“I don’t think it’s fair for anyone to be so cute you know.” James was saying, his fingers gently tickling her tummy. She grinned and giggled, wriggling and stretching her plump arms. “And that smile! It’s criminal. Don’t you know people will eat you right up if you show them that dazzling smile? I’m tempted myself, and I love you to pieces.”

Sadie babbled happily up at him, speaking her sweet baby language as joy and amusement pulsed through their nascent bond. “Oh no!” James said with theatrical horror. “I don’t think I can resist, Sadie bug. It’s just too much to bear. I’m going to do it! I’m going to eat you up.”

He lowered his mouth to her tummy, kissing her repeatedly and making exaggerated, “nom, nom, nom,” noises. Sadie squealed happily, and Isabel couldn’t feign sleep any longer. She opened her eyes fully, and found James watching her with a look of reverence and overwhelming affection. “Good morning beautiful.”

“Good morning.” Isabel mumbled, fighting the blush working up her neck and trying to pretend her insides hadn’t just turned to mush. She diverted her eyes to the baby between them. Sadie blinked her gorgeous wide eyes at her adoptive mother, and an incandescent smile stretched over Isabel’s features. “Hello my love.” She asked, running her hand over the pup’s downy head. “How long has she been up?”

“Just a little while ago.” James smiled. “She didn’t make a sound, just lay there like a little angel.”

“That’s because she is one.” Isabel informed him earnestly, noting that Sadie was already changed and wearing a fresh onesie. She reached through her bond with the little girl, but found she wasn’t yet hungry and felt perfectly content just as she was. Appreciation for James welled in her heart, because even though she’d known he would make a loving father and strong protector, not all Alphas are so eager to do the more tedious parenting tasks. “Thank you for letting me sleep in.”

“I figured you haven’t had the chance in a while.” He replied easily, reaching out to stroke her hair. She should have objected, but she couldn't bring herself to say the words. It felt too nice to be touched this way again, and for the first time since meeting her mate, Isabel truly considered what it might be like to make love to another man. She imagined James kissing her, stripping off her clothes and exploring her body with his hands and mouth. Much too quickly, her body began to heat up, and she forced those thoughts from her mind. The last thing she needed was for James to scent her arousal.

"When was the last time you slept in?" Isabel asked instead, genuinely concerned that he made this sacrifice for her.

"Today was sleeping in." James chuckled. "I've been doing five am flights for so long that even making it till now feels like a luxury."

Isabel turned to look at the clock, noting it was already seven. "What about today's flights?"

"Dominic ordered me to take the day off." James admitted with a frown.

"Are you worried how it will go without you?" Isabel questioned, sensing his disquiet.

He shook his head. "I know the other pilots can handle it." James paused, watching as Sadie rolled over and snuggled up to Isabel's breast with a sweet coo. "Oh I see how it is." He joked as Isabel reflexively circled her arms around the pup, cuddling her closer. "Now that Mommy is awake I might as well disappear."

"Nonsense, she loves you." Isabel smiled, trying to block out the sound of her wolf – who was currently demanding that she invite the pilot to hold them.

It turned out she didn't need to, because James's sly wolf immediately took advantage of the extra space between them. He shifted closer and looped an arm around Isabel's waist, the heat of his fingers searing the she-wolf's lower back through the thin fabric of her dress. A noticeable shiver raced down her spine, and Isabel glowered as James smirked. "Tell me why you aren't happy to have a day off." She deflected, trying to breathe in Sadie's pure scent without also taking in the soldier's enticing fragrance.

James sighed, "I know this isn't the case, but part of me worries that Dominic only gave the order because he thinks I've lost my edge." When Isabel looked confused, he continued, "Yesterday we found out that it was probably my fault that the spy who bombed his convoy got into Vanara. The working theory is that he disguised himself as a refugee and snuck onto one of my flights last week."

A beat of silence met his words, and for one horrible moment, James was terrified that Isabel would lose her interest in him. What good was he as a mate or father if he made such grave mistakes? If he couldn't detect lethal threats and endangered the very people he was meant to keep safe?

Instead, Isabel's face transformed from pensive to horrified. "He might have killed you! Do they think Damon is going to send more assassins this way? What if the next one decides to take over the plane? What if his army lies in wait at the coast and ambushes you?" Her panic was so swift and sharp that Sadie began to squirm and fuss, feeling the unpleasant feeling filtering down through their bond.

James's wolf was conflicted. He didn't like seeing Isabel upset one bit, but he certainly enjoyed seeing her so disturbed by the thought of harm coming to him. He began to purr, stroking her spine and pressing his chest to Sadie's back so she could feel the comforting vibrations. "You're not worried about me, are you little wolf??" He asked, only slightly smug.

As he'd hoped, the jibe snapped Isabel back to her usual self, and the frightened look in her brilliant blue eyes faded. "I'm not going to let my daughter lose another parent." She proclaimed sharply, tightening her grip on Sadie and adding her own soft sounds to the soothing efforts. "So help me James, if you make her lose you too, I will never forgive you."

"I have no intention of going anywhere, Isabel." James promised, grazing his knuckles over her cheek. "If someone wants to take me from you two they're going to have one hell of a fight on their hands. I won't go down easily."

"Going down isn't an option at all." Isabel corrected him. "If they try to lay a hand on them, you rip them the shreds and get out of there. Don't go doing noble things like turning back to save babies or..." She trailed off, her voice thick with emotion. She tried to cover it by kissing Sadie's head and averting her eyes, but James saw everything. 1

"Is that really what you'd want?" James questioned, the corner of his mouth quirking as he nodded to Sadie. "For me to leave a precious pup like this sweet muffin behind, just to save my own ass?" They were so close now that he could see the moisture welling in her eyes, and the near imperceptible quiver of her plump lower lip.

"I know I don't want you to die." Isabel replied grumpily, deciding that enough was enough. She started to get out of bed, but James stopped her, keeping her pinned with one strong arm.

"Because you'd miss me?" He suggested, the spike of adrenaline in Isabel's scent triggering his prey drive. His wolf was coming to the surface, and Isabel's was responding in kind. She was becoming more demanding, wilder and less manageable with every moment that passed.

“Because the pack needs you, and Sadie needs you.” Isabel answered fiercely. “Now let me go, I need to feed the baby and get everything ready for the visit this morning. The delegations will be here in a few hours and the nursery is always a mess after breakfast.”

“I’ll let you go.” James agreed, his eyes glowing now, “in exchange for a kiss.”

Isabel froze, looking remarkably like a startled rabbit. “Don’t be ridiculous.” She scoffs, again trying to rise.

“Come on, what’s the worst that could happen?” He tempted her. “You’ve kissed me before, and I seem to remember you enjoyed it quite a bit.”

“I was distraught.” Isabel bit back, “it’s not the same.”

“Oh I see.” James flashed his fangs, “well in that case we’ll just have to stay here all day and kiss Sadie bug instead.”

Isabel glared, and then an idea struck. “Can I decide where I kiss you?”

“Anywhere you like.” James agreed.

“Fine, then I want to kiss your hand.” She announced slyly, and James almost laughed. He knew exactly what Isabel intended, but he played along.

“Alright.” He extracted his arm from her middle, freeing her from her makeshift cage and opening the door for an escape. The moment his grip loosened on the she-wolf, she attempted to leap up with the baby. Of course, James was ready and waiting, so he jumped up with her and dragged her into his arms.

Isabel barely had time to register what had happened before James was dragging her mouth to his – one powerful hand on her nape, the other cradling Sadie’s head between their bodies. Isabel whimpered as their lips collided, all her defenses falling away. Her wolf howled happily in her head as James expertly claimed her, extracting breathless kisses from her lips over and over again – until neither one of them could remember where they ended, and the other began.

Chapter 228 – Roger Forges a New Bond

Sinclair

Sleeping with my pregnant mate is becoming increasingly challenging as her body grows with our pup. Even though Ella takes as many naps as the pups in the nursery these days, she's still exhausted by the end of the night and I'm not faring much better amidst all this stress and activity. Still, exhaustion isn't enough to get us off to dreamland when getting Ella comfortable enough to rest is a nightly struggle.

The nest is a blessing, as the incredible abundance of pillows surrounding her on all sides can easily be shifted and fluffed to perfectly cradle her precious form – the difficulty is figuring out where I fit into the cozy retreat. Most of the time Ella just treats me as an extra large body pillow.

More than once, I've woken in the middle of the night to find her sneakily trying to rearrange my limbs to her liking. Each time I've told her to simply wake me so I can help, or to turn the light on for her late night bathroom trips so she doesn't risk running into something or tripping in the dark. Of course, my instructions go in one ear and out the other because Ella feels too guilty to willingly rob me of my sleep.

This morning is worse than most, because I have to be up at the crack of dawn despite the fact that Ella managed to completely sprawl herself over my body last night. If it wasn't for my prior engagement, it would be picture perfect: she's on her side with her arms and legs tangled around my own, her round belly resting on my torso.

Her long rose-gold hair cascades over my chest, and her heartbeat is in perfect sync with the baby's. Rafe and Ella's sweet smells overtakes my senses, and my groggy wolf sighs with utter contentment.

I mentally curse this summit. The last thing I want to do is get out of this bed, shortly followed by waking the angel on top of me. I try to extract myself as carefully as I can, rolling her small body away from me and attempting to replace my mass with pillows. I almost manage it, but every time I manage to free one limb from her clutches, she latches onto a different part of me. Eventually she stirs and I emit a hushed swear, knowing the battle is lost.

"See is not nice waking your mate." She mumbles, her words slurred with speech as she nuzzles my bare chest.

"I'm sorry baby, I have to get up." I confess, kissing her her hair. "I have to meet with Roger before today's events get started."

Ella sighs, snuggling closer, "uh-huh." She sighs, her soft breath fluttering over my skin. "Stay."

"I wish I could." I answer honestly, once more trying to pry her determined paws from my body. "I'm so sorry little wolf, but you have to let me go."

"But you're my pillow." She murmurs. Her wolf begins whining pitifully in my head, which only upsets my own wolf and sends my temper spiraling further downward.

Exhaling miserably I make a third escape attempt, to no avail. "Goddess you're like an octopus, when did you get so strong?"

Ella's eyes stay closed as a glorious smile splits her cheeks. "I'm not. You just don't have the heart to deny me." She's right, I could easily overpower her and walk away, but that is a last resort.

I finally manage to get out of bed, but I'm in a right foul mood by the time I reach my brother's suite. To make matters worse, Roger has clearly slept through his alarm. The lights are off and I can hear a persistent beeping from the direction of the bedroom. Groaning, I bang on the door with my fist, not giving a damn how boarish I'm behaving. "Wake up!"

After some grumbling and fumbling around inside, the door swings open and Roger appears. He squints at me in the low light, looking completely baffled. "What crawled up your ass?"

"Damon. This war. The bloody delegations. Take your pick." I bite back.

Roger purses his lips and nods, "Fair enough." He swings his door wide and ushers me inside, yawning and stretching. "Care to tell me why you wanted to meet at this ungodly hour."

"I don't want to meet now." I growl. "There's just no other time." As I enter I notice that my brother's once impeccable rooms now look like the scene of some natural disaster. All the furniture is broken, now neatly leaned against the walls and leaving a huge empty space in the middle of the room. And though someone has clearly been sweeping, there is still a layer of dust and sawdust on the floor. "What the hell happened to your room?"

"I lost my temper." Roger shrugs, but there's an expression I don't recognize on his face. "It didn't feel right to have Gabriel's servants to clean up after me, so I've been trying to put it to rights slowly – but there's not much time." He waves the wreckage away. "It's not important, don't worry about it."

Abruptly, I recall my brother's ferocious energy when I returned from the storm forest pack alive and well. And without asking, I know exactly what caused Roger to lose his temper. I feel a deep pang in my chest, and without thinking I pull him into my arms, enveloping him in a bear hug. He tenses, but quickly relaxes into the embrace. It's an improvement from the hugs we've shared in the past – normally it takes him ages to accept the affection.

"Look at you, big brother." I tease in a saccharine voice, "you're learning all about feelings aren't you?"

"Oh shove off." He complains, pushing me away. "Enough of that, tell me what's going on!"

I drag one hand through my hair, "Listen Roger, obviously when a new Beta takes power under normal circumstances, there's a ceremony and celebration. I wish I could give you that, but everything is moving so fast and I need to be fully bonded to you before the summit really takes off."

Roger's lips quirk, "you're going to have me take the oath at five o'clock in the morning, without any witnesses, in a dark room when we're barely awake?"

"Can you think of a better way?" I question, hating that I can't honor him the way he deserves.

Roger laughs, and shakes his head. "Okay, how do we do this?"

I extend my fangs and raise my hand to my mouth, quickly slicing a gash in my palm. I use my left hand, because my right still bears the scar where I forged this bond with Hugo, and I can't bear to mark over it. Hot, sticky blood seeps from the wound, and I offer my bleeding paw to Roger. He follows suit, biting his own palm and letting the blood pool forth before taking my hand in his.

"We already shared blood, but the bond of an Alpha and a Beta goes beyond brotherhood." I declare, needing to make sure he's truly ready for this – to submit to me from here on out. He may have felt confident he could go through with this arrangement in the high emotions following my near death, but reality may seem colder now that the shock and grief have passed. "As my second in command, it will be your duty to support and balance my wolf. But it will also be your responsibility to carry out my orders, even when you don't agree -even when you think I'm being as dumb as a brick. You may advise, you may debate and I will always do my best to listen and understand, but at the end of the day my word is law."

"I understand, Dominic." Roger replies soberly. "I'm committed to serving you, as well as the pack."

"Thank you." I exhale, feeling that the worst is past. "You will be my right hand in all things, and the pack will rely on you as a cornerstone of our leadership. If anything should ever happen to me, it will be your obligation to take over from me until the Alpha Council confirms your permanent role, or another Alpha steps forward.”

“Assuming we ever have an Alpha council again.” Roger quips, earning a low growl.

“These oaths weren’t made with the apocalypse in mind.” I remind him. “Do you, Roger Sinclair, vow to always put the united packs before all else? To be loyal and just in all matters, to serve me and our people until your dying day?”

“I do.” Roger confirms.

“Do you vow to govern and protect the united packs, advise and inform your Alpha and Luna to the best of your abilities, further the aims and agendas of shifter kind, and always maintain the natural laws imparted to wolves by our Goddess?” I ask, recalling these words from very long ago. Already I can feel the magic beginning to take hold, sparking through our joined blood and entering our veins.

“I do.” Roger says again.

“Do you vow to take my place as leader should I perish or be otherwise incapable of governing, and to act as a mentor and guardian for my family, if there ever comes a time that I cannot?” I continue, deciding that it may be time for a new line in this ancient oath, one to address the tumultuous future we’re facing. “And do you vow to make these same commitments to non-shifters in our territories, should our societies unite?” Roger’s eyes widen only slightly. “I do.”

“Then I shall vow to always appreciate and respect your opinions, expertise and perspective. I vow to do everything in my power to help you be successful in all things, and to honor your service and sacrifice.” I profess.”

I vow to never ask you to do anything in opposition to these same values, or to put you in a position which might risk you and your family’s health, safety and happiness. I vow to always appreciate the demands and complexities of your role, and to care for you as you care for me.”

In that moment a searing pain pierces my hand, and white light fuses our palms together. I feel as though a grenade is detonating in my chest, as if my entire being might be torn to shreds with the intensity of these strange sensations. They end just as quickly as they begin, and when the rush of magic fades, I feel a new bond taking hold in my heart.

I’ve heard my brother’s voice in my head a thousand times in our wolf forms, but this is the first time we’ve ever communicated through this kind of bond, and I feel steadier and more connected to Roger than I ever have before.

Alright brother, let's get to work.

Chapter 229 – The Summit Continues

3rd Person

Roger watched the delegations warily approach the refugee camp, unloading from an identical convoy of shiny black cars parked at the entrance of the air field. Some appeared far more curious than others, keeping their expressions open and interested, if somber. A few Alphas however, most notably the Storm Forest and Midnight leaders, appeared as though they had no intention of letting the harrowing scenes ahead sway their opinions.

Even so, the new Beta could only focus a fraction of his attention on their mindset. He was far more preoccupied ensuring the airfield and camp were as secure as possible before the visit, and his wolf was always somewhat distracted when Cora was near. He'd yet to see her today, but he knew she was somewhere in the medical tents, her faint floral scent discernible through the cool morning air.

Maybe we should go ahead of the group, Roger's wolf suggested, to make sure everything is ready and do a final threat assessment.

And flirt with a certain stubborn human, since we probably won't get another chance today? Roger replied, sorely tempted by the idea but knowing he couldn't abandon his duty for such a frivolous reason.

It's a thought. The mischievous canine answered, we haven't spoken since yesterday morning. It would be a wasted opportunity when she's clearly warming to us. The beast is whining like a pup, and I have to fight the urge to roll my eyes. There's nothing more determined or impossible than a besotted wolf. Come on, he cajoles eagerly, wagging his tail. Think of how cute she'll be, trying to act all grumpy even though we can hear heart racing.

We can't – we can't afford to get distracted. I want to see her as badly as you do, but this isn't the time. Hmph. His wolf grumbled, spoilsport.

Roger glanced at the slow moving party behind him. The Alphas and their advisors were being led into the camp by the King, Sinclair and Ella. His brother kept his mate tucked safely under one arm as they approached the airfield. The planes were due to arrive any moment, and Roger knew they were all a bit tense for the first transport conducted without James's leadership.

Sinclair scanned the open area, his sharp gaze landing on his brother. At this short distance, there was no difficulty communicating through their new bond as Alpha and Beta. All clear?

So far. The entire camp has been swept and the pilots have all signaled imminent landing with no signs of trouble. I can either stay here to help with the disembarkment, or I can go ahead of the group with a few soldiers and act as an advance team. Roger offered, secretly hoping his brother would choose the second option.

So much for not getting distracted. His wolf scoffed.

I'm not saying it for Cora, I'm saying it because it's a valid tactical strategy and might be helpful. I'll only approach her if I have a good reason... otherwise I'll just look. Roger insisted, wondering if he was trying to convince himself or his wolf of this plan.

Look and touch?" His inner animal pleaded.

No! No touching, no scent marking, and certainly no kissing... or biting... or licking... arggggh this is useless!

What on earth is happening? Sinclair's deep and slightly amused voice drowned out Roger's tortured musings. You look as if you're short-circuiting. Have you had a stroke? He didn't need to say more. Roger could feel his left eye twitching, not to mention his hands were trapped in white knuckled fists and his jaw was clenched so tightly his fangs felt as though they might grind each other to dust.

Nothing important. We can talk about it later. Roger gritted out, What do you want me to do?

Oh, I know what this is about. Sinclair smirked, keeping his eyes on the approaching aircraft on the horizon. I meant to tell you, Cora was visibly anxious yesterday when you were late for the welcome event. She kept asking if everyone was there and didn't calm down until I explained you were back safely.

That is not the kind of information I need right now, Dominic. Roger growled.

Sinclair chuckled, Alright, I'm sorry. Stay here for now. Once the planes are down do me a favor and get eyes on all the refugees coming in. Our men are well trained, but this is James's operation and they've never flown solo before. If everything checks out then catch up with us.

Roger nodded, moving closer to their group, One more thing. Sinclair interjected, raking his cool gaze over their visitors. See if you can't get close to some of the other Betas. See if you can get a leg up on their packs ' needs and strategies, their Alphas' mindsets.

Oh so I'm a spy now? Roger inquired, not the least bit bothered.

I thought you might enjoy that role. Sinclair replied. And don't worry I'll talk you up to Cora if you're not with us when we get to her section. From what I've seen you need as much help as you can get.

Thanks, Roger thought wryly, trying not to think about the information his brother had just shared. Cora's anxiety was further confirmation of what he already sensed, and he needed to think about how to play this moving forward. Cora was stubborn and skittish for reasons that he both understood, and couldn't know unless she told him. She was also brilliant and beautiful and stop it... Roger hissed at himself. No distractions right now.

Of course, this became much more difficult once the arriving refugees had all disembarked and Roger joined the delegations on their meet and greets through the camp. He watched the Vanaran Alphas like a hawk, trying to assess their response to the suffering shifters in the camp. Luckily they all seemed very engaged, but Roger couldn't help thinking about the welcome feast.

They had two main hurdles to overcome – the first was making the Vanarans pledge their allegiance to the cause. The second, and much more challenging task, was dealing with the fallout from the broken secrecy pack. Thus, they already cared about shifters, so seeing the refugees might help forge alliances, but it wouldn't open their eyes to the bigger picture.

Soon enough they were in the medical tents, and then she was there in front of him – even more stunning than he'd remembered. However, not everyone was so impressed. “You have a human administering medical care? You've given her access to Vanaran technologies?” The Silver Dawn Alpha was aghast to find Ella's sister actually working in this place.

“And why not?” Cora asked, before Sinclair, Ella or Gabriel could reply. “I was already working in shifter medicine back home – at the highest level. My expertise is equal to that of any continental physician, so why shouldn't I continue practicing here?”

The Storm Forest Alpha shook his head. He hadn't been thrilled to learn Gabriel had allowed a human over their borders in the first place, and this was clearly a step too far. “Alpha what is the meaning of this?” He asked, the formal address not doing a damn thing to soften his sharp tone.

“If Sinclair's Luna wants to keep a human orphan as a pet that's one thing but this is proprietary technology, you can't just-”

That was a mistake. No sooner had the words left his mouth that both Ella and Roger surged forward with steam pouring from their ears, while Cora stood frozen in shock. Only the dual force of two terrifying snarls prevented the situation from coming to blows. Sinclair and Gabriel unleashed their power on the room, and everyone else winced in response.

“That was out of line.” Gabriel growled fiercely. “Do not forget you are a guest here, Kieran. You forget our origins – we are not alike in all ways, but the Goddess created us equal.”

“If that were true she wouldn’t have made the humans so weak and backwards.” The Alpha, Kieran argued. Roger scented salt, and was horrified to realize Cora was on the verge of tears.

“I have news for you,” Cora’s soft voice sounded behind them, and Roger was furious to see she was shaking. He moved beside her, and his wolf puffed up with pride when the scent of her fear faded in response to his nearness.

“Humans might not be as strong, fast or advanced as shifters, but that doesn’t mean we have no knowledge to contribute. You may think we’re brainless and backwards, but I’ve made scientific discoveries unknown to shifters and published groundbreaking research in top peer-reviewed shifter journals.

I have the intelligence and experience to help both of our kinds advance, and your prejudice – your exclusion – only holds you back. However far ahead of us Vanara is now, it would probably have an even larger lead if you considered perspectives and experiences other than your own.”

“Well-said.” The Black Alder Alpha, Callahan praised. “Get your head out of your ass, Kieran.”

Ella was trying to go to her sister, but Sinclair still seemed to fear she might attack the Storm Forest leader. He was probably right too, because her ravishing features were twisted with rage and she was wriggling against him like a fish out of water. Sinclair growled low and deep, combining the sound with a purr, and Ella calmed enough to draw in a few deep breaths.

“You should be ashamed of yourselves.” She finally hissed. “And I don’t only mean you, Alpha Kieran. I know he’s only saying what some of you are too cowardly to speak aloud. We called this summit to generate collective action against a dire threat facing us all.

As we already agreed, this war is not only Damon’s, it is not only shifters’, and Vanara can no longer escape the fallout by turning a blind eye the way you have been doing for so many centuries. Change has come and you cannot pretend otherwise.

You call yourself Alphas, but you sound like nothing but spoiled pups who don’t want to share their toys. Mark my words, if you keep up these racist, isolationist attitudes, you will destroy the way of life you so love, and cost the world dearly.”

As she spoke, Roger noticed that Ella truly seemed to be glowing. Not in the way pregnant women are supposed to, but in the literal sense, wherein radiant light shimmered around the Luna, as if she was lit up from within. Not only that, but her words carried a weight unlike anything Roger had ever felt – stronger even than Sinclair and Gabriel's devastating power.

The chastised Alpha's hung their heads and shuffled their feet, but a few looked as confused as Roger felt. They exchanged curious glances, but Sinclair only kissed his mate's soft cheek, and guided the group forward.

As the others moved on, Roger stayed behind with Cora. He didn't bother getting permission from Dominic, because not even an order from his Alpha could tear him away from her right now. "You were brilliant." He murmured gently. "Are you okay?" "No." Cora wouldn't look at him, "I'm not." i

Chapter 230 – Not Okay

3rd Person

Cora's eyes followed her sister's retreating back as the delegation exited. Ella kept looking back over her shoulder, concern and apology clear on her beautiful face. It was clear she wanted to stay, to talk about what had just happened and offer comfort, but her responsibility was to remain with the group. She mouthed "I love you" just before disappearing around the corner, but Cora could only manage a tremulous smile in response, 1

She wrapped her arms protectively around herself, all too aware of Roger's presence behind her. He was so close Cora could feel the heat radiating off his powerful form in waves, and it was all too tempting to imagine his arms around her. She didn't know why she'd admitted her hurt feelings to him, but she suspected it was the same reason she found his proximity so comforting. "You should go ahead," She tried to say, "they must need you."

"I'm not leaving you like this." Roger answered firmly, shifting close enough that Cora's shoulder blades brushed against his chest.

"Well I have work to do." Cora answered hoarsely, trying to pull away.

A heavily corded arm snaked around Cora's middle before she could take a single step. "Talk to me." Roger encouraged in a tender purr. He pulled her back against him completely, and Cora could see his handsome face in her periphery, watching her intently. "You're clearly upset, little one."

Cora was desperately trying to ignore the sensation of having the wolf wrapped around her like a security blanket, and she hated the way his nickname played on her psyche. Next to tiny Ella, Cora had always felt a bit gangly and ungainly, even though she was a perfectly average height and weight. She'd never been considered "little" compared to her sister, but she certainly was next to most wolves. It was often intimidating, but with Roger? She secretly loved how small and safe it made her feel. "I already have a support system." She told him dismissively, but her voice shook and her lower lip quivered dangerously. "I don't need you."

"Maybe not, but I'm here and I care." He answered gently, cupping her cheek in his free hand and turning her face towards him. It was an odd angle: at once sideways, backwards and upwards; but it was undoubtedly effective. The wolf's dark eyes were boring into her own from only a few inches away, and Cora felt as though he was looking straight through her. "Tell me how to make it better, Cora."

He couldn't have predicted the effect these simple words would have on the human, but the next thing he knew tears were spilling from her lashes. Heart-wrenchingly vulnerable,

Cora admitted. "I don't know. I don't know what I need right now."

Roger tsked, and turned her to face him. "That's okay." He assured her. "Because, I do." Wrapping Cora in a proper hug, he tucked her tear-stained face against the curve of his neck. He stroked her spine and began to purr, pressing soft kisses to her hair. Cora broke the moment his purrs began, clinging to Roger and sobbing into his collar. "That's it, sweetheart." Roger encouraged. "Just let it all out." He swayed softly from side to side, and though his wolf was focused entirely on soothing the devastated bundle, his own thoughts were much darker.

Roger was already plotting ways he could take revenge on Kieran for his cruelty. It was better to do so now, while his wolf was distracted. As soon as the irate beast was no longer occupied with Cora, he was going to be so aggressive and bloodthirsty that it would take all of the Beta's strength not to go rip the other wolf to shreds – which would hardly help their diplomatic mission. He needed to decide an appropriate revenge now, while he was still able to think logically. novelxo.com fast update

"I'm s-s-sorry." Cora wept, her words muffled against his shoulder. "I d- don't kn-know why I'm being such a b-baby."

"Don't you ever apologize for crying." Roger scolded, holding her just a bit tighter. "You have every reason to be upset. That mongrel was unconscionably cruel to you, and trust me, he's going to pay."

"He was r-right." Cora cried. "As far as shifters are c-concerned I'm n- nothing more than a pet. I w-wouldn't even b-be here if it wasn't for Ella."

A growl broke through Roger's purrs. "He wasn't right and if you ever suggest such a thing again, I swear to the Goddess I will put you right over my knee."

Cora shuddered reflexively, her pulse speeding up. Though she did her best to sound affronted, she couldn't completely hide the curiosity in her voice. "You can't do that."

"Watch me." Roger rumbled in her ear, sending a second shiver down her spine. His wolf howled in triumph, loving how responsive the lovely woman was proving to be. Holding Cora felt so impossibly right, and she clearly responded to his dominance. "He wasn't right. No one thinks of you that way, Cora. Kieran is a vulgar little maggot with no redeeming characteristics. Don't give his opinion a second thought."

"You don't really believe he was the only one who felt that way do you?" Cora inquired. "The others might not have jumped on board, but they didn't object either." She shook her head, frustration taking hold now that the worst had passed. "I hate the way I always freeze up that way! Why can't I break myself of that? I'm not a little girl anymore."

'You didn't freeze, you spoke up for yourself beautifully.' Roger argued.

'That's not what it felt like.' Cora confessed. 'I felt like a mouse standing up to a lion. Ella and Gabriel were the ones who actually put an end to the matter. And I just stood there and let them defend me, I probably wouldn't have been able to say what I did if...' She trailed off, her cheeks suddenly going pink.

'If what?' Roger asked, his instincts alerting him to her sudden spike of nerves.

It took Cora a long moment to answer, and when she did her voice was barely audible. 'If I'd been alone, if I hadn't had... all of you... beside me.' Her phrasing was stilted and uncomfortable, and Roger immediately understood that she'd been about to say: 'if you hadn't been beside me.' Now she was trying to cover it by making it about the group.

'I see.' Roger said, smiling to himself and breathing in her scent. 'And is there a reason you think you should have to go it all alone?'

'Because I never have before.' Cora explained, sniffing. Her tears had slowed but she didn't make any attempt to leave Roger's arms. Instead she leaned into him and closed her eyes. 'I know I don't have to be an island – I know everyone needs help sometimes. But just once in my life, I'd like to know I'm capable of saving myself.'

'So why do you think you freeze up?' Roger inquired, still purring.

'I know why.' Cora shared sorrowfully, 'because I'm afraid that if I do or say the wrong thing, if I react at all, I might provoke an even worse attack... it's a survival strategy I learned in the orphanage.'

Roger couldn't hold back his growl, but Cora was surprised to find she didn't mind. Growls from Roger never felt threatening, only . 'Well maybe we can work on that together. I could teach you how to fight, or we could start running together – so you have a flight option as well.' He teased, remembering how badly she'd coped with a short job the day before.

'No running.' Cora grumbled sulkily, earning a chuckle from Roger. The sound filled Cora with warmth, and she found herself smiling too.

'There now,' Roger praised, petting her hair, 'Goddess you have a beautiful smile.'

His compliment jerked Cora abruptly back to reality, and she realized just how completely she'd dropped her guard. A flash of panic infiltrated her senses, and she desperately tried to regain control of her senses.

Attempting to backtrack, she said, 'Thank you for comforting me, but I should get to work, and you should catch up to the group.”

‘That might be difficult if you don’t let me go, little one.’ Roger teased, and Cora realized he was right. Her arms were still locked around his middle, and though she tried to convince her hands to release him, they would not obey. Mildly alarmed, she reflexively looked up at Roger for help, and found his face mere inches from her own. She gasped with surprise, her heart pounding even harder when she saw the wolf’s hungry expression. His eyes drifted to her full mouth, and for a moment Cora was certain he was about to kiss her. Worse, she realized she wanted him to do so more than anything – and that was truly terrifying.

Something flashed in his glowing gaze, and just when Cora thought he was about to close the final distance, he released her. “I’ll let you off just this once, Cora.” Roger promised, stroking her cheek. “Because you’ve been through a lot today, and I know you’re confused. But be warned, the next time I get you in my arms, I’m not letting go.”

Cora gulped with trepidation. Oh God, she thought as the butterflies in her stomach went into overdrive, I’m in big trouble.

Chapter 231 – Revenge

Ella

At Dinner that night, I finally get the chance to check in on my sister. “How are you doing?” I ask, giving her a one-armed squeeze.

“I’m okay.” She says, and I’m surprised to see she’s telling the truth. “How did the rest of the visit go?”

“It was good.” I reveal, not really ready to change the subject. I feel eyes on us, and look up to find Roger watching our exchange. What’s more, I realize Cora is staring right back at him, rather than looking at me. Suddenly I understand why she isn’t more upset – I don’t know what Roger did or said to her after we left, but he clearly worked his magic. “I think we made some progress. More importantly, we finally received a response from one of the human governments we reached out to last week – saying they were open to a meeting – so it seems like we might be gaining some traction.”

“But didn’t you reach out to a lot of human leaders?” Cora asks, genuinely intrigued. “Just one isn’t a very good rate of return.”

“One so far.” I correct her, hoping that I’m right. Vanara is so far away and these matters so complicated that we always expected any response to take a great deal of time. The humans are undoubtedly gathering their entire parliaments to consider our offer, and political debates are rarely fast. “Besides, even if no one else responds, if we can bring one government on board, then they could become a link to others – vouch for us.”

“That’s great.” Cora smiles, lighting up a bit. “What did the other Alphas think of that?”

“So far everyone but Kieran is playing their cards close to their chests – not that I blame them. Still, I think the camp visit did what we intended. Hearing about a crisis like this is nothing compared to seeing it with your own eyes.” I want to tell her about the way some of these puffed-up alpha males had dissolved to tears in the nursery, but unfortunately they’re all in hearing range. Instead I say, “Roger even showed them the video of the coast and offered to arrange a visit there as well.”

Cora blinked, jerking her eyes back to Roger, “But surely that’s not safe.”

“We’re deploying the first of the security drones tonight, and Dominic is pulling his continental spies and a few resistance forces back to the coast to shield the refugees – now it’s obvious Damon knows their location.” I reveal, “for now it’s the best we can do, and so far Damon’s focus isn’t on us. He’s too busy trying to remain in control of the territories he stole and from all appearances, it’s not going well for him.” 1

“I don’t understand.” Cora blinks, returning her gaze to me. “I thought the takeover was complete.”

‘That was before the secrecy pact broke. Now he’s fighting the human armies and resistance forces have been springing up everywhere.

Apparently his initial success was short-lived. He’s employed thousands of rogues which he cannot control, and the more shifters he targets, the more enemies he makes. We’ve even got some rogue-led militia’s now.”

“Really? But... why am I only just hearing about this?” Cora asked, looking slightly affronted.

“Don’t worry, I’m in the same boat,” I relate. “These bossy wolves aren’t great about sharing information. We’re all so busy with our own projects and tasks that it’s easy to lose track.” In truth, between planning the summit, my hypnosis, work with the refugees, bed rest and Sinclair’s neardeath, I almost forgot about tracking events on the continent. It wasn’t until my mate filled me in that I realized just how much I’d been missing.

“Well I’m glad to hear it – are the delegations going to go to the coast?” Cora questions.

“It’s not clear yet,” I answer, which isn’t entirely accurate. It was obvious the chickens hadn’t wanted to take the risk, but I won’t be saying that aloud either. “Anyway, we can talk more later, I just wanted to check on you.”

“Wait,” Cora catches my arm before I’ve even moved. She glances around at her neighbors to make sure they aren’t paying attention. “Do you... I mean ... Ella, when all that happened – earlier you were kind of glowing.” She whispers, “Did you realize?”

I purse my lips, “Later.” This is the precise word Sinclair had used when Henry and Gabriel brought up the strange phenomenon – which I had been completely unaware of at the time. It wasn’t until they mentioned it that I even knew it happened, and I don’t know how I did it. Still, Sinclair hadn’t wanted to discuss it in front of the delegations.

I return to my seat, and Sinclair promptly slides his arm around me. How is she? He asks through our bond.

Like you couldn’t hear. I joke, arching my brow.

It’s still polite to ask. He replies, nabbing my hand and bringing it to his lips. The dinner continues without incident, and eventually I tell Sinclair that I’m going to go up to our suite a bit early. Of course, this isn’t what I actually want to do. Instead I head for Roger’s rooms. He left dinner a little while ago, and I have the sneaking suspicion that he and I are on the same page. When he opens the door, he only smiles, "I had a feeling I might be seeing you."

I walk in without hesitation, "so what are we going to do to that fuck pig?"

"Well, whatever it is, it needs to be something Kieran can't tie back to us. As much as I want to teach him a lesson, if he knows why he's being punished, he might go after Cora." Roger replies, needing no further explanation. "We'll have to keep our distance."

"What does he hate? Other than humans, I mean." I ask, though I realize my brother-in-law knows the wolf barely better than I do.

"Well, I imagine a hyper-masculine ass like that wouldn't appreciate being made to look like a little girl. We could turn all his clothing pink? We would only need to go down to the laundry and slip some dye into the wash." Roger suggests, a devious glint in his eye.

"Oh I like that." I agree. "But I don't want to get any of the castle servants in trouble, and I can tell he'd demand their heads on the platter." I pause, "In fact, I think that we need to keep this out of the palace entirely. If we humiliate him while he's here, it could undermine the summit and our alliance. It would be best if we can hit him on his home turf." I wrack my brains, and after a moment a lightbulb flicks on with a brilliant idea.

"What are you thinking?" Roger questions, easily reading my beaming grin.

"Well obviously the ignorant bastard needs some education and guidance on how not to be a world class prick. So I think we should start sending him some literature and self-help guides. They can be mailed directly to his own mansion in the Storm Forest capital, and we can even space out the deliveries so that it starts small, but over time it will build up into a veritable library. It would certainly be easy enough to place the orders and conceal our identities so he doesn't know who's sending them." I explain, getting more and more excited about this idea by the minute. "We can even keep it on the theme of things that would completely emasculate the little weasel."

"I'm not sure I follow." Roger confesses, his brow crinkling in confusion.

"Well, just picture it," I instruct, fighting back the urge to giggle. "When Kieran returns home from his trip and starts going through the correspondence and packages that arrived while he was away, imagine how surprised and confused he'll be when he finds an advice book about living with a micro-penis; brochures about resisting the urge to cross-dress; and how-to-guides for fixing impotence." I paint the scene for us both, watching as Roger's face lights up with delight. "He'll try calling the companies which sent the books to find out who purchased them, only to find out that his own name is on the buyer accounts.”

“He’ll be baffled and angry, and of course he’ll throw it all away – but the outrage will pass after a week or so. That’s when the next set of packages will arrive.” I continue, becoming more animated by the minute. “More selfhelp books about overcoming the things he would consider most humiliating, in conjunction with supplies to help him improve. Adult bedwetting literature with boxes of diapers; books on how to pleasure your unsatisfied lover along with penis enhancement pills; feminization porn along with frilly dresses and sex toys.

“You’re a bloody genius.” Roger praises, laughing out loud. “And the best part is that you know he’s not even going to be the one opening the boxes. His servants will deliver everything to him unwrapped. Before long rumors about his embarrassing problems will be all over the pack.”

“Exactly.” I giggle, more than a little proud of myself.

Just like that we’re off to the races, beginning to make lists and search materials online. We make the final arrangements for the first shipment and agree to meet again, before I finally sneak back to my own room. I’m so pleased with our scheme, and I’m still smiling when I walk into the suite.

“Hello mate.” Sinclair’s deep voice sends me leaping into the air before the door can even close. “And just where have you been?”

Chapter 232 – Power

Ella

I clutch my belly in shock, whirling around to locate Sinclair. He's leaning in the doorway of our bedroom, his powerful arms crossed over his chest. Sinclair's glowing green eyes pierce straight through me, a foreboding expression on his handsome face as he waits for my answer.

"Nowhere." I squeak, too surprised to think clearly.

Sinclair rumbles wordlessly and prowls forward, catching my nape in his strong hand. "You told me you were coming back here after dinner, but you were clearly somewhere else, trouble. The question is whether you meant to come back and got sidetracked, or if you lied to me?"

He tilts my head back so I'm forced to look up at him, and though he's wearing his most intimidating expression, my inner wolf only swoons. She flops onto her back and rubs herself against the ground, attempting to entice her mate. I can feel Sinclair's wolf fighting the urge to give in, reasserting his disapproval through our bond. The massive creature towers above my wolf in our minds' eye, his canine features hungry, fierce and utterly irresistible.

Sinclair's free hand travels across my waist and settles over my navel. The baby kicks in excitement, sharing the elated emotions and silliness he'd been feeling through our bond when I was scheming with Roger. For a split second, I think Sinclair might be fighting a smile, "Have you been making mischief, little wolf."

"Of course not." I promise, sliding my arms around his neck and rising onto my tip toes for a kiss, "I wouldn't even know how."

Sinclair chuckles darkly, claiming my lips for an extended interlude that sparks fire in my veins. "Don't make me ask Philippe where you've been, little wolf." He warns when we part, "it will only make things worse."

"I just went to see Roger." I shrug, batting my lashes and trying to look innocent, "I'm sorry if I worried you."

"Thank you. But you didn't answer my question, Ella." Sinclair responds, running his palm over the curve of my bottom and squeezing, hitching me closer.

I gnaw on my lower lip. "Well I was planning on coming straight here... after I stopped to talk to him."

"Uh-huh." Sinclair rumbles, dropping his head to the curve of my neck and brushing his fangs back and forth over my mating mark. He pauses to nibble the special spot, turning my insides to liquid. “And what business did you have with Roger that was so important that you felt it warranted lying to your mate?”

“It wasn’t really a lie.” I insist, earning myself a scolding growl. I give him a beseeching look as he raises his head again, already knowing I’m fighting a losing battle, “just an omission.” Sinclair arches a devastatingly dubious brow, and I sigh. “Fine, we wanted to make Kieran pay for being such a jerk to Cora. It was our fight – not yours.”

For the first time, Sinclair looks genuinely wary, “Ella, what did you do?”

Staring at my feet – or more accurately, staring at my baby bump, which now completely obscures my feet – I tell him the details of our plan, wondering just how angry he’s going to be. When I finish explaining the plot, I peek up at him from beneath my lashes, only to find him beaming down at me. He cups my cheek in his hand and, feeling emboldened, I offer him a shy smile. “You are the sweetest, most diabolical little imp I’ve ever met.” Sinclair announces, laughing heartily. “He’s going to lose his Goddess -damned mind.”

Now I can’t hold back a grin, “it’s good isn’t it?”

“It’s brilliant, but you’re still a very bad girl for going behind my back.” Despite his words, his tone is pure affection. “I was worried when you weren’t here, and besides your fights are my fights too now. That’s how this works.”

I nod, “I’m sorry, I should have told you.”

‘Yes you should have.’ He confirms, scooping me up into his arms. “And we’ll talk more about that later, but for now I’m more concerned about the power you tapped into earlier.”

‘You mean the glowing?’ I guess, not really wanting to discuss this when we’re finally alone and his kisses have left me feeling more than a little hot and bothered. “Wouldn’t you rather do something else?” I lean forward to kiss my way up his jaw, catching his earlobe between my teeth and nipping lightly, “Something that doesn’t require any talking at all?”

Sinclair growls with longing, but he holds firm. “We have plenty of time for that, trouble.” He answers, settling on the couch with me in his lap. ‘This is too important to put off. I’ve never seen anything like it.’ He shares, caressing my belly.

“Do you think everyone noticed?” I ask, leaning my head against his shoulder. “I mean it only happened for a second, right?”

Sinclair chuckles, cuddling me closer. ‘Yes baby, I’m afraid they would have to have been blind not to.” He explains, “It wasn’t just glowing. When you spoke it was like... I don’t know, the only thing I can compare it to is casting a spell.”

“What do you mean?” I inquire, not sure I like the sounds of this.

“I mean you captivated the entire room so completely that we all forgot everything else. When you spoke, nothing else existed. Now,” He flashed a sultry smile, ‘That might be business as usual for me, but it isn’t for other wolves – especially not Alpha’s of this caliber. Your words weren’t just persuasive, it felt as if you were rewriting my personal thoughts. That feeling faded as soon as you calmed down but it was... well, astonishing doesn’t seem a strong enough word.”

“But how could I do something like that, without even realizing I was doing it?” I frown, feeling more than a little overwhelmed.

Sinclair thinks for a moment, ‘Your wolf was bound for so long that you never got a chance to learn how to control your power like most shifters do. And when we met and she started to come out, it was a little like this too, remember?’ He prompts, kissing my hair. “We kept seeing flashes of your true nature – flashes of the alpha spirit inside you. The power would flare up and recede so quickly it was easy to mistake it for the baby.”

“And you think the same thing is happening now that my wolf is free? The power is there somewhere but I don’t know how to use it, so it’s just bursting out when my emotions get high?” I clarify, not sure how I feel about this at all.

‘That would be my guess.” Sinclair confirms.

“But where is it coming from – I’ve never heard of wolves casting spells or anything like what you’re describing. Not that I’m an expert but still.” I ramble, feeling more confused by the minute.

Sinclair begins to purr, obviously sensing my unease. “But you’re not just any wolf, Ella. The Goddess’s bloodline runs in your veins. We may not know how much of herself she gave to you, or what kind of magics that power imparts – but I have to think that’s the reason this is happening.”

