retreat. It's also why it's so important that we don't waste a single minute together.

Now that we've shared this love, life without it seems unimaginable and fucking unbearable – and there might come a day when that happens, as much as I despise that possibility.

Suddenly I feel absolutely wretched for avoiding my mate – for running and hiding when he's exactly right. I'm on the verge of tears for the dozenth time today, but this is the first time it's due to my own guilt, rather than my misplaced anger with Sinclair. "I'm sorry." I hiccup, speaking aloud for the first time. I stop backing away, instead leaning forward and wrapping my arms around his middle. "You're right. I've been acting like a child."

Sinclair purrs and returns my embrace, squeezing me tightly. "You've been acting like a she-wolf who's afraid, and one whose mate isn't giving her what she needs... but I just can't this time, sweetheart."

"I know." I nod, sniffing. "But it was easier to blame you than face my feelings."

"I know." He croons, giving me the same acceptance and confirmation I've just offered. Of course, a moment later his tender tone goes dark and sultry, "But we still have tonight, plenty of time for me to give you that dominance you hate but secretly love..."

I gulp, my eyes going wide as I take in his wolfish features as I recall my conversation with Cora. "You heard that?" "Oh yes, trouble." He confirms, sensual promise in his deep voice. "I certainly did." i

Chapter 170 – Sinclair's Departure

Sinclair

The next morning Ella and I stay in bed as long as we're able.

I wake early, but my mate is snuggled so sweetly in my arms and I can't bear to disturb her – not even for an encore of last night's lovemaking.

After we resolved our fight, I'd been perfectly ready to take Ella to bed then and there – however, before I could lay a hand on her, she looked up at me with those big golden eyes and said, "I thought we were going to run?"

I purred knowingly, sensing her wolf's restlessness despite the fact that she'd tried to escape my plans for us. "So somebody's wolf wants to come out and play before I rut you senseless, hmm?"

"Well," She responded slyly, tangling her arms around my neck. "If you want to give me stability then following through on the expectations you set would be very important, don't you think?"

I couldn't help but laugh, throwing my head back and releasing a booming chuckle. "You do remember the second part of the promise I made you, don't you?" I teased, once I was able to speak again.

All mischief now, Ella batted her lashes, "something about not being able to walk until you come home to me?"

"That's right." I confirmed, running my hand down her back and over her luscious behind. "Only after your antics tonight I think we might need to add: not sitting for a week either."

My brazen mate rolled her eyes, even as her pulse spiked and the scent of her arousal rose to combine with her already intoxicating fragrance." Dominic, you are obsessed! You just spanked me yesterday."

"Because you were naughty yesterday too – and don't act like you don't love it every bit as much as I do." I warned, lowering my lips to my mark and nibbling Ella's scrumptious neck. I knew the sweet human was still struggling to come to terms with this side of her sexuality, but I wasn't going to show her any mercy. "I can smell your excitement, little mate." I reminded her. "Besides, I wasn't talking about spanking this time. You really pushed your luck today, so I'm going to have to get more creative."

Ella blinked in surprise, or she tried to. Her head was lolling to the side as I laved the soft spot behind her ear, and she was struggling to keep the gears working in her mind. When I pulled back to switch to the other ear, her quick mind was obviously trying to piece together this puzzle. She was so distracted and consumed by her feverish lust that she eventually sent her confusion through our bond, but if it's not that, then why wouldn't I be able to... Deciding to help her, I trailed one finger down between the round globes of her bottom, tapping my fingertip against her back entrance through her bathing suit.

Oh! A shiver wracked her small body as curiosity, exhilaration and trepidation combined to make a sharp cocktail in Ella's blood, flowing from her senses into my own. It was a delicious combination. I've never done that before. Ella murmured after a moment, alight with nervous excitement.

I figured as much. I shared, delighted by this confirmation. It might have been irrational, as every first with my mate has been incredible, but I've always taken a certain smug pleasure in introducing Ella to new things. Especially the things that make her blush – the ones her human upbringing taught her to be embarrassed about but she can't help but enjoy. And even if you had, I doubt your abominable ex could have prepared you for me.

My words did exactly as I intended, and Ella's eyes widened as she considered our size difference. Will it hurt? She asked shyly, leaning into me for comfort even though I was the one scandalizing her sense of propriety.

It will in the beginning. It will feel strange and forbidden. But it's like taking my mark. I explained with a lethal grin, closing my teeth over that special spot once more. If your mate knows what he's doing, it can feel better than you'd ever imagined.

Then why is it a punishment? Ella inquired suspiciously.

Because it will take a bit of discomfort before you start to enjoy yourself, and because it puts you in a very vulnerable position, little mate. You have to trust me implicitly, and there is no better way to make you feel so thoroughly claimed – because there is no part of you that's off limits to me. No part that I haven't possessed.

Ella shivered again, and I didn't bother mentioning how much I was going to enjoy watching her blush and squirm over the new sensations. And Goddess did I.

After we returned from a long run on the shores of the lake, I spent a good long time preparing Ella, working her up to the edge of orgasm three times as I stretched and toyed with her tight back channel. Only then did I finally bring out my cock, gently rocking into her with lots of encouragement and praise as she grappled with the intrusion.

Sure enough, as intrigued as she'd been by the idea, her shyness and inexperience came out in full force once I actually began touching her in such a forbidden place. She was crimson faced and making the cutest sounds of reluctant pleasure and embarrassment well before we reached the main event, and when I was finally inside her and began telling her how wonderful she felt – using the dirty words that scandalize and delight her in equal measure, she came to pieces in my arms.

Of course, that was nothing compared to the rapture she found when I began strumming her swollen clit and sank my fingers into her weeping sex on top of everything else. She cried out in ecstasy and slumped back against me, trusting me to support her as she disappeared to a heightened plane of erotic bliss. That was the point that I lost my own control as well, spilling my seed into her clenching sheath as I brought her over the edge again and again.

I'm sure Ella thought we were done after such an overwhelming mating, but I'm nothing if not good for my word. I kept my poor mate up all night long, exhausting her and putting my own endurance to the test. Luckily our ravenous appetites for one another were spurred on by the knowledge that this was our last joining for a few weeks, so we came together as many times as we were able.

So this morning, as I look down at my slumbering mate, overflowing with love and admiration as I caress her pregnant belly and commune with our unborn pup, I can only hope I did enough to satisfy and reassure her over the weeks to come. I've been watching her for a while when she finally stretches and emits a sleepy moan, making me rethink whether this morning should be reserved for innocent cuddles after all. My wolf drags his attention from Rafe, quieting his continuous proclamations of love for the tiny babe, to focus on our mate.

When Ella's dark lashes part and her beautiful gaze focuses on me, her brow furrows much too quickly for my liking. "I don't want you to go." She whispers, sounding so vulnerable it nearly breaks me.

"I don't want to go either." I confess, hoping that hearing my own reluctance will offer her some comfort. I understand Ella well enough to realize that knowing she's not hurting alone can go a long way to easing this ache. "But I'll be back before you know it, baby."

Her tiny hand moves to her navel, joining mine to rest above our son's kicking feet. "I'll be entering my third trimester by the time you're back. Just wait, I'll be as round as a beach ball."

I rumble regretfully, "I hate that I have to miss a single day of this miracle. I always thought that if I ever became a father I'd be there every step of the way."

Ella uses her free hand to stroke my jaw, "You'll be there for all the moments that count. This is the easiest time after all... I'm not constantly sick anymore, and I'm not so big yet that I can't be active. I'll just be sleeping a lot and making lots of odd snacks."

"But who will feed them to you?" I wonder, teasing her plump lower lip with my thumb.

“Well you are leaving me with lots of big strong guards.” Ella replies cheekily, “I suppose I could ask one of them.”

“Over my dead body.” I growl, claiming her lips in a punishing kiss. She whimpers into my mouth, sliding her hands into my dark hair and holding my face against hers. When we part, I’m struggling to keep my wolf under control. “Goddess, I miss you already and I haven’t even left.”

Ella smiles sadly. “I know you’re only going because it’s the right thing for the pack. And I’m going to do everything in my power to make you proud in the meantime.” She vows. By now she knows all the plans I arranged with Gabriel, and she immediately took them to heart.

“You already do make me proud.” I inform her honestly. “And with any luck, we might know where you come from by the time I get back.”

“I doubt that.” Ella frowns. Though she’d been honored by the responsibilities of watching over the refugees and planning the political summit, she’d been less thrilled with the idea of digging into her past – though I know that’s only because she’s afraid of what she might learn. Yet despite her anxiety, she continues seriously. “But if you really believe it’s important, I’ll do my best.”

“I do.” I confirm, grazing my knuckles over her cheek. “The more time that passes, the more I have to think you and I met by design... and I highly doubt the Goddess or whoever put all this into motion did so simply to make us happy. It’s possible your past is related to all this – the war, the revolution. We need to find out who you are, trouble.”

Ella nods. “Then we will. Just come back to me, Dominic. Whatever happens, promise you’ll come back to me.” “I promise.” I say, kissing her deeply and praying it won’t be for the last time. “Whatever happens.”

Chapter 171 – Separation

Ella

When Sinclair left, all my wolf wanted to do was climb up to the highest tower of the Prince's palace and howl into the sky, to cry out for our mate until our combined voices went hoarse. Instead I allowed myself a single hour of wallowing – I climbed into a bubble bath, turned on the saddest song I could find and cried until my tears ran dry. Afterwards I pulled myself together and got dressed, even though I could feel Sinclair slipping further and further away with every minute that passed.

We've never been this far apart since my wolf woke, and I'm amazed by how keenly I can feel his absence. As he drove away, Sinclair's beloved voice continued to sound in my mind, I love you, Ella. I love you, Rafe. But it faded in perfect synchrony with the widening gulf between our hearts, and eventually it went completely silent. Now the only way we'll be able to communicate through our bond is in dreams, otherwise we're stuck with the technologies I knew as a human: cell phones and emails.

I know the best thing for my agitated wolf is to keep busy, so I start my day by meeting Cora and Gabriel in the King's study, to begin planning the political summit Sinclair suggested. My sister is still half-asleep and sulking about the fact that Sinclair left Roger behind as added protection for us, but she offers me a sympathetic squeeze all the same. "How are you doing?" She murmurs, her arms locked around my back.

"Well I mate it out of bed and I'm not crying anymore... so better than expected." I confess, burying my face in her neck.

"Tsk, poor thing." Cora replies, rubbing my back. A note of humor enters her voice then, "My intrepid wolf sister, brought to her knees by a boy. I never thought I'd see the day." She teases, even though this isn't truly a fair assessment.

Sometimes I think my big sister is blinded by the relationship we had as children, because though she's remarkably perceptive about my personality in many ways, there are other facets that go over her head completely. She sees the protector, the martyr who suffered without complaint and then shut out all the pain for so many years. She doesn't see the love-starved girl so desperate for affection that she settled for scraps from a scoundrel. No, in fact if there's one of us who avoids attachments at all costs- it's her. Even as I think it, two new scents enter the room, as if they heard my inner musings and appeared to prove me right.

"If I were you, I wouldn't let Dominic hear you call him a 'boy'." Roger's husky voice has Cora pulling abruptly away from me, a scowl on her pretty face. He and Henry are framed in the doorway, though my sister doesn't seem to notice my father-in-law at all. Her full focus is on Roger.

“What are you doing here?” Cora inquires rudely.

I give her a little pinch on her arm, and she yelps and pinches me back, “Hey!”

“Play nice.” I instruct in a low mutter, even though I know the men can hear us perfectly well.

“Tell him.” Cora snipes, crossing her arms over her chest and refusing to look at the wolf now grinning at her like the cat who caught the canary.

I shoot Roger a withering look, and he has the decency to wipe the smirk from his face. “Alright.” Gabriel chuckles, taking the opportunity to steer us back to the matter at hand. “Let’s talk about the summit, we’ve got a lot of work to do and not much time to make it happen.”

“What exactly are we expecting?” I inquire, trying to recall the details Sinclair had shared with me in between sessions of our marathon lovemaking.

“Well, if all the Alpha’s turn up we’ll be looking at about twenty pack leaders with their mates, betas and guards.” The King explains. “We have gatherings of this sort a couple of times a year, so luckily my staff is well versed in housing, feeding and entertaining the lot – that isn’t anything we have to worry about.”

This is some relief, but my mind is lingering on all the refugees sleeping on rough cots in the camp near the air field. “What exactly is the palace’s full capacity? In terms of the number of shifters it can house?”

“We can support a few hundred people – not all at the same level of luxury of course. The guards and lower ranked members of each delegation will join my own in more modest quarters. Alphas will have suites similar to yours and Dominic’s, and betas somewhere in between.” Gabriel answers thoughtfully. “Why?”

“Well I know it’s not what we’re here to discuss right now, but I’ve been thinking about finding better lodging for the refugees from the continent. I hate leaving them in such stark conditions.” I frown. “I was wondering if we might be able to put them up here, though I know that’s a huge imposition.”

Gabriel offers me a gentle smile. “It wouldn’t be, but I’m not sure that’s the best option. We could feed them and put a roof over their heads, they could be near their leaders,” he acknowledges, nodding to me. “But in my experience coming into the lap of luxury when you’ve just lost everything you own can be a cruel reminder, and the palace isn’t exactly the warmest environment. I would suggest finding local families willing to offer their guest rooms so that the refugees can have a sort of home stay. Between us, we could find a way to supplement incomes to support the extra mouths being fed, and the shifters from the continent would be welcomed into the arms of a real family and a real home.”

“I like that idea.” I agree, “and it would also help them integrate into the community here, to feel accepted. If there’s resistance to their presence among your own pack, this would also be an important way to build support. It would be especially good for the orphans.” I add, my mind returning to the children. “Maybe we could even place some of the parents who lost pups with the unaccompanied minors.”

Henry smiles, “Brilliant. Though you’ll have a time convincing Isabel to give them up.”

He has a point. The she-wolf I place in charge of the orphans has taken the job to heart, becoming a fierce protector and loving guardian for each of the parentless pups. The orphan tent has become something of a sanctuary under her leadership, and I doubt she’ll want to relinquish her new babies to other families. “I’ll talk to her.” I vow, “besides it’s good to have someone like Isabel in charge of placing the children anyway, she’ll ensure the foster families are top notch.”

“Ella’s right.” Cora pipes up, sending me a meaningful glance full of understanding, appreciation and bitter memory. ‘You can’t be too careful with children in these circumstances. And we could move her and the unplaced pups here in the meantime.”

“Agreed.” Gabriel nods, “And your point about public sentiment here is well taken. That is going to be one of our challenges with the pack leaders at the summer. If Damon continues to expel people at these rates, we’re going to need to expand homestay placements outside of the capital. No shifter would begrudge the wolves fleeing his violence, but some of the leaders will be worried about the strain on their resources. I can think of a few particularly stingy Alphas who will require significant funding before agreeing to such a thing.”

“Sinclair has plenty of money to spare, even with the war effort.” Henry assures Gabriel, and I belatedly realize I don’t know the first thing about my mate’s finances. I know he’s a billionaire, but I don’t truly understand the extent of his wealth or liquidity – especially after fleeing the continent. My father-in-law turns to me now, ‘You two might have to make some hard decisions between winning the war and saving enough to rebuild afterwards, but I think that’s a ways down the road. For now I can work with you to appropriate funds to support the refugee efforts.”

“Thank you.” I profess, squeezing his hand before turning back to the King.” And the rest of the summit? What do we need to worry about most?”

‘Well, by the time they arrive, most of the Alpha’s will have already made up their minds about whether or not they’ll offer an alliance. One or two might withhold judgement to see which way the others vote – to follow the popular tide as it were.” Gabriel explains. “Still, I think I can fairly predict who will be for and against you. It will be our job to focus on the latter.

There are four or five Alphas whose minds you’ll have to change, and we need to structure the events around the summit so you can do that, Ella.”

At first, I assumed he was speaking to all of us as a team, but when Gabriel calls me out by name, I blink in surprise. “Me?” I utter dumbly.

“Who else?” The King laughs.

“But I’m not... they don’t even... why? How?” I stammer, sounding painfully uncertain of myself.

“Because Dominic will have demonstrated his strength and leadership and made all the logical arguments.” Gabriel answers easily, “Where logic cannot sway, there is only emotion, and if anyone can soften their hearts to the cause, it’s you. And as for the how? All you have to do is be yourself.”

I can’t quite believe my ears. I thought that my usefulness to Sinclair was strongest in terms of supporting him, not in the actual politics. “If that’s true, then why didn’t Dominic take me with him?” I question. “I mean I know he was worried but, if I can actually help...” I trail off, doubting my mate’s explanations for the first time.

“Because we don’t want to give them too much time to think about it.” Gabriel shares slyly. The logic will be weighing on them for weeks, and the emotional impact will move them in the moment, but it will likely wear off after a few days. That’s why Dominic decided to do it this way. You can stay safe here with us while he travels and plants seeds in the minds of the leaders, then we bring them here – and you make them bloom.”

My wolf swells with pride, but at the same time I have to wonder. “I don’t get it. If this was the plan all along, why didn’t he tell me?”

“Because,” Henry smiles gently. “You wouldn’t talk to him.”

I flush scarlet. “Right.” I owe my mate a big apology.

My dear readers, Thank you for stopping by and reading this story. I hope you enjoyed it. I’m trying my best to update assp. I’ll appreciate it if you explore my other stories as well. Please follow my fk page Caroline above story and group Caroline above story if you wanna chat or keep updated on my writing schedule. Yours, Caroline above story

Chapter 172 – Convincing Isabel

Ella

After concluding our three hour summit meeting, where the King, my hybrid family and I decided on a few special events, we kicked off preparations for a welcome banquet, refugee camp visit, an open forum for debate, and a grand ball.

I'm still brainstorming different ideas for other ways to engage the reluctant Alphas, while grappling with the idea that I could play a pivotal role in convincing them to join our cause and wondering how I can make up for my coldness to my mate.

Still I have plenty of time to sort out those issues — now my full focus is on the refugees.

I arrive at the airfield just as a flight full of new exiles from the continent lands, and I watch in horror and heartache as they disembark the plane.

From the looks of it, this is the largest group to arrive so far, and they're mostly women and children.

We're losing more and more male wolves to this war, the ones who stay behind to fight or die protecting their families.

I help the Vanaran volunteers usher the group into the camp, taking a screaming infant from one of the guards who led the group out of Damon's brutal empire.

"Her parents died just a hundred yards from freedom." He shares bleakly, gently transferring the pup into my arms.

"I promised them I'd get her here, so that it wouldn't be in vain."

Tears well in my eyes as I rock the babe gently from side to side. I haven't welcomed my own baby yet, but my perspective on children has already changed so much. I've always loved them, always connected to and felt protective of them, but now that I'm learning the depth of a parent's love, I can never look at a child the same way again.

I'm painfully aware of how much this precious girl must have meant to her mother and father, and I know how much it would have meant to them that this man kept his promise.

"you did very well." I praise him.

"Her parents can rest in peace now, and one day she'll come to understand what you did for her. She has a future now — because of you."

His face is still downfallen, and there's a haunted look in his eyes which I recognize all too well.

"Would you like to come with me to the orphan's tent? So you can see where she'll be in case you want to visit?"

He stiffens slightly, but there's an flash of longing in his eyes.

"I doubt I'll have much chance. I've got to go back this evening."

"If you keep making these runs you ought to get to know some friendly faces here."

I suggest, even though I know the face he'll likely encounter before he can actually see the orphans is anything but friendly.

"I think it's important you come and visit, so you remember what an incredible difference you're making. If you try to stay disconnected then you might stop yourself from seeing how much good you're actually doing."

He still looks uncertain, so I make the decision for him.

"Come on."

I order, putting some of my newfound authority into my voice. I turn and carry the whimpering pup towards the orphan's tent, and a glance over my shoulder confirms the big man is trailing reluctantly after me.

Sure enough, Isabel appears almost as soon as we enter.

She shoots the guard a suspicious look, but is immediately drawn to the baby in my arms. She moves beside me with solemn focus.

We're hardly friends, but she seems to trust me now.

Isabel peers down at the squalling pup, clucking sympathetically as she traces a finger down her red cheek.

"Poor darling."

She murmurs, glancing at me for my professional opinion.

"About eight months?"

"Thereabouts." I assess, still rocking the distraught pup.

“She’s had a rough time of it.”

“Do we know her name?” Isabel asks, clearing her throat to disguise the thick emotion in her voice.

“Sadie.”

The guard pipes up from behind me, his deep voice low and gravelly.

Isabel’s attention swings towards the rugged wolf, and her eyes narrow in suspicion.

At once I’m struck by how many of the women in my life have this response to strange men — of fear and mistrust learned through terrible experiences. My heart wrenches with the sting of her pain, but I know this man doesn’t deserve her suspicion.

“Isabel, this is…”

I trail off, realizing I don’t even know this man’s name.

“James.”

He offers gruffly, his eyes still on the baby.

“This is James.”

I finish gently.

“He’s one of the guardians getting families off the continent. He rescued Sadie here.”

Isabel’s accusatory glare turns suddenly wary, and I can see her rethinking her first impression of James.

She gives him an acknowledging nod that would seem very reserved for most people, but which I know is a mark of great respect from Isabel.

“Thank you.” She says softly.

James’ eyes lift to Isabel’s face, and his dark eyes widen almost imperceptibly.

Suddenly he’s looking at her so intently that I feel as if I’m intruding somehow.

Isabel turns her head away, but I see the slightest flush of pink on her cheeks.

Interesting.

I think, with a flutter of excitement. I relinquish Sadie to Isabel so that she can get to know her newest charge, "Hello little one."

She greets her, and something in her voice makes me wonder if the child Isabel lost was a daughter... perhaps one around this age.

"It's okay. You're safe now."

As she carries her deeper into the tent, no doubt bound for a bath and a change of clothes that isn't flecked with her parents' blood, James and I follow.

He remains silent, but I broach the subject I know I must.

"Isabel, I've been talking with the King. We want to move you and the orphans to the palace so you'll be more comfortable. There will be lots of amenities and extra hands to help."

Isabel listens quietly, not responding immediately.

Instead I'm surprised to hear James inquire, "You mean, they won't be here much longer?"

"You'll be welcome to visit even after we move them. The palace isn't so far." I answer, earning myself a reproachful look from Isabel.

"Who will receive them here if we move?" She asks stiffly, clearly not liking the idea of change.

"Perhaps James could deliver any unaccompanied pups directly to the palace." I suggest slyly.

"That way you won't have to worry about them landing in anyone else's care, and he'll be confident he's delivered them into the safest possible hands." I pause, going very still as if she's waiting to hear the Guardian's thoughts on the matter before making her decision.

"I could do that." He agrees promptly.

"I mean, I'd like to, if it's alright with you."

Isabel nods without looking at him, and even though I know I'm dealing with two people who are hurting deeply, the hopeless romantic in me gets a thrill of excitement.

“Then it’s settled.” I decide, before either one of them can rethink it.

“Though there’s something else.” I add, pursing my lips.

Hearing my hesitance, Isabel turns her guarded features to me, clearly sensing bad news is coming.

“We don’t want to keep anyone in these awful camps. We want to bring them into the city and are going to be asking for volunteers to host different families.” Isabel’s eyes narrow again, and I know she sees where this is heading.

“I grew up as an orphan, Isabel.” I state abruptly, changing tactics.

“I was in a group home with a lot of problems. But even before things got bad, I can tell you that I spent my entire childhood wishing for a family of my own. These pups need someone like you to care for and look out for them, but there are a lot of families with love to give, a lot of parents who have lost their own children. I think the best thing we can do for them is to place them with fosters.”

She opens her mouth to object, and I hold up my hand.

“I would work with you to make sure only the best, most well-intentioned families are actually given pups, and that a system is in place to check in on their welfare. It wouldn’t all be at once either. As long as the war goes on, there will always be new pups coming in – as terrible as that is.”

I shift a bit closer to her, speaking in a very soft voice.

“And if there’s anyone that you are interested in fostering yourself... we can arrange that.”

Isabel’s eyes widen, and she clutches Sadie a bit tighter.

“You make a good point.” She concedes stiffly.

“But I don’t like it.”

“I understand.”

I concede, reaching out to stroke Sadie’s soft hair.

“But parenthood is doing the right thing for your pups, even when it hurts. I know you understand that better than anyone. And I’ll be here with you every step of the way.”

Isabel glances at James again, and I almost wonder if she's shy to speak in front of him, or if she might take some comfort in his steady presence.

"I won't give them to just anyone." She finally agrees.

"And I won't settle for anything but the best procedures."

"I wouldn't expect otherwise." I assure her, feeling my victory within reach.

"When do we move?" Isabel inquires, with solemn resignation.

"James, how would you feel about making your first trip to the palace this afternoon?" I ask, smiling at the big wolf.

"I know you've had a long day already but-"

"No," He interrupts, his eyes locked on Isabel.

"Of course I'll do it." Isabel nods, still not meeting his gaze, "I'll get the pups ready."

Chapter 173 – The Heart of the Pack

Ella

It takes me a while to drag myself away from the orphans once they're settled in the palace. I know I have about a thousand things to do, but seeing so many little ones in need of love and care is simply too much for me to resist. I stay for a few hours to help Isabel and James set up, glancing furtively in their direction every now and then to see how things are going.

Isabel is as standoffish with James as she is with me, but he's gentle and steady, not seeming to mind her cold demeanor.

Every now and then I find the she-wolf returning my glances, but there's a distinct tinge of jealousy in her observation. I can't blame her — in her shoes I'd probably hate me for being so happy too.

After a while she marches over to me, interrupting me as I make up cots for the pups.

"You should let us finish this. You must have more important things to do." I shrug.

"Actually this is about the time I'd usually be taking a nap."

I share, wondering if it was a mistake to reference my pregnancy or point out the easy comfort of my life, then hating the fact that it feels necessary to overanalyze my words this way. I've been through enough traumas to know that people walking on eggshells around you only makes things worse.

"Then go nap." Isabel instructs brusquely, gesturing towards my middle. "You need your rest and you won't have the luxury in a few months."

There's a strange undercurrent in her words, and I have the sense that she would give anything to go back to the sleepless nights and overwhelming days of being a new parent.

"If it's alright with you, I'd like to stay." I reply simply, fluffing a pillow before tucking it under the soft blankets of my current cot.

"I was thinking the pups might like to make this space their own. We could build a fort or —"

"They aren't your practice dolls." Isabel cuts in, her hands on her hips.

"They're real pups who are hurting badly, they need comfort and safety right now. Getting attached to another adult who's just going to disappear as soon as she has her own pup to cuddle, isn't going to help them."

Taking a deep breath, I carefully consider my next words before speaking.

"I don't need practice, Isabel. I've been raising babies since I was one myself — children who, like these pups, have lost everything and need all the support they can get. Now I can't promise that I'll always have time to give — whether it's because of the war or physical distance or whatever else might happen. But I can tell you that my son's arrival isn't going to make me forget about these children, I'm here because I care and I want to help." I pause, studying the other woman closely.

"And I might not be a mother yet, but that doesn't mean I have no wisdom to share." Isabel's mouth twitches, dangerously close to a quiver.

"Well you are wrong about one thing." She answers stiffly, turning her nose up. "You're already a mother...more of one than I am, at least."

I want to hug her so badly that it takes all my strength to hold back, but I know she won't welcome it.

Isabel has so many walls up at the moment she'd probably bite me just for trying. She starts to turn away, but I raise my voice, imbuing it with some of my newfound alpha female authority.

"Once a mother, always a mother. Your love for your child doesn't end with their life, Isabel."

She freezes, stopping dead in her tracks. She doesn't turn back or say a word, but I see her shoulders cave and her head hang.

Isabel retreats into the bedroom we arranged for her, and a minute later I hear her muffled sobs floating through the door. James appears at my side, with the helpless expression of an alpha faced with a crying she-wolf.

"What happened?" There's a note of accusation in his voice, and I realize just how quickly he's bonded with the grieving mother. "She'll tell you her story when she's ready."

I answer, the palpable anguish of her cries making me want to weep myself. "She's a stubborn one, and she's hurting. You'll need to give her time."

James looks at me sharply, and I can sense his wolf's agitation. "This isn't something I can fix, is it?" I almost want to smile, but I'm still aching for the other woman.

“No.” I murmur gently, “nothing can ever fix this. But if you can get past her teeth and claws, you might be able to give her a shoulder to cry on.” He looks at me uncertainly.

“You don’t think it’s too soon?” I shake my head. “It’s never too soon for a hug when someone is suffering.” James sets his shoulder with the expression of a warrior going into battle, then marches determinedly towards Isabel’s room.

The door closes behind him, but I can still hear Isabel’s outraged snarls and a small scuffle before James rumbles a dominant growl.

Then there’s stillness, and a piteous moan. Isabel’s keening grows louder then, no longer dampened by her efforts to hold in the pain or muffled by prideful attempts to stay quiet.

Her sobs are soon joined by purrs, and suddenly I’m so glad that I stayed here with our people that it’s staggering.

It was a very small thing, I know, but I can’t help but feel as if this is right. These orphans, the refugees, need someone to look out for them, and I can help but think I’m the person for the job.

Suddenly I remember what Sinclair told me about Lunas being the heart of a pack, and then Henry’s explanation about my role inspiring the Alphas at the summit.

A torrent of guilt rains down on my senses as I realize just how badly I messed up with Sinclair.

Not only was he right about me staying behind in the capital, but we never even got to discuss all the reasons why it’s important, because I shut him out.

I’m so ashamed of myself A little while later I find Roger in the palace kitchens. “What are you doing here?” I ask, good naturedly, taking a seat beside him at one of the work tables.

“I’m scheming.”

He reports slyly. “Cora ran off the other day before she was able to eat the ice cream she ordered, so the pastry chef is going to help me by making some fresh.”

He looks so pleased with himself that I have to laugh despite my gloomy mood. “Oh she’s going to be furious.”

“Bad idea?” Roger asks, apparently having second thoughts now. “No, good idea. That’s why she’s going to be pissed.” I explain.

"She loves ice cream and if she finds the strength to resist she'll be grumpy because she won't get to enjoy it, and if she gives in she'll resent you for making her happy." Roger chuckles darkly.

"Excellent." He smirks, looking at me curiously. "You don't mind? My interest in her, I mean?"

"No," I share honestly. "Actually I think you two might be good together, but you've got your work cut out for you." "Don't I know it."

Roger agrees, not sounding the least bit bothered by this prospect.

"Of course, if you hurt her I'll rip your arms off and beat you with them until you're dead from blood loss or blunt force trauma." I add smoothly, in a perfectly serious tone.

"I would expect nothing less." He nods, solemnly adding. "But I have no intention of hurting her, Ella." "Good." I reply shortly, my eyes exploring the room for food options.

"And you?" Roger inquires, watching my curious exploration. "Afternoon snack? Pregnancy craving?" "Actually I got busy and skipped lunch." I confess, my stomach growling right on cue. "Ooh, I'm gonna tell on you."

Roger teases, sounding like a child on a playground. "Dominic would not approve." My jaw drops, "hey, I just gave you my blessing to date my sister and this is how you repay my kindness?"

I object, narrowing my eyes when he continues to grin. "You're gonna be in so much trouble!" He jibes, not letting up. "You are such a tattletale!" I accuse, swatting his arm. "Haven't you ever heard that snitches get stitches?"

"Yeah but somehow I don't think you're the type to stab a man for ratting you out."

He assesses, pinching my cheek. "You're too sweet." I shove his hand away, my shame and guilt rising to the surface as his words sink in.

"I'm not."

I sigh forlornly.

"I can be a real brat."

"Why do you say that?"

Roger inquires, ceasing his teasing in light of my dour mood. "Oh, I've just been a really shitty mate to Dominic lately." I confess.

"I made his job a lot harder because I didn't get my way, and I've done some really hypocritical things too. I'm currently working up the courage to call him and apologize."

"Well the good news is that you don't need much courage. You know he'll always forgive you."

Roger tells me confidently. "I mean, yes, the logical adult part of my brain knows that."

I agree, "but the scared little orphan in me still associates admitting difficult truths or bad behavior with danger. She expects one wrong word to flip a switch and make him stop loving me."

"Well you tell that orphan to shut up, because that's not your life anymore, Ella." Roger instructs me firmly.

"She doesn't know what she's talking about. My brother loves you more than anything."

"Thank you." I answer, shaking my head.

"This has been a really odd time for me. I really thought I understood all the ways my baggage messes with my head, but it's like facing the bad things in my past created all these new ways for them to manifest."

"I get that." Roger expresses.

"When I finally acknowledged that Dominic wasn't the monster I'd made him out to be, I thought I would turn over a whole new leaf and everything would be easier. I thought it was the end, instead it was the beginning. Facing the truth of what happened isn't the hard part, it's all the fallout afterwards."

"I'm learning exactly that." I confirm, "and now I have to go deal with it."

Roger squeezes my hand.

"Good luck."

Chapter 174 – Ella Apologizes

Ella

After my snack, I meet with the chefs to talk about menus for the summit, then ask to have dinner sent up to my rooms. I'm feeling too pensive and tired to be social tonight.

I'm still reeling from discovering how badly I handled my troubles with Sinclair, and I'm both dreading and eager to make amends. I know I won't feel better until I do, but the prospect is more than a little daunting. I'm too much of a chicken to call him on the phone, and I don't know where he is or what he's doing right now anyway. So I decide to wait for our dreams, where I'll be able to feel his touch and let my wolf take over if things get too hard. I know Sinclair probably won't be asleep for hours, but it was a long, emotionally draining day.

So as much as I want to put off our meeting I take a quick shower and climb into my nest.

It smells like Sinclair, and that blessed comfort is enough to whisk me off into my dreams.

When I arrive in the dream forest I have nothing but time to kill, and I spend it thinking about what I want to say to Sinclair when he appears.

Of course, the more I think about my mistakes, the worse I feel, and soon I'm fighting the urge to cry.

When my mate finally takes shape in the distant trees, I feel a deep pang in my chest. I can't bring myself to look at him. I kneel at the foot of the bed, my hands resting on either side of my belly as I stare at my lap. I can perfectly picture his handsome face, rugged lines and bronze skin practically glowing in the light of the moon, his blazing wolf eyes piercing me through the darkness.

"Hello trouble."

Sinclair's deep voice wraps around me like a warm embrace, and I can see his black-clad legs just in front of me.

Strong fingers catch my chin, and then he's tilting my face up to his. He searches my features with lethal intensity, and his voice is husky when he speaks.

"What, no smile?" He asks, running his thumb over my lower lip, his longer fingers splayed across my cheek and delving into my hair.

"If I didn't know any better I'd think you weren't happy to see me."

I can feel his wolf prodding at our bond, trying to tempt my own inner animal to rise to the surface.

“What is it, little wolf? Talk to me.”

“I owe you an apology.” I admit, wide eyed and trying to stop my voice from quavering.

“Already?” He inquires, the corner of his lip twitching upward.

“I’ve only been gone a day, how much mischief could you possibly have made? Other than skipping lunch of course.” My jaw drops, and in my surprise and outrage, I forget some of my shyness.

“He actually told you?! That rat!” Sinclair chuckles, stroking my hair back from my face.

“You missed our bedtime call, so I checked with Roger. He explained that you’d had along day and probably went to bed early.”

A new stab of guilt assails me.

“I forgot.”

I bury my face in my hands, “I’m sorry, I wasn’t thinking. I just didn’t get a chance to nap and I was sleepy and the nest smelled like you and —”

“Ella,” Sinclair pulls my hands away from my face, his brow furrowed with concern now.

“Baby, it’s okay.”

“No it’s not.” I insist, furious with myself now.

“I keep letting you down, you’re always there for me and every time you need me to be there for you, I fuck it up.”

My words are met with a deep growl, and I know Sinclair is warning me to stop this, but I can’t help myself.

I forge on, my voice thick, “I’ve been such a horrible brat to you.

You’ve got the whole world on your plate and you were still thinking of me every step of the way — figuring out how to best use my talents while also looking out for the pack and keeping us safe.

All I did was give you a hard time for being stressed and then run away when things got hard!"

I'm on my feet now, pacing back and forth while the huge Alpha patiently waits out the storm, watching me with the bearing of a wolf about to pounce, his hands in fists at his sides as he glowers down at me.

"When we started out I gave you so much flack about communicating with me, but when you tried I refused to listen because I didn't like what you were saying. I wasted our time together and whined and complained — and even now I can tell you're pissed that I'm being hard on myself and you're getting ready to comfort me and tell me I'm wrong and I won't have it, Dominic!" I command, pointing my index finger at him sharply.

"I deserve your anger, I deserve to be held accountable and I'm not going to let you smooth this over because I'm breeding or new to being a wolf! Yell at me, or walk out on me, tell me I'm a spoiled hypocrite — anything!"

I'm breathing hard and near tears, my emotions swirling out of control. I'm prepared for the worst, and I even welcome it, anything to ease my guilt.

However Sinclair simply crosses his arms over his chest, his expression dark and foreboding.

For a minute I don't think he's going to speak to me, but then he rumbles, "Get on the bed, Ella."

I blink, taken aback by his stark command.

"Why?"

My mate arches a menacing brow, one which has me scampering onto the plush blankets.

When I'm kneeling in front of him again, he steps forward, and I don't need to tap into our bond to feel his disapproval. It rolls off him in waves.

"Who is in charge here, mate?"

I shudder at the pure dominance in his voice.

He lets his alpha power flow out of him freely, and maybe for the first time, I feel the full force of his strength.

I'm confronted with the reality of exactly how much magic courses through his veins, the reason why all the other wolves on the continent were prepared to bow down to him.

I've always known he was strong and fierce, I've always understood that he's clever and kind, but before now I never quite realized how much more raw power he possesses than everyone else.

I'm also astounded to realize how much control he must employ every second of every day in order to keep it in check, to stop it from coming out this way and terrifying everyone he meets.

A moment ago I might have challenged him, but now I have no option but to submit.

"You are." I answer meekly.

He nods, not showing me any mercy.

"And who decides how I feel? Who gets to choose whether or not I'm angry?"

"you do?" I squeak, my wolf squirming with the desperation to cease the onslaught of his power.

She's on her back, belly up with her tail between her legs, but still Sinclair does not relent. His clenched jaw twitches dangerously.

"And who gets to tell me how to deal with my mate?"

"Well technically your wo— no one!"

I cut off my defiant response when Sinclair unleashes yet another wall of power, disproving my earlier assumption that I was feeling all of it.

"That's right, little wolf."

Sinclair affirms, finally uncrossing his arms so he can grip my nape.

"On all counts."

He growls wordlessly, and I shiver in his hands.

"You may be feeling guilty, and if you ask me nicely, I can help you work through those feelings. But you do not get to tell me how to feel about you or our relationship."

"I'm sorry." I sniffle.

"This was all supposed to be an apology, I just got so upset when I realized I -missed our call."

"You don't say?"

Sinclair intones sardonically, his thumb brushing up and down on the side of my neck.

"Now, would you like to try your apology over?"

I nod, amazed when I realize how much steadier I feel now that he's taken me in hand.

"I'm sorry that I didn't talk with you, especially after making such a big deal about communication. I'm sorry that I ran away, and that I've been self-involved and unsupportive. I'm sorry for lashing out when I knew your heart was in the right place."

"And?" Sinclair prompts me ominously.

"And I'm sorry that I lost my temper and yelled at you and tried to tell you how to feel and how to treat me."

"And?" He says again, still radiating with an overwhelming amount of strength.

I rack my brain, trying to figure out what I'm forgetting.

Sensing my confusion, his wolf's voice sounds in my head.

Food and rest, sweet mate.

"I'm sorry I didn't take care of myself today."

I add at last, feeling a huge weight fall from my shoulders now that everything is out in the open.

"Good girl."

Sinclair praises, and my wolf preens happily.

"Now I'm going to tell you some things you're not going to like, but you're just going to have to deal with it." He warns, pulling back on his overwhelming power at last, and I'm surprised to find I miss it.

"You haven't let me down, Ella And I'm not angry."

We're in an unimaginable situation here, and despite what you may think, you have supported me and comforted and inspired me in a hundred different ways since we arrived, and that is not up for debate." I nod, understanding that he needs me to accept this without complaint.

Sinclair sends a rush of genuine emotion through the bond, reassuring me that he's not only saying these things to placate me, but that he actually feels them.

"Now, if you don't mind, today was the longest fucking day of my life, and I haven't even gotten to kiss you yet."

Feeling a bit more centered and brave now, I peek up at him from beneath my lashes.

"And if I do mind?"

Sinclair chuckles, flashing his fangs, as he leans in anyway.

The moment before his mouth crashes into mine and heat explodes through every inch of my body, I hear his sensual purr.

"Too damn bad."

Chapter 175 – Guilt

Ella

“It’s all right, Ella.”

The first priest says, approaching me as one might a skittish horse — with slow, measured movements and hands exposed to show he holds no weapon. “We only want to protect you.”

“Protect me from what?” I question shakily, my back flush against the locked door. “You have a very powerful magic inside you, and if it’s allowed to come out you’ll be exposed. We can’t let that happen.” He explains, using a tone much too gentle to be trustworthy.

It’s as though he’s trying to trick me, to convince me he’s kind when he truly intends malice. “I don’t have any magic.” I insist, wishing that I did.

Maybe if I was magic I might be able to put a stop to the things happening here — to protect the others without bringing harm to myself. I was so preoccupied with this statement that I almost missed the second piece of information. “Exposed to what?”

“You do, it just hasn’t shown itself yet.” The second priest sighs, keeping his distance but watching me with sharp eyes.

“At least not in ways you understand. Tell me, have you never noticed how much stronger you are than your peers? That you can hear and smell things from much greater distances? That you can run faster, jump higher, suffer greater injuries with less pain?”

He inquires, his hawkish gaze searing into me, “do they not follow you? Gravitate to your side and obey you as a leader?”

My head spins, making me dizzy with the possibilities. He guesses correctly, but that can’t be because I have some sort of special power. It’s just the way things are... isn’t it? “And exposed to a world you cannot yet join.”

The first man adds. “It must happen when the time is right – but that time is a very long way off.”

“I don’t understand.”

I squeak, a sense of pure dread settling in the pit of my stomach. “We know, Ella.” The second man proclaims, “And I’m sorry that this must happen, it will not be pleasant, but it is necessary for the future of our people.” I shake my head, fighting back tears.

Their words are triggering every alarm bell in my young mind. I know what men do to little girls under the guise of necessity, the pretense of helping or protecting.

And I know exactly how unpleasant things can get. My blood runs cold, and my pulse races, triggering a strange new energy deep in my bones.

It pulses through me like a bolt of electricity, a wild thing writhes just beneath my skin, feral and rabid — begging to be free. “No, go away!” I hiss, my body shuddering with these new sensations. The men look at each other with grim determination. “Her timing was spot on — another week and we’d be too late.”

“I’m sorry, child.” The first priest professes gravely, closing the distance between us. “We would not do this if there was another way.”

Raw terror, unlike anything I’ve ever experienced before, takes over my senses. My instincts are screaming at me to run, to get away at any cost.

They tell me that whatever these men intend will be far worse than anything the doctor or dormitory matron have ever inflicted on me. But there isn’t anywhere to run.

I’ve got a bolted door at my back and two attackers far larger and stronger than I am bearing down on me. I try to scream, but the second priest clamps his hand over my mouth before the sound can escape.

I sink my teeth into his palm, but he doesn’t even flinch. He simply wrenches me away from the door, propelling me further into the room.

The first man grabs my legs, and I’m lifted off the ground. I thrash violently against their hold, my screams muffled and garbled as the priest continues to smother me.

His blood seeps into my mouth, the metallic tang fanning the flames in my already sour stomach. My gorge rises, and I’m gagging, fighting for air and struggling to focus on my escape.

I don’t know what to do or how to fight them — I’m powerless in their strong grips, and they seem completely unaffected by my attacks. I might as well be a feather swaying in the wind for all the effort they expend to contain me.

A distant keening pierces the air, sounding very far away. The cries are deeper than my own, thick with grief and pain more complex than the sheer fright in my own panicked screams. “Leon,” A deep voice, tinged with concern, joins the terrible sounds. “It’s too much.”

“Just a little more.”

A second voice, floating above me, replies.

“We’re so close.” I have no idea where these sounds are coming from, and the priests don’t seem to hear them at all. They continue with their task with single-minded focus, and I’m nothing more than a pawn in their game — tiny and helpless to stop them.

I’m thrust onto the floor and pinned down. The first priest restrains my wrists while the other sits on my kicking legs, pulling his tool bag to his side.

He extracts a shimmering silk cloth, its pearlescent sheen glimmering like moonlight, glowing in the darkness.

It looks soft and airy, but when they begin wrapping it around my body, it tightens around me with the unyielding force of steel. They enclose me in the fabric, winding it round and round like a glittering cocoon.

Once my arms are locked against my sides and my legs tightly shut, I’m completely immobile.

I can’t move a muscle in the fabric’s punishing grip, and soon they’re wrapping my head, as if they intend to mummify me alive.

Just before the silk falls over my mouth, the priest finally removes his hand from my mouth.

A half second of my scream escapes before the moonlight closes over my gaping lips, locking my face into the contours of a silent scream.

I’m able to breathe, though I don’t understand how. It’s one of my nightmares come to life – my mind is awake but I’m trapped in my own body, unable to move or speak.

I can only lie there motionless, my brain screaming at my nerve endings and muscles to move, to do something – anything! But nothing happens because this isn’t a dream from which I can wake, this is real, and it’s only the beginning.

I can hear the priests rummaging around outside the walls of my silken prison, and I strain to identify the sounds: the clink of glass? The jostling of beads? A bottle uncorking? For all the fabric’s strength, it does not stop me from feeling or smelling.

My nose is filled with some pungent, herbaceous fragrance a moment before drops of moisture seep through the silk and onto my skin.

Light objects are laid over my body, stones or crystals placed in deliberate patterns on my head, chest, arms and legs.

I'm still desperately trying to fight the cocoon, that foreign electricity in my veins warning me that I won't be able to fight much longer. Somehow, I know I'm running out of time, but I refuse to give up hope for escape.

The priests begin to chant then, speaking a language I do not recognize. Their words swirl around the small room, carrying arcane power older than the world itself.

There was only darkness a moment ago, but now blinding light explodes in my vision, blinding me – but I can't close my eyes against it. The light is so searing that pain stabs in my head, and I'm sure I'll never see again.

Soon I realize that the light is the least of my worries. Fire is traveling along the inside of the fabric — but the silk does not burn, only I do.

It blazes so hot that I'm sure any tears lingering on my cheeks will evaporate on the spot, I can feel my skin blistering, bursting until the flames can move on to charring my flesh and muscles. I'm dying...

I'm sure of it. I'm dying and I'm not going to escape. There won't be anyone left to protect Cora and the other children, they'll be alone and defenseless.

That same wild energy surges forward, and the priests lose their rhythm momentarily, their chant stuttering before regaining its droning force. I try to send another surge, but something is tearing inside of me, more painful even than the flames. "Leon, I'm serious now, bring her out."

The man is angry now, furious. And the woman is still screaming, her voice hoarse with the effort. "We know what they did, it's time to stop. She can't take any more."

"I'll get the antidote."

The second voice agrees. I'm breaking, unraveling, and with a violent wrench my soul is ripped in two. The pain disappears, the light goes dim, but my chest feels hollow.

There is no more power pulsing through my veins, and only now that it's gone can I recognize that it was there in the first place. I've lost something sacred and integral to my being, though I don't know what. I simply know I am no longer whole. The priests speak softly as they unwrap me, "She was stronger than I expected...remarkable really."

My face is uncovered, and though I was certain I'd been burnt to a crisp, I feel cold air against my tearstained skin, though I no longer have the will to cry. I stare blankly at the ceiling above me, until one of the withered faces moves into my line of sight. "It's all over now."

The priest assures me, sounding regretful. "We'll take away the memory too. You won't have to remember this, little one." His face blurs as a needle pinches my arm, and I return to the present.

Chapter 176 — Hypnosis

Ella

"I don't want to wake up ." I complain, still snuggled beneath the covers of my dream bed with Sinclair.

"I know, but the sooner we do and get back to work, the sooner we can be reunited." Sinclair replies, sounding every bit as reluctant as I feel.

"Meet me again tonight?" I request, wondering how I'll ever force myself to untangle my limbs from his.

True to his promise, my mate had freed me of my guilt and helped me forgive myself, just not in the way I expected. I got to give him plenty of pleasure, but unleashing all of his Alpha power was like experiencing his wolf on steroids. He was so wild and feral, practically rabid with lust, and my wolf responded like a complete wanton. I imagine it's what being in heat will feel like after the baby comes, and the entire night passed in a blurry haze. My body is sore and aching from my mate's dominant treatment, but my heart is light and my conscience is clear.

"wild horses couldn't stop me." Sinclair promises, still bathing me in the glow of his astounding magic.

"We'll of course not." I joke, "your wolf is the size of a bloody horse already and he's got built in knives on his fingers and toes."

Sinclair laughs, petting my hip. "Fine, an army of vampires couldn't stop me." He amends.

I pause, "wait, are vampires real too?"

"No." Sinclair smiles, without judgment. He pauses then, seeming to be listening for something. "I think I'm waking up. Be good today, little mate. No skipped meals or forgotten naps."

"I'll be good as long as you stay safe." I agree, thinking I might cry and then feeling ridiculous for being so emotional over such a short time apart.

Sinclair rumbles wordlessly, but he seems to sense my words came from a place of vulnerability, so he doesn't chastise me. Instead he waits for me to look up at him again, "and please talk to Gabriel about investigating your past, the longer we put it off the more you'll dread it, sweetheart."

I nod in reluctant confirmation, "I'll make some time."

Sinclair simply kisses me, pouring all his love through our bond, and then he's gone.

I wake up a short time later, the wonderful, airy emotions from my dream turned bittersweet by my mate's absence. I scarf down my breakfast and throw myself into making arrangements for the summit, before visiting the orphans and departing for the refugee arrivals camp. When I arrive, I'm surprised to discover that my sister is already present, anxiously looking on as the Vanaran doctors treat injured shifters. She's so consumed in the events in the medical tent that she doesn't even notice me approaching beside her. When I place a gentle hand on her arm she leaps a foot into the air, yelping in surprise.

"Ella, you scared me." She breathes, pressing her hand to her breast.

"Dm sorry." I profess, giving her an apologetic squeeze. I follow her gaze to a surgeon setting a broken bone, placing the injured arm into a strange machine, which automatically projects a light image of the woman's skeleton, like a portable x-ray which requires no radiation. As we watch, the machine carefully bends and shifts the limb until the bones are lined up properly, and the shifter only emits a low hiss, making me think it must be a relatively pain-free process. "Admiring the Vanaran technology?"

I inquire, feeling amazed myself.

"It's so far ahead of anything we have back home, even in the shifter community." She shares, shaking her head. "These packs have a lot they could be teaching the rest of the world — a lot of good they might be doing. Instead they keep it to themselves."

"I can't blame them for hiding." I reply, "you know how humans are with people they don't know or understand. If they found out about wolves we'd have a witch trial reboot on our hands."

"But wolves aren't some marginalized group." Cora answers, "they are the ones holding the power. Yes, humans would be afraid and all the bigots in the world would probably demonize them the way they do with everyone who's different, but they'd be punching up. Shifters are the Goliath to their David, not the other way around."

"Humans outnumber wolves four to one." I remind her. "Yes, we might have strength and technology on our side, but I think it's a mistake to forget how much damage humans can do when they set their minds to it."

Cora looks at me with an unreadable expression now, and I'm surprised to find a gulf between us. Our relationship didn't change when we found out I'm a shifter, but in this discussion we're suddenly separated by our identities. "On our side?" She repeats, her brow furrowing. "You mean your side. Have you forgotten, sister, that I'm one of the hateful humans you' re talking about?"

"I didn't mean it that way." I sigh, replaying my words in my mind and realizing how cold they must have sounded.

"You were a human for thirty years Ella, and you've been a wolf for less than a month. I thought your allegiance was stronger than that." Cora remarks, "You're so concerned for all these displaced shifters, for your pack.. have you even thought about how this war is affecting the humans on the continent? They're suffering the same violence and instability, but unlike us, they don't have any idea why it's happening or where it's coming from. It must just seem as though the world's gone mad." thuy Her chocolate eyes shine in the fluorescent lights.

"And they don't have anywhere to run, there is no magical continent to offer them refuge."

My heart sinks as I realize she's right. I've been concerned for everyone left behind, but until this moment I hadn't given any specific thought to the humans. The shame I so recently banished comes back to strike at me full force. Where are all the humans I once knew? The children I nannied? Are they even alive?

"I'm sorry." I choke, "You're right. I've gotten so caught up in my own life these last couple of weeks... in trying to figure out where I came from, that I forgot the people who took me in when the shifters abandoned me."

"Well, if anyone has an excuse to be a bit self absorbed right now, it's you." Cora appeases begrudgingly. "And I'm probably just taking out my frustration on you, which isn't fair."