I clamp my eyes shut, I’d been afraid he’d say that. “Do you think it will hurt us with the other Alphas – like they might feel tricked or manipulated?” I wonder aloud.

“On the contrary, I think it will help us. It’s one thing to reject me – and another entirely to reject the Goddess’s own daughter.” He reasons. “Even so, we need to find out what else you’re capable of – we need to learn about your power and find you a teacher to help you control it.” Sinclair declares, “As soon as the summit concludes, we can restart your hypnosis sessions – and this time I’ll be by your side.”

“But Dominic... we don’t have any idea what other memories I might have suppressed, or if there are any at all.” I object, staring at my lap. I’ve been waiting for the right time to bring this up, and it seems fate has given me the perfect opportunity – through necessity if not grace. “The only way hypnosis is going to answer these questions is if those priests or the Goddess herself came back and taught me about my power – and they certainly can’t have trained me because my wolf was bound before my magic even manifested.”

“Well, we won’t know unless we try.” Sinclair sighs, brushing my hair back from my face. “If hypnosis doesn’t hold any more answers we’ll find another way. But I promise we’ll figure this out, Sweetheart.”

Taking a deep breath, I sit up, moving to straddle his lap. Sinclair’s big hands settle on my hips as he waits for me to work up my courage. When I finally do, I say, “I think there may be another option – but you aren’t going to like it.” I reveal, watching him closely. “Dominic, I think I have to find my mother.

Chapter 233 – Maternal Quest

Ella

Sinclair's face immediately closes off, "Baby we talked about this." He rumbles, sounding unhappy but not angry.

"We started to," I agree, remembering that last painful conversation. "And then the bomb went off and everything went crazy."

"Ella, I know how badly you want to meet her. And I would love nothing more for us to be free to go searching right this minute – but it's not the time. There's too much going on." Sinclair proclaims, repeating much of the same sentiments he had when we first discussed this matter.

"But this isn't just about finding her because I want to meet her." I correct him. "You told me yourself that after Xavier died, Queen Reina left Moon Valley and became a devotee of the Goddess. That can't be a coincidence." I insist, silently begging him not to shut this possibility down without hearing me out first. "My mother met the Goddess, she spoke to her. Whatever they discussed, it had to have been far more substantive than the fairytale version the Goddess told me as a pup. Even if that's all she knows – she still has answers we don't."

Sinclair doesn't reply, but I can see the gears working in his head, his thoughts racing a thousand miles a minute. Taking advantage of his contemplative mood, I forge ahead, "But what if that's not all? What if she's been serving the Goddess these last five years learning the secrets of my blood so she'll be ready when I come? What if she knows how to get in direct contact with the Goddess, and can help me do the same? It's obvious that the Goddess's priests and devotees have powers and knowledge we don't – far more than any elder council. If anyone can help us, surely it's her."

All of a sudden I feel a violent burst of defiance from Sinclair's wolf, the beast lashing out against the man. It explodes through our bond in a vicious haze of passion and protectiveness, rage and refusal, determination and fear. Sinclair clamps his eyes shut with the effort of getting the animal under control, and his fingers dig into my hips with unexpected force. Understanding sinks in when he slowly drops his head back against the sofa, emitting a very soft, drawn out, "fuuucckk."

My heart leaps in my chest. "I'm right, aren't I?" I exclaim excitedly, bouncing a little in his lap. "I'm right?"

Sinclair snarls, and perhaps for the first time in our entire relationship, he sets me away from him. One moment I'm straddling his thighs with my swollen belly pressed flush to his abs, and the next I'm alone on the couch while my mate paces back and forth across the room, overflowing with feral energy. I watch him warily, feeling torn. I'm desperate to find my mother, but the last thing I want is to be away from my mate, especially as the war escalates and my due date nears. I'm sure he feels exactly the same way.

"Dominic?" I ask in a small voice, not sure what to do to help calm him.

"Yes, you're right!" He snaps, even though I hadn't planned on repeating my earlier question. "I swear, I could strangle the Goddess for doing this to us. If she wanted to create a mortal child she should have stayed with you and raised you and been a real fucking parent. She never should have torn you from Reina and Xavier, sacrificed you to be abused by the humans!" His thundering growls have evolved into a full-on roar, and his power spills out of him like a wild thing – ferocious and indomitable. "What kind of a god abandons their most precious miracle? What kind of mother leaves her children helpless?"

I want to get up and go to him, but I can tell he needs his space at the moment. He needs to get all of his fury out into the open – especially if I want him to agree to this. Even so, I feel the strangest compunction to defend my celestial mother, "In my memory, she said that I had to go through all that, so that I could know what it was to be human." I remind him.

Sinclair whirls around, "that's bullshit. You could have been raised by Damon himself and still turned out the sweetest creature to ever walk the earth!"

"I don't think that's true." I counter gently, "that's not how people work."

"I don't care!" He grumbles viciously. "I will never, never forgive her for what she put you through!"

At this point, I do stand and close the distance between us. I reach up and place my small hands on either side of his scruffy jaw, forcing him to look down at me – even though he clearly doesn't want to. He grimaces and looks anywhere but at me. I patiently wait, and he eventually concedes, his green eyes shining. I tilt my head to the side, letting him feel all my love through our bond. "You do know, that if she hadn't done all that – you and I would never have met."

Sinclair softens slightly, searching my face with his ravenous gaze. His arms reflexively wrap around my body, and he lowers his forehead to mine. There's still so much turmoil swirling through his consciousness, and the stubborn man doesn't want to give in. "If the cost of giving you the life you deserve was living without you, I would have gladly done it."

"Then I'm glad it wasn't up to you, because I wouldn't." I profess fervently. "I wouldn't trade you and Rafe for anything in the whole world, and it frankly infuriates me that you would even suggest such a thing,” I continue with a scowl. “I am the woman I am today because of everything I survived and overcame. I’m not saying I like it, or that I wouldn’t spare myself of the pain if I could. But if it hadn’t happened we wouldn’t be here now. I wouldn’t have the love and joy of our family, and more importantly, our people would pay the price.”

“I don’t care.” He says again, wearing an expression suspiciously close to a pout. “You’re more important.” I realize I’m talking to his wolf now, rather than the logical man who puts duty above all else.

“You don’t really believe that.” I respond with a sad smile, ‘This was all set in motion so that the God of Darkness’s schemes on earth wouldn’t result in the destruction of shifters and humans alike. You, more than anyone, believe the future of our world is worth any price.”

“Not you.” He digs his heels in, clutching at me with newfound vigor, his voice hoarse with emotion. “Never you.”

“Exactly, and if it wasn’t for this war – I never would have been born.” I state simply, though the gravity of this fact staggers me. I hadn’t considered this particular bit of logic before, and though my brain wants to freak out in existential angst, I know I have to keep it together for my spiraling mate. “Don’t you prefer having me in the world and a bit scarred, than not having me in the world at all?”

“That isn’t fair.” He snaps petulantly, glaring at me even as his hands tighten on my small body.

“Maybe not, but it’s true.” I answer wryly, running my thumbs over his cheeks. “It will be okay, Dominic.” I croon, leaning into him for a hug.

“I can’t let you go, Ella.” He mumbles against the curve of my neck. I feel his angry tears on my skin, and I know that the decision has already been made, despite his continued denial. “I won’t. It’s not safe, I’ll go mad if I let you out of my sight.”

“We got through one separation.” I murmur, kissing his hair and running my hands over his broad shoulders. “We can get through another.”

He shakes his head, “It’s not the same. I knew I’d be back before things got too serious, before the baby got too big.” Sinclair’s hands slide to my middle, “there’s no telling how long it might take you to find Reina – how far you might have to go, or how much time you’d have to spend with her to learn whatever she has to teach you.” His wolf’s despair puts tears in my eyes too, but before I can reply he’s talking again. “And it was different when I knew you were under lock and key here. I wasn’t joking when I said

I'd go mad, my wolf will lose his mind if we don't know where you are or whether or not you're safe."

'We'll get through it, because we have to.' I promise, feeling my own sobs begin to build. "The last thing I want to do is be away from you, Dominic. But we don't have a choice here. I have to do this if we're going to win this war."

I feel another violent wave of anger and resistance from his wolf, before something caves inside him. "Not before the summit concludes. Not before I've had at least another week with you two." Sinclair stipulates, letting his authority come through loud and clear.

"After the summit." I agree, feeling both of our hearts break. "Not a moment before.

Chapter 234 – Ella Shares her News

Sinclair

If I'd thought getting out of bed with my mate was difficult yesterday, it's nothing compared to the struggle facing me today. Now that Ella and I have decided to undergo another separation, my wolf is even more on edge than before. All night I slept with my precious mate wrapped so tightly in my arms she couldn't move an inch – a fact which became apparent when she pinched me awake in the middle of the night so that she could go pee. Of course, the moment she returned to my arms I wasted no time making love to her again, but it only appeased my wolf temporarily.

Now, as I watch her snuggle closer to me in the cool morning air, I wonder if I can truly go through with this. Right on cue, Ella opens her glorious gold eyes, and I fall into the bottomless pools. "Good morning." She murmurs, yawning and stretching before leaning in for a kiss. Her lips meet mine with familiar ease, but the taste of my delectable mate sets my wolf to howling, and fire sparks in my blood. It's further proof of what I already know – that no matter how much time passes or how often we come together, my passion for this she-wolf will never dim.

"I changed my mind." I rumble when we finally part. "I can't let you go, Ella."

My sweet mate sighs, frowning deeply as she caresses my muscular arm." Dominic, we talked about this. It's for the best."

"How can it be for the best when we aren't together?" I posit stubbornly, not caring one bit that I sound like a lovesick pup.

"The same way it was for the best for us to divide and conquer when you went visiting the Vanaran territories and I stayed behind." Ella reminds me, kissing my shoulder and drawing my hand to her belly to feel our pup. Rafe is wide awake and alight with energy, though he clearly senses our tangled emotions. There's an edge of confusion and anxiety in his otherwise content consciousness, and I know the clever minx is directing my attention to this on purpose.

"Stop being so rational." I huff, letting my wolf take over. "What happened to the little hellion who made me feel like a murderer for leaving her behind?"

"She learned from her mistakes." Ella answers steadily. "I didn't understand then, I let my hurt feelings and anxiety blind me – but I know better now." A door opens in our bond, and she lets me feel the pain she's struggling to overcome herself – pain she kept hidden last night. I suspect she did so to prevent me using it as an excuse to stay together, but now she shares it to let me feel how she hates this every bit as much as I do.

“What about Rafe?” I demand, “you remember how angry he was with me when I finally returned? How abandoned he felt?”

“And he recovered, because you’re a wonderful father and you showed him that you’ll always be there for him – even when he doesn’t want you to be.” Ella counters in the same gentle tone. “Besides, I’ll tell him every day that it’s my fault and if he should be angry with anyone, it’s me.”

“No you won’t.” I reply sharply. “He can’t be missing me and cross with you at once – it’s too much stress.”

“Alright.” Ella agrees. “Then I’ll tell him once we’re back together so he can retroactively hate me... and we will be back together, Dominic. We’re going to get through this.”

“I don’t want him to hate you.” I grumble, running my hand over her tummy as Rafe rolls around inside of her, sending visible ripples over her taut skin. “I just want there to be some way for us to do it all: find your mother and fight this war, and have our pup without ever leaving each other’s side.”

“It was bound to happen eventually anyway.” Ella reminds me, “I know you weren’t going to take us with you into battle. You were going to leave us here in Vanara while you went off to save the world, weren’t you?”

She’s right, and the impossible creature knows it. Her beautiful face is the picture of innocence, but there’s a knowing glint in her shining eyes that betrays her calculation. “I didn’t think it would be this soon.” I grumpily explain, nibbling her mating mark. “And it’s one thing for you to be under lock and key with Gabriel, and another entirely to send you out into the unknown without me.”

“I know, my love.” She croons, running her fingers through my hair – soothing me against my will. I’m well aware that she’s giving me a taste of my own medicine, and I have to admit it’s rather infuriating. Clever mate, my wolf growls through our bond, though it’s not clear whether it’s intended as praise or complaint. Naughty, incorrigible little wolf.

Just think about how wonderful our reunion will be. Her wolf answers suggestively. We’re not going to have any big scares this time. We’re just going to run – or waddle, in my case – into each other’s arms and ravish each other until we welcome our little angel.

That’s assuming he doesn’t arrive before you can find the answers we need, or before I have to go into battle. My wolf sulks. It’s not as if we can control his arrival.

Dominic, I promise you that no matter what is happening or where I am, I will come to you before he arrives. Even if I have to turn around and leave immediately afterwards,

I'm not going to let this child come into the world without you. A flash of fear seeps through our connection, and I understand that this possibility terrifies her even more than it terrifies me. I couldn't do it on my own, even if I wanted to.

You could. I tenderly chide, there is nothing you cannot do, Ella. You might not want to, but you'll get through it whether I'm there or not.

The point is that you will be there. She insists, because we're going to make sure of it.

I think we both know that this is wishful thinking – pretty words to give our wolves enough hope to go through with the separation. Children have a way of proving that even our best laid plans can and will go awry, and that's when all else is normal – which our lives are certainly not. Even so, these gentle pacifications are enough to calm my wolf, and a few hours later we're sharing our decision with our friends and family.

Dad, Roger, Cora, Gabriel, Isabel, James and Philippe are all gathered in our sitting room, expectantly anticipating an explanation for our mysterious summons. The day's summit events are about to kick off and I'm sure they all assume we're here to talk about that, so it comes as no small shock when Ella declares she's leaving Vanara next Friday.

"What do you mean, you're leaving?" Cora demands, nervously looking back and forth between us.

"Dominic and I have agreed that I need to find my mother, in order to understand the Goddess's plans and my own power." She explains soberly. "It wasn't an easy decision by any means, but the more time that passes, the clearer it becomes that I can't fulfill my destiny unless I discover the secrets of my past... and if anyone has those answers, it's Queen Reina."

"So you're just going to leave?" Isabel demands, surging to her feet. "Just like that?"

"No, not just like that." Ella sighs, "I don't want to go, especially not when everything is so tense. But I don't see another way."

"What about the refugees, the children?" Isabel snaps, cradling Sadie in her arms. "They need you!"

"They might miss me." Ella concedes, too modest for her own good. "But it's you they need, just like the refugees need Dominic and James." Isabel opens her mouth to argue more, but my mate cuts her off, "I'm not doing this for myself Isabel! If I had my way I wouldn't go anywhere, but the pack comes first – our future comes first." Isabel closes her mouth then, looking decidedly sullen as James pulls her down into his lap.

"What about the baby?" Dad inquires, "the doctor is still worried about your stress levels."

I growl in agreement, but Ella speaks over me. “I’m going to be more stressed and endangered if Damon wins because I didn’t do this.”

“Where exactly are we going?” Philippe asks, already knowing that he’ll be guarding her on the expedition.

“I’m not sure yet.” Ella confesses, looking towards my father. “Henry, I hoped you might have some insight into the Queen’s whereabouts.”

“I’ll look into it.” Dad agrees, watching me closely. I can feel him probing my emotions through our bond, and I let him feel my turmoil and resignation. His wolf purrs in my head, and I’m amazed at how effective this is no matter how old I get.

“I’m going with you.” Cora suddenly announces, rising to her feet. “I can’t ask that of you.” Ella replies with a sad smile, “you have your work and

“Ella, I’m coming with you.” Cora repeats firmly, leaving no room for argument. “If you’re going on a quest to find your mother, I’m not letting you do it alone.”

Tears well in Ella’s eyes, and she beams at her surrogate sister. “I’d love nothing more than to have you with me.”

As the women melt into a hug, my own gaze swings to my brother. Roger is staring at Cora with an expression I know all too well – and he is not happy.

Chapter 235 – To Catch a Spy

3rd Person

Roger's wolf was – to say the least – not amused by Cora's decision to accompany Ella on her journey. He knew that her heart was in the right place and that she was strongly motivated by the desire to support her sister, but he also knew that wasn't the only reason she was going.

The obstinate human had been avoiding him like the plague ever since he comforted her in the medical tent, and he hadn't missed the way she'd been watching him just before declaring her intentions. While Ella had been placating Isabel and answering Dad's questions, Cora had been eyeing Roger like a wary rabbit. She knew that she wouldn't be able to resist him much longer, and Ella had just given her the perfect opportunity to flee rather than face her feelings.

Roger stalked out of the opulent guest suite in a minor rage, working to get his wolf under control. Stop being so self-centered, think about how hard this must be for Dorn. Think about how much it will comfort Ella to have her sister along for the trip. He scolded his wolf. It's a family mission after all, and they're family. It's right that Cora should go.

If that were the only reason I wouldn't object. His wolf snarled back. But she's mine. She knows she's mine and she's running away.

She's been running since this all began, it's no surprise that this is her choice. Roger countered, taking deep breaths in and out. This was the very last thing he'd needed today. He'd dedicated the morning to searching for the spy who planted the bomb for Sinclair's convoy, now he was going to be completely distracted.

I don't care if it's no surprise. She's being naughty and she knows it! His wolf sniped ferociously, grumbling wordlessly as he pictured all the delightful ways he might teach her a lesson.

Roger rolled his eyes, cut it out, I don't need an absent mind and an erection. Get your head in the game.

Giving himself a violent shake, Roger made his way to the palace's security headquarters. He'd alerted the urban surveillance team to the spy's presence in the hidden territories as soon as they confirmed the likely suspect. Every day since, he'd started his routine by stopping in to see if any positive IDs were made with Vanara's superior facial recognition software. He wasn't expecting to actually find the spy this way, but he had to exhaust every possibility.

So it was no small surprise, when the guards in charge of monitoring security cameras around the capital came rushing to meet him this morning. Before he could even enter the office, a junior enforcer was eagerly bouncing up and down in front of him, "Sir, we've got a positive ID!"

"You do?" He asked, aghast. "Where, when?"

"It just came through, I was on my way to find you!" The young wolf reported, "He was caught on a camera in the moonflower district, coming out of an apartment building."

"Take me there." Roger ordered, gesturing for a few other guards to join them. "Now! There's not a moment to waste. If he's in the city, it's because he's upto something."

Fifteen minutes later they pulled up in front of a modest building which Roger now recognized from the high definition photos the young enforcer displayed on a shiny tablet. There was no doubt this wolf was the same man who arrived on James's transport only to immediately disappear, and the Beta's adrenaline was surging as they neared their target.

"How will we know which apartment he's in?" The excited enforcer inquired.

"We'll have to check with the landlord." Roger explained. "I don't want to go through this place knocking on every door and alert the suspect."

It wasn't difficult to find the building owner, and soon they were standing in front of flat number 4, silently signaling as they prepared to enter. The landlord confessed that he'd taken a new renter just last week and hadn't bothered with the usual background checks, and now they had to hope that the suspect was still inside. Roger could smell a fellow Moon Valley wolf through the door, and it was all he could do to keep his temper in check. He'd expected a rogue, not one of their own. Then again, Damon had friends in very low places.

When Roger finally gave the signal, Gabriel's top enforcers crashed through the door, a few of the men shifting in case they needed to fight. Roger marched through the wreckage on two legs, quickly setting his sights on his target. The spy was cowering in the corner, his paws still clenching a tightly shut window. He'd clearly smelled them and attempted to escape, but he was not fast enough.

"What do you want?!" He cried, feigning ignorance. "What is this? I'm just a refugee."

"Shut your mouth before I shut it for you." Roger snarled, prowling forward. "We know exactly who you are and what you've done." It wasn't entirely true, but at their core interrogations were exercises in psychological manipulation, and Roger was willing to lie to get the information he required.

"I don't know what you're talking about." The wolf insisted, holding his hands up defensively.

'You're a spy for Emperor Damon.' Roger cut back, 'You set the bomb that killed all of the Alpha's best men – his Beta. Your Beta. You committed treason.'

"I swear I didn't!" The man repeated desperately.

"Then what is all this?" Roger turned, following the voice of the enforcer who spoke. The guard in question was standing over a cluttered work table, complete with a scale model of Gabriel's palace. While they watched, the enforcer pulled back an accordion screen, revealing an array of weapons and chemicals. It was obvious what was happening – the assassin had failed to kill Sinclair once, it only made sense that he'd try again.

"It's not what it looks like." The spy squealed, sounding truly frantic.

"It looks like you're planning for a second attack." Roger assessed coldly. "What took you so long? All the increased security for the summit?" Suddenly everything that had seemed overcautious in the preceding days felt necessary, imperative even.

"Please you have to believe me!" The assassin begged, still refusing to admit his guilt.

"The only question is whether you're planning this to get out of Damon's bad books, or because you haven't reported in yet." Roger analyzed, circling on the spot as he took in every detail of the room. "Does Damon know Sinclair still lives?"

"I don't-" The man started to lie.

"Enough!" Roger roared, throwing all of his power into the command. "There is no escaping this – we know you're guilty. The only chance you have now is to cooperate with us. So do you want to play ball and maybe salvage your worthless life, or do you want to die here and now?"

The spy blanched, his skin suddenly seeming very gray. "Damon doesn't know. If Sinclair lives, I don't get paid, I'm not reporting back until the job is done."

"How many of you are there?" Roger questioned sharply.

"As far as I know it's only me, but then Damon wouldn't be likely to tell me if there were others, would he?" the spy replied, his eyes flitting around the room anxiously.

"How did you get here?" Roger asked, just to see if the spy would tell the truth.

"I snuck in on one of your refugee transports." He confessed, "it wasn't hard."

“Did Damon direct you to the transports, or did you find them yourself?” Roger pressed, needing to know exactly how knowledgeable their enemy was about their operations.

“Damon directed me, but I was probably the last spy who got through before he had to shift his forces to meet the humans.” The wolf explained.

Roger didn't trust that this was actually true, but he wasn't foolish enough to admit it. “Join us, turn on Damon, and I'll double whatever he paid you.”

“Why would you do that?” The spy demanded suspiciously.

“Because we need every advantage we can get over Damon – and you should agree because he is going to lose this war. You must have seen how badly he's floundering.” Roger persuaded, making his offer again. “Call your boss and tell him that Sinclair is dead, and you have my word I'll double your fee.”

“How do I know you won't just kill me once I have?” The assassin questioned shrewdly.

“You don't, but you can be sure I'll kill you now if you don't.” Roger threatened.

The spy hesitated for a long moment, the gears visibly turning in his head. He was smart enough to know he was a dead man, but hope was a tricky thing. It had the power to persuade even the most dire pessimists, and when it came to life and death... well, only a fool would turn down a lifeline, no matter how unlikely.

Roger and the enforcers watched as the traitor pulled out his phone and dialed the emperor. A moment later they heard Damon's voice cut off the dial tone, “Is it done?”

“It's done.” The spy lied, shaking where he stood.

“Then your payment will be sent before the day's end.” Damon announced. “Stay available. I may need you again.”

“Yes sir.” The spy hung up, looking anxiously towards Roger.

The Beta confiscated his phone, double checking that the call was actually complete. “Very good.” He praised, his wolf salivating over the imminent kill. “But any wolf who is loyal only to the highest bidder cannot be trusted.” He stalked forward, bearing his fangs, “Any last words?”

Chapter 236 – Aileen’s Sorrow

Ella

Once Sinclair returned and I was allowed off of bed rest, I finally got the opportunity to visit Hugo’s widow Aileen. At least, I thought I would have the chance – instead I was turned away from her door and told in no uncertain terms that she wasn’t accepting visitors. I’ve been back every day since, but this morning is the first time she’s allowed me inside.

“Is there anything I can do for you?” I ask her gently, knowing better than to offer her empty apologies and condolences. “Anything at all?”

“You already are,” She answers wryly, looking up at me from her bed. “You know you, Dominic and Henry are the only ones who have come to see me? Not just to tell me how amazing Hugo was or say how much they pity me, but to find out how I’m doing because you truly care. And of the three of you, you’re the only one who hasn’t gotten the message to leave me alone.”

I shrug, not feeling the least bit sorry. “Sometimes we want to be left alone precisely when we shouldn’t be.” I frown, thinking about the other wolves in the palace – our fellow countrymen. “And don’t take the others’ absence personally. Everyone is caught up in their own worries with the war, and no one likes to be reminded of how quickly it can all be taken away... your grief makes it impossible to avoid.”

Aileen snorts, “you don’t beat around the bush, do you?”

“Would you rather I did? That I diminish the gravity of your loss for the sake of politeness?” I ask, hoping that I’m not miscalculating. My prayer is that a bit of reverse psychology will help Aileen come back to herself for the sake of her pup – who has been spending a great deal of time in the nursery since his mother disappeared into her grief.

“I still have my boy.” Aileen answers firmly, reminding herself of the very fact I came to press upon her

“And how is Davey doing?” I inquire pointedly, though I already know the answer. Sinclair and Henry have been spending any time they can with the poor pup – not that this amounts to much. The horrible reality is that none of us have the bandwidth to give the bereaved the attention they deserve, but the same is true of all the refugees. Doing our jobs as leaders means neglecting them in the present, so that we can ensure they have a future.

Aileen’s gaze drops to her lap, an expression of profound shame overtaking her features. “He’s devastated of course – he thought his father hung the moon. He’s the only thing keeping me going... if he wasn’t here I think...”

"Is he here?" I question gently, looking around the empty room.

"I sent him away." She confesses, tears welling in her eyes. "I kept our bond open, but only just. I didn't want him to see me like this."

"Maybe he needs to see you like this." I suggest, reaching for her hands and clasping them tightly. "Maybe he needs to see that you're hurting just as badly as he is. Hugo isn't the only one who hung the moon for him, Aileen. But right now he's going it all alone."

"But the other pups..." Aileen argues, "and the Alpha. Surely they'll

'They aren't his mother. It's not the same." I insist, rising to my feet. "Come with me to visit the nursery, come see Davey. Or let me bring him to you."

She hesitates, glancing towards a mirror on the far wall. She certainly looks more than a little worse for wear, with great dark circles under her eyes and dirty, lank hair. "I promise you, he doesn't care how you look – only that you're there." I state before she can object.

Aileen nods hesitantly, and together we walk down to the nursery. Isabel and Henry are waiting for us – another scheme I concocted in hopes Aileen might take comfort from people who have been through this and know how she feels. Of course, we haven't even set foot in the room when a small voice cries, "Mommy!!!"

Davey's dark head is racing towards us through the familiar space, crashing into his mother's arms with tears streaming down his cheeks." Mommy where have you been?!" He cries, his words muffled against her breast.

Aileen's arms wrap around him reflexively, but it takes a moment for her to break. When it does happen, she shatters before our very eyes, crashing to her knees and dragging the pup into her lap. "I'm sorry." She moans, rocking him back and forth. "I'm so sorry angel, I've just been so sad."

"But I've b-been sad too!" Davey complained, sniffing, "I k-kept trying to c- come see you but th-they told me I couldn't."

Aileen continues sobbing apologies to her son, and then Isabel and Henry come forward to lend their arms as well.

Sinclair appears by my shoulder, a pained expression on his handsome face as he takes in the scene. "You finally got through to her?"

"Not me." I correct, running my hands over my baby bump and thanking the stars for my unborn son. 'This was all Davey.'

I know we can't stay much longer, as our first video call with a human government is due to begin in only five minutes. Still, I wish we could stay longer – I wish we could do more for all of our people. As my mate leads me away, I lean into his warmth, "Please tell me you have good news? It's beginning to feel like all we have around here is heartbreak."

"As a matter of fact, I do." Sinclair reveals, kissing my hair. "Roger caught the spy."

"Really?" I gasp, stopping in my tracks. 'That's wonderful!'

Sinclair nods, tucking me under his arm and encouraging me to keep walking. 'The bastard is dead, but he told Damon the assassination was successful before he took his last breath.'

"Surely that will be an advantage to us?" I inquire, my wolf howling with vengeful joy to know our enemy is no longer.

"I hope so, but I have to admit I'm relieved that you'll be leaving Vanara soon." Sinclair declares, surprising me. "Damon knows you're here and he believes I'm out of the way. I'm sure he views you and Rafe as the last threats standing between him and world domination."

Understanding clicks at once, "So we may be more at risk?" I muse aloud, probing our bond for signs of alarm. "And you're still going to let me go?"

"Don't make me think about it too hard, trouble." Sinclair teases, his voice barely more than a growl. "But yes, I believe we made the right decision – though I'm going to arrange more security for you on the journey."

I smother a groan, I really don't want to travel with an entire army, but I'll be damned if I'm going to complain when I know how hard it was for my mate to agree to this plan in the first place. No doubt sensing my reluctance, Sinclair chuckles, kissing me again. 'Thank you for understanding, little wolf. I promise I'm not going to go overboard.'

"Suuree." I tease, "just like when you promised not to get carried away last night?"

He offers me a wolfish grin, and I wonder if it was a mistake to remind him of our marathon lovemaking. After all, we still have a few minutes to spare and his wolf is even more insatiable than usual amidst all this stress. 'That was different, you know I can't resist the taste of your sweet p- Ah, hello Gabriel.' Sinclair abruptly cuts off his sentence as the King rounds the corner in front of us.

Gabriel rolls his eyes, "like I can't guess where that sentence was going? I swear, you two are determined to scandalize my entire palace.”

“He’s just jealous.” Sinclair whispers in my ear, making me giggle. “He wishes he had a mate to love him senseless every night.

The King merely crosses his arms over his chest. “Are you quite finished? There is a war on, you know?”

“We know. And we’re sorry.” I profess earnestly.

“I’m not.” Sinclair mutters unhelpfully. I swat his arm and he pinches my bottom, making me squeak in surprise.

“We’re ready.” I assure Gabriel, though in truth I’m feeling rather breathless.

No less exasperated than before, the King pushes open the doors to his largest conference room, revealing the assembled Vanaran delegations and a large television screen mounted on the far wall. We take our seats at the head of the table, and then Gabriel opens the call interface.

None of us really know what to expect, and I can only hope that the wolves around me have enough sense and diplomatic skill not to insult the humans with whom we’re about to speak. We’ve done our best to ensure everyone is on the same page about how important a human alliance is – as it’s the only thing which might keep the whole of the shifter world from descending on Vanara while the countries they leave behind collapse.

Of course, the very last thing I expect to see when the screen comes to life, is the woman I once considered to be the leader of my own city. Sinclair’s hands tighten on me when he sees the familiar face of the Moon Valley mayor fill the call window. As far as I know, the last time they saw each other was after the rogue attack in Old Town and she certainly hadn’t been friendly then. On the contrary, she was Damon’s ally.

Chapter 237 – Human Meeting

Sinclair

It's no easy feat to calm my wolf. The moment he sees the cold-hearted human who confronted us after Damon's rogue attack at the Solstice, he begins clawing at the surface of my skin, begging to get out. I desperately work to keep my face blank, though I know my mate can sense my surprise and fury.

She rests one small hand on my thigh, gently caressing my tense muscles. My wolf relaxes slightly, but not nearly enough. He's growling in my head all the way through the introductions, which take much longer than I'd like.

When it's my turn to greet her, I summon my strength. "Madame Mayor." Somehow I manage to say it without enmity, "I didn't realize it was you who would be joining us."

"I think you'll find I'm the only reason anyone is joining at all." The former Moon Valley mayor, a woman by the name of Sabina Kelly, replies coolly. At first her words don't make sense, but then the video pans out, revealing that she is far from the only guest joining this call. Grim-faced men line the table on either side of her, and though some are as unknown to me as any stranger, others are surprisingly familiar. I see legislators, governors and leading activists from the human world, even a few politicians to whom we reached out with no reply. I can scarcely wrap my mind around the assembled delegates before Sabina is speaking again. "Nor can I rightly claim the title of mayor since Damon saw fit to depose me."

"Well with all due respect, you are an elected official – Damon is not." I reply, falling back on my diplomatic training to smooth the troubled waters between us. "So I would prefer to call you by the title your people afforded you."

I'm thankful my mouth is still working, because my mind is reeling. The last time I spoke to this woman she seemed to truly hate me – not that she cared for shifters in general. I'll never forget the way she sneered the words "your kind" at me that day, foisting blame for the attack onto all wolves as if we've all been cut from the same cloth. Of course that was merely one incident in a hundred. I can't remember ever having a productive conversation with her throughout the entirety of our acquaintance.

"Thank you." Sabina answers hesitantly. "Though I want to be very clear that we only agreed to this meeting to hear what you have to say. Those of us in power have known about shifters for some time now, but the last month has inflicted lasting scars on our people. We cannot overlook the violence you have inflicted upon our communities as of late."

"I understand, and I must tell you that humans are not the only ones suffering under Damon's rule." I reply steadily. "Our own people are suffering gravely under his tyranny, and it is our greatest wish to remove him from power.” I turn my gaze on each of the humans individually.” Whatever Dmaon has led you to believe about humans and wolf-kind, I’m here to tell you that he does not speak the truth. We are not all so backwards and violent – we do not all think as he does.”

‘Then how do you think?’ A man I don’t recognize inquires.

“Perhaps it would be best if you heard from someone to whom the knowledge of wolf-kind came as a very recent surprise.” Gabriel suggests, nodding to Ella.

My mate leans forward, resting her clasped hands on the table. ‘Thank you, Gabriel,’ She begins hesitantly, “It might surprise you to hear that, despite my current position, I was raised among humans in Moon Valley. In fact, I believed I was human until a couple of months ago, so there are actually a few of you who have been in on the secret even longer than I have.” I watch the humans closely as Ella’s words hit home, noticing a few confused expressions and curious grumbles.

“When Dominic told me about shifters I thought he was out of his mind, until I saw proof which made it impossible to deny. It took a lot of time for me to adjust to the new reality, to understand the way of wolves and my place in this world. I’m still learning every day, and it isn’t easier just because my wolf is now awake. But part of what makes adjusting so difficult is that shifters are as varied and diverse as any other society.” She pauses, making eye contact with each of the faces on the screen. “I would never dream of meeting someone from Sevka and assuming that they represent every being on that continent. There are good and bad people in every community, and even those designations are misleading, as each of us is the result of the experiences which shaped our lives.”

Ella glances at me for reassurance, and my wolf purrs through our bond as she continues. ‘The point is simply that while shifters share a great deal in common biologically, culture and personality are different matters entirely. Damon is, in my opinion, the worst of the worst. It would be a mistake to judge him for being a wolf, because that isn’t the proper frame of reference. He didn’t take over our home because he’s a shifter, he did it because he’s a power-hungry narcissist with too many resources in reach.” She purses her lips, uncertain about her next piece of advice. “Instead, I would beseech you to remember the centuries of peace we enjoyed living among shifters without ever knowing it.”

“You mean the centuries and centuries you lied to us?” Another human counters gruffly.

“I’m sorry,” Ella sighs, “But what nation hasn’t lied to one another in order to advance their own peoples? Have you all announced every technology, innovation and defense strategy your country employs? Or have you safeguarded sensitive information to avoid greater competition or harm?”

“But we aren’t all separate nations.” One of the activists objects, “as you said, we lived side by side.”

“Side by side, with independent governments.” I chime in, holding my mate a bit closer. “Besides, the secrecy pact did not apply universally. Your leaders knew of shifters, and select humans were brought to work with shifters because of their expertise in their fields. Our governments have been working together all along, and though the secrecy among the general public may not inspire trust, any rational actor can understand why it might feel necessary. We wanted to avoid precisely this scenario.”

“Has it occurred to you that this scenario only occurred because of the secrecy, not despite it?” A legislator asks shrewdly.

“Yes.” I confess. “You have no idea how that very question has kept me up at night. And though we may all be guilty of perpetuating it, like you we were born into a system our ancestors created. We did what we thought was best, however misguided.” I exhale, letting them see the full weight of my guilt. “The point is that right or wrong, shifters only want what is best for our families and our people. We do not want violence and war, we do not want Damon in power.”

Sabina clears her throat, and I hold my breath – praying she won’t say anything to undermine our message. “The reason I asked you all to join me today is because I have insight from the experience of working with both the Usurper and Alpha Sinclair. Before the coup and my exile to Sevka, I thought much like you did. I put up with shifters because I had no other choice, and I didn’t like it.” She confesses. “Frankly, I believed that Alpha Dominic was full of it. Damon convinced me that his public persona was all a show – that he was nothing more than a con artist who hoped to steal the crown by acting like a moralizing, bleeding heart, charmer.”

“Then the war came, and I saw that I’d believed the wrong man.” Sabina carries on, shamefaced. “Alpha Dominic tried to expose Damon’s crimes, but instead of answering for them the Usurper sped up his plans for takeover. In truth, I’ve come to believe that Dominic’s accusations are the only reason we’ve held off as well as we have – they forced Damon to rush and act before he was ready.”

My jaw drops, and Ella sweetly sets it back in place with one small finger.

Perhaps I’m an idiot, but that possibility – the idea that I might have helped lessen the damage by speaking out when I did – has never occurred to me before. I can’t express how badly I want it to be true, though I know wishful thinking can be a dangerous thing.

“I made the mistake of believing Damon when he told me you weren’t a fit ruler.” Sabina forges on, speaking directly to me now. “When he told me that he would protect humans and wolves alike if he came to power. It isn't easy to admit just how wrong I was, but it would be an even greater betrayal of my people to do nothing now, when you have reached out to us in friendship."

Again Sabina looks to the other humans. "We have a common enemy with these shifters, and the situation is dire enough that we cannot be choosy. Luckily that's not a problem, because Dominic is the ally I would choose above anyone else. He is a good man, a selfless leader who cares more about wolves and humans alike. He is brave enough to stand for the things that truly matter, strong enough to defend us, and smart enough to know when to fight and when to hold off. I encourage all of you to give this alliance your full consideration and spread the word throughout your network. We do not have to be alone in this fight."

To my amazement, a number of the other humans are nodding in agreement. I can scarcely believe this is really happening, but when I look to my mate, she's sending me an incandescent smile. "I couldn't have said it better myself."

Chapter 238 – Hypnosis Part 4

Trigger warning: suicidal ideation – please take care!

Ella

We've all been on a high ever since our meeting with the humans yesterday. No one expected more than one contact to attend, and we certainly didn't anticipate Sabina Kelly. I was prepared to have a knock down, drag out fight in order to convince them to even give us a chance, but Moon Valley's exiled mayor did all the work for us.

We later learned that our initial outreach fell on mostly deaf ears and if it hadn't been for Sabina, no one would have even considered our offer to talk. It's actually rather ironic – if Damon hadn't manipulated the woman she probably wouldn't have come forward, so his lack of scruples have directly laid the groundwork for his demise. Of course, this is nothing compared to learning that Sinclair may have prevented worse atrocities by moving against Damon when he did – I know that suggestion meant the world to him.

Still, it was not all so easy going. Many of the humans had very real concerns about creating alliances with actors who are basically political unknowns, and others seemed to genuinely struggle with fighting fire with fire. In the end the human representatives agreed to review our plans and provide feedback before undertaking further discussions about joining forces, and we're scheduled to reconvene next week. My hope is that they'll follow Sabina's example by spreading the word and encouraging more of their own allies to join the next meeting, but for the time being it's a waiting game.

I wish we had time to celebrate, because even though we didn't quite get a victory, I think it's important to celebrate the good things while we can. Instead I'm beginning my fourth hypnosis appointment. Sinclair and I agreed to try one last session with Leon before I set out to find my mother, and as happy as I am to have my mate beside me, I'm not looking forward to uncovering another painful episode from my past.

"How are you feeling, trouble?" Sinclair asks, stroking my hair as I lay on the sitting room sofa. His wolf has been even more protective and bossy than usual in the face of my impending departure, and it doesn't help that I've been a walking basket case this morning. He's done his level best to keep me calm and relaxed up to this point, and now the ether is taking the wheel. My senses are already dulling beneath the familiar fog of the drug – if it wasn't for the solid cushions around me I might think I'm floating.

"Twirly." I answer with a giggle, petting his scruffy jaw and admiring his beautiful green eyes. The edges of his massive shape are blurring, and the room beyond his broad shoulders disappears completely. His face is the only thing in focus, and I wouldn't have it any other way.

"Twirly hmm?" Sinclair grins, catching my wrist and kissing my palm. He's already purring, and belatedly I wonder if I can convince him to lie down with me. There's not really room for both of us on the sofa, but I could lie on top of him or sit in his lap. The mere thought of feeling his arms wrapped around me sends my wolf into a fit of longing.

"You're too far away." I complain, not answering his question.

"I'm right here, little wolf." He reminds me, his deep voice tender. "I've got you, and I'm not going anywhere."

"But I want to cuddle." I pout, trying and failing to remember what else we're supposed to be doing.

"I will give you all the cuddles your little heart desires as soon as we're done." Sinclair promises, tracing his thumb over my protruding lower lip. I nip at the digit, catching it between my sharp fangs and running my tongue over the salty surface. His wolf rumbles in my head and my inner animal shivers with delight. She's nuzzling and rubbing all over him, but he holds strong, replete with stern amusement.

"I think it may be better if you two had some more space between you." Leon advises from somewhere behind Sinclair. The sound of his voice makes me jolt, as I'd completely forgotten he's here.

"I think you should focus on your job and leave my mate to me." Sinclair counters in a low growl. The nerve of the man. He says through our bond, Telling me what to do with my own, sweet mate. I've killed men for less.

Have you really? I ask, not pausing to wonder why the idea of violence delights me so much.

No, but it is tempting. He answers darkly, flashing his fangs and making me giggle again.

"With all due respect Alpha, Ella needs to be able to focus on the session." Leon replies easily. "Right now she's so caught up in you that accessing her memories will be impossible."

Sinclair grumbles in displeasure, but retracts his talented hands. "Alright sweetheart, you heard the mean man." He tells me regretfully. "We have to focus." I stretch my neck so I can see past Sinclair and stick my tongue out at Leon, and though he doesn't say a word I know Sinclair wants to laugh and scold me for being naughty, i

"Okay Ella." Leon says, clearly trying to take control again. "Close your eyes and let the ether take you back. Forget all your troubles, everything that's happening in the here and now. Clear your mind and let the memories come to you." He speaks in the same soporific tone he always uses, but the addition of Sinclair's steady presence and comforting purrs allow me to fall into the mysterious realm faster than ever. Soon I'm gliding along on a river of consciousness that is neither dream nor reality, strange images swirling through my mind and evoking emotions I can't quite grasp.

Everything seems surreal and yet out of reach, but I'm becoming used to these altered states and I can't find much frightening when Sinclair is with me.

"The last time we met, you recalled meeting a mysterious woman at the orphanage Leon prompts.

"The Goddess." I correct him, my words slurring slightly.

"The Goddess," He agrees, "can you remind me how you felt when you spoke to her?"

"I felt..." I pause, considering the question. "Safe. Loved... like I had a purpose."

"Is that an unusual feeling for you? Having a purpose?" Leon inquires, latching onto the offered information with the demeanor of a tracker on a scent.

I hadn't thought about it before, but now that he mentions it... "Yes." I confirm, my voice suddenly thick with emotion. "That was the only time in my entire childhood that I ever felt as if my life had meaning. As if there was a reason I was put on this earth... I don't know why though, she was just telling me a story."

"Because it was your story." Leon assesses, his voice gentle. "But try not to get too caught up in logic or reason. Just follow that thread... the ether is leading you somewhere, Ella."

"I don't know where." I answer with mild frustration. "It wasn't fun feeling that way... there were times..." I trail off, balking at the morose emotions bubbling up inside of me.

"There were times that what?" Leon presses, "keep going."

And just like that the room dissolves.

I'm 16 years old and it's the dead of night. I'm standing on a bridge overlooking the frozen river, wondering how cold the water would feel against my skin... wondering how long it would take to pull me under... to freeze me too. Is my body even heavy enough to break through the ice?

Would I simply be crushed against the gleaming surface like a big blonde bug?

Cora's face appears in my mind and guilt slams into me for even considering this. I can't leave her alone in the world... but what is there to leave her to? Every day is the same – more pain, more hardship and sorrow. I've become skilled at burying the hurt, but my sister suffers every blow as if it's the first. I can't stand it. People only seem to want to harm us, and try as I might, I can't see any way out. I just want it to stop.

But if it stops for me, it would be a new beginning for Cora – and not the good kind. It would drag her to a new depth of despair and leave her vulnerable to everything from which I've tried to shield her. I can't intentionally inflict that kind of harm... but what if it wasn't intentional...

what if it was merely an unfortunate accident? I could try balancing on the bridge's railing, and leave the outcome upto fate. If I cross the bridge that way and don't fall it would be a sign to keep going, and if I do... then at least I know my pain will be at an end.

I'm going to do it. After all... what do I have to lose

Chapter 239 – Vision

Trigger warning: suicidal ideation – please take care!

Ella

I'm about to hoist myself up onto the frozen railing when two robed figures appear on either side of me, their faces both familiar and strange. There's something about them that sets off alarms in my mind, but not the usual kind. It feels as though I'm trying to remember something from another life ... from someone else's life.

I don't have the faintest idea where they came from, and I don't really care. Cora's safe at the orphanage and it's not as if they can do worse to me than what I've already survived. Maybe this is even fate answering my question, giving me a way out in her typical morbid fashion. Perhaps an icy plunge is too easy an end for me, perhaps I must know one final agony before I go. "Are you here to kill me?" I ask in a voice I don't recognize.

"Do you want to die?" One asks, leaning his arms against the icy metal.

"It's not that I want to die." I hiccup, tears falling from my lashes and freezing against my cheeks. "It's just that I don't want to live if this is all life has to offer... and I'm afraid that this is truly all there is for me. I have no reason to believe otherwise." I shake my head forlornly, "they say the definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over but expecting different results. So I would be crazy to think I can keep meeting the sun each morning without inviting more heartache... wouldn't I?"

"That depends. What you call crazy, others might call hope." The second man replies, making no move to look at or touch me. The three of us simply stare out at the frozen expanse with the same melancholy spirit, watching the river rushing below the ice so far below.

"Hope is a privilege for those born in the light." I reply, not entirely understanding where these words are coming from. "They know that the darkness is only temporary because they don't belong there... but how am I to believe in light when I've never seen it?"

"And if we were to give you a glimpse of the future?" The first man offers. "If we were to show you a vision of the life you might have one day, if you find the will to believe despite your experiences?"

"You can do that?" I ask, turning to look at him for the first time.

"Only if you are brave enough to take the risk." The second answers.

"And only if you are willing to fight for your future." The first man adds. "The vision we give you will only be a possibility – one in a hundred – of the person you might become if you refuse to give up. It is not guaranteed, and it is not entirely in your control. Countless actions and decisions shape our futures, and we can only tell you that this may come to pass if everything goes right.”

“Show me.” I beg, somehow believing they have this power even though there’s no such thing as magic. Perhaps I’ve lost my mind. Perhaps I’ve already jumped and this is all a hallucination on the brink between worlds.

The robed men take hold of my hands in perfect synchrony, and I let them. As our palms connect a brilliant white light surges between our skin. It’s so bright I have to shut my eyes against the glare, but it does not hurt – it does not burn me as it probably should. Energy surges through my body, so potent and wild that I feel like I’m being electrocuted. I open my mouth to cry out, but before any sound can escape my lips a torrent of color bursts in my mind’s eye.

I see a woman who looks exactly like me, only much older. Her belly is not bloated with hunger, her skin is not lifeless and pale. She’s clean and healthy, wearing a dress which must cost more than everything I’ve ever owned – combined. She moves with such an easy grace, and when she smiles I understand why people tell me I’m beautiful.

The woman is looking at something I cannot see, grinning with an overwhelming joy I can’t even begin to understand. In the next moment I see a man more than twice her size, who is as handsome as he is terrifying. He moves with the lethal grace of a predator, and there’s a vicious edge to his bronzed, raven-haired beauty. He approaches her like a wolf stalking his prey, but she isn’t afraid. He pulls her into his strong arms and kisses her soundly, and when they part she looks down at a tiny bundle in his arms.

They coo and croon over a baby with rose gold hair and a pink bow, pulling faces and tickling the infant’s swaddled tummy. Then a rush of pure exuberance bursts into the serene scene, and three bundles of energy come zooming into sight. There’s a boy around five years old, who is the spitting image of the huge man. He races forward and crashes into his parents’ legs, wrapping his arms around each and grinning mischievously up at them. A pair of toddlers quickly follow, one who appears to be a miniature version of the older boy, and the other an angelic looking girl with the same coloring as the babe.

They pile into the group hug and their father bends down to scoop them up into his arms, balancing the three older children while his wife cradles the youngest. I can hear their laughter, but I can feel it too. Their happiness is foreign to me and yet so contagious, merely watching them makes me feel as if I’ve swallowed the sun. Is that what they feel every day? Is it possible to ever be so full of emotion when the void inside of me is so bottomless?

The vision disappears as quickly as it came, and when I open my eyes again they're full of tears. "That's me?" I choke, "I could have a family one day? That family?"

"Only if you are willing to fight for it." The second man repeats. "Nothing is handed to us in life, especially not this. It will be a difficult road ahead, but there are rewards at the end if you're brave enough to make the journey."

"Haven't I already been through enough?" I ask, wondering why some people do seem to be handed everything, while others must constantly struggle.

"The trials you've overcome have ensured you're strong enough to win the fight, but you have to enter it yourself. You have to want to win, Ella." The first man explains.

"How do you know my name?" I ask, but I never get my answer. The men turn and walk away, and ten minutes later I don't remember meeting them at all. In fact, I don't remember why I'm out here in the middle of the night or what I'm doing standing on this bridge. Certain I'm going to catch my death from cold, I hurry back to the orphanage and my sister – praying no one noticed my absence.

The memory fades away as Leon calls me back to the present, "Come back to us, now." He encourages. "You did so well."

"I'm here, Ella." Sinclair purrs, his lips grazing my tear-stained cheek. "I'm here, I've got you."

I open my eyes and find my mate watching me with shining eyes. His hand rests on my swollen middle, calming our unborn pup as I struggle to resurface. "I saw you." I tell him in amazement. "I saw you... and Rafe" I recall, remembering the oldest boy in the vision. "There were other pups too."

"I know." Sinclair beams, kissing me softly. "I know, baby. I'm so proud of you."

"Does that..." I trail off, trying to wrap my mind around the scene we just witnessed. Unfortunately the ether is still in control, and I almost lose my train of thought. "Does that mean we're fated somehow?"

Sinclair frowns. "Wolves only get one fated mate, sweetheart. I think that was just a possibility of our paths crossing one day if you chose to live. You heard what the priests said – nothing they showed you was guaranteed."

"But you told me sometimes mates are fated, not because they're good together, but in order to become the people they're meant to be." I remind him stubbornly, hoping that my logic is being guided by evidence and not the ether. "I was born to unite humans and wolves in this war, and you were destined to lead the resistance. You had to be with Lydia in order to become the man you are today... to this point in your life without children so that you would turn to the sperm bank precisely when I did. If you hadn't then my wolf would never wake and we would never have Rafe... what is that if not fate?"

Sinclair smiles tenderly, "Maybe you're right... after all, these sessions have taught us that shifters don't understand our world nearly as well as we think we do. Maybe it's possible to have more than one destined mate."

For a long moment we get completely lost in each other's eyes, and before too long all the twirly sensations I'd been feeling earlier come surging back at full force. However we don't get to indulge ourselves for too long because, ever the therapist, Leon finds a way to bring us back down to earth.

"Ella, I think we might be better served addressing the things which took you to that bridge in the first place." Leon suggests.

"Leon?" Sinclair responds, not taking his eyes off of me.

"Yes, Alpha?" The therapist inquires eagerly.

Put a sock in it.

Chapter 240 – Ella and Sinclair Celebrate

Ella

After Leon leaves Sinclair takes me to bed, though not for the reason I initially hoped. I cling to him as he tries to place me in my nest, “What are you doing?” I inquire indignantly.

“Trying to help you get comfortable.” He replies, petting my cheek. “You need to rest.”

“You promised we’d cuddle.” I remind him, refusing to let go. I wrap my legs around his back, hanging off of him like a very round sloth.

“I did, but I think we both know that’s not what you’re interested in right now.” Sinclair rumbles affectionately, gently detaching my limbs from his big body. I huff and stretch out beneath him, wriggling out of my clothes and enticing him with my lush curves. His emerald eyes rake over my naked skin with open appreciation, and I hear his wolf grumbling with barely contained desire.

He’s not wrong about my intentions. This is the ether’s doing – a side effect I haven’t yet experienced because Sinclair hasn’t been with me during the previous sessions. The drug is not only consuming my mind in a haze of dreamy images and surreal illusions, but the euphoric sensations which once seemed like innocent joy now translate into overwhelming lust.

With Sinclair’s heady aroma and dominant energy filling my senses, my limbs become deliciously heavy, and a sultry heat radiates from my core. My blood simmers and pulses, accumulating in my breasts and dripping sex, swelling them with carnal need. My love for my mate is so powerful in this moment that I can’t even contemplate keeping it to myself. It wants to pour out of me in a great rush, to drown my mate in affection and bring us both to rapture.

“We just discovered something wonderful, Dominic.” I state in a voice as smooth as silk. “We should celebrate.”

Sinclair sighs, fluffing the pillows around my body and tucking me beneath a weighted blanket. “I hate to say it but I don’t think you’re in the right state of mind for that.” He declares firmly, his tone leaving no room for argument. “Besides, not all of that memory was good, my love. Are you sure you aren’t just focusing on the nice part to avoid thinking about the rest?”

“Of course I’m sure.” I counter stubbornly, pushing the blanket off of me and sidling closer to him. “The ether isn’t making me imagine I want you, Dominic. I always want you.” I profess, leaning into his side and kissing his neck. “Are you truly going to deny me just because I’m a little high?”

'That's exactly what I'm going to do, you naughty thing.' Sinclair answers sternly, "now stop flirting with me and lie down."

My wolf whines pitifully, and I slump back against the pile of pillows. Sinclair's hungry gaze follows my every move, and I sense his dire temptation through our bond. A flash of devious inspiration strikes, and I part my legs, letting him see just how aroused I am—ensuring my scent assails him at full force.

Sinclair groans, his wolf snarling with frustration and heightening my arousal even further. "Such a brazen little wolf." He croons, towering over my prone body with dark, sensual intent. 'You don't have any inhibitions right now, do you, trouble?' He observes, sliding his fingers through my slick cleft, teasing my aching clit with a featherlight touch that nonetheless makes me arch and cry out. "Putting this sweet pussy on display like this... tempting me with all your honey?" He removes his hand only to take his fingers into his mouth, licking my arousal from his long fingers with a rumble of pleasure. The scandalous sight leaves me panting, but then Sinclair captures my nape in his powerful grip, lowering his face until our noses are practically touching. "Do you really believe I'm going to let you get away with it?"

I nod hopefully, but my mate's ominous chuckle makes my heart sink. "Wrong answer, baby." He nips my trembling lower lip. "When the ether wears off I'm going to rut you senseless, but not before I teach you what happens to bad girls who try to top from the bottom."

"But you've done that before." I object, my sex clenching with the memory of the night he finally claimed me.

"Well clearly the lesson didn't stick." Sinclair rumbles, kissing me fiercely. * Lucky for you I'm a very patient wolf."

To my utter dismay, my mate is as good as his word. A few hours later I'm spread-eagled on the bed with Sinclair's head buried between my legs, his talented tongue tormenting me to no end.

'This isn't fair!' I whimper desperately, "I was high!" I've been spanked and worked up into an impossible lather, forced to orgasm over and over again as my mate overwhelms me with more pleasure than I can bear. I never know how Sinclair is going to punish me, and today he seems to have decided to teach me to be careful what I wish for – by giving me too much of it. Frankly I can't decide whether it's worse to be overwhelmed with too many climaxes or denied them until I'm a begging, babbling mess. At this point I'm so sensitive that the slightest touch can send me over the edge again, detonating in a terrifying blend of ecstasy and pain.

“And you were a defiant imp who left me with blue balls all day long.” Sinclair replies, guiding me onto my hands and knees. ‘You’re lucky I’m so proud of you, or I might have refused to claim you at all.’”

I scoff before I can think better of it, “Fat chance, with me leaving in less than a week. I’m surprised your wolf even lets me out of bed.”

“Is that so?” Sinclair responds, his deep bass full of foreboding. ‘Then perhaps we aren’t finished yet, after all.’”

Despite his words, I hear his belt buckle clink and my wolf sags with relief. Finally, she moans in my head, driving me to sway my punished bottom in invitation. As raw as my intimate flesh is, nothing compares to being filled and marked by my mate, and she won’t be satisfied until he takes this final step.

Sinclair growls, dragging his hard length through my sodden folds, using my own arousal to coat his huge cock before pressing the thick tip to my back entrance. I jolt slightly, because we’ve only done this in our dreams. Sinclair purrs and rests his free hand on the small of my back, rubbing my lumbar in soothing circles. “Easy, sweetheart.” He encourages, some of the fire fading from his voice. “I’ll go slow.”

I whine as he presses forward, feeling the foreign stretch of my forbidden channel. My cheeks flush with embarrassment as his thick head finally pops inside, feeling so strange and wrong... so oddly exquisite. “That’s it,” He praises, reaching down to stroke my overly-sensitized clit. All of my inner muscles clench and a moan escapes my lips as Sinclair eases further inside me. “Good girl, just relax. Remember how much you loved this the first time? How you came to pieces before I could even think about touching your needy clit?”

I shake my head, not understanding why something that sounds so wrong can excite me so much. I know Sinclair loves scandalizing my sensibilities, but that doesn’t explain why I enjoy it in equal measure. When he’s finally buried to the hilt Sinclair drags my back up against his chest, claiming my mouth as I adjust to his size. My lips part on a silent gasp when he begins to pull out, and he swallows the non-sound with a ravenous purr.

Sinclair withdraws almost entirely before thrusting back inside of me in a single move, and I cry out as his flared cockhead rubs up against my g-spot through the thin walls separating my passages. He does it again and again, and before I know it I’m abruptly thrown over the edge of orgasm. It seems like too much too fast, but my body is strung as tight as a bow after all his expert handling. ‘You see?’ Sinclair growls, all predator now, ‘Your body was made for me, we fit together so perfectly that you can’t help but find pleasure in anything we do.’”

There’s a note of pure elation in his voice, and I understand he was every bit as eager to celebrate our newly fated status as I was – he simply had more patience. A tiny ache I hadn't realized I was carrying eases in my chest, comforted to discover the desire wasn't one-sided. "Mine," He purrs, increasing the pace of his thrusts as his hands work wonders on my breasts and clenching sex. "My fated Ella. I knew you were meant for me. You're too perfect not to be – everything I could ever dream of and more."

At any other time I might try to tell him that I'm far from perfect, but I know there's no reasoning with his wolf right now. If I try it will undoubtedly result in another spanking... though now that I think of it... "I'm not perfect."

Chapter 241 – Hope

Ella

Sinclair's heartbeat thumps steadily beneath my ear as his hands move over my body, massaging away all the kinks in my overworked muscles. I've been fading in and out of consciousness for the last hour, floating in a very different kind of high than the one induced by ether. Sinclair tells me it's not unusual for she-wolves to enter a heightened plane of consciousness amidst such an onslaught of pleasure, but I'm still getting used to the violent surge of endorphins holding my body captive.

I feel completely boneless in my mate's arms and I really don't want to move, but my stomach is growling and I can sense Rafe's hunger through our bond. Sinclair senses this too, gently untangling our bodies so he can rise. I murmur in complaint and he kisses my hair, promising to return with food. I snuggle deeper into the plush bedding as his footsteps recede, still reveling over the information revealed in my most recent hypnosis session.

Audible Gift Memberships

It's not that I find the idea of chosen mates any less romantic or important than fated ones. In fact, in some ways I think chosen mates are more special because they derive from a love which transcends divine power.

No, I think Sinclair and I are simply so happy because this news confirms what we've both felt for some time now: that we were made for one another and nothing in this world can come between us now that we've found each other.

Of course it's not merely comforting, it also bolsters our spirits in the face of the war ahead. When Sinclair returns from the kitchens carrying a tray piled high with my favorite foods, I confess just how profoundly the priests' vision impacted me.

"I know it was meant to give me hope back then, but I think I needed to see it now too. I needed to know there's a chance we can beat Damon – that we can be that happy." I say softly, accepting a bite of strawberry from his hand. "I understand it's only one possibility, but if we can figure out how to win this war then that beautiful family – that incredible future is somewhere in our cards... we just have to play the right ones."

"I needed it too." Sinclair admits, holding a cheese-laden cracker to my lips. I accept the bite and chew, but I'm surprised to hear my mate disclose such doubts. He's always so confident and in control, and though it may seem counter-intuitive, it's a comfort to know he worries about our future just as much as I do.

"Really?" I ask, once I've swallowed the tasty morsel.

“You and Rafe are my strength, Ella.

Sinclair answers, his voice like gravel. You’re what keeps me going in my darkest moments. When everything else in the world seems wrong, I sleep easy knowing that there are at least two things which are so right it hurts... so much so that I’m afraid I wouldn’t be able to go on if anything happened to you.” He offers me a tender smile. “You’re not the only one whose world was turned upside down when we met, trouble.”

“That’s why it was so hard for you to agree to let me go.” I assess, stroking his cheek.

“That and because I’m a greedy bastard who wants my sweet mate within reach at all times.” Sinclair quips, only half-joking.

But yes, it will be easier to watch you drive away next week knowing that our family has a chance to not only survive, but thrive and grow even larger and more wonderful.” He sighs, reclining next to me and nibbling a piece of chocolate. “And if I’m being completely honest, it helped convince my wolf that finding your mother is the right move.” A wry canine grin flashes over his gorgeous features. “He doesn’t always respond to logic with the same ease I do.”

I chuckle, but my amusement with the ironic statement is short-lived. “I wish you could come with me.” I share, gnawing on my lower lip. “It is the right decision, isn’t it?”

I’m not sure where this sudden rush of doubt comes from, but I do realize why I couldn’t acknowledge it before now. I needed Sinclair to be entirely on board with the plan before wavering, because now that we’re on the same page the stakes aren’t simply about missing one another or safety they’re about strategic value.

“I’m afraid so.” My mate nods, offering me another strawberry. “The Goddess set all this in motion, and so far she hasn’t led us astray. Everything that has gone right has been part of her plan, so it only makes sense that we continue down that path.”

“Okay.” I nod, feeling the knot in my stomach ease. “I promise I’ll do everything in my power to ensure we have that future together.”

“So will I.” Sinclair vows, “But we can’t let it make us complacent or take it for granted. You remember what the priests said? There are no guarantees. One wrong move and it could slip through our fingers.”

“I know.” I confirm, knowing Sinclair is only reminding me because he’s so afraid that it won’t come to be. It terrifies me too.

He’s holding up a bite of chicken now, but I ignore it, leaning past his hand to steal a kiss. He cradles my head as we melt into the intimate act, his tongue teasing the seam of my lips and delving into my mouth. He tastes me with languid ease, running his hands over my belly as Rafe flutters and kicks. The pup has been radiating happiness ever since the session, no doubt feeding off of our own joy.

Of course, when we part Sinclair is watching me with an intensity that goes beyond mere affection. "Do you want to talk about the rest of the memory?" He asks.

I exhale, snagging the chicken from his fingers and using it as an excuse to delay my answer. When I finish chewing I say, "It's strange. This morning I had no recollection of ever feeling that way. I've experienced depressions and low points of course, but I always thought I pulled through because I had no other choice." I frown, not wanting to acknowledge this new window into my past. "But now that the ether has uncovered it, I remember every detail, every dreadful ounce of that pain and hopelessness."

Sinclair doesn't say anything, simply humming in sympathy and feeding me another bite. "I'm so ashamed that I ever considered abandoning Cora that way." I confess, already wanting to change the subject again. I can feel tears welling, and I don't want to trade this glowing warmth for the doom and gloom of my past. Even so, I know my mate won't let me get away with avoiding this conversation. "I spent so many years wondering what I'd done to deserve my life... why I was being punished. I couldn't figure out what I'd done wrong, and eventually I did start to tell myself it had to be for some larger purpose... that there was a reason I was suffering." I pause, swiping at an escaped tear. "I told myself I was being challenged so I could grow up and do great things: help others, prevent other children from experiencing the same horrors."

I shake my head, choking on my next words. "But that day one of the boys I'd considered.

to be part of our little orphan pack died. He was only 7, and he'd gone to a foster family just a couple of weeks earlier." I explain, everything rushing back at once. "They killed him after everything he survived at the orphanage... and suddenly it hit me – none of it was happening for a reason, and I wasn't special. How could I be, when every child around me was being abused in the same way?"

Sinclair starts to purr, and I can hear his wolf whining in my head. I try to pull back on my feelings so that they don't all flow through our bond, but my mate growls in warning and I surrender. "His death gutted me. It was proof that there was no hope for any of us – a reminder that too many people never make it to a better life... that people are cruel for the sake of being cruel and some lives are just short and brutal – full stop..." Heaving in a shaking breath, I continue, "That was the one time I considered ending it all, and I'm so glad now that I didn't."

Sinclair caresses my hair, "They showed you that you'd been right all along... you were being tested.”

“That isn’t the reason.” I correct him softly. “Because the rest is still true... the others didn’t have to go through all that. It happened because there are too many broken people in this world, and the vision didn’t change that reality.” I move my hands to my belly, taking strength from the tiny life within. “I hung on because they showed me I could be happy one day. I saw you and Rafe and the babies we could yet conceive. It didn’t matter whether I was being tested... I just needed to know there was hope things could be different in the future... I wish that every person who feels trapped and without a way out could receive such a gift.”

“Ella, you do realize that you’ve given us all that gift today?” Sinclair asks gently, moving his hand to cover mine. I blink in confusion, and he smiles tenderly down at me.

“Everyone in this war is struggling to find a light in the darkness, and it’s getting harder every day. But that vision wasn’t just about you and me... it was about the future of the united packs – of our world.” He smiles, gazing at me with so much love my heart feels like it might burst. “Baby, that vision means we can win.”

Chapter 242 – Cora’s Determination

Ella

As per usual the news about my latest hypnosis session is all over the palace by the time Sinclair and I surface from our rooms. Thankfully not the details about my teenaged despair, rather the premonition of our potential victory.

I’ve realized how important it is to give people hope in this conflict ever since my early days visiting the refugees, but it really is remarkable the difference it can make in morale. In fact, the increase in public and political optimism is palpable as we attend the days’ scheduled summit events, the Alphas have even agreed to fly to the coast to witness the continental front of the refugee crisis first hand.

Unfortunately, there’s at least one person who isn’t thrilled by these revelations: my sister. I’m dressing for dinner when Cora ambles into my dressing room, her feet dragging with exhaustion. She slumps onto the chaise as I try on gowns, watching me with begrudging amusement.

“You know, just once I’d like to come home after a long day of surgeries and not discover that my little sister has accomplished some impossible feat yet again. What’s next, Ella? Are you going to grow a tail?”

Audible Gift Memberships

“I think you’ll find I’ve already done that.” I joke as my wolf wags her tail in my mind’s eye, eager to show off the beautiful rose-gold appendage.

“Har har,” Cora quips, rubbing her sore neck. “Come on then, tell me all about it.”

Sighing, I slip out of the red dress I was attempting to stretch over my belly and exchange it for a green number that will match Sinclair’s eyes. I’m not particularly eager to linger on this particular subject, but if she’s going to hear the story from anyone, it ought to be me.

I gradually share the details, stopping and starting as the emotions catch up to me, using my wardrobe dilemmas as an excuse to delay the inevitable. It’s a relief when the tale is finally complete. “So it turns out those priests weren’t all bad,” I conclude, “for everything they put me through, they also kept me going when I was ready to give up.”

I peek at Cora for the first time since I started talking and discover her cheeks streaked with tears. “You never told me.” She states hoarsely, and I feel as though I’ve been punched in the gut. I guiltily search my sister’s lovely face, hating the pain in her deep brown eyes. There’s a flash of betrayal, but also a deep hurt I understand all too well.

"I didn't even remember myself." I answer, my voice barely louder than a whisper. "I never wanted to leave you Cora, you and the other kids were the one thing that kept me hanging on."

"Is that supposed to make me feel better?" She asks, a bitter note in her melodic voice. "You only got that low because you were bearing the brunt of the hardship for all of us, and now you say we're also the reason you couldn't find peace."

"Because of how much I loved you." I beseech her, taking a seat near her hip. "And it wouldn't have been true peace, because I'd known I would be leaving so much pain behind for the people I cared about most. I would have missed out on my future – on seeing you become a doctor, on finding my own passion and meeting Sinclair... having this baby, waking my wolf."

"I understand that." Cora replies stiffly, "and I understand why you felt like you couldn't confide in me then when you were in the thick of it, but I never knew you got depressed at all. You always seemed to have it all together."

Wincing, I rest my hand on her arm, gently stroking her soft skin with the pad of my thumb. "I think you're rewriting history a bit there... you're the one who was always cautioning me not to bottle things up, to deal with our past."

"Yes, once we were adults and I realized that the only way you could have stayed so composed was to repress everything." Cora explains with obvious frustration. "It took a lot of therapy for me to reach that point – when we were children I truly thought you weren't fazed by any of it. It made me feel even weaker than I already did."

"I'm sorry." I profess earnestly. "I never wanted you to feel that way, and I hope you know that I was the weak one for avoiding my pain rather than facing it."

"Oh don't say that." Cora grumbles in typical contrary fashion. "You were in survival mode. It's not your fault you never felt safe enough to come out of it." An unidentified emotion flashes across her features, "besides, you've been the emotionally brave one lately."

"Oh?" I inquire, wagging my brows. "I don't suppose you're referring to a certain wolf with a sly smile and bedroom eyes?"

Cora glowers at me, "You know smug really isn't a good color on you."

"I'm not trying to be smug." I reply apologetically, leaning my shoulder against hers. "I've just never seen you like this."

"Like what? Annoyed?" Cora bites back, and I wonder if she's being intentionally contrary or if her emotions are simply so tangled and confused that she doesn't realize she's contradicting herself from one sentence to the next. "At my wits end over how to shake him off?"

"Cora you obviously like him." I reply in exasperations. "Scowl at me all you like, I'd have to be blind not to notice. The reason you can't shake him is because you don't really want to, and you can't lie to a wolf about your feelings. He's not going to give up when you're obviously denying yourself something you need."

"I'm so tired of that nonsense." Cora lashes out, surging up from the chaise. "So I find him attractive – maybe I even care about his well being. That doesn't mean I want to be in a relationship. It doesn't give him the right to overrule my decision."

I observe her for a long moment, trying to decide on the right response. It hasn't escaped my notice that the women in my life seem to be uniquely scarred when it comes to love, and it breaks my heart to see brilliant figures like Cora and Isabel so skittish of being hurt. "How do you know you don't want a relationship when you've never been in one – never even attempted to form that kind of connection with a lover?"

"It's not brussel sprouts, I don't need to try it to know I won't like it." Cora snaps, crossing her arms over her chest. "I'm not like you, Ella. I don't need a partner to feel complete, I love myself exactly as I am."

"I'm glad to hear that." I say, ignoring her barbed comment. "But I'm curious, if you don't want anything more, why did you say you haven't been brave lately?" Cora freezes like a deer in headlights, and I press, "Did all that therapy you did ever address why you don't let anyone get close to you?"

"It addressed the fact that I have legitimate reasons to fear intimacy." Cora replies stiffly, neatly sidestepping my first question. "And I also have legitimate reasons to distrust Roger, in case you've forgotten."

I shake my head as my patience with this game runs thin. "You should have been a lawyer." I remark dryly, pinning her in my crosshairs. "You started this conversation, big sister, not me. You obviously want to talk about it and it's frankly annoying that you're being so stubborn and evasive. You say you aren't brave, you say you have reasons to be afraid... so at least do us both the courtesy of being honest about what you want."

Cora's lower lip quivers. "I want to know what it feels like to love and be loved in return." She answers, staring at her feet. "But I don't want to risk having my heart broken."

"Then you will never know." I inform her, as gently as I can. "You can't experience real love if you don't ever let yourself fall, Cora. There is no reward without first taking a risk."

“Well that’s just stupid!” Cora exclaims indignantly, beginning to pace. “Why should I have to expose myself to harm in order to be happy?” She doesn’t give me time to respond, nor does she acknowledge that she essentially just admitted to being unhappy despite her earlier words. Instead she carries on as if she’s having a conversation with herself.

“This entire thing is messing with my head, maybe I don’t even like him and I’m just confused because of everything else that’s going on.” She muses, working herself up further. “In fact, now that I say it, I know that’s right.” She nods, turning back to me. “This trip is going to be a good thing – I need some time away to clear my head, to get Roger out of my system.”

My eyes roll into the back of my head, but a knock sounds at the door before I can tell her what a blockhead she’s being. “Come in!” I call, scenting my father-in-law.

Henry wheels inside and offers me a broad grin, looking so much like Sinclair that my heart pangs. “I think I’ve found your mother.”

Chapter 243 – Alliances

Ella

I stare at Henry in utter belief, my conversation with my impossible sister immediately slipping my mind. “You found her?” I gape, instinctively reaching for Cora’s hand. Her warm palm settles in mine, squeezing tightly.

“It wasn’t easy.” Henry admits, moving further into the room. “I reached out to every surviving contact I could think of, to no effect. Then I tried the news archives from the time, since they reported on the King’s death and Reina’s departure so thoroughly. They all said the same thing – that she was devoting herself to the Goddess, but none seemed to know where she was going to serve.”

Audible Gift Memberships

“So how did you figure it out?” Cora asks, sounding every bit as excited as I feel.

“I followed the money.” Henry explains, in a statement so vague and clichéd I could scream with impatience. “I had one of Gabriel’s computer forensic specialists hack into the royal banking records back home in Moon Valley. Luckily Damon hasn’t destroyed the financial archives dating back that far.” He shares eagerly. “He discovered that Queen Reina purchased a one-way trip to the Altaran islands just before the King’s death.”

“The Altaran islands?” I ask, racking my brains to try and place this name.

“They’re a remote island chain between the hidden territories and the royal continent,” Henry tells us, “so remote that all but the largest island are completely uninhabited. And the big island is only home to one thing: the most sacred temple known to shifters. It’s considered so hallowed that they don’t even allow pilgrimages to the site, only the most devout and worthy priests and priestesses are permitted to serve there.”

I press my hand to my racing heart, “so Reina wouldn’t be going there unless she intended to devote herself as a priestess.”

“Exactly,” Henry smiles, “and the fact that she was even allowed to go indicates that her journey was Goddess-blessed.”

“So how do we get there? How long will it take to reach the islands?” I ask, my blood feeling positively electric.

“You’ll have to go by ship.” Henry tells us with a small frown. “You can’t fly in the third trimester and I don’t even know if there’s access from the air. Reina traveled by boat, so you will too.” He pauses meaningfully, “I have to tell you that Dominic isn’t going to like it, though. There aren't any doctors or hospitals, no resources to help you if you encounter trouble."

"Surely there can't be safer hands than the Goddess's," I counter, practically bouncing up and down. "How long is the journey?" I ask again.

Henry chuckles, "If I were you I would try to show a bit more hesitation about the risks when you talk to your mate. But it will take no more than three days."

"That's amazing!" I burst, giving up the pretense of calm and throwing my arms around my sister. "I can't believe you found her! I can't believe I'm going to meet her!"

Cora hugs me back, and I'm beyond moved when she murmurs, "I'm so happy for you, Elle."

"Henry, you should come with us!" I suggest, glowing with happiness. "You know Reina, and I couldn't ask for a better travel companion."

"Hey," Cora objects in an offended tone.

"Except for Cora, but she's already coming." I amend, batting my lashes at my disgruntled sister.

To my surprise, Henry's face falls. "Yes, I know Reina." He says in a strange voice. "But if I'm being honest I'm not particularly eager to renew the acquaintance."

At once I remember that my birth father is responsible for the death of Henry's mate. I don't have any idea if my mother was in on the plot, but it's entirely understandable why Henry would want to keep his distance. "Oh Henry, I'm sorry. That was thoughtless of me."

"Nonsense." He waves my apologies away, wheeling forward to kiss my cheek. "Besides, Dominic needs me here – as an advisor. He's already arranged for you to have plenty of protection and company, and I think he's worried about being short-staffed as a result." This is news to me and I don't entirely understand his meaning, but I can't bring myself to care right now.

"Have you told him the news yet?" I ask, secretly hoping that he has so that the duty doesn't fall to me.

"No," Henry grins, reading my sly expression. "That's up to you, little mother."

I nod, hugging him tightly. "Thank you so much, Henry."

3rd Person

Damon stomped into his war room, raking his gaze over the scale model of the various battle fronts spread out on the center table. He growled with barely contained frustration, quickly losing control and slashing his arm over the tiny wax figures dotting the Southern border.

His troops had just called to report yet another loss – and to the humans of all people. It was one thing to be routed by the shifter resistance forces, but it was an insult to grievous injury to be defeated by such inferior beings. The furious emperor was ready to murder his war council, convinced that they'd do about as much good to him as corpses as they currently served as advisors.

Ever since the secrecy pack broke the humans had been an unforeseen and shocking complication. Sure, the same clowns who'd recommended he send his best troops to the Western front had cautioned him about the fallout, but who would have ever believed those neanderthals could mount a competent defense against his elite forces? It seemed the weak creatures had been investing in advanced weapons systems for years without making the information public, and they hadn't hesitated to deploy them when faced with an existential threat.

For weeks Damon had been watching his forces dwindle beneath the two-pronged assaults of shifter and human armies – the only blessing was that the two sides had not united against their common enemy. Now, Damon didn't particularly care about the death of his men – a soldier was little more than cannon-fodder after all – he had plenty more where they came from. The far greater blow was the impossibility of governance amidst the sheer chaos of the collapsing societies. He couldn't get control of any town or city beyond Moon Valley, especially since he'd dismantled every institution and power structure that might impart order.

The fact of the matter was that Damon needed to put an end to the fighting and fast, or the continent he'd seized would be worthless by the time he finally established his rule. Moreover, he needed to do something about that bitch and Sinclair's unborn pup in Vanara. He was thrilled to have Sinclair out of the way, but his widow was still a source of hope for the downtrodden, and his pup would likely grow into an indomitable challenger if given the chance.

Damon had been trying to reinstate contact with his assassin in Vanara ever since Sinclair's death was confirmed, but the wolf seemed to be dodging his calls. Perhaps he'd discovered he enjoyed life in Vanara so much he didn't need Damon's favor any longer. But no matter the cause, Damon needed an ally in the hidden territories. His resources were so strained that he couldn't afford to deal with the refugees on the coast, let alone get another spy over the border.

Instead he decided that it was time to take a page out of Sinclair's own book.

Before they lost contact, his spy had shared that the Storm Forest Alpha, Kieran, was fiercely opposed to allying with Sinclair. The Alpha clearly had more sense than some of his countrymen, as he understood that humans were worth little more than slave labor, and made no bones about sharing this perspective.

In fact, Damon actually felt a sense of solidarity with the fierce leader. He'd been harboring these thoughts in privacy for some time, but now it seemed as if things were becoming truly desperate. He couldn't continue to bear the burden of this fight alone. He'd thought Sinclair weak for seeking alliances, but perhaps the late wolf was more clever than he'd seemed.

It was time to make his move.

Damon found the phone number among his late father's documents, practically salivating as he dialed. Damon held his breath as the line rang, silently praying for Kieran to pick up.

At last the shrill ringing ended in a click, "Hello?" A gruff voice sounded on the other end of the line.

"Is this Alpha Kieran?" Damon asked, trying to keep the excitement from his voice.

"It is," the voice replied, sounding suspicious. "Whom do I have the pleasure of speaking with?"

"This is Emperor Damon." He replied, relishing the sound of his new title. "I have an offer to make you – an opportunity to increase your power and protect your lands from the scourge of refugees and human scum."

Kieran contemplated this for a moment, but the suspicion was gone from his voice when he finally replied, replaced with avid interest. "I'm listening."

Chapter 244 – Sinclair Visits a War Zone

Ella

“Dominic, this isn’t fair, I want to come!” I’m staring down my mate as he pulls on his shoes, my arms crossed stubbornly over my chest. I have to fight to hide my yawn from him, as I’m barely awake. The sun isn’t even up yet, but Sinclair looks as alert and energetic as ever. His adrenaline is probably surging already, as he’s leading the summit delegations on an excursion to the embattled continent this morning.

My wolf is furious with Sinclair for ordering us to stay behind, even though I know I can’t fly now that I’m into my fifth month of pregnancy. The summit is as much my baby as it is my mate’s, and I don’t want to be left out on one of the most crucial events of the entire endeavor.

Not to mention that I want to go for our people as well, all the ones still languishing in fear and uncertainty about whether they’ll be able to escape. I want to help them, speak with them and learn their needs – to comfort them if it’s possible.

Audible Gift Memberships

Unfortunately Sinclair doesn’t look the least bit sympathetic. Last night I shared the news of my mother’s location with him, and he did not take it well. He shifted on the spot and went for a run, working through his feelings before finally returning and claiming me with all the ferocity he possessed. Afterwards he agreed to let me go, but he obviously wasn’t happy about it.

“Pout all you want, trouble. I’m not taking you into a war zone,” Sinclair declares sternly, “surely you realize how strongly I feel about this if I’m willing to let you out of my sight?”

He has a point. Ever since we decided that finding my mother was too urgent to delay, he’s been like my giant, furry shadow. His protective instincts are in such a state of overdrive that I’m reminded of the early days of my pregnancy, when he growled and snarled at anyone who so much as looked at me.

“But I should be there, people need to see that we’re in this together!” I insist, stomping my little foot before I can think better of it.

Sinclair arches a brow and unfurls his huge body from the edge of the bed, towering over me. He stares into my wide eyes for a few long moments, probing our mating bond and reading my wolf’s stress all too easily. I wish I could hide it from him, but I can’t seem to withdraw my gaze from his piercing scrutiny.

The truth is that underneath my genuine interest in the trip, there’s a churning sea of anxiety over the fact that he will be going into a war zone without me. My wolf hates this more than anything, no matter how inevitable the eventuality.

Seeing this, Sinclair's foreboding expression softens to something unbearably tender. "This will be good practice, little mate." He murmurs, pulling me close. "Neither one of us likes it, but we're going to be separated one way or another. You have to find your mother, and I have to fight Damon." He sighs, kissing my temple. "The timing is terrible, but we can't control that. We just have to get through it."

"How?" I ask, in a voice so small I barely recognize it.

"By taking it one day at a time." Sinclair replies, sounding so steady and sure that it's hard to believe this is the same wolf who is currently sending waves of rabid possessiveness through our bond. "If we can just get through today then we'll be together again this evening. And when it comes time for you to leave, then we just have to remember that every day we're apart is one day closer to being reunited."

I nod, my throat feeling thick and scratchy. "I knew it was going to be hard... I just didn't realize it would be this hard. I mean, we've already done it once."

"I know, baby." He purrs, clutching me even tighter now. "But it's different this time... and it's for the best. I won't be able to focus on the refugees or the other Alpha's if you're with me, I'd be too worried about your safety to give them the attention they deserve."

He's right. I know he's right, but that's never been the problem.

"Okay, but if you're even one minute late coming back then I'm coming after you." I threaten sulkily, my voice muffled by his sweet-smelling chest.

"I won't be late," he promises, kissing my hair four times in quick succession. "You have my word, Ella. I'll be back before you know it."

Sinclair

When this war began I told myself that when I finally came home, it would be to defeat Damon once and for all.

It isn't easy to come to terms with the fact that I'm going to be returning to Vanara in only a few hours, especially not when I see the throngs of bodies clamoring to board the planes when we land. My family is a thousand miles away, which hurts to no end, but at least I know that I'm doing what's best for them no matter the distance. It feels different to turn my back on my people when they languish here alone, for how can I do what's best for them when I've escaped and they still live in fear?

As we disembark hundreds of wolves press around me, crying out with a mix of joy, relief and desperation. They beg for my help, cry out questions about my plans for the war, beseech me to overthrow Damon and pledge their lives to the struggle. It's all so overwhelming, and I'm not the only one who feels this way.

I can see the pain, concern and pity on the faces of every Alpha in my company, even those who haven't been particularly cooperative. There may only be a plane ride between these refugees and the ones they met in Vanara, but this experience feels entirely different. These people are not recovering, licking their wounds and trying to figure out what to do now that they're safe. These people are still in the throws of fight or flight, unsure whether or not they will live to see the sun rise again.

The scent of their fear is crushing, and I wonder at how James manages to do this every day – to know he can only save a few and pray that nothing happens to those he must leave behind. I rest a firm hand on his shoulder as the delegations spread through the crowds, listening to their stories with grave expressions. "I'm sorry I didn't come sooner." I confess to the soldier. "I want you to know how much I respect and appreciate the work you've been doing. If I hadn't been so determined to come back the right way I would have understood what you've been going through sooner."

"Alpha, that's your guilt talking." James replies simply. "These people are thrilled to see you, no doubt, but they know you can't be here and plan a war at the same time."

"He's right." A she-wolf chimes in. There are so many shifters surrounding us that private conversations are impossible, not that I mind. "Trust me, Alpha. We don't want you here every day."

"What do you want?" I ask, noticing a young boy leaning against her legs. "Is there anything I can do for you while I am here?"

"You can get us on one of those planes today." The she-wolf requests, a stark burst of vulnerability crossing her countenance. "We've been waiting three weeks."

I nod, unable to refuse them. "And you?" I ask the boy, "would you like to fly today?"

He peeks up at me with a confused frown, "Can my Daddy come with us?"

I glance at his mother, who kneels down beside him, "Finn, you know Daddy is fighting in the resistance. We've talked about this, honey."

He looks up at her unhappily, then turns his eyes to me, obviously hoping I might tell him otherwise. "I don' wanna go without Daddy."

"You're Daddy must be very proud of you," I tell him gently. "He'd have to trust you a lot to leave his mate in your protection. It's a very big job." I continue solemnly. "And I'm sure he misses you every bit as much as you miss him, but I think he'd want you to get your Mommy to safety, since he can't be here to do it himself. She's in your care until he returns, after all."

The boy looks up at me with wide eyes, his chest puffing up with pride as he reaches for his mother's hand. "Come on then, Mommy. We should get you on the plane before it's all full."

The she-wolf mouths a tearful thank you at me as they depart and I feel a split second of warmth as I watch them move towards the aircraft, but it's quickly replaced with a fresh barrage of guilt and helplessness as more shifters rush forward, eager to gain the same privilege. I know I've opened the floodgates, but I can't bring myself to regret helping those two. I want to help as many as I can, but it's hard to hear individual stories with so many voices competing to be heard.

"Please, I have pups!" One woman cries.

"My grandson is injured, we need help!" An elderly wolf counters, waving his arms.

It goes on and on, breaking my heart. "What will happen if we stay?" "How much longer before the usurper comes after us?" "The humans are getting closer by the day!"

"The human armies?" I clarify, zeroing in on this surprising news and wondering why my spies haven't reported such movements.

"No, sir. I mean the human refugees. The camps started small but the governments aren't helping so they're incredibly disorganized. The more numerous they become, the closer they come to encroaching on us." The same man responds.

"Are you telling me that there are human refugee camps near here?" I demand, stunned by this news and feeling as though I'm completely incompetent for not learning of this sooner.

"Yes Alpha," The man confirms hesitantly, clearly confused by my sharp tone. "There's one only three miles from this spot."

"Take me." I command, "now."

Chapter 245 – Human Camps

Sinclair

I don't depart for the human refugee settlement alone. I take every Alpha I can find, but I take special care to rope in Kieran. The wolf has been shooting me subversive glances since we arrived. He's been perfectly attentive to the shifter refugees, but it's almost as though he's angry I'm making him care about them – that I'm confronting him with their pain.

It's a short trip to the human camps, and we promised the pilots we would return by the scheduled departure time. This only leaves us about an hour to actually get a sense of the situation. Before we arrived I was worried this wouldn't be enough time – afterwards I realize it was too much. The scene is so overwhelming, so distressing that even a few minutes amidst the chaos is overwhelming.

Audible Gift Memberships

If we'd believed that the plight of shifter refugees was grave, it's nothing compared to that of the humans. After all, the shifters understand why their lives have fallen to ruin, the humans are completely in the dark, and they're not coping well.

We hear the camp before we see it. This isn't much surprise with our supernatural hearing, but the sounds that float to us through the forest are not the desperate cries of people in need. It sounds like a battle.

Eventually we reach the crest of a hill overlooking the sprawling camps – if they can even be called camps. "Holy Goddess." Gabriel says beside me, his dark skin going remarkably pale.

A vast field of black and blue tarps sit in deep mud, propped up on shabby poles and sticks. They're supposed to be tents, but they look more like the squalid dwellings often built by those experiencing homelessness in large cities. The ramshackle structures are on the verge of collapse, and there is no sign of any food or fresh water. The stench is incredible, and it's immediately apparent that there is no one governing this place.

The disconsolate cries of women and children rise through the air in a miserable symphony, while the voices of angry men explode in violent shouts. It seems like there's movement everywhere, but none of it is positive or productive. There are fights breaking out every few feet, people lashing out over the last piece of fire wood, or accusing one another of thefts and attacks.

Utter dread fills me as I wait for the inevitable castigations from the other Alphas. And you want us to bring these wretches into our world? I imagine Kieran saying, with disdain dripping from his tongue. A crash sounds in the distance, and terrified screams break out as the humans whip around, searching for the source of the disturbance. It's coming from the Northern mountains— the opposite direction of the shifter camps – and it sounds like nothing more than a rock slide. However to their ears it must sound like an incoming army, and their fear is so potent my heart aches.