"No, you were right." I insist. "I have to think about the humans too, Sinclair might already be monitoring the situation or planning things, but if he isn't, I'll make sure we start." I decide, thinking aloud. Almost as an afterthought, I add, "Frustration with what?"

It's possible she was referring to Roger's advances, but then it's also possible that I've been an even more negligent sister than I realized.

"Ella, my whole world got blown up too." Cora scoffs, sounding annoyed. "My job, my home, everything I knew is gone. And now I'm here like some sort of third wheel to you and the refugees — an interloper with no rightful place or role. I can't even practice medicine here because they' re living in the fucking space age."

My eyes fall shut, a heap of guilt joining my shame. "Cora, I should have realized. I'm really sorry, and I know I keep saying that but it's the truth. I feel terrible." I take her hand in mine, half afraid she'll reject it.

“We’ll find you a role. Maybe it can be helping with the efforts to support humans back home, or maybe you can help here.” I suggest, gesturing to the medical tent.

“You were just saying how much we have to learn from the Vanarans. Well, this is a chance. Just because you don’t know this technology yet doesn’t Mean you can’t be trained. You have all the medical knowledge, this is just new methodology right?”

“Well yes and no, because they probably understand things about disease and physiology that we haven’t figured out yet, but... I would love to learn.” Cora shares wistfully. “The science nerd in me is geeking out already and I don’t even know the tip of the iceberg. Do you really think I could find an apprenticeship or something here?”

“If they try to say no I’ll just sick Dominic on them.” I promise, proud and pleased to see my sister so excited. “We’ll make it happen.”

She hugs me tightly, and slips a little bit closer to the procedure happening in the medical tent. I retreat gradually feeling anew weight on my overburdened shoulders. “Something on your mind?” Gabriel inquires, entering the room for his own daily visit to the camp.

“You know when you think you have a handle on your to-do list, and then 8 thousand new things pop up that you should have already accounted for but didn’t because you were too stressed or too preoccupied with your other tasks?” thuy I ask, exhaling with exhaustion.

“yes.” He chuckles. “Anything I can help with?”

I set my hands on my hips, working up my courage. “Well, I’d probably prefer to have your help on some of the things I was just talking about with my sister, but I know I should really be asking about DNA and hypnotists.”

He nods in understanding, looping an arm around my shoulder. “ I’ll tell you what, why don’t we go back to the palace and get my royal physician to run some tests for you. I’ll call in the hypnotherapist, and in the meantime, we can talk about the things you’d rather focus on.”

I hang my head, really not wanting to do this. “Deal.”

Chapter 177 – Hypnosis

Ella

“Hello Ella, I’m Leon.” I’m staring skeptically at the strange man, not trusting this one bit. He doesn’t bat an eye and only continues as if I’m not watching him like a wary rabbit preparing to bolt.”

King Gabriel tells me you’re in the market for a hypno-therapist.”

I don’t respond, still sizing him up. I’ve never liked doctors and with good reason, but after learning that the OBGYN who prompted me to go to the sperm bank turned out to be a fraud, I find myself even more suspicious of anyone in the field than usual. Frankly, the idea of laying back and closing my eyes while some stranger delves into my deepest, darkest memories makes me feel sick to my stomach. If my mate were here it might be different, he would provide me with the sense of safety I need to let my guard down, but he isn’t here and my wolf is very on edge. A low growl slips out of my mouth, and I feel my lips curling back to bare my fangs.

Leon shoots a nervous glance at Gabriel, who seems entirely unphased. He gestures for the therapist to continue, so Leon forges on, “I understand that hypnosis can seem very daunting.” Leon acknowledges, “we’re searching understand that hypnosis can seem very daunting.” Leon acknowledges, “we’re searching for things your mind has hidden from you for your own protection, but I assure you that I’ve been doing this for a very long time and you’re in good hands. I will help you through every step of the process, and I’ll be able to pull you out of the dream state if it becomes overwhelming. You can have someone stay with you through the process if you like, but you need to make sure it’s someone with whom you are comfortable sharing these memories.”

“Like you?” I scoff, knowing I’m being unnecessarily rude but not caring. “A random man off the street who has done nothing to earn my trust but expects me to lay myself emotionally bare at your whim?”

Gabriel opens his mouth to speak, but Leon holds up a staying hand to the King. “It’s okay, she’s exactly right. Normally we would be doing this as part of a much broader therapy regimen where we would have the space and time to form a bond of trust. I would be concerned if you didn’t feel anxious about this, Ella, but I also know that time is a luxury we don’t have.”

“How about I go get Cora? I’m sure she’d be happy to stay with you.” Gabriel suggests, intentionally making his voice low and soothing.

“I want Dominic.” I answer sharply, my arms wrapped defensively around my body.

Gabriel sighs, “I know, but he isn’t here, Ella. You’re going to have to pick someone else.”

My lip quivers dangerously, and for a second I'm furious with Sinclair for leaving me to do this alone. A moment later I'm kicking myself for being so selfish, and tears well in my eyes. I blink them away, hating my weakness. We could just attack him. My wolf suggests slyly. He doesn't look so tough, I bet we could take him. There can't be hypnosis without a hypnotist.

You make a good point. I answer, truly liking her idea and marveling at my own bloodlust. I never contemplated attacking anyone before all this started, and now I'm practically salivating at the idea of pouncing on the unsuspecting therapist. Of course, a moment later I imagine having to tell Sinclair that I bit the hypnotist Gabriel generously vetted for us, and I put the idea to bed. We can't. I tell her reluctantly. Dominic would be disappointed.

Fine. She grumbles, but I can still feel her violent inclinations pulsing through my blood, sparking my adrenaline and making my heart race. “Ella?”

Gabriel prompts, a note of warning in his tone. I think he can sense the direction of my thoughts, but I send him a withering glare.

“Henry.” I decide, “If he's free and willing.” The King had been right in assuming that I would feel the most comfortable with Cora if I can't have my mate, but I'm painfully aware of the possibility that this session might bring up horrors from our childhood that I don't want her to have to hear or relive.

Gabriel doesn't move. “If I leave you alone here, are you going to try to harm Leon?”

Now there's a thought. My wolf pipes up. If Gabriel isn't here then we could get rid of him before King Nosey gets back, and then there wouldn't be anything to tattle to Dominic about. Nobody, no crime.

I don't know.” I answer, turning my nose up. “Why don't you try and find out.”

“I send a guard.” The King chooses wisely, giving me a scolding stare.

“Why don't you have a seat, Ella.” Leon advises, seeming entirely unfazed by my aggression. Then again, I suppose he's used to shifters' battling their wolves' base instincts.

A little while later, I'm stretched out on the couch with one hand on my belly and the other clasped in Henry's large hand. “Don't worry, Ella. I've got you.” He tells me warmly. “If he puts one foot out of line I'll sick my guards on him.”

“Thank you.” I reply, squeezing his hand. “Will you wake me if you do? I want to watch.”

“Of course.” Henry chuckles, reminding me so much of Sinclair that my heart aches. My mate might not let me lash out at an innocent man unprovoked, but he would certainly take equal pleasure in vanquishing one who crossed me.

“You two are being ridiculous.” Gabriel mutters under his breath.

“Hey, I’m pregnant!” I remind him, thoroughly affronted.

“And I’m disabled.” Henry adds, in an equally offended tone that has me smothering a giggle.

“Neither one of those conditions excuse you from being irrational.” Gabriel declares.
“Leon is here to help.”

Henry and I exchange a mutinous glance, silently agreeing to have the guards take out the King as well, should Leon cross a line. I can practically hear Gabriel rolling his eyes, but Leon quickly takes control. “Okay, so what I’m hearing is a lot of anxiety about this process, and that’s okay.” He announces inanely. “Ella, I’m going to tell you how this works so you know what to expect. First I’m going to give you a very small injection of a drug called Ether. It’s going to help you relax and open your mind, breaking down the barriers of thought that often lock certain memories or sensations away from your consciousness. It’s completely safe – you can compare it to human psychedelic-guided therapies if you like.”

I can hear him opening plastic packaging, and my fear spirals a bit. No one said anything about an injection. I’m fine with needles, but my distrust of this man makes my wolf recoil at the thought of him putting something unknown into my body.

Maybe I should have asked for Cora after all, since she has medical knowledge I don’t.
“It’s okay Ella.”

Henry says softly, clearly reading my resurgence of anxiety. “It’s a common drug in Vanara people use it recreationally too and there’s no danger.”

“Exactly.” Leon confirms. “I’ll check in with you continuously as it kicks in, and then we’re just going to talk. I’ll ask you about your earliest memories, to tell me about your life growing up. I won’t be controlling you or manipulating you in any way, just guiding you through your memories with the help of the Ether. If it gets to be too much, I have another injection that can counteract the first. Otherwise, we’ll let the drug takes its course.

Afterwards, we’ll talk about everything that happened and talk about any tools to help you process your feelings. We'll go over things we didn't get to, challenges, things to focus on next time." He concludes as I watch him finish preparing the shot out of the corner of my eye.

We'll be working together the whole way. Henry will be taking care of you and also helping me gauge your reactions and mental state since he knows you better. How does that sound?"

Terrible. Not Fun. Bad. Stop this! I think miserably.

This quack doesn't understand what remembering my life growing up will be like. He doesn't realize that even simple questions are painful or difficult for me to answer because of how fucked up things were. But I promised my mate, and we need to know where I came from. Still, with all the horrible things I do remember, I don't even want to imagine how bad something would have had to be for me to repress it. "Is there a chance that we won't find anything? That there isn't anything I've blocked out?" I inquire, even though I know myself well enough to realize there probably are. I shut out all the bad memories for two decades, so I probably shut out memories too.

"There is." Leon confirms, "But in my experience, you always learn something new about yourself through this process. Your brain connects the dots of things you already knew in new ways, or allows you to drill down on realizations about your life or experiences. Therapy is always a journey, so I can't predict what we'll find, but I can tell you that you will be changed by the end of it."

I draw in a shaky gulp of air, and I can almost hear Sinclair's voice in my mind. You can do this.

You're stronger than you know, little wolf.

Clamping my eyes shut, I nod to Gabriel, prompting him and the guards to leave us alone. "

Chapter 178 – Visitors

Ella

I've never really done drugs. I experimented in college like most people, and I've partaken at a few parties over the years, but nothing in my limited experience prepared me for the ether. As soon as Leon injects it, I immediately feel it taking control.

The room around me becomes sharper and more blurred, the walls seeming to vibrate with energy. I close my eyes against the strange visual stimuli, and a kaleidoscope of color explodes to life against my eyelids, filling the black void with light. I feel lighter than air, oddly euphoric, and my already sharp wolf senses become even more vivid. In some ways my body feels very far away, yet in others, I can't help but revel in the feeling of the sofa's cloth against my skin, or the new notes I detect in the distant chime of bells in the city.

"How are you feeling, Ella?" Leon inquires, and even his voice sounds different, deeper and more complex.

"High." I admit honestly, peeking my eyes open again and marveling at the way the painting on the wall in front of me seems to be moving.

"That's normal." Leon says, nodding. "Is it a relaxed high or an overwhelming one?"

I pause before answering, feeling as though my brain is on a delay. "It's a little overwhelming." I admit, checking in on the corner of my mind inhabited by my wolf. She's sprawling peacefully, free of the aggression and anxiety that consumed her a few minutes ago. Instead her tongue rolls from her mouth as she stretches and enjoys the sensations flowing through us, even rolling over and rubbing herself against the ground.

I don't need any explanation for my wolf's behavior, because I feel the same languid comfort and ease. My thoughts are quiet, but my body is buzzing with sensation. I snuggle deeper into the cushions, wishing I was in my nest. I consider asking to move – everything there is so much softer and nicer – but somewhere in the back of my head I'm aware that this wondrous state of mind is probably going to be undone by the therapy ahead. I don't want to ruin my safe space by letting something bad happen there. Still, I'm so busy thinking about my lovely nest that I forget I was supposed to be answering a question.

Wracking my brain to recall what Leon had asked, I say, "But I feel a lot calmer than I did a minute ago."

"Good. Let's go ahead and get started." Leon proposes, leaning back in his seat. "Think back for me Ella, what's the first thing you can remember of your life?"

"I don't remember a lot." I confess, preoccupying myself by running my hand over my baby bump.

Not distinctly at least. My childhood is kind of a blur, small flashes and an understanding of things that happened, but few scenes that I can recreate in my head, you know?"

The words come forth much more easily than I can ever remember happening in the past. Normally talking about my childhood is like pulling teeth, dragging the thoughts out of my mind to form stilted words and incomplete sentences. I don't mention that the scenes I do recall in high definition are the ones I want to remember least, the things that scarred me so badly a single sound smell can take me right back to that place. "The earliest thing was probably hunger. My sister crying because of how badly her stomach and head hurt, and me trying to sneak into the kitchens in the middle of the night to find something for her to eat."

"How old were you then?" Leon inquires curiously.

"Maybe four?" I guess, "old enough to have figured out how to sneak out of our dorm, but young enough that I hadn't figured out picking locks yet."

When I got to the kitchen my plan fell apart because it was locked, and then I was caught by the custodian."

"What happened when you were caught?" Leon presses, taking me deeper into the memory.

My high transcends to a new realm then, and it feels as though a door is opening in my mind. I'm not sure I like it – strange feelings rush in, embodying themselves throughout my body in a way that I don't understand. I'm not used to feeling emotions – normally I just think them, aware that/they exist, but unable to manifest them completely. It's almost as if they're trapped in a glass display case.. or they were. Now the glass is shattered around my feet and a lifetime of wants and hurts come teetering out. I try to clench my hands into fists, but I only succeed with one, the other squeezes Henry's hand in a death grip. He moves his free hand to envelop mine from both sides, reminding me that I'm not alone without saying a word.

I suck in a deep breath, and the tightness in my chest eases slightly. I was about to say that I don't remember, but I realize that isn't true. For the first time, I'm able to follow this memory past being caught. "He reported me, and the next day I was put in the punishment box."

"What is the punishment box?" Leon asks, sounding concerned.

"That's just what we called it as kids." I sigh. "It was where they put young children who misbehaved: this tiny room in the basement, with no lights and no windows. They'd lock us inside and leave us in the cramped darkness for hours and hours. There was no food or water, no contact to the outside world. The longest I ever spent there was two days."

"Did anyone outside of the orphanage know?"

Henry questions, sounding suspiciously like his son had when I shared the abuse I suffered with him – like a man determined to find the people responsible and destroy them.

"The children weren't ever really allowed to interact with people from the outside. Sometimes parents would come to see if there were children they wanted to adopt, but we were always told to be on our best behavior- to be seen and not heard.

Cora and I always hid when they came though. We were afraid of being separated." I explain, thinking deeply.

"So you never met anyone from the outside world?"

Leon poses, and though I can tell he's trying to keep the emotion from his voice, I sense a hint of disappointment, as if this fact means we're headed towards a dead end.

"We did later." I inform him, "After we ran away.

And there was once.. " I trail off, feeling as though there's an image hovering on the edge of my consciousness, just out of reach. It reminds me of trying to remember a name or word that's on the tip of your tongue, only this time it's a piece of my own history.

"Are you remembering something, Ella?" Leon says, full of patience.

"I don't... I can't reach it." I huff in frustration.

"Don't try to force it. The harder you work at it the harder it will become." Leon coaches. "Just take some deep breaths for me and let the memory come to you. You were saying that you rarely met outsiders, and you hid when they came. So let me ask you this, if you did meet someone, why was it possible? When did it happen and why didn't you hide?"

"Because they weren't parents." I answer, without even trying. "And they were there for me." I continue, the blurry image becoming clearer in my mind. "I was eleven. It was two men in long robes, and they smelled so strange." I recall. "They were tall and powerful, they gave off this energy that I didn't understand but which frightened me. When I saw them, something inside of me kind of crumpled."

“Keep going Ella. How did you know they were there for you?” Leon encourages.

“Cora and I were getting ready for bed.” I answer, not sure where this information is coming from.

It’s almost like I’m bringing it to life only after the words are out. As soon as I say it, I can see it in my mind’s eye. “The head of the orphanage came into the dorm and everyone scattered. They thought it was he, that she’d come early... ” I’m so lost in the memory that I don’t pause to explain, “I was the only one who stayed out and the headmaster just smiled. He told me that I must have known I had visitors. They took me out and I was terrified. I knew what happened when people came in the night and took you away. I naturally assumed they wanted to hurt me like the others... and they did, just not in the way I expected.”

Henry’s hands tighten reflexively on mine, but I can’t bring myself to look at him, to see the pity in his eyes. “The headmaster left me alone with the men – he seemed very strange, as if in a trance.

The men sat me down and told me they were priests of a very sacred order. They said... they said I had magic in me and they needed to suppress it so I could stay hidden.” My eyes slam open as the memory comes back to me fully. “I think... I think they took my wolf.”

Chapter 179 – Bound

Ella

“It’s all right, Ella” The first priest says, approaching me as one might a skittish horse with slow, measured movements and hands exposed to show he holds no weapon. “We only want to protect you.”

“Protect me from what?” I question shakily, my back flush against the locked door.

“You have a very powerful magic inside you, and if it’s allowed to come out you’ll be exposed. We can’t let that happen.” He explains, using a tone much too gentle to be trustworthy. It’s as though he’s trying to trick me, to convince me he’s kind when he truly intends malice.

“I don’t have any magic.” I insist, wishing that I did.

Maybe if I was magic I might be able to put a stop to the things happening here – to protect the others without bringing harm to myself. I was so preoccupied with this statement that I almost missed the second piece of information. “Exposed to what?”

“You do, it just hasn’t shown itself yet.” The second priest sighs, keeping his distance but watching me with sharp eyes. “At least not in ways you understand. Tell me, have you never noticed how much stronger you are than your peers? That you can hear and smell things from much greater distances? That you can run faster, jump higher,- suffer greater injuries with less pain?” He inquires, his hawkish gaze searing into me, “do they not follow you? Gravitate to your side and obey you as a leader?”

My head spins, making me dizzy with the possibilities. He guesses correctly, but that can’t be because I have some sort of special power. It’s just the way things are. isn’t it?

“And exposed to a world you cannot yet join.” The first man adds. “It must happen when the time is right- but that time is a very long way off.”

I don’t understand.” I squeak, a sense of pure dread settling in the pit of my stomach

“We know, Ella” The second man proclaims, “And I’m sorry that this must happen, it will not be pleasant, but it is necessary for the future of our people...”

I shake my head, fighting back tears. Their words are triggering every alarm bell in my young mind I know what men do to little girls under the guise of necessity, the pretense of helping or protecting.

And I know exactly how unpleasant things can get. My blood runs cold, and my pulse races, triggering a strange new energy deep in my bones. It pulses through me like a bolt of electricity, a wild thing writhes just beneath my skin, feral and rabid – begging to be free. “No, go away!” I hiss, my body shuddering with these new sensations.

The men look at each other with grim determination. “Her timing was sp0t on – another week and we’d be too late.”

“Im sorry, child.” The first priest professes gravely, closing the distance between us. “We would not do this if there was another way.”

Raw terror, unlike anything I’ve ever experienced before, takes over my senses. My instincts are screaming at me to run, to get away at any cost.

They tell me that whatever these men intend will be far worse than anything the doctor or dormitory matron have ever inflicted on me. But there isn’t anywhere to run. I’ve got a bolted door at my back and two attackers far larger and stronger than I am bearing down on me. I try to scream, but the second priest clamps his hand over my mouth before the sound can escape. I sink my teeth into his palm, but he doesn’t even flinch. He simply wrenches me away from the door, propelling me further into the room.

The first man grabs my legs, and I’m lifted off the ground. I thrash violently against their hold, my screams muffled and garbled as the priest continues to smother me. His bl00d seeps into my mouth, the metallic tang fanning the flames in my already sour stomach. My gorge rises, and I’m gagging, fighting for air and struggling to focus on my escape. I don’t know what to do or how to fight them – I’m powerless in their strong grips, and they seem completely unaffected by my attacks. I might as well be a feather swaying in the wind for all the effort they expend to contain me.

A distant keening pierces the air, sounding very far away. The cries are deeper than my own, thick with grief and pain more complex than the sheer fright in my own panicked screams.

“Leon,” A deep voice, tinged with concern, joins the terrible sounds. “It’s too much.”

“Just a little more.” A second voice, floating above me, replies. “We’re so close.”

I have no idea where these sounds are coming from, and the priests don’t seem to hear them at all. They continue with their task with single- minded focus, and i’m nothing more than a pawn in their game – tiny and helpless to stop them.

I’m thrust onto the floor and pinned down. The first priest restrains my wrists while the other sits on my kicking legs, pulling his tool bag to his side.

He extracts a shimmering silk cloth, it’s pearlescent sheen glimmering like moonlight, glowing in the darkness. It looks soft and airy, but when they begin wrapping it around my body, it tightens around me with the unyielding force of steel. They enclose me in the fabric, winding it round and round like a glittering cocoon.

Once my arms are locked against my sides and my legs tightly shut, I'm completely immobile. I can't move a muscle in the fabric's punishing grip, and soon they're wrapping my head, as if they intend to mummify me alive. Just before the silk falls over my mouth, the priest finally removes his hand from my mouth. A half second of my scream escapes before the moonlight closes over my gaping lips, locking my face into the contours of a silent scream. I'm able to breathe, though I don't understand how.

It's one of my nightmares come to life – my mind is awake but I'm trapped in my own body, unable to move or speak. I can only lie there motionless, my brain screaming at my nerve endings and muscles to move, to do something – anything! But nothing happens because this isn't a dream from which I can wake, this is real, and it's only the beginning.

I can hear the priests rummaging around outside the walls of my silken prison, and I strain to identify the sounds: the clink of glass? The jostling of beads? A bottle uncorking? For all the fabric's strength, it does not stop me from feeling or smelling. My nose is filled with some pungent, herbaceous fragrance a moment before drops of moisture seep through the silk and onto my skin.

Light objects are laid over my body, stones or crystals placed in deliberate patterns on my head, chest, arms and legs. I'm still desperately trying to fight the cocoon, that foreign electricity in my veins warning me that I won't be able to fight much longer. Somehow, I know I'm running out of time, but I refuse to give up hope for escape.

The priests begin to chant then, speaking a language I do not recognize. Their words swirl around the small room, carrying arcane power older than the world itself. There was only darkness a moment ago, but now blinding light explodes in my vision, blinding me – but I can't close my eyes against it. The light is so searing that pain stabs in my head, and I'm sure I'll never see again.

Soon I realize that the light is the least of my worries. Fire is traveling along the inside of the fabric – but the silk does not burn, only I do. It blazes so hot that I'm sure any tears lingering on my cheeks will evaporate on the spot, I can feel my skin blistering, bursting until the flames can move on to charring my flesh and muscles. I'm dying...

I'm sure of it. I'm dying and I'm not going to escape. There won't be anyone left to protect Cora and the other children, they'll be alone and defenseless.

That same wild energy surges forward, and the priests lose their rhythm momentarily, their chant stuttering before regaining its droning force. I try to send another surge, but something is tearing inside of me, more painful even than the flames.

“Leon, I’m serious now, bring her out.” The man is angry now, furious. And the woman is still screaming, her voice hoarse with the effort. “We know what they did, it’s time to stop. She can’t take any more.”

“I’ll get the antidote.” The second voice agrees.

I’m breaking, unraveling, and with a violent wrench, my soul is ripped in two. The pain disappears, the light goes dim, but my chest feels hollow. There is no more power pulsing through my veins, and only now that it’s gone can I recognize that it was there in the first place. I’ve lost something sacred and integral to my being, though I don’t know what. I simply know I am no longer whole.

The priests speak softly as they unwrap me, “She was stronger than I expected... remarkable really.”

My face is uncovered, and though I was certain I’d been burnt to a crisp, I feel cold air against my tearstained skin, though I no longer have the will to cry. I stare blankly at the ceiling above me, until one of the withered faces moves into my line of sight. “It’s all over now.” The priest assures me, sounding regretful, “We’ll take away the memory too. You won’t have to remember this, little one”

His face blurs as a needle pinches my arm, and I return to the present.

Chapter 180 – Stolen Wolf

3rd Person

Henry glared at Leon as he injected the antidote for ether into Ella's arm. He was angry with the therapist, but he was also furious with himself for letting the hypnotic state continue for so long. He should have put his foot down the first time, when Ella first began screaming. Listening to her suffering had been horrible beyond belief. She'd started out by explaining the events that happened, but before long she disappeared into the memory, feeling everything that she described so that her story was interrupted by bouts of screaming and crying. She was reliving it all in front of them, and Henry despised himself for helping Leon torment her this way.

It took a moment for the antidote to kick in, but Ella finally went quiet as she was transported back to them. When her lashes parted to reveal bloodshot eyes, her tearstained skin turned grey, and in the next moment she lurched over the side of the couch and was vomiting onto the floor.

Henry pulled her hair back and ran a comforting hand up and down her back, crooning words of comfort to the poor child. "It's okay, dear one ... You're safe, it's over."

Once her stomach was empty and she was reduced to dry heaving, Henry guided her to lie down again. Leon appeared at her side with a wet rag and a glass of water, and Henry gently cleaned her face and helped her drink. "I'm sorry." Ella moaned, fresh tears streaming down her cheeks.

"Nonsense." Henry assured her. "If anyone has a right to be sick, it's you. You should have seen some of the messes I cleaned up when my boys were little. This is nothing."

Ella's hands went to her belly, her face twisted in guilt and pain. "He's upset." Ella whimpered, clearly referring to the baby "I frightened him.. the screaming.."

"Do you want me to call for the doctor?" Henry offered, "Just to be safe?"

Ella's gold eyes widened then clamped shut, and Henry remembered the things she'd confessed in her dream state. Hints about doctors abusing her, things that made his wolf apoplectic with rage.

"Will you stay with me if he comes?" Ella asked in a small voice, worried enough about her unborn child to agree, but not wanting to face an examination alone.

"of course." Henry promised, not looking at Leon as he gave the orders to the guards hovering in the doorway. They'd crashed into the room when Ella started screaming, and watched in horror as she recounted the priests binding her wolf, cutting her off from her inner animal. In their world such an act was an atrocity, a crime that should not have been possible, and a violation a shifter should not be able to survive. The man nearest the door took off at a run, and Henry turned back to his daughter-in-law. "What can we do for you, Ella? What do you need?"

"We should talk through what just happened."

Leon interjected in his therapist voice. "She needs to process this."

"Not today she doesn't." Henry snapped back, "And not without her mate. We never should have attempted this without Dominic."

"Her mate can't change the past." Leon answered sternly. "This was always going to be terrible."

Henry growled wordlessly, and Ella curled in on herself a little. "I want my nest."

"Of course," Henry agreed, pulling her into his lap and wheeling her out of the sitting room and into the bedroom. He helped her climb into her pillowy sanctuary, purring and stroking her hair as she silently wept.

After a while, Ella blinked at him, seeming to realize what he was doing only after it began to work. "I thought wolves only purred for their mates?"- Her voice was still raspy from all the strain of the session, a mere shadow of its usual velvet tone.

"No." Henry corrected her with a sad smile. "We also purr for our children, and you're one of mine now."

Ella's lower lip quivered violently, and she reached for Henry's hand, holding it tightly. "Thank you."

The palace doctor arrived before Henry could tell Ella that she never needed to thank him for taking care of her. The physician checked on the pup and administered a sedative for Ella, advising no more hypnosis for at least a week. After he left, Ella was already teetering on the edge of a drug-induced sleep, but she managed to pin her father in law with a hollow eyed gaze that made his heart ache. "

Why did they do that to me?"

He knew she was talking about the priests who came to the orphanage, and he wished he had an answer for her. "I don't know." He confessed sorrowfully. "Before today, I didn't even know such a thing was possible."

"I always thought..." A wide yawn interrupted her, and she closed her eyes as she drowsily continued, "I always thought I lost my strength because they broke me... the doctor and the matron... I believed they broke my spirit. But it was the priests." She shuddered, tears seeping out beneath her closed lashes. "They stole it."

Henry frowned, still petting her hair. "They took your wolf, Ella, but they never broke you. You survived despite everything. You took care of your sister and made a life for yourself. You might have been missing part of yourself, but the woman my son fell in love with – the woman we all fell in love with Was never weak"

To his surprise, the corner of her lip twitched up in a bittersweet tilt, somewhere between a grimace and a smile. "Because Dominic brought her back to me. She started waking up when we met. If you'd known me before him.." Her shoulders trembled and any sense of sweetness disappeared, "I h-hate them for doing that to me." She murmured, pure anguish heavy on her tongue.

"I do too." Henry shared. "We're going to get to the bottom of this, okay? You have my word." He vowed, overflowing with conviction. "For now, just sleep little mother. When you wake, Dominic will be waiting for your call and you can face it together."

As soon as Ella slipped into unconsciousness, Henry wheeled back into the sitting room. He didn't want to go too far in case she had bad dreams, though the doctor had promised the sedative would send her into such a deep sleep that dreaming would be impossible. He pulled out his phone and dialed his youngest, cold fury coursing through him.

Sinclair answered on the fourth ring, his deep voice filling Henry's ear. "Hi Dad, this isn't really a good time, we're about to reach the FrostFang capital."

"You need to make the time." Henry growled, "Ella just had her first hypnotherapy session and it did not go well."

Sinclair's voice went sharp as a knife, "Put her on."

"She's sedated." Henry explained, unable to quell the hardness in his tone even though it wasn't meant for his son. "But you need to know what happened and you need to be prepared to drop everything for her when she wakes."

"What happened?" Sinclair inquired, concern making his voice every bit as gruff as his father's.

Henry shared the tale in starts and stops, pausing to entertain his son's growls and curses. When the story was finished, Henry added. "She was frightened from the beginning and didn't want to do it, and we made her." He recalled, guilt tying his insides into knots. "She forced herself to do it because she didn't want to disappoint you, and we didn't know how bad.. we had no idea what she'd been through, Dominic. But I have to think you did.”

“I knew about the a.buse.” Sinclair confirmed, his voice raw and thick with emotion. “I had no idea about her wolf. We knew that something like that must have happened to keep it dormant, but I assumed it was when she was an infant – before she was left with the humans. I never would have asked her to do this without me if I’d believed -“

“You shouldn’t have asked her to do it without you at all.” Henry corrected firmly. “She needed her mate today and I was a sorry subst!tute.”

“She chose you because she felt safe with you.”

Sinclair replied, wanting to deny his father’s negligence even as he grappled with his guilt. “But you’re right. I should have been there.” He paused, breathing heavily. “But I should be here too, and I should be back in Moon Valley fighting Damon don’t know how to do it all, Dad. I can’t be there for Ella without failing the pack, and I can’t be there for the pack without failing my mate.”

“But why now, why was digging into her past urgent enough to risk this in the first place?”

Henry asked, sympathetic for his son, sharing his pain, but also frustrated.

“Don’t you think it’s connected?” Sinclair inquired.”

I mean, think about what you just told me. Those priests had to have been servants of the Goddess, and they told her she was being hidden, that she couldn’t join the shifter world until the time was right. Then someone inseminates her with my s.perm just before the election, and her wolf wakes just before the war. Call me crazy but that sounds pretty prophetic from where I stand.”

If Henry had still possessed the ability to stand, he would have needed to sit down. He even considered climbing out of his wheelchair and lying down, so unsteady did he feel. He’d been so busy comforting Ella and so aghast by the assault she endured that he hadn’t put the pieces together yet. “I think you’re right.” He gulped, glancing back to the door where his daughter-in-law slept. “I think we’re seeing the Goddess’s plans in action.”

Sinclair agreed with somber gravity. “And they’re all about Ella.”

Chapter 181 – Saint Ella

Ella

I sleep through the night and well into the next day. My mind is foggy when I wake, and it takes a moment for everything to come rushing back to me. I wince as the memories of my hypnosis session take hold, and my first thought is of Rafe. I tap into our bond.

The tiny being is asleep, but I can feel the lingering stress and fear clinging to his consciousness. I cradle my belly in my arms, feeling a new depth of sorrow for causing my child pain – beyond regret, sadness or guilt.

The force and scale takes me by surprise, and I know I have to work on controlling the feelings I send through our bond. Suddenly I understand only too well why Sinclair holds bad feelings back from me, and though I don't like being kept in the dark, I don't think he's wrong either. In fact, I'm glad my mate is far enough away that he couldn't feel my fear and pain yesterday too.

It would have affected him so much more than it did Henry, and he has more than enough to worry about as it is. I take a bubble bath, and as I rest in the steaming water my pup stirs, fluttering in my womb and emitting a pulse of cautious energy...

He's still wary, still confused and upset by what he heard and felt during my trance. "Hello sweet pup." I hum, stroking my navel and wishing I could rock him in my arms already. "It's okay, everything is okay." I send all the affection, solace and calm I can summon down to him, and he relaxes, his miniscule fingers clutching at the wall of my uterus as if he's reaching for me. I rest my hand on the opposite side of his, singing a soft lullaby and wishing I had a male's ability to purr.

I think Rafe feels the same way, because a moment later he sends a fuzzy, half formed memory to me – of large, protective hands and a deep rumbling sound, the thing that comforts us both more than anything else. A tug of longing accompanies the hazy thought, and I realize he misses Sinclair.

I know, my love. I miss him too." I share, pausing my singing for a moment as I struggle to hold back my own pining. I want nothing more than to feel Sinclair's touch, to hear his beloved voice murmuring comfort in my ear – even from hundreds of miles away. At the same-time, I can't bring myself to call him. If I do, I know he'll sense that something is wrong, and I'm not going to distract him from the war effort by making him worry I can't handle a few memories. After all – I lived through these things, if I was able to survive them then surely I can survive remembering them.

So I pull myself out of my bath and get dressed, switching to a flowing maxi dress when I realize my maternity jeans are too tight now to fit over my hips and belly. "Are you having a growth spurt, munchkin?" I ask my pup, excited and pleased that he's getting bigger and stronger.

Just remember that Mommy is a lot smaller than Daddy, so don't go getting too big, okay?" I add, remembering the birthing class where they told us to expect twelve pound babies. I wonder if I would have grown into a taller, larger woman if my wolf hadn't been bound, but I suppose there's no way to know now.

When I walk out of my room, intending to take my growling stomach down to the kitchens for a snack, my guards straighten up and puff their chests out, as if they want to look as large and powerful as possible. It's a bit odd, but I don't think anything of their behavior until I get downstairs and feel all the eyes following me through the palace, and all the hushed murmurs circling in my wake. I catch a few snippets of the whispers, my heart sinking when I hear the words, priests... her wolf was bound...so many years,"

Apparently everyone knows what happened during my hypnosis, and as much as I want to curl in on myself to hide from the scrutiny of so many strangers, I notch my chin up and ignore them. It isn't until I hear another snatch of speech nearer the kitchens that I realize their tones aren't pitying or condescending, but reverent. "How did she survive? ...Chosen by the Goddess... blessed."

If I thought things would be better once I reached the service level of the palace, I was sorely mistaken. If anything I draw more attention, and when I walk into the kitchens I cause quite the commotion. At once I'm being guided into a chair and plate upon plate of food is being set in front of me, eager cooks and maids murmuring their admiration and asking me to name any dish or delicacy, promising to whip up whatever I desire. I smile and thank them, insisting I don't need anything special. Still, the head Chef, an older woman with a no nonsense attitude, refuses to let me leave until I've told her my favorite meal, promising to cook it for supper this evening, I oblige, then quickly retreat to the orphan's wing. If there's anyone I can count on not to treat me differently – whether with awe or pity – it's Isabel.

She doesn't disappoint, as I enter she arches a sardonic brow. "Well if it isn't Saint Ella."

I smile, feeling a rush of fondness for the prickly woman. This is why I like her. She gives me no judgment, no pity and no fawning. She sees me exactly the same way she did yesterday, and I need that when I hardly recognize myself anymore. "Good afternoon, Isabel." I greet warmly. There's a baby wrapped in a sling against her chest, and I move forward to admire the child. Sadie stares up at us with wide blue eyes, and I stroke a finger over her cheek. How's she doing?"

"She's getting spoiled rotten." Isabel remarks dryly, her tone masking the deep affection I know she feels for the infant. "She always wants to be held and wails like a little banshee if she's put down even for a moment."

“What a lucky girl that you’re here to serve her every whim.” I tease, strolling around to check on the other pups. Even with the children we’ve been able to foster with local families, the planes keep bringing more, and the nursery is growing to be too large for one woman to wrangle alone.

We’ve had a few more volunteers from the city express interest in helping here. If you had more hands on deck, you could take turns with Miss Spoily there.” I offer, nodding towards Sadie and watching Isabel’s expression closely. Her eyes narrow and I add, “or they could free you up so you can devote your time to the pups who need the most attention.”

Isabel wraps a protective arm around Sadie’s back, and I know I’ve read her correctly. She’s clearly attached to the pup. (I’m not going to let just anyone come in here.” She counters stiffly.

I would have to interview them.”

“That can be arranged.” I promise, grinning at a toddler who’s just woken from his nap and is now standing at the bars of his crib, begging to be picked up. I pull him into my arms, kissing his chubby cheeks. “Well hello there, handsome. Did you have a nice nap?”

He giggles as I bounce him in my arms, but his laughter dies away quickly, as if he’s remembering something unpleasant. “I don’t like naps.” He whispers sulkily.

Really?” I ask, making my voice sound shocked.

I love naps. Naps are the best.”

He looks at me curiously. “You take naps?”

“Of course I do, whenever I can.” I share, studying his small face as his features settle into a frown.

“Mommy naps too.” He tells me a minute later, looking grim but hopeful. Is she here?”

“No angel.” I sigh, cuddling him a bit closer. He leans his cheek against my shoulder, sniffing softly. “Did you used to nap with your Mommy?”

I ask. Do you not like them anymore because she isn’t here to snuggle with you?”

He nods pitifully, and I rub his back. I catch Isabel watching us with a look of abject despair, but she covers it quickly, turning away. Well I’ll tell you what. I know I’m not as good as your Mommy, but I’ll nap with you if you want?”

He nods again, and I give him a squeeze, trying to pour all the love in my heart into his small body. I feel a tug on my dress, and I look down to find another pup hovering at my side. This one is a little girl around four, and she's looking up at me like she's not sure if I'm real. "Can I naps with you too?" She asks shyly, "I have bad dreams when I sleeps alone."

"Of course." I promise, soon met with a chorus of, "Me too? What about me? Can I?" I look around at the other pups and realize they've been listening all along, and they're all wearing similarly hopeful expressions. "I'll tell you what, why don't we make a nice big blanket fort, and every afternoon when I take my nap, anyone who wants to come cuddle will be welcome? How does that sound?"

A chorus of approval meets my ears, and I send the guards at the door to gather extra blankets and pillows, and the little girl clutching my skirt says, "My big sister says you're a Princess, and the Goddess sent you to us. Is she right? Is it really true?"

Isabel snorts at my surprised expression.

Rumors reach the nursery just as fast as they do the rest of the palace. Did you really think they wouldn't know?")

"I am no Princess," I tell the child. And I don't know the Goddess's plans any more than you do little one."

She will be better than a Princess." Isabel interjected, gentling her tone for the child.

When her mate leads his army back home and overthrows the tyrant, she will be Queen." I'm taken aback by the firm conviction in her voice, as if she is looking forward to this future. Her icy gaze meets mine, and I see it is more than mere conviction, it's closer to a demand. I realize she believes in Sinclair and me, we've given her hope when she wanted none, and now she's going to hold us to it. She won't stand for being let down, and that is the last thing I want to do.

If there are more secrets waiting in my past, I have to continue searching for them. I need answers if I am to do right by Isabel and these pups, by all the shifters and humans suffering in this war. I am not eager to try hypnosis and ether again, but I can be brave for them – if not for myself.

Chapter 182 – Sinclair

Sinclair

My wolf is half-mad with guilt and worry. I've been waiting for Ella's call all day, but when the clock strikes four and I still haven't heard a peep from my mate, I call my father. The line rings for what feels like ages, but then Dad's familiar face appears on my screen. "Is she still asleep?" I inquire, before he even has a chance to greet me.

"I haven't seen her." Dad replies, his brow crinkling in the video. The image is jostling slightly, his background shifting and changing as he wheels himself forward with one hand. But I've been at the airfield all day. I'm just getting back to the palace now. I'll check on her now."

I gnash my teeth impatiently, not really wanting to talk about anything until I know how my mate is doing. Still, I ask, "How was it today?"

More of the same, I'm afraid." Dad reveals sadly.

The average number of refugees making the trip each day hasn't increased, but it hasn't decreased either."

What about their conditions?" I ask, weary to the bone amidst so much misfortune. "Are there more injuries? More unaccompanied pups?"

"Everything seems stable." Dad reports, but I can tell he doesn't consider this any victory. "How did it go with the FrostFang Alpha?"

"Well, I think." I answer, looking out the windows of my suite in the FrostFang pack's headquarters. A mountain range spreads out on the horizon, the majestic towers of volcanic rock covered in verdant peat moss. It's green and glorious, but there are almost no trees. I feel a deep pang as I think about the dense forests back home, wondering how these wolves can be so content without any woodlands.

Gabriel said Alpha Aiden would be an easy sell, and so far he's been very supportive. He hasn't officially pledged his alliance, but I think we can count him among our friends at the summit.

"And you? How are you holding up?" My father inquires, a knowing timbre in his rich voice.

"It's cold up here, more like back home." I muse aloud, my train of thought momentarily derailed by my wolf's agitated energy. If Ella's still out I may let my wolf out for a run, he's been bloody stir crazy with all the travel and the situation with Ella isn't helping. He's on edge and I'm not going to be able to keep a handle on him much longer."

(You might consider doing that even if she is awake – before you two talk.” Dad advises, but despite his wisdom I’m tracking the interiors of Gabriel’s palace as he moves through the halls, measuring the distance between him and my mate. “Depending on how she’s doing, seeing her might push you over the edge.”)

I know you’re right.” I concede, “But I don’t think I can stand it. It’s one thing if she’s still resting. it’s another if she’s trying to work through this alone.”

Well the word around the palace is that she’s a gift from the Goddess, sent to see us through the war.”

Dad shares, his mouth twisting with wry humor. “It seems the guards who oversaw her hypnosis couldn’t quite keep it to themselves. I promise you she’ll have lots of support when she comes to.”

He pushes into our suite, and I hold my breath, c0cking my ears for sounds of movement or tears.

Updated by novelxo.com

Dad pauses in the doorway of the bedroom, looking bemused. “Well she isn’t here.” He announces after a moment. He looks around, backtracking into the sitting room and switching the camera view so I can see his perspective. He lifts a cell phone from the coffee table, pressing the power b.utton but only finding a black screen. “Her phone is here and dead.”

My heart beats louder in my c.hest, and I smother a growl. “Okay, check with the guards – then try the kitchens, the nursery, Cora’s rooms and the camp – in that order.”

It only takes ten minutes to find my mate, but I’d be lying if I said I bore the wait well. My mind races with the unknown. Why didn’t she call me the moment she woke? Is she alright? Maybe I should have called Phill!pe – he won’t have left her side.

Of course when my father wheels into the nursery, Isabel meets us at the door, her arms crossed over her c.hest. “Where have you been?” She demands.

That mate of yours has insured my pups will be up half the night! I tried to tell her they’d already napped but no, she couldn’t resist.”

A moment later I understand, because the video draws nearer and nearer to a masterful blanket fort as Dad crosses the room. And then she’s there on my screen, curled up at the center of a puppy pile.

They surround her on all sides, arms and legs splayed over her body as she cuddles a little boy to her breast, lost in the tangle of limbs. My heart melts, and suddenly I don't care why she didn't call me. It's one of the sweetest scenes I've ever seen, and the last thing I want to do is disturb their slumber.

Unfortunately my mate seems to sense my virtual presence, because she blinks her gorgeous gold eyes a moment later and stretches like a sleepy kitten.

Her gaze lands on my face before she even looks at Dad, as if her instincts drew her to the phone in his hand like a magnet. Raw vulnerability transforms her features from sleep, as if she wasn't prepared to see me so soon, or face the feelings I naturally provoke. "Hello trouble." I greet huskily, "Did I interrupt your cuddle party?"

She peeks up at me from beneath her lashes, untangling herself from the pups enough to sit up and glance warily at the other adults in the room. As I can see a hundred emotions flickering in the bottomless pools of her eyes before she pulls a curtain over her expression, erasing any hint of her true feelings.

She doesn't say a word, so I continue. "How are you doing, little mate?" I inquire tenderly, "I've been worried about you."

Ella's eyes widen imperceptibly, and then she slumps back down against the piled pillows, "They told you." She moans, frustration and just a little resentment lacing her silken voice.

As I watch, I see her eyes jump somewhere above the screen, and I can imagine my father gesturing a warning to her. A wordless rumble rises in my chest, "Should I take that to mean you planned on keeping it to yourself?" I inquire ominously.

Ella shivers at my dominant tone, "That isn't what I meant.)

(Dad, we need a moment alone." I state, "Can you please clear the room?"

Ella's eyes leap to the sleeping pups, clearly worried about waking them. "No – she object, at the same moment Isabel growls, "Absolutely not."

"I'll go upstairs and call you from my phone." Ella offers, clearly not realizing the device is dead. When I tell her as much she responds that she'll sit beside the charger. I watch as she kisses the dozing children and extracts herself from the pile, then clambers up and disappears out the door.

I hang up with Dad, and a few minutes later my phone rings and Ella's face appears on the screen, beautiful and haunted. "Start talking, baby." I instruct, needing to know what she's thinking.

Ella reclines in her nest, the curtained walls casting her features in shadows. "I have too many questions to count." She admits, clearly deciding to skip over the difficult parts and avoid evoking the painful memories. "Who were those Priests? How did they know about me? Why did they say I needed to stay hidden? I don't understand any of it – the only thing that makes sense now is why everything changed. I was living without a critical piece of my soul for years, and the entire world became duller and emptier because of it."

I purr sympathetically. "I have those same questions," I relate, wishing I could touch her. "But right now I'm more concerned with how you're feeling, Ella."

She shrugs non committally, "Okay. I've been better." She mutters, "But I've also been worse."

"That isn't a real answer and you know it." I admonish, working to keep my voice soft and even "

Is that why you didn't call me? Why you wanted to keep it from me?"

"I didn't want to worry you." Ella replies thickly,

And you don't get to be mad about that because you do the same thing with me all the time," Her tone is petulant, but I can hear the tears in her voice even if I can't see them in the low light.

"How worried should I be, little wolf?" I rumble, " because I have to tell you, you seem awfully upset for someone claiming to be okay."

"I'm not upset." She insists, hiccuping and proving her words false. I'm just... " She trails off, her lip quivering.

"Just what, Ella?" I prompt, instinctively sensing that this is the true reason she avoided reaching out.

She can fake it with everyone else, but she can't fake it with me. I can read her like a book, and she knows it.

I scared Rafe." She admits miserably. "He's still not at ease, and I don't understand... " She sniffles, swiping at her cheeks. "If someone knew I was there .. if they knew I was suffering, then why did they leave me there? I could have been hidden anywhere ... but those priests must have known the kind of place the orphanage was." Her shining eyes glow up at the phone screen. "They said they were there to protect me... they were obviously wolves, why would they let the humans hurt me that way?"

I don't know, sweetheart, " I croon, sending my purrs over the line. "But I promise we'll find out.

Chapter 183 – Roger’s Injury

3rd Person

Cora’s first week working with the doctors at the airfield was both overwhelming and fascinating. She felt like she was lightyears behind the Vanaran physicians in medical expertise and technological know-how, but they were welcoming and patient with her deficiencies. She threw herself into the work, accepting the fact that she’d have to start as a glorified scrub nurse until she learned enough to start doing major procedures and seeing patients on her own.

Cora felt as she had in the early days of medical school, as if her brain was a sodden sponge already oversaturated with new information but still trying to soak up more. The work was fascinating, but it was also devastating and draining.

This wasn’t like being in school and practicing on her fellow students or cadavers – her patients were real people and they were suffering so much more than injury or disease. They were grappling with grief and loss – for the lives and homeland they cherished if nothing else.

By the end of her fourth day on the job, Cora was ready to collapse. She looked around at the other doctors and wondered how on earth they found the strength to keep up this work. She was tempted to ask, but instead she gritted her teeth and pushed through the last hour of her shift. About half an hour before they were set to finish for the day, Cora found herself with a rare moment of quiet. There was only one patient left, and the head surgeon already had too many helping hands for her to pitch in.

Cora began to clean her work station, disinfecting! everything she’d touched and wiping down every surface in sight, before neatly stowing her supplies. She was intently scrubbing her hands when a familiar voice sounded over her shoulder. “Do you have time for one last patient?”

She looked up to find her new colleague, May, standing behind her with a kind expression. Cora looked around, both searching for the patient in question and a substitute for the sick bay she’d just packed up. Her eyes landed on the other woman’s, which seemed viable. “Can I use your workstation?”

“Sure.” May agreed, “it’s sanitized but haven’t put everything up yet.” “Who’s the patient?” Cora asked, pulling on a fresh pair of gloves. “He requested you by name,” May shrugged. “I think he’s part of your own delegation.”

Cora’s traitorous heart skipped a beat, and a moment later Roger appeared, cradling his left hand. Cora narrowed her eyes, determined not to let the butterflies causing chaos in her tummy sway her judgment. He stood in the doorway, all masculine charm and Alpha dominance – and as usual, his full attention was glued to her blushing face.

“You know there’s an in-house physician at the Palace.” She stated coolly. I’m sure his team can handle whatever ailment plaguing you.}

“But the palace is so far away, and you don’t have any other patients, right?” Roger inquired, a devious glint in his eyes.

Just because I don’t now, doesn’t mean an emergency might not come in at any moment.”

Cora countered, her hands on her hips. “And if my hands are tied with you, then who will help them?”

still unphased, the clever wolf pursed his lips. “One of the other physicians packing away their stations?” He suggests, nodding to the Vanaran doctors around them.

Cora huffed, “what’s wrong with you anyway?”

Roger presented his hand, which had a large but certainly non-urgent splinter of wood embedded in his palm. “I think I’m dying.”

Cora glowered, the leash on her temper snapping taught. It took a lot of built up frustration for her to let loose at someone, but she’d been tormented by this wolf for more than a week now. True, he hadn’t made a move since that confusing night at dinner, but his presence was impossible to escape. She could always feel when he was near, and half the time she wasn’t quick enough to flee before he entered a room and found her with those dark eyes.

She was constantly trying not to squim under his searing gaze, forever trying to block out his husky voice so it wouldn’t make her pulse race. Things had gotten to the point that Cora was practically looking around corners to make sure he wasn’t lying in wait to surprise and tempt her with his rugged features and mysterious allure.

Thus, when faced with this latest outrage, Cora threw her well-honed skills for self-preservation out the window. “Are you fucking kidding me, Roger? You do realize that people are actually dying here, don’t you?” She didn’t wait for him to answer furiously ripping off her gloves. “This isn’t cute, you know. Do you have any idea what my day has been like?”

His roguish expression softened, and he replied, From the looks of it, it’s been the sort that means you’re in dire need of a laugh.” Roger assessed, mouth quirked. “And a stiff drink – perhaps with a friend who’s good at listening.”

“And that’s supposed to be you?” She snorted derisively. “If that’s your example of your humor, then I'm not interested in hearing more, and I don't drink." I've seen you drink more than once, Cora. Roger corrected her, a note of warning entering his voice.

I should have said that I don't drink with you." She amended in a biting tone. "oh?" He answered with a smirk. "Why not?"

You're not scared are you? Cora scowled, notching her chin up. I can't be baited that easily either, but I assure you fear isn't the problem."

(Then what is?" Roger pressed, moving forward so that he loomed over the curvy human. You've said you have no interest in me, so what's the problem? You get to relax and vent a little and enjoy a night off from all this stress – is that so terrible.

(I don't want to humanize you." She countered fiercely. "If I do, I might forget what a jerk you are."

Roger chuckled, sidling closer. "Should I take that to mean I'm growing on you?" He questioned slyly.

I knew the ice cream would work." «The ice cream was a dirty trick and you know it."

Cora insisted stubbornly, trying not to let him see how much she'd enjoyed it. In truth it had been the best ice cream she'd ever tasted, and though she'd only meant to take a single bite before smashing it in the wolf's smug face, she'd ended up devouring it all in a single sitting. "You need to learn how to take no for an answer.

Roger emitted a wordless rumble. "Now I have to think that a brilliant doctor who spent as many years working among wolves as you did, must know better than to challenge an Alpha."

"You see, this is the problem with you wolves." Cora seethed. A no isn't a challenge, it's not a provocation, it's simply an answer to a basic question."