“I've never seen anything so...” Callahan begins, trailing off before he can find the right word.

“Hopeless.” Of all the members in our party, Kieran is the very last man I expected to find an ounce of empathy for these people. Still, the pain and concern in his voice is clear, and I find myself even more on edge than before. I can't make sense of his behavior today. One moment he's so tense and on edge, looking around at the other summit attendees with such suspicion and distrust that I wonder what on earth is going through his head. The next moment he's acting as though he actually has a heart, and I don't trust it for one moment. Something is going on with him, whether this latest show of emotion is to throw us off the trail, or he's internally overcompensating for his treachery. I have a terrible feeling that Kieran has not only made his decision about where to pledge his alliance in this war, but that he's chosen the opposition.

Ella

He's late. The lying fink promised me! But here we are five minutes after the designated landing time and the airfield is completely devoid of planes.

“Something's wrong.” I fret, looking back and forth between Henry and Isabel, eager for their perspectives.

“They probably just got caught in a headwind.” Henry answers, squeezing my hand. “Flight timetables are an estimate, not an exact science.”

I gnaw nervously on my lower lip, focusing on Isabel. Surely she'll support me, I think, with James away as well. “They did radio when they departed the coast.” She reminds me, the traitor! “We have no reason to think anything has gone awry.”

My wolf grumbles mutinously in my head, and I'm already wracking my brains for some way to go after my missing mate. There aren't any planes left here in the capital – at least, not any that belong to the King. “Do many Vanaran citizens own private planes?” I ask curiously, trying to keep my voice innocent.

“Don't even think about it.” Philippe growls from behind me. “For my sake if not your own. Dominic will kill me if I let you anywhere near an aircraft.”

“Let me?” I mutter under my breath, my wolf roiling against the idea that anyone but Sinclair should give us orders. “I ought to— look!” I exclaim, interrupting my own train of thought as a dot appears on the horizon, zooming towards us.

“There, you see?” Henry chuckles, “they’re just running a little behind.”

The wait is much easier then, but still frustrating. The delegation isn’t on the first, second or third transports to land, and I realize my noble mate probably waited until everyone else had departed before taking off himself. Finally the last plane taxis over the field, coming to a stop mere meters away. The cargo door starts to descend before the plane has even finished moving, and then Sinclair is there, bounding out onto the pavement.

I throw myself into his open arms, feeling every muscle in my overwrought body finally relax. “Seven minutes, Dominic!” I tell him furiously. “You are seven whole minutes late!”

“I’m sorry, sweetheart.” He breathes against my ear, squeezing me so tightly I think I might burst. “But I’m here now.” He purrs, “I’m here.”

I pull back only far enough to kiss him, tears of relief stinging my eyes. Sinclair hungrily takes my mouth, and he lets his power pour off of him in heady waves. The wolves around us shrink back at the force, but my own inner canine only swoons. I don’t understand why he’s unleashed his full strength on the airfield, but I’m too caught up in the delicious feel of him to care at this moment. It goes on and on, until everyone around us retreats to the intake tents. Even James and Isabel, who were trying to pretend they didn’t want to be wrapped around each other in precisely this way, eventually slip away hand in hand.

It’s not until later, when we’re alone in our rooms, that he explains himself. First he tells me of the human camps, which devastates and horrifies me in equal measure. It’s easy to understand why he would feel so on edge, and as terrible as it sounds I wish that was all there was to his temper. Instead he explains about the Storm Forest Alpha’s most recent offenses. “Kieran was acting very odd today.” He confesses, sprawled naked beside me in bed. “On edge, cagey, even after the danger had passed and we were on our way back. It set off alarm bells in my mind, so I wanted to remind him of exactly who he’s dealing with – just in case.”

“Then you mean it wasn’t for me?” I pout, my body still flushed from his thorough loving.

“Not entirely.” He grins wolfishly, caressing my belly. “I knew you’d enjoy it and I wanted to let go for my own sake, but I also needed to send him a message.”

“Well it worked.” I assure him. “You should have seen the looks on their faces when they first felt it?”

“Should I take that to mean you were looking at other wolves while I was kissing you?” Sinclair growls playfully, making me squirm with renewed heat.

“I was just curious.” I shrug, blushing. “Besides, my wolf liked seeing all those big tough Alphas run away with their tails between their legs.” I admit, rubbing my body against him.

“Oh?” He inquires, eyes glinting.

I nod eagerly, unable to hide the sensual pleasure in my voice. “They looked like children compared to you.”

“Now you’re just flattering me.” He teases, kissing my nose. “And if you keep this up then we’re going to get distracted and end up late for dinner – which we can’t afford. Not with Kieran acting so shifty and the summit coming to an end tomorrow.”

My desire is immediately banked. “You think he might betray us?”

Sinclair grimaces, “I think he’s hiding something... and we need to find out what it is. We don’t have much time left.”

Chapter 246 – Kieran Shares Something Unexpected

Ella

Dinner is a tense affair. I wish I could say it's clear whether or not our efforts with this summit are paying off, but all of these Alphas play their cards so close to their chests – well, all except Kieran. The Storm Forest Alpha spends the evening glaring at everyone around him, even his own men.

I'm beginning to think that there isn't any way for us to win him over and that we should focus our attention elsewhere – on the Alpha's we can form alliances with. Still, I understand that excluding him might make his animosity towards our cause even greater.

Audible Gift Memberships I ponder my conversation with Sinclair, wondering if Kieran is actively betraying us. Has he told Damon that my mate still lives? Is he planning on helping him attempt another assassination?

I don't believe he cares about people beyond his pack or perhaps beyond Vanara, but I didn't believe he was stupid. It's one thing to refuse to join forces with us, and another entirely to make a suicide pact with a madman – for that's surely what joining Damon would mean.

Of course, I've been wrong before. Sinclair believes he's hiding something, and I have to admit the Alpha's behavior is suspect. So my only mission tonight is to persuade Kieran to come clean, and I know exactly how I'm going to do it.

I start with simple observation, knowing just how uncomfortable persistent and unwanted attention can be to one with a guilty conscience. I don't hide the fact that I'm watching him. Every time Kieran looks up and finds my eyes on him, I stare with the same expression I've always used for misbehaving children. It's not threatening or cold, rather deliberate and dismayed. It says: I know what you've done and I'm already disappointed, don't make things worse by lying to me.

I begin sprinkling bait into my conversations as well, which isn't difficult when all the delegates want to debrief about their excursion today. "It was absolutely sickening." The Black Alder is saying next to me. "I've never seen so many people in so much pain." He's looking at me with wide eyed sincerity, eager to hear my perspective. They all are – being a child of the Goddess has its benefits.

"And to think the person inflicting all that horror is the one who is meant to protect them." I sigh, shaking my head sadly. "It's the worst kind of betrayal. What kind of Alpha could possibly stomach harming so many shifters, let alone those in his care?"

"But it wasn't only shifters!" The Silver Dawn Alpha pipes up. "The human settlements were even worse.”

I pretend like this is news to me, though my pain and outrage over the details they share are completely genuine. “You see, this is why we have to stop thinking about our peoples as separate. Damon doesn’t care who he hurts, and if some of us suffer then we all do.

If we only help the shifters and leave the humans behind, then those settlements you saw today will only grow. The people will see that we only care for our own kind – they will see us prosper while they languish, and they will hate us for it.” I scan the faces around me, taking my attention off of Kieran only long enough to argue my case.

“When I first learned about shifters, Dominic explained to me that he doesn’t lead because he wants to. He does it because his power is a grave responsibility – he has the strength to spare, so he’s obligated to lend it to those in need. This is the same principle.

Vanara has the power and strength that all those beings fleeing the war, and everyone who remains trapped under Damon’s thumb, lack.” Sinclair has one arm slung over the back of my chair, and his fingers trace circles on my upper arm, encouraging me to continue.

“It is an incredible privilege to be able to choose whether or not to enter this conflict. And it would be easy to say it’s not your problem, but if your life is easy and prosperous while the rest of the world wages war...” I trail off, sounding forlorn. “Well I just can’t find any honor in that.” I return my full focus to my true target, pleased to see the Storm Forest Alpha listening intently. “And what good is an Alpha without honor? Without loyalty to a higher cause than his own self-interest?”

Kieran, who has been turning increasingly red while I make my speech, surges up from the table. “Fine damn you!” He bursts, throwing down his napkin. His movement is so abrupt that his chair falls back and clatters against the marble floor, adding violent emphasis to his outburst.. A hush falls over the room, and I’m infinitely pleased this is a private dinner rather than a public feast. Sinclair glowers at the other wolf, a deep growl rumbling in his chest.

I rest a steadying hand on his leg, keeping my posture relaxed. “It’s okay.” I soothe, trying to gentle his worth. “I’d like to hear anything Alpha Kieran has to say... or confess.”

The man in question narrows his eyes at me, outrage and indignance pouring off of him in waves. “Ohh you’re too clever for your own good, you know that?” He grumbles – it does not sound like a compliment.

"I've been told." I tell him, smiling serenely.

Kieran shakes his head, clenching his fists. "I wasn't going to share this," He begins furiously. "But now I see I have no alternative." He's silent for almost half a minute, and the quiet drags on interminably. Eventually Kieran seems to find the right words, "Yesterday I returned to my rooms to find an anonymous electronic message waiting, including a video link and a note advising me to follow it if I cared about the future of Vanara. When I did so, I discovered that Damon was waiting on the other end."

The other Alphas begin muttering amongst each other, and Kieran huffs in frustration. "I didn't announce this for precisely this reason. You're all already preparing to condemn me!"

I raise my hand, urging the other wolves to quiet. "No one is condemning you. Please tell us what happened."

Kieran scowls, and I'm sure he's cursing my name in his head. "He offered me an alternative alliance." He explains fiercely, not taking his eyes from me. "He said that he needed someone to help ensure Sinclair's bloodline ended once and for all, and that he could use ground support to thwart the humans and the resistance fighters on the royal continent. He was confident that once these challenges were overcome, We would be primed to turn our attention to Sevka and Vanara."

Now the hush in the dining rooms is completely voluntary, as many of the delegates gape in surprise. "Dominic was right. Damon isn't going to be satisfied with controlling one land, his appetite for power is infinite. He spoke of a worldwide empire, and he tried to bribe me by offering your crown, Gabriel." Kieran confesses, looking suddenly ill. "He said he would reward my loyalty to his cause by putting me in charge of Vanara – that this was the only way I would ever sit upon the throne."

We're all waiting with baited breath, beyond curious to hear how Kieran responded to this offer. "I questioned his strategy. You see, I thought he might tell me some of his plans to prove he could fulfill the promises he was making.

I wanted to know what his vision of the future was, and how he was going to achieve it. In return he lashed out. He called me a coward and a... little bitch. He said I was as bad as a she-wolf, nagging and questioning his ability when he'd just offered me the world on a platter."

Kieran is growing visibly more irate with every word, his cheeks positively crimson now. "He called me every insulting name he could think of and he ended the meeting when I refused to commit to an alliance."

The Alpha averts his gaze to the ground. "Then today... this afternoon my chief of staff called to inform me that I'd received an express package by special courier. Apparently it was full of dresses, diapers and self help books on how to be a real man."

It's a good thing that Kieran can't seem to look us in the eye, because I slap my hand over my mouth to smother the shocked laugh attempting to bubble up inside of me. I glance at Roger, whose lips are visibly twitching as he fights his own humor.

"I know it was from Damon." Kieran announces angrily, and I'm certain only the grace of the Goddess keeps my face straight. "He's trying to bully me into betraying you all. But I will never join such a wolf." He turns his gaze on Sinclair now, looking contrite.

"I did not reveal to him that you are still alive, Dominic. I did not share any of the progress we've made here." He sucks in a deep breath. "I should have told you about the offer as soon as I received it. But after seeing those camps today, after learning just how dishonorable our enemy is... I've made my decision. My allegiance is yours."

Chapter 247 – To War

Ella

I'm dying. The strength and determination it requires to stay serious in the face of Kieran's announcement is staggering. I want nothing more than to roll on the floor laughing, but something tells me that doing so would undermine this victory.

Audible Gift Memberships

I can feel Sinclair's mirth through our bond, though he looks as cool and intimidating as ever. You brilliant, devious, glorious little minx! His voice sounds in my mind, full of all the laughter missing from his face.

I send him an elated giggle in return. The only thing better than getting to see how embarrassed he is by that delivery, is knowing that Damon is getting the blame. I share, my pulse racing with excitement. You notice Kieran didn't tell him no? He asked about strategy and 'didn't commit', but he never refused him... how much do you want to bet he was genuinely considering the option before getting so mercilessly insulted?

I know. Sinclair confirms, positively glowing with pride. I think your prank just stole a powerful ally right out from under Damon's nose, trouble. I have no doubt Kieran was tempted and just needed to confirm it was a safe bet... but he'll never work with Damon now.

No wonder he was in such an odd mood today. I reflect, wishing this dinner would end so we can go celebrate.

I can sense Sinclair preparing to stand and thank Kieran for his allegiance, to deliver a speech inspiring the other pack leaders to make their own pledges. The momentum is on our side, and Kieran was our most difficult sell – if he's on board it's only a matter of time for the others to join as well. We can both feel that this is the opportunity we've been waiting for, the perfect time to go big or go home.

However before Sinclair can move, the FrostFang Alpha stands as well. "I admit, I have my opinions about the way you handled this, Kieran." He begins, giving the other wolf a piercing look. "But I cannot fault the conclusion at which you have arrived. I was inclined to lend my support to this effort from the beginning, but this week has surpassed anything I could have imagined."

His gaze swings to me, "Ella, your wisdom and grace – your compassion for all those affected by Damon's violence and greed – is an inspiration. You are living evidence of the Goddess's wishes for our future, but you are more than that too, because I'm certain that you would never join an unworthy cause. To oppose you would be to oppose justice, and I have no wish to betray my values that way."

The Alpha forges on, turning now to Sinclair. “Dominic, I have always admired your dedication to your people, as well as your unflagging principles. But meeting you, seeing your strength and feeling the magnitude of your power first hand, has been a humbling and heartening experience. I’m certain I have never, and will never, meet another wolf of your caliber – unless perhaps it is your son.”

He allows with a genial smile, nodding to my round tummy. “You have never sought to pressure or manipulate us despite the urgency of your campaign, you have only worked to educate us about the threat Damon poses, and allowed us to bear witness to the events on the ground.”

“You have done very well. Because even if I did not feel so warmly towards you and your Luna, the things we have seen and the stories we have heard over the last few days would have been more than enough to convince me to oppose the usurper.”

His countenance hardens as he surveys the other pack leaders, many of whom are nodding in agreement. “Any wolf who would cause his people such torment is not fit to lead. Any Alpha who would risk the existence of all shifters by breaking the secrecy pact – who has overturned our way of life for the last thousand years – cannot be allowed to gain power.

And any King whose avarice is so great that he cannot be content with a single empire, will turn on his allies as soon as his enemies are defeated. And when that time comes, there won’t be anyone left to help those who stood with him.”

The FrostFang Alpha is clearing gearing up for a big finish, his volume rising with his passion. “We saw Damon’s vision for the future today in revolting detail, and I for one have no intention of letting him spread that nightmare any farther than he’s already managed. We must do whatever is in our power to defeat him, so I too pledge my allegiance to Dominic and Ella, and I charge any Alpha who would refuse to do the same as a traitor.”

Cheers and growls of agreement rise up around the table as the other Alphas stand one by one, each wolf declaring his commitment to defeating Damon. Soon Sinclair, Gabriel, Roger, Henry and I are the only ones seated, and I think we’re all a little surprised by the sudden wave of support. I suppose this has been building all along and it’s just been difficult to read because of their expert poker faces, but then again, maybe today was a turning point?

Maybe even the hardest of hearts cannot stand before such suffering and remain unmoved. Maybe they were waiting for Kieran to choose a side first, so that they wouldn’t be alone if they refused to help... maybe a simple and diabolical prank accomplished what no words ever could.

“Well damn,” Sinclair observes, smiling broadly. “I thought I was going to have to make a speech. You kind of stole my thunder, Ethan.” The group laughs heartily, and Sinclair gracefully rises, buttoning his suit jacket as he raises his glass. “I must admit I’m incredibly moved by your support. I’m infinitely grateful to have your allegiance, and I vow that I will do everything in my power to honor your sacrifices and live up to your expectations.” He squeezes my hand, and I can feel pure love rushing through our bond.

“I have always considered this war to be so much bigger than us – than our pack and our people. I wish that wasn’t the case. I wish that Damon was not the monster he is, that he was not such a threat.

I wish that he hadn’t cost us all the lives he’s stolen and destroyed.” Sinclair’s eyes are shining now, and I send him a flood of encouragement, needing to overwhelm his guilt with support. “But I could not wish for better allies than the wolves in this room, and I promise to never take you, or your people for granted.

My hope is for our refugees to leave your shores one day soon, but I assure you that even after we are gone, we will never forget the kindness and support you have shown us. We will never be able to repay you for your generosity, and you will always have friends on the Royal Continent.”

Gabriel stands too now, raising his own glass. “To our alliance – to ridding the world of Damon, and building the future the Goddess envisioned for us when she brought this wonderful she-wolf into the world.” He smiles, gesturing to me.

The others echo his toast, and I steal a single sip of Sinclair’s wine to seal the verbal agreement we’ve all made. I can’t wait to go back to our rooms and talk about all of this, but my mate isn’t finished yet. He turns to the Storm Forest Alpha, a lethal expression on his handsome face. “Kieran, did you ever tell Damon whether you would join him – one way or another?”

The wolf in question flushes again. “No, but I swear on my mate’s life, my allegiance is yours.”

“Oh no, I believe you.” Sinclair reassures him, “I was actually thinking that there might be an opportunity for us to infiltrate the enemy camp. I have spies on the ground of course, even a few who have won prominent roles in his employ. But Damon needs more fighters, I’m sure he wants your army and it could be very advantageous for us to have a double agent commanding his reinforcements.”

“You’re saying that you want me to go back to him and accept?” Kieran clarifies.

“That’s exactly what I’m saying.” Sinclair confirms, a devious glint in his eye. “Tell him you thought about it and decided that the Vanaran throne is worth the risk, but you want to be intimately involved in his war planning efforts if your own men's lives are going to be on the line. Pretend you're on his side, collect whatever intelligence you can, undermine his plans whenever possible, and set your soldiers against his when the time comes for battle." He pins the Alpha in his crosshairs, practically daring him to refuse. "Are you up for it?"

Kieran levels him with a blazing look, filled with bloodlust and an unmistakable thirst for vengeance against the wolf who insulted him so badly. "It would be my pleasure."

Chapter 248 – Decisions

Sinclair

What started as a regular dinner party quickly evolves into a marathon planning session for the war, extending late into the night. I summoned James and my top enforcers as soon as the alliance was confirmed, because even though we've just clinched a major victory, the truth is that the hardest work is still ahead of us. In addition to coordinating Kieran's mission as a double agent, there are a lot of logistics to sort out in terms of mobilizing combat forces and choosing tactical strategies.

In hindsight I realize I should have familiarized the delegations with the military minutiae from the beginning, but I hadn't wanted to risk compromising classified information without confirming their loyalties first. Now I'm paying the price of that caution, as there's a great deal of ground to cover simply to get everyone caught up on the same page.

Still, I'm elated to have the combined armies of the Vanaran packs at our disposal. In addition to the resistance forces coalescing back home, our numbers should now be more than double the soldiers employed in Damon's imperial army – and that's not to mention the Vanaran technologies we'll now be able to employ.

Audible Gift Memberships

Everything is finally coming together, and I'd be lying if I said I don't feel entirely impatient to launch our first true attack. Ella is helping me remain patient, simply by the virtue of my wolf refusing to be separated from her any sooner than we've already planned.

It's a good thing too, because I know rushing home in a fiery rage is a recipe for disaster. We have to put ourselves in our opponents shoes; get inside Damon's mind and anticipate his every move, then account for each potential complication until we have a protocol for every contingency.

Ella is barely awake by the time we finally finish discussing our next steps. I tried to convince her to go up to bed an hour ago, but she only climbed into my lap and dug her proverbial paws in. I didn't have the heart to set her away from me, and I figured there was a better chance of her sleeping with me than without me. I'm not even sure she's aware when we decide to call it a night.

I carry the drowsy bundle up to our suite, pangs of tenderness radiating through my chest every time she emits a sleepy murmur and snuggles closer, burying her face in the curve of my neck. I try my best to undress Ella without disturbing her slumber, but it's no use.

She blinks up at me with heavy-lidded eyes as I slide her dress down over her hips, one small hand extending towards my face. I pause so she can stroke my jaw, wondering if there's ever been such a sweet mate before, then deciding such a thing is impossible.

"I'm so proud of you." She utters, her speech only slightly slurred. "You were brilliant tonight, Dominic."

"You were the brilliant one." I reply, kissing her palm and finally pulling the gown from her delectable body. "You played Kieran like a fiddle, and you had every other wolf in that room hanging on your every word."

"I just lured them in, you're the one who they've chosen to follow." She replies, summoning a beatific smile. "All those big tough wolves deferring to your strength, anxiously awaiting your directions and guidance, even above their own King's? That's not nothing, my love." Her silken voice is low and husky, her gold eyes limpid pools. I know, even without scenting her arousal, that my little wolf found no shortage of excitement in watching me take charge of that room.

"Oh?" I croon, slipping her heels from her poor, swollen feet. I begin massaging the soles, and Ella moans in relief as my knuckles knead her sore muscles. "So my little troublemaker enjoyed seeing me boss everyone around, hmm?"

She flushes and giggles softly, but her face is solemn when she continues. "I'm serious. It's a testament to just how much they respect you – we couldn't ask for a higher endorsement." Ella smiles again, lighting up my whole world. "It's why you deserve to be King... wherever you go, the most powerful shifters bend the knee of their own free will. You don't use threats or intimidation, you simply walk the walk and they fall in line." She muses, "It's very impressive."

I know Ella is expressing genuine admiration – that she wants to make sure I take credit for this accomplishment – but I'm feeling much too triumphant for thoughtful reflections. My wolf wants to celebrate, and what better way could there be to mark this occasion than playing with our mate?

"So it didn't turn you on?" I tease, sliding my hand up her velvety thigh and pulling aside the sodden gusset of her panties. Ella shudders as my fingers connect with her needy sex, sinking right into her slick folds. "This sweet pussy is certainly dripping – do you mean to tell me it's not for me?"

"It's always for you." Ella answers breathily, her voice catching when my thumb finds her sensitive clit. "Only you can do this to me, Dominic." I might think she's simply going along with the subject change to please me, except that I can feel just how profoundly my touch addles her thoughts, derailing anything she might have wanted to say next.

I purr with barely restrained pleasure, my cock going rock hard before Ella is even finished speaking. "Very good." I praise, pulling away the last of her undergarments. Her eyes dip to the hard member between my legs, and my wolf howls through our bond when she licks her lips as if the mere sight has made her salivate. I'm still lazily petting her most intimate flesh, drinking in every tiny sound and movement she makes as the feelings wash over her.

Ella is perfectly alert now, but I cease touching her when her eyes fall shut. "Are you sure you're not too tired for this, little mate?" I ask, eyes narrowed in concern. "We just go to sleep if you are."

Her eyes snap open. "No, I'm awake." She answers, responding so quickly I have to smother a smile.

I don't budge my stern expression, and Ella's pupils dilate with obvious desire, "Prove it, baby." I instruct her, making my voice as deep as possible. "Don't take your eyes off of me for even a moment. If you do, everything stops. I want to see you come to pieces for me."

She gulps and nods, gnawing on her plump lower lip as she waits for me to continue stroking her. I don't disappoint, and soon the only sounds in the room are Ella's ecstatic whimpers and my rumbles of pure satisfaction.

The next morning we both find it difficult to believe the summit has reached a successful conclusion, before the scheduled events have even been completed. Of course, Ella also doesn't know that tonight's ball is going to double as our surprise mating ceremony, and though my mind is finding it difficult to think of anything else, hers is still sharply focused on politics.

"I was thinking," Ella says, leaning back against my chest and trailing her hands through the sea of bubbles filling our bath. "We ought to focus some efforts on encouraging Damon's men to turn against him. Not his top advisors or anything, but the footsoldiers in his army. They're being ordered to commit atrocities and some of them might not have a problem following those commands, but I have to think that others are waiting for any opportunity to desert."

"That's a good thought." I nod in approval. "We've had quite a few reports of imperial soldiers joining the resistance already, but if we offer amnesty to the rest then we might be able to incentivize more wolves to change sides."

"The only thing I don't like about it is that they shouldn't need an incentive to betray a leader as dishonorable as Damon." Ella sighs, "if anything turning traitor is a sign of virtue."

“It’s not that simple.” I remind her, though I know she doesn’t need it. “Warriors are taught to follow orders no matter what, many have no way out, and the penalty for dereliction of duty is execution. Too many of those wolves have families to support, it makes taking the risk untenable.”

“You wouldn’t commit war crimes even if the cost was your life.” Ella counters, sounding rather petulant.

“Not my life.” I confirm, “but if it might cost me you or Rafe? If my death meant abandoning you in a world like the one Damon has created?”

“You would find another way.” Ella insists, leveling an adorable glare at me over her shoulder.

“I would try to find any alternative I could, but none of us ever know how far we’d go to protect the people we love until we’re put to the test. I know myself well enough to understand that I’m capable of doing terrible things if I feel like I have no other choice.” I exhale heavily, thinking about the future now. “Besides, when this war is over all of these shifters are going to have to find a way to go back to living side by side with those their former enemies. We can’t imprison everyone... we’re going to need compassion and empathy then more than ever.”

Ella frowns, “but we can’t just smooth over atrocities.” She reasons, “We can’t tell people to kiss, make up and pretend like it never happened – like they weren’t traumatized or they didn’t lose loved ones and livelihoods.”

“We won’t.” I promise. “But justice doesn’t necessarily mean punishment. Everyone caught up in this mess is merely trying to survive, however they can. We will all have committed offenses against other shifters and humans by the time this is over.” I run my hand over her belly, smiling as Rafe kicks against my palm. “That’s why we need you so much, Ella. I can kill Damon, but I can’t heal our peoples from wounds that run so deep. You’re the only person I know who has that power – just look at what you did for me and Roger. Look at what you’ve overcome yourself.”

Her lashes fall shut as the gravity of my words sink in. “That’s a really big job for one woman, you know.”

“I know.” I murmur, kissing her neck. “But I believe in you. And this little munchkin believes in you.” Rafe kicks in agreement, and I scent the faintest hint of tears. “Now let’s not talk about this any more today.” I suggest, “We have way too much to do.”

“I thought the only event today was the ball?” Ella asks, confused. “That’s hours and hours away.”

I offer her my most wolfish grin, "Well my beauty, you thought wrong."

Chapter 249 – Surprise

Ella

“Cora, what the hell is going on? I demand, staring at my sister in shock and indignation. She has just broken into my suite and announced that I will not be wearing the dress that Did especially for tonight’s ball. She pulled the hanger out of my closet and threw the laundry bag aside, as if the dress inside wasn’t the same the most expensive piece of clothing any of us have ever had.

“Just put on your bathrobe and sit down. The makeup artist arrives at any minute. Cora replies, with a devious and utterly unrepentant smile on her face. ” She’s moving around my dressing room, pulling up a chair in front of the dressing table.”, making room by moving boxes and suitcases.

She moves around the room as if she owns the place. Normally, I wouldn’t mind that – since my sister is welcome to anything that’s mine – It’s his sneaky demeanor and knowledgeable looks that are driving me to distraction.

“Makeup artist? ” I repeat, horrified. I gave up trying to follow her frantic movements, knowing I couldn’t keep up with her and that she wouldn’t stop even if I tried. “What are you talking about? I’m perfectly capable of doing my own makeup. ”

“Sure you can, but there’s nothing wrong with pampering a little once in a while. when . ” My sister replies, not giving me any more information about her strange behavior .

She starts rummaging through my shoe rack, seeming to eliminate a number of options with a single look, including the heels I bought specifically for this event. I’m about to demand answers once more when the door opens and a new voice joins the confusion .

–

“Don’t forget the hairdressers! Elizabeth sings, entering without warning and carrying three heavy-looking bags. “They want to start rolling it up before the makeup team takes over. Obviously she could hear our conversation before she arrived, and obviously she’s involved in whatever that plot is.

“Okay, stop! I cry, throwing my hands out in protest. The two women stop halfway, looking at me with Expressions of expectation . “One of you needs to tell me what’s going on, right now. ” I order firmly, trying to keep my voice steady.

“Don’t worry, she’s never gotten along with surprises. ” Cora says to Isabel in a somewhat conspiratorial tone , as if I not even being here. Luckily she turns to me a second later, “Ella, everything you need Knowing is that there has been a small change of plans and we are here to ensure that everything run well . _ ”

“What a change of plans! I exploded, feeling more frustrated by the minute. “I’ve been planning this ball for weeks! I know all the details about the logistics , the decoration and the environment, the food ! I personally approved each __ item on the menu, each flower going to the arrangements of Flowers – I’d know if anything had changed. Do you realize that I have teams of people working on this? You can’t just come in and change things at the last minute. ”

“Take a deep breath, dear. ” Elizabeth says, hanging the bags that weigh on her. ___ ” It’s not last minute, we’ve been working on this for days. Also, Dominic doesn’t want you stressed, he’s just trying to do something good For you . ”

I gawk, cradling my belly. My first instinct is to laugh in their face if they think some days is time Enough to make big adjustments in this kind of event, but my wolf is more focused in the second half of Elizabeth’s statement. “Did Dominic arrange this? ”

“Well, technically we organized that. ” Cora corrects me, all smiling. “But we did it at his behest. We’re just fulfilling your wishes. Now calm down – if and try to have fun. ” __

As soon as I hear that my cowardly companion is behind this scheme, my wolf immediately cools down. __ My shoulders drop as the tension coursing through my body abruptly dissipates , disappearing as quickly as it emerged. If Sinclair is responsible, I know I’ll like this surprise. At the same time, my mind is spinning with questions. I’m not sure where he is at the moment, but I reach out to him anyway. What are you doing? I ask suspiciously.

He must be close, because as soon as the message comes out of my head , his cozy laugh fills my senses. You’ll see, problem. Are you being a good girl and letting Cora and Isabel take care of you?_

You mean your evil minions? I snort, they’re taking great pleasure in fooling me , in fact they’re just asking towards be bitten . No biting, little wolf. Sinclair warns, his tone sounding too forgiving for me to take seriously.

My wolf grumbles rebelliously, a new thought arises then. If Sinclair is responsible for this twist, perhaps he is the one who should pay the price . ” What about you?” “She asks mischievously, can I bite you?” _

Maybe later. He laughs, and I don’t try to hide my disappointment. “We’ll be together soon.” “For now relax – I promise you’ll enjoy this surprise.

My wolf is still muttering curses in my head when the makeup and hair crews arrive. They slide inside carrying sophisticated boxes of supplies, all with bright smiles and talking in a tone so loud that his words border on squeals. they’re allclearly very excited, but no one is going to tell me what's going to be happening and it's driving me absolutely crazy.

I sit patiently as my hair is curly in meticulous detail, staring to anyone and everyone who looks in my direction. I have to get up twice during the session to go relieve the bladder, but Soon my reflection is more glamorous than ever. My golden pink hair is entwined in intricate braids wrapping around my head while long Curly locks float around my face. The effect is ethereal and charming, especially when they start adding pins with pearls true .

My makeup is impressive but understated, leaning heavily on my charms Natural , instead of painting them . Smoky shadows form seductive patterns under my well-carved eyebrows, and onyx paint is spread over my long lashes, making my golden irises glow. _in bright contrast . My fair skin is virtually untouched, with just a touch of blush on my apples of protruding face and a pink lipstick over my fleshy lips.

Cora and Isabel come to admire the finished product, and I notice that they are both using it matching emerald dresses. "You look amazing. My sister smiles, shaking my hand.

"It's true ," Elizabeth confirms with the typical indifferent air. "In fact, it's annoying that someone is allowed to be so beautiful. Maybe we should undo some of that – it might cause a ruckus. "

" She's not going to cause a ruckus. " Cora laughs, shaking her head. " But Dominic can when he sees you. "

"And we haven't even put on her dress yet. " Elizabeth smiles. _

"What a dress! "I demand," how can you have made another dress without that Do I give it a try? I exclaim, gesturing to the full length of my body. While my breasts and belly bore the brunt of the growing pains in the first two trimesters of my pregnancy, the third is showing me how nothing is safe from change. My hips are widening, my ass has a lot of extra padding , up my feet seem to have grown. "I balloon another inch good morning, whatever is in that bag doesn't will fit! "

"Honestly, Ella. Elizabeth rolls her eyes. "Do you think we're complete amateurs? The seamstress has been at it since the beginning. " _ _ _ _ _took a test for her ball gown, she took out duplicate measurements for the royal dress. "

My jaw drops as I look back and forth between these women, "Who are you! " _ _ _ _ _
_ _ _ _ _

"So, you love spy movies." Cora replies, ignoring me again. _

“If one of you doesn’t start talking, I’m going to lose my temper . “I warn you,” and losing your temper means a lot of tears these days. If you don’t want me to ruin that makeup, then tell me what’s going on . ”

” Alright, princess,” Isabel laughs humorously, ” why You don’t take a look at your dress, so you can decide if you still want to twist our necks. ”

My jaw clenches and I clench my hands into fists, moving forward and violently unzipping the clothes bag. I don’t want to look at this dress. _ I want the dress I chose with the stylist. Unfortunately it doesn’t look like I’m going to get __the explanations I need any other manner , then I get into the game.

As soon as the zipper descends, I feel the air stolen from my lungs. __ Opening the waterproof cover, meeting meters and meters of bright white fabric . I have no idea what material it is, but it has the most notable luminescence __glow, making it look like a ray of pure moonlight. Pearls like the ones entwined in my hair were sewn into the bodice and skirts, accentuating the intricate swirling embroidery throughout the design.

Suddenly, I understand why everyone is behaving so strangely—even before my sister finally have mercy on me. “Ella, tonight isn’t just a ball. ” Cora tells me, her eyes sparkling. “It’s your mating ceremony. “

Chapter 250 – Mating Ceremony

Ella

If I thought the dress my dishonest friends designed on my back was dazzling on the hanger, it's nothing compared to the way it looks on me. I've never seen anything like it. The pearly fabric hugs my curves, the cleavage plunging between my breasts and thin straps leaving my back and flanks almost completely bare. The skirt ripples in a cascade of shiny chiffon, with a modest tail flowing behind of me as I walk.

Of course, my threat to spoil my makeup with tears is soon fulfilled when my eyes they fill with tears and I reach out to Cora and Elizabeth, babbling thanks and declarations of love for both . Then calm me down for a few minutes, before my sister puts her down .

“Enough.” Cora says after my third outpouring of thanks, ” no let’s waste all this beauty on us. Your companion is waiting. ”

My heart is pounding as we leave the suite, and I stroke item belly amazed. Your daddy did it again, I tell my puppy. Be sure to pay close attention to his romantic instincts as he grows up and simply ignore it Mom’s . You definitely want to follow your example when it’s time to choose a mate. Even as I think about the words, I realize how deeply I believe in them. I couldn’t ask for a better example for my son, and I almost start crying again just thinking about the kind of man we’re going to raise together.

I don’t even care about walking into the unknown anymore, not when I know Sinclair is pulling the strings behind it all . I lift my skirts as we leave my room, smiling insanely at the white heels lace peeking beneath my belly. _I expected Cora and Isabel to take me to the ballroom, instead I I found myself following them towards the palace gardens, my breath gasping for breath as we approached . When the balcony doors open, I have a moment of startled panic when I fear that my kneescan really give up – and the last thing I want to do is fall off ass before even taking a step down the hall.

Still , if anyone is to blame for my vertigo, it’s surely the palace elves who are working their magic to create the scene before we . It must have taken days, but I managed to lose everything. _ _ _ _ _ the neatly landscaped flower beds and familial topiaries carved were concealed by a vision directly from a fairy tale. An enchanted forest spreads out where once there was only a labyrinth of hedges, shrouded in fairy lights and wildflowers. Lanterns cast bright amber light upon the petal—path scattered at my feet, which descends into an arch of tall trees. And in the center , of the

All the Alpha delegations , the Vanaran courtiers and dozens and dozens of refugees became lined up in the spaces between the trees. _ _ I feel your manifestation of support and affection as a tangible hug, and I I can only laugh and smile with incandescent happiness. The nursery puppies are all dressed in formal dresses and small tuxedos, and Isabel leads them down the hallway as they scatter more flower petals whenever they can.

Ethereal music floats in the air, though I can't decipher its origin . As the music changes, my sister turns to me. " Are you ready? She asks, cackling and wiping away a tear that escaped my cheek. "Are you handing me over? " I sob, wondering how I can stay serene enough to through my vows .

"Of course not. " Cora laughs. "That's a human tradition. Wolves believe that nothing can break family ties, and finding your mate certainly can't it means giving up on your family. I'm just here to show you the way. "

"What if I want you to walk with me? " I ask, feeling – I am strangely vulnerable. It's not like Sinclair hasn't already claimed me, or that this is changing anything . However, at the same time, I can't help but feel the magnitude of this ceremony . Maybe it has something to do with the fact that we've been through so much time of our relationship stuck to secrets, and now everything is open . ___ Maybe it's because dedicating ourselves to each other in particular feels so intimate and meaningful, but to do so before the whole world confers a inevitable gravity to the case . Maybe it's simply the visceral magic in the air, like an electric current pulsing around us and within us – in a way that makes me wonder if the Goddess can be looked at for us right now. _

"Well, only a monster would refuse such a request. Cora smiles, moving – moving to my side and wrapping her arm around mine. " I've got you, little sister." _

My vision blurs and I look at my sister with trembling lips , "I Love You".

Cora lowers her forehead, resting it against mine and swallowing mein his chocolate gaze. "I love you too. "A wave of Alpha power hits us as we take this moment, and I understand that my companion is feeling impatient..

"We'd better go. "Cora laughs," before he comes here and decides accompany him personally. As we begin our descent , Sinclair's expression goes from devotion to voracious and possessive, then comes back again at least three times. I can't take my eyes off him, and I can feel his passion for me so intensely how much I feel my own desire.

I am amazed to feel so much joy as the war progresses, when we still have so many challenges ahead and we will part ways in a matter of days. ___ And yet I am. I feel like we've stolen a moment in time – like this night and the celebration of our love would go on forever – even if only in our hearts. And I suppose so, because no matter what happens in the future, always We'll have that moment together. ___ we will always be _able to look back and remember, from Find constrength and consolation in our scandalous joy. It's an amazing gift, and I want nothing more than to savor every second.

I think Sinclair can feel the direction of my thoughts, both that his patience finally ran out. He walks to greet us at the end of the tree-lined path, pure love radiating from his pretty face. _

“You built a forest for me. I say foolishly, smiling at him. He knows how much I missed the landscape of our homelands, how desperately my animal interior fought in Vanara.

” I would build a thousand if I could, little wolf” He tells me reverently , caressing my cheek. _ _

I shook my head, fighting back tears. “I don’t know what I did to deserve you. ” _

“Well, it helps that you’re the sweetest creature that has ever walked the earth. ” Sinclair jokes. “It is only right that you be rewarded with my perfection. ”

I can’t help but laugh, knowing how critically my companion sees himself. “At least you’re finally starting to recognize how wonderful you are. I joke in response, leaning in to kiss him.

“Oh – ah,” he scolds, “not yet , problem. We have to do the ceremony first. ” _

“Are you really going to make me wait? “I pout, looking as miserable as possible.

He chuckles warmly, giving me a final squeeze before situating us to finish the procession . ” Trust me, mate , it’ll be worth it. Sinclair’s arm snakes around me in a protective cage as we continue over the tender grass . Cora is gone ahead, and is now standing next to Isabel in the altar .

When we finally reach the end of the hallway, we say our vows under the full moon and the stars, reaffirming our commitment to love and value each other for the rest of our days . – Part of me wants to complain that Sinclair had time to write _and essay_your speech, but when I open my mouth the words come on their own own .

“Dominic, until you found me , I didn’t even know I was lost . I start, looking into his bright green eyes. _ _ ” I thought I knew who I was and what I wanted out of life... I thought I was at the end _ _ _of a Chapter , until you me showed that it was only the beginning. I pause to try and steady my trembling voice. “When I was young, I dreamed of a life free of fear. But now I see that such an existence must also be _free of meaning_ – Because there can only be fear if we have nothing to lose. _ _ Now, there are a lot of things I haven’t worried about since I met you . I don’t mind losing my way, because I know you’ll always find me— even in my dreams... I don’t mind being hurt, because I know you’ll protect me as you can , and share my pain when it can’t be avoided. I don’t even mind facing the unknown, because no matter where life takes me , I I know as long as you’re there, that's where I'm supposed to be. _ _ _ _ " 1

"But I'm also terrified, because of how much you've given me. How much you and this puppy have added to my life. I never knew it was possible to be so happy by being afraid, but I am . "I sob. _ _ _ _ I'm so thrilled to have so much to lose, and I promise never to take a single moment with you for granted. I may be scared, but I know deep in my soul that it doesn't matter what challenges may separate us, we will always find _ _ _ _our way back one towards the other .

I take a deep breath once more, gathering strength to the finalization . "You may be my destiny, but you are also my choice. I swear to always do everything in my power to make your life so full and glorious as you made mine ; to always love and support him, share his burdens and ease them whenever you can.

I promise to be a true partner and friend in good times and bad , and in any titles I may win in the future, be _Luna, Queen , or even Empress – the only one who matters to me, is companion . "

"My Ella," Sinclair purrs in response, holding my cheek on his excessively large hand. " You're not the only one who's gotten lost, little wolf.And you're not the only one who's scared . Every day I wake up in fear of the Last few months have been a dream miraculous And, as much as I desperately pray to be wrong , I'd rather dream of you for a thousand years than to live without you. "Your wolf blinks behind your eyes, and I know he speaks the truth.

"But you're better than any dream, Ella. So much so that at Sometimes I find it hard to believe that you're real— not because you don't have flaws or not. have flaws, not because I have mistaken you for a fantasy – but because you makes the fantasies that lonce held for a mate sound shallow and empty in comparison . " Sinclair admits with a wry smile.

"When I was a boy, I imagined that love was one-dimensional , that it was only sunshine , rainbow – iris and destiny . _ thought I wanted _nothing more than passion and adventure, preferably with someone handsome and intelligent. " He reveals shyly.

"But life isn't one-dimensional, and now I know I don't just want to passion, I also want compassion. I don't just want adventure, I want an anchor to keep me anchored in the seas more stormy and remind me of what is truly important in life ... I don't just want intelligence, I want friendship and support. And as far as beauty is concerned , I much prefer good humor and a brave spirit . Sinclair continues, his voice hoarse.

"You are all that, and more—my greatest weakness and my greatest strength. I am a much better man with you, than without you , and you make the worst moments of my life a blessing – because at least if I am fighting, I'm fighting with you. So, I swear to honor you and protect you forever. I promise to keep growing and learning, to always be by your side and for our puppies . I swear I'll _always find you) , no matter how much distance is between us , or what trials we face. "I swear each kiss will be filled with more love than the last," and that our days together will only grow in love and devotion. "

We're kissing before anyone can declare our full vows, and when Sinclair finally sinks his fangs into my neck, a deafening joy ascends to the heavens. The stars themselves begin to fall, triggering a wave of oohs and ahs from the crowd as they they look up at the sky.

I can't drag myself away from my mate to look, but everyone seem to come to the same conclusion as Sinclair and I remain locked in the shelter of arms from each other – the Goddess is looking at us, after all.

Chapter 251 – To War

Ella

“Do we have to stay too long? I ask Sinclair, snuggling up to him. ” We’ve just finished the wedding party and the party is moving to the ballroom. The orchestra warms up in the distance, and the guests slowly shrink to outside the great hall, attracted by the promise of dancing.

” I think we have to stay until the opening dance, at least . He retorts, kissing my forehead as his fingers trace circles on my thigh. “I may have hijacked this event, but it’s still part of the summit. Why? ” He asks, sliding his wolf eyes to my flushed face, ” Is there anything you’d rather be doing, little wolf? “.

I shoot him a grumpy look , “you know exactly what I do.” I want to do it, Dominic. ”

Sinclair adopts a look of confusion, which my wolf doesn’t believe not for a second. ” I’m sure not. “He lies—the rat! “Do you want to go for a run? ” __

The offer is surprisingly tempting. It’s been almost a week since I last let go of my she-wolf, and she carries the weight of my belly with far more grace than I do. I would give a lot for the freedom to run and play as easily as __her_ yes , and I have a feeling that the nostalgia will only increase with the course of the pregnancy . Still , I don’t let my companion distract me: “No. I have a very different activity in mind.”

“Well, you know all you have to do is ask, honey . ” Sinclair states in a gravel voice, which betrays his own desire. “Tell me what you need and I’ll give it to you. ”

I fight a groan. He knows I can’t ask for these things in public, it’s hard enough to talk those words in the privacy of our bedroom. “My cunning wolf wants to do it anyway , use his own dirty trick against him, _speaking our desires_ and leaving his own animal Inside so angry that he will be forced to drag us along like a caveman . Unfortunately, my timid sensibilities and preoccupation with political optics prevail over it, so I can only nibble on my cake and pout while Sinclair murmurs promises in my ear.

” Soon, problems. ” He calms down, his hot breath vibrating over my skin, ” I’m so Eager to take her to bed as much as you, we just have to be patient . ”

Reluctantly, I allow Sinclair to lead me to the ballroom, where we receive the honor of the first dance — both as hosts of the gathering and as a newlywed couple ‘ . Sinclair spins me across the dance floor in his arms, and I avoid becoming Izzy looking into her beautiful eyes. _

I thought I’d want to give up after a dance, but once we’re in the moving, I remember how fun it is to spin this way, feeling lighter than the air . Only when my feet start screaming in protest does my companion immobilize me with one of his burning looks that tell me he can see through me, "As they are those feet, problem?"

"It depends, if I say they're hurting, you'll tell me. Carry to our room and rub them for me? I ask, tapping my eyelashes.

"We're almost there, baby." He promises, taking me to the opulent seats in the front of the room. – Just one more toast and then we can get away. _ "

He guides me to one of the chairs and grabs a glass of champagne. Someone slams a knife into his own glass, and a gradual silence falls over the room. "First of all, I have to thank everyone who helped plan tonight. OneA huge amount of work was required to gather this summit and this ball, even before I decided to make everyone's job much harder by adding a mating ceremony to the mixture .

My lovely fiancée Ella was up day and night making sure everything was perfect, as well as hundreds of planners, coordinators, florists , chefs and Palace staff. "He keeps raising the glass ," for my brother, my sister-in-law, and our friend Elizabeth, you were instrumental in transforming the night and ___ __helping -me to surprise my companion, and I am extremely grateful to all of you . " He continues to descend less, seeming to fear leaving out a single person from your thank you list .

Only after finishing the compliments does he turn his attention to the Summit delegations . "As some of you may know, we were extremely excited to reach an agreement of summit last night. I am thrilled to announce that we will be forging an alliance with the bands of Vanaran in the war against Emperor Damon, and we are moving very quickly in view of the urgent situation . I cannot express the size of my respect and appreciation for all the delegations present here , as well as for its people across the continent – its support and Loyalty is a gift we will never be able to repay, and I am proud from be with all of you. "

Bursts of excited murmurs throughout the room, as many of the courtiers and refugees are learning this information for the first time . I look around at the crowd, watching as new hope and anticipation fills their faces assorted . Sinclair is still talking, describing the challenges ahead and the importance of this fight for shifters and humans. I have to admit that he is very talented when it comes to inspirational speeches , and this is clear from the energy growing in the room. Still, it's not until he mentions an impending deployment that I finally drag my attention from the public. _ _

"At this hour, next week, our forces will be gathered on the Royal Continent, ready to launch our offensive against the tyrant , together .com the resistance forces already on the ground. It is my greatest hope that we can put an end to this devastating conflict as soon as possible As soon as possible, but I'm also hesitant to make promises about battle timelines. War is unpredictable and chaotic at best , and I prefer to set realistic expectations than making promises I can't keep. However, you have my word that I will do everything in my power to bring this war to a swift and speedy end. "

The room begins to spin when Sinclair finishes. "Maybe I'm a fool, but somehow I didn't expect him to leave Vanara so soon. I suppose I was so wrapped up in my plans to find my mother, that I couldn't calculate how a _a successful alliance_ would affect my companion's movements . Therefore, it is an unwelcome shock to know that he is planning to return home to fight next week – though I seem to be the only one. _ _ _

After Sinclair finishes, Gabriel stands, starting a chain of freebies that seem to drag on for too long. By the time my mate finally gets back to my side, I'm struggling to stay calm . " Did I mention how awesome you look tonight? My companion smiles, approaching my chair with outstretched hands.

I let him lift me up, but I can't formulate an answer. _ _ _

"Are you okay? Sinclair asks gently, his big hand circling the back of my neck.

"Can we go up now? " I ask weakly. Sinclair is already moving, lifting me into his arms and leading me to the sound of a symphony of raucous applause. No one seems to notice that none of us seem as thrilled as we just got along. _ _ _ _ _ _ _

"Talk to me, little wolf. Sinclair murmurs as soon as we're out of reach of the ballroom . _ _ _ _ _

"It's nothing. I gasp, quickly correcting myself when Sinclair growls in warning. "I mean , it's , but it's my fault. I don't... I don't... I didn't expect you to be back so soon. " _ _ _ _

_

Sinclair's eyes close, remorse washing away his features. "I'm sorry, Ella. I should have talked to you about it directly. We just finalized the plans this afternoon. The visit to the continent was an unwelcome reminder of the promises I made. I did it to myself when we left. I cannot – in good conscience – stay away now that we have the military support that we needed to. Besides, with you leaving to find your mother , there's no reason for me to stay here for longer . "

_

"So what happens when I find her and I'm ready to join?"to you Again, when is the time to have the baby? I ask, feeling terribly uncertain.

Sinclair sighs, carrying me to our suite. "Can I place an order, dear? " _

“Sure.” I agree, looking at your pretty face. __

“I know you’re feeling anxious right now, and we can talk about it if you need to. But we start tonight on such an amazing note, and I don’t want to knock ourselves down with conversations about war.” He pulls his hair away from my face. “I just want to celebrate to steal a few more hours without worrying about you and just stick together.” __

—

I nod anxiously, tears streaming from my eyelashes as I lean in her warmth, circling my arms around her neck. “I’d like that... Although I don’t know it, it may take some effort to make me forget.”

” Challenge accepted. Sinclair responds like a wolf, lowering his mouth to my neck. He pulls at the strap of my dress to reveal the swollen bite he inflicted on the altar. I whistle at the burning of the cold air, and Sinclair purrs in solidarity. “Poor Dear Fellow, is your mark sore?”

I nod pitifully, “You never claimed me without giving me an orgasm first.” I’m sorry. “It hurt a lot more than I expected.”

“Well, then,” Sinclair replies, his eyes sparkling as he takes my hand seriously, “let’s see what I can do about it.”

Chapter 252 – Isabel Guesses a Secret

3rd Person

Elizabeth spent most of Ella and Sinclair's mating ceremony distracted. The problem wasn't that she didn't feel very happy for her new friends, it was simply that his own mind was focused elsewhere . And while that focus wasn't too far off – it was complete. In fact, all of Elizabeth's attention was focused on James, who sat in the back of Vanaran's delegations with Sadie jumping into his lap.

The pilot's dark hair was combed back and his strong jaw was tightly shaven for the first time . He filled her velvet-lined tuxedo so completely that Elizabeth worried about the seams .it exploded, and it didn't help that she could smell him as clearly as if he didwas at its side, like oak moss , amber and sea salt... And another thing that was just James.

As the passionate couple exchanged their vows, Elizabeth's gaze drifted between James and her adopted daughter, overflowing with unspoken emotions. She was gripped by the most tortuous desire to go and be with them, and their wolf whimpered like a puppy in ___her mind.

It's not fair! The frustrated canine lashed out, unable to contain her fury as Sinclair nailed her fangs at the curve of Ella's throat , eliciting a wailing scream from Luna – one that made the huge Alpha growl with sympathy and desire in ___equal measure. Jealousy surged through Elizabeth's veins as she watched the honorable couple fight their instincts towards unite there and now, using drunken expressions and emitting wild energy as they fought by control .

I want Jame's brand. His wolf demanded for the hundredth time, annoyed at renewed complaint at the intimate ceremony. "Why don't you let me have you!"

–

It's too early. Elizabeth insisted, trying to let the canine feel the logic of her decision, instead of the agonizing desire that assaulted his senses. At the same time, another smaller one somewhere far away. __ Why ? How long will it take? How long do you have to stay voice murmured unhappily?

" Are you okay?" Cora whispered, misinterpreting the other woman's expression of pain as she leaned in to whisper into her ear . "Is this bringing back difficult memories? "

Immediately Elizabeth understood that the concerned human expected her to focus on the past, on its her own mating ceremony and bond with her late husband. The she-wolf managed to shake her head and draw her attention back to Ella and Sinclair , But the exchange was nothing short of shocking. His companion had left a little over a year ago, and the death of His daughter was an even more recent scam. Surely she should be thinking about her true family now... the one she lost, not the one she was building.

Her confusion, guilt, and jealousy threatened to drag her down, then Elizabeth gave herself a silent jolt and pushed away the unwanted thoughts. It was all she could do to not let her gaze return to James and Sadie until the ceremony ended and the crowds began to flock to the party. Now James approached with a wide grin, the precious wrapping in your strong arms reaching Elizabeth the moment she arrived.

"You're amazing: James' words warmed Isabel from the inside out, which, combined with the sudden rush of endorphins as he hugged his little girl, forced a reluctant smile on the wolf's face.

"You don't have to say that." She blushed, shyly lowering her gaze to the floor.

"Oh, yes. James replied fiercely, pulling her chin between his thumb and forefinger. "I don't believe in lies or hiding the truth – especially not when it's in the face from all. So if I say you look amazing, it's because you look so good that it would be a crime not to tell you. _ _"

Elizabeth nodded tremblingly, still keeping her gaze averted and grateful for being able to use Sadie as an excuse for her cowardice. "My dear scapegoat. She thought, tickling the baby's belly and earning a wide smile in response.

Our puppy is not a scapegoat. Her she-wolf objected vehemently, wagging her fluffy tail with utter adoration as she studied the sweet child. She's an angel. The canine made a special effort to make sure Sadie could feel the waves of love through their bonding and stress or instability from their mother. You're right, what I was thinking.

Elizabeth said, speaking directly to the baby. My angel dumpling. They laughed together as James watched, content to observe his favorite girls—at least less_time being at least. The soldier was not blind and it was clear that something was going on with his little wolf, but he knew it was best not to scare Elizabeth now. Instead, he leaned in to kiss her temple, savoring the feel of her soft body melting against her. "Are you ready for the party?"

Elizabeth frowned, but was strengthened by his firm presence at her side, "As I always will be."

A few hours later, Elizabeth's head was light from so much champagne and her heart was heavy for to watch Ella and Sinclair celebrate their happiness so loudly. They deserved this party more than anyone, but Elizabeth hadn't been the best company in this kind of event. It's been a while. She hated small talk and personal questions, largely because of all the answers she could provide usually made people sad and uncomfortable.

However, the longer the night dragged on , the more comfortable Elizabeth became , although She didn't realize it until she caught herself laughing out loud at a joke. She put her hand over her mouth in surprise, and a low purr sounded in her ear . "None of that, now. I love hearing you laugh. Her big blue eyes turned to James in surprise, wrinkling when she saw his expression indulgent .

Immediately Elizabeth realized that James was shielding her from the curious questions and tedious interactions all night long, And he had done it with such skill that no one noticed. – Whenever someone came too close to a subject <B29> , the she-wolf tensed and her protective partner steered the conversation in another direction without a second thought . _ _

Pure safely enveloped Elizabeth's senses, and she heard that strange, distant voice again. How long will it be enough? "How long do you have to be unhappy?"

Standing on tiptoe , Elizabeth smashed her lips into James's. He grabbed her by the waist, holding her slender form tightly against her chest as her free hand moved to Sadie. They held it together, becoming at the same time lost in each other, but reasoned for the little life in his care. _

"Mmm, do you mind telling me what you're thinking , little wolf? James asked, his chest vibrating in a deep rumble as his fangs brushed against his earlobe hers.

" I need to—I need to be alone with you. Elizabeth gasped, feeling terribly vulnerable and struggling to courage .

The soldier considered her for a long moment, noticing the way the she-wolf stood contortion eagerly against him, both with repressed emotion and with physical need. "Alright. He agreed, leading her out of the hall. "The nursery? "

Isabel looked at Sadie, remembering the first time she had to leave Sophie with a nanny, and wondering if it would be more or less painful now. "To leave Sophie. Elizabeth swallowed dryly, hiding her face in the shadows.of the corridor . "Then let's go to your rooms. " _

Jame slowed down until he stopped in the middle of the hallway. " Elizabeth? "

She turned, with an expression of wild uncertainty on her features. "Please? " She asked, her voice hoarse. "I've been denying my wolf for so long and you've been so wonderful. I don't know why I keep pushing you away... " Elizabeth said.He left with a helpless shrug. " I mean, I want to... We both want to... but I don't want to punish myself anymore. She confessed, her voice diminishing to little more than a squeal as tears filled his eyes . "I think it's like Ella says, to go on in a frenzy You don't mean forgetting the past, it just means freeing yourself from becoming his prisoner . "

James nodded, pursing his lips and nodding. "She's a smart wolf. He stepped closer, reaching out to cradle Sadie's downy head in his huge palm, before grabbing the back of Elizabeth's neck with the other. "But I'm afraid I don't understand. "There was a devilish glint in his lethal eyes, one that said to Elizabeth that he was playing with her now—a predator who just couldn't resist playing with your dinner. "What exactly are you asking me, Elizabeth? "

" I've been here all night, seething with jealousy of Ella and Dominic because they are so happy and in love. Elizabeth admitted, embarrassed. "After all their kindness to me, I still get so angry that they they can enjoy what I've lost." James cackled tenderly, moving closer. "And then I feel horrible and guilty and it's just a cycle vicious... then tonight I realized that the only person demanding that I be miserable... it's me... " She shared, tears streaming down her cheeks in perfect lines .

"No one else is telling me That I have to suffer, that I deserve to be alone. People have told me this before, but I don't think I was ready to hear it before, I think I needed to stay ___ to this place for own account . "I don't want to be unhappy anymore, James. Elizabeth murmured, sniffing as the great wolf did his best to just listen , rather than trying to offer comfort or fix it.

"I don't want to be alone... and I couldn't admit it until you showed up. You've made it very hard to keep lying to myself._" She he blinked, nervously biting the inside of his cheek. "I'm in love with you, for more reasons than I can. count . She concluded with a small shrug , tangling her fingers in the fabric of his shirt to steady himself. "I want you to claim me, James. "

Chapter 253 – Isabel is Claimed

James

At first, James thought he misheard her. Then he thought he had misunderstood. But there was no doubt now—not the way Elizabeth was looking at him, with big eyes full of hope, anticipation and a little fear. Hearing the protected she-wolf profess her love made her heart race, until it was __slamming violently against his ribcage as he sped to a gallop .

Elizabeth’s skin was bright pink, and she couldn’t really look him in the eye . Her gaze kept flying up and down, almost as if she thought James could reject it. This it was adorable and annoying at the same time. Didn’t she realize how crazy he was about her?

At the same time, he didn’t want to force her beyond her limits. It was one thing to think she was ready, and another to actually take such a step important. James wrapped a large hand in Elizabeth’s hair, pulling her face up.” You thought I’d refuse, honey? He asked, caressing her sharp jaw with the tip of his thumb. “Surely you realize how hopelessly in love I am with you, Elizabeth. ” _

She shrugged, sniffing harder now. “I don’t know. ”

“Oh, my sweet companion. He breathed, snuggling her into his chest. “I lost my mind for loving you, and it means the world to me that you feel the same. I’ve just been trying to be patient. “ _ _ _ _ I don’t want you to be patient anymore. Elizabeth grumbled, all she-wolf as her eyes gleamed neon blue. James showed off his fangs and growled softly, until the animal ferocity disappeared from the Elizabeth’s countenance , ” I think I need to be pushed. “She added with a small pout. “My she-wolf has me begged to give in to you for weeks, and I have resisted her. I appreciate you trying to give me time, but I can’t do it alone. I... _ _ _ _ _ I need help to take this final step. Elizabeth admitted, her knees looking like absolute jelly. _

James captured her lips with his, knowing exactly what she meant. Loving Elizabeth had been an exercise in endurance, self-discipline and absolute masochism. “I appreciate it, baby. He purred, kissing her cheek. “And I’m so proud of you for acknowledging and asking for help, but no there’s a rush. ” He told her, mostly to see how she would react. “Just know how you feel and that you’re ready to take that step. We can start with _getting more intimate_ and see how you feel . ”

Elizabeth did not disappoint the soldier’s wolf, throwing him a fierce scowl and digging his little feet into the ground. “I don’t just mean I want you to eat me, James. Elizabeth corrected him in a sultry tone, peeking out at the underneath her eyelashes and watching as his words sank. ” I mean, I want you to actually claim me. She clarified, running her little pink tongue over the seam of her lips. His words were getting softer and more suggestive by the second, and it was everything James could do to keep his wolf in check. "I need you You fill me with your big , hard cock, and eat until I'm ruined by any another wolf . I need you to sink your sharp fangs into me."

—

"Enough! James' blood was well beyond boiling point now, and though he didn't Wanting nothing more than to take her to bed in that instant, he couldn't resist kissing her either-it again. He growled, dragging her mouth to his and Elizabeth immediately opened it to his tongue, his light body moving restless against his. They surrendered for a few long, panting minutes, before James finally gave himself regain control of your senses. "There's something I have to tell you, before we go any further. " He grumbled, looking angry at his own best judgment.

Elizabeth winced, fighting a shiver of dread. She was worried about it... about what would happen to her relationship with James once the war broke out.really started. She had also seen the way all the Alphas were muttering and talking today, making plans and whispering strategies . And now with James looking at her, his brow furrowed with regret... It wasn't hard to guess what he was about to say. "You go with Dominic into battle, don't you? " She stated, her mouth suddenly looking very hard .

"He asked me to be his second-in-command while sending Roger to some another mission . " _ James confirmed, trying to read Elizabeth's closed features. "The refugees won't need me to transport them every day, because we will be between them and the threat. " He sighed heavily. "It will be a relief. _ _ "

Elizabeth nodded, her eyes burning. " He'd be a fool if he was without you."

" Can you look at me, sweet fellow? James asked, using that sacred nickname for the first time, and seeing the shape as the vibrations of his voice whizzed through the she-wolf. _

She raised her bright eyes to him, and he kissed her again, at length . "I'm going to do everything in my power to get back home, to you and Sadie . Nothing will keep me away. His need for her was growing wild and violent, even stronger now that they talked about separation. Elizabeth simply nodded, arching into his mouth , searching for his lips with her hers.

James only favored her for a moment, by pushing back and grabbing her hips with an alarming force. "Tell me now, Elizabeth. James begged, desperate to claim it , but I hate to scare her. "Before we go too far to turn back. Are you sure that's what you want? "

Looking at him now, she'd never been so sure of anything. "If you plan to flee to war on the s*tch, then you don't has a choice. You're going to claim me, man."The words were spoken in Elizabeth's voice. trademark ferocity, but also a shiver of fear , like if She still didn't trust this to be real.

James stripped Elizabeth naked as if she were a carefully wrapped gift, whose paper is too beautiful to risk tearing. He kissed every new inch of skin he bared, running his lips down his arms, neck and shoulders her as the blouse disappeared, then working his way down his flat belly until he reached the button of his jeans. (2

It was torture, the way he danced in the places where she more needed his mouth. He took off her bra, licking and nibbling on her spine until her wrist was racing , then doing the same thing with her panties, rolling them out of her hips.and devoting his attention to the curve of his hip, to the bulge of her ass and the inside of her thighs.

Chapter 254 – Cora Gets an Unwelcome Surprise third person

" Well, it looks like you and I are the only bachelors left in this place , " Cora commented to Gabriel , watching Isabel and James in their far corner of the table . Thankfully, they weren't as obvious about their romance of her as her sister was of her and Sinclair .to whom one could easily be shocked if the couple did not realize that they had an audience .

Isabel and James , on the other hand , had been snuggled together for the better part of an hour , close but not really touching . really his _Proximity isn't what gave them away it was their laser focus on each other , not speaking or looking at anyone else . _ It was as if they were the only two people in the world . _

Cora felt a pang of jealousy and immediately forced her away , embarrassed by the ugly emotion . Instead , she tried to concentrate on her conversation with the king . " Excuse me , but I happen to be dating a very handsome wolf named Thomas . ". Gabriel replied , not sounding annoyed in the least by her assumption of him.

Audible Gift Memberships

" Oh . " Cora frowned , obviously disappointed to learn that even the Vanaran king was also part of a couple now . " I'm sorry , I should n't have assumed , " she sincerely apologized , even as questions welled up in the back of her head mind . Namely When had he become so sentimental that the sight of just one happy couple could make his heart overflow with longing ? What learning about another could make her boil with envy ?

" Okay . " _ Gabriel assured him : " It is intentional . I prefer people to keep guessing about my love life . "

Cora concentrated enough to sneer sympathetically , " Yeah , I 'd imagine there are a hundred too many opinions on that particular subject . " _

" You can say that again . " Gabriel chuckled , taking a sip of his wine from him . Then , a mischievous expression appeared on his face in the form of a small , secret smile as if he was about to admit something he should n't . goes_ good though _ Someday soon I hope to make it official . _ _ "

Cora forced herself to smile . Congratulations ! _ " To make a relationship official in the world of shapeshifters meant a formal claim : another mating ceremony . She tried to hide the sudden , inexplicable pain that swallowed her insides from her , silently wondering if she was freaking out ... or maybe about to get her period . She was never so moody and she could n't understand it . _ _

“ Thank you , but if it happens it will be after the war . Gabriel replied , visibly recanting her own hopes of him in favor of realistic expectations .

” Are you sure ? Cora asked , nodding at James and Isabel . __ ” Maybe they have the right idea , bond while you can . ”

It was their last night in Vanara , either traveling to the halls of Altaran to find Ella’s mother , or returning to the mainland with Sinclair to face Damon . Either way , they would all be separated by this time tomorrow ... and goodbyes in times of war . They were the worst of all . _ Cora she knew that there were never guarantees in life , and she knew especially the cost of fighting at home . Suddenly, an image flashed in his mind of her, a bloody vision of the operating room that afternoon , of a resistance fighter they had failed to save . Only in his mind ‘s eye of him was Roger ‘s face in that lifeless form , instead of the stranger he had been unable to save .

“ Cora , are you okay ? Gabriel asked suddenly , worry seizing him as tears welled up on the human ‘s lashes .

“ I’m fine . She assured him through a completely unconvincing smile . _ “ I just need a moment . Some fresh air . ” _ She gasped , pushing her chair back . He met Ella’s concerned gaze and shook his head to make sure she was right. her sister did not follow her . Unfortunately , there was nothing she could do to stop Roger from following her .

Cora moved stiffly for the balcony doors and ran out onto the terrace . The gardens were still decorated from the night before , though they were much quieter now . Courtiers and delegations , all refugees willing and able to fight , __ everyone was home preparing for war . _ Those who weren’t were back in the dining room trying to enjoy what little time they had left together . Cora descended into the maze of plants , sucking in great gulps of air as her awareness of her cruelly narrated. the scene . __ And tonight they ‘ll all go up to their rooms and hold each other tight and make sweet , sweet love and I ‘ll be here ... staring at a fucking leaf .

Cora made a face and shook herself a bit , “ Enough ! ” , she scolded herself . “ You’re being a brat . It’s not their fault they’re happy . ” “ Talking to yourself , little human ? A familiar and infuriatingly deep voice sounded behind her . __

Cora jumped , turning back to look at Roger . ” You know where I come from , it’s rude to stalk lonely women in the dark and listen to their private conversations . ”

Roger frowned , as if racking his brains . “ No , no , we come from the same place and I don’t remember any rules like that . Also , is it a conversation if you are having it with yourself ? ” _

“ It’s the most private type of conversation . I answer haughtily , turning my nose towards the handsome wolf . _ _ _ ” So do us both a favor and run before you make things even more awkward than they already are . ”

Roger pursed his lips , shoving his hands into his pockets as he crept forward . ” Well, since things are already so awkward , I might as well ask why you’re crying ... and why you were mad because someone is happy . ” Cora crossed from _ arms . on his chest From him, wishing he could kill this man with his eyes alone ... then trying and snorting when the big wolf just chuckled . ” Come on , ” He encouraged , moving so close now that they were almost touching . _ _ _ ” Do you know that I can be a _ very good listener . ”

Somehow , Cora doubted that Roger’s services as an impartial friend and advisor extended to her feelings for him ... not that she had feelings, of course . ” Actually I ’m going to bed . She lied quickly . But listen , in case we do n’t have one opportunity in the Tomorrow I want to thank you for being so supportive of me . _ _ _ Tor helping me and getting me out of Moon Valley in the first place . _ _ _ You saved my life . She held out her hand , ” I hope we meet again . ” ”

Cora was counting the minutes until her and Ella ’s departure , and dreading them . She knew that saying this goodbye would be difficult , but she was also the one she wanted the most to get out of the way .

” Oh, I see . ” Roger’s lips unfurled in an utterly devilish smile . “ I was wondering why you didn’t mention it . Dominic didn’t tell you . ”

” You didn’t tell me what ? Cora snapped , not liking the predatory grin on her face one bit .

“ Well , since the killer told Damon that the Alpha is dead , his next logical targets are Ella and the baby . _ This possibility seemed to be confirmed when Kieran was approached by Damon , so we made arrangements to ensure additional security on his journey . “. Roger explained vaguely , looking like the cat that ate the canary . _ “ You must realize that my brother puts the safety of his mate and his son even above his own ... he will spare no resource or expense for Ella and Rafe . ”

” What are you saying ? Ella Cora demanded , though she had a terrible feeling that she already knew .

” I’m saying you do n’t have to worry about getting separated or something happening to me while you’re on Altara .” Roger clarified , still smiling as he pushed Cora against the wall .

" Why not ? _ Cora swallowed , cursing her body as she instinctively backed away from the wolf .

Roger bared his fangs . " Because I'm going with you . " He stated , in a tone that sent shivers down Cora 's spine . _ " I'll be with you every step of the way . " Roger continued as Cora 's shoulder blades collided with the stone , and he loomed over her , taking her cheek in his great hand . " Day and night , for the next few weeks ... on a chain of deserted islands ... with nothing to do but watch over your sister with a dozen other guards . "" . she purred Ella, and Cora found her lashes droop , wondering if he was about to kiss her ... and then wondering if she would have the strength to stop him .

He did n't . " I don't know about you , " Roger concluded , his dark eyes boring into Cora's as she looked up at him again , nervously licking her lips . His glowing wolf gaze dropped from her to follow her little pink tongue from her, and suddenly the Beta was finding his pants too tight . _ " But I'm going to work hard to think of ways to entertain ourselves during those long hours on the boat and in the temple . " _ _ _

Cora's heart pounded frantically against her ribs , her thighs clenching reflexively to ease the ache in her core . " Surely a temple dedicated to the Goddess is a very holy and sacred place , " Ella Cora suggested , her voice quavering . " Probablywe will have tobe very quiet and respectful while we are there . "

Roger laughed , a sort of ominous , knowing roar . " Sweet Cora , is that really what you expect , knowing what you make of our kind ? " "

Suddenly, her mind returned to the changing holidays and traditions she was familiar with , and the few she was able to celebrate with Ella this year . She thought of the Solstice , with its bonfires , moon baths , and wild hunt . She thought of the primitive , paganthe energy of those nights , the way they are all rooted in ancient magic and base instincts , the raw sensuality they all seemed to bring to the surface . She thought of the heady power of being alone with Roger in these completely nondescript settings , and tried to imagine yourself in a place of mystery and power , where all your senses would be heightened even more .

And suddenly she understood why Roger seemed so pleased with himself .

It was clear that he did not expect her to be able to resist once they left together . He planned to make her his , sooner rather than later . And the scariest part of all ? Cora had a very bad feeling that she was going to have success .

Chapter 255 – To War

Ella

“I can’t believe you didn’t tell me!” Cora grouses, shooting me a death glare as we gather at the Royal docks. Vanarium–hulled ships fitted with cutting edge defense and weaponry systems are moored along the wharf, their crews flitting around like hundreds of tiny ants as they prepare the vessels for departure. One, the smallest, is bound for the Altaran Islands and my mother; the others are all headed back home to face Damon.

None of us want to say goodbye. Sinclair bundles me in his arms and nuzzles my neck, his wolf grumbling and growling as he nibbles my mating mark, repeatedly reminding me that I’m his – as if I could forget. Mine, mine, mine. He proclaims, his wandering hands moving over my round belly. We don’t leave for another half hour, but I’m already beginning to worry he won’t let me go when the time comes.

Isabel is in the same boat, cuddled up with James and Sadie, trying to pretend she isn’t crying as the big Soldier soothes and pets her. She focuses her attention on her young daughter, rocking and shushing the perfectly content child – as if Sadie is the one in need of comfort instead of her mother. James doesn’t say a word, merely kissing Isabel and holding her a bit tighter.

Of course, when I say no one wants to say goodbye, I’m excluding my sister, who is still complaining about the fact I didn’t warn her Roger would be joining our journey as added security. “Seriously Ella, you had to know I wouldn’t approve!”

“I’m not listening!” I sing in reply, closing my eyes and kissing my mate. I slide my arms around his neck, and Sinclair chuckles as he claims my lips. That’s it. His wolf croons in my head. Just ignore her and let me gobble you up, little mate.

I can’t help but giggle into his wolfish grin, catching a flash of emerald fire in his eyes as he captures my nape and drags my mouth back to his. I lean into my mate, letting him support my weight as we get lost in one another. Heat pools in my belly, and I can feel my inner animal starting to get excited. Scenting my arousal, Sinclair pulls back with a reluctant frown – there’s not enough time for us to come together again before we go, and continuing to rile one another up before parting is a recipe for misery.

Thus I don’t really mind my sister’s whining, because at least it’s a welcome distraction from the imminent separation of our party. I’m painfully aware that this might be the last time I ever see my mate, but it isn’t only Sinclair I’m going to miss – nor is he the only one for whom I’m worried. When all this began I didn’t know any of these people, now I feel as though I have a deep and abiding bond with each of these wolves – forged through the crucible of mutual trauma. Of course it’s more than that too. They’re my family, my pack. 1

I don't want to lose any one of these people... but we're going to war and the unavoidable reality is that some of these shifters won't survive. The mere thought forces me to clamp my eyes shut. If I continue watching them, I'm sure I'll start to cry – though today I think tears are inevitable. Anger is easier, so I direct all my pent up feelings towards the person who truly deserves them: Damon. Standing here, looking around at the somber, solemn faces of the people I love most – it's painfully obvious how much we all have to lose, and I'd happily destroy anyone who tries to steal more from us than has already been taken. It honestly makes me want to forget finding my mother so I can go straight home and destroy that tyrant.

"You're glowing again, trouble." Sinclair tells me softly, leaning his cheek against my hair. I crack an eye open and take a peek at my skin. At first it seems like nothing more than a shimmer – like the iridescent sheen of snake scales in sunlight, or the glimmering luster of pearl dust. However the effect only grows stronger as I watch, and soon it appears as though my pores are emanating their own white light. I feel like I'm back on the Ether – as if my altered consciousness is bending reality to ensnare my senses.

"I'm fantasizing about how you're going to kill Damon." I confess, breathing in his wonderful scent as grisly images fill my mind. I share the pictures with Sinclair through our bond, hoping to inspire him. Decapitation, disembowelment, beating him bloody with his own dumb leg... or maybe you could tie him up and sick some rogues on him.

"Mmm, my bloodthirsty mate." He purrs, letting me feel the steady vibrations in his chest. There's a flash of sadistic appreciation through our bond, but Sinclair's wolf seems much more interested in exploring every inch of my glowing skin. "I can't wait to see all the incredible things you learn from your mother." He lifts my hand to his lips, holding my gaze as he bestows long, luxurious kisses over my knuckles. "You hold such mysteries for our kind, Ella. There's no telling the secrets you're about to uncover." He murmurs, rocking me back and forth in place. "I can't wait to see you figure it all out and unlock your power... to watch you come into your own. My Ella."

I can hear the words he's leaving unsaid, his hope that he lives long enough to see these gifts manifest, and to see our son come into the world. Oh Goddess, I think as his mood grows heavy. It's getting close to our departure time, but I'm not ready to say goodbye, not yet. I'll never be ready. I nod eagerly, "I'll learn. And I'll come to you as soon as I can. Maybe we can castrate Damon together?" I suggest hopefully.

Sinclair laughs, "Whatever happened to that innocent little nanny who wouldn't hurt a fly?"

I hiccup and sniffle, fighting the emotions seeking to drown me. There's a new frisson of tension in the air, a sense of communal understanding that we need to finish up. I try to smile, "She was corrupted by a big bad wolf, of course."

Sinclair kisses me, pouring all his tenderness and passion through our bond. "Listen to me, baby. We don't have a lot of time left."

I shake my head, the tears hovering on my lashes immediately tumbling down my cheeks. The last time I said goodbye to my mate he almost died, and that was supposed to be a safe trip. Now he's actually going into battle. Primal fear and bad memories rage and roil inside my chest, and part of me wants to cling to my mate and beg him not to go.

"I know, sweetheart." Sinclair assures me, not needing any explanation for my sudden panic. "It will be okay." He soothes, stroking my trembling lower lip with his thumb. "I know I can't promise us a future, but Goddess... if I could..." He shakes his head in frustration, holding me a bit tighter as his green gaze seers me. "When we get through this I'm going to write you a whole book of promises and spend the rest of our lives fulfilling them."

"The only promise I need is for you to always remember how much I love you." I counter, trying to steady my shaking voice. "How much Rafe loves you... and your pack." I want to bury my head in his chest and sob, but somehow I manage to keep going. "I need you to promise that whatever happens, you always keep reminding yourself how worthy you are of all that love – because you are. You're brilliant and selfless and deserve so much more credit than you take." I'm trying to think of all the things I need to say to him, just in case this is the end. I don't want to leave a single word unsaid. "And you musn't blame yourself for whatever comes to pass. You have given everything for this pack, and you're about to give even more. None of this is your fault, Dominic." "Right back at you, gorgeous." He smiles sadly, and a pulse of uncertainty escapes me. Now that the moment is upon us, the idea of running off to remote shifter lands without him is too daunting to contemplate. Self-doubt assails me, and Sinclair doesn't accept it for a moment. "I believe in you." He professes intently. "I know you will succeed, I know you will find the answers you seek, and I know that you will master your powers with flying colors. You have an incredible future ahead of you, no matter what happens in this war, you know that?" Sinclair's eyes are shining as he returns my sentiments, trying to fit a lifetime of love and emotion into a few words.

"I believe in you." I reply tearfully. "Damon is no match for you, Dominic. He's a little boy who got hold of a big stick and he thinks he can make us all back down. You're going to prove him wrong, you're going to show him what a weak little insect he is."

"I love you so much." Sinclair declares, dragging me into his arms. "If Damon wants to keep me from you, he's going to have to do a lot worse than kill me." He drops onto his knees then, pressing his palms to either side of my tummy and leaning his forehead against my navel. My precious pup. I have to leave you now, and I'm so sorry. It's the last thing I want in the whole world, but I promise I'm going to do everything in my power to come back to you. I can't wait to meet you, Rafe. I'm expecting to feel confusion or offense through my bond with the baby, but instead I hear the tiniest, garbled wail. It almost sounds like a person speaking underwater, only much more garbled and high pitched. My eyes widen as I realize that our unborn pup is crying within my womb – for the first time. Sinclair looks at me in surprise and absolute misery as we reach the same conclusion: Rafe understands. And he is not happy.

Chapter 256 – Altara

Ella

The floor of the ship's afterdeck bucks and reels on the rolling ocean waves, the deck surging up and falling beneath my feet. I grip the railing and try to breathe in the fresh sea air, keeping my eyes locked on the distant horizon. Cora appears by my side with a bottle of water. "How's the nausea?"

"You would think a ship this large couldn't be thrown around so easily." I chuckle in reply, gingerly sipping the water. It's our fourth day at sea, and I barely made it through the second afternoon before the swells became so rough that I began to feel ill. After my first bout of vomiting I fled our stuffy cabin and came up above deck which helped – but now I'm afraid to take my eyes off of the horizon, and the Goddess knows there isn't any land in sight to spot instead.

Audible Gift Memberships

Cora laughs, "babe this tub is a drop in the bucket." She reminds me, patting the side of the silver watercraft. "Besides, they warned us these seas are rough."

I groan, taking another drink. "How much longer?"

Her face lights up, "I just came from the wheelhouse, the captain says we should be able to sight the islands within the hour!"

That gets my attention. I straighten up immediately, trying to shake off my malaise. Adrenaline rushes up to beat back some of the illness, and I find myself inspecting my clothing for wrinkles and stains. Maybe it's utter insanity, but if I'm going to be meeting my mother today I want to make a good impression, even if I am five months pregnant, sick to my stomach and fleeing a war zone.

"Easy now, it'll be a few hours yet." Roger chides, coming to stand on my left. He leans on the railing mirroring Cora, who determinedly ignores him. "We'll have plenty of time to make ourselves presentable after we've docked."

That does settle my wolf a bit, but I wish Sinclair was here. I pull out my phone and turn on the recording of his purrs, feeling some of my tense muscles unwind as soon as I press play. My nerves have been absolutely fried since we separated. On one hand this is to be expected – given the seriousness of our situation. However, something tells me that my anxiety is less about the wolf I left in Vanara, and more about the woman for whom I'm headed. After all, I know Sinclair loves me almost too much. I have no idea how my mother feels about me, and I've been dreaming of her for as long as I can remember.

–

I peek at my sister. “So... do you hate me?” I ask, pulling her attention away from Roger.

Cora, who was thoroughly occupied staring daggers at the wolf, gradually drags her attention to my face. Her brow furrows. “What do you mean?”

“I mean, we spent our whole lives wishing for parents.” I sigh, searching my sister’s lovely face. “if the situation were reversed I think I’d feel pretty jealous.”

“I mean I am.” Cora shrugs, having the grace to look slightly abashed. She wraps her arm around me and rests her head on my shoulder. “But I’m happier than I am jealous – I want this to be everything you’ve been hoping and waiting for, Ellie.”

For one moment, I forget we aren’t alone. Roger and the sailors fade into the background, and then it’s only Cora and me, looking out at the deep blue water surrounding us on all sides. I snuggle into my sister’s warmth, needing to feel her affection as I contemplate the uncertainty awaiting us. I inhale a shaky breath, “What if she doesn’t like me?” I whisper, in an impossibly small voice.

—

Roger has the decency to make himself scarce as Cora pulls back from me in surprise. “Ella, what are you talking about? This woman prayed and prayed for you for years! She wanted a child more than anything and then she didn’t even get to raise you, if anything I expect she’s going to like you too much.”

I’m not ashamed to say that I let this fantasy take hold of my mind for a minute. I picture myself arriving at an ethereal temple by the coast, and a beautiful woman in long robes running towards me with open arms. I imagine feeling her embrace... my mother’s embrace, and I shudder. “I’m afraid to hope.” I admit, gnawing on my lower lip. “It’s so much easier with the war because as horrible as things are, I’ve only been caught up in this for a few months I mean it hasn’t even been a year, Cora!”

“I know.” She nods in understanding, rubbing my back. “And you’ve been holding out hope for parents for the better part of 30 years.” A hard edge enters her usually soft voice. “It’s much easier to believe in the things you haven’t already seen played out a hundred times before.”

I blink the tears from my eyes to study Cora’s countenance, which remains drawn and sober. There’s something so lost in her deep brown eyes, and I realize she’s probably feeling about as raw as I am right now. I may be vulnerable and on-edge, but she sounds so disconsolate that I simply can’t bear it. “I’m really rich now, you know.” I tell her with a sly smile. Cora blinks in confusion, “I’m sorry, do you want me to hate you?”

“No!” I laugh, rolling my eyes. “I’m saying that I could hire an investigator... if you want to find your family.”

Cora’s face lights up for a second, then quickly falls. “No.” She answers shortly, and I wonder if she’s talking to me or her own conscience. “I hate to say it, sis. But I think we’ve maxed out our miracles.” 1

“You never know, just look at what happened with me.” I encourage, knowing I’m walking a thin line now. I want to help my sister, but I also don’t want to be cruel by giving her false hopes.

“You also happen to be a she-wolf with the Goddess’s own blood in your veins.” Cora counters, a note of derision in her voice. “Somehow I doubt things will turn out so well for me.”

“I’m sorry, Cora.” I proclaim sincerely, “I wasn’t trying to rub your face in my good fortune.” (1

“It’s okay,” Cora exhales, her entire body softening as she wraps me in a hug. “I know you were only trying to help, but I came to terms with the fact that I will never know where I came from a long time ago. Being reminded... it only hurts.” She has to bend over my swollen belly in order to properly embrace me, and her voice is full of warmth when she finally pulls back. “But Ella, your mother is going to love you so much. Just think, all those years you were waiting for her and not knowing if she was even out there... well she was waiting for you too, probably counting down the days until she finally got to meet you, knowing you were out there but forced to stay away.”

My heart swells in my chest, and I cling to my sister, nuzzling her shoulder. “Maybe we can share her.” I suggest, “If she’s like me then she probably wanted lots of babies. I bet she’d adopt you.”

“Thank you.” Cora laughs, “But we should probably wait and see what she’s like before we decide to make any offers.

I scoff, “hey it’s a good deal. Two awesome daughters for the price of one.”

“Oh, I’m sorry, is she buying you now?” Cora teases. “With what money? She’s been living in a wolf convent for the last five years.”

“She was a queen.” I respond, my eyes narrowed. “She probably has it stored away somewhere.”

“Yeah, or she donated it like most people when they join a religious sect.” Cora responds with amusement.

“Fine, she won’t buy us!” I finally surrender, “it was just an idea.”

“A ridiculous idea.” Cora laughs, and I squeeze her even more tightly.

“I’m sorry to interrupt ladies,” Roger says, stepping close enough to drag our attention away from one another. “but if you want to go to the bow, land has been sighted. The navigator confirmed it’s the Altaran islands.”

Before the words are even out of his mouth, Cora is gripping my arm and pointing into the north, her face alight with excitement. “Ella, look!”

A group of islands appear so suddenly on the horizon that I have to wonder whether or not they might have been pulled up straight out of the sea for our benefit. They’re dark and jagged and entirely too ominous, with black volcanic beaches and jagged peaks thrusting skyward, lined with spiraling cliffs. My heart races the closer we come, and soon the islands are not merely blurry shadows, but solid, stark and in high contrast to the endless ocean.

And there, on the distant shore, stand three figures in long robes – waiting.

It seems to take a lifetime for our ship to moor, and another lifetime over by the time we’ve loaded into smaller boats to venture ashore. I recognize Reina as soon as I see her, standing tall and proud between the priests from my memories. If I expected her to greet me with tears or laughter, I was wrong.

Instead she merely looks at me with sharp, searching eyes. They travel up my body, assessing me coolly as they finally rise to my face. “You’re too late.”

Chapter 257 – Queen Reina

Ella

Of all the things I expected to hear when I met my long-lost mother for the first time, it certainly wasn't, "You're too late."

I stop dead in my tracks, glancing nervously at Cora, Roger and Philippe. We're barely out of the transport boats, and my bare feet are sinking into the dense black sand covering the beach. It slips between my toes, and I absentmindedly squidge them this way and that, enjoying the sensations while my brain tries to catch up.

"We're too late?" I finally repeat as our little party remains frozen at the edge of the waves, wondering if we might be sent back the way we came.

"You should have been here months ago." One of the priests announces grimly.

I recognize the man from my dreams, and suddenly my heart stops beating. His face is so familiar, and yet I doubt I'd be able to pick him out of a lineup. He's at once entirely unremarkable, yet impossible to forget. Cora leans into me, sensing my tension if not my malfunctioning heart. "I didn't even know this place existed until last week!" I say by way of explanation, my voice hoarse and wary. "I would have come sooner if I knew I was supposed to."

The three figures exchange dubious glances, and though my wolf refuses to take her attention off the priests, my other senses are completely distracted by my investigation of my mother. She smells familiar, but when I reach towards her with my thoughts, I come up against a blank wall. She's shutting me out. My heart sinks, and a new voice pulls my attention from Reina's beautiful face.

The second priest – also from my nightmares – grumbles, "Very well then, you'd better come in." We begin to move forward, but Reina stops us with a raised palm. "Just Ella." She orders, her voice soft and yet inarguable. "The rest of you will have to return to your ship."

"We're not leaving her." Cora objects, her hand wrapping tightly around my arm as if she fears they might attempt to take me by force.

"You'll have to." The first priest responds dryly. "This is sacred land. Only those blessed by the Goddess are permitted to enter, you risk grave misfortune by setting foot in her temple without invitation."