Roger purred, but it was not a gentle sound, it was more like a murmur somewhere between a hum and a growl. His eyes began to glow amber as he looked down at Cora. And the problem with you humans, is that you fail to realize how much you say with body language and pheromones. I take your no as a challenge because it's meant as one, and I pursue you despite your protests because I can smell your attraction to me,)

(I've been attracted to plenty of people I had no intention of taking to bed. Attraction is a reflex, not proof or justification of actual interest." Cora hissed defensively. "I don't do this. I don't get involved with men who want more from me than I can give – it's a recipe for disaster."

“And what do you give?” Roger questioned, settling his hands on her hips and scalding her through her clothes. Some hurried one night stand with a stranger you meet in a bar and won’t ever see again?”

Cora’s chocolate eyes went wide. “How did you know that?”

“An educated guess.” Roger flashed his fangs. Which you just confirmed.” His powerful fingers ran up her side, and he relished the sound of her heart pounding against her ribcage at a mile a minute.

But for the record, I knew because I’ve been the same way ever since Lydia left me. It’s not a pattern you begin because it’s what you truly want – you do it because it’s safer than risking your heart.” He searched her lovely face, “Of course, we know why I chose that path – why did you, Cora?”

“Stop it.” Cora ordered sharply. “Stop talking to me this way, stop touching me.” Her lower lip quivered dangerously, and Roger sighed, accepting that he wasn’t going to get any further with the human on this day.

He released her slowly, “I’ll be here when you’re ready to talk, whether it’s about your work here, or us.” He offered. “Anything you have to say, I always want to listen.” He reached over to her medical tools and plucked a pair of tweezers from the tray, quickly extracting the splinter from his hand and retreating.

Cora was left staring after him in surprise and confusion, feeling – for the first time – as if she was way out of her depth with this wolf.

She didn’t like it- not one bit.

Chapter 184 – Bad Dreams

Ella

Darkness, terror, pain – my wolf being torn away. Blinding light, loss... emptiness. I wake screaming, for the sixth day in a row. It's been a week since Leon uncovered the memory of having my wolf bound, and every night has passed in the same exhausting pattern. I stay awake as long as possible, until I can no longer keep my eyes open, and then there is no time to consider calling my mate. The demons descend the moment I relax my defenses, and I'm helpless to keep them at bay.

Phillippe rushes in, a familiar look of worry on his face. His eyes go straight to me rather than scanning the room for threats, because by now he's learned that the greatest threats are in my head. "Are you okay?" He asks, frowning.

I nod, sitting up in my nest and pushing the blankets away, "It's just more of the same." My phone rings at my bedside, and I take a deep breath before answering Sinclair's call. "Good morning, mate." "Good morning, trouble." He rumbles warmly, "You missed another dream date:"

"I know," I say regretfully. "Im sorry, I've just been so exhausted that I fall asleep before I can think about dreams." In truth the nightmares claim me before I can hear my mate's calls, but I'll be damned if I'm going to admit that to the overprotective Alpha.

Phillippe scowls disapprovingly, crossing his arms over his chest in obvious admonition for my lie. I shoot him a warning glare to keep his mouth shut, and he offers me one final glower before retreating from the room so we can finish our call in private.

"Turn on your camera, baby." Sinclair instructs, "I want to see you. I do as he asks, hoping I don't have dark circles beneath my eyes. "Where are you now?" I ask, leaning back against my pillows.

His handsome face appears on the screen, deep green eyes drinking me in like a blind man who's only just regained his sight. Sinclair is still abed as well, and I can see a hint of his bare chest at the bottom of the feed, his muscles flexing and relaxing as he gets comfortable. "The White Claw territory." Sinclair answers, sounding drowsy still. "

This Alpha is a tricky one – very cunning and difficult to read. He's unpredictable too, and I'm not sure how to best approach him." "His past politics don't give any hint?" I ask, feeling more awake than my mate seemns. "His voting record?"

"It's all over the board." Sinclair explains, "And he's not one for deals and alliances. He votes based on what's best for his pack, but it isn't clear how he decides his priorities."

"You can always play the Damon will set his sights on Vanara once he conquers the continent' card, or point out the resource strain of accepting sO many refugees." I suggest, rubbing my belly.

Once again, Rafe had been startled and upset by my nightmares, but hearing his father's voice always Works wonders – possibly because it calms me every bit as much as it does him.

"Both good ideas." Sinclair murmurs, "But I don't really want to talk strategy right now, baby."

"Oh, what do you want to talk about?" I inquire slyly, "summit plans? The refugee camp? What color dress I should get for the ball?"

Sinclair chuckles, "Imp. How about we discuss why on earth you're wearing clothes in my bed?"

"Hey this is my nest." I correct him saucily. "And besides, you're not here. Just because you want me n.aked all the time

"I'd certainly like to see you n.aked now." Sinclair interjects, his voice low and husky. His arm is moving just out of frame, and from the hungry glint in his eye, I can tell he's stroking himself.

"Hmm, I don't know." I tease, fiddling with the strap on my nightdress. "I seem to remember a certain bossy wolf telling me that my pleasure belongs to him. and forbidding me from touching myself because it's his responsibility as my mâte." I pull down the fabric to expose one of my b.reasts, cupping the sensitive mound in my hand as I admire my mate. "I think if I were n.aked and I had the sight of such a gorgeous, virile Alpha in front of me like this ... I would be very tempted to misbehave."

"Is that so?" Sinclair inquires darkly, his wolf eyes flashing.

I bite my lower lip and nod. "I can't help myself." I confess, revealing my other b.reast and shimmying out of my nightgown. I lift the phone so he can see my fingers training down over my belly and between my legs. "It's been so long since I felt your touch, Dominic." I might be doing this for show, but it's only too true. My wolf has been going crazy without affection from her mate, and I wasn't far from taking matters into my own hands as it was. I gently circle my swollen clit with my fingertips, my eyes falling closed with delight.

Sinclair growls, sending a delicious shiver down my spine, "Naughty mate." He croons, "If I didn't know any better I'd think you were trying to earn yourself a spanking. But I'll forgive this much because I'm away, just as long as you don't go any further."

On cue, I sink my fingers into my soaked channel, gasping and moaning at the sensation, even as I wish it were his hands on my body, his hardness filling me. "Oh you're really in for it now." Sinclair warns me, all grumbly and foreboding.

My pulse races and my lust spikes as his own movements become more pronounced. He watches me like a starving man as he rubs his hard member, making me feel beautiful and powerful at once. "What are you thinking about, trouble? Hmm, what's got you so worked up that you're willing to risk provoking my wolf this way?"

"You." I confess, wishing I had both hands free so I could give some attention to my aching breasts. I'm thinking about all the wicked things you're going to do to me when you get back."

"Tell me." Sinclair orders seductively, shifting his own phone so that I can see down below his waist.

Licking my lips, I find myself getting distracted by the heat building inside of me, so much so that my mate has to call my attention back to him with a soft purr. "You'll start slow," I finally answer, my voice little more than a whisper. "You'll kiss me until my knees go weak... and then you'll strip off my clothes and explore every inch of my body with your mouth and hands, discovering the ways my shape has changed and teasing me until I'm writhing underneath you.. and then... and then, ohh." My sheath clenches around my fingers, and my hips rock up into my hand.

I can't continue, so my mate takes over. "And then I won't be able to wait any longer." Sinclair tells me sensually. "It's been too long, and I'll be nearly desperate to be inside you. After all this is only the first time of many, so I won't worry about pacing myself or letting you off easy for all of your mischief while I've been away. I'll drive myself into your tight little pussy in a single thrust and rut you so hard that you see stars."

The phone is shaking in my hand, and I'm fighting to smother my whimpers as I near the edge. "Don't you dare drop that phone, little wolf." Sinclair rumbles, sounding as if he's barely hanging onto his control. "And don't you dare come yet, because I'm not done telling you my plans." I whine needily, and he only purrs with satisfaction. "Do you like being watched this way, Ella? Do you like touching yourself on camera for me?" nod, barely containing a sob. "Please, Dominic.

I'm so close." "Not yet, baby. I'm enjoying seeing what a dirty girl you are." He declares. I shake my head, not sure whether I'm trying to deny his words or hold off the wave of rapture swelling above me. Sinclair chuckles knowingly,

No? I'm wrong?" He croons, "you're not loving putting on this show for me, little exhibitionist?" "Only for you." I gasp, biting down on my lip so hard I draw blood. "No one else."

“Damned straight.” Sinclair replies, his voice like gravel. “Goddess, I can’t wait to be inside you again. I’ll make you beg, just like this. I’ll hold my power back from you until you’re finally gushing all over my c0ck, and then I’m going to give you everything I have. I’m going to-“

I can’t bear anymore, I detonate then and there, crying out into the empty room. I catch a look of triumph from my mate, even as the sight of my defiant ecstasy sends Sinclair over the edge himself and his lusty growls fill my ears as he finds his release in his hand.

Afterwards he purrs, scolding me and praising me in equal measure, and I belatedly realize he wanted to make me lose control all along – just so he has an excuse to inflict more sensual torments on me later. I float in the heady afterglow, soaking up his sweet nothings and fighting to stay awake.

“Go back to sleep, sweetheart.” He encourages after a while, seeing my valiant struggle. “No, I wanted to talk to you about my next hypnosis session.” I say, forcing my eyes open. It’s been a week. The doctor said I could try again after a week.”

“Ella, we decided the next session would have to wait until I’m back.” Sinclair reminds me, recalling the conversation we’d had when I mentioned my interest in going back to Leon earlier this week. “No, you decided.” I sigh, “we need answers, Dominic.”

“Answers that can wait until you have the support you need to uncover them.” He insists. “I have Henry, and he might not be able to calm me the way you do, but you know it’s less painful for him than it is for you.” I argue.

“I’m not worried about my pain, I’m worried about your and Rafe’s wellbeing.” Sinclair states firmly. “But the damage is already done.” I claim fiercely. “There can’t be anything worse than having my wolf taken from me.”

“We don’t know that.” Sinclair grimaces, “and I’d hate to find out the hard way.”

“Dominic, plea-“

“No, Ella.” He cuts me off, raw authority in his deep voice. “We do it together, or not at all. Is that clear?” I swallow my protests and try to quell the rebellion churning in my blood. “Crystal.”

Chapter 185 – Ella Schemes

Ella

I gather Henry, Philippe and Gabriel just after lunch, careful not to hint about my motives for this meeting. Instead I ask them to come to my suite for a chat before returning to their regular daily tasks.

Naturally, as my personal guard Philippe would have been here anyway, but when Henry and Gabriel arrive and realize that this is a group discussion rather than a private audience, they automatically sense that something is up – and they're right. "What's on your mind, Ella?" Henry inquires, wheeling over to take a place beside me.

"I have to ask a favor of you all." I begin hesitantly, knowing that my next request isn't going to go over well at all. "And while I know this puts you in a very difficult position, I'd like to ask that this conversation remain between the four of us – whether you agree to help me or not."

Philippe stiffens, and Gabriel's sharp eyes search my face. "You're asking us not to tell Dominic?"

"Yes, but I swear that I have good reason." I insist, the words spilling out of me in a rush. "You all know what happened in my hypnosis session and how many questions it raised about my past. You know how unprecedented all of this is, and that the events I recalled suggest powerful forces at work." I take a steadying breath to try to stop my voice from shaking. "You must also realize the implications of all this, and how seriously the people are taking these rumors."

The men exchange wary glances. They may be among the few shifters in the palace not treating me like some sort of divine savior, but they'd have to be blind and deaf not to hear the whispers, or notice the worshipful gazes and gifts raining down on me from the pack.

"This is so much bigger than finding out who my parents were or why I was given up." I continue fervently. "If that were all it was then I wouldn't mind waiting -I didn't want to do this in the first place." I pause to laugh at the sheer irony of this – how quickly the tables have turned.

"What exactly are you asking, Ella?" Gabriel inquires, sounding genuinely curious rather than cautious.

"Dominic doesn't want me to do any more sessions without him, with good reason. The baby and I will cope better if he's present, and he'll be here to take care of me if things get difficult again." I acknowledge. "But it will also be more stress on him – far more than it is or any of you, because we aren't bonded. The bottom line is that Dominic can't protect me from my past, and he's already got enough to worry about without his wolf going berserk because I have a bad memory and he can't fix it."

"That may be true, but I can tell you right now that this argument isn't going to hold water with us, Ella." Gabriel replies, even though there's a softness in Henry's eyes which I understand only too well. "You are Dominic's Luna, and interfering with any wolves' mate -let alone an Alpha's - is forbidden except in cases of abuse.

What's more, none of us would do or feel differently if it was our own mate in your shoes. I understand you have a tender heart and you're trying to protect him from unnecessary pain, but that would be a disservice to his wolf. It's the Alpha's duty to bear the brunt of the stress and pain for his people, because he has the strength to take it. He'll feel far worse if you do this and he wasn't here for you, than he will if you wait and let him support you through the process."

I glance between the wolves in front of me, who sit with their arms crossed over their chests and wear identical brooding expressions. I decide to change tracks. "Fine, we won't make it about Dominic." I amend. "Perhaps I should have started by saying that we can't afford to wait, regardless of any of our wishes.

If the people are right.. if things truly are the way they appear and the Goddess's servants hid me and bound my wolf to fulfill some prophecy in this war, then there isn't any time to waste. We need answers to these questions before we start planning a large-scale invasion, maybe before we even strike the alliance.

"Depending on what we find out, the secrets in my past might change the way we view our opponents. It may alter our entire strategy for the war. It would be folly to move forward with our plans when we know we're missing major pieces of the puzzle.

We owe it to our people to do everything we can to bring Damon down, and if I'm part of that then there is no justification for putting this off." I shrug. "Dominic isn't the only one with a duty to put the people above his own needs or desires. If I'm truly to be their Luna, I have to do the same.

The men look more uncertain now, exchanging resigned glances which give me hope I've finally gotten through to them. They know I'm right, even though they don't like it.

"What about the pup?" Henry questions, throwing out one final impediment to my plans. "This baby survived my first shift- hours of terror and agony that certainly should have killed him.

He got through the memory of having my wolf bound." I remind him, running my palm over my round belly. "I hate upsetting him more than any of you ever could, but he's his father's son. He's strong and healthy, and frankly I don't believe there can be anything worse than what he's already overcome."

"And you?" Philippe questions, piercing me with a knowing gaze. "Your stress is the worst thing for the baby, don't you think it's worth waiting until you can do this under the best possible circumstances?" My stomach flutters. Philippe worried me more than Gabriel or Henry from the start, because he knows exactly how tormented I've been by the memories of my first session.

However he's also the one who I absolutely cannot do this without – since he's glued to my side nearly 24/7. In truth, I sought Gabriel and Henry's help to give Philippe permission to defy Sinclair, more than I did to bring them on board themselves.

I silently beg my guard not to reveal my nightmares to the others, saying, "Do you think it's less stressful for me to be floundering in the dark?"

Unsure of whether I might hold something in my memories that can change the course of the war?

Unsure of whether some new demon I didn't even know about is lurking somewhere in my consciousness?" I retort. "Yes, reliving painful things without my mate here is difficult, but it's not nearly as difficult as thinking I might ruin our chances to win this war."

I look down at my belly, wincing, "I love Rafe more than anything, but we're talking about the lives of millions of people. Millions of other children whose parents love them every bit as much as I love my son. Don't you think they're worth our risk?"

Philippe narrows his eyes, and I can see him digging in his heels. Henry and Gabriel, on the other hand, look grave and pensive. "We'll need to think about it, Ella." Gabriel sighs. "And whatever we decide, I don't think we should keep it from Dominic."

"He'll put a stop to it before it can even begin."

Henry interjects, surprising me. "She's right about that. When he makes up his mind there's no changing it.. and it's partly my fault that he's so set against this. I wasn't easy on him about how it went down the first time.... But that was before I understood what we're dealing with." He sighs, scrubbing a hand over his face. "I'm not saying I like it. I agree that it's in all of our interests to pursue this sooner rather than later but I certainly don't approve of sneaking around behind my son's back to make it happen."

Thoroughly scolded, I drop my eyes to my lap. "It's not that I don't believe it's wrong. I do. I know how shitty it is for me to even suggest, but I'm willing to pay the price to my mate. He'll be furious with me, but if it helps the pack then it will be worth it.

The stakes are just too high." I murmur, "Besides, this is my life we're talking about- I have a right to find out where I came from and that isn't anything anyone else can dictate, not even Dominic"

Before they can say another word, the door swings open and Roger strides in, looking grave. Isabel trails behind him, baby Sadie in her arms. "We've got a problem." Roger announces. "The daily shuttle from the continent never arrived. there's a chance Damon has compromised our refugee operation."

Chapter 186 – James' Revelation

Ella

I look back and forth between Roger and Isabel, noting her pallid skin tone and his quiet concern. "How long overdue is the plane?" I inquire, checking the time on my phone.

"It was supposed to get in five hours ago. James has never been late before." Isabel pipes up, bouncing Sadie in her arms and visibly trying to control the tremors of fear wracking her body. I rise from my chair and attempt to put an arm around her, but she jerks away from my touch like a skittish horse. Sighing, I drop my hand.

"Is it possible there weren't any refugees needing to make the journey today?" Henry asks, logical as ever.

"We haven't had a single day without a new batch." Gabriel answers grimly, "the wait list back on the continent is a mile long. If he didn't come today, then something has gone wrong."

"Is the news out of the continent still blacked out?" I question, even though I already know the answer. Damon shut such a tight lid on the media that the only information available to us anymore is brought by refugees and spies.

"Yes." Gabriel replies, with the same dark expression. "I'll see if I can tap into our spy network. I have a few people stationed around the egress points on the coast. But to be frank the fact that they haven't reported in either doesn't bode well."

"What do we do?" Isabel frets aloud, looking hopefully at the King. "Can you stage a rescue mission?"

"We can't go in blind." Philippe declares evenly.

We need to know what we're dealing with before we send relief troops or more aircraft."

"But if the camps on the coast are under attack then they need your help now." Isabel argues, swinging her frantic gaze to me, "Ella, do something!"

"We will." I promise, resisting the urge to reach for her again. "We're not going to just leave our people to fend for themselves, but Philippe is right, if we charge in blind then not only do we risk failure, but we risk losing even more people than were already in danger."

"But there's no time!" Isabel insists. "They could be dead already." Even though she says they, I can hear the secret fear she won't allow herself to voice. She means he could be dead already. He James, the soldier who rescued Sadie and delivered frightened orphans to the safety of Isabel's nursery every day, who comforted the aloof she-wolf despite her ferocious protests. I'd known she was becoming attached to him, but I hadn't realized quite how far she's already fallen. I say a silent prayer to the Goddess for the man's safety, to spare my cranky friend more pain if nothing else.

"I know." I tell her gently, "but we don't have many options here, Isabel."

"Don't look at me that way!" She snaps, cuddling Sadie closer. "Like I'm some hysterical woman who can't see reason. I'm not fragile and I don't need your pity."

I cross my arms over my chest, an instinctive growl bubbling to life in my chest. Isabel jolts, her wolf reflexively quivering in the face of my warning, "That's not what I'm doing, and lashing out at me isn't going to bring him home any faster." I state calmly.

Her eyes widen slightly, and then she deflates, submitting to my dominance. "I know, I'm sorry...I just..."

"I know." I assure her, finally sliding my arm around her shoulder and leading her from the room. "We'll get through it, whatever happens."

We're only halfway back to the nursery when Roger comes racing up behind us, "We just got word, James's plane is about to land."

Isabel jerks her head up, "what?"

"We don't know what happened, but he just called in clearance to land." Roger explains, Henry, Gabriel and Philippe joining us as we change direction. We all pile into the King's car and speed towards the airfield. Isabel is shaking with relief beside me, and I try to lean against her for comfort without letting her realize what I'm doing. She glares at me but leans into my warmth despite her thorny demeanor.

We arrive just as James's plane is taxiing down the runway, and when the cargo bay opens, a rush of refugees pour forth, more numerous than any arrival to date. I immediately sense that something has gone terribly wrong back home – worse even than before. There are too many people, and the looks on their faces break my heart. These aren't the panicked but hopeful expressions of relief at a long journey's end, but the hollow-eyed numbness of those that have seen too many horrors to feel anything anymore.

James is the last off the plane, and though Isabel runs half the distance to him, she seems to stop when she realizes what she was doing. Luckily he isn't shy about his affection, and he pulls Isabel and Sadie into his arms as soon as they're in reach. Sadie cuddles him happily, but Isabel pushes at his chest with a look of sullen detachment on her pretty features. "Where were you? What took so long?" She demands, her tone more harsh for all the hurt and fear she's trying to mask.

James growls and tugs her closer, burying his head in her neck. She allows him this much, though she still has the sulky energy of a she-wolf who is determined not to be mollified. James purrs, and she finally relents, melting into his arms. I look away, knowing she wouldn't want her private moment observed.

I turn my attention to the refugees, who ebb forward as if in a trance. The triage tent separates the injured from the unharmed, individuals from families and unaccompanied children from temporary guardians. I go to assist with the intake process, trying to offer what comfort I can.

I lead a couple with minor injuries to the medical tent, and Cora meets me in the doorway with wide eyes. "What's happened?"

"I don't know." I sigh, "but it isn't good."

"The Usurper..." The she-wolf beside me mutters, searching my face for understanding. "Damon, he broke the pact."

Cora and I exchange confused glances. "What pact?" I'm glad that my sister asks, because as Luna I should probably know about the major treaties and agreements governing shifter society.

"The secrecy pact." Her mate explains gruffly, though this doesn't actually clear things up for us.

I don't know if he grew too ambitious and lost control, or if this was part of his plan all along... but it's done now... the entire continent is on fire... the revolution is in shambles... nothing will ever be the same."

His words strike fear into my heart, but I still don't understand them. I don't know about any secrecy pact, but I don't want to force these weary wolves to explain things when they need to be focused on healing. "It's okay." I murmur, "go with Cora here and she'll get you cleaned up, there will be plenty of time to talk later."

I return to the triage tent, but when I see Gabriel and Henry huddled with James near his plane, I can't stay away. I return to their side, noting that while Isabel is taking charge of unaccompanied pups, her eyes are locked on the pilot. I approach behind them, just in time to hear James saying, his army breached the borders in broad daylight – fully shifted, and set upon the humans. It seems Damon is done with shadow tactics that can be explained away by weapons or natural disasters."

"You think it was intentional?" Gabriel demands, sounding as serious as I've ever heard him. "Not some sort of military exercise gone terribly wrong?"

An attempt to work with rogues who betrayed him?"

"From what I can tell it was a calculated assault."

James confirms, "I've never seen anything like it."

"What's happening?" I finally interrupt, pushing into the circle. "Someone mentioned a secrecy pact, and you're saying Damon attacked the humans?"

"Yes," James accedes, glancing anxiously towards Isabel and Sadie.

"The secrecy pact is what bound shifter society from coming out in the open in the lands we share with humans." Henry explains, squeezing my hand. "It's a treaty the united peaks formed in the earliest days of our existence, to preserve the safety of our people and preserve the cultures of both worlds."

Understanding clicks into place, and my mouth drops open. "You're saying that all the humans back home just found out that werewolves are real? Because Damon was too stupid or too greedy to maintain the pact?"

"Exactly." Gabriel nods, "Our two worlds just collided- with violent and devastating impact. My guess is that Damon seeks to enslave the humans as a lesser class of being, that he means to make them serve shifters in his empire."

"But it's not just our continent affected." Henry shares bleakly. "Damon just opened a can of worms for every country on the planet. People all around the world are waking up to discover that creatures from their worst nightmares are real and living among them- that they have more money, power and influence than any humans. The fallout is going to be unimaginable."

"It's already utter chaos." James reports gravely."

Everyone, both shifters and humans are in a fault on panic, and there's no controlling it. That's why I was so late, I was trying to lead people to the coast but every ten feet we'd have to stop and hid from roving war parties belonging to both sides, and then more people would turn up begging to join us.

I've never seen anything like it."

"I can't believe this" I breathe, feeling my knees go weak.

"Believe it." Gabriel said, without ire. "This changes everything. And I think you were right, Ella.” The King is looking at me with determined calm. “We can’t afford to waste a single moment in this war. If there are things in your past that can give us answers... we need to find them as soon as possible.”

Chapter 187 – Fallout

Sinclair

I lean over the back of the sofa in my quest suite, my hands closed in white-knuckled fists around the frame. My phone is lit up on the table in front of me, Gabriel's name glowing on the screen. Hugo and the Black Alder Alpha, Callahan, stand beside me, looking on with somber expressions. "Talk to me. What do we know?"

"It's bad, Dom." The Vanaran King reports. "My spies say that all signs point to utter ruin. Civilians are fleeing the territories in droves, and the governments they're leaving behind are scrambling. The packs have all fallen to Damon, and the human regimes are considering extreme action to hold off the invasion."

"Do they not realize what they're up against?" I demand. "After all, the upper echelons of government have always known the secret, they know how far ahead our Societies are."

"And they've been planning contingencies." My father interjects. "Sovereigns from other continents are offering their aid, there's been talk of employing weapons of mass destruction... of secret laboratories working for decades on projects inventing next-gen arms capable of combatting our own. They've been preparing for this sort of eventuality since day one."

"And what have they come up with? Any weapon deadly to shifters will also be lethal to humans." I remind them.

"From what we can tell, even the best of their labs haven't come close to matching the sophistication of our technology." Philippe reveals. "They're at least fifty years behind. But that's less important than the likelihood that they'll deploy them anyway. Some we can stop and neutralize- others we shield against, but there are others still that we cannot defend against once they've been deployed, only try to mitigate the damage."

"I'm afraid things are reaching the point where the humans may very well decide to abandon their own people left under Damon's rule, for the sake of taking him out once and for all." Gabriel cautions, answering the second part of my question. "They see them as lost causes, collateral damage."

"That's unconscionable." I snarl. "What kind of leader would contemplate killing their subjects so indiscriminately, as if they're nothing more than pawns in some larger game?"

"It's containment." Ella chimes in, her sweet voice clashing with the harsh words. "They're panicking and they want to fight fire with fire. Damon isn't holding back no matter the impact on the shifters under his rule, and the humans are being faced with the choice between losing some of their populations, or having the entirety enslaved."

“As we said.” Roger sighs, “things are worse than we ever could have feared.”

“Are the pathways out of the continent still open?”

I inquire, trying to quell my wolf’s rabid energy.

Are we still able to bring refugees to Vanara?”

“We need more planes.” Dad replies. “One trip a day isn’t enough anymore, and we need to allocate more funding to supporting them once they arrive.”

“Authorize it.” I order, knowing my voice sounds harsh and biting, but unable to help it. “Has there been any word from packs on the other continents? What of the rebellion?”

“Dom, our spies are reporting all the same intel that Gabriel’s are.” Roger shares, “the rebellion is all but in shambles after this... there’s a strong undercurrent of anger and hope among our allies back home... they’re eager to fight, but right now our biggest concern is making sure they live to fight another day.”

“We’ve had word from the Veran King.” Gabriel adds, referring to the continent west of Vanara.

He’s eager to speak with you. Things haven’t devolved to violence there or in Sevka, but the humans are in an uproar around the world. They’re anxious about our future.. they’re willing to offer any help they can to get this under control.”

“Thank the Goddess for that.” I breathe, even though I don’t have the first idea how to do such a thing. The only thing that comes to mind is inventing a time machine and going back to kit Damon before he ever got a chance to put any of his diabolical plans in motion. If I hadn’t been such a noble a.ss we could have avoided all this.

“What are your orders, Alpha?” Philippe inquires, his voice full of belief that I will have some sort of answer. I’m grateful for him, but also at a loss.

“Ella?” I ask, wishing I could see her. “You know the ways of humans far better than we do. Do you have any thoughts?”

There’s a short pause, and then her silken voice floats up from the device. “People are afraid, and right now they see us as their enemies... as monsters from horror films who are all cut from the same cloth as Damon. I think the best thing we can do is show them that they aren’t suffering alone. Show them that Damon does not reflect all shifters, and that our people don’t want him in power any more than they do.” Another pause, and I can imagine my mate’s beautiful face scrunched up in deep thought. “I think we should extend our rescue operations to include human civilians.

Reach out to every state and local government you can to offer aid, whether it's money or resources, and publicize it. We need shifter allies, but I think human allies might be even more urgent now."

"Well put." Dad praises, "we need to combine PR with diplomacy and hard line action. This isn't just our fight anymore."

"Do it." I agree. "I trust you all, authorize whatever funds and resources we can, and put out feelers to contacts throughout the continent. Forward me any correspondence for approval before sending it out, and have our spies start spreading the word on the ground. Half of Damon's strategy is propaganda and fear mongering, we can counter it with a whisper campaign of our own. Don't let people lose hope, don't let Damon convince them we're enemies. Print up flyers supporting the rebellion if we need to, whatever it takes."

There are a few mumbled agreements, and when a hush falls I turn my attention to the person I want to speak with most. "Can I have a minute alone with my mate please?" I request, though it's actually an order. I listen as the men on Ella's end of the line shuffle out, and wait for the Black Alder Alpha and Hugo to leave as well.

When we're finally alone, I ask. "How are you holding up, trouble?"

"I'm a little overwhelmed." She admits in a soft voice, "I never imagined this could happen."

"I don't think any of us believed Damon would be so reckless." I share, feeling more at ease now that we can speak one on one. "I always knew it would be a disaster if he came to power, but I have to confess this is so much worse than I feared." I don't add that I hate not being able to fix it, because she already knows. "I need to see you tonight."

"I'll try my best." Ella promises with true longing, as though she wants nothing more herself. "I've just been so tired with all the summon it planning and the refugees. I'm out the second my head hits the pillow."

"I know baby." I sigh, feeling guilty even though I know a dream date would comfort us both. "I suppose I shouldn't keep you half awake in dreams all night anyway... I just miss you."

"I miss you too, so does Rafe." Ella relates, "He asks for you- in his own way – about ten times a day."

“Maybe I can record some purrs for you both, so it can feel like I’m there even when I’m not.” I suggest.

Ella’s breath catches, and I wonder if she’s been struggling even more than she admits. “I’d love that.”

“Then it’s done. As soon as we’re off the phone.” I vow, wanting nothing more than to spend the rest of our call talking about each other and our pup, but knowing there’s still some business left to cover. “How are plans for the summit going?”

“Well, for the most part.” Ella reports. “Everyone’s looking forward to the ball and Roger is helping me plan some especially sneaky events to win over the reluctant Alphas. Though we’re going to have to reevaluate a few things now.” She pauses, sounding wistful. “And the Black Alder pack?”

“Alpha Callahan was reluctant to join us this morning.” I say ruefully, “but it seems he’s had a change of heart, what with the pact being broken expect the Alphas here are going to be much more motivated to help us now, as shifters living among humans are probably going to be looking for an escape – and what better place than the hidden territories?” I glance at the door, recalling the tense conversation I’d shared with the Black Alder Alpha Over breakfast. “Vanara is the last place on earth shifters Can exist in secret now, and for the first time in the history of the hidden territories, their own society is at risk because of events in the rest of the world. It’s an important wake-up call.”

“Then maybe some good can come out of all this pain.” Ella assesses sorrowfully.

“I hope so.” I agree, wishing I could wrap my arms around her, breathe in her wonderful scent.”But for now we just have to wait and see. This is a new world we’re living in, and if we can save it then it will be up to us to build a new, hybrid society unlike anything before seen in history.”

“And if we can’t?” My precious mate squeaks.

“Im not going to let that happen, Ella.” I remark firmly. “Il die first.”

Chapter 188 – Henry Researches

Ella

After hanging up with Sinclair, I return the King's cell phone and look around at the gathered men." When does Leon arrive?" I inquire, forcing down a shiver. "Within the hour." Gabriel replies, solemn-faced.

Though they'd all agreed that the developments back home warranted accelerating my hypnosis sessions, none of them are happy about keeping them secret. I'm not happy about it either, but I'm also dreading another traumatizing visit to my past.

"Before he arrives I think we should take some blood samples from you, Ella." Henry suggests. "I know the doctors in Moon Valley didn't find any genetic matches for you, but there's a chance that we can trace your ancestry by looking at genetic traits which have historically been documented in certain bloodlines. It won't help us if the inherited genes aren't expressed through ancestral phenotypes, but certain markers in your DNA might still allow us to draw important connections"

"But surely that would only work if my ancestors come from a bloodline deemed worth documenting." I object uncertainly. "I mean if I come from a long line of nobodies then there won't be anything to find."

Phillippe, Henry, Gabriel and Roger exchange meaningful glances. They appear to have a full on silent conversation, trading shrugs and expressions as if batting the responsibility of answering back and forth between one another. "

What?" I finally prompt them, feeling exasperated.

"It's just, Ella," Roger sighs, "it's highly unlikely that you come from random nobodies. It's not impossible, but the fact that you survived having your wolf bound and have proven yourself a match for Dominic... that indicated a level of power that has to be passed down over centuries, getting stronger with every generation. It would explain why the Goddess chose you.. she blessed certain wolves with more magic than others from the beginning."

I look between them curiously. "Does that mean that all of you have the same sort of lineage?" I inquire, "Given that you're among the most powerful Alphas alive today?"

"That's exactly what it means." Henry confirms, not sounding the least bit boastful. "The Sinclairs, Gabriel's bloodline, even Phillippe, they're all incredibly distinguished and can be traced back to the first wolves."

I cross my arms over my chest. "That hardly seems then what, you're doomed to be poor and powerless?"

“That isn’t how it works.” Gabriel chuckles. “Plenty of other traits prove more useful than brute strength, which is why some other bloodlines have died out because so-called weaker wolves outsmarted them. And the fact remains that fair or not, this might hold some clues to your past, so isn’t this worth exploring.”

Suddenly the little girl who asked me if I’m a princess pops into my head, and I grapple with the discomfort of this idea. “I guess, though I don’t think I like the idea of being part of a long line of snobby elites.”

“Oh come on,” Roger jokes, “we’re not all that bad.”

I manage a small smile for his joke, but I grumble the entire way through the blood draw. When the doctor departs I try to sneak in a power nap before Leon arrives, much good that it does me. I end up lying awake and staring at the ceiling, dreading the session about to come. I tried to tell myself it would be okay, but I knew better... and I was right.

Half an hour later I’m in the familiar drug-induced stupor of the ether, the world swirling around me in a hallucinogenic haze. Henry’s hands are warm around mine, and I try to focus on the good feelings, rather than the walls coming down in my mind.

“All right Ella, last time we were here you recalled being visited by a couple of priests when you were a girl. I understand that was a somewhat traumatic memory for you.” Leon begins gently.

“That’s putting it mildly.” Henry mutters under his breath, and I squeeze his hand to let him know I’m okay.

“Yes.” I answer, delighting in the starbursts dancing across my dark eyelids.

“I want to ask you if you ever saw or spoke with those men again?” Leon inquires. “Can you recall meeting other men or women in similar clothing, who spoke about things you didn’t understand?”

I breathe deeply and try to focus, recalling their wrinkled faces while trying to hold off the feelings evoked by that particular memory. I’d been ready to say no, but the more I focus on the details of their robes and the timbres of their voices, I realize that isn’t true. “Yes.” I say, even as I realize it. “I did see them again.”

“When?” Leon inquires, as nonchalantly as if we’re talking about the weather.

“I... I don’t know.” I stammer, not really wanting to move deeper into the possibility – after all, if my first incident with them resulted in the binding of my wolf, I’m not eager to find out what might have come next.

“Don’t resist the ether, Ella.” Leon advises. “Just let it carry you. I know it’s not easy, but we need to know this. This is all to help the pack, remember?”

I squeak my assent, trying to refocus myself as he continues, “try to picture the setting. Where were they when you saw them again, what were they doing?”

Flashes of a dark forest burst into my thoughts, followed by the sound of my feet crashing through the undergrowth, my heart pounding in my ears as adrenaline floods my veins. I have to get away. I think frantically. I can’t let them catch me! Just keep going, don’t stop.

“There’s someone chasing me.” I gasp, understanding setting in as my breath comes in pants. There is no light in the woods save the moon, and as I race away from the monster at my back, I see the priests standing amidst the towering trees... watching... making no move to help me.

“Try going further back, Ella. Who is chasing you?”

“Why did you start running?” Leon prompts, in the same calm tone.

As soon as he says it, I’m transported to a dim alleyway a few miles from the orphanage. I’m thirteen, and it’s the first summer that Cora and I attempted to live on the streets. After fleeing the orphanage and the Doctor’s abuse, we’d lasted two whole months picking pockets and hustling to keep our bellies full. We’d slowly learned the tricks of the trade – how to stay hidden from the authorities and enterprising gangs who might recruit us; how to hide our shelters out of sight and stay warm on the cooler nights; even how to navigate some of the city’s secret closes and corridors to get around.

Everything was fine until this night, when we’d been on our way back to our current home base after breaking into the public bath houses for some stolen showers. Our hair was wet and dripping, and we were giggling up a storm, still riding high on the excitement of our scheme. “I think we should do this at least once a week – their security is so weak I doubt they’ll ever notice.” I laugh.

“Every week, how about every day!” Cora suggests, her cheeks clean and rosy for the first time in too many days.

“Now that’s playing with fire.” A deep voice sounded behind us.

We both whipped around, our eyes going wide as we took in the sight of two huge men towering over our slight bodies. “You take risks too often and you’re just asking to get caught.” The second man agreed, a hungry glint in his eyes.

Cora and I began backing away, both sensing that whatever these men wanted, it wasn't good. My mind was fighting to stay in the present, immediately consumed with the doctor's last attack... the pain, violation and shame of having him on top of me.

"Ella!" Cora shook me back to the present, and the first man offered up a sickly smile. "What a pretty name. Don't be scared, honey, we just want to have a bit of fun."

My first thought was to find some way to lure them away from Cora, and I turned and hissed in her ear, "Run. Run and hide, I'll lead them away."

"Ella no!" She gasped, "I can't -"

"I won't let them catch me, you know how fast I am." I promised. "Now go." Looking uncertain, Cora turned on her heel and darted away. The second man started to go after her, but I reached out a hand to block him. "Wait, you don't need her. Leave her be and I'll do whatever you want."

"Is that so?" The first man asked, smirking. "Do you have any idea what we want, beautiful?"

"I can guess. " I replied, trying to make my voice steady while silently counting how many seconds had passed since Cora ran.

"What do you think?" The second man asked.

"Well she'll certainly bring the higher price, and you know the customers prefer a willing slut." He glanced in the direction Cora had run. "She's gone anyway." He assessed, turning back to me. "Alright girly, why don't you prove yourself to us, otherwise we start looking for your little friend."

I had to hope that Cora had enough time to escape, and I hadn't missed their comment about me fetching a higher price. "Sure," I grinned, "You'll just have to catch me first."

Chapter 189 – The Dagger

Ella

I turn on my heel and run away as fast as my feet will carry me. My would-be kidnappers curse and soon their footsteps are pounding into the pavement behind me. I fly through the sleeping city, careful to make sure I travel in the opposite direction Cora ran.

I hadn't been sure they'd both follow me when another target was still within reach, but it seems their outrage over being duped by a little girl was strong enough to make them focus on me.

I know I need to find some place to hide, or some way to lose them. I'm small and fast, but my pursuers have longer legs and are probably in much better shape than I am. I can't remember the last time I ate, let alone the last time I exercised for any reason other than survival. I turn towards the park in the center of the valley – the trees are dense and there's little to no light, plus I've always had a talent for seeing in the darkness... at least I used to.

My adrenaline pushes me to sprint away from the men, even though my head is telling me to pace myself. I don't risk looking over my shoulder, I simply run until my lungs are burning and my sides are splitting with cramps. Still, I don't let myself slow down. I push through the pain and exhaustion, forcing myself to take longer strides, to move faster still.

I feel a slight flash of relief, when I reach the forest, bounding into the cover of the trees and veering away from the path. I leap over fallen logs and plow through the thick undergrowth, wondering if I should keep running or attempt to climb a tree.

An angry shout sounds behind me, and I realize my pursuers are closer than I knew. My heart stutters with raw panic, but I keep going, panting with the effort of drawing air.

Blood rushes in my ears, and though I can feel branches and thorns scraping my legs, I don't feel any pain. My frantic brain hallucinates the sound of a wolf howling in the distance, then two more join the cry and my eyes flit around the woods, searching for unseen predators. We're deep in the forest now, and all at once I realize this was the worst possible place I could have chosen to flee.

I've always felt safe in the forest, but it seems my eyesight is not as sharp as I remember amidst this pitch blackness, and I've led my attackers away from the bustling city – from any witnesses or bystanders that might step in to help me.

I'm slowing down, no matter how hard I try to carry on. I was running on fumes to begin with, and my adrenaline can only do so much. No! I think frantically, keep going! If they catch you it's all over. They'll sell you to a brothel or to some monster like the Doctor. No one will be left to protect Cora. You have to fight!

A final burst of energy gives me a fleeting sense of hope. I pick up speed once more, but in doing so I move too fast to adequately take in my surroundings. My foot catches on a protruding rock, and I tumble to the ground, rolling and crashing through the undergrowth. I finally come to a stop, sprawled on my back and gasping for air.

I'm bruised and bleeding, and I feel as if I've been punched in the stomach, my lungs temporarily frozen in shock.

My attackers loom above me then, panting for breath but looking down at me with sickening smiles. "Now look at what you've done, you stupid girl." The first remarks, "How are we supposed to get a good price for you when you're all marked up this way? Hmm?"

His partner smirks, "At this rate it will be a week before we can take her to auction, so there's really no reason to be delicate with her. We might as well test the merchandise."

"I agree." The first leers, "The little b!tch was asking for it, besides I doubt a pretty thing like this is still pure anyw ay. You remember how she offered herself up for her friend. The little hussy is just gagging for it."

"Then let's not disappoint her." The second declares, reaching for his belt. "Don't worry slut, we'll make this good for you – as long as you don't fight."

Tears burn in my eyes. I know what happens next

..I know I can survive it, but I don't want to. I don't want to be hurt that way again, and their cruel words fill me with a well of humiliation deeper than I can fathom. It's not my fault I'm not pure, it's not my fault I look this way.. it isn't fair. What have I done to deserve this? Haven't I suffered enough in my short life?

I choke back a sob, I don't know what to do. if I fight them they'll hurt me worse, and if I don't they'll insist that I like it. I look around the forest, searching for some escape, some last ditch rescue.

I freeze when I see two robed figures a dozen meters away, illuminated in a shaft of moonlight between the trees. I don't recognize the men, and yet they seem strangely familiar. They stand there motionless, their hands clasped as they watch the scene with my kidnapers unfold. Their wrinkled faces are drawn in frowns, but they don't make a sound. They don't move to help me, or acknowledge my terror... they simply watch.

"What is she looking at?" The first man grumbles, sounding annoyed that my full attention isn't on them.

“I don’t know, there’s nothing there.” The second mutters in frustration. I can’t focus enough to comprehend that they can’t see the strange men, I’m still staring at the pair with desperation, silently begging them to help me but still too afraid to scream. I know they see me. They’re looking right at me – so why aren’t they acting?

Surely they don’t think I’m here willingly. I hear a whoosh of air, and then a sickening crack as pain explodes across my cheekbone. I hear myself cry out, even though I hate giving them the satisfaction. My vision goes black for a moment, then fills with stars as I blink up at the men in confusion. Any hope I’d kept alive dies as I accept the fact that no rescue is in store for me. They’re going to r.ape me, and then they’re going to sell me to be a.bused over and over again.. possibly for the rest of my life.

The gravity, the reality of that future slams into me, and suddenly my stomach is rising into my throat. I vomit onto the ground beside me, and the men leap back in disgust. “You idiot, you hit her too hard”

“Just drag her over here, I don’t want to get it on me.” The other orders.

Someone lifts my feet, and then I’m being wrenched across the cold, hard earth like a ragdoll.

I blink up at the sky, wishing to leave my body, to be knocked unconscious so that if I must be violated, I won’t have to remember it. Then something glints in my periphery, like silver and starlight. It’s just a flash, buried among the leaf litter and coarse woody debris of the forest floor.

My focus locks onto it, and the closer I look, I recognize the hilt of a dagger. The weapon is unlike anything I’ve ever seen – not the simple blades included in multipurpose tools or even the jagged knives used by hunters. This looks like something out of a museum. Jewels are imbedded in the hilt, and though I can’t see the blade, I instinctively sense that it’s sharp enough to slice through steel.

I reach for it, trying not to telegraph my movements as the first man wrenches my legs apart and rips at my clothes. My fingers close around the cold metal, and I act before I can even think. My body is in survival mode – I’ve tried flight, and now all that’s left is fight. After all, it’s not like I have anything to lose. I slash the dagger across the first man’s throat, watching his flesh rip open with detached horror. It took more strength than I expected, but I managed, and now his hot, crimson bl00d is gushing out as he gurgles and claws at his neck.

The second man j.erks around in shock, wide eyed.

“What – Steven!” He leans down to try to apply pressure to his friend’s wound, clearly more concerned with saving the man than identifying the threat which caused this damage. "What... how

As soon as his eyes slide to me I strike again, burying the blade in the side of his neck until the tip protrudes from the other side of his throat. I rip it free and stab again, before scrambling back on my hands and feet. The second man collapses atop the first, though he still reaches for me, "you little b!tch."

"Are those really the words you want for your last?"

I manage to spit, drawing strength from some unknown source. He opens his mouth again, but nothing comes out. I watch as the light drains from their eyes, before finally looking back to the robed men. They nod their approval, and the first sets a bundle of cloth on a log by his feet. They turn on their heels and stride back through the trees, disappearing from sight.

My limbs are trembling violently, and when I look back to the dead men, I discover that the knife has disappeared. I'm alone in the forest with two dead bodies, covered in blood and my own vomit. But I'm alive, and other than some bruises, I'm unharmed.

I shakily rise to my feet, though it takes a few tries.

I move forward in a trance, investigating the bundle the robed man left behind. It's a fresh change of clothes and a bottle of water. Moving on autopilot I wash away as much of the gore as I can and change, knowing that if I return home to Cora this way, she'll be traumatized. After, I walk out of the forest as if nothing happened, and the strangest part of all is that the closer I come to the edge, the less I remember.

By the time I emerge I can't recall anything at all, and when my sister asks I can only answer that I lost our attackers... and as far as I know, it's the truth.

Chapter 190 – Tested

Ella

When I return to the present, the room is completely silent. Henry is still holding my hand, though he also holds a bucket in case I need to be sick. Leon is watching me closely, as if trying to decipher my mental state. Gabriel, Philippe and Roger look on from the doorway in a horrified hush.

I hadn't been wild about having them here with me during such a vulnerable time, but in the end we agreed that we needed as many brains on the case as possible. Besides, I'm discovering that I don't really mind having so many friends on hand this really is a strange new world for me.

"Do you want me to bring you out of the ether, Ella?" Leon finally asks, and I realize that he hadn't been forced to give me the antidote this time. I'm still floating along under the influence of the drug, still in the safe embrace of the high despite the horrible things I've just remembered.

I'm not feeling yet, not processing, and I don't think I want I shake my" updated by jobnib.com" head in refusal, moving my hand to my belly. The baby reaches out to me through our bond, uncertain and afraid. Had he understood my fear, my helplessness? Or did all he knew was that I was suffering? "Can I have something nice?" I request, not truly knowing what I want or need. "

Something for the baby?" "I have just the thing," Henry replies, pulling out his phone. He presses a button, and then the sound of Sinclair's purrs fills the air. I forgot I'd sent him the recording my mate provided earlier today, but now I'm beyond glad of it. Rafe and I instantly calm, and though longing for Sinclair tugs viciously at my heart, I sink deeper into the plush sofa and try to lose myself in the cozy sound.

"Anything else?" Henry inquires, stroking my hair. "Do we have any popsicles?" I sniffle, and for the first time I realize my cheeks are soaked with tears. For a moment I revel in the sensation of the salty moisture on my skin, of the burning in my eyes.

Everything seems so different in this state, and I could spend hours exploring the feelings – if only I didn't have to dig into my past as well. "I'll check the kitchens, and if they're out I'll get some." Roger promises, slipping out of the room.

"Let's talk about what just happened." Leon suggests once I've relaxed. Of course, this is the last thing I want to do, now that the memory is over I want to leave it in the past where it belongs

"Do we have to?" I inquire in a small voice, trying to disappear into the couch. Stupid sofa, my wolf thinks, I want my nest, why do we keep doing this here? It's all lumpy and there aren't nearly enough pillows Where am I supposed to be now?

"I think we should." Leon answers gently, interrupting my inner animal. "We didn't talk about our last session because it was so distressing, but you seem to be steadier now." He pauses, and when I don't respond he continues. "I know you're only doing this to find answers for the war, but my job isn't the answers, Ella – it's not even the war. My job is your mental health, it's helping you understand and deal with the things we discover in a productive way."

"Dominic wouldn't make me." I counter petulantly, reaching for Henry's phone so that I can balance the device on my tummy. The speaker thumps against my baby bump, the volume growing louder for my pup and allowing us both to feel the vibrations as if he were really here with us.

"I'm not sure that's true, little mother." Henry warns me, in that paternal voice that both warms my soul and annoys my wolf for being bossy. "I've been doing fine without this warlock's help."

I argue instead, and I hear Gabriel smother a snort of laughter. You tell him. My wolf encourages. Nosey wolf. Remind him that our mate could kill him with no more than his little finger if he wanted.

"Have you really?" Leon questions, not seeming the least bit bothered by my insult. "Just because you didn't remember these things, it doesn't mean they weren't hurting you – affecting the way you interact with the world."

"We don't have time for this." I insist. "I understand you want to help, but I'm more concerned with finding out who these priests are, why they keep turning up in my past."

"So you aren't bothered by the fact that you killed those men?" Leon prods curiously. "Did you know you were capable of such violence before, even in self defense? Did you imagine you would have such a skill for it?"

His words slice through me, and suddenly it feels as though I have ice in my veins. I did kill those men. I took their lives without a second thought, and with no remorse. They'd deserved it.. hadn't they? They were going to hurt me, rape me, sell me like chattel... but that doesn't change the fact that I murdered them. It's because of me that they no longer exist on this earth. Did they have families?

People who mourned them? Children I rendered fatherless – no! Stop this, it won't do any good. "Talking about it won't change the past." I insist. "

It's done. "You don't think it's worth exploring all the things you suffered because you didn't have your wolf to protect yourself, or because you were trying to protect the people you love?" Leon presses, and my frustration grows. "If it were me I think I'd feel very angry with those priests for taking my magic from me, for standing by and just watching as those men assaulted me."

"But it wasn't you!" I snap, more fiercely than I intended. I'm outraged to realize how furious I am, just as he says. Still, I lash my anger at him, rather than acknowledging the truth of his words "They assaulted me, the priests took my wolf. Stop presuming to know how I feel."

"So tell me." Leon provokes, "tell me how you feel, Ella, and I won't presume. Roger returns then, and I hear the glorious crinkling of a popsicle wrapper. I accept the cold sweet eagerly, rejoicing as the flavors explode on my tongue. "Oh my goddess, this is the best thing I've ever tasted."

I know it's the ether talking, but even that awareness slips away a minute later when neon-colored visions of frOzen desserts appear on the ceiling above my head. While I get lost in the hallucination, I hear the others continue to talk.

The King sighs, and to my surprise, he speaks up in my defense. "Leon, I hate to say it because I know you were against haūing such a large audience in the first place, but if this is going to turn into a true therapy session then the rest of us probably shouldn't be here. As you said. that's not really why we came to you. If Ella doesn't want to do the work, you can't force her."

"I'm just trying to take care of my patient." Leon defends, sounding resigned. It's not safe or responsible to uncover these sorts of traumas with someone – only to cut out and leave them to deal with it on their own. It would be like a doctor performing surgery and then never doing any post-op checks or physical therapy. If Ella wants these answers, she needs to face them afterwards, not just ignore them."

"I understand." The King agrees, "And you're right, but these aren't regular circ.umstances."

"She's been through a lot." Henry adds, "And she's dealing with a lot now. I have to admit I worry what might happen if you start digging into all this when she's under so much stress as it is"

"The digging is already done." Leon corrects him "

These things aren't just going to go away. Do any of you know how she's actually been coping since the first session? How she's been feeling?"

"You know I can hear you." I pipe up, suddenly very conscious of Philippe opening his mouth and worried he'll rat me out about my nightmares. "I'm not a child and I might be high but you don't have to talk about me as if I'm not here. It's very patronizing" I continue savoring my popsicle as I forge on. "I'm pretty sure I've already made my feelings on this clear – and I'm the patient, so it's my choice."

"Fine." Leon concedes, sounding annoyed and exasperated. "But mark my words, you're courting disaster." He strides over to me, and I blink up at the grumpy therapist. "Ella I hope you'll call me to talk when you come down from the ether. You can call me any time, when you're ready I'll be waiting" He departs without another word, and I look around at the gloomy faces of the remaining men.

"So what do we think?" Roger asks after a moment.

"What was that memory all about? Why would servants of the Goddess do such a thing?"

"They were testing her." Henry concludes grimly.

"Testing her for what?" Gabriel replies sounding confused.