"Then we'll risk it." Roger bites back, stepping forward with utter authority. "We stay with Ella." Reina arches one blonde brow as she considers my mate's brother. After some contemplation, she concedes, "As you wish." One graceful palm is outstretched, welcoming our small group onto the island. “But no more, the rest of your crew will have to stay aboard.”

The trio turn their backs and begin marching through the sand towards the temple. I stare at their retreating forms in shock, trying to wrap my head around this turn of events. They seem both entirely unsurprised and thoroughly underwhelmed by my arrival. Granted, I wasn’t expecting fanfare or even a welcome banner, but I did assume we’d be received with warmth... especially by my mother.

She barely looked at me.

I feel a tugging at my elbow and realize Cora is trying to pull me forward. Meanwhile I’m standing here gaping like a fish, too stunned to move. “Come on, honey.” Cora encourages softly, “let’s get you off your feet.”

Despite our chilly greeting, Queen Reina and the priests turn out to be generous hosts. They usher us into the temple and set us up in front of a blazing fire. A few novice priestesses carry in dishes piled high with food, as well as kettles full of tea and coffee.

I find myself shrinking next to Cora, increasingly ill-at-ease with every moment that passes. No one says a word. Reina and the priests seem perfectly content to wait until the servants have delivered everything and we’re alone... unfortunately for them, I’m not so patient. “Would someone please tell us what’s going on?”

“You don’t know?” Reina inquires, setting down the steaming teapot in her hands.

“Well I thought I did!” I burst, still gripping Cora’s hand. “I came here to find you and learn about my past and my powers, but now I’m only confused.” I explain, “You seem to be expecting us, yet you tell us we’re too late.” I look to Reina now, trying not to show my hurt. “You’re my mother, but you don’t seem to care that I’m here!”

“That isn’t true.” Reina corrects me gently. “We’re all very happy you’re here, Ella. We’re just worried. There’s not much time left.”

“That may be true, but it isn’t my fault.” I counter, crossing my arms over my chest, “You left me helpless, defenseless, with no possible tools or advantages in life. You didn’t leave me a single hint about my true identity, so is it any surprise that it took me so long to figure it out?”

“No.” The first priest concedes, bowing his head. “It isn’t.”

“Will you at least tell me your names?” I inquire, feeling far more bold than I did a few minutes ago, “I keep calling you one and two in my head and it’s confusing.”

"I'm Silas." The second priest offers me something akin to a smile, "and this is Pollux."

"You two," I accuse hoarsely, not sure where I'm headed with this, or why it's coming out now. "You bound my wolf, you tormented me."

"We also saved your life." Pollux points out, his dark eyes flashing.

"Did it ever occur to you that I might not have been broken enough to need saving if you'd protected me?" I demand harshly, trying and failing to get to my feet. Instead my ungainly belly topples me right back into my chair.

"Just stay down, babe." Cora murmurs in my ear. "You're more intimidating seated than standing at this point."

I glare at her over my shoulder, before extending a hand to Roger with a pleading expression. He helps me to my feet, and I begin to pace. "All this time I've been asking myself why I was being punished, why I was being tested." I turn my focus to Reina, "I've waited 30 years to find out where I came from, and now I finally find you and it's like.." I trail off, pulling out my phone so I can play the recording of Sinclair's purrs. If this is confusing for Reina and the Priests, they give no hint. Instead they wait until my breathing has gone from heaving gasps to steady exhales, and I summon my remaining patient. "I just want answers. I just want to know who I am and what I'm supposed to do in this war. Where in the world do I belong?"

I don't realize I'm crying until Cora scrambles up and wraps herself around me, making soft shushing sounds. "You belong with me, Ella. If nowhere else, you belong with me, and Dominic and Henry..."

"You belong right here among the Goddess's most honored servants." Reina interrupts, earning a vicious glare from Cora. "Surely you must realize you are no ordinary woman."

"But I am." I insist, clutching my sister. "Do you think you can erase so much hurt with a few divine gifts? Do you believe that beauty or wealth can undo the crimes committed against me?"

"You are not ordinary, Ella." Reina repeats firmly. "Perhaps you are in matters of the heart, but you certainly aren't when it comes to lineage and power."

"Well what good does that do anyone, if I'm too late?" I inquire, trying to get my raging emotions under control. "Are we bound to fail now?" Tears steam from my eyes as I contemplate this possibility for the first time. "Are... are you telling me I'm too late to help us win? To save the packs?"

The priests exchange unreadable glances. "Not necessarily. We didn't mean to make it sound so final.” Pollux explains. “None of us know what the future holds, but I’d be lying if I said I wasn’t worried.”

“We’re sorry for what you have suffered, Ella.” Silas offers, sounding sincere despite his austere expression. “And we’re sorry that this meeting isn’t what you expected. It’s clear there have been a few misunderstandings, but the important part now is that you’re here. We just have to do our best and hope that it’s enough.”

I shake my head, feeling completely adrift and longing for my mate so fiercely I could scream. I reach for him through our bond, even though I know he’s much too far away to feel me. My tugs on the connection come up empty, but I notice that I can feel his absence. It’s like a hole in my chest that can’t be filled again until he returns. But it is there. Whereas, with Queen Reina, I don’t feel anything at all – not even an absence of what should be.

I turn to Reina, realization dawning. “We aren’t bonded.” I assess, wrapping my arms around myself. “Are we?”

“No.” Reina confirms gravely, and I see a flash of pain in her eyes. “Ella, you have to understand that I only carried you... I was never your true mother.”

“I don’t understand.” Tears burn my eyes, “If you’re not my mother then who is?”

“Sweetheart.” Reina leans forward to take my hands in hers. They’re warm and soft, but I feel no greater energy, no sign that we might have a connection beyond that of strangers. “Your mother – your only mother, is the Goddess.”

Chapter 258 – Answers at Last

Ella

“You’re not my mother?” I whisper, my voice positively tiny. Looking at Reina, it makes sense. She’s tall and willowy, with black hair, olive skin and dark eyes – just about my polar opposite. I’m recalling Henry telling me that I don’t resemble her or Xavier, so I must take after the Goddess, but I didn’t truly understand how great the dissimilarity was until this moment. It seems a silly question now; of course she’s not my mother. How could she be?

The weight of my crushed hopes batter me from every direction, as if they aren’t simply falling from above, but closing in around me, suffocating and strangulating. They’re all watching me with the same sympathetic expression: Reina, the priests and Roger. Only Cora refuses to pity me, choosing instead to offer our hosts a death stare for upsetting me.

“Ella, please sit down.” Reina pleads, pulling me back over to the fire. “If you’ll listen, we’ll explain everything.”

“Okay. I manage to utter weakly, reclaiming my seat. “Explain.”

Reina clasps her hands in her lap, taking a deep breath. “When I married Xavier, I had my entire life planned out. I would finish school, wait a year or two before trying for pups, maybe work a little. All in all I expected to spend the first years of my union learning to be a queen and preparing to ascend to the throne in another decade or so. Then Xavier’s father died suddenly and unexpectedly, and all at once my plans fell apart. We were coronated when I was just 22.”

She pauses to sip her tea, and though the flavor is sweet her lips form a grimace. “Xavier and I chose one another. He’d rejected his fated mate and all his parents’ plans for an arranged marriage, and all for me. At the time it was romantic, I felt like I was living a fairytale. And then things changed... or perhaps the problem is that they weren’t changing.” Her eyes drop to my pregnant belly, and the muscle in her cheek twitches. “I had half a dozen miscarriages before the doctors told me to stop trying... they said I’d kill myself if I continued.”

My cheeks are wet, as if her words flipped on a switch in my brain and opened the dam. “I’m so sorry.” I profess, “I know what it’s like to struggle with infertility but I never... I’m just so sorry.”

“Don’t be.” Reina purses her lips, and I wonder if she truly means it. “You wouldn’t be here if I’d been able to conceive, and we would all be the worse for it.”

“I’m still sorry.” I repeat, wanting to hug her but not trusting my ability to get out of my chair without assistance.

“I appreciate that.” Reina replies, softening slightly as she continues with her tale. “Of course, Xavier was at a loss. His greatest responsibility as King was to produce heirs and carry on his bloodline. My inability... my failure made that impossible. We were stuck. Xavier couldn’t reject me – not when I was crowned queen and not after he’d made such a fuss about choosing me in the first place, though he probably should have.” An expression of torment crosses her pretty features. “More than once over the years I’ve thought this all could have been avoided if he hadn’t rejected his fated mate. They would have produced heirs, the monarchy would never have been in threat, and his sons would have taken over when he died.”

“And we’ve reminded Reina that this was all put in motion by much greater forces than the workings of a few power-hungry shifters.” Silas chimes in, using a gentle tone that indicates they’ve discussed this many times indeed. “The God of Darkness has been at work for centuries.” Reina inhales a steadying breath as she meets Silas’s gaze, nodding in appreciation. “Well, however it came about, that was the beginning of the end for me and Xavier. All the things that had seemed so romantic when we first fell in love... all the sacrifices he made for me... they became naught but resentments. He blamed me for everything that went wrong in his life from then on, and I could see him reframing the things he once loved about me as annoyances.”

Her eyes fall shut, and I can almost feel her pain. “A couple of times when he became very drunk, I caught him looking at me with such hatred in his eyes that I actually worried he might try to kill me just to get me out of the way. It was as if I had become this insurmountable hurdle standing between him and everything he’d ever wanted...” When her lashes rise again they’re wet with tears. “He forgot he wanted me once.”

“So I did the only thing I could,” Reina shrugs, “I prayed. I’d prayed to the Goddess for all my babies, but I’d never felt so utterly desperate. It was no longer simply a matter of wanting to be a mother, it was a matter of my entire future happiness, my marriage and possibly even my survival. I’d never been so low before.” She lifts her eyes heavenward, to the open ceiling and the stars above us. “I never dreamed she would respond in person.”

“She appeared to me as if she’d been there all along – one moment I was alone and weeping, the next I was awake with this glowing being before me. It physically hurt to look at her, as if I knew I was gazing upon something I was never meant to see.” Reina’s attention turns back to me, and I’m surprised to see she’s smiling. “You look so much like her, Ella. All of the beauty but none of the pain. ”

“So what happened?” Cora asks, leaning in as if she worries Reina might stop her story here. “She asked me why I wanted a child.” Reina replies, her gaze flitting to a vast moon dial in the center of the room, checking the time. “So I told her that it was my duty, but more than that, that it was my greatest wish to be a mother. Then she asked why she should grant my wish over the thousands of other mothers in the world, and I explained that my child wouldn't merely be for myself, but for all the united packs. My child would become King one day, and not having one meant risking a power vacuum."

Reina pauses then, clearly getting caught up in her memories. "When she told me that she would give me a baby I thought I might faint, but my joy was only temporary. Because next the Goddess shared her own story with me, the details of our world's creation, the peril we would all be facing one day. She explained that there was no stopping this war, but that the child I bore might allow us to survive it." Reina recalls, "I didn't really understand, or know what to think. It was all too surreal."

"Then the Goddess told me that I wouldn't get to keep you. I was so angry and outraged, I demanded to know why on earth I would torture myself carrying a baby I'd be forced to give up... Reina's lips go very thin as she nods slowly, with the bearing of one who does not wish to remember this at all, "And that's when she explained that Xavier took me to bed that night, it would be her child in my womb, rather than my own. I would be like a surrogate for her and the King not that he ever knew anything about it." She shrugs as she watches me, her eyes welling over again. "In some ways it made it much easier to give you up, because you weren't truly mine."

I shake my head, unable to stay seated a moment longer. I manage to hoist myself out of my chair and cross to her side. The idea of anyone asking a woman who cannot have children of her own to carry theirs is a cruelty beyond imagining. I can't find any words to express the depth of my horror and sorrow for her, so I simply wrap my arms around Reina and squeeze. She gasps in surprise, but gradually returns my embrace, leaning into me.

—

"I tried not to love you, not to get attached." Reina explains, weeping into my neck. "But I should have known better. Even humans fall in love with their babies before they're born — and they aren't bonded. I did have fun with you though, I loved being a living miracle, I held onto you as long as I possibly could. Then Silas and Pollux came to take you — I never knew where you went." "And Xavier?" Roger interjects, "how much did he know?"

"None of it." Reina reveals grimly. "After so many miscarriages, it came as no surprise when I told him the child didn't survive."

"So my father never even knew I existed?" I assess, my throat thick with emotion..

"I told him on his deathbed." Reina shares. "We got through the next twenty-five years in a tense partnership. We were no longer lovers or even friends, but bound together by our roles as leaders. I learned to feel safe with him again, and he learned to accept reality – though it took him a few years to stop flailing in protest. He was pleased Ella... when I told him about you, he said he wished he could have met you.”

I sniff as I process this information. “Did the Goddess tell you how I’m supposed to save our future?”

“No.” Reina dashes my hopes. “That, she will have to tell you herself.”

I untangle myself from her arms. “What do you mean?”

Reina gives me a wry smile, “You didn’t think she was going to miss your homecoming, did you?”

I can only blink, still not understanding. Then Pollux stands, “she’s here.”

Chapter 259 – The Goddess

Ella

Seeing the Goddess again is like something out of a dream. Naturally, my memories of our first meeting have been restored, but the events my hypnosis sessions uncovered feel slightly different from my other memories – less solid, more malleable and illusive. This feels much the same. There's a surreal ambience in the air as the doors to the inner temple swing open, and it only grows stronger when the Goddess appears.

At first, there is only light. It pours forth from the expanding entryway in a blinding aura, forcing me to avert my gaze. Beside me, I feel Cora throw up a hand to block this show of celestial brilliance – not that it does much good. I feel as though my skin is on fire, and then a strange pressure deep in my chest. I feel as though something inside me is cracking open, and I instinctively fold in on myself, trying to keep it closed. Philippe is muttering worried questions by my side, his strong hand on my elbow, but I can't bring myself to look at him.

Audible Gift Memberships

My attention is locked on the being now framed in the doorway of the gleaming inner temple. The overwhelming light has dissipated now, leaving only the beautiful woman from my memory. I lift my gaze to her face, still grimacing with the effort of keeping myself in one piece. She's exactly as I remember her: too magnificent to take in all at once, and yet so fascinating that I could easily get lost in a single one of her features and never grow tired. There's the same starlit hair, galaxy eyes and pearly skin. But this time when our eyes meet, I feel a new pulse from that cracked place inside me. Oddly enough, it reminds me of my bond with Rafe.

The shock of this realization staggers me, so much so that I lose control and stop trying to cement the burgeoning crack. At once the walls seem to collapse, and suddenly I'm feeling a third bond in addition to Sinclair and Rafe's. It's filled to bursting with love and power, and a great many things I don't understand. The link is so replete with magic that I feel a bit drunk, but I know I have to keep going.

My wolf inches forward, testing the new channel in our consciousness. It's every bit as strong as those I share with my son and mate, though alarmingly vast and unfamiliar. I know the feel of my boys with my eyes closed, but pinpointing a single shape, emotion or thought from the Goddess is impossible. It's daunting – but not unpleasant. I can feel so much warmth and affection radiating towards me, with the same sort of unconditional fervor I feel for my unborn pup. It fills me with a sense of safety, security and belonging, in ways no one else has been able to provide for me. Tentatively, I send a single question through the bond and hold my breath as I wait for an answer. The Goddess hasn't looked away from me once since she arrived, and now she floats forward, her cascading gown trailing over the hallowed ground. "Yes, Ella." She confirms with a tender smile, her shimmering hand cupping my cheek. “This is what it feels like to have a mother.”

Her touch is so soft and nurturing that tears sting my eyes, and all I want to do is throw myself into her arms. I don’t, unsure of what is appropriate and how I’m even supposed to behave in this situation. However the Goddess obviously senses it, because she wraps me up in her willowy arms, “I’ve been waiting for this day for longer than you know.” She murmurs in my ear. “Even before you were conceived, I have always looked forward to meeting you, my daughter.”

“But we already met.” I sniffie, nuzzling her shoulder and taking the opportunity to breathe in her scent. I almost regret this, because her aroma is a terrifying blend of everything in the universe.

All the life her light created is now embedded in her pores, competing for attention and rushing to the surface in microscopic bursts. There are plant and animal smells, as well as those of minerals and chemicals – and then about a million things I don’t think I want to know about.

“I know,” The Goddess answers, pulling away to look down at me with a serene smile. “You were so tiny and precious, but it was only a blip in time. I want to know the woman you’ve become.”

“Will we have the opportunity for that?” I inquire warily, “Reina, Silas and Pollux keep telling me I’m too late.”

She sighs, “We have a lot to talk about, my darling. And you’ve only just arrived. Wouldn’t you like a rest?”

“No.” I counter, tempted to put some distance between us, but unable to release her. “I’m too hyper to ever sleep now. I need to know what’s happening.”

“Very well then.” The Goddess concedes, “Reina?” She sweeps her hand towards the inner temple, and one by one we file inside. I introduce Cora, Roger and Philippe, and I’m infinitely grateful that they continue to refuse to leave me alone with these mysterious characters, no matter how many times they’re asked.

“Where should we begin?” Reina inquires once we’re all seated and drinking a fresh brew of tea. “I know where.” I declare. I’ve been keeping the former queen in my periphery this entire time, and I didn’t miss the pain in her eyes when she witnessed our reunion. “I want you to know that I think what you did to Reina is horrible.” I begin, leveling a scowl at my mother. “To grant her wish only to rip it all away? It’s unforgivable. And why did you tell me Reina was one of my mothers if she wasn’t?”

The Goddess arches one silvery brow, cocking her head to the side as she observes me. “Wasn’t she? She loved you, sheltered and carried you. She sacrificed her body and her freedom once she lost her husband, and all for you.”

“You know what I mean.” I counter, taking Reina’s hand in my own. I wish I had a way to communicate my appreciation and affection for the she-wolf beyond small touches, but at this point it’s the best I can do.”

“I needed you to find this place, Ella.” The Goddess replies, her voice light and airy. “You had to come looking for Reina, so that we could have this meeting. So that we can begin your training.” “I don’t understand.” I confess, reaching for Cora with my free hand. She quickly cuddles up to my side, surrounding me with support. “Why couldn’t you carry me yourself?” I inquire, glancing apologetically at Reina. “Not because I wanted you too... I just don’t understand?”

“I do not create life in the same way humans and shifters do.” The Goddess shares. “I can dream entire worlds into being, but the only being capable of impregnating me would be the God of Darkness. And it would have meant an immortal child – one who could never know what it truly means to be human.”

“Oh.” I muse, wondering if any of this will ever begin sounding believable.

“The world doesn’t need another god with more power than they know what to do with.” The Goddess continues, looking around at us all. “I needed a child with shifter blood and my power in one. So the best I could do was implanting one of my eggs in Reina, and giving Xavier a push to her bed.”

“And everything that happened after?” I ask, not trying to disguise the pain in my voice. “The orphanage? Binding my wolf? Those visits from Silas and Pollux! What on earth was the deal with that knife in the forest?”

—

“You know some of the answers already.” My mother reminds me softly. “We needed you to know what it meant to be human, but it wasn’t enough to merely leave you with them and binding your wolf. We knew you had my power. We knew you had the experiences to give you perspective – but we had to find out if you were capable of uniting our worlds, and that part has nothing to do with power or perspective. It’s about you. We didn’t know your heart or who you would become.” “But I thought this was the whole reason I was born!” I exclaim, needing to make sense of this. “It was a hope.” The Goddess replies. “I am not omniscient, and I do not control the workings of men. I knew a child of your lineage and experience would have the potential to save your people, but the rest was up to you. We needed to see if you would fight, if you would protect and sacrifice your own needs for others. Luckily you grew up to be the woman I hoped, but none of this is guaranteed.”

“Alright,” I swallow, deciding to wait and process all of this later. It’s simply too much to compute in this moment. “So... what training? What am I supposed to do? If it’s not about magic –”

“If we can win the war, your heart will bring our people together, not your power.” She answers evenly, “but to win the war? Damon is not as weak as you may think, Ella. Your mate is going to need your help, and that means learning how to use your magic – and we hardly have any time left.”

“I still don’t understand.” I whimper, wishing Sinclair was here.

–

“That’s okay, my love.” The Goddess runs her fingers through my hair almost absentmindedly. “All will be clear in time. Now – Are you ready to begin?”

Chapter 260 – No Boys Allowed

Ella

“I’m ready,” I reply, straightening my shoulders and sitting up, away from my mother, who is also the Goddess. “What do I need to do?”

“You must go,” she urges, her eyes clear and untroubled despite the turmoil in mine. “Into the desert beyond this temple. There, I can communicate more clearly, more fully. I will make your path clear to you.”

“Seriously?” I cry, wrinkling my nose in distaste and looking over my shoulder to where the desert surely waits. “Out into the desert? It’s not something that we can do here, in the comfort of this really nice temple?” My wolf inside me howls at the idea – she wants trees and shade and cool damp places, not the hot desert sun.

The Goddess smiles at me and shakes her head lightly, her glowing blonde hair shaking over her shoulders. “No, my child,” she intones. “You must learn the lessons that this earth has to teach you, and it’s not something you can glean from a structure built by man.” Her eyes drift, then, to my stomach, where my child is growing. “It will be dangerous for you,” she whispers. “You are weaker than you think, girl.”

My stomach sinks at her words and my hands fly to my stomach, instantly wanting to protect my little boy. “Will it...will it hurt him? To learn what I need to know?”

She looks at me evenly, not giving a hint of affirmation or denial. “The future is not written, my child,” she whispers, her voice soft. “Your body is weak, but your child is strong. Your time in the desert will be a trial, your deliverance of my gift to your people will be worse. It is your choice, whether to take these risks upon your body. And in the end, there is no guarantee that it will work. You are...late. The war is well progressed. Those against whom you fight are strong.”

I look around the room at everyone, all of their eyes and their hopes trained upon me in this instant. My hands move over my stomach as I look each of them in the face, but my heart is with my little boy – our little boy, mine and Sinclair’s. This miracle we made together.

as

I would do anything to save him, to keep him safe. This I know as a truth as deep as my soul, deep as my love for Sinclair. But I think as well of the world he’ll grow up in if I do nothing. A world torn apart by war, in which he will always be hunted, always be a target. And one day he’ll grow big and strong, like his father – big enough to take it all on. But until then, when he is just an innocent child...

Until then, it's my job to fight for him.

"All right," I choke out, my fear as well as my determination shining on my face. "All right, I'll do it. Let's go."

My mother gives me a soft, worried smile and leans forward, taking my face in her glowing hands. "I will be with you every step," she murmurs, her voice soft enough that I'm the only one to hear it. "Do not doubt that I am there, guiding you, little one." Then, pressing a kiss to my forehead, she begins to glow with a fierce, burning light.

As she pulls away, she turns to Cora and gives her a bright smile. Cora blinks her surprise, shocked to be singled out by the Goddess. And then, all at once, the light is blinding, forcing all of us to close our eyes against the glare. When we open them again, the Goddess is gone and the room is cast in relative darkness.

—

"What!" Cora cries, jumping to her feet and looking around. "But she didn't give us any instructions – what are we supposed to do!?"

"No," I whisper, shaking my head at my sister. "No, I know what to do." I press my hand to my forehead, where the goddess had pressed her kiss. With it, she gave me her love, but also all of the instructions I need to carry us forward. "Come," I order, getting to my feet definitively. "We have far to go, and not much time."

Everyone stands, ready for action, ready to follow me out into the desert to meet whatever the Goddess holds for us there.

In the end, we don't all go into the desert. Instead, it is only Cora, Regina, and I who prepare to set out into the sands. Roger puts up the biggest fuss at being left behind, of course.

"I can't let you go out there alone," he growls at me, though his eyes are on Cora the whole time. "I promised Dominic that I'd keep you safe –"

"It doesn't matter what you promised," Regina intones evenly, coming over to us when she hears him putting up a fight. "This desert is sacred to the Goddess, it is no place for a man." She looks him up and down, a bit of a sneer on her face.

"And them?" Roger snaps, throwing an arm towards the priests who work the temple. "You're going to tell me that they've never been out there?"

Regina glances calmly over at the priests and then turns her gaze back to Roger. "They are castrati," she says, raising her eyebrows. "Unless you'd like to join their number...?"

I burst out laughing at this and slap a hand over my mouth to muffle the sound. It feels wrong, somehow, to laugh like that in the goddess' temple – but the look on Roger's face when Regina so casually offered to take his balls away –

I glance at Cora and almost lose it again when I see that she's also holding back her hysterical laughter.

Regina raises disapproving brows at us, but walks quickly away to where preparations are being made, too busy to scold.

"Well, Roger?" Cora asks, crossing her arms and smirking at him. "You gonna... lighten your load? And join us out in the sand?"

I hear the growl deepen in my mate's Beta's chest and take two steps towards him, putting my hands on his arm and looking up at him with my sweetest sisterly gaze. "Come on, Roger," I coax. We need someone to ready the ship, anyway – when we get finished with what we have to do out there, we're going to need to move. Fast."

Cora says nothing, just continues smirking, even when he turns his heavy gaze on her. I see the longing in his eyes, the worry that's not simply the assignment given to him by his brother, but the worry of a wolf for the woman he loves. Looking between them, I can feel his anxiety in the air, as well as Cora's daring. If Cora had a wolf, I know that right now it would be crouching in her mind, her hackles raised, her tail slowly wagging, thinking come get me.

But, as much as I'd like to see this play out, we're out of time. "Well, whatever," I breathe, stretching my arms over my head and pretending a nonchalance I don't feel. "If you want to come, Roger, we'll see you out back once you've had your uh –" I flick my eyes to his crotch, letting my gaze linger there, "load lightened." Then I look back up at him with a big smile. "Otherwise, we'll see you at the boat!"

I turn, moving to Cora and wrapping my arm around hers, pulling her away with me.

"How long will it take?" Roger calls after us, his hands sunk angrily in his pockets.

I look over my shoulder and shrug at him. "Honestly?" I say, shaking my head. "I don't know. Hours. Days. Weeks? It will take as long as it takes,"

He growls again and opens his mouth to reply but Regina opens a door at the back of the temple, waving us forward towards the dark room there.

"Come," she demands, lowering her brows at us. "There is no time for this nonsense. We have work to do."

Nodding, chastened, Cora and I duck through the low lintel of the door, into the coolness of the dark room. But I don't miss the glance Cora sends to Roger over her shoulder. The one that promises a return, no matter how long it takes.

Chapter 261 – Ella Goes Into the desert

Ella

In the darkness of the back room, Regina instructs us to strip down to our skins and then hands us two rough robes that we pull over our heads, hardly more than bleached potato sacks with cowl necks and long sleeves.

“Is this part of the ceremony?” I ask, curious and disliking the feel of the fabric on my skin. Honestly, given my choices I’d rather wear the leggings and simple shirt that I arrived in.

Audible Gift Memberships

“No,” Regina answers, looking at me evenly, not a hint of emotion on her face. “It will simply keep you cool in the heat of the desert. But your nakedness beneath,” she notes, letting her eyes travel down my small body beneath my robe, “that is to honor the goddess. When you perform the ceremony, you must be naked before the moon. You can bring nothing with you from your earthly life.”

I run my fingers lightly over the claiming mark between my neck and shoulder, suddenly glad that wolves don’t do wedding rings. I’m not sure I could leave this memory of my mate behind, even to lay myself bare before the Goddess. My fingers move again to my stomach, and I look down again to the swell of my child.

“Will it matter?” I ask, suddenly looking up at Regina. “That my child is a boy? Like, if there are no boys allowed on this trip

—
—

Regina smiles slightly, coming forward and laying a hand on my cheek. I stop mid-sentence, surprised to see her express any positive emotion at all.

“While he is within you, he is part of you, and part of the sacred cycle of womanhood. He will be safe, child, have no fear.” Her eyes crinkle a little as her smile deepens. “A boy, then? How wonderful. A blessing for the kingdom.”

I join her in smiling and give a little nod. A blessing indeed, though I admit I hadn’t really thought about his role in the kingdom. But if Sinclair did win this war, then he would be King, and his son...

Well. Questions for another day. My wolf yips within me, somehow sensing in a way that I do not our need to get moving.

“The sun is falling,” Regina declares, taking her hand from my face and walking towards another door on the far side of the room. "It is time to go." With that, she opens the door wide, revealing the golden desert beyond. "Let us begin."

Cora and I give each other a glance and then, together, head through the door.

Cora, Regina, and I walk through the white sands of the desert, which now glow orange in the light of the setting sun. It's an incredible sight, the way the entire landscape seems to take on the nature of the sun, glowing and hot and alive. I look out over it admiringly, wondering if this is the sun putting on a last show before the moon takes its place as queen of the night.

I walk at the head of the group. Regina is, technically, our leader, but I'm the one with the soul bond to the Goddess now, to my mother. I shake my head, still marveling over that fact. I had always wondered who my mother was and never, ever, had this possibility come into my mind. As we walk and the sun takes its final dip below the horizon, my hand again drifts to my stomach.

Will it make a difference in my son's life, having a goddess as a grandmother?

Will he, too, have powers?

And what were mine?

I sigh, knowing that I'll have answers soon enough, but wanting them now now now so I can get out of this scratchy potato sack, away from this place, and back to Sinclair. My wolf gives a restless little stir inside of me, wanting to be with him, in his arms, smelling his delicious scent...

"Ella," Regina warns, her voice low. "Pay attention."

I give her a little apologetic grimace and look around, realizing that we've reached the crest of a dune and that the desert is spread out below us. Night fell without my noticing and above us, stretching huge above the sky, a full moon hangs.

"We are lucky." Regina murmurs, looking up at it. Cora and I follow her gaze. "The full moon will make the connection stronger."

"This is it," I declare, nodding with certainty. I don't know how I know, but I know. I feel it, in my bones and my stomach. Inside me, my wolf turns in a circle and curls up, alert but content. We have reached the place we're supposed to be. I do a little turn, marveling out at the silvery desert spread around us, the shadows of the dunes purple and blue to match the richness of the velvet sky. It's an incredible sight. I wonder, passingly, how many have had the chance to see it. For a brief moment, I feel myself blessed.

“What do we do now?” Cora asks, likewise looking all around. As beautiful as it is, we are in an empty place. There is nothing here to with any script regarding what to do next.

“Sit,” Regina instructs, pulling her garment over her head in a single graceful movement and spreading it out on the ground. Then, she folds her legs beneath her and sits patiently upon it. Wait.”

I wrinkle my nose at the idea of waiting. Though I know this is where I need to be, and my wolf is calm inside of me, I still want to be home in his arms

—

“Ella,” Regina warns again, giving me a stern look. I frown at her. How did she know what I was thinking about? “Concentrate.”

I sigh and nod, knowing that I have a job to do. Then, I pull my potato sack over my head and spread it on the stand before sink to my knees on top of it. I place my hands on my thighs, sitting my butt back on my heels. Cora sits down next to me on her own bit of fabric, staring up at the moon, and I close my eyes, slowing my breathing. I’m not really someone who meditates – who has time for that? – but I know, somehow, that this is what I need to do.

“Breathe,” Regina instructs, and I start taking deep breaths, letting my mind wind down to its basest state, trying to clear all my thoughts and make space for the Goddess to do her work.

It takes a minute before I notice a change. But then, slowly, in the darkness of my closed eyes, as if on the back of my eyelids, a small purple light begins to glow. I barely notice it, register it as strange, until it begins to pulse lightly and then spread. The growth is slow, just—a minute bit at a time, but, eventually, the purple light takes over the space of my entire internal vision.

And then, I gasp.

Inside my head, my mind, my body, I feel the shuddering warmth of my mother’s love. And it’s an incredible thing, because it’s a love for me, specifically, but also, somehow, a love for everyone. I am filled with it, with my mother’s ceaseless love, with the love of a mother for her child, with the dedication of a moon for the earth around which it orbits.

And then, very suddenly, I know. I understand. I have everything I need, inside of me.

When I open my eyes, I see Regina still sitting quietly with her eyes closed. Cora, however, is starting at me dumbfounded.

“Ella,” she whispers. “You’re...you’re glowing.”

I give her a smile and look down at my arms, somehow not surprised to see that I am glowing – or shimmering, or something. With a glorious silver–white light.

“Cool,” I murmur, admiring it. Then, I look back to my sister. “Are you ready to go?”

“Is...is that it?” she asks, hesitant. “Do you know like...what to do?”

I nod, my smile growing. “Yeah, it’s way simpler than I thought it would be.” Then, I push myself to my feet, shaking out my sack and pulling it again over my head.

I take a few steps towards Cora, then, but a sudden wave of dizziness overtakes me the moment I do. Cora is on her feet in an instant, Regina next to her, and I stumble into Cora’s arms, feeling my breath come short.

“Oh my god,” I murmur, looking up at Regina. “I feel like...why am I so weak?”

“The ceremony has taxed you,” Regina warns, “you must take care.” Then, she turns to Cora. “Come, we must get her back to your ship. The time is short.”

With that, Regina stoops under my arm, wrapping it around her shoulder, supporting my weight. Cora, on my other side, does the same. Together, we begin the journey back, and I’m horrified to find that every step is a struggle for me.

Worse, as much as I search for it...I can’t feel my bond to Rafe. Not anywhere.

My dear readers, Thank you for stopping by and reading this story. I hope you enjoyed it. I’m trying my best to update asap. I’ll appreciate it if you explore my other stories as well. Please follow my fk page Caroline above story and group Caroline above story if you wanna chat or keep updated on my writing schedule. Yours, Caroline above story

Chapter 262 – War

Sinclair

God damn it, I think, looking around at the hastily set-up headquarters that looks like a little more than a rickety table surrounded by anxious wolves. If this isn't hell, then I don't know what is. We arrived at the edge of the capital days ago and set up here, in an abandoned warehouse that Damon didn't bother protecting because it's not worth his time.

A mistake, I think, one of many that he's making. The fact is that Damon made a huge misstep in releasing the secret of our being to the humans he expected, I think, to cow them with fear, to take control of their resources and use them against mine. What he didn't expect was that the humans would entrench and fight back. And now, his army is fighting on two fronts – against the humans and against me – stretched thin. Being pulled in two directions is making him miss things, like this warehouse at the edge of his territory, which we were able to sneak into and set up shop.

Still, though, looking around, it's nothing like the quality of accommodation that I'm used to. The walls are crumbling, the ceiling has fallen in a few places, and what rusted rafters are left look ready to fall down at any moment. My wolf grumbles within me, pacing unhappily. Let's get this moving, he growls, we have to get back to her – we have to get to the baby –

–

"I know," I mumble to myself aloud, angry. God damn it, I know. I don't need my wolf inside me constantly nagging me about it. My mind is on her every minute my beautiful mate, with her rose-gold hair and that troublesome smirk. God, what I could do to those smirking lips if she were here now with that teasing mouth. I'd use my tongue to part those lips, slip inside. I'd holding her against every inch of me while I tasted her, feeling her moan reverberate in my own mouth...

I press my eyes tightly shut, forcing my mind back to the subject at hand and gritting my teeth almost to dust as I dismiss these thoughts of what I'm going to do to my mate the moment I have her in my arms again. This is better, at least, than the thoughts of what can go wrong with her not by my side at every moment, but –

–

Damn it. I take a deep breath and open my eyes, forcing myself to look at the tactical maps on the table in front of me. This would all be much easier if she was here with me, so that I could protect her. I can't stand her being away. Inside of me, my wolf gives a little howling yip of agreement. He wants her back too, wants her near.

“Sir,” James says, walking over to the table where I consult with a handful of the other Alphas.” The mission is in place. We are ready to proceed.”

I take a deep breath, straightening up from the table and looking around at the men around me. Okay, everyone,” I snap. “This is the big push. Our only shot at the element of surprise. Are we ready?”

We’ve been working on this plan for days, putting it together piece by piece. Everything needs to happen just so but...if it works? We could take the city by nightfall. Around me, all of the Alphas nod. Everything in its place, everyone ready, It’s zero hour and time to attack.

“Goddess’s speed, then,” I growl, my eyebrows drawn down and my eyes alight with the fire of the wolf within me. “And good luck.” With that, everyone springs to action. And the war truly begins.

3rd Person

Damon stands at the head of the empty table in his board room, his arms crossed, his gaze fixed on the door. His left eye twitches slightly with the intensity of his gaze. Any minute now, he thinks, almost willing the door to open so that his plans can finally come to fruition. He received a message this morning, from his ally. We’ve got him.

That’s all it said, but that was all he had needed to hear. He knew that he could use Sinclair’s foolish trust in his so-called allies against him. That all it would take was one well-placed bribe, and all of his little soldiers would fall one by one. Like dominoes.

As the prince stares, the door begins to creek open. With it, Damon’s smile grows.

“Welcome, Kieran,” Damon purrs, quickly scanning the group he sees before him. “So nice to see you on this...momentous occasion.”

“My Prince,” Kieran replies, giving him a deep bow.

“King, now,” Damon growls, glaring at the weak Alpha to whom he has promised a kingdom. Promised, Damon thinks, but not yet delivered. He smiles at his own cleverness, knowing that this is just the start of his plans.

“King when you are crowned,” Kieran replies evenly, stepping into the room. “Until then? Prince”

—

“Formalities,” Damon snaps, watching the rest of Kieran’s group filter in. Guards, mostly – his own, as well as Kieran’s – the stupid man had insisted upon his own troupe – but... there. Damon’s grin glows as he sees Alpha Sinclair being dragged into the room, his huge shoulders struggling against the chains wrapped around him, against the handcuffs behind his back.

The guards bring Sinclair forward, throwing him to the floor at Damon’s feet.

“Well well,” Demon teases, his cruel smile showing all of his wicked teeth. “How the mighty have fallen.”

Sinclair glares at him from his spot on his knees, shouting some curses that are muffled by his gag. Damon just laughs, lowering his face so that it’s nearly even with Sinclair’s.

“Do you not wish,” Damon jeers softly, “that you had just bent the knee weeks ago? When you had a chance? All of this could have been avoided. You would have been powerful, under my rule. Comfortable. At peace. And now? Now you have lost everything.”

Sinclair glares at Damon as if the look could burn him. As if he could light him on fire with just the force of his eyes. Damon just laughs, straightening up and shaking his head at the man.

“I don’t like this,” Kieran insists, looking around the room anxiously, drawing Damon’s eyes to him. “Killing him like this – I don’t think it will have the effect you think it will”

“Cut the head off the snake,” Damon responds, his voice harsh. “And the body will...” he draws a hand through the air and then lets it fall limply to his side. “Die.”

“I don’t think it works like that here,” Kieran refutes, shaking his head. “It’s not like with you, with one leader to whom everyone bows. In the past weeks Sinclair has rallied many to his cause – has convinced them of the morality of his position. If you kill him here,” Kieran looks seriously at Damon, hoping he will understand. “Another will simply rise to take his place. Perhaps you should let him go, or keep him as prisoner instead. Don’t make a martyr for them to rally around.”

“Never,” Damon snarls, glaring at Kieran. “He will die today, solidifying my position as King. And if you suggest any alternative again, you will go with him. Am I made clear?” The last word is a horrible growl that sends shivers down Kieran’s spine. His eyes go wide as he takes a step back, clearly believing Damon. “Besides,” Damon continues, looking back towards his prize, taking pleasure at how Sinclair looks on his knees. “I’m going to enjoy killing this one. And we wouldn’t want to take away any of my fun. I’ve been deprived for so long.”

Damon takes his time pulling a wickedly bladed knife from his belt, pressing it close to Sinclair's throat. "After all," he whispers, low enough that Sinclair is the only one who can hear. "It's been so long since I killed your first mate. And then I'll take you. And then, when I'm done, I'll bring this knife to your new mate's pretty little neck. And I'll drink the blood I spill with it."

A menacing snarl rips from Sinclair's throat as he hears this threat. As the knife presses closer, a single drop of blood begins to drip down his neck.

Chapter 263 – Twisting the Knife

3rd Person

“Now!” Kieran shouts, just as the knife starts to draw Sinclair’s blood, just as he was instructed to do. The blood, after all, would throw Damon’s guards into a frenzy, giving Kieran and his men the slight advantage they will need to pull this off.

At his word, every single one of his guards goes into action, turning on the royal guard closest to him and engaging in battle. Damon was no fool, of course – Kieran had been allowed to bring only a few guards, not so many that they outnumbered Damon’s. It was a risk, engaging the enemy when outnumbered, but it one they had to take.

As Kieran too whips a knife from its hiding place in his boot, Sinclair whips his body away from Damon, sheering the skin of his neck across the length of the blade but avoiding any true wounds. Rolling away from the prince, Sinclair roars, ripping his gag away with the force of his jaw, twisting his wrists and wrenching his handcuffs apart at the weakened center chain that his men had placed there just for this moment. Sinclair then makes quick work of the chains wrapped around his shoulders placed there for show, rather than for restraint – and turns on Damon.

The glow still burns in Sinclair’s eyes, but now a deep and hungry grin spreads across his face as well. The prince goes pale. “Mine,” Sinclair growls. “You are mine, and it is your blood that I will lick from my teeth when this is finished.”

Barely a moment passes before the prince responds, throwing himself as far from Sinclair’s grasp as he can as Sinclair takes a mighty swipe at him, the claws growing from the edges of his fingertips as he moves. A chase begins, with the Prince moving away from Sinclair as quickly as he can and shifting as he goes. Sinclair gives chase like lightening, taking his own gigantic wolf form to face the prince’s.

The prince and the alpha ignore the other battle across the room, though Kieran glances their way when he can. The gambit seems to have paid off the prince’s guards, distracted by the scent of blood in the air, were not expecting the assault. Prepared for the blood, Kieran’s guards press their advantage, slaughtering as quickly as they can, dispatching the prince’s forces until they are even. Sinclair’s teeth pull back from his slaving jaws as he stalks slowly towards the prince, backing him into a corner. One huge paw slams on the ground after another, coming ever closer to his prey, his hackles high, his nose wrinkled and tense with his rage, his fury, his need to kill.

–

How dare Damon – on top of everything he had done – how dare he threaten Ella, his perfect mate. The thought of Damon with her blood on his hands, licking it from his paws Sinclair with a fury that lights his own blood on fire. He will see this wolf in pieces today, torn it fills apart with his own jaws.

Damon doges back and forth in the corner, his tail low between his legs but his ears pinned back in a snarl. He knows he is at the disadvantage – that there's no way he can take on Sinclair's gigantic wolf alone. But still he is not without his own advantages – Damon is clever, ruthless, and fast. And has nothing to lose, whereas Sinclair has everything.

—

As Sinclair draws close enough to strike, Damon feints left and then dashes right, squirming past Damon's snapping jaws and darting under the table, seeking to get to his men, to hide behind their safety and regroup –

Just as his forelegs disappear under the table, though, a great crack sounds through the air and a horrible howl. Even the guards across the room, caught in their own battle, pause at the sound, twisting to see Sinclair hauling Damon out from beneath the table, the prince's twisted back leg held tight in his jaws.

With all of his might, Sinclair hauls the other wolf into the air, slamming his body onto the table. The wolf yelps, the sound echoing through the room over the noise of his cracking bones. Kieran is the first to recover from his shock and horror, yelling "move!" to his forces, who press their attack, taking advantage of the distraction to cut the throats of some of the prince's guards, to trap and tie others, rending them useless.

As they work, Sinclair leaps onto the table, which shudders under his weight. He crawls over top of the smaller wolf's shuddering, whimpering form, his face still curled in a wolf's rage, his jaws slavering with his hunger for vengeance.

Beneath him, there is a flash, and then, in the blink of an eye, the wolf transforms back into its human form. The prince is so tiny below the gigantic wolf above him, his leg twisted unnaturally beneath him, his ribcage oddly flat in places it should not be.

"Please," the prince pants, looking up at the alpha above him with rage and fear in his eyes. Mercy

"

The wolf above the prince snarls dreadfully at the sound of the word, placing a paw on the center of his chest and pressing down, causing the prince to cry out in pain. Sinclair lowers his face until his fangs are just inches from the man's face, their eyes level. His fierce green gaze speaks his intention: he wants to let the man look one more time into the eyes of the wolf who will kill him. To know who, precisely, took his life. And why.

The prince's face twists, the fear turning into a nasty, pain-filled sneer as he spits up at Sinclair, the spittle missing its mark and flying back to smack onto the prince's cheek. "You pathetic excuse for an Alpha," he hisses, "you will never lead them – you will never –"

"

But his final words are lost to history as Sinclair raises his head to roar mightily to the sky and then snaps his head down, sinking his jaws deep into the prince's throat, and ripping it out. Blood pours from the man's neck as the light dies from his eyes and, slowly, Sinclair turns to look at Kieran, at his men, at the prince's guards either dead or incapacitated on the floor. Blood and gore drips from his maw and his piercing eyes are lit with an unearthly green light.