"To see if she was worthy? If she could survive?"

Henry suggests, not sounding particularly confident with these explanations. "Perhaps to see if she was ready."

"For what?" The King presses.

"I have no idea, but I can tell you if they ever turn up again, I'm going to have some words for them."

Henry snarls.

"Do you think there's more? More memories like this?" Gabriel questions then.

Henry sounds about as enthusiastic as an executioner signing a death warrant. "I hate to say it, but I'm afraid there are."

Chapter 191 – Cora’s Advice

Ella

My nightmares were worse than ever before the night after my second session with Leon, and I wake thrashing in my nest, with Philippe hovering above me, shaking me vigorously. I shriek and recoil, and he backs away from me with his hands outstretched in apology. “It’s okay, I’m sorry.” He breathes, ‘I didn’t know how else to wake you.’”

I gulp in a few gasps of air, trying to calm my racing heart. Rafe sends flashes of concern through our bond, and I immediately grab my phone, turning on the recording of Sinclair’s purrs.

This is getting out of hand, Ella.” Philippe scolds, still standing over the bed.

I’ve got it under control.” I insist.

“You don’t.” He cuts, and I can’t, in good conscience, let this continue.”

(You’re my personal guard, Philippe.” I remind him in the sternest voice I can summon, “It’s a very intimate relationship and there has to be trust between us. You hear everything I do, everything I say – whether I’m sick to my stomach or on the phone with my mate. This is a private matter which you are only privy to because of your position and I have to be able to trust you won’t betray my privacy, otherwise this arrangement won’t work”

I may be your personal guard, but I still answer to the Alpha and he wouldn’t approve of this.”

Philippe counters, crossing his arms over his chest.

“You also agreed to help us with the hypnosis behind his back.” I remind him, Now do you want to tell him that I ordered you not to say a word about any of it and you obeyed out of respect for our relationship, or do you want to tell him you were fine with being disloyal to him only until you had reason to be disloyal to me?”

Philippe narrows his eyes, I don’t like you very much right now.

‘Right back at you.” I respond, clambering to my feet. “But I appreciate your honesty.”

He growls as I move towards the door. “Where are you going?”

To find someone cuddlier than you.” I toss back over my shoulder, pulling on my robe and feeling thankful that I’d gone against Sinclair’s wishes and continued wearing pajamas while he’s away. Of course, I know he’ll be disappointed that I missed another dream date, but when I get lost in my night terrors, there's no way to find him. I pad through the halls to Cora's bedroom, not bothering to tap on the door before entering.

She stirs as I climb into bed with her, moaning sleepily, Ella?"

"Can I sleep with you?" I ask, snuggling up to her and sighing as her arms come around me.

"of course," She agrees without hesitation.

Though I'm surprised you don't want to be in your nest."

"Well I do." I confess, "I just want to be alone less."

Bad dreams?" She guesses, only too familiar with the phenomenon. I nod pitifully, and she takes me by the hand, "Come on, then."

Phillippe rolls his eyes when the door opens again and a bleary-eyed Cora leads me back to my rooms.

Updated by Jobnib.com

I don't complain when she directs me back into my own bed and climbs in with me, and she doesn't bat an eye when I turn on Sinclair's purrs. «Thank you."

I murmur against her hair. I needed this."

I catch my sister smiling out of the corner of my eye, and I nudge her, What?"

"It's just... this is nice." Cora replies softly. "I mean I'm not happy you're having nightmares, I just like being the one to comfort you for once."

You comfort me all the time." I inform her defiantly.

(Not like this." She murmurs, "You were always the one to Scare away the monsters in our closet. " (Yeah well, the monsters aren't staying in the closet anymore." I confess miserably.

Do you want to talk about it?" Cora inquires. I shake my head no, and I catch a note of exasperation in her voice. "You don't always have to be such a martyr, Ella. Suffering in silence doesn't help anyone, least of all yourself."

My muscles stiffen. "Is that what you think? That I enjoy playing the martyr? Sacrificing myself to fulfill some self-righteous hero complex?)

(No, I know that's not the reason." She answers apologetically, "but whatever your motives, you do have a habit of hogging all the worst things in life for yourself. You always have."

There's an ironic note in her voice which tells me that she doesn't resent me for it, at least, not the way she had the last time we talked about this.

You're my sister, it's my job to hog the suffering to spare you."

"But I'm older, I'm supposed to be the one looking out for you. Do you have any idea how much I hated myself when we were growing up, how much I still do, because I wasn't strong enough to take care of you." I suspect Cora has done a lot of thinking since our fight earlier this year, because rather than accusing me of making her weak by coddling her, she's admitting that those feelings came from a place of self-doubt.

"It didn't matter that you were older. I'm a wolf." I argue.

"So what, you age in dog years?" She jibes.

...

No... I just, I was able to survive things you couldn't ...I don't add that I may have been destined to as well, the way things have been going with my hypnosis.

"But you lost your wolf." Cora declares, surprising me. "Do you think I didn't know?It's all over the palace Ella."

I know that now... then all I knew was that I couldn't stand to see the people I love hurt... I still can't." I muse aloud.

"It's not a bad thing to be selfish sometimes, Elle, to put yourself first every now and then. In fact, it's called self-care." Cora states, rubbing my back.

I've been plenty selfish lately." I confess, thinking of my behavior with Sinclair, and even my thoughtlessness about the human impact of our war, my failure to see how this tumult was affecting Cora. "And part of me enjoyed it, having someone who made me feel safe enough to explore all the things I never had a chance to be growing up.

Dominic has never faulted me – not at my b.rattiest or most needy, he guided me through it all with utter patience. But I think the time for that has passed." I conclude, clamping my eyes shut. "I have a baby on the way, and an entire pack looking to me as a leader now.)

But why does that mean you have to hurt yourself?"" Cora inquires. "Why does that mean you have to suffer?"

Because everyone is suffering right now and I'm not special because I have a powerful mate... if the people suffer, I suffer." I explain logically.

"That's all well and good, very noble." Cora assesses. "But how are you supposed to lead them if you're a basket case?"

I won't be permanently." I reason. Dominic will be back in a few weeks, and then I'll feel better."

(This is about so much more than Dominic, Ella."

Cora exhales heavily. "Feeling safe and loved is important. But it can't fix everything you're learning in these sessions, it can't erase everything you've repressed. Only you can do that. You can't keep running from the past and pretending like everything is fine – mark my words it will catch up to you."

I look up at her in surprise, because I haven't shared anything about my hypnosis sessions with her, and as far as anyone knows, there has only been one session. Did Roger say something?"

'No, you silly thing, Cora scoffs. "I'm your sister, I know how you operate."

"Right." I chuckle humorlessly. "silly me."

There's a pregnant pause, and then she asks, "Are you sure you aren't doing all this to punish yourself?"

'No... I'm not sure of anything." I murmur, "Not anymore. I don't even know who I am."

(You've never known that." Cora teases, kissing my cheek.

"Even a penniless orphan is an identity." I reply, "I can't even fall back on that anymore."

Poor darling." Cora croons, "You know if you want to complain about possibly finding out who you are after a lifetime of questions, you might want to do it to someone who isn't bound to die an orphan with all of theirs unanswered."

"Fair point." I giggle, squeezing her. We lie like that for a little while longer, our thoughts spinning with all the challenges facing us. Though Cora hasn't said it this evening, I know she feels as overwhelmed as I do. "What are we going to do, Cora? Everything's such a mess.”

“We’re together, that’s all that matters.” She says, echoing the words I’ve used to comfort her a thousand times before. You and I can get through anything, we had a lifetime of practice, remember?”

I love you.” I profess gratefully.

“I love you too, now try to get some sleep. Cora advises. Things always look better in the morning.”

Chapter 192 – Isabel’s Plight

Ella

Things did not look better in the morning. At least, not for all the people back home in Moon Valley – shifter and human alike. With every day that passes, the worse the crisis grows, with refugees flooding out of the occupied territories and ever-rising death tolls. It feels insane that I’m one of the people in charge of solving this crisis, especially since I was just a Nanny a few months ago. It used to be that I would watch events like this unfold on the news and wonder what our world leaders were going to do to fix it... now I am one of those leaders.

The best I can do is take it one step at a time, and though I sometimes feel like I’m shirking my duties with the summit by focusing on the refugees so much, I feel like they need me most. It’s difficult, draining work, but it’s also more rewarding than I could imagine – even when things are tough.

And speaking of tough, there is one refugee in particular proving to be a tough nut to crack – not that this is surprising. “Isabel,” I chime, striding into the nursery. The she-wolf looks up from the diaper she’s changing, and her expression immediately becomes guarded.

Before I can reach her, a small herd of pups race forward to clamber around my legs, “Ella! Ella!”

There are fewer familiar faces here than before, since we’ve successfully placed a number of the orphans in foster homes. Still I continue coming every day to nap with the remaining children, and I love the time I spend with them.

“Luna.” Isabel greets me stiffly, carrying over the child she’d been tending. I’m surprised to see it isn’t Sadie, but when I search the room I spy James cradling the young girl by the fire, grinning down at her with obvious adoration. I can’t help but raise my brows, as far as I know Isabel doesn’t trust anyone with her precious charge, so it speaks volumes that she’s relinquished her to the soldier.

The King tells me you rejected another foster home for Sadie.” I explain, lifting one of the munchkins tugging at my skirt. “That’s seven families you’ve passed up, you realize.”

Isabel shrugs, not looking the least bit repentant. “I didn’t like the look of them.

“And what exactly did you find so objectionable?” I ask suspiciously – the woman has come up with countless inane excuses to reject potential fosters.

«The mother smelled of cleaning chemicals and their own pups looked as though they’d been kept in a bubble their whole lives.” Isabel explains haughtily.

“That mother works as a housekeeper, she can’t help smelling a bit like the tools of her trade.” I remind her, propping one hand on my hip and pinning her with a disapproving gaze. “Besides, two days ago you objected to a family because their pups had dirt on their shoes.”

“It’s about balance.” Isabel insists obstinately. “I don’t want Sadie to go to an unsanitary home, but I also don’t believe children should grow up in completely sterile conditions – how is she supposed to build an immune system?”

“I think you are determined to find problems with everyone we bring to you, because you don’t want to give Sadie up at all.” I state sternly. “And that’s okay. If you want to foster or adopt her yourself, I would be thrilled to help you do so. But don’t keep the baby in limbo. If you’re not going to commit to her then you need to give her to a family who will.”

I can’t adopt her.” Isabel mutters, all the blood draining from her face. “But why can’t I just keep her a while longer?”

“Isabel, ” I sigh gently. “Sadie lost her parents and she’s bonding to you more and more every day.

She’s getting used to her routine here and starting to feel comfortable in the nursery. Those are all good things if we can keep that going... but if we can’t... The last thing she needs is to get attached to another parent figure only to have them taken away.

That’s not what I want.” Isabel answers, her eyes shining as she looks toward the child in question.

James raises his head as if he senses her gaze, frowning when he sees her sorrowful features.

“Do you want to tell me why you’re so opposed to taking her in, when you obviously love her?” I prompt, sensing that I already know the answer.

“I don’t love her!” Isabel snaps defensively. “It’s not the same... I can’t...” She bites down on her lip, then glares at me. “Why are you doing this?”

(I’m trying to do what’s best for everyone – you included.” I share, “I want to see you happy, Isabel.

I know that feels impossible right now-)

“Shut up!” She cries, interrupting me and stomping her foot in fury.

A gasp goes around the pups, and the little one perched on my hip whispers, "She said a bad word!"

(You don't know what you're talking about – you have no idea what I've been through!" Isabel continues, pointing an outraged finger at me.

Happiness is... that's done for me! I can't ever have it again, nor should I! So get your annoyingly perfect nose out of my business and leave me alone!" With that she turns on her heel and storms off into her room. The door slams, and then the sound of her sobs float out to us.

I wipe tears out of my own eyes as the pup in my arms cuddles closer. "Is okay, don't cry."

(Why's Miss Isabel so sad?"" Another asks, looking up to me with wide eyes and the expectation that I hold all the answers.

Footsteps approach, and then Jame's voice murmurs, "Because Miss Isabel lost a baby and she misses her." He explains softly, easing Sadie into my arms. "Let me talk to her, okay?"

I nod, "I'll watch the pups."

I try not to listen as he follows the distraught she-wolf, but with my supernatural hearing, there's no avoiding this. The door opens then shuts, and I can imagine him standing over Isabel as she sprawls miserably on her bed.

"Go away." Isabel sobs pitifully, her voice muffled – perhaps by pillows.

"No." James counters firmly. We're going to talk about this, Isabel."

I don't want to." She objects, and I hear a soft thump as though she slammed her fist into the bedding.

"No, you just want to make yourself miserable."

James answers, and the bed squeaks as he sits down.

You think if you let yourself be happy then it means you didn't love your daughter. You think that adopting Sadie is the same as replacing her, forgetting her, as if loving another child would be disrespecting her memory."

"Because it would!" Isabel whines. "I don't want another pup, I want my Sophie!"

I know you do." James acknowledges in a low purr, But you want Sadie too. And more importantly, Sadie needs a mother. So if you can't do this for yourself, then do it for her."

Isabel just m0ans wordlessly, and James seems to lose his patience. Come here, you stubborn thing."

There's a slight scuffle, with feminine snarls and the snapping of teeth, but soon enough Isabel's struggles cease, her defiant limbs no doubt captured by the pilot's powerful arms. His steady voice continues, "If you want to honor Sophie, the best thing you can do is not let your love go to waste.

Imagine if this was the other way around, and you had died with your mate, and Sophie was all alone in the world ->

I wish I had." Isabel weeps, "I wish it had been me instead of her. It should have been me."

(I know." James croons, rocking her, kissing her hair. "But if Sophie were all alone in the world, you would want someone to love her as if she was their own.)

(I didn't protect her." The she-wolf keens, and I find myself choking back my own sobs, snuggling close to the pups around me as I recall the visceral pain of thinking I'd killed my baby. It gives me the barest bit of insight into how the other woman must be feeling, and the gravity of her grief tears me to pieces.

"But you can still protect Sadie." James proclaims, I promised her mother I would look after her, but I can't take her with me on evacuation runs, or wear a baby carrier into battle. So I left her with you because I knew there was n0 one better. I believed you would watch over her as well as her own parents. Are you going to prove me wrong, Isabel She hiccups, "You're not playing fair."

"And you need to understand that shutting off your heart is a greater disservice to your daughter's memory than anything else. As long as you hurt, as long as you miss her, your love lives on. But if you stop feeling, if you stop caring then you let that love go to waste." James advises.

"If I adopt her, does that mean you'll finally stop visiting ? Since your promise to her parents will have been fulfilled?" There's both hope and fear in Isabel's voice, as if she's trying to convince herself she doesn't want him around, even though she's afraid he might actually say yes.

(Not on your life." James chuckles, You can't get rid of me that easily, little wolf."

Well I'll adopt her anyway." Isabel agrees, sounding sullen. James purrs, and Isabel grumbles in return, but the sound is soon replaced by a whimper, and I have a sneaking suspicion that he silenced her in the way of all bossy Alphas – with his lips, and tongue, and wickedly talented hands.

Chapter 193 – Sinclair’s Worries

Sinclair

“I’m worried about Ella.” I confess, pushing away my dinner. “You still haven’t been able to connect?” Hugo inquires, looking up from his own meal. We’re on the road today, in between territories and enjoying a rare night free of politics – though not free of stress. This is the first time I’ve been able to stop moving all day, and I know I have a long night of research and preparations for our next destination ahead.

“Not the way I want.” I confirm. “We talk on the phone but something feels off. It would be different if I could actually see her, hold her and feel her emotions for myself. I can’t stand this distance.”

“Maybe that’s all this is then,” Hugo guesses. “You feel anxious because you’re so far away and don’t have the bond to rely on, and the absence of the connection is driving your wolf to distraction”

“But it’s not just her.” I admit, “Every time I ask Dad or Gabriel about Ella, it feels like they’re holding something back, and it concerns me that she’s not coming to our dreams. Every time I reach out for her... it’s like she’s not even there.”

“That’s not unheard of. Dream meetings take more energy than regular sleep -more brain power.”

Hugo reasons, “Few couples meet that way every night, or even weekly – especially under such stressful conditions.”

“My worry is that she’s too stressed. I can hardly get her to turn on the video function on calls lately and when I do she’s got great big circles under her eyes.” I grumble, “And if I could get her into a dream then I could force her to tell me what’s going on, but my voice alone can only do so much.”

Not to mention the naughty thing finds an excuse to get off the phone as soon as we get stern with her. My wolf adds crankily.

“You knew that was a risk.” Hugo replies with a sigh, “And if you ask me, she’s not the only one working herself into the ground to distract herself from missing her mate.”

“That’s not why I’m doing it.” I counter grumpily, and he shoots me a disbelieving glance. “At least, it’s not the only reason. There’s too much to do. I feel guilty every time I take even the smallest break.” “You and Ella are two sides of the same coin.”

Hugo laughs, “I think you both need to take a day off.” “A day off to do what?” I scowl, feeling irrationally annoyed with my Beta even though I know he’s only trying to help.

“Sightsee? Read a novel? While my people are dying?”

“So Ella shouldn’t get one either?” Hugo inquires slyly, finishing his plate. “She should keep working herself into the ground, until she’s completely burnt out?”

“That’s different.” I bite, baring my fangs at him. “Why?” Hugo demands. “Why is it okay for her to take care of herself, but not you?”

“Because I don’t have the luxury of burning out! If I do, then I compromise the entire fvcking war.” I burst out angrily.

“And that’s exactly why you should set some damned boundaries for yourself, Dom.” Hugo growls. “Because if you keep this up, you will render yourself useless to us whether you approve of it or not. So for the love of the Goddess man, take the night off. Go call your mate and talk it out, take the edge off, do whatever you need. And come back tomorrow recharged.”

I narrow my eyes at him, annoyance surging through my veins, “You know you can be a bl00dy prick sometimes.”

“Yeah, but I’m right.” Hugo snorts, not the least bit bothered by the insult. “Of course you are, that’s why it’s so damn irritating.” I chuckle, standing and clapping him on the shoulder. “Thank you, brother.”

I leave the hotel dining room and retreat to my room, pulling out my phone. It’s about 8 o’clock, and though Ella and I normally talk much later than this, I think our brief bedtime calls might be part of the problem – they don’t leave us enough time to speak in depth. I dial her number and wait for the line to pick up, my wolf sighing with satisfaction when her silky voice fills my ear, “Dominic?”

“Hello trouble.” I greet her, “What are you up to?”

“Just trying to catch up on the summit plans.” She explains. “Is everything okay? You’re early.”

“Everyth ing is just fine. I decided to take the night off, so you should too.” I order warmly. “But I have so much left to do.” Ella objects, sounding uncertain.

“It wasn’t a suggestion, little wolf.” I chuckle darkly, “I’m making an executive decision that we both need a break.”

“But -“

“No buts, this is happening.” I command, leaving no room for argument. “Have you eaten dinner?”

“Yes.” Ella answers, sounding only slightly sullen. “Did you have dessert?” I follow up, wishing she would turn on her damn camera so I can see her.

“No... though the chef did make an especially delicious looking cake today.” She reveals, obvious longing in her voice.

“Okay, then you call down to the kitchens and have someone bring you an extra large slice. Then draw yourself a bath, turn on your video, and you and I are going to talk about absolutely anything but work. Sound like a plan?” I inquire.

“That depends,” Ella replies slyly. “Are you actually asking or is this another order?”

“What do you think?” I laugh, missing her so much my chest hurts.

“I think you’re a bossy tyrant.” She answers tartly.

But I miss you, so I’ll be good just this once.”

Fifteen minutes later her camera clicks on, and I’m granted with the sight of my glorious, naked mate in a steaming bubble bath, a huge slab of chocolate cake resting on the edge of the tub. I scour her beautiful face, frowning at the dark circles looming against her pale skin. Ella looks as though she’s running herself ragged – worse, she looks drawn and anxious. In that instant, I know that this is more than stress or exhaustion and I’m furious with myself for not doing this sooner.

“Alright, baby. Time to come clean.” My wolf’s instincts are screaming that something is very wrong here. “What’s really going on with you?”

Ella flushes and averts her eyes, a clear sign of deceit. “This is all just harder than I expected.” She says quietly. “Not that I expected any of it really. I just miss you, and working with the refugees is so wonderful – it feels so right, but it’s hard. It’s really hard.”

I tsk gently, hating the fact that she’s on a screen and not in front of me. “I believe it. But we both know that’s not all.” I press, and part of me imagines I can feel her tension even at this great distance. Ella sets her jaw, and I can tell she’s determined to stay silent. “Come on, talk to me, mate. Let me help.”

She shakes her head. “I’m fine. Just tired and wishing you were here.” I let a heavy silence hang between us, and when I don’t say anything, she peeks up at me from beneath her lashes. “Why?”

Did someone say something?”

My wolf sits up at attention. “Why? What would they have said?” I growl forebodingly.

Ella squirms beneath the bubbles, and I increase the force of my growl, trying to send all my power and dominance through the phone. I wasn’t sure it would work, but Ella shudders instinctively. She’s still fighting me, but I don’t let up, and eventually she breaks. “I lied to you!” She finally bursts, tears flooding her eyes.

“What about?” I ask, trying to keep my voice even.

“I haven’t been missing our dream dates because I’m tired.” She sniffles. “I’ve been having really bad nightmares ever since I remembered my wolf being bound. I don’t even have a chance to try to go to you because the moment I close my eyes the bad dreams come and then I spend half the night trying to avoid going back to sleep but I never succeed and then it just happens all over again.”

Her voice is shaky and her lips quiver dangerously. “And I didn’t tell you because I didn’t want you to worry and I made Philippe promise not to tell either – so of course he’s pissed at me.

And your recording helps but it’s not the same as having you here...and the worst part of all is that every time it happens it upsets the baby and I don’t know how to make it stop!”

As usual, my wolf goes to pieces at the sound of her tears, and I can’t even bring myself to be angry for the secret. “Sweetheart, it’s okay.” I croon, and my arms reach for her even though I know she’s not really here. A purr takes up in my chest, as she buries her face in her hands and begins to sob.

Ella, I’m not mad. Please don’t cry.” I beg. “We’ll figure this out. We’ll make it stop. If I have to follow you into your dreams and drag you back to safety, I will.”

She lifts her head meekly, “Is that even possible?”

“Nothing is impossible when it comes to us, baby.”

I promise, “Not even the goddess will keep me from you now that I know – mark my words. When you go to bed tonight I’ll be waiting, and wherever your dreams take you, I’ll come. I promise I’ll find you – no matter what”

Chapter 194 – Sinclair Travels Through Dreams

Sinclair

When I arrive in the dream forest, I'm alone – as I have been almost every night since I left.

However, rather than calling for my mate as I usually do, by picturing her in my mind and willing her to come to me with the sheer force of my longing and determination, I send my power outward. I unleash the full force of my magic, spreading it as far and wide as I can, searching every inch of this enchanted plane of existence. It rolls off of me like a dense fog, ebbing past the limits of my own consciousness to delve through the mating bond and track Ella.

Dreams are strange this way: both closer to and more distant from reality, so that our souls can join when the Goddess's power is at its peak, even as doors to fantastical and surreal worlds swing wide. I don't know where my mate is, but as long as she is also in the realm of dreams, I know I can find her.

It isn't easy. It takes what feels like hours to finally sense her presence, to detect her heartbeat across the vast expanse of ethereal worlds. Finally I find her, though she is very, very far away. To reach her I must travel through dozens of different dreams: some my own, some Ella's, Some a combination of both. It's hard not to pause and get distracted, especially when I come across a shared imagination of us playing with our young son, or the depiction of peace in the united packs and our future on the throne. I'd like to stay in those fantasies forever, but to do so would be to abandon Ella in her time of need.

I also struggle when I come across a sensual vision of Ella and I roleplaying as little red riding hood and the big bad wolf, especially when I realize the dream is hers. Still I forge on, though I certainly make note of the idea for the future.

There are odd things too, like the giant frog telling fortunes for a call-in psychic hotline, or the pirate ship full of ballet-dancing vegetables. Others simply make me smile, like Ella's craving-driven fantasy of a real-life candy land, or my own childhood wish of riding a dragon as it flies through the air on great leathery wings.

Eventually I move through every variation of happy and bizarre dreams, until the sky darkens overhead and the road I'm traveling becomes harsh and cold. I know I'm entering the realm of nightmares now, and I brace myself for the horrors ahead. I ignore the haunting visions that tormented me as a child – the fire that killed my mother, the monsters hiding in my closet. I even manage to move past Ella's youthful terrors – things that would absolutely destroy me if I had to see them for myself.

Her heartbeat and scent draw me deeper and deeper into the darkness, until I can feel her just around the next bend in the path. I expect to find my mate at the mercy of the priests who bound her wolf, but suddenly I find myself in a forest I know all too well – the one where I spent the best days of my childhood. Only this time it's not welcoming and magical, but a vile place full of terror and pain. When my mate finally comes into view, she is not a small girl wrapped in a fiery cocoon. Instead I see a half-starved teenager, injured and dirty, but fighting for her life as two human men bear down on her.

My wolf roars in my ears, and my vision goes red.

Ella

I'm back in the forest.. wolves howling in the distance... pounding footsteps hot on my heels.

Falling, tumbling... crashing into the earth over and over again.

It's happening all over again, the panting breath, the sickening smiles. "Now look at what you've done, you stupid girl."

Two robed figures in the darkness, illuminated in a shaft of moonlight between the trees. Searing pain across my cheek... the horrible knowledge that there is no escape from this violation.

Sickness... my body being dragged. a glint of silver in the leaves. My legs being wrenched apart and my clothes ripping... blind, thoughtless anger, aggression like I've never felt. Blood gushing over me, hot, sticky and metallic. It stains my skin, forever marking me like a grey tattoo, a reminder of what I've done.

Murderer... I'm a murderer... and the priests are still just watching. I try to swing the knife again, only this time my hand is empty. The dagger is gone. I scour the ground for my weapon, but it's gone. I look toward the priests as the second man bears down on me. "The knife!" I shout frantically. "

Where did it go!?"

This isn't right. In my memory I killed them both..I saved myself despite the cost of violence. The priests stay silent, and now the other man is forcing his way between my legs. No! Not this.. not after everything that's already happened. "Please, help me!" I scream, giving up any sense of pride, any bravery. "Please, don't let him do this!"

A fist slams into my face, "I'm going to make you pay for this, b!tch." My attacker snarls, gesturing to his dead friend.

"No – please!" I cry, "it wasn't supposed to happen this way, you should be dead."

“Well now you get to die.” His face comes into focus over mine, and I can see the pure, sadistic hatred in his eyes. His fingers dig into my flesh, holding me still as he unbuckles his belt. He lashes the leather across my face as it comes free, then uses it to gag me, silencing my screams.

“Ella!” A voice I’ve never heard... not yet at least. It’s deep and wonderful and fills me with warmth, completely out of place in this horrible place. And then there’s a great black wolf running towards me through the trees, and I understand. My attacker barely has time to turn before Sinclair clamps his fangs around his throat, ripping his spinal cord from his neck and tossing him aside. He shoves the dead man out of the way, and then he’s a man again, dropping onto his knees in front of me.

Sinclair takes my face in his hands, “I’m here, Ella.

You’re okay.”

“D-Domìnic?” I gasp, clinging to him with desperate relief. “Is it really you?”

“Yes, little one” He confirms, though his eyes look past me, to the robed figures in the distance. “It’s me. You’re safe”

“How did you find me?” I squeak, still in the hoarse voice of my younger self.

“Im your mate. Il always find you, remember?”

Sinclair croons.

He scoops me up into his arms and carries me back the way he came. As we move through the dreamland, the horrible forest of my nightmare slowly transforms. Gone is the blood and horror, the unwelcoming darkness that tormented me so terribly. It’s gradually replaced by the glittering woodland of our dream dates, and I feel myself changing too. No longer an injured, frightened little girl, but the woman I am today. I don’t know how long it takes, but Sinclair carries me all the way to our dream bed and climbs on, pulling me into his lap, “There now. I’ve got you, baby. It’s Over.

I can’t believe this. I didn’t really believe Sinclair could follow me through dreams, let alone understand how such a thing was possible. But that doesn’t matter now. The moment I feel his muscular arms around me, breathe in his scent, and feel the rumble of his purrs, I unravel. I collapse against him and pour out all the emotions I’ve been grappling with these past weeks – all the horror, fear and pain. All the confusion, helplessness, and guilt. If I had control of myself I might try to hold some of it back from Sinclair, but I’m beyond that sort of limitation now. Everything is pouring through our bond, and I can feel his sorrow, rage and love rushing back towards me.

He rocks me back and forth, kissing and petting me, whispering sweet nothings in my ear. I cling to him like a raft in stormy seas, and for the first time since that first terrible hypnosis session, I feel as though I'm not completely adrift. Why couldn't he have been there all those years ago?

Why did I have to wait so long before having this man in my life? When my tears have finally slowed and my breathing steadies, I look up at him, “

Thank you.” I profess hoarsely. “I don't know how you did it, but thank you.”

His thumbs brush my tears away, and he nuzzles my nose with his own before pressing a tender kiss to my lips. There's comfort in his touch, but also despair, and when we part I see tears in his eyes. “Don't ever hide something like this from me again, Ella.” It's not a scolding, or even an admonishment, the words are full of worry and sadness.

“I'm sorry, I should have told you sooner.” I confess, leaning my wet face into the curve of his neck while he caresses my belly. “If I'd known... I never imagined you'd be able to fix it, I thought it would only make things harder for you.”

“I'm not just here to fix problems, mate.” He purrs.

And if they're harder for you, they're harder for me.

Haven't you been telling me I don't get to share the good and keep the bad all for myself? That goes both ways.”

“I'm sorry.” I say again, feeling chastised even though there was no bite in his words. “I know we talked about this... I think I'm still just having a hard time with it.”

“These things don't go away overnight just because we talked about them. They take work – time and effort for both of us.” He pauses, searching my features in a way that makes me squirm. “But Ella, what was that dream?”

I shudder, not able to look him in the eye. “It wasn't a dream, it was a memory.”

Chapter 195 – Ella Comes Clean

Ella

“What do you mean, it was a memory?” Sinclair asks carefully. “I thought the priests came to you in the orphanage? I don’t remember anything about humans attacking you in the woods.”

I stare at my lap, cradling my belly and trying to figure out how to explain my deceit. I knew this conversation was inevitable -I even prepared for it, but these are not the circumstances I expected. I didn’t imagine I would be so emotionally fragile, or that Sinclair would be wrapped around me purring, fresh off of rescuing me from a traumatic nightmare. I thought I would be able to present my case and apologize, acknowledging my wrong doing with confidence and strength of conviction.

Now I fear it’s going to tumble out as a mess of excuses and tangled feelings.

“Ella?” Sinclair presses, his voice taking on a dominant tone.

When I finally look up at him, tears pour from my lashes. “I’ve still been doing the hypnosis.” I confess, my lips quivering with every word. “I went behind your back and convinced the others to help me.”

Sinclair’s glowing emerald eyes bore into me as me.”

Sinclair’s glowing emerald eyes bore into me as his jaw clenches tight, the muscles twitching dangerously. I open my mind to him, showing him everything that happened through our bond, both the lead up to the second session and the events we uncovered through the ether. I even show him the conversation afterwards, not wanting to hold anything back now that the game is up.

Slowly, carefully, Sinclair sets my body away from his, even as I try to cling to him. “No, please don’t leave, Dominic.”

“I’m not leaving.” He assures me gruffly. “I just need to think a minute and I can’t do that clearly when you’re snuggled up giving me those puppy dog eyes.”

I snuffle, and I can feel his wolf’s continued agitation over me tears, even as the possessive Alpha struggles with his temper. I wrap my arms around my knees, clamping my hand over my wrist in a death grip so I stay still. I’m finding it very difficult not to squirm in the face of my mate’s disapproval.

Sinclair paces back and forth, growling wordlessly as he works through his thoughts. He doesn’t let me feel his emotions, but a few slip out, giving me flashes of anger, frustration and... heart wrenching disappointment. I’m shocked at how powerfully the last affects me. I've heard people who grew up in happy families say that disappointment can be worse than anger, something I've never understood until this moment. I didn't believe anything could be more horrible than the violence and pain wrought by a person's rage, I didn't realize how different things are when love is involved.. when a person is your entire world and you let them down. I start to cry again, and hide my face in my knees so he can't see my tears.

After a moment his footsteps fall silent, and I lift my face to find my mate looming above me, a cold expression on his face. "What am I supposed to say to this Ella?"

"Whatever you like." I croak. "Whatever you're thinking, whatever you're feeling. I know I was wrong."

"Do you?" He counters roughly. "Because it seemed to me you were so convinced you were right you were willing to betray my trust. To ask my family, friends and guards to do the same."

"Not wrong for doing it, wrong for lying about it, hiding it." I amend softly. Let me out. My wolf begs.

I need to make it up to him. Let me show him how sorry I am.

Not yet. I caution her. We need to have this out first.

"What did you think would happen?" Sinclair asks, crossing his arms over his chest. "That you'd uncover the secret to Winning the war and that would excuse what you did? That you could come to me when I got home, tell me everything you learned and be forgiven?"

I shake my head, absolutely miserable. "I just needed to know. We needed to know. But I don't believe it excuses anything."

"You didn't even give me a chance to agree."

Sinclair bites, and even though he's furious, he doesn't seem to be able to resist touching me. He slides his powerful hand around my nape, applying gentle pressure that somehow steadies and thrills me.

"I did," I insist, licking my lips. "I tried to talk to you but you wouldn't listen."

"You didn't," he corrects firmly, stroking the side of my neck with his thumb – pure dominant affection. "Not the way you talked to the others, you assumed I couldn't be objective about you."

A flash of defiance sparks in my chest, and I notch my chin up, trying to match his scowl. "Was I wrong?"

I can feel his wolf fighting for control, and in the next moment he's pulling me up onto my knees.

No, damn you. You weren't." He rumbles, dragging me into his arms and claiming my mouth in a searing kiss. I don't resist, I throw my arms around his neck and let myself be taken. His hands are rough on my body, and so are his lips. Sinclair nips my lower lip with his fangs and takes advantage of my gasp, sliding his tongue into my mouth. His big hand stays locked on my nape, holding me in place for his conquest, tilting my head this way and that. He grumbles and growls, and I shudder in reply, not caring what else happens, as long as he keeps kissing me this way.

Before long I'm breathless and overwhelmed with liquid heat. When Sinclair pulls back, I try to follow him and whimper in disappointment when he doesn't let me. "I won't lie to you, mate." He remarks huskily, our breath mingling. "This has hurt us. How am I supposed to trust you again?"

I shrug, even though this devastates me. "Isn't that the choice you made when you left? To have me safe and hating you, rather than happy and dead?"

I inquire. "I chose to lose your trust and help the war, rather than keep it and hinder our efforts."

Sinclair sighs, stroking my spine in long, soothing lines. "Hugo was right." He says, baffling me.

We're two sides of the same coin, you and I."

"Of course we are." I answer, nudging his nose with my own. "we're mates. If I have to deal with you being stubborn and impossible and infuriatingly self-sacrificing, it's only fitting that you have to deal with the same from me. I'm your just desserts, Alpha."

The corner of Sinclair's mouth quirks upward. "Are you calling me names little wolf? Don't you think you're in enough trouble as it is?"

"I figure that if I'm going to do a thing, I might as well go all in." I reply, offering him a shy smile.

Though I do have plenty of other names in mind for you."

"Mhmm, and what are those?" He inquires, sliding his hand over my bottom and squeezing. It's both sensual promise and threat, but all that matters is the hungry look in his eyes, all signs of anger and distress replaced with desire.

“Bossy,” I begin, pausing to nibble his jaw.

Overprotective, possessive, tyrannical, bloodthirsty, unreasonable...” I kiss or nip a new spot with every word, moving down his neck and over his chest, delighting in the warning sounds from his wolf. Just when I sense he’s about to pounce, I look up at him and let all my love rush through our bond. “Brave,” I offer, kissing his muscular abs, “Noble..” kiss, “cunning,” nip, “powerful...” lick, “passionate,” I unbutton his sleek black trousers. “Gorgeous, sexy, generous to a fault.” I slide his pants down his legs. “My absolute heart and soul. The best man I’ve ever known. The only one I ever want.”

Sinclair catches my hands before I can take his hardness in my palm, pulling me back up to eye level. He kisses me again, and my pulse races with excitement – every bit as feverish and exhilarating as the first time. “Thank you, baby.”

I’m surprised to hear his deep voice hoarse with emotion, and I realize how hard this distance has been on him as well.

“Has it been horrible, waiting for me every night and me never coming?” I ask anxiously.

“I don’t want to talk about that right now.” Sinclair informs me, with pure authority. “As far as I’m concerned we can deal with all that when I’m back.

But right now I just want to be with my mate.” He brushes my hair back from my face with both hands, cupping my cheeks. “Are you recovered enough, from your nightmare?”

I nod, reaching again for the hard member pressing into my tummy. He stops me again of course, giving me a sharp look. I huff “Yes, Dominic. You made it all okay – you always do.”

“Good, because I have some words for you too, trouble.” Sinclair informs me darkly, laying me out on the bed in front of him. He’s got that wolfish look in his eye, the one that tells me I’m in for a long night at my mate’s mercy. The one that tells me he’s barely in control, and all I can do is hold on and try to survive the pleasure. “Let’s start with brilliant..” he strips off my nightdress. “Beautiful...”

He traces the line of my curves. “Courageous...” kiss, “sweet,” nibble, “fucking delectable,” lick, “... and very, very naughty.”

Chapter 196 – Sinclair’s Blessing

Ella

When I wake up the next morning, I feel better rested than I have in weeks. For the first time since I started hypnosis, Philippe hasn’t had to charge in during the middle of the night to wake me from my night terrors. Simply being able to connect with my mate did wonders for my state of mind, and even though our lovemaking was reserved for our dreams, my body is sated and satisfied.

Even though I just saw Sinclair, my heart leaps when my phone rings a moment later, and I pull the device from its charger. “Good morning my love.” I greet him, beaming.

“Good morning, gorgeous.” His handsome face fills the screen, still drowsy from sleep. “How are you feeling?”

“A thousand times better.” I admit, because not only did he save me from my nightmares, but the weight of my lies are finally off my shoulders. I run my hand over my belly, checking in with our pup.

Rafe is happy too, he’s been missing you as much as I have”

“I’m glad you’re both feeling better,” He rumbles, “ though I have to tell you, you’re not going to be happy with me in a moment.”

“Why?” I ask nervously, sitting up. A thousand possibilities run through my mind, though I have a sneaking suspicion I know where this is going.

“Because I’ve called a meeting with your co- conspirators.” Sinclair reveals, a note of foreboding in his deep voice.

“But Dominic, it wasn’t their fault.” I object. “I’m the one who convinced them and to be fair, without you here I outrank all of them.. except Gabriel.” I amend. “So they were just following orders.”

Sinclair gives me a sardonic look. “I hate to break it to you trouble, but as incredible and strong as you are, your wolf has only been awake for a month – there are children with more experienced animals. As far as I’m concerned, you don’t outrank anybody yet.”

“Im their Luna.” I counter defiantly, deeply affronted that he’s undervaluing my agency in my own scheme.

“You are, and you and I are going to have our own reckoning when Im home.” He promises ominously, “But for now, we all need to get on the same page.

Muttering mutinously, I slide out of bed. “When is this meeting?” I snap after a moment, deciding not to voice some of the more colorful insults in my mind aloud.

“Half an hour, in Gabriel’s chambers.” Sinclair shares, a familiar glint in his green eyes. “Now, would you like to spend that time grumbling at me, or would like to sneak in some fun before the day gets away from us?”

“That depends.” I huff, thinking that I’d quite like to continue grumbling. “What kind of fun?”

“Well, I’ve been thinking of the show you gave me the other day.” Sinclair shares, sending a crimson blush to my cheeks as I recall pleasuring myself on our last video call. “And how beautifully you lost control, even if you were defying me every step of the way.”

I smother a shiver, “And?” I squeak, already excited and having to clench my thighs together to relieve the ache at their center. My annoyance and trepidation about the meeting is gone, replaced only with erotic interest – which is exactly what the wiley wolf intended.

“And since I’m such a generous mate, I thought I might give you the chance to redeem yourself.”

Sinclair bares his fangs, all predator now. “By doing exactly what I tell you to do, no matter how scandalous it sounds..” His words trail off into a low growl, and I swear my se.x spasms as if it’s already on the verge of climax. “You’ll follow my orders exactly, so that even though it will be your own hands, it will feel like I’m the one playing your sweet body like a fiddle – and I’m going to watch every moment.”

“Okay,” I gulp, trying to get control of my pounding heart.

“Good girl. Now prop the phone on the table by the bed and make sure I can see you.” He instructs, his voice like rough velvet. “Then take off your nightgown, and lie down.”

“And then?” I breathe, already obeying.

“Then wait for my instructions..”

Forty minutes later I careen into Gabriel’s chambers, freshly dressed but still weak kneed from our video call. Sinclair was as good as his word – unsurprisingly – and spent nearly the full half hour before the meeting ordering me to pleasure myself for his enjoyment, and Goddess was it hot! I never thought I would enjoy that sort of thing, but I’m wondering if I don’t have a small exhibitionist streak when it comes to my mate.

I'm sure the wolves in this room can sense my over -excited vital signs, not to mention smell my lingering arousal. Part of me wonders if Sinclair doesn't take some sort of twisted pleasure in showing off his sexual prowess this way, or if perhaps this is just part of my punishment. Either way, I veer into the meeting ten minutes late, and take a seat at the table.

Sinclair's face is already on a large computer screen, and his hawkish eyes follow me the moment I enter the room. They linger on me for a long moment after I sit down, before he turns his attention to my companions. "So, I'll get straight to the point," He begins gruffly. "I know that you've all been helping Ella continue to do hypnosis sessions. I know about the second memory she uncovered, and that she hasn't slept in weeks because of the nightmares."

Henry, Roger, Gabriel and Philippe all exchange wary glances, before turning their attention to me.

I sink down in my chair, feeling like a child sent to the principals office – only there are four principals and they're all lethal predators. "I didn't know about any nightmares." Henry states in concern. Roger and Gabriel murmur in agreement, and Philippe glowers as I confess that only he knew.

"No, only Philippe knew and I swore him to secrecy." Their gazes swing to my guard, full of accusation, so I add, "I didn't give him a choice."

"There's always a choice." Henry says gravely, and guilt fills me as I see the shame in my guard's eyes.

"This isn't about blame." Sinclair interrupts. "Ella and I have talked and well sort matters between us when I come home. I also know it wasn't easy for her to convince you, and I know why you agreed." he reveals, sounding resigned. "Im more concerned with how we move forward."

I look up, not quite believing my ears. It almost sounds as though he's going to let us continue, but that can't be right.. can it?

"I know my mate well enough to realize that once she's set her mind on something there isn't any stopping her – at least not when I'm so far away."

He adds with a note of warning. "So I want to make sure that the future sessions are safe and healthy. I want to know when they're happening and how they go, as well as any new information that's discovered."

"Dominic," Henry sighs, "Im sorry we kept this from you, and though we did feel it was worth the risk, I'm sorry we didn't pick up on how badly it was troubling Ella." He reaches over and squeezes my hand, looking at me with obvious worry.

“Thank you,” Sinclair nods, and I realize that though he certainly blames me for not speaking up about my bad dreams, he also blames them for not noticing what was obvious to him from thousands of miles away.

“But son, you have enough going on without adding these updates and reports to your plate.

Henry continues. “I can assure you that we’ll keep a sharper eye going forward and relieve some of the other stresses Ella is dealing with. Then we can update you with everything when you’re back.”

Not for the first time, I feel a bit indignant to have all these men talking about me as though I’m not in the room, but I also understand this is part of being a she-wolf. All these bossy Alphas view me as part of their pack, and though the independent woman in me feels offended, the orphan who grew up with no one giving a damn about her feels oddly touched. “No.” Sinclair counters, not willing to budge an inch. “I’m not happy about any of this, so I’ll be damned if I’m going to stay in the dark about it.”

“That’s fair.” Gabriel acknowledges. “And I think I speak for us all when I say that we do regret the subterfuge, and for not taking better care of your Luna.” The others mumble their agreement.

“There’s another thing.” Sinclair continues, “Ella, I expect you to go through Leon’s suggested therapy after your sessions, and I want you all to make sure she does it.”

My jaw drops, “What?”

“You heard me, little mate.” He rumbles. “That point is not up for debate. If you’re going to do this, you’re going to do it safely.”

If I could shoot daggers with my eyes, my mate would certainly be dead. Still, he stares me down and growls until my wolf is trembling and tucking her tail between her legs. “Fine.”

“Good.” Sinclair approves, “Now, I’d like a word with Philippe in private.”

My heart sinks as I look at my guard. “Dominic -“

“No.” Philippe, objects, holding up a hand to stop me. “It’s okay, Ella. I answer to my Alpha, and I knew what I was risking.”

“But -“

“Come on, Ella.” Henry encourages, leading me from the room. Still, I can’t help but look back over my shoulder at my guard. The door closes behind us, and the last thing I see is my mate’s enraged face scowling out of the computer screen.

Chapter 197 – Trust

Ella

I pace back and forth outside Gabriel's chambers, absolutely beside myself over Philippe's fate. I have the worst feeling that Sinclair is going to fire or demote the guard because of my actions, and I'm already preparing a furious speech to deliver to my mate if he does so. I can't hear a single word of their conversation because the King's chambers are soundproofed – a luxury I decide Sinclair and I should definitely invest in when we return home.

The waiting is horrible, but eventually my faithful guard emerges, looking thoroughly dejected. I can't stop myself from racing up to him with man energy. "Did he demote you? Is he still on the call –I'll talk to him-"

"Woah," He catches me by the shoulders. "It's okay, Ella. He didn't demote me, he just did a lot of yelling"

"Im so sorry." I profess wringing my hands.

"Don't be." Philippe says evenly, staring me straight in the eye so I can see the honesty in his expression. "You were right. Being someone's guard is a really intimate relationship. You have to trust me with your very life, with all your secrets

He sighs, shaking his head. "Most people get to choose their guards but you didn't pick me, you didn't even know who I was when Dominic assigned me to you."

"So?" I protest, still feeling indignant on his behalf.

"So it's right that I should have to prove myself to you." He chuckles. "Trust has to be earned."

Philippe pauses, giving me an assessing look. "But I have to tell you that if it had gone on much longer. I don't think I could've kept it up.. part of protecting you means looking out for your health and well-being even when you don't want me to do it. You weren't doing well and I'm glad Dominic got through to you. I don't want to be in that position again."

"I respect that." I reply contritely. "And Ill try to do better." I promise, wondering if my sudden urge to explain myself is actually to help him understand, or to make myself feel better. I have a terrible sense that it's the latter, but I forge ahead anyway as we begin walking down the opulent corridor."

These last few months have gone by in such a whirlwind. My entire life is different now and I'm still struggling to catch up."

"It's so strange to me that I matter to people now..three and a half months ago I was alone in the World. I had my sister and no one else. And now I'm a wolf and I'm going to be a mother, and I have a mate and a pack, and I'm in charge of a world I didn't know existed, and I'm in the middle of a war, and I might even have parents out there somewhere." I know I'm rambling, and Goddess love Philippe for standing beside me and listening without judgment. "I love it, but it's still hard. I'm still suffering major growing pains... maybe most of all when it comes to being part of a pack and not just being a lone wolf anymore." I confess, wincing.

When I look over I find Philippe watching me closely. He leans back on his heels, pursing his lips. "Is that part of why you're so intent on continuing the hypnosis?"

"Which part?" I inquire, not even sure about all the words I just blurted out.

"The fact that your parents might be out there somewhere." Philippe clarifies, "I don't think any of us... I mean we all realized you'd been left with the humans and that the Goddess was involved, but I think maybe we were so distracted by how amazing it all is that we didn't consider what it might mean for a woman who probably spent her entire childhood praying that her parents might turn up one day and tell her it had all been a mistake"

My eyes widen, and suddenly I feel very vulnerable. I wrap my arms around myself. "What orphan doesn't have those fantasies?" I shrug."

Cora and I used to say our parents were spies working together on a top secret project for the government and that they'd had to leave us in the orphanage for our safety. But they left us together so we wouldn't have to be alone." I smile at the bittersweet memory. "But we grew up... and we realized that we just weren't wanted. We weren't any more special than any of the abandoned kids in that horrible place."

Philippe is still watching me, and I realize I haven't answered him. "I think it's part of it." I confess. "I've been saying I have to find out where I came from – which is true. But in my brain finding out where I came from is one in the same as finding out who my parents were and why they left me." I chafe my arms, feeling suddenly cold. "

And maybe that's why I've kept Cora out of it too.. because for the first time since I was eight, I feel like there's hope I might find the answers... and that's not a chance she has."

He nods. "It's funny the things that can motivate us without us even realizing it." He observes.

That's why therapy is so useful."

“Oh come on.” I groan, thinking of my mate’s edict.

“Not you too!”

Phillippe raises his hands in self defense, “hey, I’m just following my orders.”

“Suuurre.” I deride, throwing my arms up. “That’s what they all say.”

Two days later I’m back in the sitting room with Leon, Henry, and my small audience of babysitters.

They’ve all agreed to leave Leon and me in private for the therapy session following today’s ether trip – a fact the therapist was only too smug about- but for now they’ve all piled into the room to show support.

The drug is already taking hold of me, but this time I don’t need any guidance from Leon to travel into the past. As soon as the walls come down in my mind, I’m taken even farther into my memories than I’ve gone before.

I’m six years old, and for the first time ever, I have a visitor.

The headmaster didn’t tell me who the strange lady is, or why she’s here so late at night, but she’s the most beautiful woman I’ve ever seen. The strange thing is that I find it hard to take in all of her features at once. I can only focus on one aspect at a time, and when I do I get so lost in the feature that it feels impossible to look away.

She has long gold hair, so starkly metallic and luminous that it looks like strands of pure starlight. Her eyes are wide and dark, and if I look closely enough, I swear there are whole galaxies swirling in her inky irises. Her limbs are long and willowy, and with the way the shadows ebb and sway around her, I can’t be sure where they end.

Her skin is fairer than any I’ve ever seen, and it seems to glow like mother of pearl. She wears a dress of gentle white fabric that reminds me of clouds, and being near her gives me the strangest surge of energy. I’m finding it hard not to bounce off the walls, but I know grown ups get mad when kids get hyper and then bad things happen.

“Did you hear me, Ella?” She asks in a voice that is both musical and soft like a summer breeze.

“Oh.” I peek up at her face, feeling dizzy when all her stunning features combine. “No, sorry. I’s distracted.”

“That’s okay.” She assures me gently, and my tense muscles relax. “I came to tell you a story.”

“Really?” I ask in awe. The only stories I ever hear are from bigger kids, and they’re usually not nice-“

Is it a nice story?”

“In some ways.” She answers, tilting her head. “In some others it’s sad, but it’s a story you need to hear all the same.”

“Why?” I inquire, in the way of all curious children.

“Because one day you’ll need to remember it, so you can find your way back home.” She informs me, with more patience than I’ve ever seen in a grown up.

“Okay” I consent, not really sure what’s coming.

“Would you like to sit in my lap?” She offers, “I think maybe you find it hard to look at me.”

I nod shyly, though less because I want to stop enjoying her beauty, than because I want to experience what it’s like to be held – just once. I’m not really sure how to go about it, but she plucks me up into her arms and settles me in her lap. Her body is warm and cool at once, reminding me of a light in the darkness. no, not just any light but moonlight.

Chapter 198 – The Goddess’s Tale

Ella

“Before the world existed, before there were planets or stars or even dust, there was only darkness, The darkness was ruled by a god of creation, an all-powerful celestial being the universe dreamed up to rule the heavens. He existed in quiet solitude for millennia, exploring the farthest reaches of his domain, never tiring, never asking for more.” The strange woman began.

“But didn’t he want things, like friends? Or a puppy?” I ask excitedly, feeling uncommonly bold.

I’m leaning back against my visitor’s chest, running my small hands through her shiny hair and wondering at the way it makes my fingers glow and zing with electricity.

“Well that’s a good question. If you didn’t know that friends or puppies existed, would you long for them?” She asks, not the least bit bothered by my interruption.

I scrunch my face up in confusion, trying to work out this puzzle. “I guess not. You can’t want something if you don’t know that it exists. But I think I’d feel lonely”

“And so did he. she confirms, “though he didn’t realize it at the time. But the universe knew, it had willed this God into being so that he might create but he wasn’t creating anything at all He needed a partner inspiration. So the universe dreamed up another magic, one that would be the perfect balance to his own powers, and one that would need someone to watch over it too”

“What was it?” I ask eagerly

“Can you guess?” The woman asks, “What is the opposite of darkness”

“Light!” I exclaim, with barely a thought. I’ve moved past her hair to toy with the fabric of her dress, but my hands seem to move right through it like fog.