Slowly, a little awed, Kieran sinks to one knee. The surviving men they brought with them quickly follow suit, bowing their heads to Sinclair, who still stands as a wolf on the table, heaving heavy breaths.

"My King," Kieran murmurs.

There's a bright flash of light and suddenly the giant black wolf is gone, replaced with the Alpha who would be King. He stands on the table, looking down at his people, ignoring the corpse at his feet. Then, he raises his arm to wipe the blood from his face, licking the blood slowly from his teeth. Savoring it

"Come," Sinclair says to his men. "We have work to do."

Kieran and the men stand to attention as Sinclair steps down from the table, striding quickly past them out the door. This part, at least the killing of the prince had gone according to plan. But the rest

They walk to the front of the palace, out onto a third-floor balcony where they can see the war raging within the city itself.

"Release a statement to the press, photos," Sinclair orders, his voice low. "I want the prince's corpse on every news channel. Unlike our side, the prince truly was the head of the snake." He snaps his gaze over to Kieran. "With him gone, the wolves he led will fall in line under my control."

Kieran nods, agreeing, though his face is still worried. "Sir..."

"I know," Sinclair interrupts, his voice snapping as he turns his face back to the city. "That only ends half a war. What the hell was that man thinking, revealing our secret to the humans?"

“He underestimated them,” Kieran suggests, sinking his hands into his pockets and looking out at the smoke rising over the city. “Humans are not wolves, but they are not sheep either. They will fight for their freedom.”

“Now, our job is to convince them that we have no intention of taking it away,” Sinclair thinks aloud. “But how the hell can we do that?”

Chapter 264 – To the Temple

Ella

As soon as the boat pulls up to the dock, I'm by the gangplank, eagerly waiting for the sailors to lower it. One of my hands rests on the underside of my swollen belly, holding my child close. The doctor that Sinclair assigned to come with us examined me the moment we stepped foot onboard after our trek home from the desert and confirmed that Rafe's heartbeat is still there, though fainter than he'd like.

I need to get off this boat, now, I think, my eyes wide as I watch the sailors hurry to lower the plank so that I can scurry off of it. I have a job to do, and the sooner it's done, the sooner I can rest.

Stop, my wolf begs inside of me a word I don't think I've ever heard her say. She's usually run!, or fly! or go! Never stop, caution, wait. But today, I can feel her pacing inside me, worried.

We are weak, she cautions. The pup...

I can't, I growl back at her, impatiently watching the plank finally touch the dock next to us. We have a job to do – we have to help everyone survive

"Ella!" Cora calls, running out of the boat's small cabin. "Ella, wait!"

I turn to her, my face fierce. "Either come with me or stay here, Cora," I warn, my eyes flashing. But you can't hold me back –"

–

"Ella," she says, grabbing my arm as I put my foot on the gangplank, ready to rush forward." Please, you barely made it out of the desert – you are not well enough for this – your doctor ordered you onto bedrest weeks ago – he told you to walk no more than forty minutes a day! You're risking your health, your child!"

"And if I don't?" I bite out, spinning on her. "How many will die, if I don't get to that temple and deliver the Goddess's gift?" My eyes fill with tears and my lip trembles as I look my sister in the eye, my hand still pressed against my poor child. "Are their lives worth less than mine? Worth less than my child?"

"Yes," Cora says, and I can see her guilt as she utters the word. "At least, to me – Ella, I can't see you harmed like this –"

"Then stay," I declare, ripping my arm from her hand. "Don't watch. But you can't stop me."

Cora is right, of course I am weak, perhaps too weak to do this. But I can't not not anymore, not knowing what I know. I can do so much good if I can only get to those temple steps...

Free of her grasp, I hurry down the gangplank and am surprised to hear footsteps following me. When I stand firmly on the dock, I turn, my eyes going wide when I see Cora hurrying after me.

She shrugs when her feet too hit the wood.

"I can't let you go alone," she protests. "If you insist on killing yourself, I'm going to be there to witness it. You idiot."

I nod, ignoring the insult, and feel honestly a little lighter now that I have my sister at my side. I turn and as one we head out into the streets.

"Cora! Ella!" We hear Roger's voice call out behind us, but neither of us turn. If he wants to stop me, he's going to have to chase me, and damn it – weak or not – I'm faster than him. Cora and I pick up our pace, determined not to waste any more time on negotiations.

—

We plunge through the city, which is filled with smoke and rubble. I'm horrified by what I see. Some houses look almost untouched while others are in total ruin. Whole neighborhoods which I used to walk through are demolished, their beautiful tree-line streets ripped to shreds. It's horrible to see what Damon has done to this place, what the humans have been pushed to in order to keep hold of their freedom.

But if I do this right, if I can get there....damn it, but I can make a difference.

I caught a little sleep on the boat on the way here. My anxiety kept it light, kept me from the dream state that would have allowed me to speak to Sinclair if he, too, were dreaming. It was a huge disappointment, not to have been able to talk to him. Just one word from him, one embrace, one press of his hot mouth to mine

—

It would have given me such strength. Instead, I feel my weakness in each of my steps. I feel as if I could sleep for days, my adrenaline the only thing that's keeping me going. And of course – of course I know that my poor baby is the one paying the price of all of this.

It's the cause of all of my anxiety, the only thing that I thought about during the long trip here. The all-encompassing question that kept me up at night: was my child the price we would pay for peace? And then, was it a price I was willing to pay?

Every motherly atom within me screams no, but the human in me – And yes, the human. Biologically, I am wolf, but I was raised as a human on purpose, so that in this moment I would know the meaning of the word. The human in me feels the suffering of thousands and knows that I must do this.

In the end, it comes down to my faith. My faith that my mate and I are strong, that our love is strong, that our bodies are strong, that the child we have made is strong. My son is the grandson of a Goddess – he is not made of tender stuff. He will not be snuffed out by the bringing of peace. And so, with clear eyes and a steady heart, I plunge through the war zone towards the temple. know is at the center of the city.

We arrive what feels like hours later, our breath coming short, our mouths wide as we pant. The Goddess's temple is a shining white building that stands across the street from the palace.

It's so obviously a temple, I think, leaning on Cora and catching my breath as we look across the palace square at it. What on earth did I think it was, before I found out about werewolves and wolf society? I shake my head clear of the question, though it's not important now.

–

“Oh my god,” Cora gasps, grabbing my hand and pointing up at a huge screen on the left side of the square. It's on the side of one of our city's mega news organizations, a screen as wide as a billboard. And there, on it –

“Oh my god,” I echo, my eyes going wide as I see the graphic image of the prince's corpse laying on a board room table. Beneath it, text scrolls:

Prince Damon declared dead...forces requested to cease fire....Sinclair declared leader of all werewolf kind....peace talks to begin...

“Why,” Cora demands, looking around at the still-smoking city which still echoes with the sound of gunfire and bombs. “Why haven't they stopped, if the prince is dead?”

“Because,” I pant, my breath just now starting to come back to me. “The human's war was never with the prince – it was with all of us.” I shake my head at her. “It's humans versus werewolves now. This war has just begun.” My voice is desperate, shaking.

“Unless we can stop it,” Cora whispers, taking my hand. Her face takes on a new, determined look as she sets her jaw and then looks towards the temple. “Come on, Ella,” she demands, tugging me forward into the chaos of the square. “Let’s end this.”

Chapter 265 – The Steps

Ella

We dash across the square, my hand clasped in Cora's, adrenaline moving my legs for me even despite the fact that I don't have the strength for it. As we run, debris and smoke fly around us. The humans are pressing their advantage, shelling the center of the city with abandon after they heard the prince is dead. They know Sinclair must be regrouping, so they're doing as much destruction as they can while they can.

My eyes are on the temple steps ahead of me but for a moment – just a moment – my mind turns to my mate.

He is the one responsible for the prince's death I know it for a certainty, without having to ask. He wouldn't let anyone else take the final blow – it was vengeance and it was his. But the prince – that photo of him on the board room table – it had looked like it was in the palace. My eyes flick to the palace building to my right – does that mean is Sinclair in there?

We're close to the temple steps now, just feet from them, really. But I have to try.

I tug at that bond within me, the one tied to that deep place somewhere behind my ribcage.

Dominic? I call, my inner voice breathless with the hope of it. My wolf gives a few excited nips, anxious inside of me, wanting to be with him, to smell him –

I wait, heart pounding, as Cora and I reach the steps, our feet thumping to match my heart's frantic rate. Cora takes the steps two at a time, pulling me up behind her until we reach the clear and empty marble expanse at the entrance of the temple. The temple, miraculously, has been untouched by the human's fire. Perhaps the Goddess has had a hand in shielding it for us, just until we got here.

"Are you ready?" Cora asks, panting. "Do you know what to do?"

I turn my attention to her, nodding, but can't help myself from glancing back at the palace.

"What?" she demands, following my gaze. "What is it?"

"Sinclair," I breathe, studying the façade, trying to see him – desperate for a glance "Ella!" My sister shouts, taking me by the shoulders and giving a little shake. "Pay attention! We've got work to do, and hardly any time to do it!"

"I think he's in there," I confess, turning my eyes suddenly full of tears – back to my sister. “ Cora, this could kill me if I have a chance to say goodbye –”

Her face screws up with rage and she shakes me harder. “No, Ella,” she yells, her voice desperate and angry at once. “No! You are the daughter of a damn Goddess, you will not die in the deliverance of her gift!”

I meet her eyes, then, and pause, shocked by her passion. But then I nod my head, fervently believing. I have to believe this, or else I won't have the strength to survive it. I place my hands on my stomach, reaching for the bond that I know still exists between me and my baby, but which has grown so weak in the past few days that I can barely sense it. I pour my strength down that bond, telling the baby how much I love him, how I can't wait to meet him, how we're going to live live live.

Cora, I think, senses what I'm doing and lets me have this moment alone with my child. But when I open my eyes, my gaze newly steeled and prepared for the challenge to come, she nods once and turns to face the square. I set my shoulders and stand next to her. I take her hand and close my eyes.

I work to slow my breathing, to get to that state I found in the desert under the moon when my mother gave me my instructions, told me how to deliver her gift. My heart rate falls to a peaceful resting rhythm, my vision starting to go violet behind my eyelids. I sink lower into myself, seeking the base of my being. My wolf curls up inside of me, finding peace as well.

But then, very suddenly, I feel that tug. The one behind my ribcage. The one tied to him.

Ella?

My eyes fly open as I gasp and I cry out. “Dominic!” I shout, my eyes frantically searching the square for him.

“What?” Cora pants, looking around, frantic. “What is it? Is he here?”

“He's here,” I breathe, my eyes still searching and failing to find him. “Ella,” she says, looking at me with sorrowful eyes. “There's no time people are dying “I know,” I reply, closing my eyes again and setting my jaw. “You're right, I know. I'll – I'll press on.”

It's a lie, though. I can't do this without a word to him Dominic! I shout in my mind, my wolf already on her feet, raising her nose to catch his scent. Where are you?

Here – he cries to me, and I can feel his anxiety, his love, his pleasure at hearing from me, his terror that I'm here in this horrible place, in the middle of the war. I'm in the palace – I'm working – where are you? I'll come find you now you've got to get inside –

NO, I reply, fervent. Please, Dominic, there's... there's something I have to do. Goddess stuff? He asks, and I can hear the humor in his tone, even beyond the fear. I can't help the little smirk that plays at the corner of my lip.

Yeah, I respond, Goddess stuff. Are you...are you safe? He asks. Are you okay? I'm... I'm weak, baby. But I have to do this. I was born to do this.

Ella, his voice is a warning now, and the wolf in me responds instantly, eager to follow his lead, to listen to him, to trust him. Stop whatever you're doing – it's not worth it, if you're weak – Please, I say simply, letting him feel the strength in me, the assurance, the need. Trust me, Dominic. I can do this. I'll come back to you. I'm strong. We're strong.

There's a pause before he replies. I can feel his worry, his dread. But also, that he believes in me.

All right, trouble, he responds, and I can almost see him folding his arms over his chest and smirking at me. Do what you've got to do. But the minute you're done, I'm in charge.

Yes, Sir Big Alpha, I respond, letting him feel the sass in my message. I feel his laugh rumble down my bond to me, let it wrap around me, strengthening me further. One last thing, and then you're in charge.

He lets me go, then, and I take a deep breath, settling myself on the cold marble of my mother's steps. I hadn't realized that I'd needed that moment with him, that it was the last piece of the puzzle before I could do this right. But I should have known. He is such an intrinsic part of me, of my journey of who I am. How could I do this without him? Together, we are complete.

I settle my hands on my stomach, keeping the lines to my bond between my mate and my child open, returning to that base state. My wolf settles down again with me, brushing her warm fur up against those bonds, against my soul It's time.

As my breath and my heartbeat again slow, as my vision turns lavender, I open up my third bond that new one, between my mother and I And I let her power fill me.

Chapter 266 – True Sister

Ella

The power comes slow, at first, and I feel like a dry terracotta pot into which the first drips of rain begin to fall. But then, as my body begins to take in the power, to soak it up like thirsty clay, the power starts to fall into me like a summer storm. It soaks every bit of me, splashing against my tired soul like a cooling salve.

But then, even when I feel I've had enough, it keeps coming, and coming. The storm of power in me grows until it becomes a monsoon, until it fills me, overflows me. Until it reaches my throat, threatening to fill my mouth, my nose, my lungs. I tilt my head back, desperate to keep above the tide, but it's ceaseless.

I gasp, struggling, but I can feel it trickling around the edges of my mouth, finding its way in despite my efforts –

If only I'd had more time – if only I were stronger – but I can't fight this – it's too much –

I spit, trying to keep the water out of my mouth, but it pours in and I gasp against it, coughing as the power fills my lungs.

“Ella!”

Only a sliver of me can hear Cora's shout – the rest of me is gone, consumed by the power, by the knowledge it gives me, by the way it fills me, possesses me, chokes me with its strength –

I can feel her hands on my shoulders, but then, suddenly – I'm gone –

My mind is filled entirely within the power now and I feel myself weakly working to swim through it, to get to the top, to come up for air. But my arms – they can't seem to push through, to lift me. I gasp again, desperate for air, and the power floods down my throat, filling me, consuming me, grasping every edge of my body until my vision goes not black, but totally white.

And then, what I see next...

It is as if I've always known it. Always been aware, deep down, of precisely who she is. But in this moment, in my greatest weakness, I've finally realized it. That she is the only one who can help.

Because there, in my weakest moment, my mother gives me a gift. A single image of her kneeling by a bedside in the orphanage, pressing a kiss to a little girl's forehead as she whispers the word “daughter” lightly against her skin.

But that little girl isn't me. It's Cora. Cora, my sister. The sister of my heart, my constant companion, but also. Yes, now I know it. Also the sister of my body. My true sister.

The Goddess in the memory turns towards me and gives me a small smile. "Two daughters," she says, soft. "One of wolf, one of human born. To unite the worlds. Two halves of a goddess to make one."

"Why?" I think the question more than ask it. I couldn't form the words if I tried, drowning as I am in her power. The Goddess shakes her head slowly, that small secret smile still on her lips.

"You had to love each other willingly, to want to save each other. Not because you had to, because it was some written destiny. It must be a gift, freely given."

She nods to me as I stare at her. "Go now," she says. "Your time is short."

At that, my eyes fly open in the real world then and I can see that I am spilling power, overflowing with light, but I'm laying flat on the steps of the temple, and I cannot breathe –

"Ella!" Cora cries, terror in her voice, tears streaking down her face. "Ella!"

I turn then, my body wrenching, hacking, and power spills from my mouth like water from my lungs. I draw a gaping breath, then, which feels like fire within me and for a moment I close my eyes, trying to fight against the pain in my body – the pain in my stomach –

I wrench my eyes open, then, and look down at myself, at my legs –

Blood – blood everywhere –

Oh my god. I rip my eyes back to Cora's face. "Cora," I demand. "Cora, take it."

"Ella!" I hear his voice as I plead with my sister, hear it somewhere across the square, but I can't look now –

She's got to take this from me – only she can – or it will kill me, and it will all be a waste –

"Cora!" I shout, almost screaming against the sound of explosions so close to us, gripping her hand as hard as I can. "TAKE IT, Cora! Take the gift, and give it!"

"Wha – what?" She mumbles, her voice frantic. "Ella – I can't –"

“You can,” I say, locking my eyes on hers, her hand gripped in mine like a vice. “You are my sister, Cora.” I stare into her gaze then, transmitting the truth through my eyes, through my hand on hers, through the bond that has always been there between us –

She gasps, suddenly, with the knowledge of it.

“Ella!” I hear him screaming now, can hear his feet pounding towards me.

“Now,” I growl, fierce. I know he will rip me from her – he won’t be able to help it, when he sees the blood – “Take it now, Cora!”

She nods quickly, understanding, afraid but...but willing. “All right, Ella,” she says, tightening her grasp on mine. And then, almost in a flash, I feel the power starting to pour out of my body and into hers.

Cora is strong, though. Stronger than me, stronger than I ever was. I may have been her protector in the orphanage, in our lives, but she has always been the source of my strength.

As the glow fades from me, I can see it filing her. And she welcomes it, makes space for it, relishes it within her. It drowned me – almost killed me – perhaps killed my child – But Cora? Cora has space in her heart for all of it. For the love, the joy, the knowledge.

I feel the last trickle of it leave me and have no strength left. My hand drops from hers, my head falling against the stone of the temple steps. My vision begins to fade as Cora stands, her eyes turned up towards the sky.

I hear my name again, not from her lips, but from another’s. From his.

Strong arms wrap around me, pulling me close against a chest. My name, over and over again, frantic with worry.

“Wait,” I say, as he turns me away from her. I am desperate to see, to look. “Watch,” I whisper, pointing a shaking finger at my sister as, suddenly, she lights up like a star. And as she does, as she gives the gift to the world, I feel myself simultaneously shudder and smile.

Good, I think. It is done. I close my eyes, then, allowing my head to fall against my mate’s chest as he holds me close. We’re moving, now, running – somewhere, I don’t know where. I don’t care. I have nothing left.

Inside of me, I can feel nothing, as if the efforts of the day severed all of the bonds inside of me. I can no longer feel Cora, or my mother. I can’t feel my child. I can’t even feel Sinclair, or my wolf. It’s just...nothing.

I am at the end of myself. I am spent. And I honestly...

...I don't know if I can come back.

Chapter 267 – My Mate, Covered in Blood

Sinclair

I roar as I stumble through the doors of the hospital, my bleeding mate clutched in my arms. Everyone in the emergency room freezes – doctors, nurses, patients. Everyone. The noise that comes from me is unending, a demand, a plea, a threat. I am halfway between states now – my eyes filled with the wolf's flame, my hands ending in razor-sharp claws.

She breathes against my chest, barely. Blood drips from her. The bond – I can barely feel it, between she and I –

And my child –

I take a breath, then, glaring around the room, and open my mouth to shout again. "DOCTOR," I cry. "Get me a doctor! NOW!"

The room collectively jumps at this, patients clearing away from the desk and heading towards the sides of the room, the nurses leaping to their feet. A doctor strides forward – one I don't recognize – but he's here, damn it, he'd better be good –

"Come," he commands, stopping a few feet from us and then gesturing backwards towards the door to the treatment rooms. He doesn't need to look any closer to know that she needs immediate care. "This way, fast."

I stride after him as he shouts out commands on his way. In my arms, Ella is deathly pale, passed out, hardly breathing. I glance down at her, at her beautiful face, her rose-gold hair falling across it. She's strong – I know she's strong –

But she's given so much. I grit my teeth, growling, livid with the universe for asking this much of her. I will not lose her to this.

A swarm of doctors gather around us as we move down the hall, the doctor who first met us at the entrance taking lead and giving commands left and right. They move quickly, efficiently, bringing forward machines and tools as we approach a bed at the back of the room.

"How many months?" The doctor asks, looking closely at Ella's face as I lay her down on the bed as gently as I can.

"Three," I say. I could tell him the exact number of days, but frankly I don't think it will help at this point.

"Halfway," he murmurs, and then glances up at me. "Too soon for an early cesarian. The child...it would not survive..."

"This child will survive," I growl, grabbing the man by his coat and bringing his face close to mine. "And she as well. You will do everything – you will move mountains, if I command it –"

The doctor, to his credit, does not quail. "Sir!" he barks back at me, his eyes angry as he grabs my offending wrist.

I blink, surprised, and then release him. The doctor takes a step away from me and brushes off his coat, keeping his eyes on mine. "I will move mountains for her, sir," he bites out, his voice still low. "I will do everything I can to help her survive. We owe you that. But it will not be helped by you losing your temper. Is that clear?"

I feel my lips pull back from my teeth in a snarl as I close the distance between us. "You dare take that tone with me?" I ask, my voice low with warning. "I am your King – you will –"

He steps up to me, then, our chests almost meeting, glaring up into my eyes. "You may be our King, sir, but I am the Alpha in this surgery. And if you want me to save her life, you must back down."

I feel the growl rip from my throat then, but I turn my head to look at her. So small – so fragile, in that bed –

My pride is not worth her sacrifice. I glare at the doctor but step away. "Do your work," I snarl, folding my arms across my chest and stepping to the head of her bed. The doctor holds my gaze for a moment more and then does as I say, getting down to the business of saving my mate's life.

A moment later, the room is swarming again with people, with beeping machines and IV's and tanks of oxygen. They work quickly. Almost before I can comprehend it, Ella has a mask over her face to help her breathe, wires and tubes plugged into her arms. The nurses cut the clothes from her poor fragile body, strip her naked so that I can see the blood thickly coating her thighs. I almost flinch away at the sight, but I refuse myself that indulgence. If she can endure it, then I can surely stand to watch. So I stare, following their every move.

The professionals murmur to each other as they work, speaking in a medical language I can't comprehend. It's almost more than I can do to stand still, helpless. I have basic medic experience, of course, but I know that her life is in their hands, not mine.

And it kills me to realize that, to stand here and watch her fight knowing that there's nothing I can do. As I watch, a nurse comes forward with an ultrasound machine, plugging it in as another quickly spreads clear jelly on Ella's stomach. Then, they turn towards a screen, murmuring as they try to look at my child, assess his state.

I cannot see a heartbeat on the screen. My stomach drops and I hear a moan. A moment later, I realize that the noise dropped from my own mouth.

"We need to take her in," The doctor commands, stripping off his bloody gloves and turning to me. "Her uterus is torn, leaking blood at the cervix, and her organs are in failure – she needs immediate surgery –"

"The child," I growl, focusing my eyes on him. "Is he alive?"

The doctor hesitates, glancing at her, and then quickly nods. "There's a heartbeat," he says, turning back to me. His voice is apologetic as he utters his next words. "It's not good, Sir. If it were anyone else, I'd...I'd instruct my team to let the child go, to concentrate on saving the mother."

I snarl at him, taking two instinctual steps forward. "You will save them both," I demand, my voice steel.

He doesn't flinch, but instead nods. "I will fight for her," he responds, solid. "I will fight for both of them, as my Queen and my Prince. Trust me, Sir." He bows his head then, briefly, before again meeting my eyes. "I will do everything."

I clenching my jaw against the desperate need to threaten him further – to tell him that if I lose either of them I will rip his head from his shoulders –

But. My breath shakes as I force myself to exhale, my whole body trembling against my need to do something – anything –

A single nod, that's all I give him. It's all I can manage before he returns the gesture and begins delivering more commands. They're on the move before I can react, wheeling her entire bed towards a door at the far end of the room – taking her away from me.

I stride after her, refusing to be parted.

"Sir!" a nurse demands, daring to put a hand on my arm to stop me. I snarl at her as well, unleashing the full strength of my fury as I bare down on her. She quails next to me, giving out a little shriek and covering her head. I start again after my mate.

"Sir, please!" the nurse shouts after me, her voice shaking. "You can't go into surgery – it's not safe!"

I ignore her, though, storming through the doors through which Ella just passed, following her into the surgery. Two more nurses move towards me, protestations on their lips, but the doctor interrupts them.

“Let him in,” he calls to them, his attention not wavering from Ella. “He won’t be parted for her. It’s not worth the lost time trying to keep him out.”

The nurses hesitate but then give in, returning to her bedside. I move again to the head of her bed, accepting the surgical gown and gloves that someone hands to me.

“You will stay out of our way as we work,” the brave doctor informs me, briefly meeting my eye. “You can stay as long as you don’t interfere. I won’t lose her to your impatience.”

I consider it for a moment and then nod, agreeing to his terms. The doctor begins his work then, turning his attention to my mate and beginning to deliver his commands. Then, he raises a shining scalpel and begins to cut.

Chapter 268 – The Waiting Game

3rd Person

The hours pass slowly for Dominic Sinclair as he sits at his mate's side in the post-surgical suite, willing her to live.

Her hand is held tight within his and his eyes are trained on her face, watching her eyelashes flutter every minute or two. Her chest raises and lowers slowly, shallow breaths coming less frequently than they should. She had survived the night. But just barely.

Sinclair wipes a hand down his face, willing himself to stay awake. The surgery took hours and he had stood stoically at her side for every moment of it. It had been agony, watching them cut her to ribbons, listening to them mumble words he couldn't understand, trying to fix her like some kind of broken car

As if she wasn't the most important thing on earth. As if she wasn't the daughter of the Goddess, the future Queen, the mother of his child and – most important of all –

His fucking mate.

It had taken everything in him to stand there and not wrench the tools from the doctor's hand, to do something, anything, to fix her out of the sheer will of his desire for her to live.

But in the end, after hours of work, the doctor had just nodded to Sinclair, wiping a bloody hand across his forehead. "We've done everything we can," he had murmured, looking down at Ella. "It's in her hands now."

Then, they'd wheeled her into this room, hooked her up to what looked like a thousand ridiculous machines, and just left. Left Sinclair here, holding her hand, waiting to see if she lived or died. But damnit, he wasn't going to let her die. No fucking way.

Nurses come and go periodically, of course, checking on her, checking on him, letting him know that there have been no turns for the worse, asking if he wanted any food, any water, anything at all. He'd ignored them all, focused only on her. His Luna. The light of his world.

A few hours later, a knock comes at the door. Sinclair glances towards it, expecting another nurse, and blinks and surprise when he sees Cora and Roger standing there.

"Dominic," Roger, his face full of sorrow, his eyes not going to Ella and instead focusing on Sinclair. Roger opens his mouth to say something else, but Cora interrupts.

"Is she alright?" Cora breathes, hurrying to her sister's side, glancing between Ella and her mate.

"No," Sinclair murmurs, unwilling to lie to spare Cora's feelings. "She survived the surgery...but the doctor says it could go either way. And that it's it's not..."

Sinclair covers his face with his hand, unable to say it.

"The child?" Cora asks, desperate. "The baby?"

Sinclair just nods, letting Cora know that he's still there. He can't feel my son anymore, can't feel the bond, but he hopes that Ella can. He hopes that they're holding on to each other, in their unconscious state. He hopes...

God damnit, but he doesn't know what he hopes.

Cora refocuses her attention on Ella, running her hand over her sister's forehead, brushing some hair behind her ear. "Come on, kid," she murmurs. "You have to fight, Ella."

Sinclair doesn't say anything, letting Cora have the moment with her sister, but he takes the hand from his face when he feels Roger grip his shoulder. Sinclair looks up at his brother, shaking his head. Roger says nothing, looking at Ella's fragile form laying limply on the bed.

A long moment passes before Roger looks up at the television, which has been playing lightly in the corner for hours on end, the dialogue a bare murmur. "You have the television on?" Roger asks, frowning.

"The nurses did it," Sinclair responds, shrugging noncommittally. "I asked them to turn it off, but," he lifts a hand lightly before dropping it, not understanding. "They said something about... unconscious patients. The sound of human voices. It's better, apparently. Makes them feel grounded or something." Roger frowns at his brother, confused, but Sinclair just shakes his head. Whatever. It can't hurt."

Roger nods, but then looks back at the television. "Have you seen any of this?"

Sinclair blinks and then looks towards the television. The news is on, but he glares at his brother." No, Roger, I'm not sitting here watching the news while Ella slips away from me. I'm concentrating on her, obviously

"

"Would you just look, Dominic?" Roger throws back, frustrated. "I wouldn't draw your attention away if it wasn't important. Obviously."

Sinclair growls a little, irritated, but he does as his brother asks and turns towards the television. To his surprise, it's an image of Cora. Sinclair blinks, paying more attention now to the words that scroll across the screen, to the picture of Cora glowing with a bright white light, her clasped hands raised above her head.

As he watches, Cora's body seems to brighten. He sees her mouth fall open in a gasp, her eyes press closed as a great flare of light erupts from her, turning the screen white as her brilliance overloads the capacity of whatever camera was trained on her. It's an unrefined image, probably something taken from a security camera, so no wonder.

But when the light fades, Cora stands panting, looking out onto the square. Sinclair squints, leaning closer, and he can see – yes, himself, in the corner of the screen, with Ella in his arms, dashing away towards the hospital.

"I was there," Sinclair murmurs, leaning back in his chair. "I don't need to see it again on the news."

"Yes," Roger replies, sliding his hands into his pockets, his eyes still on the screen. "But do you know what she did?"

Sinclair briefly shakes his head, slumping back in his chair raising one hand to his forehead, his other still wrapped around Ella's in the bed. It doesn't really matter to him what Cora did, not really. Because whatever it was, Ella had tried to do it first, and it may have killed her. He doesn't give a fuck what it was.

"Dominic," Roger growls, frustrated again. Sinclair snaps his eyes to him, his lips pulling back in a snarl. Roger puts up a hand, calling silently for peace. "I know that you're focusing on Ella, brother, but you're our King now. Or if you're not, you will be soon. And you need to know what the hell is going on in your nation."

"Fine," Sinclair grinds out, not taking his eyes from his mate. "Tell me, and be done with it."

"In that moment that flash – Cora gave the Goddess's gift. To everyone. Didn't you feel it?"

"No," Sinclair grumbles, frankly not interested. But, if he thinks back... he had been distracted, of course, frantic at the feeling of Ella's weak body in his arms. But he had felt... something. Hadn't he? Some kind of...of hope? Running through him?

–

“Well, I did,” Roger continues. “And so did everyone else in the nation, at that very moment. She spoke to us, Dominic. The Goddess did. Through Ella, through Cora. She made clear to us her love for all of us for humans, for wolves. Communicated to us that her love for us all is equal, and that she holds neither as superior. And that, in the name of her love,” Roger holds out a pleading hand here, begging Sinclair to see, “that we must stop fighting. That we must work together to love each other, to find peace.”

Sinclair says nothing, just staring at Ella, his fingers still pressed to his forehead.

“Don’t you get it, Dom?” Roger insists. “They ended the war. It’s over. A ceasefire, a real one. The humans have stopped attacking, and so have the wolves. There need to be talks, of course, negotiations, but —”

Sinclair snaps his head up, looking at his brother. “It’s over?” he asks, a little shocked. “For real?” Roger nods emphatically, raising his eyebrows. “For real, Dominic. It’s done. You’re going to be crowned King in a new era of peace.”

Sinclair leans back in his seat at this news, his eyes still on Ella. He lets out a deep breath, one perhaps he hadn’t known he was holding. Then, his eyes travel to Cora.

“Thank you,” he breathes. He means it, deep down, even if he can’t muster the power to express it properly. “We are...in your debt.”

Cora meets her eyes and just shrugs. “She did it,” she says, glancing down at her sister. “She did all of the work, paid all of the price. She just...handed it to me, and I took the final step. Ella is the great peacemaker here.”

Cora slowly shakes her head, taking her sister’s other hand. “I just hope she can fight as hard for herself as she did for everyone else,” she murmurs. “She needs to come back so that we can thank her. Not me.”

Sinclair growls his agreement and stares at his mate. God damnit. Why wouldn’t she wake up?

Chapter 269 – All Just a Dream

All Just a Dream

Sinclair

The doctor knocks gently at the door then. I slide my eyes to him, annoyed to have another person in the room. Is this best for her, all of these interruptions?

“How is she,” the doctor asks, coming to Ella’s side. Cora moves to stand at Ella’s head, making room for him.

“The same,” I murmur, returning my eyes to my mate’s pallid face. “No changes.”

“What does that mean, doctor?” Cora asks, wringing her hands.

“Well,” the doctor replies, leaning down to study Ella’s face. “I can’t say that I’m encouraged by it. I think that if she were getting better, she would have woken by now.” He moves away from her and over to some of the machines, lifting the tape they’ve been printing for hours to read the report. But,” he murmurs, studying them. “It doesn’t seem like she’s getting any worse.”

“Is there anything we can do?” Cora asks, looking at him with pleading eyes. She, like me, wants to do something, anything.

“Go home,” the doctor says frankly. “Get some rest. There’s nothing you can do for her here. So go home, prepare yourselves.”

“Prepare ourselves?!” Cora gasps, her eyes going wide. “For –”

“For whatever’s next,” the doctor interrupts, meeting her eyes evenly. “It’s not going to do any good to panic. If she survives, she’s going to need you, all of you.” He glances around at the rest of us as he says this. “She’s going to need you to be strong for her, so it doesn’t do any good to stand around her worrying. I would recommend that you go home and let us care for her here.”

Cora nods anxiously, but I can’t help the anger that builds in me.

“I am going nowhere,” I snap, my eyes fixed on the doctor, who comes back to the bedside now.

“I understand,” he replies, meeting my gaze. “But you two,” he says to Cora and Roger, “I don’t recommend that you stay.”

“All right,” Cora murmurs, steeling herself and nodding. Then, she looks to me. “But we’ll be back- tomorrow. And if anything..."

"We'll keep you informed," the doctor replies brusquely, heading out of the room without another look at me. "Leave your number at the nurse's desk."

"Abrupt, that one," Roger says, frowning a little as looks at the empty door through which the doctor just passed. "I kind of like him," I mumble begrudgingly. "He's no coward."

Roger just shrugs as Cora moves to his side. "Sinclair," she says, her voice serious. "How long have you been awake?"

I just glare at her. What a stupid question. "Seriously, Sinclair," she insists. "The doctor is right – we're not doing Ella any favors exhausting ourselves. When she wakes up, she's going to need you at full strength."

I just shake my head. "I'm not...I can't rest. Not when she could..."

I can't finish the sentence. Can't even think the thought. Cora nods, seeming to understand. But then she starts, suddenly blinking rapidly.

"Wait, Sinclair," she rushes. "Ella told me, once, about how you...you meet? In her dreams?" I snap my head, looking towards her. "Can you..." she waves a hand towards Ella's still form. "Can you do that? Can you meet here there? Maybe...give her some hope? Some encouragement?"

I shake my head slowly, grinding my teeth. Why the hell hadn't I thought of that? But still...

"No," I growl. "Not without her invitation. She has to bring me into the dream, and I don't know..." I lean forward to look at her. "I don't even know if she's dreaming, let alone in a state to offer me..."

I feel a sudden flutter of hope within me. Could it be possible though?

"Sinclair," Cora begs. "Please, try. It can't hurt."

I consider it for a moment and then, slowly, I begin to nod. "All right," I agree, against my better judgement. If I fall into a sleep...and she's not dreaming, or I don't...god damnit, the waste of time. I would never forgive myself if she...if she slipped away while I...

"Go," I command, not looking at them. "I do this alone."

I hear them murmur something to each other and then slip from the room, closing the door behind them. I take a long moment, then, to look at my mate. To lean forward, pressing a kiss to her precious forehead.

"I'm coming to meet you, trouble," I murmur to her. "Please, let me in."

Ella

Spin Spin Spin, I think, giggling to myself as I spin around in my little dream forest. It's so good to be back here – where the air is cool, and damp, and I have the trees above me and the roots below.

I'm spinning in circles, like I used to love to do as a little girl, laughing as I go. "Spin, spin," I sing, biting my lip for the joy of it.

How long have I been spinning like this, though? My wolf yips, jumping just beyond my vision. But when I turn towards her, she's gone. Silly pup, where is she of to? I hear her again, and spin towards her, seeing a flash of her rose-gold fur. But then, again, gone.

I stop myself, frowning, looking for her, and am hit with a sudden wave of nausea.

"Oof," I say, falling to the ground, my hands going to my stomach. "Ohhh, too much spinning." I giggle again, laughing at myself. Silly girl, making myself sick. I throw myself back on the grass then, enjoying the feeling of it against my skin, waiting for the nausea to pass.

It doesn't though. It worsens, making my head pound with it.

"Ohhh," I moan, lifting my hands to my head. Silly girl, silly dream. Suddenly my head spins of its own avail and I close my eyes against it, not wanting to see the trees twisting above me while I lay still.

I wish, suddenly, for my mate. For his arms around me. For his chest pressed against my back, his delicious scent overwhelming my senses. That, I know, could fix me, wipe away this horrible feeling. After all, he makes my head spin in precisely the opposite direction. He might even me out.

And then, quite suddenly, he's there. I know it the moment he arrives and I smile, propping myself up in the grass on my elbows, looking for him.

"Hello, gorgeous," I murmur when I finally see him at the edge of the woods. I'm soaking in the gorgeous look of him, all tall rippling muscles and dark power. But...something is off. His image... flickers, a bit like my wolf was doing. One moment he's there, the next he's gone, only to come back again shimmering like he's in a haze.

“You stay put,” I command, frowning at him and pointing a finger in his direction. “I’m trying,” he says, laughing a little, his voice calm. “Concentrate, baby. Bring me in.”

So I do. I close my eyes and take a deep breath, letting myself want him here. And when I open my eyes, there he is. He’s closer this time, standing only a few feet from me. And yes – when I sniff the air, I can smell every minute detail of him on the breeze. I allow myself to close my eyes, relishing that scent.

His warm chuckle brings me back to him, though. “Well, trouble,” he murmurs, smiling softly down at me. “We’ve been waiting for you to wake up. What have you been doing instead?”

“Spinning,” I say, laughing and throwing my arms back above my head. And then- bloop! I’m gone. Somewhere else the clouds, perhaps totally alone, spinning again. Spin spin spin, I think, turning around in the soft nothing of the white fluffy clouds.

Was I just talking to someone? I can’t remember.

Spin spin spin, I think, giggling. Somewhere, in the distance, I hear my wolf howl. I pause, but then ignore it. What is a wolf anyway? Here, there are no wolves, only clouds...maybe I, too, am a cloud...

Chapter 270 – Ella’s Dream

Ella’s Dream

Sinclair

I throw out my hand, grasping for her arm – her skirt – anything – as she disappears from my sight in a blink. A growl grows in my chest. God damnit, why can’t she just stay still? I put my hands in my pockets and look around at the familiar dream forest, this place we’ve come so many times. But there’s something just slightly... off about it. A haze, an... indistinctness to the details. As if Ella can’t put the pieces together quite well enough.

I’m still here, though, which means some part of her wants me to be. I hold on to this knowledge, desperately, and begin to prowl through the forest. Where the hell is she?

I hear her giggling somewhere and spin my head, looking everywhere for my mate. But then – god damn it, is it coming from above me? I stop, looking up at the canopy of leaves and the clouds, listening hard. Yes there is she in the sky? I cup my hands to my mouth and shout her name upwards.

“Ella!” I cry. “Ella! Come back here!” There’s no response, just more of that giggling. My inner wolf prowls within me, hungry, worried, ready for the chase. But now is not the time to be playing hide and seek. I let my anger and my alpha demand infuse my voice, trying again. “Ella!” I command. I hear the giggling cease. “Get your ass down here! Now!”

And then, suddenly, she’s there again, standing in front of me. I keep my face stern, not letting any of the relief I feel slip through. “Bossy,” she quips, crossing her arms over her chest and pouting. “Big bully wolf.”

“Ella,” I sigh, shaking my head and closing the distance between us, putting my hands on each of her cheeks. Her tiny face is so small, so fragile between my palms. And so, so incredibly precious. I let my eyes rove over her, savoring every detail. “Baby,” I murmur. “Come back to me.”

“But I’m right here,” she giggles, wrinkling her nose at me, confused but not dismayed. Her form flickers like a lamp with a bad bulb – now bright, now hazy, struggling to keep alight.

“Please, baby,” I beg, moving my arms to take her by the shoulders, to bring her closer to me. Please try.”

“Sinclair,” she whines. “I don’t understand.”

I shake my head, panicking a little. Ella’s innocence is one of the things I love about her, but talking to her now...it's like she's a little child, like she really doesn't understand, doesn't remember what happened to her. And frankly, I don't know what to do – I hadn't thought through the possibility of meeting my mate in her dreams, but finding only part of her, an indistinct facsimile at best.

I feel Ella relax in my arms, though, as I press her close to me, nuzzling her face against my chest. My wrack my mind, trying to figure out what to do to bring her back.

But I come up with nothing – nothing logical, nothing real. And so I fall back on the thing that has always brought us together, without fail. I tip her face up to mine and kiss her.

My mate responds instantly, giving me a little gasp and taking a step closer to me. But our kiss quickly intensifies. Suddenly, she's pulling my face down to her, kissing me with abandon. Another moment passes and she's gasping, as if my kiss is air to her, bringing her life. Her hands sink in my hair, her nails rake against my scalp as she brings me closer, urges me on with her need. My body responds instantly despite my mind's protest that I need to do something – that I should be talking to her – convincing her – Shut up I think to myself. Because right now, she is the only thing that matters, and this seems to be what she needs.

I feel my knees start to weaken and I let them, falling to them, bringing Ella down with me, on top of me, her legs straddling my lap as I go to my knees on the forest floor. She moans, grinding her hips against me, pressing herself closer so that my head bends back on my neck. She takes control of our kiss, sliding her tongue into my mouth and pressing it against mine, desperate, hungry.

And I let her. I let her take charge of the moment, of me, of everything. Let her have me, all of me. And as she does, I realize, suddenly, that her flickering has stopped. That in my arms she's substantial...real.

My eyes fly open and I draw a deep breath, pulling my face away from hers – needing to see, but desperately scared that if we stop – if I interrupt this, that she'll fade away –

But no. I freeze, my arms wrapped tight around her body, pressing her to me, staring up at her shocked face which is vivid and warm and real. "Dominic," she whispers, her eyes suddenly filled with a clarity and knowledge and horror that tells me, without doubt, that she's back.

"Oh my god, Ella," I cry, my voice muffled as I bury my face against her, fighting the tears that spring to my eyes, that have been pressing there for hours.

"Dominic, Dominic," she whispers, her voice increasingly frantic, her hands loosening their grip in my hair and scrabbling to turn my face up to hers. I can't help the two tears that slide down my cheeks as I look up at her. "What's happening," she asks, her voice still no more than a whisper. Where –” she looks around, increasingly frantic, “where are we –”

“We’re dreaming,” I reply, working to keep my voice steady, my arms still tight around her. “You’re in the hospital, Ella

“What?” She gasps, her eyes wide and terrified. “The hospital? What happened the baby?” I see her eyes fill with the utter panic only a mother can feel.

“It’s okay –” I hurriedly whisper, shaking my head, desperate to calm her. “He’s still – he’s still there.” I can see that my words only bring her anxiety down a notch, though.

“We have to get out of here –” she hisses in her panic, staring around at the dream forest I know she loves so much. “We have to help

“Shhh, shhh,” I say, working hard to calm my own heartbeat, to pass that calm on to her. “It’s all right, sweetheart,” I say, my voice level, soft. “The world is steady, for the moment. We have time. You can relax.”

Her gaze snaps back to me, her hands pressed against my cheeks. “It’s it’s done? The war? The peace? The gift?”

I nod slowly, begging her with my eyes to rest. “Please, Ella,” I whisper. “Don’t worry about any of that right now. All you need to do is heal. We need you to focus on getting better.”

“Getting better,” she murmurs, shaking her head at me, though I feel her body relax a little on top of me, her muscles loosening, her panic slowly leaving her. “But what’s wrong with me?”

I wait a moment before I reply, holding her gaze, letting her muscles unwind a little more into this solid dream frame that I remember. I’m worried, terribly worried, that when I tell her...that she’ll flit off again. And worse, push me out of the dream.

“Please, Dominic,” she begs, her eyes making it clear that she needs to know. “Please. What’s wrong?”

“You gave the Goddess’ gift to the earth, Ella. You changed the world.” I shake my head a little, still marveling at my incredible mate. “But it was too much for your body. You had to undergo surgery – you’ve been asleep for days.” I see her eyes go wide again with shock and fear, but she presses her lips into a tight line, letting me continue. “And the baby...”

I close my eyes, hardly able to mutter it. But her voice is hard, strong, carrying me through my weakness. "The baby?" she demands.

"He's alive, Ella, but I...I can't feel him. I'm worried the connection is gone, and that..."

She drops a hand from her face, swiftly pressing it to her stomach. I wait a moment, desperate to know, but when she doesn't speak...

...I know the answer before she says it. "Dominic," she whispers. "I can't feel him either. I haven't felt him since that night in the desert."

My dear readers, Thank you for stopping by and reading this story. I hope you enjoyed it.