“Very good.” She praises, filling me with warmth.

So one daylight appeared, and it shattered the God’s endless darkness. He didn’t know what was happening, only that everything was suddenly different... more magical. He went searching, and he came upon a goddess of light. When he saw her, he realized what he’d been missing for so long, and he instantly fell in love.” Emotion is heavy in her voice, though I don’t understand why. “She loved him too, and together they created entire worlds: galaxies full to bursting with life, every one different and special in its own way.”

“Galaxies like in space?” I inquire, wanting to make sure I’ve got the information right.

“Galaxies like in space.” She confirms, “like this planet we’re on right now, it’s part of a galaxy, and it was one of their creations one of their favorites. Because you see, creating worlds takes practice. Each had its own magic, but some were more special than others. And on this one they learned to create animals and people and even a few beings in between. Now, these gods never asked to be worshiped, but their Creations could feel their magic coursing through their veins, and so they gave them names.”

“I like naming things.” I offer, running my fingers over her glimmering skin.

“So do I.” The woman expresses fondly. “The humans called the gods of creations by many different names, but wolves, they had sharper senses. They could feel the source of magic in the world, and so they named the Goddess of light after their moon.”

“What about the dark god?” I ask curiously, pausing in my explorations to look up at her glorious face.

“Well you see, that’s the trouble... they couldn’t feel his power as strongly. They thought the darkness was a curse broken by the light, when really they were two halves of the same whole. So the wolves didn’t give him a name, they forgot to worship him. Instead they feared and reviled him. Over time he became jealous of the one they called the Moon Goddess. He began to punish their creations, to haunt and torment them, to make them frightened and do things they shouldn’t.” She explains sorrowfully.

“That’s naughty.” I decide, not liking the sounds of this at all.

“It is.” She agrees, “and the more time that passed, the worse things became. Eventually the humans did find a name for him, but it was no relief, for they called him a devil. It wasn’t fair. He’d given everything to their creations, and they despised him. So his heart grew shriveled and cold, until the only thing he had left was his other half, but he sensed her slipping away too. You see, after so long being alone, he’d finally felt the joy of love, of sharing his immortal life with another. But she didn’t like what he was doing, and the more their creations called on her, the lonelier he felt. He began to fear that eventually she might forget him in favor of her worshippers

“It wasn’ her fault she was busy.” I defend, “I don’ think she woulda forgotten.”

“She wouldn’t.” The woman responds decisively. “

Not ever. But the damage was done. Fear and loneliness are powerful forces, and one day he decided it would be better to destroy their greatest creation. I do not know if he meant it as a punishment or a test, or a desperate plea, but he put the events in motion to make it happen.”

“How?” I question, deeply upset by the thought of losing this story world.

“Well, these Gods decided not to interfere directly with their creations – so that they’d be free. At most they could send messages and signs, try to steer their beings in one direction or another.

And for centuries he’d been spreading discord between the humans and shifters, instilling them with so much of his own fear and anger, that he made it impossible for them to live side by side. It wasn’t always this way, you see. Once they lived in harmony, but before long the wolves went into hiding, building secret societies alongside the human ones. Still the god of darkness continued to sew rage and despair, such that it became clear that if the humans were to find out about the wolves, such a terrible war would be unleashed, that they would all perish.”

“That’s terrible.” I object. “I don’t think I like this story.”

“Just hang in there little one, there’s hope.” She encourages, petting my hair and making me sigh with delight. “Because the light Goddess saw what he was up to, and she knew she had to act. She knew that she needed help, a source of her own magic on earth, someone who could bring together the humans and wolves, a bridge to connect them in harmony.”

“Who’s that?” I question in wonder.

“Well, it had to be someone very strong, someone who could survive a lot of very hard things in order to become the person they needed to be.”

She shares, sounding almost sad now. “And one day not so long ago, there was a King from a very long and powerful wolf bloodline, but he was struggling to make an heir with his queen. He wanted to continue his royal line, but she just wanted a child to love. She had a heart even more powerful than his magic, and one night she prayed to the Moon Goddess to grant her a babe. And can you imagine her surprise when the Goddess appeared herself?”

“That would be... a lot.” I assess, nodding.

“She was shocked.” The woman laughs. “But she bowed down and offered her tributes and blessings, and only then did she make her request.

At first, when the Goddess told her she would have a child – a daughter- she broke down into joyous tears. But as hard as it was, the Goddess had to tell her the truth, that the child would not be entirely hers. It would share the courageous blood of her husband the king, the loving heart of her mother, and the celestial power of the Goddess herself.

Worst yet, she would have to give her up.”

“But why?” I demand, feeling strangely near tears. “I -if she wanted her, then why she have to give her up?”

“Because to unite humans and wolves this child had to be part of both worlds. She had to grown up knowing what it meant to be a human. To feel powerless and afraid, and like there wasn’t magic in the world. But she also had to find her own magic when the time was right so she could be accepted by the wolves.”

But she should be with her Mommy and Daddy.” I say again, my own longing for parents outraging me for this imaginary child.

“She should.” The woman agrees, “if she were not so important, she should have grown up with all three of her parents. King, she-wolf, and Goddess.

But she was. She was important, and so sacrifices had to be made.”

“I thought you said this was a nice story.” I sniffle, outraged.

“I said there was hope.” She corrects me. “And there is. That hope is you Ella.”

“Me?” I hiccup.

“Yes, little one,” She confirms. “Because one day, you’ll grow up, and you’ll fall in love and have a baby of your own. And you’ll remember this. You’ll remember that you have parents who love you and wanted you, and that everything you’ve been through had a purpose.”

“I won’t member it now? Tomorrow?” I ask. “I wanna tell Cora.”

“You won’t, dearheart.” She sighs. “But one day.”

“When” I inquire grumpily.

“When the time is right.”

Chapter 199 – Family

Ella

There are tears in my eyes as I come out of the memory, the heady drug still swirling through my senses. I forget that I'm not alone in the room, trying to wrap my brain around the conversation I just recalled. My mind feels as though it might splinter with the weight of so many astounding revelations.

I met the Goddess, and though I'd been too young to understand the things she explained to me, to realize that I was the child in the story, I'm certainly old enough now. I have a family. I think dazedly, the Goddess's own power runs through my veins. When the heavy silence breaks, I remember I have an audience. "Holy sh!t." Gabriel utters in amazement.

"Did that... was that..." Roger stammers, looking around at the other men. "I can't believe it." Henry concludes, looking solemn but reverent as he strokes my brow.

Was that – was that real, or a dream?" I ask nervously, turning wide eyes to my father in law. It felt real, but years of disappointed hopes have trained me never to trust such things.

"No Ella," Leon answers stiffly, as if he's suddenly not sure how to address me. "That was very real."

I clench my eyes shut, and rivulets of salt water streak down my cheeks. They wanted me" I murmur in awe. My parents wanted me.

"Of course they did. Henry clucked fondly, wiping a few of my tears away. How could they not? My brother-in-law is watching us as if we're mad, Um...is that all that stuck out to you because-Put a sock in it, Roger." Gabriel cuts him off with a low growl. "Sorry, it just seems like she's burying the lead" Roger answers sullenly, crossing his arms over his chest, "Mean we just found out secrets about the whole damned universe and -"

And Ella just found out that she wasn't willfully abandoned by her parents," Leon cuts him off this time "Let her have this moment before we start digging into the rest." You all are being very calm about this" Roger observes grumpily. "But I'm the crazy, insensitive one,"

Henry turns to glare at his eldest son, "Why don't you make yourself useful and call your brother." Glaring, Roger does as he's told, and a minute later a tablet is pressed into my hand. Dominie's handsome face fills the screen, and I'm introduced to the joys of seeing my mate while in the clutches of the ether. "Hello trouble," He greets me with a wide, though concerned smile, “How are you feeling?”

I met the Goddess.” I report dreamily, raking my gaze over the rugged planes of his cheekbones and jaw. They’re even sharper under the effects of the drug, and his emerald eyes even more striking. “

You’re so beautiful I want to lick your face.” Sinclair chuckles, the worry lines in his brow smoothing out. “Well right back at you.” He replies warmly, “what’s this about the Goddess?”

“Oh, she was prettier than you.” I admit reluctantly, recalling the enchanting woman with her starlight hair and cosmic eyes. But not nearly as cuddly... I mean her cuddles were nice but yours are so much better.” I stop for a moment, distracted by thoughts of being in my mate’s arms. It takes a moment for my thoughts to get back on track. “But you wolves have had it wrrroonngg. I sing, dragging out the word. “She’s not even the Goddess of the moon, but of all light – and she has a partner.

Though honestly he sounds like a bit of a downer. Well, isn’t that fascinating?” Sinclair tells me, in the tone of one speaking to a drunk toddler. Then he clears his throat, “Dad?”

“Yeah, she’s still pretty high.” Henry mutters, and I emit an affronted scoff. “Here dearheart, listen to this while I explain to Dominic.” My phone is ready and waiting at my side, with the recording of Sinclair’s purrs cued up in case I needed to be calmed down during the session. He presses play, and the sound rumbles to life by my ear, sending ripples of cozy warmth through my body.

In the distance I can hear Henry recounting the entire tale to Sinclair, but I find myself dozing nearer and nearer to sleep, floating on the waves of the drug and my mate’s purrs. I hear the far- away sounds of their astounded discussion, about the God of darkness, the unknown history when wolves and humans openly lived together, and my role in this war. There are too many details to focus on all at once, and the conversation flits around erratically. I can only sigh and snuggle deeper into the sofa cushions.

«Can I have a blanket?” I ask after a while, my words soft and slurred. “And maybe a cupcake?”

A warm, heavy weight settles over my shoulders, and I burrow into the coverlet, You can have as many cupcakes as you want when you wake up, angel.” Henry promises, even though I can hear Sinclair complaining in the background about such an unhealthy prospect.

“Stop being bossy.” I tell him, interrupted by a wide yawn. “Sugar comes from plants... that makes it salad.” Sinclair laughs, and I realize they’ve brought the tablet back over to me. “Stop sassing me and go to sleep, little mate.”

You can't make me... " I mumble weakly, but I'm only met with purrs from both the recording and the video call now. At some point I hear Leon protest. "What about the therapy?" "Let her rest." Sinclair's deep voice instructs, "I go after her, and when she wakes she'll come see

The next thing I know, I'm in the dream forest, and Sinclair is walking towards me through the trees. It's the first time I've been able to find my way here on my own since I started digging into my past, and I run into my mate's open arms. "I did it!

No nightmares!" I exclaim, Wrapping my arms and legs around him. "I see!" He exclaims, hugging me close and dropping kisses over my cheek, temple and hair. I'm so glad, baby."

"Are you sleeping in the middle of the day?" I ask, nuzzling my nose against the bare skin of his chest, that special spot where his scent is the strongest.

I am." He confirms, running his big hands over my body. "I figured it was worth making an exception today."

You should do this every day." I suggest eagerly, nibbling his shoulder and dipping my tongue into his clavicle. "In fact, if we both slept all the time, then we could just be together here the whole time until you come home!"

That might cause a few problems with the summit." Sinclair remarks wryly, reclining on the bed and adjusting my legs so that I'm comfortably straddling him. You know, for someone that was so exhausted a second ago, you're awfully hyper now.

"Because I'm excited!" I announce, sitting up. He reaches for my hands and I thread my slender fingers through his, playfully pushing against his palms and grinning widely. I don't know how much of my euphoric mood is the drugs or the secrets I just learned, but I want nothing more than to be lighthearted and silly right now. "I have a family... one who loved me. I've been dreaming about this since I was a pup."

"I'm so happy for you, sweetheart." I lean down to kiss him, and Sinclair catches me tight, content to explore my mouth with his talented tongue and lavish affection on my body with his expert fingers.

Just before our lips connect, however, I sense him thrusting some unpleasant emotion away, as if putting it aside until later. I only let him indulge me for a moment before I pull back "What is it?"

Nothing." He lies, "Just let me love on you for a while." He catches my lips in another delicious kiss, and my hips reflexively rock against his hardness, but I wriggle free of his intoxicating trap. No." I insist stubbornly. "Tell me."

He grumbles, moving his mouth to his mark and nibbling the sensitive spot. "Don't you want to enjoy this for a while? Come on, let's leave reality for after the drugs wear off."

"If you don't tell me now I'm just going to build it up even worse in my mind." I declare fiercely. Sinclair sighs and drops his head back against the mattress. "Alright, I need to tell you something about your family.

I freeze, my instincts going on high alert. "Do you know who they are? My parents?" I ask, not knowing how such a thing would be possible based on the limited information the Goddess shared.

"Baby, the couple the Goddess described in your a powerful Alpha King from an ancient bloodline, with a tender-hearted wife who couldn't bear children... around the time you were born... there's only one couple in the world who fits that description." Sinclair explains gently. My heart ceases beating completely, Who?"

Chapter 200 – Revelations

Ella

I'm staring at Sinclair in utter shock, wishing I could unhear the words that just came out of his mouth. You're saying that my father is King Xavier?" I gape, all the joy from the last hour slipping away.

The King who died without an heir and led to your father's campaign against Damon's? The one who killed your mother?"

(We don't know for sure that he killed my mother." Sinclair soothes, "And even if he did, it's not as though that changes anything."

"It means that my father is a murderer – a dead murderer!" I cry, feeling my stomach rise into my throat. It means he ruled over the city where I grew up in terrible conditions and never... never did anything to make sure I was alright."

It hadn't even occurred to me that the Goddess's tale essentially made me a Princess. I'd latched onto the fact that my parents wanted me and glossed over everything else she said- like the fact that my father was a King and that I was chosen to unite humans and wolves. Now that I remember it feels like the entire world is crashing down around me. Baby, we don't have all the answers yet."

Sinclair quickly gathers me back into his arms, sensing my quickly fraying nerves. "This was only your third session and for all we know, your parents never knew where you ended up. Servants of the goddess might have taken you and given you to the orphanage, just like they handled binding your wolf and... whatever the incident in the forest was about."

But he's dead." I repeat, hating that this fact bothers me more than the rest. "I always thought that if I found my parents I'd get to meet them... and now I never can."

"Xavier is dead." Sinclair confirms, turning my face up to his. "But your mother lives, Ella. Queen Reina left Moon Valley after Xavier died and the last I heard, she dedicated herself to the Goddess. When this is all over we can find her."

"Reina?" I murmur realizing I'd never heard the Queen addressed by her name. That's the surname they assigned me at the orphanage. I always went by Ella Reina. " "Maybe that was her gift to you... a clue to find her when the time came." Sinclair suggests.

"And the Goddess?" I ask, feeling suddenly so overwhelmed with emotion that everything seems numb, too convoluted to identify any single feeling from the tangled mass. "She called herself one of my parents too... and she knew all of it, she sent those wolves to bind me, like you said."

She also said it all happened for a reason.” Sinclair reminds me tenderly. “I know it feels like no reason could ever be worth such terrible trauma, but she must have thought it was necessary. I can’t believe she would have done it otherwise.”

“So you’re taking her side?” I sniffle, burying my face in his neck. Never.” He retorts, stroking my spine. “From now until eternity, your side is the only one I will ever take... and if I ever come face to face with that b!tch I’ll punch her right in her beautiful face. We’ll just see how long she stays prettier than me once I get my hands on her.”

I hiccup a laugh, sliding my arms around his neck. Thank you.” I whisper, tilting my face up for a kiss. He doesn’t disappoint me, and we sink down onto the bed together, determined to make the most of the time we have left in the dream.

3rd Person

Roger was lying in his suite, trying to wrap his brain around the day’s events when a knock sounded at his door. He rose and crossed the room, his nose picking up on his new favorite scent, though he could scarcely believe it was real.

But sure enough, when the door swung open, Cora leaned in the doorway, her dark eyes wide and vulnerable. “You still wanna have that drink?”

“Of course,” He ushered her in and took her order, preparing the requested cocktail without a word – waiting for her to take the lead.

“Don’t turn this into something it’s not,” Cora warned as he handed her the glass. “I’ve just had a really long day and I just need to decompress a bit.”

“Do you want to talk about it?” Roger inquired, certain she would turn down the offer. But she surprised him again, “I think I might be a terrible person.” She admitted dolefully. “Why do you say that?” Roger asked, fixing his own drink.

“Ella thinks if she doesn’t tell me about all the secrets she’s uncovering, then I won’t find out... she doesn’t seem realize that she’s a celebrity here.”

Cora shook her head. “It’s all over the palace already, the long lost daughter of King Xavier, of the Goddess herself- however that works.”

“Okay?” Roger asked, knowing better than to guess what was bothering her. “The point is that if anyone deserves to be happy... it’s my sister.” Cora groused, trailing off. “But.?” Roger prompted.

“But we were always each other’s only family.” Cora shared bleakly. “Sure, when we were little, we hoped and prayed that our parents would come for us... that's a hope that never really goes away. But the older we got, we were bonded by the fact that we never knew where we came from and never would.

We chose each other to be our family. And now she might find her real one and I.. I'm angry at her. I'm angry that she's getting answers that I never will. "Are you afraid that she won't need you anymore if she finds them?" Roger inquired gently. "Because that's not going to happen."

I wish it were that – that would be easier than the truth." Cora confessed miserably. "Fear is forgivable. Jealousy is just selfish and petty... But I am jealous. It feels like this is just another way that the world revolves around Ella. It was hard enough when she was just my brilliant, beautiful little sister. No matter what happened to her, she never fell apart, and even though she was good at everything, she was never prideful about it."

"I became a doctor, thinking a prestigious job might even be the playing field... but she could have been one too, she just didn't want to. She only ever wanted to teach children and have a family. Then I got the job at the sperm bank and learned this huge secret about the world, I was doing science unlike anything I could have hoped for and I didn't mind keeping the secret about shifters because I felt special for the first time in my life." Cora revealed, her eyes shining. "Then Ella turns out to be a wolf."

And now.. she's an actual princess, a gift from the Goddess. Roger sighed, understanding only too well. "You know, sometimes I find that when I have a horrible, unconscionable thought. Something so terrible that it shames me to my core, that sometimes saying it out loud can help, because then at least I can acknowledge it and let it go."

Cora nodded slowly. "It's wrong and cruel of me to feel this way, after everything she did for me, after everything she's been through. I know that... But," Cora professed, taking a deep breath. Ella shouldn't get to find her family too... I want to win, just once."

Roger watches as she buries her face in her hands. Why can't I figure out how to define myself outside of her? This is my life, not hers, so why does our relationship have so much power over me? Why can't I figure out how to be my own person?

"If anyone understands that, it's me." Roger assured her, resting a gentle hand on her shoulder. Hell, I plotted against my brother with his enemy, I actually helped attack his mate ->>

Wait, what?" Cora interrupted. "Are you talking about Lydia, or Ella?" "Why, Ella. That night behind the club." Roger paled as he realized his mistake, "I thought you knew."

"No." Cora hissed slamming her drink down. "I did not. Explain – right now."

Chapter 201 – A New Dawn

Ella

If I thought the world was going to look different waking up as a princess, I was wrong. Everything is the same, even though I feel like an entirely different person than I was yesterday. I suppose I should be getting used to having my entire identity and sense of self turned upside down and inside out, but it never seems to get any easier.

If anything it just becomes more confusing. I still can't believe that I know who my parents are... that my father likely killed Sinclair's mother... that my own mother is out there somewhere. Frankly I can't even contemplate the Goddess's role in all this, it's difficult enough being a princess without also being some sort of demigod.

Above all else, I can't wait until Sinclair is home next week. Yes, we'll be preoccupied with the summit, but with everything that's happening right now I simply don't feel steady without him. I need my mate, and I know he's just as anxious being away.

He would barely release me from our dream date last night, making me promise to take it easy today and call him if I got overwhelmed. He could clearly sense my reluctance to agree – but can you blame me? I don't want to interrupt my mate while he's making battle alliances just because I feel a bit weepy.

I force myself to get up and out of bed, even though I feel like I could sleep for a year. I'm almost four months along now, and the baby is more active than ever. He's also creating new challenges for my body – like testing the limits of my bladder, stomach and brain.

I move in front of my mirror to marvel at my round belly, running my hands over my stretched skin. I'd been worried that my stretch marks would be gigantic since my body is trying to cram nine months of growth into six, but I see only a few feathers of purple and white around my sides and breasts. It's also difficult to feel self-conscious about them when my mate insists on calling them love marks' and kisses them every chance he gets.

Of course, another challenge is the fact that none of my clothes fit anymore. Luckily Gabriel's tailors have been hard at work designing me a line of maternity dresses and gowns for the summit, but we've still got a week to go before they're ready and I don't want to walk around naked until then. I head for the closet and eye all the pretty outfits I bought when we first arrived here, sighing in resignation as I turn to Sinclair's rack of clothes.

I snag one of his t-shirts, which fits snugly on his powerful build, but hangs around my thighs like a dress, even with my baby bump. I find a pair of very stretchy leggings and don't even bother looking at the mirror before leaving the room. I'm extremely comfortable, but I haven't dressed this way in public since I was a teenager.

When Philippe sees me he valiantly attempts to mask his expression, so I give him a big grin. "It's your lucky day, Philippe. We get to go shopping!

Won't that be fun?'

His humor evaporates, and I relish the look of a man who would rather go into battle than spend the morning in a dressing room watching women try on clothes. Ha! My wolf thinks victoriously. All these big bad wolves, scared of a little shopping.

Babies. I agree, deciding to seek out Cora. Of course, I haven't moved three feet before I notice that people are staring at me way more than usual – and I don't think it's my casual outfit. Everyone we come across bows their heads and moves out of my way, rather than saying hello or smiling at me like they usually do. I stop dead in my tracks. "Philippe, why is everybody acting strange?" I have a feeling I already know, but I need to hear it just to be sure.

'You're in a royal palace. Even the walls have ears here, and as loyal as the staff are... when it comes to gods and prophecies... nothing stays secret for long.'" He remarks, shrugging in half-hearted apology.

I exhale shakily, So much for the world seeming the same today. My wolf observes.

I can't make myself move, because a new possibility has occurred to me now. "Is it... is it always going to be this way?" I whisper, so only Philippe can hear. "People bowing and scraping wherever I go? Afraid to look me in the eye? Am I never going to have a normal interaction again?'

Philippe steps up beside me, a strong, steady presence. "I think you humans have a saying, you have to teach people how to treat you."

My lip quirks, "thank you for calling me a human." He nods with a soft smile, "the point is that everyone is in shock and doesn't know what to do... as far as we know there's never been anyone like you before. So if you don't want them to bow and scrape, then tell them not to. Tell them you're the same Ella you were yesterday."

"But then, won't they just be obeying me because of who I am?" I inquire hesitantly.

"Maybe at first." He confirms. "But in time they'll get used to it, and when you go home the people there will see how your inner circle treat you and they'll take the cue."

"Okay." I breathe, placing an appreciative hand on his arm. 'Thank you.'" "Of course, your highness." He teases, and I narrow my eyes to slits.

Philippe chuckles and returns to his place behind me as I continue down the halls, telling everyone I see not to fawn or grovel. I want to see the pups. My wolf huffs. They're always too curious to have these silly stuck-up manners.

I like that idea. I confirm, First shopping, then the nursery.

When I reach my sister's rooms, I'm surprised to hear her pacing and grumbling before I can even raise my hand to knock. Once I do the door swings open and Cora's livid face greets me. "Good morning sunshine." I say, unsure why she's so on edge and praying I'm not the reason.

She ushers me inside. "Did you know?" Cora hisses, baffling me completely. "Know what?" I ask, wondering if the rumors have reached her as well. My heart sinks, I'd wanted to break the news to her myself, to let her know that this changes absolutely nothing between us.

"That Roger helped orchestrate the rogue attack the night at the club!" She exclaims, as if the answer is obvious. "He did?" I question, taken aback by this accusation.

"Yes! It was a plot with the prince from the very beginning. They would attack and he'd rescue you to earn Sinclair's trust. He acted like it was common knowledge." Cora grouses, crossing her arms over her chest.

"I didn't know." I confess, "But that was months ago, before he saw reason and came back to our side."

"How can you be sure he did?" Cora lashes out. "If he was willing to do that then how do you know he's not willing to betray you still? Dominic thought he turned him into a double agent but maybe the Prince turned him back – to a triple agent!"

"Cora," I begin gently. "Dominic trusts his brother, and I trust him too. Roger lost his way for a long time, but I genuinely believe he turned over a new leaf. I can guess why my mate didn't tell me this particular detail, but honestly – I can't bring myself to care after everything that has happened."

"How can you say that!" Cora bursts. They might have killed you!"

"Because millions of people are dying because of Damon at this very moment, and I know Roger well enough to understand he would never let a personal feud with his brother overpower his duty to his pack. He wouldn't help Damon do this." I explain. "Besides in the grand scheme of things, that incident was nothing."

"Well, you might not be able to be angry for yourself, but I sure as hell can be!" She declares fiercely. "I've told the rat that I'm never speaking to him again and if he comes near either of us I'll rip his head off."

"How did you even find out?" I inquire curiously.

Cora sneaks a furtive look in my direction, and I can see guilt written clearly on her face. "I was confiding in him... I heard about your last session." She admits, not quite meeting my gaze. "I know you found your parents and look, I'm not proud of it, but I was really jealous and angry that your dreams are coming true and mine never will." The words come out in a rush, and then her shoulders sag. "I think he was trying to comfort me by telling me he was an even worse person than I am – which sort of worked but it didn't actually fix anything." Her lower lip quivers as she glances over at me again. "I want to be happy for you Ella, I really do... I'm just not there yet."

Before she can blink, I have my sister wrapped in a rib-crushing hug. "Thank you!"

"What are you doing? Didn't you hear what I said?" Cora questions stiffly.

"I did." I confirm, cuddling closer to her. "Everyone has been treating me like some sort of magical china doll and it's driving me fucking crazy." I confess. "I need some normal. I need my sister – more than anyone else – to keep treating me like I'm the same person as before."

"Even if I'm being a horrible, ungrateful brat?" Cora asks against my neck, her arms coming around my back.

"Especially then." I confirm.

She sniffles and squeezes me, "I can do that." Cora agrees, her voice thick with emotion. "Now what the hell are you wearing?"

Chapter 202 – Mother

Ella

After shopping with Cora and napping away the afternoon with the pups in the nursery, I find my way to Henry's rooms. The guards told me he just returned from the refugee camp, but when he opens the door for me he's all smiles. I give him a hug and a kiss on the cheek, and he welcomes me in. "You wouldn't happen to be in the mood for an afternoon snack, would you?" He inquires knowingly. "Because personally I'm starving."

I'm fairly certain this is a plot to make sure I'm feeding myself well, but my stomach growls loudly as I find a seat on the couch. Still, I try to sound demure as I shrug, "I could eat."

Henry laughs before calling down to the kitchens and ordering a small feast. As we eat he tells me all about his day at the refugee camp and I, in turn, share my frustration with my sudden celebrity and Cora's news about Roger. He can only shake his head. "That boy has made some bad choices in his life, but I've been very proud of him these last few months. I never thought I'd see the day that my sons would repair their relationship. You know that's down to you, don't you?" He asks warmly, an affectionate twinkle in his eye.

"Oh, don't say that. I'm so tired of getting credit for things that just so happened to occur in my general vicinity." I complain, slumping back and rubbing my full belly. "Not that I don't appreciate the compliments... I just... perfection is an impossible thing to live up to... and I am so far from perfect it's laughable. I don't want to end up with a reputation that I'm destined to fall short of – I'm only human after all." A moment after the words leave my mouth, I realize they aren't true. "I mean, not human, but I'm just a person like everyone else."

"No one said you were perfect, Ella." Henry reminds me pointedly. "I said that you brought Dominic and Roger back together – which is true. If you read more into that then I think you're projecting at best, and giving yourself too much credit at worst."

I can't help but laugh. "Fair enough. I suppose no one has said I'm perfect... I just... I can see the hope and the expectation in their eyes. The refugees, the servants, random people on the street... even my guards. Everyone is looking at me as though I'm the solution to this war, the ruined secrecy pact... but I'm the same person I was yesterday. I don't have the answers to these problems." Seeming to sense there's more, Henry stays silent, and I catch a rogue tear slipping from the corner of my eye. "I'm terrified that I'm going to fail them all, Henry."

Henry wheels around the coffee table, which bears the wreckage of our feast, and takes my hand in his. "Dearheart, that is part of being a pack leader. Every Alpha and every Luna has had the same fear, and I know it feels overwhelming, but it's also your strength. Duty to your people, the desire to do right by them will keep you centered, it's what will guide you forward through the hardest days of your reign. Now, I know the problems you're facing are a lot bigger than what most Lunas have to deal with, but I promise you aren't alone in feeling this way. That's why the responsibility is so grave."

His words ring true, especially as I think about Sinclair. I know my mate struggles with the incredible weight of caring for all those in his territory, of living up to his title and doing his best for his people, but it still feels different to me.

"But most Alpha's and Lunas have some idea what they're doing." I argue weakly. "They know this world, they've learned and prepared their whole lives from watching their predecessors. They know the history, the society and all of it's challenges. I'm not even a decent ambassador to human society because my experiences were pretty damn niche."

Henry smiles tenderly, "I'm going to give you some advice that will help you as both parent and pack leader. There are countless days ahead where you will feel uncertain, where you're overwhelmed and exhausted and all you can do is pray that you're not messing up your child or your people in some irreparable way."

"Is this supposed to be comforting?" I squeak, cradling my belly protectively and wishing I could keep my son in the safe haven of my womb until this wretched war is over.

Henry chuckles good-naturedly. "The advice is just to keep putting one foot in front of the other. If you step back and think about everything at once, the weight will crush you. Just take it one day at a time, and before you know it, you'll realize that you had what it takes all along. It won't be easy – but I promise you, nothing is more rewarding."

"Thank you." I profess tearily, reaching forward to hug him. "That isn't even what I came to talk to you about, but I guess I needed to get it out."

"Exactly." He purrs, patting my back. "Poor little mother, I'm sorry you're dealing with all this alone."

"But I'm not alone." I correct him with a watery smile. "I have a family for the first time in my life – and I don't mean the one who gave me up." I clarify, wiping my eyes. "I'm so grateful to you all. I admit, it's been one hell of a learning curve to figure out how to talk about my feelings, but I have to admit Dominic was right – it helps." I glance at my father-in-law. "Don't tell him I said he was right."

"I wouldn't dream of it." Henry promises, swiping his fingers over his lips and throwing away the key. "So what did you want to talk to me about?"

"Oh." I say, my face falling. I'm half tempted to brush it aside and save this conversation for another day. We've ended on such a lovely note, and I'm not eager to mess it all up. Still, when I glance up at Henry he's giving me an expectant look like he knows exactly what I'm thinking and won't let me get away with it. Not for the first time, I see where my mate gets his bossiness. Taking a deep breath, I forge ahead. "Dominic told me who my parents are."

Henry nods in understanding, "It must have been quite a shock... Are you disappointed, that you won't be able to meet your father?"

I shake my head fiercely, squeezing his hand as hard as I can. "I already have the only father I need." I proclaim, and suddenly I'm not the only one who has tears in my eyes. "But I'm horrified to think that my – that Xavier might have ripped your family apart." I confess, my tears returning. "That he stole your mate – Dominic and Roger's mother. I don't want to belong to his bloodline."

Henry clucks and brushes my hair back from my face. "None of us can change where we come from, Ella." He states softly. "But your upbringing taught you a lesson most of us don't learn until much later in life: the family you choose can be a thousand times better than the one you were born into. Blood may be thicker than water – but so are a lot of things... mayonnaise, frosting, gravy..."

A giggle breaks through my heavy emotions, and Henry smiles in return. "The point is that your father doesn't have to define who you are – you have more power to decide that than most." He continues, turning my chin up to look into my face. "I knew your parents fairly well, and I can tell you right now that I don't see any of Xavier in you – I never have."

"And my mother?" I inquire shakily, not sure whether I truly want the answer to this question.

"Your mother was one of the kindest women I've ever met." Henry shares. "She was unlucky in her fated mate, but like you, she loved her pack, and she dreamed of children. It can't have been easy for her to give you up."

"Do you think he knew – Xavier, I mean?" I ask. "The Goddess said he wanted an heir... would he have even cared about a girl? Would she have just told him the child died and kept the secret for herself?"

"Xavier was much like Aimon." Henry reveals, referring to Damon's father. "He was a ruthless king, though his bloodline was much older and stronger than the Tyrant's. He was willing to sacrifice a few for what he believed was the good of the pack, but he wasn't without a conscience. He wasn't mad. If he knew the Goddess had ordained it that you be taken into hiding, he never would have disobeyed her. If anything it would have given him great pride to think his child would be so important down the line."

I nod, grappling with so much new information. “Dominic also said... he said my mother is alive.”

“She devoted herself to the Goddess once Xavier died.” Henry confirms, “Which makes a lot of sense now that we know about you. I’m not sure where she went. But the Goddess’s temples tend to be in very remote, sacred places.”

“Do I look like her?” I inquire, feeling strangely vulnerable now.

Henry purses his lips. “I have a feeling that the parent you take after most is the one you’ve already met.”

It takes me a moment to realize he’s referring to the Goddess, and I have to blink a few times, trying to recall the memory. I want to say I disagree – after all, my hair isn’t made of starlight and my eyes are not the endless cosmos. But the more I think about it, the more I can see similarities – albeit very dulled and downplayed ones. My pearly white skin, eyes and hair in shades of gold I’ve never seen on another person, my light, willowy limbs...

Still, the Goddess wasn’t the one who wanted me. She might have needed me, in the same way Xavier needed a son to carry his legacy. But my mother, the one who carried and birthed me... she’s the one who wanted me.

“I want to find her.” I tell Henry suddenly. “Do you think we can track down the temple where my mother became a devotee?”

His warm gaze observes me with more understanding than I can bear. “We can try. And we’ll keep trying until we succeed.”

Chapter 203 – Damon Plots

3rd Person

When James started transporting refugees from the embattled continent to the hidden territories, his job had seemed simple – dangerous, but simple. He would land his plane on the coast and hide it as best he could, taxiing into the forest and covering the aircraft with tarps and plantlife.

He would then travel inland on foot. It was twenty miles to the nearest village, so James would often trek through the night until he came to the modest inn where Sinclair's network of spies were ferrying hunted shifters to safety. Once they were handed over into James's care, the spies would disappear back whence they came, and James would lead his new charges to the coast.

On a few occasions things had gotten dicey, like with Sadie's parents. They had unknowingly been followed by Damon's agents, forcing the entire group to scatter while James and some of the abler men stayed to fight. When Sadie's father fell, her mother hadn't been able to stay away, and the decision cost her life.

Thankfully that sort of drama was a rarity, though every refugee was consumed by near constant adrenaline on their journey, only able to relax once the plane landed in the hidden territories. At least, that's the way things started, back when he'd had the time to learn every face and name, hear every harrowing escape story.

Everything changed when the humans learned about shifters. Now the once-empty coast was crowded with bodies as far as the eye could see. There was no longer any need to travel to the village, because the refugees came straight to him.

Landing had become something of a gauntlet, as the terrified people were too busy clambering to the front of the queue to clear an adequate landing strip. James was terrified that he was going to hit someone one of these days.

Even with the extra planes and pilots Gabriel had provided to make these runs, there was never enough space for everyone. At best they could take a hundred people a day, but thousands were gathered – exhausted, starving, and injured.

James was also well aware that the operation was growing too large to stay secret, and he lived in constant fear of the day that Damon would send his army to slaughter the fleeing shifters. The only silver lining– if it could be called such a thing – was that his forces were so busy trying to manage the havoc they'd wreaked across the land, that there weren't any soldiers to spare.

So as he helped the most urgently injured shifters and families with the youngest children board the plane, he was so distracted answering the pleas and cries from those who wouldn't be able to travel this day, that he didn't notice an extra man sneak onto the plane. He didn't catch the way the shifty character slunk to the very back and huddled on the ground, wrapped in an emergency blanket. James didn't see the dangerous glint in his eye as he surveyed the quaking passengers, and when they eventually landed in the hidden territories, he didn't realize that one of his passengers hadn't thanked him for his rescue.

The man prowled off into the triage tents, his hungry gaze taking in every detail, listening to every word spoken by his relieved companions. When he reached the intake tables, he gave a false name, accepted his tent assignment, and disappeared into the camp— as silent as a ghost.

“They're here.”

Damon – now better known as Emperor Damon (as he insisted everyone call him) or the Usurper (for which he threatened to kill anyone caught calling him) or His Royal Fuckwit (his least favorite name of all) – swore violently, smashing his fist into his desk. “I knew it! That bastard Gabriel must be hiding them.” He complained, speaking so loudly into the phone receiver that the man on the other end of the line flinched. “Have you seen them?”

“No, I'm still in the refugee camp.” His spy replied. “But I have plenty to tell you regardless. This entire place is abuzz with intel, the idealistic fools never saw me coming.”

“Well get on with it then.” Damon ordered gruffly, pacing in his rooms.

“To start, Sinclair is apparently traveling around the Vanaran territories building alliances with the Alphas here, and the rest of his delegation stayed behind. Word is that the old man and Sinclair's Luna visit the camp most days, and the King and that traitor Roger are busy trying to find local families to host the refugees.” The spy reported, derision heavy on his tongue.

“What else?” Damon growled, becoming more and more furious with every moment that passed. “Do you know if the alliances are successful? Are they building an army?”

“I don't know, but there's going to be a huge political summit next week. Every Alpha on the continent is going to gather in the Capital to either pledge or deny their support.” He answered. “They've made it into quite a lavish affair, with excursions, opportunities to hear from the survivors of the conflict, feasts and even a grand ball.”

“Trust Sinclair to wine and dine grown men like one of his fucking girlfriends. Does he understand nothing about war?" Even as he said it, Damon was grinding his teeth with barely contained worry. If Sinclair succeeded in his efforts, there was no telling the damage he and the Vanarans could inflict. With their next-generation technologies, they could probably wipe out his armies in a single stroke. "I can't believe I didn't think of this sooner. I thought they'd just gone to ground. I should have remembered how far back he and Gabriel go!"

"Well the Vanarans aren't your only problem." His spy remarked reluctantly. "They might not even be your biggest."

"What the hell are you talking about?" Damon hissed.

"By far the biggest rumor swirling around this place is that they've figured out his Luna is the long lost daughter of King Xavier." The spy shared, trying to hide the excitement in his own voice.

"That's nonsense, Xavier and Reina never had children. Everyone knows that." Damon argued, though he rubbed his neck, trying to remember if there had ever been a failed pregnancy or still-birth. "There is no way they could have had a pup without anyone knowing, let alone that the bitch would have ended up in a human orphanage."

"Apparently it was by the Goddess's own orders that she be hidden." The spy explained, relating the events of the hypnosis session, which were now all over the city.

"What absolute nonsense." Damon dismissed the tale before the last words were even out of the man's mouth. "That sounds like the sort of fairy tale a child makes up to comfort themselves. People can't possibly believe that shit."

"But how could a tiny human child know about wolves? How could she know about a King and Queen when she didn't even know monarchies still existed? That anything existed outside of the human world?" The spy questioned.

"I don't know, kids are creative." Damon scoffed, "Last week my son was talking to an imaginary cowboy all day long, the little idiot."

"They're calling her a demi-goddess." The man revealed, "they believe she was sent to save them. She's even more popular than Sinclair."

"Then get rid of her." Damon commanded sharply. "If they lose their hope, they lose their will to fight. Put an end to the bitch before it's too late."

"Do we even know if she can be killed?" The spy asked uncertainly, "if she's truly the go—"

“Everyone and everything can be killed, one way or another.” Damon snapped. “Sinclair isn’t there to protect her and from the sounds of it, she’s running around the refugee camp without a care in the world, so just get it done.”

“I didn’t sign up to assassinate anyone.” The man countered. “This was just supposed to be information gathering.”

“Oh like you haven’t killed for me before.” Damon reminded him. “Don’t tell me you’re balking because she’s breeding.”

“No... but I’m not eager to kill the child of the Goddess.” He corrected.

“You can’t honestly believe that nonsense.” Damon exploded. “She’s not a fucking unicorn, she’s a regular she-wolf with a grandiose personality disorder.”

“I won’t do it.” The spy protested, gritting his teeth. “Even if I wanted to, she’s constantly surrounded by people. I might be able to get to her but it would be the end of me. Can you imagine what they would do to the man who murdered their savior.”

“Fine, if you’re too much of a coward to do what’s necessary, then at least kill Sinclair while he’s away from his reinforcements.” Damon suggested. “If he’s traveling then he’s vulnerable – meeting countless shifters he doesn’t know, moving through unsecured areas with minimum security. There are advanced technologies in Vanara, weapons and tools we don’t have. It could be as simple as planting an explosive on the road to intercept his car.”

“That’s assuming I can get my hands on their weapons and track him down in time, to predict his movements well enough to ensure he fell for the trap.” The spy explained.

“Is that a no?” Damon snarled.

“No,” the spy clarified. “It’s a question of how much you’re willing to pay. If you want me to kill an Alpha, my price just went up.”

Chapter 204 – Boom

Sinclair

“Where are you now?” Ella asks, her beautiful face looking up at me from my phone screen. “We’re headed to the Storm Forest pack, but we’ve got quite a few hours on the road before we get there.” I sigh, wishing we hadn’t needed Gabriel’s planes for the refugees, so that we might have flown these long distances.

“Storm Forest.” Ella murmurs, her eyes lighting up, “Does that mean you’re going to get to see some trees at last?”

Chuckling, I turn my phone towards the window, so she can see the rolling salt flats flying by in the distance. “No, unfortunately they chose their name to honor the ancestral lands they left before coming to the hidden territories. I’m afraid that the only trees here are the ones planted in Gabriel’s gardens.”

Ella’s face falls, and her lips form an adorable pout, just begging to be kissed. “I don’t know how they can stand it.”

“My poor little forest wolf.” I purr in sympathy, “our dream forest isn’t enough, is it?”

She shakes her head. “It’s not the same, just like being with you there isn’t the same as being with you in reality.”

“I know, baby.” I share honestly, “I feel it too.” I don’t add that it drives me crazy; that getting to hold her and love her in that secret place only our wolves can find, is nothing compared to actually having her with me. Every morning I wake up aching for her – in more ways than one.

“How many days?” Ella asks, giving me a sultry look that tells me she knows exactly how badly I’m longing for her. How I wish I wasn’t in the back of a car surrounded by my men, and that she wasn’t currently cuddled up with the pups in the nursery.

We could pull over. My wolf suggests slyly. Sneak off into the distance and have her do the same.

No. I respond, not liking it any more than he does. We need to keep moving, and she needs her rest. “Five.” I eventually answer, resisting the urge to adjust my trousers. “Five more days and we’ll be together again.”

Ella pouts again, and my wolf rumbles in my head, Naughty mate, tempting me this way. Doesn’t she know how delectable she looks? It should be illegal to have such full, luscious lips.

She visibly shivers, and I realize I've growled aloud. Unintentional or not, I don't regret it – I love seeing my sweet mate squirm with anticipation and desire. She drops her gaze in submission, and my growl turns to a pleased purr. "I can't wait to see you."

"Me too." She confirms, flushing. "Though, there is something I need to talk to you about."

"Oh?" I ask, not liking the sudden somber note in her silken voice. "What's that, gorgeous?"

"Well, I was talking to Henry, and he offered to help track down my mother." She confesses, sounding nervous now.

My heart softens, "Of course, we'll all help you sweetheart. As soon as Damon is dealt with, we'll find her."

"No Dominic, that's the problem." Ella admits with a grimace. "I don't think it should wait. I think I need to find her as soon as possible."

I try to keep my face blank as I absorb this information. She hasn't said it, but I understand she's talking about another separation. There's no way I can go searching with her, which means she wants to do it alone. My wolf positively rails against this idea, and I'm not any happier about it. Still, I don't want to shut her down without consideration for her feelings. "Ella, are you sure that this is what we need, and not simply what you want?" I ask. "I understand that you feel compelled to find her, but I have to tell you that I don't like the idea of rushing it this way."

"You mean you don't want to let me run off on my own, even though you just did the same thing in the name of duty." Ella assesses, her golden eyes narrowed.

"I mean you're entering the final stage of your pregnancy and we're at war. If you want me to even consider letting you out of my sight, you need to give me a damned good reason." I reply sternly.

Ella huffs and rolls her eyes, and my responding growl sends shudders through the other men in the car, but not my defiant mate. She simply glowers at me, "Based on my memory, my mother met the Goddess – she spoke with her and was convinced to give me up. I think there's a chance she has information – answers about all this, things that might not exist in my past."

"I'm hearing a lot of maybes and mights, little one." I reply gently, trying to keep in mind that she's been waiting to have a mother for more than thirty years. I hate the idea of keeping Ella from anything she wants, especially this, but I can't abide the thought of her taking even more risks than she already is.

“But maybes and mights that could turn the tide in this war.” Ella argues. “Isn’t that worth finding out, Dominic?”

“And if she’s somewhere you cannot follow? Somewhere so far away that it will take months to find her?” I ask sharply. “How far are you willing to go for answers? Is finding her important enough to risk our pup? To miss the war you were born to fight?”

“That isn’t fair.” Ella answers, her hurt plain in her voice. “I didn’t ask to be born to fight this war. I didn’t ask for any of this – the only thing I did ask for was our baby, I wouldn’t ever do anything to risk him.”

“I know,” I exhale, regretting my words. “I’m sorry, I shouldn’t have suggested that.” I’m desperate to put a smile back on her face – to ease the pain I can see in her eyes, but which our distance keeps me from feeling through the bond. “You didn’t ask for me either.” I remind her with a smirk. “And look how well we’ve turned out.”

Ella scoffs, but there’s clear mischief in her expression. “Ha – as if I enjoy having a giant, grumpy wolf bossing me around every second of every day.”

I chuckle, “Deny it all you want, trouble, but remember I can hear the way your heart races every time I take you in hand.”

“Ogre.” She accuses, sticking her little pink tongue out at me.

My wolf groans in my head, “That’s a dangerous thing to do sweet mate, you’re lucky we’re not together or I’d teach that precious tongue a lesson.” Hugo clears his throat and shoots me an exasperated look, an important reminder that I’m not alone. Ella hears it too, and my temporary distraction comes to an end. Though she giggles and flushes, she also glances at the pups snuggled around her to make sure they’re still sleeping, and turns the conversation back to tamer territory.

“I wasn’t saying any of this just because I want to meet my mother, Dominic.” She pauses, averting her gaze. “I mean I want to... of course I do... but I can be patient. I’ve waited this long and I can wait longer... but every time I go into a session with Leon I learn something new and overwhelming... I just thought that if there’s someone out there who has all these answers then maybe I wouldn’t have to keep doing this – learning bits and pieces every few days in the most agonizing ways...” Ella peeks back up at me with wide eyes. “Maybe that makes me a coward – wanting the answers without doing the work.”

“You are the farthest thing from a coward I have ever seen.” I inform her seriously. “And I’m not just saying that because I love you or want you to feel better. It’s natural to want to avoid unnecessary pain, and I don’t blame you for feeling this way one bit.”

“But you don’t want me to go.” She assesses, slightly mollified.

“I don’t want any of this.” I confess, hoping she realizes just how deeply I understand and share her own frustration. “If I had my way, you and I would have a little cottage in the mountains where we could raise our children and run in the forest, and never have to think about politics or prophecies.”

“But that will never be our life.” Ella laments huskily, her eyes shining.

“Maybe one day, when this is over and our pups are grown. When Rafe takes the throne and I retire, we can go and find that place. We’ll get old and grey and fat, and all of this will seem like a bad dream.” I suggest.

“Not all bad.” Ella protests, and I can see her arm moving, caressing her belly. “There’s been a lot of good too. It’s just hard to appreciate sometimes when everything else is so terrible. It feels wrong to enjoy what we have when so many other people are losing everything they hold dear.”

“I know.” I agree, “but it’s also why we have to cherish what we have and not take it for granted. This war is a horrible reminder of how quickly it can all end.”

“I won’t ever take you for granted.” Ella promises with a smile, “no matter how bossy you get. You’re my everything, Dominic – I never felt alive until I met you.”

“I won’t take you for granted either.” I vow, and these promises remind me of the mating ceremony we never had. We told the pack we were waiting until after Rafe was born, and by the time we finally confessed the truth and might have considered having one sooner, all hell broke loose. A new idea occurs to me and as soon as I think it, I know it’s right. We should have our mating ceremony before I go into battle, before we can be separated again. “Ella –”

Before I can make my proposal, a deafening explosion detonates all around us, and the world goes black.

Chapter 205 – Panic

Ella

I stare at the black phone screen in shock and confusion, trying not to jump to the wrong conclusion. One moment Sinclair was there, talking to me as if everything was normal, and the next I heard a terrible boom and saw a blinding light. Then the line disconnected. It didn't look or sound like a car crash... it seemed... it seemed like some sort of explosion.

Maybe it was just the call getting interrupted, some sort of weird static... or a sound on the radio. My wolf suggests, even as I frantically attempt to call him back. The line doesn't even ring, I simply hear an error tone and a voice telling me the call can't be completed.

I untangle myself from the sleeping pups, waking a few of them but too alarmed to pause and apologize. My heart stops beating, and my lungs stop pumping. This isn't happening. This can't be happening. It's just a problem with the phone. I think desperately, stumbling out of the blanket fort, gasping for air. Isabel looks over when she hears one of the rudely awoken pups emit a cranky cry, her attention quickly zeroing in on me.

"Ella, what is it?" She asks, looking between me and the pups. "Is it the baby? Are you sick?"

"I ca... I can't breathe." I wheeze, pressing my hands to my breast in a feeble attempt to make my body start working again.

Isabel tries to guide me to a chair but I push her off, gasping. "Get the King." I beg, "Henry... get everyone." The room is spinning before my eyes, and I reach out to the she-wolf to steady myself, certain I'll topple over at any moment. Isabel shouts an order to one of the guards and he takes off at a run.

"You've got to calm down, Ella." Isabel says sternly, pushing me into a chair and forcing my head between my knees. "You're alright, you're just having a panic attack." Though her voice is cold, warm hands rub my back.

I shake my head violently. "No... you don't understand." I hiss, between gulps of air. "It's Dominic... I think... I think something happened."

She goes very still, "what do you feel?"

"Nothing," I reply hurriedly, trying to feel him through our bond even though I know he's too far away to sense. "I mean, not... not different." Tears are spilling from my eyes, and my voice is shaking over every syllable. "We were on the phone and then there was this huge boom and a flash of light... like an explosion and the call dropped, I can't get him back. It says the line is dead."

Isabel exhales a breath I hadn't realized she was holding. "That could be nothing. And when my mate died, I felt like my soul had been ripped out of my body and torn to pieces."

"Were you together, when it happened?" I ask urgently, "were you chosen or fated?"

"We were together." Isabel admits reluctantly, as if I'm forcing her to remember things she'd rather not. "I saw it happen, and yes, we were fated."

"I'm sorry." I hiccup, "I didn't mean... I'm just trying to figure this out."

"It's okay." Isabel answers, though her shoulders are rigid. "I understand."

A few minutes later Gabriel comes rushing into the nursery, followed closely by Roger. "Ella what's wrong?"

I'm still heaving and gasping, worse now that my tears have taken hold, so Isabel explains for me. Both men immediately tense, their faces growing grave and serious. "I'll call the doctor for something to calm you down." Gabriel says to me, "And I'll deploy a drone to fly over the road they were traveling, reach out to the Storm Forest Alpha to see if there have been reports of crashes or explosions."

"I don't want the doctor." I argue, rising to my feet and wrapping my arms around my middle. "I'm not taking or doing anything until I know whether or not Dominic is alright." The baby flutters and kicks inside me, and I feel a rush of sadness and confusion through our bond. I hate knowing that my emotions are causing him distress, but I also don't know how to help it. I try to send waves of calm back to him, letting him feel my love and commitment to protect him, but it doesn't help much.

In the end I take a step I never have before, and cut him off from my feelings completely. This was never possible when I was in the depths of hypnosis because I wasn't even present myself, and the other times I've shielded him from things, I've had the presence of mind to allow the good things through our bond. But now I'm too out of control to regulate anything, so it will have to be all or nothing.

I regret this as soon as I do it, because the moment Rafe stops sensing me, he panics. Stress and fear unlike anything I've ever felt from him pummels my heart, and I immediately drop the shield I put up. "It's okay," I say aloud, running my hands over my belly – it must have felt like I disappeared completely, and with Sinclair so far away too, he must have thought he was all alone. "I'm here. I'm here, angel. I'm sorry."

The baby calms at once, and I feel the first pulse of anger he's ever directed at me, as if his tiny mind is demanding where I went – how I could leave him like that. "I'm sorry, I love you so much. I'm here" I repeat over and over.

The sensations make the loss of my own parents loom larger in my heart, but when it happened to me I was too young to remember. Still, I must have felt this way... only instead of a terrified flash it was permanent. I'm all too aware that I'm still in the nursery, surrounded by a number of children who were old enough to remember the pain and fear of being suddenly, viciously alone – their souls cut off from the only bonds they'd ever forged. The thought makes my knees go weak.

Gabriel and Roger are still looking at me with obvious concern, and Isabel is wearing an expression that makes me think she understands exactly what just happened. She nods bleakly, and slides a steadying arm around my waist, looking at the men, "If you don't let her come with you, she's only going to be worse."

I could hug her... assuming she would let me, but Gabriel and Roger exchange a wary glance before agreeing. "Fine, but I'm putting the doctor on call, just in case."

"I'll go get Dad." Roger announces, taking off towards the palace entrance.

An hour later I'm doing breathing exercises while we watch one of Gabriel's aerial drones zoom across the foreign landscape. Any other time I would be fascinated to discover the secrets of the hidden territories, but now I can only wring my hands and pray. The search seems to go on forever, and my nerves are fraying more and more with every moment that passes. Finally a few specks appear in the distance, and I recognize the salt flats Sinclair had shown me out the window on his drive. The specks grow larger and larger as the drone flies... and then we see the flames.

The room is deathly silent as the cars come into view... what's left of them at least. Where there were once shiny SUVs, there are now only mangled and charred husks of metal, centered in the middle of a blasted crater of earth. "No." I gasp, counting them, trying to figure out if there was any way the men might have escaped. The drone flies lower, and when I see the burnt outline of an arm hanging out of one of the shattered windows, I clench my eyes shut. I'm rocking back and forth on the sofa, refusing to look at the screen, to witness the horror tearing through the room.

Pounding footsteps charge for the door, and when Roger's scent fades I understand he must have stormed out. I peek at Henry, hoping he'll tell me this isn't real. But when I look... I barely recognize him. His face is grey and pallid, and all the strong steadiness I've come to expect from him is gone. He's sunk in on himself, his expression one of a man whose just had his whole world shattered. I swing my gaze to Gabriel for help, but the King stands in front of the screen with his hands in tight fists and tears in his eyes. They all believe it. They all think he's gone.

"No." I insist, refusing to accept this. "No, he might have escaped somehow. He's not..." I can't bring myself to say the word. It's too terrible to contemplate.

"I'm so sorry, Ella." Gabriel says, in a voice like gravel. "I don't want to believe it either, but I'm afraid he's gone."

"No!" I cry, shaking my head. "Why are you saying that! He can't be gone! Do you have any idea what he's survived? What he's overcome? He's not dead!" I explode, spinning in place, searching for anyone who will agree with me. When I find none, I stop and dig my heels into the ground. "I won't lose him, I can't!"

Before I can say another word, pain rips through my belly, clenching and white hot. My lips part on a silent cry as I double over, clutching my stomach. Black spots take over my vision, and the carpet zooms up to meet my face. Then all is quiet.

Chapter 206 – Denial

Ella

When I wake I'm in my nest, hooked up to about a dozen machines and wracking my brains for some explanation of how I got here. Of course... the moment my memory kicks in, I wish it hadn't. My wolf howls in my head, but I shut out the tumultuous emotions threatening to consume me. It might not be healthy, but if there's one thing I'm good at – it's repressing feelings.

I clench my eyes shut. "It's not real, it's not real." I insist to the empty room, reflexively tracing the outline of my womb. "Are you alright, little one?" I squeak, wondering if my pain is about to multiply by a million.

The baby flutters and sends feelings of sleepy confusion through our bond, and the tightness in my heart eases a bit. He's okay. I tell my whining wolf, but we both know she's not just worried for the baby's sake.

They're both okay. My wolf assures me, sounding surprisingly confident for all her nervous whimpering. I don't care what anyone says. We would feel it if he was gone. I would feel it.

But what if he's too far away? I ask, hating myself for the kernel of doubt currently sitting in my stomach like a boulder.

I would still know. She insists. Trust me, no amount of distance could fool me. Our bond is in tact, just out of reach.

Then why are you so worried, I can feel how feral you are. I remind her, praying she's right and that this isn't simply bravado.

Because he's out there alone somewhere and someone just tried to kill him... they succeeded in killing all his men. She answers, and I can feel the truth in her words.

As if we don't know who's responsible. I growl fiercely. This is Damon's doing. I don't know how he managed it, but I will not rest until that bastard is six feet in the ground. Too late I realized I growled out loud, and a man's voice breaks through our private conversation.

"Oh good, you're up." The palace doctor is standing in the doorway, looking at me with the pitying expression of someone who wants to be sensitive but doesn't know how. "You gave us quite the scare, Ella."

Well at least he didn't call us Your Highness. My wolf remarks dryly, noting the trend that far too many of the Vanarans and refugees have recently adopted.

“What happened?” I ask, my hands still resting on my belly. “Is my pup alright?”

“You had what is called a hypertensive crisis.” He answers evenly. “At times of extreme stress, your blood pressure can skyrocket to very dangerous levels. In your case it triggered false labor and a dizzy spell which thankfully caused you to pass out before your heart or child could be harmed.” He explains. “We’ve got you hooked up to an IV to get some fluids into your system, and it also allows us to administer anxiety medications and sedatives as efficiently as possible.”

“Do I have to go back onto bed rest?” I question worriedly.

“For the time being.” He confirms. “I’m very worried about you, Ella. High blood pressure is very dangerous during pregnancy and you’re under far too much stress. I know the doctors in Moon Valley diagnosed you with preeclampsia, and when you arrived here we thought that the condition had been mitigated by your wolf waking. But based on the numbers I’m seeing, you’re at risk of the condition returning. We need to get your stress levels under control.”

“That’s easier said than done.” I answer sullenly. “We’re at war... and my mate...” I know if I tell him that Sinclair isn’t dead he’ll just think I’m in denial, but I can’t bring myself to lie either.

“I was very sorry to hear about Alpha Dominic.” The doctor tells me sympathetically. “I know it’s hardly a comfort, but his death is a huge loss for all shifter kind.”

I can’t bring myself to thank him, even though I know he’s trying to be nice. I simply nod and glance at the IV. “Do I have a choice about the sedatives?”

He sighs. “You need to rest, Ella. I can’t force you to take anything, but I must encourage you to follow my treatment plan for the sake of your child’s life and your own. Eclampsia kills mothers and babies... even these days with all the technology we possess. It’s not something to mess around with.”

“I understand.” I murmur, feeling fresh tears well. “Would you like to tell me what worries you about the sedatives?” He inquires.

“No.” I answer stiffly, because telling him would mean admitting that I believe my mate is alive... and how terrified I am that he isn’t. The truth is that I’m afraid to go to sleep, because no amount of distance can keep us apart in dreams. My mate can even follow me into my deepest, darkest nightmares... so if I sleep and he isn’t there... it will mean he’s really gone. That possibility is just too horrible to contemplate.

“Then I’ll leave you to rest.” The doctor answers, thankfully not seeming offended by my response. "But I hope you'll reach out to me if you have any questions or concerns."

I nod and he leaves. I'd just started to burrow deeper into my nest, seeking the lingering scent of my mate from the last time we lay here together, when Henry and Cora enter the room. They both have tears in their eyes, and Cora immediately comes forward and climbs into bed with me. "You scared me." She murmurs, cuddling up to my side. "I'm sorry." I profess, kissing her hair. "I'm okay."

Though I'm speaking to my sister, my eyes are locked on Henry. I swear to the Goddess, he's aged ten years in a single afternoon. My heart breaks seeing the pain in his warm eyes, and I reach out to him. "He's not gone, Henry." I whisper, unable to help myself. "I would know if he was."

Henry's eyes fall shut as his handsome features twist into a grimace. "My darling, I don't want to believe it any more than you do, but we can't pretend this isn't real."

"You weren't with your mate when she died, right?" I ask determinedly. "You were away from her, so could you feel it when she passed, even though she was out of reach of your bond?"

Henry sighs, looking as though he doesn't want to answer. "Yes, but that's different... we were fated."

"My bond with Dominic is no weaker just because we chose each other." I argue. "He's told me that it's stronger even than what he shared with Linda."

"That may be so, but it's still different." Henry cautions me. Cora stays silent, snuggling beside me and watching our debate unfold with wide eyes.

"And what of your bond with him?" I demand. "Shifter parents have bonds with their pups from just days after they're conceived. Surely you would feel it if your bond with Dominic was broken? Surely it would hurt every bit as much, if not more than losing your mate?"

As soon as I ask the question, a new fear assaults me... maybe Henry did feel it, and I didn't. I brace myself for a terrible blow, but Henry says. "I saw that wreckage just like you did. We saw the bodies. Whether we can feel it or not, no one could survive that... not even Dominic. I'm afraid he was simply too far away, even the strongest bonds have their limits."

"What are you saying?" I cry. "Why is everyone so ready to believe this! How can you be willing to believe it if there's even the slightest hope?"

"I'm not!" For the first time since I've met him, Henry raises his voice at me, and I flinch in shock and alarm. "That's the last thing I want, Ella! No parent is ever ready to believe their child is gone!” He wheels away from the bed, then back, his face livid with color.

“But I can’t help Dominic by living in denial – I can’t help you or our people by refusing to believe the evidence in front of my face! If he’s out there then why haven’t we heard from him? You were on the phone with him, he’ll know we must all think he’s dead, so why hasn’t he been in contact, why hasn’t the storm forest alpha found him!”

Neither Cora or I make a sound. Our upbringing taught us to freeze and make ourselves as small as possible in the face of this kind of anger. I reflexively try to shield Cora and my belly from Henry, and when he sees the protective movement, he breaks. “I’m sorry,” He utters hoarsely, full of remorse. “I didn’t mean to raise my voice. But you have to know that this is a tragedy for all of us.

For our family more than anyone else, but a tragedy for the entire continent. No one wants to believe it’s real Ella. You’re not alone in that, and when you come to accept what’s happened, you won’t be alone in your grief either... but you need to accept it. Dominic is gone.” His voice breaks, tears streaming down his cheeks. “And he’s not coming back.”

Chapter 207 – Cora Comforts Roger

3rd Person

Cora wasn't sure what she was doing.

Her sister needed her, so why was she walking away from Ella's suite? Why wasn't she offering to help make arrangements for a funeral, or trying to help Henry convince the stubborn Luna to accept her loss and focus on caring for herself and the baby? Why was she determinedly walking the same path she had only nights before, when she'd been vulnerable and reckless enough to seek out Roger?

Because you've lost your damn mind. She thought bitterly. Worrying about a man who doesn't deserve your time or attention – someone who betrayed his own family and endangered Ella's life. So what if he's gorgeous and clever, so what if he understands you even better than you understand yourself... and makes your stomach go all soft and squishy everytime he looks at you with those fierce wolf eyes... he's still a scoundrel. He can't be trusted.

But despite Cora's confused inner musings, she was worried. She hadn't seen hide nor hair of Roger since the news broke about Sinclair's death – and that was three days ago. Ella may not have realized it, but after she collapsed the doctor sedated her for a full 72 hours, and Cora knew that was part of why this was such a struggle. Ella was waking up as if his death had just happened, but the rest of them had been battling through the last few days without her. They'd exhausted every possibility, every hope, and eventually accepted what Ella could not.

When she reached Roger's rooms, Cora knocked softly, unsure if he was even there. However her question was soon answered, when a bitter growl sounded from somewhere inside. "Go away!"

"Roger, it's me." Cora called, fighting back a quiver of fear. "I just wanted to check on you."

"I said go away." He barked again, and Cora thought she heard something smash.

Taking a deep breath, Cora summoned all her courage, briefly wondering if she'd lost her mind. She knew better than to interfere with a man in such a state, and though his harsh words and angry tone sent nervous tremors through her body, she couldn't help herself. She turned the door handle and warily opened the door. The scene which met her was more concerning than anything she'd imagined.

His suite was a bit larger than hers, but no less opulent – at least it had been. Now it lay in ruins – every piece of furniture had been broken or toppled, every decorative vase and framed portrait smashed and ripped. Papers and shards of glass, pottery and wood fragments littered the floors, making the room nearly impassable. Cora sucked in a shocked breath, pressing her hand over her mouth to suppress the sound.

“What the hell are you doing? Don't you have ears?” Roger snapped, appearing in the door to the bedroom. He was shirtless, dark trousers slung low on his hips, muscles rippling on his abdomen and arms. His dark hair was tousled and a thick layer of stubble swathed his cheeks. In his balled fist he held a half empty bottle of dark brown liquor, and he was swaying slightly on his feet, his eyes unfocused.

Cora cursed in her mind, suddenly wishing she'd come earlier. Roger was clearly in very bad shape, and she wasn't sure if he was a threat to her in this condition. “I'm sorry.” She stammered, trying and failing to look at anything but the mess or his contoured muscles. “But, from the looks of it, you're not doing well.”

“Of course I'm not doing well!” Roger bit, taking a swig from the bottle and stalking forward. He trod over the debris as if he didn't even realize it was there, and Cora winced as glass and splinters dug into the soles of his bare feet. Blood seeped out to blend in the wreckage, and Cora gulped as he drew nearer. “My baby brother is dead.” Roger reminded her – as if she could forget. “How would you be?”

Cora felt herself cowering, even though she knew better. The last thing you're ever supposed to do with an irate wolf is behave like prey, and here she was flooded with adrenaline and contemplating flight. “Not like this.” Cora managed to utter, glancing again at the destroyed suite, i “Well I'm sorry if my grief is messier than yours.” Roger sniped, closing the door behind her and making her flinch.

Why do you even care? I thought you were never speaking to me again.”

“I wasn't planning on it,” She admitted, “but given what happened I... I just thought...”

“Wanted to check to see if I was celebrating?” Roger suggested coldly, still prowling forward until Cora had no choice but to back away, her shoulder blades colliding with the door. “I finally got what I wanted right? Dominic out of the way and the pack in need of an Alpha?”

“Of course not!” Cora countered sharply. “I knew you would be sad, I just wasn't prepared for you to be quite so...” She trailed off, trying to find the right word before he growled and she involuntarily squeaked, “rabid.”

Roger laughed without humor. “Why not? Don't you think I'm some sort of monster? Isn't this exactly what you expect of me?”

“Stop it!” Cora hissed, trying to cease the shaking in her voice. “I know what you’re doing Roger and you can’t bully me into leaving so that you can carry on wallowing this way.”

“Why? Isn’t it working?” He demanded, lowering his head to her neck and drinking in her scent. Cora’s stomach flipped, and she could smell the whisky on his breath. “I can taste your fear, little human. That’s how strong it is. So why aren’t you running away?”

“I’m not going to.” Cora insisted, clenching her eyes shut. “Because I know you won’t hurt me.”

“Is that so?” Roger rumbled ominously, trailing a finger down the length of her arm, extending a claw but only letting it graze her with a featherlight touch. “And how do you know that.”

“You said it yourself.” Cora croaked, trying to ignore the sensation of his warm breath on her skin, his proprietary touches, which seemed to set her entire body ablaze. “We’re kindred spirits. I know that no matter how terrible and unforgivable your thoughts might have been towards your brother at the height of your anger and jealousy, losing him is a loss from which you will never recover. And your grief is all the worse for how cruel you’ve been to him in the past.”

She gulped, “And I... I know you won’t hurt me because I’m not the one you’re angry with... I’m not the one you hate.”

“So who is?” Roger asked, his gravelly voice like a caress.

“Yourself.” Cora breathed, wondering how in the Goddess’s name she could be so frightened and turned on at the same time. She couldn’t deny the way standing up to an unhinged wolf terrified her, but the mere fact that she was able to do so was something of a miracle. Cora had never been able to stand up to anyone this way, and Roger was a hundred times more dangerous than any of the people she’d come up against in the past. Then there was the way he was looking at her, the way he was touching her – impossibly gentle despite his menacing behavior.

She watched as her accusation hit home, and suddenly Roger’s eyes shuttered. His shoulders sagged as some of the chaotic energy ebbed out of him, and the next thing Cora knew, he was resting his forehead on her shoulder, one of his powerful hands gripping her waist as tightly as he gripped the liquor bottle. “I just got him back...” Roger murmured miserably. “I wasted so many years blaming him for things he couldn’t control, ignoring him when all he wanted was to be my friend.” A drop of moisture landed on Cora’s skin, and she realized Roger was crying. Tentatively, Cora wrapped her arms around his broad shoulders, wondering how it was possible for anyone to be so huge. She settled one hand in his dark hair, stroking the silky locks as he continued to bare his soul.

"I was never the brother I should have been. I never looked out for him or taught him about the world. I didn't protect him when we were little, and I didn't do it now – when he needed me most." He heaved a sob. "It was my job and I failed him." i

The liquor bottle dropped to the ground, just one more piece of debris in all the ruin, and Roger clamped his arms around Cora's middle, squeezing her tightly as he bore his soul. Any threat or sensual intent was gone now, and Cora stroked and soothed him as he wept. There were tears in her own eyes too, in sympathy for his loss, but also for her own mistakes with her sister.

This hadn't been what she planned when she came looking for Roger, but she was glad she'd listened to her instincts. Roger clearly needed comforting, and even though she decided not to let this change anything between them, she was only too eager to take care of him... she didn't want to think about why that might be the case. She simply leaned into his arms, and gave him the solace he desperately needed.

Chapter 208 – Isabel Comforts Ella

Ella

Four days. Four days since Sinclair's car was bombed in West Vanara, and four days since I last heard his voice.

I refuse to believe he's gone. I know the others have given up hope, but they don't know my mate like I do, and they don't have our bond. I don't know where he is or why we haven't heard from him, but I know he's out there somewhere. If the doctor would just let me out of this bed I'd go find him myself.

Unfortunately he's keeping me under lock and key, and a roster of babysitters have been assigned to watch me. Honestly it's insulting, but I suppose my first few escape attempts might have given him cause to worry. The first time I slipped out past my guards I made it all the way down to the second floor before Philippe caught up with me and hauled me back. The second time, I only made it down the hall, and the third was dead in the water before I could even finish making a rope out of my bed sheets. That was about the time the bossy wolves who seem to think they can tell me what to do now that Sinclair is... out of reach... decided I needed constant supervision.

I know everyone is trying to be patient with me, novelxo but they're dealing with their own grief too, and the doctor frightened them about my condition. If they would just listen, I would tell them that the best possible solution for my stress would be to find Sinclair and bring him home. Nothing will help more than having him with me... but they won't listen, so I'm stuck here – lying around in my nest and banned from working.

"This is stupid." I complain, glaring at Isabel. "Shouldn't you be in the nursery?"

"The King thought my experience dealing with whiny babies made me ideally suited to look after you." Isabel responds coolly. "And James is with the pups."

I glance at her curiously. "How's that going? You and James?"

Isabel shoots me a withering look. "Why don't you worry about yourself, Princess." Though many people now address me seriously with this title, from Isabel it's pure derision. "You haven't slept, you haven't eaten or washed your filthy hair. If you truly believe your mate is out there, then you might want to pull yourself together so he doesn't have to come home to a hot mess."

She has a point, but only just. I didn't sleep last night, but I was so rested from my long sedation that staying awake wasn't even a challenge. And how can a she-wolf have an appetite or think about hygiene when her mate is in mortal danger? novel.xo "You don't think I'm crazy?" I ask hesitantly.

“Would it matter if I did?” Isabel arches a brow. “You don’t care that the others think you’ve lost your marbles.”

“No...” I confirm, staring at my lap. “But you’ve lost a mate, you know how it feels.”

“That’s different.” Isabel snaps, “I was there when my mate died. I saw it and I felt it, there was no doubt he was gone and no room for hope.” She glances at me with an unreadable look in her eye. “If I were in your shoes...

I expect I’d do exactly the same as you are.”

“Can I ask...” her face shutters as soon as the words leave my lips, novexo but I’ve already begun. “How did it happen?”

At first I’m sure she won’t answer the question, but Isabel shifts in her seat and purses her lips. “It was more than a year ago, before any of this started.” She explains, surprising me. Still, the emotion in her voice from sharing these basic details makes me regret asking this of her. “Our baby, Sophie, was only a month old, and we were both exhausted and overjoyed. Daniel was absolutely besotted with her, and in a lot of ways, he was better with her than I was. I had a really difficult birth and my body was wrecked. Nothing seemed to go right, not breastfeeding or my recovery – it was overwhelming and I was so worried about doing everything right that I forgot to enjoy it. I was in love with her too... I just didn’t cope as well.”

“Then one day we were out at the park, just having a family picnic. We heard someone scream, and then we saw rogues racing towards us. Daniel pushed the baby into my arms and told me to run... I didn’t realize in the moment that he meant to stay and fight, to hold them off so we could get away. I thought he was going to be right behind us, but all my instincts were to protect Sophie, so I ran. Then I felt it. I felt our bond shatter and fall away, as if my own soul was slipping from my body.” Isabel shares, tears streaming down her cheeks. “And when I turned back... I saw him lying on the ground with his throat ripped out, a rogue still standing above him, nvēlx.o goring him with his claws.”

I’m reaching for her, and to my surprise, she comes into my arms. “At first, I didn’t want to live without him. I fell into a terrible depression, and nothing anyone tried could bring me out of it. It wasn’t until a couple of months later, when Sophie woke me up in the middle of the night.” Isabel sighs, “I hadn’t been... I’d wanted her so badly before she arrived, and then with all the difficulties and losing Daniel – I wasn’t the mother I should have been, let’s just say that. But that night I went to feed her, and her eyes had changed color. They were blue when she was born, but there she was looking up at me, with Daniel’s amber eyes.”

Isabel sniffs. “It was a wakeup call. A realization that I would always have a piece of Daniel as long as I had Sophie. And Goddess how I hated myself for neglecting her, for letting my grief make me forget what a miracle she was. Everything turned around that night. I finally became the mother I was meant to be, the one who would have made Daniel proud – the one Sophie deserved.” She swipes at a tear. “She was my entire world... and then Damon took over, and we were forced to run.”

I wait for her to continue, but I fear this loss was too recent. I already know what happened anyway... Isabel made it, and her daughter did not. “I’m so sorry, Isabel.” I profess, cuddling her close, tears in my own eyes. “No one should have to go through what you have. I wish there was some way I could make it right.”

“You’ve done plenty.” Isabel hiccups. “You gave me the nursery. You brought all of us here.”

For a long moment we just lie there in each others arms, and then the baby kicks in my womb, thumping his foot against Isabel’s side. To my surprise Isabel smiles and reaches out to rest her hand on my navel. “Hello munchkin.”

“Can I ask you something?” I inquired uncertainly.

She nods, and I confess, ‘The other day, after the phone call with Dominic, I was worried about upsetting the baby. So I tried to cut myself off from him.’

“We’ve all made that mistake.” Isabel replies knowingly. “It’s a lesson every parent has to learn: that having you is better for them, even if you’re upset.” She grimaces, “and it tells you just how traumatizing losing a parent truly is for a pup... How much they need you, rely on you to guide and shelter them.”

“Is it possible to bond with an adopted child that way?” I ask, thinking of all the children in the nursery.

“Of course, just like chosen mates bond.” Isabel confirms. “You fall in love, and you claim them. It’s a different kind of mark, but it’s every bit as powerful.”

“Will you claim Sadie?” I inquire, my heart aching to think the infant has been feeling the way my own babe did the other day.

“When I’m ready.” Isabel reveals, looking torn. “I know it would be better for her to have it sooner, I just can’t help feeling that it’s a betrayal of Sophie.” ‘That’s nonsense.’ I tell her, knowing James already shared this sentiment with her. “You know as well as I do that loving one child doesn’t mean you love another any less, or that you forget them.”

“It’s not just that... it’s that I think if the tables were turned and Sophie had lived instead of me... I would have felt jealous if she bonded to a new mother so quickly. I was her mother – me, not some random she-wolf who accidentally stumbled upon her.” Isabel relates guiltily.

“Isabel.” I murmur seriously. ‘Think about how it felt when you tried to cut yourself off from her, how afraid and unmoored she was. Would you really rather she be in that pain, than connect with someone who will love her like only you could?’”

She clamps her eyes shut, choking on her tears. “No.” She cries, gasping. ” No, I would be sad if she forgot me, but I’d much rather she always feel safe and happy.”

“Exactly.” I say, “Don’t make Sadie wait. You already love her and there’s no use denying it.”

Before Isabel can respond, I feel a tug deep in my chest, a pang of intense love that feels very far away. I jerk upright in my nest. I know that feeling!

A moment after I’ve thought it, I hear a familiar, beloved voice in my mind. Ella?!

I’m out of bed in an instant, dislodging a suddenly disgruntled Isabel. “It’s Dominic!”

Chapter 209 – Ella Breaks Out

Ella

Isabel stares after me with her mouth gaping open in shock, not moving from the bed. I don't pause to put on appropriate clothing or even don shoes, instead sprinting to my door and pressing my ear to the wood. After a moment Isabel recovers and comes to stand beside me. "What are you doing?" She whispers, her pretty eyes wide.

I lead her back from the doorway, pressing my finger to my lips. The feeling of my mate is growing stronger by the second, and his voice calls out again. Ella!

I hear you! I send back through our bond, praying he can hear me. I'm coming, Dominic. The baby is fluttering excitedly in my belly, and I have a feeling that when Sinclair isn't calling to me, he's calling to Rafe. Still, when his voice sounds again he says only my name, Ella! Through the distance I can sense his exhaustion and worry, the nearly unhinged determination of his wolf. There's pain there too, and I know he must be injured. He's trying to get back to us, but he's too worn down and depleted to communicate beyond these simple calls.

"I have to get out of here." I tell Isabel, speaking as quietly as I can. "Dominic is... I can feel him, he's calling me. But he's hurt, I have to reach him."

Isabel blinks, "Are you sure?"

I cut my eyes to her, "Of course I'm sure, I know my mate better than I know myself."

"Alright, I'm sorry," Isabel replies, "I was just surprised. What can I do?"

"Can you distract my guards?" I request, wondering if she'll actually agree. This feels like the first true test of our friendship, but Isabel only sets her jaw and nods.

"I'll go out this way," She tells me, pointing to the bedroom door. "You exit through the sitting room. I'll keep them occupied as long as I can."

I nod eagerly and dash to the far door, watching as Isabel slips outside. Her voice echoes down the hallway, "Excuse me, can you all help me? The Princess requires some items from the kitchen but our phone doesn't seem to be working. Would you mind terribly going down to fetch a few things for us?"

I roll my eyes at her use of my surreal title, but I open the door as quietly as I can, peeking my head out even as the guards gathered around Isabel exchange uncertain glances. "We can't leave our post, Miss. Philippe's orders."

"Well I promised the King I wouldn't leave her side." Isabel frets, wringing her hands like the perfect damsel in distress. “Maybe just one of you could go? I’m sure you’re all more than strong enough to carry even the heaviest tray.”

I slink away on tiptoes while the guards puff up their chests and debate which one of them should get to be her knight in shining armor, and I have to bite back a laugh when I catch Isabel batting her eyelashes at the guards. I disappear around the corner, trying to remember which of the secret passages Gabriel described to me is closest. I know there’s one on the floor below, but I’m worried someone might see me before I get there.

Ella, Ella Ella. Sinclair chants through our bond, filling me with all the courage I need to take this risk.

I’m coming, my love. I send back, moving as swiftly as I can. Suddenly I’m regretting my urgency to get out of the room without pause. I call attention on the best of days, and scampering through the daylight palace in my current state is not exactly discreet. I can only imagine how I must look: barefoot, wearing only a long silk nightdress, novelxo hair unwashed and disheveled.

Thankfully I make it to the passage entrance without difficulty, though I do have to hide behind a large statue until a pair of servants rolling a laundry cart pass by. For a split second I consider asking them to help me, but I don’t want them to risk their jobs by defying Gabriel’s edict to keep me in the palace. I know the King is worried about my wellbeing, not to mention outside threats like the bomb that intercepted Sinclair’s delegation. Still, I don’t appreciate his high-handed orders. So I move through the passages on my own, following the fresh scent of the outdoors to guide me around corners and through intersections.

By the time I make it outside, Sinclair feels as though he might be right around the next corner. His calls have grown loud and constant, but no matter where I look, I cannot see him. Ella, Ella, Ella. I open my heart to him and follow the path our bond illuminates, throwing caution to the wind as I reach the palace gates. The guards’ backs are facing me as they search for outside threats, completely occupied with keeping unwanted guests out, not holding anyone inside.

I dart out past them, ignoring their cries of surprise, and take off into the city. Within moments I hear footsteps pounding the pavement behind me, and I smell Philippe’s familiar aroma at my back. I curse in my head, there’s no way I can outrun the guards – I can barely manage a jog, cradling my belly and wincing as my swollen breasts bounce uninhibited. People stop and stare as I pass by, but I don’t give them a moment’s notice.

I know I’m caught a second before it happens, novelxo when Philippe’s voice is growling in my ear and his footsteps sound as though they’re right on top of me. He practically tackles me, racing up behind me and gripping me as gently as he can, infinitely conscious of my delicate condition. His arms come underneath my own as he pulls me to an abrupt stop, and I go limp in his grip, hoping my weight will drag him down.

It doesn't. He supports my body easily, then scoops me up into his arms.

A crowd has formed around us, but the other guards keep them at bay, holding their arms outstretched and backing them out of the square. I'm not sure if it's for my safety or to keep them from witnessing the ensuing scene, but I don't care. novel.xo They can all watch, as long as I get to Sinclair, they can do whatever they like.

"Let me go, Philippe!" I command, raising my voice and kicking my legs as he hitches me closer. I thrash and fight as he tries to drag me back to the palace, wrenching his arm close enough to sink my fangs into his wrist. He hisses and reels back, but he doesn't release me.

Philippe snarls impatiently. "Damn it Ella, this has to stop!"

"You will never stop me from going after him!" I cry, returning his snarl with one of my own, "I will never give up, as long as he's out there I will always try to find him."

"He's not out there!" Philippe insists, giving me a small shake, "You've got to accept it, Ella!"

"You're wrong!" I combat, thrusting my elbow into his ribs, "You don't know! None of you can feel him like I can."

"You think we weren't bonded with him too?" novel.xo Philippe demands angrily, dragging me up into his arms, no matter how frantically I squirm. "That we didn't love him?"

"It's not the same!" I counter furiously, willing my body to shift. My wolf is right at the surface, every bit as desperate and outraged as I am. Still, I'm weak from the lingering sedatives and the lack of food, and I suspect the doctor's anti-anxiety medicines are keeping her from coming out. "I can hear him! He's calling me, he needs me!"

"You're delirious." Philippe sighs, sounding resigned now. novexo "You've got to get some rest or you'll make yourself sick."

"I'm not!" I explode, throwing my head back and slamming my skull into Philippe's chin. I instantly regret it as stars burst in my eyes and pain blooms through my cranium. "Just because you all don't have any hope left, doesn't mean I'll let you steal mine." I moan feebly.

"That's it!" Philippe grumbles, pain lacing in his voice. "I've had enough. You are coming with me now, whether you like it or not!"

“You can’t make me!” I challenge, a rush of adrenaline overwhelming my pain. I throw myself against the cage of his arms, but I can’t break through. Philippe holds me fast, and then his fingers dig into my neck, triggering a pressure point which I didn’t know existed. My vision starts to black out, but at the very last moment, Philippe pulls back. I don’t understand why at first, not until I realize that the sound of Sinclair’s voice is no longer ringing in my head... but I can smell him, as strong and potent as if he were right next to me. I look around, my heart soaring, but I don’t see him.

Suddenly a deafening growl sounds behind us, and my soaring heart takes flight. “Take your hands off my mate.”

Chapter 210 – Reunited

Sinclair

It had all happened very slowly. I heard the deafening noise, felt the excruciating heat of the blast, but when the explosion struck my body was thrown from the car. I remember sailing through the air, feeling as though I was traveling through water as flames and entropy eviscerated the vehicle where I had just been sitting. I hit the ground hard, my head slamming into the earth and stealing my consciousness.

When I woke, I was lying at least ten meters from the blast radius. My head ringing, acid churning in my stomach, I stumbled back towards the burning cars in a daze. I don't know how much time had passed, but my men were little more than charred husks, and the vehicles nothing more than tangled knots of molten steel.

I vomited onto the ground, emptying my stomach and trying not to let the horror consume me. I'd loved my men like brothers, but if I stopped to process their losses, my own life might be forfeit too. I did not know if the danger still lingered – or even from whence it had come, though I could certainly guess.

I quickly checked myself for injuries, noting the way every breath rattled and tore against my aching ribs, and the blood that seeped through my torn clothes. I shifted, and abandoned all thought of going on to the Storm Forest pack. For all I knew, my would-be assassin was waiting there in case their bomb failed. My phone was lost in the wreckage, and I was in the middle of nowhere, hundreds of miles from any being I knew and trusted. So I took off into the wilderness, letting the sun and moon guide me back towards Gabriel's city, not allowing myself to stop or rest even once.

I was terrified that this was not an isolated threat, that perhaps similar nightmares had befallen my family... my mate. I needed answers, but I needed to get back to them faster. I thought about seeking Ella in my dreams, but I was afraid that if I let myself sleep I might not wake for hours, and the people I love would be vulnerable without me for that much longer. So I forced myself to carry on, until at last the crystalline lake and gleaming outline of the capital came into view.

I started calling to Ella then, and though my heart pulsed and skipped gloriously when she responded, by that time I was so diminished that I couldn't think of any intelligible thoughts other than her name. I tore into the city at top speed, ignoring the gasps and shouts of the shifters I passed. And when I finally saw my beautiful mate, fighting tooth and nail to escape her guards, I shifted back into my human form.

I felt like I was on the verge of collapse, but I unleashed the remaining reserves of power I'd been holding back, and found the strength to stay upright. "Take your hands off of my mate."

I watch as shock reverberates through Philippe's body. His grip goes slack, and Ella takes full advantage, scrambling free and running straight into my open arms.

"Dominic!" She cries, squeezing me so tightly that my broken ribs scream in protest. But I don't make a sound, I swing her legs up into my arms so that I can cradle her against my chest as she buries her face in my neck, breathing in my scent. "I knew you weren't dead! No one believed me but I knew!" She sobs, pulling back only far enough to look up at me. Concern immediately takes over her lovely features, but before she can say a word I claim her lips with my own.

Mine. My wolf sighs in my head. Mine, mine, all mine.

I don't have any control left to spare, so all my love and longing from these last few weeks pours forth, along with all my pain, sadness and fear. Ella takes it all with utter generosity and pure passion, letting me drown her in my feelings and yielding her soft mouth for my feral exploration. She makes the sweetest little sounds as I ravish her with my lips, teeth and tongue, giving back as good as she gets and threatening to rouse my cock in the middle of the public square.

Naughty mate. My wolf purrs through our bond, and Ella only shudders and presses closer to me. Reluctantly, I force myself to drag my lips from hers before we get too carried away. "I missed you, trouble." I purr, wishing I had a free hand to explore her round tummy, and instead sending my love for my son through our bond. Rafe replies with pulses of excitement and affection, though I'm concerned to sense him holding back slightly.

"I missed you more." Ella insists, stroking my jaw with a mischievous glint in her gold eyes.

"Wanna bet?" I chuckle, kissing her again and never wanting to let her go. The last few days have been too horrible to bear- not knowing what I would be coming home to... if there would be anything left for me to come home to at all.

"Dominic?" My father's voice breaks my reverie, and for the first time, I remember we aren't alone. I look up to see Dad wheeling towards us, tears and amazement plain on his face. I set Ella's feet on the ground so that I can fall into my father's arms.

"Dad." I breathe, feeling like a boy again as he kisses my hair and rubs his strong hands over my injured body.

"I thought I'd lost you." He admits thickly, his face twisted into a grimace as he delves into our own bond. "You're hurt."

"I'll live." I reply, tears burning in my own eyes as I feel the grief he'd been battling over the past few days, a grief I understand all the better now that I have a son of my own. "I'm sorry I scared you."

"I'm sorry I didn't listen to your mate." Dad replies, relinquishing his hold on me so he can reach for Ella. Her warm little body snuggles in beside us, and my heart swells to bursting.

"It seems we all should have listened to Ella." A new voice sounds from somewhere above us. "She's been a bloody terror since it happened ... but she was right." Gabriel informs me, though there is no bite in his voice. The King is standing above us with a wide smile, and not even the sight of my sweet mate glaring daggers at him can dull his joy.

I leave Ella in Dad's arms so I can hug Gabriel and Philippe, and then Roger is charging out of the palace gates wearing an expression I've never seen before. "You bastard!" My brother is all aggression, and he lashes out as he draws near, pushing me in the chest and forcing me backward. "You scared the hell out of me. Where the devil have you been!"

"Roger-" Dad tries to intervene, but I beat him to the punch. I duck Roger's next attack, and throw my arms around him, restraining his arms and forcing him to settle as he tries to fight me. He gradually softens, clutching my shoulders and leaning his head against my shoulder.

"Don't you ever do that again!" He sniffs bitterly.

"I'm sorry." I profess, "I won't."

"I love you, you dummy." He adds begrudgingly, and I laugh, though the motion sends pain searing through my abdomen. I hiss, trying not to let the agony pull me under.

At once Dad and Ella drag us apart. Ella nudges her way under my arm, as if she thinks she might support me with her weight. She presses her small hand to my chest, "Your ribs are broken, you should have said!" Her worry floods through our bond, though I can feel her trying to hold it back.

"I'm alright, sweetheart." I assure her, though my wince betrays me.

"You're dead on your feet." Dad corrects, looking to Gabriel. "We need to get him inside. He needs a doctor."

Roger and Philippe move forward as if they might displace Ella and cart me inside like some wounded war hero, but I wave them off. "Call the doctor. But I'm walking in on my own two feet, with my mate beside me."

'Your mate isn't even supposed to be out of bed.'" Philippe informs me coolly, sending a scolding glance at Ella.

She sends him a ferocious glare and sticks out her tongue, but for the first time I realize she does look a bit worse for wear. She's wearing nothing but a nightgown – her feet are bare and she has dark circles beneath her eyes. Ella said she knew I wasn't dead, but these events have obviously taken their toll on her nonetheless. I feel a stab of guilt for not noticing sooner, as well as an abundance of curiosity for what the clever minx has been doing to put the King and her guard in such a grumpy mood.

I shrug and slide my arm around her back and knees, lifting her off the ground. 'Then I'll carry her.'

Chapter 211 – Rafe’s Anger

Ella

I loop my arms around Sinclair’s neck as he carries me through the palace gates, trying to steady myself even as my concerns for his injuries grow irrepressible. “Dominic no, you’ll hurt yourself.” I object, sweeping my eyes over his muscular body. He’s naked as the day he was born, and his abdomen is swollen with black and blue bruises. His feet are bleeding, and numerous smaller bruises and cuts dot his powerful form.

He doesn’t seem the least bit bothered, though I suspect he’s using the last stores of his power to stave off the pain. “Hush now, I’ve been waiting weeks to hold you, you think I’m going to let some sore ribs stop me?” Sinclair quips, brushing his lips over my forehead.

I try to help as best I can, novelxo sitting upright in his arms and using his strong shoulders to support my weight. I’m in the perfect position to explore the curve of his neck, and my inner wolf won’t let me pass up the opportunity. I nuzzle his sweat-stained skin, kissing and nibbling his throat – letting him feel how elated I am to have him home, and just how badly I missed him.

Sinclair emits an appreciative purr, turning his lips to my ear. “Do you want to tell me what mischief you’ve been making to make Philippe and Gabriel so grumpy?”

“Nothing.” I reply innocently, giving him my best puppy dog eyes. “They’re just mean, ill-tempered men.”

Sinclair grins wolfishly, and my heart skips a beat. “Now why do I find that hard to believe?”

“Because she’s the most ungovernable she-wolf I’ve ever met.” Gabriel snorts from beside us, also smiling. “Honestly, you’d think I was nothing but a nobody omega for all the consideration she gives my orders.”

“I might give them more – if you were half the wolf my mate is.” I challenge, feeling thoroughly emboldened with Sinclair’s arms around me.

“Ella,” Sinclair warns in a half-amused, half-scolding tone, “Is that anyone to speak to the man who has shown us and our people such friendship and generosity?”

“Since he’s also the man who tried to lock me up so I couldn’t come after you when you were out there alone and clearly in need of help – yes.” I reply stubbornly, scowling when the King just rolls his eyes.

“I hate to break it to you baby, but the last thing I would have wanted was for you to be out there looking for me with a bomber on the loose.” Sinclair remarks, affectionate but somber as he looks to his old friend. “I know why you felt compelled to come after me, but I appreciate Gabriel looking out for you when I couldn’t. He did the right thing.” 1

I huff indignantly, “But I was the only one who even believed you were alive!” I exclaim. “None of them were doing anything!”

“They didn’t need to.” Sinclair soothes, pressing soft kisses to my cheek. “I made it home, sweetheart.

“Besides, I’m not the one who put you on bed rest, Ella.” Gabriel adds pointedly, and Sinclair stiffens, looking down at me sharply.

“It was just stress because you were missing.” I assure him quickly, “I’ll be fine now that you’re back.” He’s still watching me suspiciously, and I’m willing Gabriel not to say more. Luckily the perfect distraction awaits us as we enter the palace itself. Word has obviously spread about Sinclair’s return, and it seems as if every shifter in the vicinity has turned out to welcome him.

The halls are lined with servants, Vanaran courtiers and refugees from home. The servants and Vanarans bow and smile, but the refugees drop to their knees with tears in their eyes, looking as though their prayers have been answered – which they probably have. Sinclair nods to each and every one of them with such respect, compassion and dedication, signaling that he sees and appreciates them, even if he doesn’t have the freedom to stop at this moment. I lean my head against his shoulder as my wolf overflows with pride for our mate, letting him feel every ounce of the emotion through our bond.

When we get up to our suite, Sinclair settles on the sofa with me in his lap, at last able to greet our pup properly. He runs his hands over my belly, his eyes drinking in every inch of my changed body. Just look at you. He marvels, his gaze lingering on my ever-enlarging breasts and the sudden protrusion of my popped belly button. I can’t wait until I get you alone. His wolf says in my mind. I’m going to strip you naked and kiss every inch of your beautiful body.

And you, my sweet pup. He adds, letting me hear his words to our son. I can’t believe how big you’ve gotten. I wish I could keep you safe in there forever, but I think you’re outgrowing your Mommy.

To my surprise, Rafe doesn’t respond, except to send a pulse of sullen energy through our bond – a request for my affection instead of Sinclair’s. I add my touch and my voice, thinking I might understand the problem,” Come on angel, you were so excited to feel your Daddy again.” I remind him, “Don’t be angry when he’s finally come back to us.”

Sinclair frowns, realization clicking in his mind. "I'm sorry I left, little one. Please believe me when I say that it was the last thing I wanted. I never want to be away from you."

Still, the baby seeks only my attention, and I can picture our son as if he's already been born. A miniature version of Sinclair in my arms, sulking because his father left – giving him the cold shoulder as punishment. He got angry with me for the first time too. I reveal to Sinclair through our bond. He's getting big enough to feel more complex things now, and he hates it when he can't feel us.

Sinclair purrs sympathetically, and I know that if he were able to take the baby from me and cuddle him directly, he would. He would bombard him with love and affection the same way he does to me when I'm cross, forcing the tiny tot to understand that no matter how far away he goes, he'll always come back. Of course, for now he can only hold me. Why did he get angry with you?

The same reason. I confess, grimacing. When our call dropped the other day... I was really scared. I wanted to protect him so I tried to shield him from my feelings. But I cut myself off from him completely and... it was awful. I'll never do it again, no matter how bad things get.

I thought you said you knew I survived? Sinclair inquires, frowning.

There's a knock on the door, reminding us that Gabriel, Henry, Philippe and Roger are all witnessing our reunion. Philippe opens the door, and the doctor sweeps in, immediately zeroing in on us. "Alpha Dominic, I'm so pleased you're all right." He sets his bag on the coffee table and opens it, extracting a few tools. "Luna, if you wouldn't mind?" He doesn't directly ask me to move, but it's clear he needs me out of Sinclair's lap.

I try to rise, but Sinclair's arms tighten around me. You haven't answered me, mate.

Later, I promise, though his wolf growls in protest. Let the doctor examine you.

He can examine me while I hold you. He insists, glowering at the physician who would separate us.

No he can't. I correct him sternly. He needs to see your ribs. Another wordless growl. Please, Dominic, I'll be so worried otherwise. I beg, letting some more of my concern filter through our bond.

Sinclair arches a brow, and his wolf lets me know that he sees right through my tactics, still he must sense I'm speaking truthfully, because he concedes. Grumbling in protest, Sinclair rearranges us so that his head is resting in my lap, the rest of his long limbs sprawled over the sofa. He turns his lips to my belly and kisses my navel, novelxo early a tiny kick in the mouth from our pup. I hiccup with the force of the outraged thump, but Sinclair only chuckles and kisses the same spot again, sending praise through his bond with the baby. My little fighter, I'll kiss that foot as many times as you send it my way.

He does just that as the doctor pokes and prods at him, and soon it's become a game between father and son. Rafe tries to trick Sinclair with his timing and placement, and Sinclair does his best to predict the next kick so he can meet it with his lips. Absolute glee bubbles through my bonds with each, and I can only grin like a fool as I watch them, barely able to focus on the doctor's exam. As simply as that, the hurt and resentment the baby had been feeling amidst Sinclair's absence is healed.

I can't help but reach down and run my fingers through Sinclair's hair— which feels about as dirty as mine after so many days in the wilderness. novelxo You do know that my womb is paying the price of this little game of yours?

I tease. It feels like he's tap dancing on my organs.

Sinclair looks contrite, but also as though he doesn't want the fun to end. Do you want me to stop?

I can only smile, thanking my lucky stars that I found this man. Don't you dare.

Chapter 212 – Tattletales

Ella

“Four broken ribs.” The doctor assesses grimly, “and with all the exercise you’ve done since the initial brakes, they haven’t been able to set or heal. I have an injection I can give you to fuse the bones quickly, but it’s painful, and we still need to set them first.”

“What about his other injuries?” Henry inquires anxiously, seated on the other side of me.

“I’ll do a scan to assess the exact placement of his ribs, and I can extend it to the rest of his abdomen to rule out internal injuries. I don’t see anything else of concern.” The doctor shares with much more optimism.

“He’s got a good size lump on the back of his head.” I inform the physician, still running my hands through Sinclair’s hair.

“Then you two will match.” Philippe interjects, reminding us all of the way I headbutted his chin in my attempts to reach Sinclair. “When you’re done with him, you ought to check her for a concussion.”

“I hardly think that’s necessary.” I complain, reaching back to see if the area is tender, then reflexively wincing when my fingers graze the swollen knot at the back of my skull.

“It is.” Five dominant voices assert, the loudest and most forceful coming from my lap. I send Roger, Henry, Philippe and Gabriel mutinous glances, much good that it does me.

“I was already planning on examining her.” The doctor relates, having the unbelievable nerve to look at Sinclair now, rather than me. “From the sounds of it she’s been much too active following her collapse.”

“What collapse?” Sinclair demands fiercely, his eyes pinning me with a suspicious glare. I turn my indignant gaze on the doctor now, but my mate catches my chin and returns my attention to him. “Don’t blame them for telling me what you should have told me yourself.”

“And when should I have done that?” I argue, feeling truly overwhelmed now. I can’t believe they’re all ganging up on me when Sinclair is injured and needs our attention most. “You’ve been back ten minutes and you’re in much worse shape than I am. Rafe and I are fine, you’re the one we need to worry about.”

“What happened, little wolf?” He asks, his voice gentle, for I’m sure he can sense my genuine distress.

Taking a deep breath, I force the words out in a rush, speaking as quickly as I can in the futile hope that he might not catch all the details. "It wasn't a big deal. My blood pressure spiked when Gabriel's drones found the wreckage from the bomb, that's all. I passed out and they sedated me. I slept for three whole days, so I'm much better rested and healthy than you are."

Sinclair's pupils contract, and his irate gaze swings to the King. "You let her watch you search for the wreckage?"

Gabriel shifts uneasily from foot to foot. "Well, we didn't know what we would find. Besides, Ella is the only reason we knew something had happened."

"And did none of you consider the possibility that you would find us dead?" He sits up, power rolling off of him in heady waves, "It was sickening for me to see that scene and I've been in battle. What the hell were you thinking?" A flash of the gut-wrenching horror Sinclair felt when he woke from the bomb blast slips through our bond, and my wolf whimpers in my head. 1

"Dominic, it's okay, come back to me." I encourage, trying to guide his shoulders back down. He obeys, but I suspect he only does it to settle my wolf.

"It's not okay." Sinclair tells me, his voice like gravel. He reaches up to cup my cheek. "I'm sorry you had to see that."

"It might have upset me, but it wasn't enough to convince me you were gone." I remind him, leaning down to kiss his pillowy lips, "My faith in our bond kept me from believing the worst."

"So much so that she didn't eat or bathe, or sleep again after she woke up." Philippe offers, his arms crossed over his chest. "She just kept trying to escape."

I tear my attention from Sinclair, truly outraged now. "Would you stop this?!" I exclaim, feeling as though I might scream. I'm so sick of my pack of overbearing babysitters that I could honestly throttle them. And for once, I don't give a single damn that they're tattling on me, I care that they might further upset my mate when he's already hurt and grieving. "Do you have any idea what he's been through! He doesn't need to be worrying about me right now. What is wrong with you all!?"

A tender purr begins to vibrate in my lap, and I can feel Sinclair's wolf reaching out to mine. "Don't be mad at them, baby." Sinclair murmurs, sliding his hand to my nape and massaging my tense muscles. "I know you don't like seeing me hurt, but they're telling me exactly what I need to know – what I want to know."

I shake my head defiantly. "No, you need to come first this time." I reply thickly, wondering how they can all be so blind. “You almost died... you lost Hugo and your men.” 3

“And if I had died, they would have been doing exactly what I wished – taking care of you and Rafe when I couldn’t.” Sinclair croons.

“What, by being intrusive, overbearing bullies?” I sniff, hating the very suggestion of him truly being gone.

“Is that so different from me?” Sinclair asks with a crooked smile.

“Of course it is – because you’re my mate.” I reply fervently. ‘You’re only do it because you love me.’”

“Well why the hell do you think it’s different with us, Ella?” Philippe grouses, pulling my attention away from my mate.

“Because Dominic would disembowel you if you let anything happen to me.” I answer easily, my wolf feeling a bloodthirsty thrill at the thought of our mate’s prowess.

Roger rolls his eyes, sarcasm heavy on his tongue. “Guess again genius.”

Gabriel clears his throat, diplomatically adding. “I think what Roger means is – why would we have to fear that if Dominic was dead? If that’s the only reason we were doing it, why did we continue when we thought he was gone?”

I look between them, slowly piecing together the clues. When the realization strikes, I turn to Sinclair for confirmation. Do they mean what I think they mean? I mean I know Henry is fond of me but...

“Of course they love you, Ella.” He says, assuaging my doubts and making me feel extremely guilty for giving them such a hard time.

“We’ve been trying to take care of you because we would be heartbroken if anything happened to you.” Henry contributes, “And that’s why we’re telling Dominic what’s been going on – because we want what’s best for you, and he’s the only one to whom you’ll truly respond.”

‘That and you won’t tell him yourself.’ Roger mutters, but there’s only humor in his voice.

“Roger.” Henry bites, shooting the wolf a scowl before stealing one of my hands and squeezing it. “I’m sorry we didn’t listen to you, Ella. But I’m not sorry for the rest. We were doing the best with the information we had. But never doubt that we acted from a place of love.” 1

My lower lip quivers, and I stare up at the men apologetically. "I didn't realize... I'm sorry." I try to fight back my tears, but my hormones are unrelenting. I swear once this baby comes, I won't cry again for a year. I vow to myself, wondering if this is a promise I can keep. The tears come all the same, but I try to keep my voice steady, "I mean, not for disobeying you or smashing you in the jaw," I tell Philippe, who chuckles good-naturedly. "But for misunderstanding... I assumed the worst, and that wasn't fair to you." It takes a moment to work myself up to the next part, but I manage. "I love you all too."

One by one, the alphas return the sentiment, and Sinclair sends me a rush of affection which warms me inside and out. "Poor little mate, dealing with all these big mean wolves all on your own. It's no wonder you're in such a state." I can see Roger, Gabriel and Philippe making exasperated faces out of the corner of my eye, but I don't care.

"It's okay." I tell him conspiratorially, not bothering to hide my devious grin. "I still got the better of them."

'That's my girl.' Sinclair praises, pulling my head down for another kiss. It's soft and tender, and with his pride and amusement, comes a rush of delicious dominance. "Just as long as you remember that you won't be getting the better of me – even if I am weak and injured."

My wolf shudders happily, and I kiss him again. "I still look forward to trying."

His wolf gleams in his green eyes. "And I look forward to catching you."

Chapter 213 – Uncooperative Alpha

Ella

After we make our amends, the doctor makes short work of his scans and treatments, even the terrible injections into Sinclair's bones. Before long, my mate looks a thousand times better than he had when he arrived, and I'm still marveling at the Vanaran's state of the art medicines. The physician checks the goose egg on the back of my head and takes my vitals, but Sinclair is so exhausted that he falls asleep right there in my lap. Philippe and Roger move to pick him up, but I beg them not to disturb him. Instead I wave them away so we can be alone, and Henry promises to have some food sent up to us.

Once the crowds are gone, there's only my pup to wrangle. Now that things have calmed down again, he's eager to take up his game with Sinclair again, kicking his tiny foot against the wall of my uterus, just on the other side of Sinclair's cheek. Easy now, munchkin. I say through our bond.

Daddy needs to sleep.

I feel a wave of drowsiness from my womb, and send my support for the idea of a nap. That's it, rest together, angel. Soon both of my boys are quiet, and I'm free to gaze down at Sinclair and marvel at his beauty and strength, even in slumber.

As overjoyed as I am, my heart also aches for my mate. Sinclair might not have said it or let me feel more than a hint of his grief, but I know he's going to need as much support as I can give him after losing his Beta and friends. Part of me is still frustrated that the other alphas turned the focus onto me, though I understand they were doing what Sinclair preferred. He would never have been able to relax unless he knew the truth of my situation and appreciate that they helped him do that. But he's going to need me when he wakes – even if it's only to help him feel in control. I can't let him be distracted by my needs.

I run featherlight fingers over his stubbly jaw as he dozes, wondering if any she-wolf has ever loved her mate more than I love this man. What would I do without you, Dominic? I think reverently. I might be able to survive losing you, but I wouldn't want to. There will never be anyone for me but you.

Not for the first time, I wish I could fantasize about our future without worrying about the war ahead. But it looms too large in my consciousness to overlook, and a new determination takes hold in my heart. We have to get through this. I'm going to do whatever it takes to make sure our family stays whole and overcomes the battles ahead. I fall asleep stroking his hair and pondering the daunting possibilities, so happy to be reunited with him that I don't even feel my exhaustion until it has pulled me under.

I wake a while later, to the sensation of a gentle finger tracing the bridge of my nose. When my lashes part I find Sinclair gazing lovingly down at me, his emerald eyes like liquid in the dusky evening light. "I'm sorry to wake you, baby. I just thought you might like to have a bath with me?"

I'm still very drowsy, but as soon as the words are out of his mouth, I realize how disgusting I feel. With four days of accumulated dirt on my skin, I'm amazed I don't spell like hot garbage. I nod sleepily, and before I can say a word to stop him, he scoops me up into his arms. As he carries me to the bathroom, I notice an abundance of room service cloches waiting on the table, and my stomach growls loudly in protest. Sinclair chuckles. "Don't worry trouble, I'll bring you some snacks." 2

He's as good as his word, depositing me in the swirling bubbles and delivering a plate full of my favorite dishes to the wide rim of the tub. The gears of my mind are turning much too slowly, but I spy a bacon-wrapped fig and can't focus on anything else until it's in my mouth. Gradually I realize that the plate only bears enough for one, and none of the delicacies are Sinclair's preferences. "What about you?"

"Are you worrying about me, little wolf?" Sinclair asks, a knowing look in his eye.

"You need to eat even more than I do, and I know your father didn't only send my favorites." I answer, trying to look imposing so that he'll take me seriously. Of course, this is difficult when I'm still only half awake.

Sinclair kneels down in front of me, his mouth quirking upwards, "To be honest, I was so starving that I ate before I woke you."

"Oh." I breathe, disappointed but struggling to remember why I should feel this way.

Sinclair chuckles, "don't look so sad, in fact you should be glad you missed it – have you ever seen the appetite of a wolf who's been running for four days straight? It isn't pretty." He rumbles "I had to take a shower just to wash off the culinary carnage."

I giggle half-heartedly, my thoughts finally clicking into place. "I'm not sad," I correct him. "But I am worried about you, and I want to help you."

"You are helping me." Sinclair replies, sinking into the steaming water and pulling me into his arms with a low rumble.

"How?" I demand, "by letting you carry me around and pampering me?"

"I happen to like doing those things." He answers, kissing my neck. "Besides, this way my hands are free."

“Oh, going to grope me while I eat?” I inquire saucily, reaching for the plate.

“No, actually I thought I’d feed you.” Sinclair corrects me, intercepting my hand. A moment later he dangles a second fig over my head, tempting me terribly. It smells absolutely divine, and as much as I’d like to resist, my stomach is growling demands again. It seems my first bite woke a monster, and now I’m ravenous. I close my lips around the morsel, nipping Sinclairs fingers for good measure. Just you wait, Mr. I say through our bond, trying to smother a delighted moan as the flavors explode over my tongue. As soon as I’m full these tables are turning and you’re going to let me indulge you.

Is that so? Sinclair counters, arching one dark brow in warning. Clearly I’ve been gone too long, if you’re already so eager to challenge me.

Not challenge you, just make you prioritize yourself instead of me. I clarify, taking a bite of the sumptuous tart my mate is currently holding to my lips.

He chuckles, offering me the tart again. I lean forward to accept it, but just as I’m poised to take another bite, Sinclair replaces it with his lips. Silly mate, don’t you know that’s one in the same.

I whimper as he devours me, suddenly wondering why I’m so determined to argue when this incredible man is intent on wining and dining me. A moment later, I realize his own wolf is silently putting these very suggestions in my head, and I wrench myself away from him. ‘That’s cheating.’ I accuse, narrowing my eyes at the sly wolf.

“I know.” He sympathizes, catching my nape and pulling my mouth back to his, “I’m a bad, bad man.” For a few delicious moment, I let him kiss me senseless, heat pooling in my core as my wolf grows increasingly eager to reunite with her mate in the most intimate and sacred manner.

Eventually I return to my senses and wrench myself away. “Dominic!” I complain, pushing my lips into a pout and crossing my arms over my breasts.

Sinclair flashes his fangs, his hungry gaze glued to my mouth. “You better put that pout away unless you want to get bitten, gorgeous.”

I purse my lips, glowering, but when I try to speak he presses more food onto me, and I have no choice but to accept the offering. I moan as a delectable, warm mouthful of rare steak rolls over my tastebuds, and my lashes fall shut as I swallow the bite. When they part again, I find my mate waiting with another bite, but I don’t trust that he’ll actually feed me rather than stealing another kiss. When Sinclair sees my uncertainty, he purrs with satisfaction, and I realize he intended on throwing me off balance in precisely this way.

The uncooperative Alpha doesn't seem to care that I only want to take care of him, he's enjoying teasing me, overturning all my best laid plans. At a loss, I try to scramble off of his lap, but his arms lock around me, "And just where do you think you're going?" He rumbles ominously, eyes glowing.

I squirm helplessly, unable to decide whether I'm hungry, turned on, or angry with my mate. I glare up at him, and the fire in his eyes sparks hotter. Stop fighting me, little wolf. My mate's inner animal speaks directly through our bond, reaching out to my own wolf, calling to her instincts. This is what I need. I know you want to take care of me, this is me telling you how you can. Just let go, and trust me.

My body goes still, and my lips part on another silent gasp. Suddenly I feel like a fool – his playful behavior wasn't teasing at all, it was simply Sinclair showing me what he needed from me, and I've been too preoccupied trying to give him what I thought he should have, rather than listening. He doesn't need cuddling and pampering. He needs to feel in control, because everything is spinning out of control – only I can give him that.

'There.' He croons, taking me cheek in his hand, "now you see."

I nod, leaning into him for another kiss. Instead he places more steak on my tongue, shaking his head with that same ravenous expression. His message is clear: he makes the rules, and I hang on for the ride.

Chapter 214 – What You've Done To Me

Ella

We don't spend very long in the bath. As soon as I'm fed and clean, Sinclair takes me to my nest and lays me out like his own personal feast, and he wastes no time in ravishing me.

I've never been frightened of Sinclair. Not at his wildest or grouchiest, not even when he's on the warpath against others, or assailing me with the full force of his magic. If anything, it's been an incredible turn on to know that I can call such a powerful man my own, that I'm the sole soft spot in his impenetrable armor.

But when he makes love to me now, I feel afraid. Not for myself – never that – but for the feral energy I can sense swirling through his body. His wolf is in full control and he's near rabid with desire – ruthless in his affection. He isn't gentle, nor would I ask him to be. I love his rough passion and savage intensity: the way he makes me feel as if I'm the only woman in the world and he'll die if he doesn't have me this instant; the way he drives into me with reckless abandon and earth-shattering skill, drawing sounds I didn't even know I was capable of making from my mouth before he greedily swallows them with his tongue.

Still, there's a dark edge to his carnal hunger, as if it's not just sensual release he seeks, but absolution. The dominance he exerted earlier is nothing compared to the chaotic power fueling him now, and while I might not understand everything behind his actions, I realize that as much as he wants me, he's also hurting. I'm seeing the results of everything he's pent up over the last few days, and my wolf is only too eager to submit, to give him whatever solace we can, for however long he needs it.

So I give myself to him completely, letting him claim me over and over again, and trying to survive the endless onslaught of pleasure he delivers. At some point it becomes too much, and my vision blacks out as I crest the peak of yet another orgasm. I don't fight the darkness, because I know I'm safe in my mate's arms at long last.

I'm alone when I wake, and instantly I fear Sinclair's return was all a dream.

I jerk up in my nest, my wolf whimpering as I scan the room. However, almost as soon as the sound leaves my lips, a soft purr rises to meet it, and I shift my worried gaze to follow the comforting rumble. Sinclair stands on the terrace looking out on the sleeping city, but now he turns and strides back to the bed, "It's okay, Ella. I'm here." He assures me, wrapping me up in his strong arms.

I cling to him with all my strength, unable to form words just yet. My heart feels as though it just took a plunge off a high dive, without knowing if there was any water waiting to break my fall. Luckily there was, but my pulse is still racing with the fright.

Sinclair strokes my spine and kisses my hair, murmuring sweet nothings in my ear. It takes me longer than it should to calm down, but my wolf is seriously on edge after this last week.

“What were you doing?” I finally ask, unable to keep a petulant note from my voice, my inner animal thoroughly affronted that he scared me this way.

“I was just thinking.” Sinclair answers, his warm breath fluttering over my ear. “I haven’t had a moment to stop since the explosion – I’ve been so focused on getting home. But now I’m here, everything is hitting me at once.” As soon as he says it, he opens the gates and lets the emotion pour through our bond. I’m thankful that he doesn’t try to hide his pain from me, but the force of it is staggering. Not only grief for Hugo and his men, but confusion and guilt over how he survived when they did not. More than anything else, I sense a deep well of helplessness, brought on by his inability to protect the people he loves in all this chaos.

I hold him tighter, ‘They were good men.’ I tell him softly. ‘They loved you, they would have been happy you survived even if they didn’t.’

“But they shouldn’t have had to die.” Sinclair replies thickly, burying his head in my neck and breathing in my scent. “We didn’t even see the attack coming. We don’t know how Damon managed it, or where the bomber is now.” He doesn’t say it, but I can sense how badly this grates on his nerves. One more thing he can’t control, one more tragedy piling onto his conscience. “I’m so sick of this war, and it’s hardly even begun.”

“I know.” I say honestly. “And I know how badly you want to fix all this, how agonizing it’s been for you to see your people suffering. Please just remember that you’re not in this alone, Dominic. You don’t have to have all the answers. Your family, your pack – we all love you and we’re in this together.” I remind him, hoping the words don’t sound hollow to a man who has the weight of the whole world on his shoulders. “We’re all mourning for Hugo, for every wolf in those cars. Don’t let our relief that you’re okay make it seem otherwise, because we all lost a great deal in that accident. We’ll make sure they didn’t die in vain. We’re going to get through this.”

‘Thank you, baby.’ Sinclair sighs, his salty tears feeling hot on my skin. “I really needed to hear that.”

I nod, still a bit afraid to trust that he’s truly here, while also hating that his homecoming carries such heartache. “I would have told you sooner if those bullies had let me come after you.” I quip, only half joking.

“Mmm,” Sinclair rumbles appreciatively. “And I suppose that’s the only reason you were so determined to come after me? Because you knew I needed comfort?”

I'm suddenly very glad he can't see my face. "Not entirely."

"What else?" Sinclair asks, pulling back to look down at me and, as usual, filling me with the sensation that he can see straight through me.

I shrug and lean my cheek against his shoulder, wishing we didn't have to have this conversation, but knowing he won't rest until we do.

"Come on trouble, talk to me." Sinclair encourages. "You kept saying you knew I was okay after the attack, but that's not the way it sounds." He sighs, petting my sides. "You collapsed. You've been neglecting your health, and cutting yourself off from the baby? None of that seems hopeful."

"I said I knew you were alive. But I didn't know you were okay..." I correct him, staring at my lap. "And everyone was telling me I was just in denial. I was afraid to sleep because it might prove them right if you didn't turn up... and I think I was so desperate to come after you because I needed to prove them wrong. I needed to know I wasn't just blindly hoping. The truth is that I was terrified." I confess shakily. "You don't realize what you've done to me, Dominic."

Sinclair takes my face in his hands, his thumbs brushing away rogue tears as they slip down my cheeks. "What have I done, baby?" 1

The concern on his face nearly topples me over, but I manage to stay upright – if only because I need to reassure him. "Before I met you, all I ever wanted was a baby. That's it." I explain, still amazed by how quickly everything has changed. "I would have loved a partner, but you saw what I was willing to settle for with Mike." My mate growls at the sound of the human's name, and as much as I want to smile, I can't. The confession I'm about to make is too grave, too terrifying when our lives are so precarious.

"But you ruined all that.. you made my old dreams not enough anymore." I share, searching his emerald gaze for understanding. "You opened my eyes to worlds I didn't know existed, a kind of love I never dreamed I might have. You spoiled me... spoiled me for anyone else, nothing but you will ever be enough for me now." The worry dissipates from Sinclair's gaze, and he watches me with such tenderness that my wolf melts into a puddle. "I can't lose you, Dominic. I love this baby with every fiber of my being, but I need you too. I don't want to go back to the way things were – living a half life and convincing myself it was enough because I didn't know any better."

"You're not going to lose me, sweetheart." Sinclair promises, and I can tell he believes it, even though this isn't something in our power.

"You don't know that." I reply, thinking of Isabel, or Henry and all the people who have lost mates. "Look at what has already happened."

“Exactly.” Sinclair purrs. “Look at what we’ve already survived, look at the forces that have tried to keep us apart and failed. What can’t we do?”

I furrow my brow. “But-” I want to say that this is all still beginning, we still have the summit ahead of us, and who knows what other challenges. But I don’t get the chance.

Sinclair’s finger comes over my lips, “no buts, no what ifs. You’re my destiny, Ella. I’m not going to let anything come between us.

Chapter 215 – New Beta

Sinclair

Morning comes much too soon. My body is sore and aching, but I'm much calmer now that I've let off some steam with my mate. The last thing I want to do is leave our suite and deal with the fallout of last week's drama, but there is much to be done before the summit.

I begin with a visit to the families of the men I lost in the bombing, starting with Aileen. I give her my oath to find the men responsible for the attack, knowing my words are an empty comfort in the face of a life without her mate. These visits nearly break me, as I've yet to truly begin grieving myself.

In fact I don't even make it five minutes before regretting my orders for Ella to stay in bed and rest. She is the only thing that could possibly calm my wolf right now, and I dearly want to return to her side. I still hope to steal some time alone with her this afternoon – a final reprieve before the entire continent descends on us – but that will only be possible if I finish my to-do list.

Next I go to the airfield, needing to see the situation for myself. I'm astounded to see how large the refugee camp has grown in my absence, even with the families Gabriel has housed in the city.

Though each of the shifters I meet is grappling with profound personal loss, they're no less thrilled to see me alive and well. Their warmth and relief is a welcome balm, and I carry it with me into my meetings with the King's security services.

The enforcers assure me that everything is ready for the summit, and that security will be the strictest the capital has ever seen, but that's where the good news ends. So far, there are no leads on the bomber, and when I explain my miraculous survival to the assembled wolves, they can only exchange befuddled looks and remark that the Goddess must have been looking out for me.

I don't understand it myself, and even though Ella has proved just how present divine forces are in our lives, it's beyond surreal to think that the Goddess might have saved me. Even so, I'm much more concerned with discovering Damon's allies in Vanara, but I don't find the answers I'm seeking in the security offices.

I leave, brooding as I check another task off my list. By the time I reach the palace library I don't have any more clarity about who might have carried out the attack, and I'm at a loss for what to do. Thankfully Roger is already there waiting for me, and he greets me with an uncharacteristic hug. I return it enthusiastically, wondering when we last showed each other such affection – if ever.

"I don't know what to make of it." I tell him, quickly bringing him up to speed on the situation. "Obviously Damon orchestrated it, but how? Who is he working with? Is it one of the alphas here? Are there counter forces working against us right under our very nose? Did he somehow figure out a way to send people to Vanara?" i Roger frowns, his mouth twisting into a grimace. I wait for him to speak, but I can sense his reluctance. "What?"

"Well," he winces, "it could be one of the refugees."

I take a step back, stunned he could suggest such a thing. "I refuse to believe that." I argue, shaking my head. "You've been to the camp – you've seen what they've been through. No one there would help Damon."

"I'm not saying it would be a true refugee – but someone impersonating one." Roger amends, holding his hands up defensively. "And I don't necessarily think that's the case, I'm simply saying that there's only one way off the continent right now. So if Damon did send someone here, it might have been on one of the evacuation flights."

"If Damon found out about the flights and discovered the meeting point, he would just kill all of the refugees." I argue, not adding that I've been terrified of this very eventuality for weeks, 1

"Maybe," Roger agrees. "Or maybe he'd use the opportunity to send spies or assassins. You know? Find out where we are and what we're doing."

I smother a growl, hating this possibility but appreciating that he's thinking strategically. "You need to be very careful who you say that in front of." I warn gruffly. "That is the kind of idea that can spread panic and turn the locals against our people."

"I know that." Roger admits, "I don't like it any more than you do. I'm just trying to think of every possibility."

I grip his shoulder, "I appreciate that, and I'm going to need you to keep thinking that way if we're going to get through this."

"Of course I will." Roger vows, though his frown only deepens. "The real question is going to be how we investigate this without letting the public know our suspicions."

"Well, that can be your number one priority," I reply, watching him closely as I continue. "As my new Beta."

Roger blinks, doing a double take as if he's unsure he heard me correctly." What did you just say?"

Taking a deep breath, I explain. "I wouldn't normally try to appoint a replacement for Hugo so soon after his death," I confess, feeling a stab of guilt for even suggesting this when his loss is so fresh. "And I know it's a lot to ask when you spent your life dreaming of being Alpha, but I need a second in command and I... well, I want it to be you. It should be you."

Roger drops his gaze to the floor, a sober expression on his face. "I lost any interest in being Alpha the moment I thought you were dead." He shares grimly, his voice like gravel. "It was the closest I'd ever come to leading, and it's the closest I ever want to be. My personal glory isn't worth losing you – nothing is. You have no idea how desperately I prayed to have you back."

I feel a deep pang in my chest, undone by the vestiges of pain still haunting my brother's features. "Well now I am back, and I need someone I can trust by my side." I take him by the shoulders, encouraging him to look me in the eye. "Who better to watch my back than my big brother?"

"That's easier said than done." Roger counters uncertainly. "Betas are supposed to balance their Alphas, not antagonize them."

"They are..." I confirm with a grin. "Do you think you can manage it?"

"That depends," Roger quips, "how big of an ass do you plan on being?"

"No bigger than usual." I laugh, offering him my hand. "So are you up for it, or are you going to make me ask Philippe?"

He exhales dramatically, "And leave Ella without a guard? What am I, a monster?"

"I know." I grimace, thinking of all the soldiers I already have to replace. "At this rate my men are dropping like flies. I don't think I can handle losing anyone else."

Roger slides his hand into mine, squeezing with his full strength. "I won't let you down, Dominic. I'm going to find the people responsible for the bomb if it's the last thing I do"

"I know." I assure him, pulling the stubborn oaf into a hug. "I trust you, brother."

He chuckles, thumping my back with his fist. "Just wait until we tell, Dad. The old man is going to absolutely blubber."

He's not wrong, and I'm already looking forward to sharing the news with our father. Still, my to-do list isn't complete yet, and the scent of my mate's adoptive sister tells me I'm behind schedule. When we part I see Cora leaning in the library doorway, watching us warily.

'You rang?' She inquires, keeping her attention focused entirely on me. She doesn't even afford Roger a glance, and I realize that the burgeoning attraction between the pair hasn't progressed well in my absence. I'll have to ask him about it later, because right now my brother looks as though he's forgotten I'm here. He's staring at Cora with open hunger, and it seems to take him a minute to process her words.

"You did?" Roger questions eventually, looking at me when the information clicks.

'Yes, I need your help with something – if you're willing to lend it.' I amend hopefully. "Just before the attack, I realized that Ella and I never got the chance to throw a mating ceremony after our secret came out." I reveal, marveling about how much has changed in such a short time. "We've celebrated becoming mates in private, but we never had the chance to celebrate it with our loved ones, and I don't want to put it off any longer. I'd like to surprise Ella with a ceremony on the last night of the summit – before the ball. What do you think?"

Cora's face splits into a wide smile, "I think that's a wonderful idea. She'll love it."

'Then you'll help?' I ask.

"Of course," Cora agrees.

I glance between her and Roger, not sure the human realizes the full implications of my request. "And you think you'll be able to work together?"

Cora's freezes, her eyes swinging to Roger. My brother grins, flashing his fangs, and I can sense Cora forcing down an indignant protest. Instead she plasters a smile onto her features, and forces her next words out through clenched teeth, "I can't see why not."

I'm not sure who's more pleased, me or my brother. "Perfect."

Chapter 216 – Silent Treatment

3rd Person

As soon as Sinclair left Roger and Cora alone, the human turned towards the door, determined to flee. They'd talked about the mating ceremony for the better part of an hour, but as soon as they finished making their plans, Cora made a break for it.

Before her hand could touch the door knob however, Roger's voice stopped her in her tracks. "Oh so you're back to ignoring me, are you?"

Cora stiffened, turning back to the newly-minted Beta. "You got my sympathy when your brother was dead, but now that we know Dominic is alive, I don't see any reason to pretend." She answered with a shrug, trying to push away the memory of having the huge wolf's arms around her. Of course, that was much easier said than done – her mind was already carrying her back to that emotional night, and it was nearly impossible to forget the way her heart had raced when he touched her.

Roger's tears gradually slowed as Cora held him, breathing in her delicate scent and letting her gentle touch tame his rabid wolf. Soon his heaving breaths were low and steady, and Cora's soothing murmurs fell quiet. It shouldn't have been so electrifying – to hold a grieving man this way. But as the worst of the storm passed, the more intimate the embrace seemed, and suddenly Cora was so terribly aware of Roger's powerful body flush against hers that she could scarcely breathe.

She felt as though his hands were scalding her through her clothes, and his warm breath fluttering over her neck roused butterflies in her stomach. Gooseflesh rose on her arms as he emitted a soft rumble of appreciation for her comfort, and Cora wondered why her mouth suddenly felt so dry. Even though the big wolf had been vicious and unhinged mere minutes before, Cora felt safe and content in the circle of his arms, and more alarming yet – she realized she didn't want him to let go.

That was the last straw. As a doctor Cora was used to touching people constantly, and in the midst of the refugee crisis she'd done more than her fair-share of hand holding. But no one had ever blurred the lines of personal and professional this way, evoking deep emotions she should not be feeling – especially not for a man who infuriated her as much as Roger.

Cora extracted herself a bit too abruptly, but she attempted to cover her actions with a hasty cough. "You'd better let me take a look at your feet." She suggested, glancing at the debris-strewn floor. The wolf's blood mingled with the glass and splintered wood and Cora wasn't sure how to even cross the wreckage, but Roger lifted her into his arms and carried her through the worst of it, ignoring her protests.

"What are you doing?!" She'd exclaimed, wriggling in his strong grip.

“My feet can’t get any more beat up than they already are – yours can.” He explained, hitching her closer.

“I’m wearing shoes!” Cora countered, rolling her eyes.

“Well you can’t ever be too careful.” Roger answered easily, though she thought she saw the corner of his mouth twitching. He carried her into the bathroom and reluctantly returned her feet to the ground, but he didn’t release her immediately. Instead he leaned her weight against him, as if worried she might not be steady without his support.

Cora pulled away, becoming increasingly flustered. “Have a seat.” She instructed, searching through the cabinets and extracting first aid supplies. Roger settled on the edge of the bath and patiently waited for her to finish her search. If she’d felt brave enough to look over at the wolf, Cora would have seen the hungry way he followed her with his dark eyes, or noticed the smirk which twisted his lips as he listened to her pounding heart and racing pulse.

Trying to still her shaking hands, Cora sprayed warm water over the wolf’s torn feet, wincing when she saw all the glass shards imbedded in his soles.

“How were you even standing?” She inquired.

“It helps that I’m very drunk.” Roger answered, his eyes locked on her lovely face. He was finding it very difficult to control himself with the beautiful human, especially given the way she’d stood up to him so courageously. He knew it must not have been easy for her, and though part of him was proud, her skittishness was thoroughly provoking his wolf’s prey drive.

Cora’s knees were weak, but the familiar motions of her work helped keep her on balance. She methodically extracted the glass from Roger’s feet with sharp tweezers, then cleaned and bound the wounds with careful precision. ‘There.’ She said, wiping sweat from her brow, even though the temperature in the room was low. “You should stay off of those for the rest of the night.”

“But how will I get to my bed?” Roger inquired, arching a brow Cora didn’t like the sultry note in his deep voice, and she glanced in the direction of the bedroom. “I think you’ll find your bed is in pieces. I think maybe you should sleep in the tub.”

She rose to her feet, cleaning up her supplies, and Roger’s heart sank. He didn’t want her to leave, in part because he enjoyed her company far too much, but also because he simply didn’t want to be alone. Roger clamped his eyes shut, not wanting to remember the pain which drove him to wreak so much destruction. “I’m sorry for the way I behaved earlier.” He said, catching Cora’s hand before she could get away.

Cora frowned down at him. "I've seen worse." She answered honestly, "But I think perhaps you shouldn't be alone tonight."

"Is that an invitation?" Roger questioned hopefully.

"My medical opinion." Cora corrected. "The same I would give anyone in your state."

"Everyone I care about is in the same condition – or thereabouts." Roger lamented, feeling very sorry for himself. "They shouldn't have to deal with me on top of everything else."

Cora studied him closely. They were in an opulent palace with dozens of servants and guards. Finding someone to stay with the wolf wouldn't be difficult – even arranging a new room for him would take little more than the wave of a hand. So why was she so tempted to offer her own company? Why didn't she want to leave him? Why was she so bloody tempted to feel his touch again. "I could stay with you." She blurted, before she could think better of it. "If you like."

Roger blinked up at her, surprised but pleased beyond belief. "Really?"

"As long as you behave yourself and don't get any wise ideas." Cora answered, notching her chin up.

"I think we have plenty of proof that wise ideas aren't my forte." Roger replied, gesturing to the demolished suite.

"You can say that again." Cora snorted, sweeping her gaze around. "But I'll be damned if I'm going to spend the night in this death trap. I'll ring downstairs to borrow a wheelchair and then you can come to my room."

"Thank you, Cora." Roger squeezed her hand, but Cora pulled herself from his grip and crossed her arms over her chest. "You don't know what this means to me."

Cora's cold expression wavered, a flash of genuine empathy bleeding into her features. Still, she didn't let her guard down. "I mean it, Roger. No funny business." She stalked away before he could reply, giving him a delightful view of her retreating backside.

"Ah, so that was just pity, was it?" Roger questioned, calling Cora back to the present.

"That and my oath as a doctor," she shrugged. "I couldn't exactly leave you bleeding and practically suicidal."

"U-huh, and I suppose you hold all your patients that way?" Roger pressed, closing the distance between them. He didn't stop until he was towering over her, and the delectable scent he'd come to love spiked with adrenaline. "And let them sleep in your bed even though you insisted they stay on the couch?"

"Only the ones who are giant cry babies like you." Cora bit, resting her hands on her hips

"Come on, admit it, Cora." Roger purred, stroking a lock of hair back from her face. 'You're warming up to me.'

"Don't be ridiculous." She insisted. "I showed you a bit of compassion in a time of need. That doesn't mean I've forgotten your past crimes."

'You're the only one who hasn't.' Roger reminds her, sidling closer. "I'm not saying I deserve it, I just find it curious that you can't move past things that your sister and my brother have forgiven. After all, they were the targets, not you."

"All that means is that I hold a higher standard for my sister than she would for herself." Cora argued, backing away until her shoulder blades collided with the door. She froze when she realized she was cornered, nervously licking her lips as Roger continued to prowl forward.

"I have a different theory." Roger shared, resting his hands on either side of Cora's head. "Would you like to hear it?"

Cora shook her head, not able to find her voice.

'You like me.' Roger declared, enjoying the way her eyes dilated with surprise and anticipation. 'You don't want to, but you can't help it. But instead of dealing with that fact, you've turned me into a monster.'

Anger and fear warred for dominance in Cora, even as heat pooled in her stomach. "I have news for you." She hissed, fire blazing in her veins. "I didn't have to turn you into anything. You helped Damon set this war into motion. You targeted my sweet, innocent, pregnant, sister because you couldn't handle coming second to your brother. You're trying to rewrite yourself as being deep and complicated and tortured, but all you truly are is a little boy with a fragile ego and major mommy issues." Cora pushed at his burly shoulder, and Roger took a step back, eyeing her warily. "If I'd known you were going to twist things this way I never would have shown you the ounce of humanity I did. But let me be clear, I won't be making that mistake again."

Without another word Cora turned on her heel and stormed out. Roger listened to her pounding heart as she retreated down the hall, and though she didn't know it, the sound stayed with him for the rest of the day, and well into the night.

Chapter 217 – Chasing Butterflies

Ella

I haven't been to the nursery since the news of Sinclair's supposed death broke, and when I walk in I'm greeted with a chorus of excited cries from the children. I kneel down and open my arms to the pups, making sure to kiss every cheek and nose I can reach. "Ella where have you been?!" novelxo One of the older girls demands hotly, crossing her arms over her chest, "It's been ages and ages!"

"Miss Izzy said you were sick." Someone else interjects before I can answer. "You can borrow my stuffy if you want, she always makes me feel better."

They're all clamoring for answers at once, novelxo and all I can do is offer hugs and apologies for my absence. "Oh thank you! I know, I've been gone too long – but I didn't want to stay away. That mean doctor ordered me to stay in bed. I promise I'm better now, and it's a good thing because I've missed you all so much."

More questions rain down, but then Isabel's firm but loving voice sounds from somewhere above us. "Alright pups, let's not overwhelm our Princess. Give her some space to breathe." I look up to find Sadie strapped to a frontfacing carrier on her chest, and though Isabel is trying to look stern, the infant is grinning and giggling as she bounces in her cloth seat. Of course, none of us take kindly to the matron's suggestion, and I simply bare my fangs and hug the little ones closer, laughing when their immature growls join my own defensive noises.

Isabel throws her hands up in exasperation, "suit yourselves then." She retreats, but keeps an ever-watchful eye on us as we continue to catch up.

"Is it true that the Alpha is back?" A little boy asks softly, his eager breath fluttering against my neck.

"A course he is!" Another small voice chastises him, just a tiny bit smug for being in the know. "Everyone saw him carrying her through the halls." A number of the girls titter excitedly, but the first pup only huffs at their antics.

"Well I dunno!" He complains, sounding thoroughly affronted as he cuddles a bit closer to my side. "The other day everyone was saying he was deads."

'We did have a scare.' I explain carefully, "but we were wrong. Alpha Dominic is alive and he's home now."

I regret the words almost as soon as I've said them, because a number of the pups look suddenly hopeful. I can practically see the thoughts racing through their minds – wondering if we were wrong about Sinclair, then maybe we were wrong about their parents too. "How come you were wrong?" The boy in my arms inquires, confirming my suspicions.

'Well, I never believed he was dead.' I share, wondering if it's better or worse to be transparent when the/re this young, "but that's only because he's my mate. The King and the other Alphas don't have the same connection with him, so they didn't have reason to hope." It's not the full story, but it's the best I can do in the circumstances. "Does that make sense?"

I see a number of their young faces fall, no doubt reflecting on their own experiences with broken bonds. My heart aches for them, even as one of the girls nods glumly. "It's like when we lost our Mommies and Daddies. We felt them go – even though they didn't want to."

'That's right.' I confirm soberly. "I never felt Dominic go, so I had to believe he was still out there somewhere, fighting to get back to us. Thankfully I was right." At this point I'm sitting on the floor with half a dozen pups in my lap, and another six gathered around me in a circle. However I also notice a few unfamiliar pups skirting warily around the edges of our group – as if unable to keep themselves away. "Now tell me what you've all been up to while I was away? I see some new faces hiding over there – do we have new friends?"

A four year old leaning against my shoulder laughs. 'They're scared cuz they heard you're the Goddess's daughter.'

"Well that's just silliness." I shake my head. "Haven't you told them how nice I am? That I'm so fat I have to waddle when I walk, and I spend all my time sleeping?"

The children laugh and I see a small boy lurking closer, encouraged by the happy sounds. "Hello there." I say, peering through the assembled pups to catch him in my crosshairs. "Would you like to join us?"

He freezes and looks at the other pups for reassurance. I carefully shift the boy currently in my arms to make room, and extend my hands to the skittish toddler, "don't be afraid angel, you have all your brothers and sisters here to look out for you."

His face closes off, 'They're not bwothers or sisters.'

"Oh but they are." I correct him gently. "When I was a little girl I grew up in a home for pups without parents, but it wasn't anywhere near as nice as this place. There weren't lovely grown ups like Miss Izzy to care for us, or warm beds and yummy food. All we had was each other, and we became each other's family. I had dozens of brothers and sisters to love, who understood exactly how I felt – how lonely and sad I could get when I thought about my Mommy and Daddy." Some of the other pups are staring at me in surprise, having never heard this story. “Family isn’t just about who we’re born, it’s about who we choose, and you can choose to have as many brothers and sisters as you want.”

“You didn’ have a Mommy and Daddy?” The tot inquires, edging a bit closer. “But they said you’re a pwincess.” novelxo There’s a note of accusation in his voice, and I wonder just how recently he’s joined the nursery – and what he went through before arriving.

“I didn’t know I was a Princess until very recently.” I explain. “In fact, I didn’t even know I was a wolf because I was raised with humans.”

“Wow.” The boy utters, coming close enough for me to pull him into my lap. He goes very still when my hands first make contact, but after a moment he melts against me, his defenses falling away.

“I didn’ thinks anything bad happened to princesses.” Another new face has joined us, a clever little girl who snuck up behind me.

“Bad things happen to everyone.” I relate sadly, offering her my other arm. She slips into my embrace, and I kiss her hair. “There now, you see? I’m not so bad.” I croon. “What a pair of cuddle bugs.”

“You smell nice.” The boys murmurs, nuzzling his head against my chest.

“So do you.” I answer honestly, breathing in his pure scent just as Rafe flutters in my belly.

“Hey, your tummy kicked me.” The girl exclaims, jolting slightly.

‘That’s my baby,” I chuckle warmly, guiding her hand to my navel. “He’s saying hello.”

“Oh, hello baby.” The pup greets, patting my stomach and looking up at me with wide eyes. “Will he be a prince?”

“I suppose he will.” I realize this is already true by my own bloodline, but for their benefit I add, “Now that Alpha Dominic is back, he’s going to make Damon pay for everything he’s done. One day we’ll all be able to go home, and when my pup is old enough to lead, he’ll take over from his father.”

The boy who asked about Sinclair’s death is still sitting in my skirts, and now he gazes up at me with wonder. “When I grow up, I wanna have a mate just like you.” He proclaims, “I wanna be every bit as strong as Alpha Dominic, so that no one can ever hurt me or take away the things I care about.”

“Do you want to know a secret about Alpha Dominic?” I ask, exchanging mischievous looks with the others.

They nod emphatically, leaning closer. I catch my mate’s scent nearby and know he’s on his way here, so I alter my words for his benefit.

‘Well, he’s all the things you say. He’s big and strong and brave, and he can be very scary when he wants to be, but deep down he’s a big teddy bear.’ I reveal, smiling broadly. “He loves cuddles and goopy romantic books and movies. He chases butterflies and even takes bubble baths that smell like flowers.”

The pups are giggling almost uncontrollably now, and I feel Sinclair behind me a millisecond before his booming voice detonates. “What on earth are you telling these pups!”

The children squeal and scatter with playful screams, and I turn to face him, batting my lashes invitingly. Sinclair places his hands on his hips, adopting a convincing scowl even though I can feel his raucous amusement. “Such a naughty mate, telling such tales to impressionable children. What am I going to do with you?”

I’m about to respond that I only spoke the truth, but before I get the chance, the boy who just shared his wishes to be like my mate steps between our bodies, matching Sinclair’s pose. “She’s not naughty, she’s the nicest, prettiest she-wolf in the whole world!” The poor boy is shaking like a leaf, but he stands proud and tall, determined to stand up for me.

I want to intervene, to reassure the poor pup it was only a joke, but Sinclair sends a warning glance and kneels down in front of the boy. “You must feel very strongly, to challenge me this way.” He remarks coolly.

The boy’s lip quivers, and his voice shakes. “I do. Ella is the bestest, you should only be nice to her.”

Sinclair settles a colossal hand on the boy’s shoulder. “Good man.” He nods, and I can sense the boy’s immense relief. “You’re exactly right and I’m glad Ella has you in her corner. I could use a hundred soldiers like you.”

The child perks up, “Really? You mean you’d let me fight?”

“Actually I was thinking of a much more important job.” Sinclair replies, “Maybe you could help look after my mate while she’s here in the nursery. She has guards of course, but I could use an extra pair of eyes.”

I feel my jaw drop in disbelief that he’s turning the pup into a spy against me, but then I see the way the boy puffs up with pride. "I'd be honored, Alpha." "Then we have a deal." Sinclair nods, before gracefully joining me on the floor. He tugs me close and kisses his mating mark, before winking at the boy, "Besides she was telling the truth. I love chasing butterflies."

Chapter 218 – Stolen Moments

Ella

It isn't easy to extract Sinclair from the nursery, not after he delighted the children with confessions of his soft side and got roped into endless games of tag and hide and seek. When he eventually shifted into his wolf and started giving the pups rides on his back, I thought Isabel was going to have a conniption. Only naptime brought an end to the fun, though I wasn't thrilled when he suggested we go back to our suite rather than snoozing with the pups. Of course... that was before I realized he intended to nap with me – or not nap, as it were.

I waved goodbye to the children as Sinclair carted me out of the nursery in his arms, a delightfully rumbly laugh vibrating in his chest. "Couldn't we adopt some of them?" I inquire, kissing his neck. "Just a couple dozen?"

Sinclair gazes down at me indulgently, "Baby when this war is over we can adopt as many pups as you want, but I think we should hold off on giving our enemies more targets for the time being."

"Fine." I groan, throwing my head back dramatically. I hear an appreciative purr, and belatedly realize the movement has given the wolf an excellent view down my dress. I giggle, attempting to pull the fabric together to cover myself, but my mate arches a threatening brow.

"Don't you dare." Sinclair warns, "We've got limited time and much to do little wolf."

I can guess he's referring to the summit's kick off in the morning, but I'm surprised to see him so early in the afternoon. "Does this mean you finished working?" I ask, licking my lips.

"It wasn't easy, but I made it happen. We've got to steal whatever time together we can."

He kicks the door to our suite closed, and I hear Philippe and the other guards disperse to give us privacy. "Aren't there things we should talk about before tomorrow?" I inquire, not wanting to deal with business but also feeling unprepared for the politics awaiting us.

"As far as I'm concerned, that bomb upended half the work I did on this trip and we'll be entering uncharted territory in the morning whether we talk about it or not." Sinclair replies, tossing me onto the bed. "I would much rather spend our evening this way."

"But

"Ah ah," He scolds, eyes blazing as he strips off my clothes, "I've made my decision trouble."

I shudder as a low growl fills my ears, calling my own wolf out to play. "Bossy alpha." I accuse, wondering when exactly I became so short of breath.

"You have no idea." Sinclair confirms with a lethal grin, "I seem to remember telling you that I'd be keeping a list of all your bad behavior while I was away, but I have to admit I underestimated the extent of the mischief you'd make."

He towers over me, still naked following his wolf's antics with the children. His long, thick cock is already standing at attention, and any hints of the civilized, bubble bath-taking politician are gone. He's pure animal now, and my instincts are driving me to see just how far I can push him.

"I'm sure I don't have any idea what you're talking about." I quip, pouting my fully lips. "I only did what I thought was best for the pack."

Sinclair's corded muscles tense and flex, and he cocks his head to the side. His entire demeanor changes as the playfulness seeps away, replaced only with dark foreboding. "Is that really the tactic you want to choose, little wolf? Because I was going to focus on the small stuff -leave the serious things for later." He pulls in a deep breath, rolling his neck as he considers my prone form. "But maybe it's better we deal with everything now – that way we can put it behind us and start the summit on a clean slate."

I grimace, understanding him at once. I'd chosen the wrong words for our game and cut too close to home. Now Sinclair wasn't merely going to concoct sensual payments for made-up infractions like wearing clothes in his bed, he was going to address the greatest conflicts in our time apart – things that were part and parcel my fault. It isn't a prospect to which I'm looking forward, but I'd be lying if I said I don't feel desperate to heal the rifts between us.

I nod in agreement, dropping my gaze submissively. "I think you're right."

He leans over me, sliding his hand around my nape and pulling my lips up to his. "Good girl." He praises, "I'd thought to wait until things calmed down, but these things don't go away, baby. Best to get it out of the way." I nod again, because I agree. My mate almost dying was certainly a huge distraction, as is my lineage and the war, but the disagreements and fights we had along the way will only fester if left unresolved. No amount of distraction can change that.

"You know I love you with everything I am, and everything I ever will be?" Sinclair inquires, searing me with his emerald gaze.

"You know you're my whole world, and I'd be lost without you?" I counter, blinking back tears.

Sinclair answers me with a ferocious kiss, and then it starts: Every lie, every betrayal of his trust, every scheme and act of neglect for my well being. At times we go around in circles, ‘You were dead!’ I cry, about half an hour into the debate. “I needed to find you, I can be held accountable for a lot, but you can’t expect me to have lost you without grieving, or not to fight when I knew you were out there somewhere!”

“Of course I know you would grieve, but I need you to know that killing yourself or our child is the absolutely last thing I would want. I would hope you would move on and

“And what, forget you?!” I interrupt, “because I have to say if the tables were turned I would be pretty offended if you got over my demise in a couple of days!” I can see Sinclair getting ready to jump in, so I add, “ Besides it wasn’t that serious! I would have been fine!”

‘That’s not what the doctor said!’ Sinclair thunders.

‘You went to the doctor about me!’ I demand hotly, my cheeks flushing.

“Of course I did – you’re my mate and I’m worried about you.” He bites back, “So help me Ella, if I do die and you stress yourself into a coma, I will come back from the dead just to spank your impossible behind!”

‘Then I would gladly do it if that’s what it takes to bring you back!’ I explode, throwing my hands up.

“That’s not the point!” Sinclair rages, pacing back and forth, any signs of arousal long gone. “Don’t you get it, I’m not the one who has to survive this war – you are the one who was chosen by the Goddess, Rafe is my heir. You two have to live, not me!”

A little while later, we’ve moved onto my hypnosis sessions, a subject which devastates me more than anything else. “I’m sorry, I’ve said I’m sorry and I know it cost me your trust.” I cry, “I don’t know what else to do, Dominic. I can’t take it back, nor would I!”

‘You could have told me, even if you knew I wouldn’t agree, you could have been honest and told me you needed to do it whether I like it or not!’ He combats.

“And risk you issuing one of your Alpha orders?” I accuse, “you and I both know you would have used your power to make me promise against my will – which isn’t fair, by the way.”

“And we also know that you would have found a way around it because you’re too clever for your own damned good!” Sinclair replies gruffly.

“Well that’s not the point.” I throw his own words back in his face. “The point is not exerting your dominance over me when I don’t want you to! Forcing me to follow your orders when I don’t agree with them!”

He throws back his head and laughs. “I’ve got news for you, little wolf – that’s my job. If I only did it when you liked it, it wouldn’t be real.”

“Well maybe I don’t want it to be real!” I lash out, snarling and baring my fangs.

Sinclair is on me in an instant, his hands course and wonderful on my body. “Is that so?” He growls, daring me to test him.

‘Yes!’ I insist, notching my chin up as I finally see a light at the end of the tunnel. I know if I provoke him now, he won’t be able to resist taking me in hand, and in my experience this is the only thing that will help me feel better. When there’s no solution to our conflicts, we have to find a way to come back together as mates and put the past behind us, and he’s the one who showed me how.

‘Well then maybe we should put that to the test.’ Sinclair answers, bending me over the bed. “Get ready, trouble. You’re in for a rough ride.”

Chapter 219 – Ella and Sinclair

Ella

“Please, please, please?” I beg, resting my forehead on my forearms. “Hmm,” Sinclair rumbles thoughtfully, swatting my raised bottom with one powerful hand, while the other skillfully moves between my legs. He’s been at this for more than half an hour, though at first it was only a punishment.

He bent me over the mattress and started peppering my behind with soft spanks as he lectured me about honesty, health and safety. Then my legs gave out, and he moved me onto my hands and knees in the nest. That was around the time he started tormenting my poor, neglected sex – no doubt unable to resist the arousal pooled there as the result of his chastisement.

Sinclair leans down to kiss me between my shoulder blades. “I don’t know, as naughty as you’ve been, I don’t think you deserve to come yet.” He decides devilishly, but he sinks two thick fingers inside my clenching sheath, using his thumb to circle my clit as he curves the long digits into my g-spot.

“Dominic, I can’t hold out any longer.” I whimper, trying to wiggle away from him and only earning myself a few especially hard smacks. The pain blooms over my heated skin with delicious effect, sending currents of electricity straight to my already overwhelmed erogenous zones.

The sting is a perfect compliment to the pleasure my mate inflicts, and his utter dominance has reduced my wolf to a puddle of goo.

“Don’t even think about coming before I give you permission, little wolf.” He warns, a dark edge in his deep voice. “You’ve been running wild without me here, and that ends tonight.”

I bite down on my lower lip, whining pitifully as I try to keep myself from teetering over the edge despite his expert handling. It’s no use, the heady combination of pleasure and pain is too much for me to bear.

My mate’s fingers are thrusting into my tight channel, stretching me – preparing me to accommodate his huge cock. The anticipation only excites me more, and when he feels me begin to spasm, he pulls his hand free and swats my swollen clit. I moan helplessly as I lose control, not understanding the sensations ravaging my body.

Sinclair returns to stroking me as I ride the shuddering bliss, his hands not gentling, but driving me even higher. He doesn’t let me come down, instead forcing me to a second terrifying peak right after the first. I don’t recognize the keening cry which leaves my lips, and when I recover the ability to hear and think again, my mate’s husky voice is full of triumph.

“Oh you bad girl.” He scolds, not sounding the least bit disappointed. Sinclair returns to spanking me, his fingers coated with my wetness and enhancing the burn. ‘You have a lot of nerve, trouble. What do you have to say for yourself?’

‘Your... fault.’ I gasp, tears burning in my eyes from the pure intensity of the experience. ‘You made me.’

The next thing I know I’m lying on my back, and my mate is hovering over me, his eyes glowing. He flashes his fangs in a lethal grin, and I know I’m right – he wanted me to lose control. “Excuses, excuses.” He growls, kissing his way down my body. “Greedy little wolf – stealing orgasms that belong to me.”

I toss my head back and forth as he nips and licks my thighs, knowing it’s no use arguing when he’s let his inner animal take over. “Such a pretty pussy,” he murmurs, chuckling when I flush an even deeper shade of crimson.

He hovers his lips just over my clit and blows cool air over the still -pulsing nub, and I hiss at the slight sensation. “Are you sore already, mate? I’m just getting started.”

“Am I done being punished?” I ask in a small voice, unsure of whether I want him to take mercy on me, or continue with his sensual torment. My insatiable wolf is still urging me to ask for more – to provoke him if I must – but it’s my body which must pay the price of her demands. I can feel Sinclair delving into our bond, and I know he can sense this truth. I instinctively realize he won’t stop until my wolf is satisfied, but a wave of tenderness assails me all the same.

“Not even close.” He croons, crawling up my body to kiss me. It’s a rather chaste kiss, given the things he’s been doing to me, but when he pulls back he cups my cheek in his hand, his hungry gaze boring into me so intensely I want to look away. “I won’t give you more than you can take Ella, but we can always pause if you’re overwhelmed.” He reminds me. ‘You’re safe, and I love you, just keep the bond open.’

I nod, and Sinclair kisses me again, this time taking the time to explore my mouth with his talented tongue. He extracts kiss after kiss from my lips, and I get lost in the feeling of our lips dancing, our breath mingling. I’m drunk on the taste of him, already wondering how long I’ll have to wait before he claims me fully. Sinclair chuckles in response, kissing his way down my neck and petting my hip.

“Wait,” I object, wanting to pause, but not for the reason Sinclair thinks. He looks up from his lazy exploration of my breasts, giving me his full attention. “I really am sorry for everything that happened while you were away.” I whisper, tangling my fingers in his dark hair, “for everything I did.”

“Oh sweetheart we’re past all that.” He purrs, stroking my sides as he sucks one of my beaded nipples into his mouth. This is just for fun now. He continues in my mind, flicking his tongue over the bud and teasing the other with his fingers.

I arch into his touch, relief coursing through me. I’m sure this fight will be one of many disagreements in our future, and I’m sure there will be times that Sinclair is in the wrong and I the right. But that wasn’t the case this time, and it is incredibly freeing to feel such catharsis – as if I’ve paid my penance and we can move forward together on even footing.

Fun for who? My wolf sasses, apparently ready to run rampant with her freshly clean conscience. As far as I can tell, you’re the one having all the fun here.

Sinclair nips my breast with his sharp canines, looking up at me with a devious expression. “That reminds me,” He proclaims, in a tone that makes me suddenly wary. “I took quite the journey through your dreams to find you in your nightmares, little mate.”

‘You did?’ I ask, curious about he accomplished such a feat, but also uncertain about why he’s telling me this.

“Indeed.” He nods, looking more and more predatory with every moment that passes. “Including a very heated fantasy you haven’t shared with me.”

If I thought his dirty talk made me blush, it’s nothing compared to the sudden embarrassment and panic I feel now. “Which one? I gulp.

He cocks his head with interest, as if he hadn’t realized there were multiple. “I think you should guess. Start with the one which excites you most – since you’re so worried about having fun.”

Something about his response gives me pause, and I realize he’s fishing – trying to make me reveal sex dreams he didn’t actually witness. I narrow my eyes. “Oh no you don’t, Dominic.” I counter, “I’m not going to let you embarrass me even more “Embarrass?” He interrupts, frowning. “What is there to be embarrassed about? We all have fantasies, Ella.”

“Oh, would you like to tell me some of yours? Or some of the weird dreams you’ve had that have no basis in reality? I’m pregnant by the way, half of my dreams are crazy!” I remind him, getting more worked up now.

“I remember, baby.” He replies, kissing my belly and purring to calm my frayed nerves.

“And I’ll gladly tell you my fantasies. Though I have to confess that I already have plans to enact them with you when we have the time... and equipment.”

The last word makes me squirm in his arms, but his soothing purrs are taking effect. “Just tell me what you saw?” I request pouting.

Thankfully he takes pity on me, ‘Well, you were wearing a bright red cloak, but otherwise you were stark naked... and “I remember.” I wince, not wanting to look him in the eye.

Sinclair’s suggestive purrs pull my attention to him despite my shyness,” We already have this room, which looks like a forest, and I’m sure I’ve seen a red coat in your closet.”

“You mean, you actually want to...?” I trail off, shocked that he seems so eager.

“Why wouldn’t I?” He asks, sitting up and pulling me up with him. “I love seeing you turned on, so I’m bound to find anything that gets you excited sexy.” When he puts it like that it makes sense, but I can’t help feeling uncertain. Sensing this, he adds in a growl, “Besides, it’s not as if it would be difficult to get into the role – if I was out in the woods and saw your luscious body flashing at me from under a little cloak, I wouldn’t be able to resist gobbling you up. I might even want to make you pay for teasing me.”

“I think I would feel silly.” I confess, even as a delicious shiver runs down my spine at the image he’s putting in my head, “what would I even say?”

Sinclair flashes his fangs, trailing his hand down my body, ‘That’s the beauty, sweetheart. The lines are already written for you.”

My sex clenches in excitement, and I take a deep breath, summoning my courage. I begin backing away from him on the bed, making my eyes wide and innocent, “My Mr Wolf, what big hands you have...”

Chapter 220 – Adoption

3rd Person

‘You can’t be serious.’ James stared at Roger in shock, not believing his own ears. ‘It’s just a possibility we have to consider.’ The new Beta replied gently. ‘Trust me, no one wants it to be true.’

‘Are you suggesting that I might have been responsible for bringing the wolves who attacked the Alpha’s convoy to this continent?’ James clarified, wanting to know if the Alpha’s concerns about Damon hiding spies among the refugees was purely hypothetical, or based on something more.

‘We don’t know anything for sure.’ Roger replied carefully. ‘But you said yourself that it was only a matter of time before Damon’s forces found the meeting point on the coast. It’s gotten too big to remain hidden.’

‘I did, but I was more concerned with increasing evacuations to try and save as many as we could before he brought the hammer down.’ James answered, wondering if he was at fault somehow. He’d certainly never viewed the fleeing masses clamoring for a spot on his plane as a threat, he’d only ever wanted to help those in need.

Moreover, he thought it was dangerous to start viewing them as a security risk. But when he considered it, truly thought back on the hundreds of flights which all seemed to blur together, he couldn’t say whether or not he may have missed something – or someone. ‘Have you checked the registration lists at the camp?’

‘For what exactly?’ Roger inquired, rubbing his jaw. ‘A spy is hardly likely to write ‘hail Damon’ on his entry forms.’

‘Well almost all the refugees are women and children, the only men who are fleeing have families to protect.’ James explained, thinking out loud. ‘The rest are staying behind to join the resistance. I can’t recall any single men boarding my flights, but if there are any registered at the camp, they would be my prime suspects.’

‘And if the spies are women?’ Roger countered, arching a brow. ‘It’s not impossible, but when has Damon ever hired she-wolves as anything but sex workers?’ James shrugged, ‘Knowing him, he would laugh at the very idea of a woman spy.’

‘You may have a point there.’ Roger conceded, making a mental note to review the registration records.

‘What do you suggest for security in the meantime?’ James probed, wondering if the Beta would have the gall to suggest screening at the coast. Roger read the other wolf’s expression with ease. ‘How bad is it, at the pickup point?’

James arched a brow, "How are you on planes?" "As long as I don't have to fly one I'll be fine." Roger reasoned, already guessing what the pilot was about to suggest.

James smiled. "Then come and see for yourself. I could tell you, but it wouldn't be the same. And if you're going to advise Dominic about this, you need to have first hand experience."

"Then you've got yourself a copilot." Roger accepted, "When do we leave?"

"Five am." James looked towards the door, no doubt thinking of his next destination. "I have a visit to pay in the meantime."

"Uh-huh." The Beta grinned. "A certain she-wolf with legs for days and a vicious growl?"

James only laughed, "Something like that."

A little while later he was striding into the nursery. Pups immediately raced to greet him, and as much as he enjoyed seeing their happy faces – especially after witnessing the fear and sorrow they'd worn when they first arrived here – he only had eyes for the beguiling she-wolf who watched over them. His eyes flew to her like a magnet, only drifting elsewhere when he realized her arms were empty for once. He quickly spotted a sweet bundle snoozing in a nearby crib and, heart swelling, he allowed his eyes to return to the willowy beauty at the rear of the hall.

As the pups self-appointed guardian angel, Isabel was aware the moment a new wolf entered her territory, but for once she didn't look up to investigate the interloper. James knew she was already so accustomed to his scent and the children's moods that she recognized him without looking. Still, she refused to look his way, but the hardened soldier only grinned.

He prowled forward, breathing in her wonderful scent and relishing the spike of excitement in her blood. Silly mate, who does she think she's fooling. His wolf purred in his ear, more than a little amused by her cold shoulder.

She needs time. James reminded him, reveling at how quickly and completely his spirits had rallied at the mere sight of her. Her heart sped up as he neared, and the steady beat in his own chest changed to match its melodic rhythm. "Hello Isabel." He greeted her, not stopping until they were almost touching.

Isabel jolted slightly, as if she was so busy trying to cope with his sudden proximity that she wasn't prepared to hear his deep voice as well. Her bright gaze flitted up to his before retreating again. "Hello." She answered, turning her back and making herself busy folding laundry.

A lock of auburn hair had fallen loose of her messy bun, and it trailed along the curve of her neck – tempting him. He caught the silken tresses between his thumb and forefinger, toying with the soft strands.

Goosebumps rose on Isabel's neck, and the hair on her nape stood on end. He was tempted to lean forward and kiss her, instead he simply let her feel his warm breath against her skin. "How's our girl doing today?"

"She's perfect, as usual." Isabel answered tritely, trying and failing to smother a shiver as his other hand grazed her waist. Apart from a single kiss at the height of her turmoil over adopting Sadie, James hadn't pushed Isabel to act on their chemistry. Sure, he wrangled the stubborn wolf into a cuddle every now and then, but when it came to true romance the soldier was determined to make her come to him.

He deliberately brushed against her as he shifted to the crib where Sadie slept, an incandescent and entirely unintentional smile taking over his features as he laid eyes on the little girl. The infant was sound asleep with her arms and legs splayed wide, a peaceful expression on her tiny face. He couldn't stop himself from reaching for her, even though Isabel's sharp whisper attempted to halt him. "What are you doing! You'll wake her!"

"Oh ye of little faith," He murmured, lifting the slumbering bundle into his arms. Sadie didn't stir, and James rocked her back and forth, wondering if any pup had ever looked so sweet.

Isabel huffed, but sidled closer to study the child. "You're lucky, you should never risk waking a sleeping baby – no matter how cute they are."

"But no baby has ever been this cute." James expressed, ducking his head to kiss Sadie's downy head. "I'd have to be a monster to resist her."

"Every baby is this cute when you love them." Isabel corrected him, sounding far away even though she hadn't moved an inch.

James searched her lovely features, immediately seeing the love and longing in her blue eyes. Cradling Sadie in one arm, he reached for Isabel with the other, sliding his big hand around her waist. "And you? How are you doing today, little wolf?"

"Fine." Isabel replied curtly, squirming a bit in his hold. When James continued to intently stare at her, she added. "You shouldn't look at me that way."

"Why not? I've had a bloody wretched day. All I want to do is hold my Sadie bug and look at you." He professed, his lips curling into a smirk, "Well, that's not all I want to do, but I have a feeling it's all you'll let me get away with."

Isabel narrowed her eyes, but leaned into his warmth despite her sullen mood. "Why has your day been so hard?"

"Just pack stuff. Things I really don't want to think about right now." He revealed, dropping his head to the curve of her neck and breathing in her scent. Some of the knots in his stomach untangled as her fragrance washed over him, making his conversation with Roger feel like it was a million miles away.

"Well, if you want to think about something else," Isabel began hesitantly, sounding uncharacteristically nervous. James raised his head at the shaky tone, and Isabel's courage fled. She backed out of his hold, wringing her hands.

She'd thought a lot about the question she was about to ask, and every time she convinced herself it wasn't appropriate, her inner wolf pitched a fit. The stubborn creature insisted that, appropriate or not, it was right. The canine was certain James would agree, but Isabel wasn't sure... or perhaps she was afraid he would agree, and she wasn't sure what that would mean for them.

Throwing her doubts aside, she forced the words out, staring at her feet rather than meeting the intimidating pilot's piercing gaze. "I've decided that it's time for me to truly claim Sadie as my daughter... and I thought you might like to do the same?"

Chapter 221 – Summit begins

3rd Person

James froze, staring at Isabel in shock and amazement. “Are you serious?” He inquired, not wanting to get his hopes up in case it was all a jest, or some strange test.

Isabel only flushed, starting to backtrack. “I... well, I just thought... I mean She stammered, looking anywhere but at him. “I’m sorry, it was a silly idea. You’re just so fond of her, I don’t know what I was think-”

“Of course I want to.” James interrupted, wanting to hold her so badly it hurt, but settling for a firm hand on her shoulder. “Goddess Isabel, I’d love nothing more.”

“Really?” Isabel squeaked, a tremulous smile stretching across her features.

“With all my heart.” James confirmed, pinning her with a fierce gaze. “But I do have to warn you.”

“About what?” She asked, going still.

“I’m not going to settle for Sadie alone.” James informed her sternly. “I want you both. I was prepared to wait -to fight for you – but you need to understand that letting me bond with her this way will change things. There will be no getting rid of me now.”

Isabel trembled slightly, peeking up at him from beneath her lashes. Her expression was somewhere between sullen and amused, “Was that ever an option?”

“No,” He chuckled, “but now that I know you realize it, I’m afraid I’m going to make things very difficult for you.”

Isabel flashed her fangs, but light sparkled in her eyes as she issued her own challenge. “Right back at you. It’s not going to be easy to win me, James.”

The soldier only grinned, at last pulling her into his arms. She didn’t come quietly, but once she was there she melted into him – a perfect fit. “Don’t I know it.”

The next morning, Cora was getting ready for her shift in the medical tent when she heard a few of the Vanaran nurses gossiping. “They’re increasing the evacuations, but I think they’re worried about more than simple detection by Emperor shit-for-brains.”

Cora smothered a snort at Damon’s unflattering nickname. She wasn’t usually one to eavesdrop, but neither did she see the harm in listening to this conversation – after all it’s not as if it was personal. Besides, as Ella’s eyes and ears in the camp, part of her job was getting a sense for the climate among local staffers and refugees alike. The others only saw her as a medical trainee, but the Luna had realized the value of having her sister on staff here early on.

“Why do you say that?” The second nurse inquired, unpacking her own supplies.

“Because they’re not only sending guardians and enforcers this time.” The first replied, in the tone of someone quite pleased to be in the know. “My friend in aviation saw the manifests and apparently the new Moon Valley Beta is headed out on the first transport this morning.”

“Oh, the handsome one?” The second questioned, “Roger?”

Cora froze, suddenly extremely interested in the woman’s response.

“That’s right.” The first she-wolf nodded, “And with as many people as they’ve already lost, I can’t believe the Alpha would risk sending his brother without a damned good reason. Especially not with the summit kicking off later today.”

Cora dropped what she was doing, swinging her gaze to the clock mounted on the wall. It was four forty five, and if she remembered correctly, the first flights departed at five. She raced out of the tent without a second thought, knowing she was probably causing a scene, and not caring.

She darted out of the main camp and headed straight for the airfield, not thinking about what she was doing or why. She acted on pure instinct, driven forward by the relentless pounding of her heart. When Cora reached the tarmac she searched for Jame’s plane first. He was the most experienced soldier and the highest ranking pilot, so he was the most-likely candidate to ferry the pack’s Beta across the ocean.

Her eyes landed on the two familiar figures just as they left the hanger and began approaching the aircraft, their bearing tired but alert. She set off at a run, and when she was within shouting distance, she called out to Roger. He turned immediately, genuinely surprised to see the woman hurtling towards him.

He caught her by the arms before she could barrel straight into him, “Cora!” He asked urgently, “What is it, what’s wrong?!”

Unused to running for any distance, Cora bent double, trying to catch her breath. Roger leaned over her rubbing her back, “Easy now, it’s okay, you caught me. Just breathe.”

“I... you- why...” She gasped, frustrated with her inability to handle the brief exercise, “oh my god, why do people run for fun – this is the worst!”

Sensing that no one was in immediate danger, Roger relaxed slightly, taking full advantage of the opportunity to soothe her. "I've got you, just take a minute. I'm not going anywhere."

"Liar!" Cora accused breathlessly, pointing a finger at him. "You're... flying back... to the continent."

"I meant I'm not leaving right this second. James still has to get the engines warmed up. Come here," He guided her over to the rolling staircase leading up to the plane, "Sit down." He instructed, easing her down onto the steps and kneeling in front of her, "What's going on?"

"Why are you going?" Cora managed to demand, her eyes wide and worried.

"I need to see the situation on the ground. There's a lot of security concerns and I can't very well address them if I don't see them for myself." Roger replied, still not understanding her panic, "Why what's going on?"

Cora sighed in exasperation, unable to comprehend her own irrational reaction. "Nothing, I just... it's dangerous isn't it?"

Roger shook his head, preparing to tell her that he would be perfectly safe. However, before he got the chance, the pieces of this sudden puzzle clicked together in his mind. He realized that Cora was here for him, for no other reason than that she'd heard he was leaving and was frightened for his safety.

His eyes lit up, as he took her cheek in his large hand. "Cora?" He prompted slyly, "You're not worried about me, are you?"

"What?" Cora snapped, thoroughly affronted. "Of course not. I just..." She trailed off again, looking confused. The big wolf almost felt sorry for her – almost.

"Just what?" He arched his brow, "voluntarily did more cardio than you've done in a year to demand why I was leaving? Abandoned your duties to run over here, shouting my name like your life depended on it?"

"It wasn't like that." Cora replied haughtily, finally calm enough to breathe normally. She sat up and pushed his hands away, trying not to think about how nice they'd felt on her skin. "I thought maybe you two needed medical support." Roger could see her making up the words as she went, getting more firmly behind the idea as it came together in her mind. "Yeah, I thought you might be going because something had happened and emergency personnel would be helpful."

"And it didn't occur to you that we would have requested medical staff if we required them?" Roger countered skeptically.

"What can I say, it's very early, I guess my brain isn't entirely turned on." She shrugged, digging her heels in. "so, do you need a doctor to come along? Just in case?"

Though he was enjoying her performance, the suggestion of taking Cora along for the flight aroused his wolf's protective instincts. Before he could get a handle on his inner animal, he'd growled, "Not a chance."

Cora's chocolate gaze sharpened, "Why not, if it's so safe?"

Her suspicion returned the smile to Roger's face, "You don't have anything to worry about, little one. I promise I'll come back to annoy you. If you like, I'll even stop by the medical tent as soon as we land."

Cora scowled, "Don't call me that." She shoved at his hand when he reached for her again. "I already told you, I don't care about your safety. And the last thing I need is you interrupting my work again."

"Are you sure?" Roger posed, "Maybe you should give me a goodbye kiss before we take off, just in case."

The human's lip curled, and she began putting distance between them, "I would rather kiss a rabid bat."

Roger grinned, giving chase. "Now how can you know such a thing without putting it to the test? I'll tell you what, kiss me now, and when I come back I'll bring you a bat to compare. But I'd be willing to bet my bite is the nicer of the two."

"I said no!" Cora glared, holding out an arm to keep him at bay, "there will be no kisses and no biting."

"Come on, Cora, don't knock it until you've tried it." Roger teased, still tracking her.

With an exasperated groan, Cora spun around and began stomping back to the medical tent. Roger watched her with a wide smile, but he kept his next thought to himself. I could watch her stomp away from me a thousand times, as long as she keeps coming back.

Chapter 222 – The Summit Begins

Ella

Warm hands trail over my bare skin as I come awake, tracing the curve of my belly, outlining the shape of my breasts. Sinclair's perusal is slow and steady, not meaning to arouse, but merely explore. My back is flush to his chest, and his broad shoulders offer endless support for my aching spine.

His warm voice rumbles in my ear, but I quickly realize he's not talking to me. "The cities were magnificent." He declares in a quiet, almost reverent tone. "I wish you had been able to see them, but I promise I'll take you some day – you and your Mommy. They had things I never even imagined were real: entire territories powered on Vanarium with no need for fuel, and cars that can transform into boats or aircraft in the blink of an eye."

"Your Uncle Gabriel is clever but he's a bit old fashioned too – some of his Alpha's are much more interested in showing off their innovations than celebrating their history." Sinclair continues to caress my tummy as the baby flutters in response – not understanding his father's words, but loving the sound of his voice and not wanting it to end.

I don't want Sinclair to stop either, so I pretend I'm still asleep. At the same time, my bladder is screaming for me to get up, and my rumbling stomach isn't far behind. "When you grow up we're all going to be living in a very different world," my mate continues. "It's exciting to imagine how far society and technology will have come... and daunting too. But there are some things that are truly timeless – and I'll teach you all about them. How to control your power; how to hunt and survive in every kind of climate; how to track a target and fight as both man and wolf."

Sinclair pauses thoughtfully, and for a moment I think he's onto me, but then he carries on as before. "How to trust your wolf's instincts and lead with your heart and your head as well as your strength." A gravelly note enters his deep bass, and suddenly I feel sharp fangs are scraping across the curve of my neck, "How to know when you've met your mate, and what to do with her when she makes mischief – like pretending to be asleep so she can eavesdrop on your conversations with your pup."

I gasp and giggle as his fingers begin tickling my sides, the sensations taking over me before I've finished processing his words. My eyes snap open and I try to wriggle away from the sly wolf, who grins down at me triumphantly. "Did you really think I couldn't tell, trouble?" He croons, nibbling my shoulder as his wolf's voice chants Mine in my head.

Joy blooms in my chest in response to my mate's playful mood – he so rarely gets to be silly, even though it's one of my favorite aspects of his personality. I don't want the fun to end for either of us, but the persistent pinching in my lower abdomen is only growing sharper the more I laugh.

“Dominic stop! I have to pee!” I squeal, still trying to escape his hands.

“You should have thought of that before, little wolf.” He teases, laughter vibrating in his chest. “You’ll never get away from me now!”

A tiny trickle of urine escapes me, and I start to truly fear I might wet the bed. The Nest! My wolf cries anxiously, Not my nest! It will ruin it! Sinclair senses my panic and finally lets up, helping me find my feet and sending me off to the bathroom with a playful swat on my – still sore – behind. I yelp but rush off, and when I finish my business and return, I pin my mate with my fiercest glower. “I hope you know I won’t ever forgive you if you make me sully my beautiful nest.” I growl in warning, poising my hands on my hips. “my bladder control is hanging by a thread and it’s only going to get worse as the pregnancy progresses.”

Sinclair frowns, considering the ruffled pillows and disheveled blankets – evidence of his crime, even if it was a close call. “I’m sorry baby, I wasn’t thinking about the nest.” He confesses, rising from the bed and reaching for my tightly wound body. “I got a bit carried away. I just love hearing you laugh.”

Sulking, I reluctantly allow myself to be cuddled, but I don’t relax against him until he begins purring. “Well I like laughing with you, and I liked hearing you talk to Rafe.” I pout, “it doesn’t count as eavesdropping when the person you’re talking to lives inside me, you know.”

“I know.” He croons, in a sympathetic tone which tells me he senses exactly how vulnerable I’m feeling. “Poor little mate, I wasn’t playing fair.”

“It’s okay.” I sigh, nuzzling his chest and breathing in his beloved scent. We stay like that for a long moment, simply holding one another, stealing yet another moment in the midst of the chaos ahead.

“Are you ready for today?” Sinclair asks after a while, referring to the imminent summit.

“Not really.” I confess. “I’m not sure what to expect. I remember some of the details you shared about your visits, but there were so many. Besides, the delegations are so large I’m going to need a cheat sheet just to keep them all straight.”

“Gabriel and his staff are going to be our living cheat sheets.” Sinclair shares, not sounding nearly as worried as I feel. “It’s too much for any one person to keep track of and anyway, I didn’t even make it to all the packs. Some of these meetings are going to be happening completely cold, and it’s entirely likely that the bombing undermined or altered the conversations I did have.”

“You think they’ll be less likely to help us if they think our presence here threatens them?” I guess, knowing I should start getting dressed – or at least feed myself, but not wanting to move from my mate’s embrace.

“That’s a very real possibility, and the situation with the secrecy pact isn’t helping.” He replied, sounding tense. “I’m not sure we shouldn’t have called them all to the summit cold – too much has changed since I set out on my trip.”

“As far as I’m concerned, I don’t think investing more time and effort in building relationships is ever a mistake.” I offer, kissing one of his muscular pecs. “At least they know what you stand for and how you operate, and you have a stronger sense of their characters.”

Sinclair purrs in appreciation, kissing my hair. “I just hate to think we might have wasted valuable time. It kills me how long this is taking.”

“It’s only been a month.” I remind him gently. “It seems like ages because you feel every single loss of life on your own conscience, but most wars are years in the making. You’re doing everything you can, Dominic. And your dedication is what makes you such a great leader.”

“Even if I steal long afternoons to lie in bed with my mate and pleasure her into a coma?” He jokes, nipping my earlobe.

“Even then.” I grin against his shoulder, only the smallest doubt slipping into my thoughts. “Do you regret it?”

“I agonize over every second I don’t spend on the war.” He admits, “But I know it’s necessary to keep myself going, and I also wouldn’t trade that time for anything.”

“Good.” I proclaim, squeezing him even more tightly than before. “Me neither.”

A little while later I’m standing in one of the King’s opulent sitting rooms, touching up my hair in the mirror. Cora enters and scans the room with an eagle-eyed gaze. It seems like she’s searching for something, but her face falls when she completes her study, her eyes coming to a stop on me.

“Do I look that bad?” I quip, wondering if she’s not looking for a certain handsome Beta.

She blinks and adopts a smile. “No, you look wonderful.” She expresses, gesturing to my floor length maternity dress. It’s more formal than anything I would normally wear, but I have to admit the fabric is divine and I feel free and confident in it.

Sinclair, Henry, and Gabriel enter then, and my sister swings her eyes to the new arrivals, looking hopeful once more. Again she seems disappointed, and I feel slightly giddy with the knowledge that she's definitely not as indifferent to Roger as she lets on.

"They're about half an hour out." Gabriel announces, looking around at our small group with approval. "My chief of staff assures me that everything is ready, so it's just a waiting game for now."

"But we aren't all here yet," Cora objects, blushing. "Are we?"

Sinclair exchanges a knowing look with me. "My brother will be here shortly, apparently the refugee transports just landed a little while ago."

"Has he had time to give you a report yet?" Henry inquires curiously.

I smell Roger a moment before he walks in, and I watch with avid interest as Cora jolts then turns away as the door opens, pretending to be oblivious to the man's arrival. "I'll give it now." Roger says by way of greeting. "And I'm afraid it isn't good."

"Tell us." Sinclair instructs him, extending an arm to me. I oblige, not minding the bossy summons because I know it's a sign of his worry. So I cross the floor and sink into his lap just in time for Roger to deliver the news.

"It's absolute chaos." Roger sighs, pulling out his phone and hitting a few buttons. Suddenly images appear on the television screen, and my heart plummets as I see the endless crowd of shifters swarming the transport planes. "There's too many of them, and not enough of us. Any concept of security is impossible in the current state. Getting the process organized would mean sending in troops, and I have a terrible feeling that this is exactly what Damon is waiting for."

We're still trying to grapple with the scale of the crisis when bells begin ringing through the castle, signaling the end of our discussion – no matter how urgent it remains.

The Alphas have arrived.

Chapter 223 – Welcome feast

Sinclair

The entire capital seems to have turned out to welcome the delegations from around the continent, for beyond the palace gates there is a sea of excited onlookers, clamoring to watch the parade of Alpha's approach the summit.

Gabriel and I lead our party down the palace steps to await them, and though our group is small, we're surrounded on all sides by guards and courtiers. Servants gather just out of sight, ready and waiting to rush forward and collect the traveller's bags or do their bidding.

I keep Ella tucked under my arm, watching as the first delegations begin to stream in. Though none of the visitors have done anything too extravagant, given the somber tone of the event, they've certainly gone out of their way to show off their power and wealth.

The flood is dressed to the nines, driving their most luxurious cars and flanked by their fiercest looking men. Vanarium gleams everywhere the eye can see, and I have to squint against the glare of the metal in the hot sun.

It appears they all want to show off, but their reasons are undoubtedly varied. Some of the war's opponents probably want to rub their prowess in our faces – to show us what we can't have. Others are doubtless trying to curry favor with their king, or simply win a leading role in the battles to come.

However no matter their motives, I see all eyes gravitating to Ella. They stay glued to her in a way that betrays their curiosity and admiration, and suddenly I wonder if they aren't showing off for her sake.

We greet the Alphas, their families and Betas one by one – first Gabriel, then Ella and me. They bow for us all, but none so deeply as for Ella, the one wolf among us who was not voted into power, but chosen – created by the Goddess herself.

A new hope sparks in my chest, a prayer that my mate's heritage might be enough to overcome our recent challenges. I always knew she was going to be my secret weapon – right from the very beginning – but I hadn't expected everyone else to recognize it so quickly.

The welcome process takes the better part of the afternoon, but finally every delegation is settled in their suites, and their staffs dispersed among the palace. Ella is practically sleeping on her feet by the end, leaning her slight weight into my side and resting her cheek against my chest, sweet sighs falling from her lips. I carry her inside for a brief nap before dinner, but she wakes fresh and eager to get to the feast.

It's a good thing too, because the event isn't the apolitical meet and greet we'd originally planned. Instead the Alphas dive straight into discussions of the war, and as enamored as they may have been to meet a living demigoddess, the consensus is far from supportive.

"Alpha Dominic, we were all extremely concerned when we heard of the attack on your convoy and we're beyond relieved that you're alright." The Storm Forest leader begins. I sense the 'but' coming already, though it's no surprise – I'd feared this Alpha would pose difficult. "But the fact remains the incident proved your war is already bleeding over into our territory."

"It's not my war." I correct him coldly, ignoring my food and leaning back in my chair. "It's all of ours – all shifter kind." I glance around at the others, trying to gauge their reactions and finding a room full of poker faces.

Surely you don't believe Damon will be satisfied with conquering one continent, especially not if all his subjects flee here."

"We can deal with Damon," The FrostFang leader interjects, brushing off this concern. "Or leave him for the humans to crucify."

"Dominic, we know you came to us looking to novelxo rally support, and we applaud your determination to return home and defeat the Usurper – it's what any good leader would do." The White Claw Alpha commends." However you must recognize that things have changed since the Secrecy pact broke.

"You aren't wrong when you say this war belongs to all shifters now – but it's not because of the threat Damon poses," The Black Alder leader proclaims evenly. "It's because of the human threat. Every shifter on the planet is at risk now, so we have to look beyond the tragedys in your homeland and think about the future of our entire kind."

"He's right." The Midnight Alpha adds, "A war is short sighted. Even if we win against Damon, it would only be a temporary fix, a distraction from the human problem." Ella shifts uneasily in her chair, and I can sense her displeasure with this framing. "At this point it makes more sense to brace for all shitters coming here, rather than funding a war that will only lead to more strife if you manage to win." 2

"That's ridiculous." Gabriel assets, "every shifter in the world cannot possibly be accommodated in Vanara – and even if they could, it would only be a matter of time before the humans began searching for us."

"Then let them search, they've never found us before." The Storm Forest leader scoffs.

"They've never known we existed before." The King reminds him, a warning note in his voice.

At that point, a silken voice pipes up beside me. “Not to mention the damage which would be done to the human communities left behind.”

Every eye in the room turns to look at Ella, and Goddess love her, she stares back at them with unflinching determination. I don’t know a single she-wolf alive who could stare down this room of intimidating wolves, but Ella doesn’t even bat an eye. When no one says anything, she continues, “I’ve been amazed ever since I arrived in this land – from the freedom your people are privileged enough to enjoy, to your technologies and advancement. It’s truly remarkable, but I wonder how many of you have spent time in our homeland?” She asks, resting her hand over mine.

No one moves or speaks, and I wonder if they’re merely stunned she interrupted them, or confused by her statement. Again she forges on, not waiting for permission. “What you must understand is that our worlds are completely intertwined.

There is no separating the human and shifter economies – everything is interdependent. All the businesses, the industries and stocks – the only things which truly remain separate are the governments. Humans and wolves live side by side, even if they did not previously realize it.”

“Is there a point to this?” The Storm Forest leader inquires, earning himself a growl from my wolf. The others look chastened, but Ella only kisses my cheek, “It’s okay, my love.” She tells me, before turning back to them. “What do you imagine will happen if one third of the societies around the world suddenly disappear?”

She inquires, ‘Your territories may be hidden, but they are not self-sustaining. You rely on imports and exports from across the globe. So if every economy, if every society other than yours collapses, what do you think will happen to trade and security? Are you prepared to take in millions of new citizens, just when all the international relationships you’ve built for centuries collapse?’

Her statement is met with potent silence, and I can see the Alpha’s reflecting on the undeniable truth she speaks. It was a calculated argument, and not the one I expecte from my mate – at least not entirely.

“Well what are we supposed to do?” The Silver Dawn leader demands. ‘The humans are already talking of pre-emptive strikes.’

“From their perspective nothing is preemptive.” Ella corrects him. ‘The first blows have already been stuck – the first hundred blows even. You forget that it is not only shifters suffering at Damon’s hands. Millions of humans are being displaced and murdered – they have every right to fight back, and it’s not their fault that they have no information about us or our perspectives to help guide them. It's ours. How are they to know we're not all bad, when everything they've seen of us has been horrific?"

'They have years of peaceful living as proof that it doesn't have to be that way.' The Wind River Alpha argues.

'That's not what it feels like to them.' Ella insists. "You've always known that both societies existed, so you can see the harmony we once struck. They are just finding out that everything they believed their entire lives was wrong, and it's happening right as the world explodes. That trauma would be enough to skew anyone's perception.

All these politics are games of guessing the intentions of others and forming misconceptions based on our own biases. So I'm telling you that your understanding of their view is wrong, we have to acknowledge and appreciate that if we have any hope of getting through this without dismantling society as we know it."

There's another pregnant pause, "So what do you suggest?" Gabriel prompts her, hiding a smile. "We've already reached out to some of their leaders, and we're waiting for a response. But I suggest that this summit should be the first of many. We need to send delegations to the humans, to show them that we are not all Damon. Hell, we ought to bring them here if they'll agree, let them see the suffering our own kind are experiencing. We have the same enemy – we need to show them we can be allies." Ella states, loudly enough for all to hear.

'That's madness,' someone mutters.

"Or genius." Another adds wryly. "Whether it's madness or genius, I guarantee it's right." Ella states confidently, offering them a Cheshire smile. "But you don't have to agree with me yet. I've got all week to wear you down."

The other Alphas exchange astonished glances, and the man beside me leans over to whisper in my ear, "Well you've certainly got a live one there.'

I chuckle, "And I've never loved her more.

Chapter 224 – Ella's Wolf Takes Over

Ella

I'm exhausted after the feast, but I know our work isn't yet complete. Roger hasn't finished his report about the refugee crisis back home and though I realize the situation is urgent, I'm not eager to discuss it. I feel like my heart and mind are maxed out on thought and emotion, so delving even deeper into these matters might just break me. Only my determination outweighs my dread, because I know I owe it to our people to bear witness to their suffering.

Sinclair is a steady presence beside me, and through our bond I feel his wolf fretting over my wellbeing. Stubborn mate, you should go up to bed. The bossy canine insists, and I see him in the shared space of our minds – nuzzling my wolf's neck and nipping her shoulder.

I want to stay with you. My wolf replies obstinately, leaning into his side and ignoring his foreboding grumbles.

Impossible thing, his wolf croons, offering me pure indulgence until a sidelong glance comes my way. You know there used to be a time when people were afraid of me.

Oh hush, people are still afraid of you. My wolf replies, circling around him and rubbing affectionately against his big body.

You're not. Sinclair growls, his wolf's dark muzzle quirking into a smile. His hawkish gaze follows my wolf as she winds around him, showing off her curves and lovely gold furr. You seem to have forgotten I'm your mate, and not your playmate. His voice is all deep foreboding, and I shiver with delight. My wolf does love it when he gets stern with us.

If it were up to me, his ominous tone and intimidating expression would be enough to still my restless energy. Unfortunately I'm worried about the meeting we're about to have, and my wolf is taking every excuse to distract us both.

I'm just happy you're home. She answers, swiping her tongue over his snout, then nudging her way under his chin.

Though we're still standing quietly side by side, I know Sinclair and I are both keeping a sharp eye on our wolves. They may not need actual space to interact, but if they don't calm down soon we're both going to end up shifting before we can get through this meeting. The next thing I know Sinclair's wolf has pounced in our shared conscience, and my gold fluffball is flat on her back, her little wolf feet dangling in the air. A deep chuckle rolls through my mind like thunder, spurring on my defiant inner animal.

She should be defeated, but my wolf only cocks her head and bats her lashes up at the lethal predator baring his fangs at her. Do you want me to be afraid? She inquires, writhing invitingly on the ground. I can run from you and hide and make a big fuss when you catch me. Flames spark in Sinclair's eyes, and I know he likes the sound of this. In fact this isn't so far from our role playing the other night, when I did all those things naked in a red cloak.

Naughty little wolf, I want you to stop flirting with me and settle so we can get through this meeting without me being forced to drag you out of here like a caveman. His wolf responds, sounding human enough that I know my mate has finally taken control of the feral creature.

And if I don't? I challenge, turning my body into his and trailing my hand up his chest, hoping the others won't see. What happens after you drag me out of here?

A true growl – not a secret rumble through our bond or some passive sound- tears from Sinclair's chest, and I know I've pushed him too far. I don't know what would happen, but I can tell you what's going to happen when we're done here and I guarantee you don't want to make things worse for yourself.

Electricity jolts in my bones, and my wolf finally relaxes, recentered by Sinclair's dominance. He eyes me knowingly as he pulls me into his lap, "come here you." He purrs, settling me on his thighs with a wolfish grin. "Enjoy sitting comfortably while you can."

I whimper softly, leaning into his chest and praying the other men didn't hear him. A hot blush burns on my cheeks as Sinclair strokes my spine, making soft rumbling sounds of contentment. Right on cue, Roger enters with James, and I think back, Thank you, reality – hoping sarcasm translates through our bond.

"Well, how was the grand feast?" James asks, sounding both genuinely interested and apprehensive.

"You'd know if you'd accepted our invitation." Sinclair replies easily, a distinct hint of amusement in his voice.

"I'm a soldier, I don't have anything to talk about with people like that." James counters, shrugging.

"What, rich people?" Roger quips, "I happen to think we're delightful."

"And politicians. They have a way of twisting the truth around until you can't even recognize it anymore. I don't like being told that things I can see with my own two eyes are wrong or don't exist, just because the reality is inconvenient." James answers seriously, his face pulled into a deep frown.

“Not all alphas are like that.” Gabriel sighs, sounding unsurprised.

“Oh no? Then your talks went well?” James inquires archly.

“They didn’t go much of anywhere.” I confess, smiling ruefully.

“That’s not true. I think you really got through to them about the humans.” Sinclair interjects, ever my cheerleader.

“Worry for their own economies got through to them, nothing else.” I remind him coolly, not wanting to let my ego inflate too much.

“Well we still have a week left to bring them around.” Henry reminds us.” Besides, they’re visiting the camp tomorrow, and the nursery. If that doesn’t tug on their heartstrings then nothing will.

“That might be more effective if we can actually guarantee everyone entering the hidden territories are refugees.” Roger says, “What are we going to do about the evacuations? How are we going to ensure security?”

“Did you find any suspicious names on the registration list?” Sinclair questions,

“Only five single men have entered the camps since our operations began. Three were elderly, the fourth is a resistance fighter who was gravely injured in Damen’s takeover. He lost an arm and was deemed incapable of continuing as a soldier.” Roger reports, listing off the details from memory.

“And the fifth?” Sinclair presses.

“At this point we’re assuming he used a fake name to register: Drake O’Dell. No one recalled seeing or speaking with him – even the intake team. No one has clocked him since the flight disembarked. He’s not in the camp, and even the other passengers on the plane didn’t seem able to remember him.” James shares, his face drawn and pale.

“So we think this is the guy?” Gabriel assesses, looking pensive.

“Well it’s precisely the profile for which we were searching, and it’s very concerning that this person came in on our transports then disappeared completely. If our operation were larger it might be expected that we’d lose track of a few people, but everyone else is accounted for.” James confirms, still looking wretched.

“So, we don’t even know what this wolf looks like?” Sinclair inquires, his hands tightening reflexively on my body.

“Luckily we do – we’ve taken photos of every refugee to enter the camp, so we can identify him if he returns, and we can send his photo to enforcers around Vanara – that way they can be on the lookout.” Gabriel explains, trying to sound hopeful.

“Do we have a copy?” Sinclair demands promptly.

Roger pulls a color image from his files, handing it to his brother. “Here.” He offers, “look familiar?”

Sinclair shakes his head, “If I’ve met this man I don’t remember him.

“Who was the pilot?” James asks, an odd note in his voice, “Who brought him here?”

Roger shares a grim look with his brother, answering the question without speaking a word. Neither man say a word, but the damage is done. James curses under his breath, then takes the photo, studying it fiercely. He pales, wincing as he shakes his head. “I really thought I knew everyone I brought here.”

“James, that’s too much pressure to put on anyway.” I tell him, trying and failing to scramble out of Sinclair’s lap. ‘You’ve brought thousands to safety, and as bad as things have gotten at the coast it would be impossible to notice one man among thousands.’ i

“My job is to protect our people,” James snaps back, “What if he’d decided to hijack the plane? Or bomb the camp?” No offense, Alpha, but we’re damned lucky he only went after you.”

Sinclair stiffens, and my wolf turns on the guilty pilot. I’m on my feet in an instant, moving so quickly that Sinclair can’t catch me this time. A snarl leaves my mouth before I can stop it, and then I’m stalking towards the soldier, my fangs outstretched. “What did you just say?”

Chapter 225 – Camp Visit

Ella

James is just within reach now, and my wolf can't help but think about how very biteable the soldier suddenly looks, in fact, he looks downright mouthwatering. There's a tender bit of flesh poking over the top of his belt, where muscle and fat stores combine to give the man his barrel-like build.

I could easily sink my fangs in there without inflicting permanent harm, not to mention it would hurt like hell. Then again... just in case I do want to do lasting damage... other much more vulnerable parts aren't so far away.

I've never had such bloodthirsty thoughts before, but I also don't question them – not after James suggested the attack on my mate was somehow fortuitous. "Lucky?" I repeat sharply, prowling closer now and trying to remember that Isabel would hate me if I truly hurt him.

"Lucky that he lost his Beta and closest advisors? Lucky that he almost lost his own life? Just where do you think this pack would be without him, was it luck that got all those refugees off the continent?"

"No it was me!" James argues back, his color rising. "I'm the one who's been going there every day and witnessing their tragedies. The other and pilots and I have been dealing with this madness all on our own, and now we don't only have to look out for armed attacks, but for spies too? It's too much!"

"And who gave you the planes and money to make the trips?" I counter, my hands on my hips. "Who gave you the other pilots, and a safe place to land? Who worked with Gabriel to give our people a second home here? Who arranged for the nursery where your own daughter now lives?"

I'm pacing now, and I can feel Sinclair hovering close behind me, prepared to reach out if I lost control of my wolf completely. "None of that was luck, James. That was all Dominic – all his sacrifices."

"As they should be." James hisses back. "That is the duty he bears, the oath he takes as an Alpha. What you do not understand about being a soldier is that no wolf, no matter how important, is worth the lives of innocent civilians. If it comes down to it, the Alpha should die protecting his people, rather than let them be hurt."

"Well he can't very well go back and hold up the entire front himself!" I burst, throwing my arms out in exasperation. I look to Henry, Gabriel and Roger to back me up, but they only watch in silence. "What would you have him do, James? Go home and set up his army between Damon and the refugees? So that the spies have to go through him first?"

"Maybe he should." James suggests simply, looking past me to my mate.

The taut leash I've been holding on my temper – and my wolf – snaps, and suddenly I'm lunging for the pilot with a vicious growl. A powerful arm catches me around the middle before I can sink my claws in James's handsome face, and a familiar voice purrs in my ear. "Easy now, trouble. James is right."

I swing around to look at him in outrage. "How can you say that, he—"

"Compared to what they might have attempted, we were lucky they only attacked a few high ranking wolves – wolves who were all combatants in this war, rather than civilians. I would always rather the target be me than one of my people. You know that, Ella." Sinclair replies gently. "And putting myself between Damon and the refugees isn't a new idea, baby."

"It isn't?" I inquire, my voice suddenly very small as I turn to look at him.

"No." Sinclair confirms grimly, "And we haven't done it because moving forward would take away our strategic advantage, access to weapons, and the time we need to plan a coup. But it wasn't an easy decision, Ella. I know that our people will hurt worse for the strategy, and when this is all over they'll be within their rights to hold me accountable for that choice."

"It was the only choice." I reaffirm, knowing he doesn't need my approval, but that it always helps. "You can't protect us if you aren't here. No one would begrudge you that."

You still ought to let me bite him. My wolf snipes as I glare daggers at James. No baby, no biting. Sinclair warns, pulling me close and breathing in my scent.

Come on, just a little one? I whine. He probably won't even feel it Sinclair looks as though he wants to smile. Then what would be the point? I think for a moment, adrenaline still pumping through my heart in over time. Vengeance

He chuckles deeply, kissing my neck, "I'm glad we're on the same page." Sinclair declares, and it takes me a minute to realize he's answering my last verbal statement, rather than my ferocious thoughts. "Dwelling on the past won't do us any good now. We need to figure out how to keep this from happening again."

"How, we can't exactly demand their ID papers like a commercial airline – most of them have lost everything but the clothes on their backs." James objects.

"We can send in troops, but that would be like an invitation to Damon." Gabriel adds, "Besides, I don't want the relief efforts to be militarized – it's a recipe for disaster

“Well we’ve got to do something.” Roger states soberly. “That video I showed you is nothing compared to actually being there.”

“He’s right – we can barely get the planes on the ground, let alone vet the people we’re bringing on.” James affirms, sounding pained.

“What about all the Vanaran’s technologies?” I ask, “They’ve got drones and state of the art weapons and who knows what else. Isn’t there some way we can do surveillance before our transports land?”

“The problem is that not every shifter is in our government databases, most of the IDs would be useless because most of the refugees aren’t known to us.” Sinclair explains with a heavy sigh.

“But it isn’t the unknowns we’re worried about.” I reason. “The soldiers working for Damon are all civil servants right? And if they aren’t, they’re rogues and scoundrels that have run into the law in the past. So between service and arrest records, we should be able to identify the majority of Damon’s forces with facial ID technology? Right?” I pose, wanting to make sure my logic is correct. “It wouldn’t catch everyone, but surely it’s better than nothing.”

“That’s not a bad idea.” Henry praises, nodding in approval. “Could we do it without further frightening the refugees? I’d hate for them to see the drones and think they were being attacked.”

“If we tell them beforehand...” James suggests hesitantly. “We’d have to be gentle about it so they knew we aren’t suspicious of them, just people pretending to be them.”

“That’s a really difficult line to walk.” Gabriel exhales, not sounding discouraged, but daunted. “Our pilots would need to be trained for striking that kind of balance. How do you interrogate someone’s identity without accusing them of being a spy?”

I can’t withhold a small snort. The men turn to look at me with raised eyebrows, and I huff softly. “By not assuming they are spies. You assume they’re innocent and hope you’re wrong, not assume everyone is guilty and then force them to prove otherwise.” I shake my head, “honestly, treat them with dignity and respect. Only investigate if you have a reason to be nervous, and otherwise trust that the others will sniff out any traitors among them.”

“Ella has a point. As long as our enforcers remember who the true enemy is, we can get through this.” Henry agrees, “ We just have to keep our heads on straight.”

“Alright, but we still need to increase evacuations. We have confirmation that Damon knows about our operation now. We need to either get everyone out at once, or change strategies.” Roger advises.

“I don’t think we should do anything just yet.” Sinclair sighs. “Damon will be expecting this, waiting for us to lash out in panic.”

“Maybe.” Gabriel purses his lips, “Do we even know who’s advising him anymore?”

“My sources say he’s gathered the most spineless of the continents’ elder councils – he gave them all the choice to serve him or die, so most of our elders are gone, and only the worst remain.” Sinclair explains gravely. “But they aren’t all idiots.” Silence meets this announcement, and though I might not have grown up among wolves, I can guess what a tremendous loss this is .

“And does Damon know you’re still alive?” Henry asks hopefully. “How fast is information traveling between here and home.”

“As fast as ever. By now I’m sure he’s heard.” Sinclair answers, giving me a squeeze.

“I wish there was a way for us to stay completely hidden until the time is right.” Henry groans, scrubbing a hand over his face.

“Well there’s one way.” Roger states stiffly. “We have to find Damon’s spy and get rid of them. Dominic I made it my personal mission to find the man responsible for the bomb, but I want to do more. Put me in charge of counter-intelligence. I want to root them out.”

“Roger you’re already my Beta.” Sinclair smiles, “the jobs don’t get any more important.” “This one does.” Roger confirms. “It’s my brother’s life, my new sister and nephew – it’s everything.”

Sinclair smiles. “Then the job is yours.”

Chapter 226 – Stress

Ella

After the meeting ends and Sinclair and I are safely ensconced in the privacy of our bedroom, I start to change out of my dress. No sooner is the delicate fabric pooled around my feet than my mate sidles up behind me, sliding his arms around my bare waist. “I can’t decide what made me prouder.” He rumbles in my ear, “Watching you put all those Alphas in their place about the humans, or seeing you go after James that way.”

I lean back against him with a contented sigh, turning my head so I can rest my cheek against his hard pec. “I don’t appreciate people criticizing you, when all you’ve ever done is serve and sacrifice for your people.”

He purrs, dropping his lips to the curve of my neck, “Leaders who can’t receive and accept criticism aren’t worth a damn, little wolf.”

“I don’t care.” I sniff, resting my hands over his where they rest on my belly. The baby is sleeping, but his heartbeat is strong and steady. “You don’t deserve to be treated that way.”

He chuckles, ‘Your wolf is really riled up, isn’t she?’

“Can you blame her?” I respond tartly. “After you’ve been gone for so long and then all of these cold-hearted alphas and the attacks? It would push anyone to the brink.”

Sinclair kisses his way down my shoulder while his wolf tries to appease my cranky canine in our shared mental space, lavishing her with nuzzles and kisses. “Such a feisty mate.” He praises, “Your spirit has always been one of my favorite things about you, but it’s not good for the baby for you to get so worked up. I can’t have you avenging my honor if it means putting stress on your body and the baby.”

“Well I don’t want to stress Rafe either.” I answer, feeling my mood swing abruptly, leaving me guilty and dejected. Tears well in my eyes and I stomp my foot in frustration, annoyed that I’m crying yet again and hating the Alphas and James for provoking my wolf. “It’s their fault, Damon and James and every one of those pack leaders who don’t give a damn about anyone but shifters. If they weren’t such assholes I wouldn’t be in this position.”

“I wasn’t blaming you, baby.” Sinclair croons, a steady purr vibrating against my back, “I know you can’t control being stressed. I just worry about you – now more than ever.”

“I feel so raw.” I confess, wishing I could hug him properly – without my baby bump getting in the way. “I can’t decide if I want to keep our pup safe inside me forever, or get him out so that my weakness won't be a threat to him anymore."

Sinclair goes very still, and then I'm being turned, his strong hands guiding my body to mirror his. He takes my face in his huge hands, and I gnaw on my lower lip, not wanting to look him in the eye. I don't think I can bare to see his disappointment right now. "Look at me, little wolf." He instructs firmly, and my gaze jumps up reflexively – even if it is blurred with tears. "Now listen to me very carefully." Sinclair continues, gentle but stern. "You are not weak. You are making a miracle in the middle of the apocalypse."

I snuffle pitifully, and his purrs renew. "You need to give yourself a bit of grace, sweetheart. I know that's easier said than done, but I won't accept that kind of talk." Sinclair declares fiercely, his deep voice full of emotion. "You are amazing. You are the strongest wolf I've ever met and this pup is so lucky to have you for a mother. Not to mention that I'm the luckiest man in the world to be able to call you my mate."

"But I can't even keep our baby safe and he's not even born yet." I counter, feeling myself begin to spiral despite his love and reassurance. Once again I'm caught in a current of emotion I can't control or escape, "And you can't focus on the war because I can't cope on my own and you're always comforting or worrying about me." i

Sinclair's purr roughens, and he unleashes his enormous power, letting it wash over me. "Our baby is going to be just fine -"

"You don't know that." I argue, piping up before he can get another word in.

"Maybe not, but you'd better believe I'm going to do everything in my power to guarantee it." He proclaims. "And If you think I could cope without you, you're out of your beautiful mind."

'You made it this far without me." I remind him petulantly.

"So did you." Sinclair answers. "We got through our struggles independently, because we didn't have another choice. We didn't know what the future would hold, and we survived so we could discover it one day. But we have each other now – so why would we ever try to go it alone? Having a support system only makes you more resilient, sweetheart. It's not something to be ashamed of." His lips caress my salty- streaked cheeks, kissing away my tears. "Would you ever be this hard on me or Cora, for letting you help us? Would you ever hold your worries for our safety against us?"

At last the combination of his tender touch, soothing sounds, steadying power and wise words take hold, and I feel the tension drain out of my body. I shake my head, my voice thick as I utter, "No."

“Of course not.” Sinclair murmurs, offering me a soft smile. “Now, on a scale of one to ten how exhausted are you?”

“Why?” I question suspiciously, recalling his sultry warnings when my wolf was flirting so outrageously before the meeting.

“Well, I thought we could have some fun.” He shrugs, a devious glint in his green eyes. “After I teach your mischievous wolf what happens when she tries to arouse me in public.”

“In that case, I’m much too tired.” I lie, even as heat pools low in my belly. Sinclair chuckles and shakes his head, flashing his sharp fangs in promise. “Nice try, baby. Have you forgotten I can sense your feelings?”

“Then why did you ask?” I exclaim indignantly.

“I thought I’d give you a chance to be good, but I should have know that was a lost cause.” He teases, pulling me in for a kiss. I start to protest but he silences me with his lips and tongue, and suddenly I can’t remember why I was so outraged a moment ago. Everything else disappears, and I melt into my mate’s arms, my heart pounding with excitement.

3rd Person

The nursery was dark by the time James made it downstairs, the pups all sleeping safely in their beds and cribs. He could hear Isabel’s heart beating slow and steady through her door, a clear sign that she was already asleep. He wanted to see her so badly it hurt, and though he’d made his intentions about her very clear, their relationship hadn’t advanced to the point where he could walk into her room and climb into bed with her.

Naturally, Sadie was also confined in Isabel’s room, and as much as James enjoyed seeing the other pups, it wasn’t the same as holding his newly bonded daughter. He was sorely tempted to barge into the room anyway – he was dead on his feet and on the verge of a mental breakdown. He hadn’t ever been so stressed in his life, and the only thing that could ease his troubles were the she-wolves on the other side of that door. James needed to see them, to hold them and be comforted by the fact that at least something was right in the world.

However as he pictured their serene faces poised in sleep, he knew he couldn’t disturb them. Instead James sunk onto the floor, deciding that listening to their sleepy sighs and gentle breathing would have to be enough. As if he’d willed it, Isabel’s heartbeat suddenly jumped and sped up as a light flicked on under the door. James’ spirits soared as the door swung open a minute later, and Isabel appeared.

“What are you doing?” She yawned, framed in the amber light of her doorway and dressed in a long silk night dress, her auburn hair loose and disheveled around her lovely face. James’ heart stopped and started again, butterflies fluttering in his stomach.

“I didn’t want to disturb you.” He stated honestly, not able to put the rest of his feelings into words.

Isabel crossed her arms over her chest. “Did you really think my wolf wouldn’t sense a strange man in here with my pups?”

James only smiled, loving her protectiveness. “I’m not strange.”

“Hmph, says the wolf sitting alone in the dark watching children sleep.” Isabel quipped, slowly approaching him. “Why are you still up?”

“We only just finished.” He explained, “and I wanted to see you and Sadie.”

Isabel narrowed her eyes. “What’s wrong?”

“It was just a very long day.” He answered, scrubbing a hand over his scruffy face. “I don’t really want to talk about it just now.”

“What do you want to do?” Isabel inquired, sidling nearer with obvious interest.

James huffed out a humorless laugh. “I’d counted on cuddling Sadie, I don’t suppose she wakes up much at night?”

“Thankfully not, but what about me?” Isabel asked, sounding mildly offended that he hadn’t considered her.

“Would you let me?” James countered, arching his dark brows.

“You’ve comforted me when I’m upset more than once.” Isabel replied simply.

“And if you recall you weren’t very happy about it.” James reminded her wryly.

“But you did it anyway – because I needed it.” Isabel added, moving to stand directly in front of him and extending one graceful hand. “Let me give you the same.”

James accepted her hand without hesitation, but rather than getting to his feet, he pulled Isabel down into his lap. She yelped in surprise but soon found her entire body surrounded by warm, firm muscles. Of course, once he was touching her, it was so much harder for Isabel to resist the burly wolf. She tried not to feel the affection and desire quickly overtaking her body, but she quickly realized she was fighting a losing battle. So just this once, she surrendered and lost herself in James' arms.

Chapter 227 – Visit to the Refugee Camp

3rd Person

The next morning Isabel woke to find James in bed beside her, fully clothed and quietly speaking to Sadie, who was snuggled between their bodies. Outside, the caretakers Isabel hired to help with the nursery were already getting the pups up and fed, so she let herself relax a while longer.

She peeked one eye open, trying not to think about how nice it would be to have James wrapped around her again. Sadie came first, of course, and she was excited to see her – but her wolf was struggling with her competing desires.