Chapter 271 – A Cry in the Forest

Ella

My breath starts to come short and fast now as I press my hand desperately to my stomach, seeking that connection somewhere within me. But I feel like I'm grasping through empty air, my fingers searching for any touch, any tie, and coming up empty.

"Ella," Sinclair murmurs, tightening his hands against my back. "Calm down – the doctors say that it's okay, that he's still with us –"

"Still with us," I growl, my teeth clenched as I try to manifest that damn connection, to make it appear even when it stubbornly refuses to present itself. "How can he still be with us if I can't feel him?"

Sinclair shushes me softly again, a soft rushing sound that despite my desperation – makes me open my eyes and look at him. My fear comes rushing in then, wiping out my anger and frustration. "Dominic, what does it mean?" I ask, my voice trembling. "If the doctor's say they have a heartbeat – but we can't feel him?"

"I don't know, Ella," he responds, his own voice low with worry and despair. "But we're going to figure it out, okay? Together?" He pulls his brows together, worried, and nods to me, begging me to see. "Please, just calm down. We'll think it through."

I nod quickly, bobbing my head in agreement and forcing my body to relax. Sinclair moves beneath me, folding his legs instead of kneeling, pulling me into his lap and cradling me against his chest. I rest my head against him, making myself breathe slow, deep breaths, letting the warm scent of him root me in my body.

God, how long have I been gone? I have...memories. Memories of being here, of dancing, of being in the clouds and in the trees...of flickering in and out of this place. I push my mind back further and remember, quite suddenly, the last place I was

On the steps, with Cora, handing her the gift...watching her use it...

I cringe at the memory, of the feeling of drowning in my mother's power, of all of it draining from me as I handed it to Cora, taking my life with it. I look up into Dominic's face then and find him there, ready, likewise peacefully breathing. Waiting.

"Cora?" I ask quietly. He nods to me, smiling a little. "She's totally fine. The world is fine. But...don't worry about that, now, my darling. Just worry about you."

"And Rafe," I murmur, tucking my head back against him and closing my eyes. I turn my attention to my little boy, then, and my heart breaks. God, I want him so badly – have wanted him so badly for years and years. And in these past few months of happiness with Sinclair, I have let myself imagine a beautiful future. I imagine him covered in pasta sauce the first time he tries spaghetti, imagine his first steps, imagine him playing baseball with his friends...

God, but now... the idea of losing him, of losing that beautiful future – it's so horrible I can hardly stand it. I feel myself physically cringing at the idea, curling further into Sinclair's arms as he tightens his hold around me, letting me feel the pain but also letting me know that he's here to help me bear it.

How horrible, the idea that it could all be just a dream...

My eyes snap open at that. I suddenly sit up straighter in Sinclair's arms. "What?" he asks, curious, a little frightened that something might be wrong.

"A dream," I murmur, my mind wheeling as I look around at our surroundings. "We're in a dream." "Well, yeah," Sinclair says, as if it's obvious. But he doesn't get it yet.

"And here," I continue, ignoring his interruption, "we can make anything happen that we want. Yes?" Sinclair studies my face and doesn't say anything, letting me continue. "And you're here," I insist, starting to get excited now, "because I invited you. Because I wanted you here."

"Yes?" Sinclair confirms slowly, still not getting where I'm going with this.

"So?" I say, smiling now, excited. "What if we invite the baby here too? Make him real so we can hold him, tell him how much we want him? You brought me back right now you kissed me – can't we do it with him?" I lose track of my train of thought a little at the end there – but I don't care, I'm too excited now. This is going to work –

I start to push myself from Sinclair's lap, ready to get to my feet, to head into the forest, to find my son, but Sinclair quickly pulls me back. "Ella," he hesitates, "I don't know if it will work –"

"What?" I ask, spinning to look at him and frowning. "Why not?"

He just shrugs and blinks at me. "I've just – I've never heard of it happening before. I'm able to come into your dreams because I'm your mate – I've never heard of a mother sharing her dream with her pup, even while pregnant I scoff at him, rolling my eyes a little. "Well just because you haven't heard of it doesn't make it impossible –"

He laughs at me for a moment then and I stop, smiling a little back at him. This, I think, this is what we're fighting for. For the bond between us, for the push and pull, for the fact that we're sitting in a dream, in the midst of a tragedy, that I'm probably dying and somehow I'm still rolling my eyes at him and making him laugh.

Sinclair nods at me, his eyes fixed on mine, and I know that he completely understands. That he gets it too. That this thing between us? It's worth trying anything so that we can share it with our child.

"All right," he says, pressing a quick kiss to my mouth. "Lead the way, trouble. You're in charge now."

I nod, affirming this, and push myself out of his lap and to my feet, dusting off my skirts and looking around the forest. He rises next to me, the mass of him as steady and assuring in this dream state as it is in real life. I brush my hair behind my ear and look around, wondering where to begin.

"Um," I hesitate, looking up at him. "When I was gone up in the clouds – what did you do? To get me to come back?"

"I called for you," he replies, smirking down at me. "And, characteristically, you ignored me. Until I hollered at you to come back."

I scrunch my face up in distaste at this. "Well I'm not going to yell at my child, the first time I meet him," I murmur, turning away from him and scanning into the woods. "But the calling....it's not a bad place to start."

Then, feeling a little foolish, but believing in it anyway, I raise my hands to my mouth and cup them on either side. "Rafe!" I call, my voice echoing louder into the dream than I thought it would. " Rafe, where are you baby! Mama wants to see you!"

We both wait for a second, holding our breath, but nothing. The forest even consents to go quiet, as if letting us hear more clearly. But still, not a sound. "You try," I murmur, nudging Sinclair with my elbow. "You're louder than me."

"I'm louder than everyone," he replies, raising his hands to his own mouth, and then he, too, shouts into the forest. "Rafe! Come on, son!" I listen to the sound reverberating in the trees and hold my breath, hoping so hard...

Still, nothing. "Keep going," I whisper to Sinclair, glancing up at him and then closing my eyes. Sinclair complies, calling out sweetly to our boy, telling him that we're looking for him, that we want him, that we can't wait to meet him. And as he does, I will him to be real, I demand the dream to make space for him, I cry out for him with every piece of And just when I feel like I can't bear it any more, I feel..

Just the tiniest tug. And a baby's cry sounds out in the forest my heart.

Chapter 272 – The Baby in the Forest

Ella

Sinclair and I both gasp at the same moment, and my eyes fly open, finding his. We are both frozen in place, but then another cry sounds and we are instantly in motion, bolting through the forest, searching for our son.

“Rafe!” I cry, my voice desperate as Sinclair pulls ahead of me on his long legs. “Rafe, baby! We’re coming!”

Rafe’s cries are louder now, more solid, the sound of a real baby crying real tears. And then suddenly something catches my vision out of the corner of my eye and I skid to a stop, turning left while Sinclair continues ahead. And suddenly, I see –

A bassinet, of all things, sitting alone in the middle of the forest. And in it, I know, is my baby. “Dominic!” I call, wanting him back, wanting him at my side, but I don’t wait. Instead, I hurry to the side of the white basket, gripping the edge of it in my hands as I pull myself closer to it, desperately looking inside – And then.

There he is. My baby boy, my pup, my child—looking exactly as I knew he would be – not how I imagined he would look, but how I knew he would be.

I am breathless, wordless, as I reach for my child, who mews quietly with discontent in his little bed, swaddled in a clean white blanket. Slowly, softly, I lift him into my arms, just staring at him as I hear heavy footsteps pounding behind me.

“Ella—” I hear Sinclair start, but then, as I turn, he forgets the rest of the word. He stutters to a stop, his mouth falling open as he takes in the sight of us – both of us – mother and child. But I barely spare him a glance, returning my gaze to my infant son.

“Hey, baby,” I murmur, my throat choked with my joy and my tears. “Hey, baby Rafe. We’ve been looking for you.” Slowly, I begin to rock and bounce him, soothing him, letting him feel me holding him against me, letting him know that I’m here, and I’m so sorry, and how I love him with the entirety of my being.

I hear Sinclair take a few steps closer and I tilt the still—crying baby towards him, letting my mate have a look at his son. I look up into Sinclair’s face as I hear him choke. I’m a little shocked – but honestly, not surprised – when I see tears streaking down his face.

“Hey, kid,” he starts, his voice wavering, his hand shaking a little as he reaches out his giant mitt to touch him. But before he can lay a finger on him, I see Sinclair hesitate, pulling his hand back.

“What,” I ask, laughing a little. “What’s wrong?”

“He’s just so tiny,” Sinclair marvels, shaking his head and staring down at our little boy’s perfect porcelain skin, his little mop of black hair. “If I touch him, I’ll crush him...”

My laughter shakes the baby a little, causing him to fuss and hiccough as I shake my head at Sinclair. “He’s your son, Dominic. You won’t hurt him. You won’t let yourself.” So, still hesitant, Dominic reaches out just the tip of his finger and brushes it against Rafe’s perfect little cheek.

“Hey, Rafe,” he murmurs, and I can hear his heart in this throat. “We’re so excited for you. We’ve got big plans.”

I smile down at my baby for a moment, unable to tear my eyes from him, but then I look up at Sinclair and fall in love with him all over again, seeing the hope and the joy and the wholeness in his eyes as he takes in his first sight of his son.

“Here,” I offer, holding the baby out towards him. “Do you want to hold him?” Sinclair looks at me with startled eyes and shakes his head. “Ella – he’s so small –”

I laugh a little at this but just pull the baby back to my breast, secretly pleased at the refusal. I never want to put this little baby down, I want to hold him just like this forever. Instead, Sinclair takes a step closer to me and wraps his arms around both of us, encircling us with his warmth and his protection and his love. And in this moment I just feel so....complete. So blessed to be able to share this with my mate and my son.

Rafe begins to quiet now, taking deeper breaths, blinking up at us sleepily with his grey little infant eyes that I know will someday turn green like his father’s.

“You’re going to grow up to be so big and strong,” I whisper to my pup, rocking him close against my body. “And we can’t wait to watch you do it.”

“We need you to be strong, buddy,” Sinclair whispers, his voice catching. “Just hold on. Your mama’s going to carry you, and keep you safe.”

“We’re so sorry,” I whisper, feeling tears come to my own eyes now at the thought of all the things my poor baby had to endure. No wonder he had been hiding, had shrunk away from me and the horrors of this world. “It will be different now – it will be safe, and good – you’re my only job now. We love you so much.”

“Hold on, baby,” Sinclair murmurs, reaching out a finger to stroke Rafe’s little hand, which has just popped out from its swaddling. “Just...hold on.” And as we watch, Rafe’s little hand uncurls and wraps around his father’s giant finger, coming nowhere close to encircling it but... trying nonetheless.

I feel the tears streak down my face as I look between them, the two men who are the world to me. But even as I watch, I feel the dream state start to shift. Start to fade, to pull away.

"I think we're out of time," I say to Sinclair, holding my baby tight against me, unwilling to let go.

He nods, realizing it too, realizing as well that there's no reason to fight it. All dreams come to an end, even perfect ones like this. Hurriedly, he turns my face to his, pressing a kiss to my mouth. I savor it, the perfect contours of his lips which fit so perfectly to mine. He pulls away too soon.

"Come back to me," he demands, his eyes serious, almost glaring into mine. "You come back to me, Ella. Wake up. As soon as you can."

I nod, assuring him. "I will," I promise. "I'm coming back to you. We both are."

Sinclair opens his mouth to say something else, but before he can, the dream fades to nothing. And then there's only mist. Sinclair

I sit stark straight the moment I gasp back to consciousness, the memories of the dream ringing through my mind, and spin to Ella, looking desperately for that sweet smile, the flash of her eyes –

But...

I blink, uncomprehending for a moment as I realize that she hasn't woken up alongside me. That she's just laying still, breathing those same shallow breaths, her pulse a slow tick on the monitors beside her.

"Good, you're up." I almost leap out of my skin as I hear the doctor's voice. I spin towards him, my instincts instantly ready to attack – but I stop myself just in time.

"Sorry, sorry," he says, putting up an apologetic hand. "I...I shouldn't have startled you like that. I apologize."

I take a moment to settle myself, to bring my pulse down to a semi-normal level, before turning to look at Ella again. "Is she alright?" I ask. "I met her in the dream – I was expecting her to..."

"Is that what you were doing?" The doctor asks, raising his eyebrow. "Interesting." He looks towards the monitors. "She did display some increased brain activity for a bit there...which isn't a bad thing..."

The hesitation on his face, though, tells me it isn't precisely a good thing either. "The baby?" I demand, my voice low with frustration and disappointment. Damn it, I had truly thought that would work...

"The same," the doctor informs me, indicating a smaller monitor that's tracking the fetal heart rate. I put my head in my hands, wondering what the hell else I can do now...

I feel a hand on my shoulder and flinch, but I don't bother to shove it off. The doctor is doing his best, after all working to save them, to bring them back to me.

"Her body is too weak," the doctor says softly. "Even if you did contact her in the dream, even if she wants to come back, her body may not let her. Not yet. It's...it's in the hands of the goddess now." I despair for a moment but then...

I realize something. And raise my head. It is in the hands of the Goddess – and the Goddess has a gift to give. And I know who currently holds that gift...

"Call her," I growl, glaring up at the doctor.

"Who?" he asks, removing his hand from my shoulder and flinching away.

"Cora," I respond, "Ella's sister. Get her here now."

Chapter 273 – Cora’s Gift

3(rd) Person

Cora almost skids to a stop as she flies into Ella’s hospital room. “What,” she gasps. “What is it – is she –”

But Sinclair is just standing at the side of Ella’s bed, his hands pressed deep into his pockets, staring at the door as if he was waiting for her. Cora bites her words back, knowing that if Ella had ...well, Sinclair wouldn’t just be standing still. He’d be tearing the world to pieces.

Cora lets out a deep breath, her eyes trailing down to her sister in the bed. God, she looks so frail just laying there, wired up to all of those machines. Her passionate sister, so full of life, looks like a little bird crumpled up in that bed...

“She’s fine,” Sinclair snaps, bringing Cora’s eyes back to him. Roger comes into the room then as well and Sinclair’s eyes flick to him, a little surprised. After all, he hadn’t called for Roger, he’d called for Cora. Apparently, they’d been together.

Sinclair didn’t let himself think about why. He didn’t care. His attention returns to Cora alone. “Give it back to her,” Sinclair demands, his voice even and controlled. “What?” Cora asks, standing up straight. “Give what back? I didn’t take anything -”

“What’s going on, Dominic?” Roger asks, stepping in front of Cora, realizing that his brother is worked up about something. “Tell us. We need to understand.”

Frustrated at not being immediately obeyed, Sinclair takes a deep breath and steels himself, trying to will patience into his body, even though he’s run completely out of it. He just wants this done. Wants her back.

“I met her,” Sinclair snaps, working to summarize the past few hours as quickly as possible. “In the dream state. She was there with...with Rafe.” Cora’s face lights up with this news and she opens her mouth to ask a thousand questions, but Sinclair keeps going. “Ella is strong in her spirit, but the doctor says her body is too weak. That she would need a gift from the Goddess to heal her now.” His eyes move to Cora’s, angry. “Which you took from her.”

Cora’s mouth drops open at his accusation and a hand flies to her breast. “Sinclair,” she breathes, “I would never – she gave it to me – I had to.

“I don’t care,” he interrupts, his voice raising now. “You took it, and now you have to give it back.” He takes a step towards her now, as if he’d rip it from her body if it would save his mate.

“Easy,” Roger warns, taking a step closer to his brother. “Easy, Dominic. We hear you. You have a point, okay? Just...just let Cora think.”

The brothers turn to Cora then, pinning her under their dual stare. Her breath comes faster as she quickly sorts through her thoughts. Is this her fault? Did she do this to Ella, by taking the gift? Was she the reason her sister would die?

“Cora,” Roger says carefully. “What do you think?”

“Um,” she mutters, her eyes unfocused as she stares at the ground, trying to piece it together. “I don’t know? I didn’t mean...I didn’t mean to? But he might be right? When I took the gift from her, that’s when she collapsed...”

“Well,” Roger says, working hard to keep the energy in the room calm, feeling like he’s walking in a minefield that could explode at any minute. “Can you give it back?”

“May maybe?” Cora replies, lifting her eyes and looking between the brothers. “But will that be good for her? She couldn’t she couldn’t hold it all, when she was weak...”

Sinclair begins to growl then and Cora shrinks away, overwhelmed.

“Enough,” Roger snaps, glaring at his brother and gesturing towards Cora. “Can’t you see that she’s trying? That none of this is her fault? She’s trying to help – let her help, if she can.” Sinclair visibly fights his instincts to force Cora to do his bidding, to save his mate. But Roger is right – terrifying the girl isn’t helping, so he forces himself to take two steps back, to return to his spot by Ella’s head.

Cora relaxes a little as Sinclair backs off. She looks between the brothers, hesitating. “Are you sure you want me to try this? Even if it could...hurt her?”

Roger glances over his shoulder at the open door. “Do you want me to get the doctor and ask?”

“No,” Sinclair bites out. “He’s done all he can. He’s out of this now. This is between us. Between... the two of you.” It kills him to say it, to admit – however tacitly that there’s nothing he himself can do anymore. That this is now between the sisters, and the best he can do is watch. “Do it.”

Cora still hesitates and is surprised when Rafe comes to her side and takes her hand. “We have to try,” he murmurs. When she looks up at him, she’s further shocked to see that his eyes are filled with hope. “I think he’s right, Cora. It makes sense. And it’s a gift – I don’t think it can hurt her.” Cora’s lip begins to tremble then as she thinks about it – the horrible, awful consequences that this could have if it went wrong. But Roger holds her gaze, tightening his grip on her hand, giving her the strength she needs, the courage.

“All right,” Cora whispers, nodding once and moving swiftly to the side of Ella’s bed, taking her sister’s hand. “Um,” she says, looking around. “Can I have a chair?”

Roger quickly moves to bring her one from across the room, helping her settle into it. As he moves away, Cora tucks her legs up beneath her so that she’s seated cross-legged, as she was that night in the desert with Ella and Reina. Sinclair makes no move, standing stoically by his mate, watching everything.

Cora gives them both a tremulous smile and then, taking a deep breath, she closes her eyes. She had watched everything that Ella did that night in the desert. Had watched her sister fall deeper into a state of truth, had watched her make that connection with her mother, had watched her be filled with the Goddess’s gift and start to glow with it. Cora hadn’t wanted to admit it then, but she’d felt...well, a little jealous. It was the jealousy of an orphan for a friend who found her mother, the jealousy of a girl who was starting to feel like a tag-along while her best friend found her mate, and her true identity, and her calling. A whole beautiful life while Cora had...

Well, not nothing. But not that. So, she had been jealous – happy for Ella but wanting a little piece of that for herself as well. And she had been ashamed of those emotions in that moment, of her envy, and had felt herself...undeserving of her spot on that sacred trip to the desert to commune with the Goddess. But now, after learning the truth?

–

Cora knew that all of that the envy, the feelings of inadequacy – it had all been in her head. The Goddess was her mother as well, after all. And she, Cora, a human, had been the one to give the gift to the world. There was no reason to think that Ella could do anything that she could not. Well, except turn into a wolf.

But Cora pushes that thought to the side along with the rest of her doubts. Instead, she embraces her identity and sinks – as she had seen Ella do – into that deeper state. And as she does that – as the light behind her eyes fades from orange to green to a deep and rich lavender and the sounds of the room’s medical devices fades to the background – Cora finds a peace within herself. And...there.

There, right at the center, where she imagines her heart to be, Cora finds it. The gift, shining, waiting, not exhausted but endless and ready to be given at will. Cora moves forward towards it, wrapping her hands around it, feeling it pulse with warmth. As she lifts it in her hands, she imagines that she can almost hear her mother speaking to her, singing, encouraging her to give it.

So she does. Cora opens her eyes in the real world and is not at all surprised to see the gift glowing in her hands – a real thing, a true entity, lighting the room with its warmth.

Cora smiles at it and then glances at Roger, pursing her lips against her laughter to see him staring at her in shock, his mouth hanging open.

—

But when her eyes move to Sinclair, she sees that he has not moved at all. That he just stares at her, demand in every line of him. She nods to him, agreeing. It is time.

So Cora simply stands and takes two steps closer to her sister. She reaches out her hands, presenting the gift, leaning over to hold it close over Ella's own heart.

"I love you, sister," Cora whispers. "It's time for you to take it back." And there is not a doubt in her mind as she opens her hands and gently places the gift directly in the center of Ella's chest.

Chapter 274 – Bonded

Ella

My head feels...so heavy. I groan, trying to move my hands up so I can press them against my temples, but I can't move them. "Easy," I hear him say beside me and instinctually I turn towards his voice. Where –

"Easy, Ella," he murmurs, his words thick with emotion. "It's all right..."

I peel my eyelids apart, then, confused at the effort. It's like I haven't opened my eyes for weeks...

My vision comes back to me slowly, the room around me coming into focus with effort. I blink rapidly, looking around at Sinclair, and Cora, and Roger all standing around me, peering at me with worried faces. I feel very suddenly like Dorothy, when she wakes up from her trip to Oz.

"What?" I murmur, my voice thick and my throat scratchy. Suddenly anxious, I try to sit up, pushing at the bed beneath me but – What the hell were all these wires, tied to my arms?

"Easy, trouble," Sinclair whispers, pressing his hand to my shoulder, keeping me down. My body responds to his command, relaxing backwards as I look up at him. But...

"Where am I?" I ask, staring at him, and then I press my eyes closed. It's all just too much. "You're in the hospital," I hear my sister explain. "After the gift, at the temple..."

But her voice fades, almost as if I can't hear it. I feel my heart start to pound, my breath ratchet up as my memories start to come back to me. Of being on the temple steps of Cora there, and what we learned about each other of Sinclair's warm arms around me –

And then, nothing – and then clouds – and Sinclair again, and my baby –

Oh my god, where was my baby? "Rafe?" I gasp, spinning towards Sinclair as my eyes fly open, desperate. "Where is Rafe?" Then I start to look all around me, searching for him – he's here, he has to be, I remember him, my little baby, wrapped in white swaddling, holding him in my arms

"A dream," Sinclair says hurriedly, "it was a dream, Ella – we met him in the dream –"

He puts his hand on the swell of my stomach then, drawing my attention to it, reminding me that he's here – of course he's here, I haven't given birth yet –

"Oh," I breathe, moving my own hands so that they rest on either side of my baby. Then I close my eyes, resting my head back on the pillow, and search for him. And it's hard, it's distant, but...

There. Yes, there. I can feel him, my ties to him. My bond with my baby. I reach out to him, sending all the love I have in my heart down our bond, and feeling a little pulse back. He hears me. He tells me he knows. He's holding on.

"Oh," I say again, feeling my whole body relax. I open my eyes again, feeling a rush of sudden and unexpected joy. I look up to Sinclair and nod. "Okay. Yes. He's here."

Sinclair exhales a huge rush of air, grasping one of my hands and lowering his head so that our foreheads touch. We stay like that for a long minute as tears start to slide down my cheeks, unbidden but unstoppable. It's all just...it's a lot to take in in just a few minutes. To come flying back to reality after such a hard few weeks, after days of struggling in the dream state to get here. It is hard on me, on my mind.

But, there's no where else I'd want to be. "I'll get the doctor," I hear Roger murmur, and then his footsteps move to the door, heading out the room.

"Cora," I call, opening my eyes and reaching my other hand for her. Sinclair straightens at my side, letting us have our moment as I take her hand. "Are you all right?"

"Am I all right," she huffs, laughing through the tears that are falling down her own cheeks. "Are you?"

I smile at her, unable to help myself, and then glance down at my poor beat up little body. "Um, I think so?" I feel so weak but there is also...a warmth, a stillness in me that feels... I frown, looking up at her. "Did you...do something to me?"

"Um," she says, laughing a little and running her hand through her hair. "Yeah? I gave you back mom's the Goddess's – the gift, I gave it back to you," she stumbles, not really knowing how to explain it.

I gasp then, working to sit up straighter in my bed. "Cora!" I scold. "Why?! I gave it to you – it's yours "Ella," she chides, "you're being ridiculous – you were dying – of course I gave it back to you I didn't even want it

"You didn't want it?!" I almost shout, frantic and frankly a little mad now. "It's a gift from a Goddess – from our mom – I worked so hard to get it here, the least you could do is take it.

"Enough," Sinclair growls next to me, and my eyes snap to him as I feel suddenly guilty and a little childish, arguing with my sister like this in front of him, especially when I'm clearly so sick. I look up at him, my eyes apologetic, and I see his face instantly soften.

“Please, Ella,” he begs.” You’re so weak – and she saved you with it – it can’t possibly matter –”

“Okay,” I whisper, nodding up at him and then turning to Cora. “Okay,” I repeat, raising a finger to point at her. “But as soon as I’m better, you’re taking it back.”

“Okay,” she laughs, agreeing to these terms, wiping the tears off of her cheeks. “Whatever you say, sis.”

—

I’m still smiling at my sister, holding my mate’s hand tight in my own, when the Doctor comes in, Rafe hot on his heels. It’s a man I haven’t seen before certainly not one of my normal doctors – but he certainly seems to know me.

“Ella,” he says quickly, coming to my side, almost running into Cora in his hurry to get to me. He quickly scans my face, his expression worried. “I have to say, I’m shocked to see you awake –” He quickly grasps my wrist, feeling for a pulse and turning towards the monitors behind them, scanning them for new information. “It shouldn’t be possible...” he mutters, his brows drawn together. “Earlier today...”

“It was...” I say, hesitating, looking up at Sinclair. “Not precisely a medical intervention.”

He turns then, looking towards us confused, and I just shrug. Sinclair stands stoically beside me, still holding my hand. “An intervention from the Goddess, if you will,” he observes, a little humor in his voice. The doctor’s face screws up further with confusion but then he simply exhales quickly and shakes his head, dismissing it, moving on.

“Okay,” he says, turning back to the monitors. “Whatever it was it is a...remarkable recovery.”

“Is the baby all right?” I ask quickly, working to sit up further and wincing as a sharp pain spikes through my back. Sinclair starts at my grimace, leaning closer to me, scenting me, clearly working to figure out what’s wrong and how he can help.

“The baby is...” the doctor says, looking at a small monitor tucked in amongst the larger ones. “He’s fine,” he mumbles, almost to himself. “Better, if anything, than he was the last time I was in here.” “Good,” I say, almost under my breath, pleased to have my suspicions confirmed. My baby and I... we are going to make it. “Can I go home?” I ask quickly, hoping to heap more good news on top of the pile.

“Certainly not,” the doctor scolds, turning towards me and frowning. “You’re still incredibly weak. You have days yet in this hospital – tests, monitoring...”

I look up at Sinclair then, my eyes pleading. I know that if I ask him, if I want it enough, he'll pick me up and carry me bodily out of this hospital right now. But he slowly shakes his head too, letting me know he agrees with the doctor. "I want you home as well, baby," he murmurs, "both of you. But he's been good," Sinclair says, glancing at the doctor. "We go when he says we can, and not a moment sooner."

I raise my eyes at this, a little shocked to hear Sinclair passing the power of decision making to someone else. I turn to look at the doctor again, assessing him anew. He really must be good.

"Your mate is right," the doctor murmurs, writing something on my chart, almost ignoring me to concentrate on his work. "I'm the best. And I'm not letting you go until you're ready." He glances at me then, raising an eyebrow, waiting for me to agree.

Overruled, I huff a little laugh and raise my hands. "All right," I agree. "If both of you say so, then I'm sticking around. For as long as it takes. But um," I hesitate, looking up at Sinclair. "In the meantime?"

He frowns down at me, suddenly worried. "What?" he asks hurriedly, "What is it? What do you need?"

"Is there any possibility..." I grimace, a little embarrassed, still looking at him as I twine my fingers awkwardly together. "Of some chocolate cake?"

Sinclair freezes and then bursts into laughter, raising a hand to his forehead. "Seriously?" He asks. "You come back from the brink of death, and the first thing you want is chocolate cake?"

"And ice cream?" I beg, giving him my best smile.

"She should eat, if she can," the doctor says, smiling a little as he glances at me.

"We'll go get it," Roger says, his voice light as he reaches a hand for Cora, who joins him at the door. "We'll go down to the cafeteria we'll be back in a second."

They go, and the doctor follows after them, pausing at the door. "I'm going to order a series of tests, Ella. You rest, but know that your day is not over yet. All right?"

I nod happily at him as he closes the door and then look up at Sinclair, sighing contentedly. "Chocolate cake?" he teases, smirking down at me, a bright and happy light in his eyes. "Really?"

"It's for the babyyyy," I whine jokingly, laughing and putting my arms up towards him, wanting him close. Sinclair seats himself on the bed next to me, putting one leg up so that he can lean back and rest his head on the pillow next to mine. The poor bed groans under the additional weight of his huge werewolf frame.

We sit there quietly for a moment, a little happy smile playing on my mouth as I stare at him, letting the very sight of him help me to ignore the aches pulling on my muscles and my joints.

“You gave us a scare for a minute there, trouble,” he whispers, raising a broad hand to softly stroke my face. I narrow my eyes a little. “Come on, Sinclair,” I quip, teasing. “Did you expect anything less from me?”

“From you?” he smirks, raising an eyebrow. “Never.”

And then he kisses me, tucking his hand gently behind my neck to pull my face the few inches closer he needs to press his mouth to mine. And in that moment I feel my future life open to me, warm, and bright, and sweet. After all, we have a baby on the way. And I can't wait to meet him.

Chapter 275 – Home, Finally

Ella

“All right,” the doctor says, sweeping into the room where Sinclair and I are resting together on my hospital bed, my head on my mate’s shoulder as we watch some daytime soap opera. I perk up at the doctor’s entrance, eager to hear what he has to say. Sinclair gives a little groan as he sits up and puts his feet on the ground, standing next to the bed to hear the news. I know that he’s not tired – instead, I think it’s the opposite. All of these days and hours cooped up here in this little room have made him terribly restless. I reach out and take Sinclair’s hand, thanking him, silently, for all he’s done for me.

“Well?” Sinclair asks, tucking his other hand to his pocket. He looks levelly at the doctor, who has given me perhaps a hundred tests since I woke up a few days ago. Everything from blood work, CT scans, ultrasounds. I’ve been poked and measured and observed so much I feel like a science experiment.

The doctor pauses before me, flipping through the pages on his clipboard, double- and triple- checking everything. I smile as I watch him do it. For all his cold bedside manner, he really has shown himself to be diligent and dedicated.

“You’ll be happy” the doctor says, letting the pages drop and tucking the clipboard away under his arm. “Everything has come back stable.” He looks seriously at me then before he continues. You’re well enough to go home, Ella, but I want to emphasize to you that you are by no means a healthy woman at this point in time. And your pregnancy is still extremely high risk. I want you’ at home. In bed. Relaxing, until this baby is born. Is that clear?”

I nod eagerly, my heart beating faster with joy. Home. Home. God, I can’t wait to be home...

“Good,” he says, nodding and shifting his gaze now to Sinclair. “Your home was it damaged during.” “No,” Sinclair says, a statement that also gives me a little thrill of joy, despite the fact that I know it already. Sinclair has been receiving steady reports from Roger and others on his team which have set our new post-war world in a very different light. “By some miracle, my personal residence went relatively untouched during the attacks on the city. The neighborhood is largely abandoned but,” he shrugs as he looks down at me. “We don’t need company.”

I squeeze his hand, smiling up at him. We talked about potentially moving into the palace to confirm to the people that Sinclair does intend to take the throne, but we decided against it until after the baby is born. And even then, I imagine I’ll delay as long as we can. I like Sinclair’s house – I have lots of good memories there. It would take a lot to persuade me to move away from it.

“No,” the doctor considers, pursing his lips. “No, I don’t imagine you do need company, newly mated as you are.” He takes a deep breath then and levels a glare between us. “I know that it’s awkward, but I want to be very clear about this – when I say that Ella needs to be relaxing...it’s very important that the activities that promote that relaxation are entirely nons*xual.”

I blink in surprise at the blunt statement and feel Sinclair go still beside me. I try not to show my disappointment – honestly, if there’s one good thing about bedrest, it’s the fact that you’re in bed the whole time. And putting aside the fact that there’s not much else to do in bed, Sinclair and I...

well, we’ve never been very good at keeping our hands off each other, have we?

“It’s very important that you practice restraint,” the doctor warns, his brows drawn down. “You’ve had surgery on your uterus, Evelyn – it’s very delicate. Even,” he sighs, putting a hand to his forehead and pausing, figuring out how to word this I smile to see how awkward he feels delivering the news “Any disturbance to your uterine or vaginal tissues Just.” He sighs and drops his hand, shaking his head. “Just don’t do it Okay?”

I nod, smiling warmly to let him know that I understand. “Baby comes first, doc,” I say. Sinclair says nothing, but nods his agreement.

“Great,” the doctor says, giving us a little half smile and heading for the door. “In that case, best of luck! Check in with your OBGYN and regular doctor for continued care. I’ve sent them my notes.” He starts to head out into the hall and Sinclair surprises me by striding after him. I cock my head, curious. What on earth is he doing?

“Doctor.” Sinclair’s voice is quiet, almost muffled with the distance, and I lean forward to hear better. “How much do you get paid here?” The doctor scoffs and tells Sinclair that, quite frankly, it’s none of his business.

“It is now,” Sinclair replies. “Because whatever it is, I’ll pay you double to be Ella’s personal physician for the remainder of her pregnancy. And our children’s physician, beyond.”

When I hear the sound of hands slapping together in a handshake, I smile and lean back against my pillows, pleased at this development. With this doctor and Cora on my side, I feel quite confident about my chances in this pregnancy. That is, if Sinclair and I can keep our hands off each other for the next three months...

A few hours later, Sinclair carries me over the threshold of our home, my arms wrapped around his neck. I grin up at him, pleased at the gesture. “Is this a tradition in werewolf mating ceremonies? The carrying of the bride over the threshold?"

"Totally human, I'm afraid," Sinclair replies, twisting his mouth in chagrin. "If this were a traditional wolf homecoming, I'd be chasing you down in the moonlight, nipping at your heels.... He snaps his teeth at me, making me laugh.

"Well let's be human then, for today," I say, putting a hand over my stomach as he takes a few steps inside and kicks the door shut behind him. "Safer for the baby."

Sinclair heads right for the steps, carrying me upwards towards the bedroom. "How's he doing in there," he asks quietly, glancing down at me. "Angry at being jostled around?"

"He's good," I say, sending a little question down the bond to my pup and receiving a little ping of happiness and contentment back. "He just says he's angry to be missing our soaps. Wants to know what's going on with Tatianna locked in that cell in Leonardo's basement."

Sinclair chuckles, carrying me easily down the hallway, as if I'm no more than a feather duvet in his arms. "Tell him we'll get a TV brought in the room, with all the channels. He'll have weeks and weeks to catch up." He carries me through the open door to our room and I smile to see that he's had someone arrange the pillows and blankets just as I like them.

"Nest!" I cry, throwing out a hand dramatically towards the bed. "How I've missed you, nest! My one and only love!" Sinclair grins as he settles me down amongst the blankets. "Be careful," he warns "Or I'll be jealous "

"Of darling nest?" I gasp, burying my face in the pillows and clutching the blankets close to me. Then, I peek up at him. "Actually, maybe you should be. I'm going to be doing a lot more snuggling with the nest for the next few weeks than I am with you."

Sinclair glares at the mess of blankets playfully, pretending a jealous rage he doesn't feel. "Watch out, nest," he murmurs. "She's mine. And I can take you."

I pull the blankets close to my chest, laughing and playing along. "How dare you threaten the nest! Brute!" I raise a hand to playfully smack him but he catches my wrist, pulling it to his mouth and laying a gentle kiss there.

"You keep your nest," he murmurs, making my stomach tingle. "Whatever makes you happy." I smile at him and relax my head against a pillow.

"Thank you," I murmur, turning my wrist in his hand so I can grasp his palm. I smile at him with all the love in my heart plain on my face. "For being good to me. For pulling me through all of this."

“Only a little further to go,” he says, leaning forward to plant a chaste kiss on my forehead. “But when this is all over?” He pauses and I look up into his face, curious. He gives me a stone–cold, serious look. “I’m going to f*ck you for a week straight.”

I can’t help the laugh that bursts from my lips, quickly silenced by the press of his own against my mouth.

Chapter 276 – Ella Gets Hungry

Sinclair

I wake, a few hours later, jumping up straight the moment I realize that Elle n't next to me.

She had drifted off to sleep hours ago after a simple dinner and a movie marathon. While she dozed next to me, I'd spent most of the late hours of the night answered the stack of emails piling up in my inbox and watching her sleep from the corner of my eye. But now, when my eyes peeked open for just a moment after maybe two hours of sleep?

Gone

I hurl the sheets off of me, getting to my feet in a flash, my head whipping around as I search the empty room for her with all of my senses. But my eyes tell me that she's not here, and my nose. Her scent is dull, but not stale She hasn't been gone long

A growl starts in my chest as I stalk from the room, looking through the empty hallways for my mate, desperate to find her. She was on bed rest, damn it – where the hell else would she be except bed? Unless Unless, something had happened – but she'd have woken me –

Or she'd been kidnapped – but there's no way I'd have slept through that.

I follow her scent quickly, my anger intensifying as I realize that it leads me down stairs. God damn it, the doctor expressly forbid her from stairs. I pound down the staircase hurrying through the hall and slamming open the kitchen door –

But then, she's suddenly there. Seated alone at the kitchen table in the dark, surrounded by a pile of food, her eyes wide.

"Um," she says innocently, knowing she's been caught and lowering the piece of cold fried chicken back down to its plate. "Do you want some?"

"Ella," I growl, storming to her side, relief washing through me like a wave. "What are you doing down here?" She looks up at me with her eyes still wide and then gestures at all the food as if it's obvious.

My snarl deepens and I don't let her off the hook. "The doctor told you to stay in bed – "I didn't go far!"

"He told you not to go down stairs." She holds up a corrective finger at me. "He told me not to go up stairs. And I slid down on my butt to be extra careful! It was totally fine!"

I groan, throwing my head back and pressing my eyes shut. “Ella,” I whisper between my clenched teeth. “You can’t be taking these risks-”

“I was hungry!” she protests. I snap my gaze back to her, glaring. “I could have gotten you food! Anything you wanted! I would have –”

Her eyes go soft then, filled with apology. “You would have gotten up,” she scolds, her voice worried. “When you’d just fallen asleep, Dominic She shakes her gently at me. “You can’t be at my beck and call like this- not for something simple like a trip to the kitchen for some food.”

“And how,” I ask, my anger fading but still not erased, “would you have gotten back upstairs? After your...” “I stare around at the rather shocking amount of food gathered on the kitchen table, “feast?” “You have like six couches, Dominic,” she replies, smiling innocently up at me like a little kid who knows they can get out of trouble if they’re cute enough. Damn it, but it works. Just a little. “I’d have napped on one of those until morning, when you got up, and could lift me in your big strong arms and take me back upstairs.”

“Oh, so you had it all planned out?” I murmur, relenting and raising a hand to play with the ends of her lovely rose-gold hair. I’m starting to calm now, realizing that my panic, while not precisely misplaced, hadn’t come to the dark ends I was imagining.

“Yup!” she quips, giving me a big smile and reaching for an Oreo, popping it in her mouth.

I can’t help laughing at this and pull a chair out for myself, sitting next to her. She hasn’t won – not yet but...well, I can’t really resist the sight of my pregnant mate happy, healthy, and hungry. But hungry for....

“What are you even eating,” I blurt out, frowning at her selection. It’s absolutely all over the place – fried chicken, pasta salad, cakes, wasabi-dipped peanuts, even a bowl of peas...

“Everything,” she murmurs, grabbing and pulling open a pack of licorice. “That’s also why I couldn’t wake you to bring me food. I didn’t know what I wanted. Turns out, I wanted it all.” I grimace as she takes a bite of the licorice, ripping it off with her teeth as she turns a curious gaze to me. “Any chance we could move the nest down here? It’d be terribly convenient, with all of these cravings

I cut her off with a laugh, shaking my head. “No, Ella,” I insist. “You can’t move into the pantry like a mouse. We’ll just make sure you have a better selection upstairs. Maybe we can hire someone...” I drift off into my thoughts, trying to think through solutions as she continues to pick through the contents of the table, grazing happily on whatever her body tells her is next.

My mind doesn't come up with much though. I'm too tired for real ideas. I sigh, running a hand down my face and rubbing my eyes with my thumb and my forefinger, thinking longingly of my pillow and our bed.

Ella gives a soft little "oh," putting her hand on my shoulder. I open my eyes and look at her worried face. "See?" she insists, shaking her head and studying my tired face. "I was right – you needed the sleep – you shouldn't be up, Dominic – you're not on the pregnancy clock like me. You should be asleep."

"Don't be ridiculous," I murmur, fighting a yawn. "I'm up whenever you need me –"

"And don't you see how that's a problem?" she pushes, shaking her head at me. "Dominic, your dedication to me means everything, you keep me so safe, but," she pauses, biting her lip, perhaps choosing her words carefully. "You have more than me on your plate now – more than you ever have You – you'll be crowned King soon. You have to be able to turn half your attention to that, and let me care for myself in the meantime."

"Ella," I begin, shaking my head.

"No," she interrupts, reaching out a hand to touch my cheek. "Let me finish, baby I see you -I see what you've been doing. You spend a whole day with me, making sure my every need is met, entertaining me, keeping me company. And when I fall asleep? You spend a whole day playing catch up with the rest of your life. I mean, half of your staff is on night hours now, aren't they? All for me." She shakes her head slowly, begging me to see her side "It's too much, Dominic "

"No." I growl stubbornly. I'm not angry, I'm just frustrated because I know she's right. "It's not too much – you mean everything, Ella –"

"I know," she assures me. "But Dominic. I'm on the mend. I'm getting better. And you've got to stop treating me like a porcelain doll – I'm strong." She flicks her hair back confidently then, affecting an arrogance I know she doesn't feel. "I am, after all, Goddess born," she jokes, her mouth pulling up at the corner.

I laugh with her but still shake my head. "Ella, if anything were to happen to you..."

"It's not going to," she states brightly, utterly confident. "Trust me, Sinclair. I'm good. Let me take care of me, and our baby, and let me tell you when I need help." Her smile broadens. "Like right now!" She raises her arms out to me. "When I need you to carry me back upstairs to bed. Because I'm finished with this." She waves a dismissive hand at the mess all over the table. She grimaces briefly, pressing that hand lightly on her stomach. "I think Rafe is telling me that the licorice was a step too far."

I chuckle, standing and gathering my mate into my arms. Before we go, though, while I've got her captive against me, I lower my face to hers for a quick kiss. "All right, trouble," I tease. "But you promise me, okay? That you'll ask for help when you need it. No pride, no putting me or the nation first."

"I promise," she says seriously, unable to help her little smile. "If it's between the national economy and me getting a bubble bath, I come first. I have no problem with that."

And so, smiling, I carry my love back up to bed.

Chapter 277 – Back to Work

Ella

When I open my eyes, Sinclair is already gone, despite the fact that he got maybe five hours of total sleep last night. He was gone as soon as his head hit the pillow when we got back to bed. I had taken a moment to nibble on a little madeleine cookie that I'd snuck into the pocket of my robe, but I hadn't been far behind him.

I stretch leisurely on the bed now, enjoying the ability to extend my legs and arms all the way across it with no gigantic wolf-man to block my path. Of course, I'd rather have him here than not, but we must accept life's small luxuries when we are granted them.

I take a minute to check in on the baby – still asleep, wrapped in contentment – and then glance around the room, wondering how I want to spend my day. I'm hit with a little pang of despair, though, as I realize that... this is going to be how every day starts for the next three months. And that my options are honestly limited to television, and reading, and whatever I can find on my phone. (4)

I sigh, scolding myself a little for hesitating at a luxury that I'm sure a thousand people would jump at. And it's not that I would prefer, at all, the sturm and drang of the past couple of months – trying to seize the country back from a mad prince, trying to end a war, worrying if Sinclair was dead, worried if I would die...

No, this was better but...damn it. I have to admit that the boredom is going to be a problem for me. I've always been one to spring out of bed, to leap for whatever the day has in store. Even when I was a little girl, I was always up before Cora –

I feel myself perk up at the thought of her. Yes, Cora! I grab my phone, hastily pushing the buttons and giving her a call. "Cora?" I burst out as soon as she answers the phone.

"Ella!" she shouts, making me laugh. I hope she hasn't just scared the hell out of one of her patients, screaming in the middle of the office. She's been busy, I know, seeing a lot of pregnant women whose healthcare was interrupted by the war. "How are you – is everything okay?"

"I'm fine," I laugh, cheered by the sound of her voice. I lean back against the pillows, getting cozy. Do you want to come over? Hang out?"

"Um ya," she replies, as if it's obvious. "But I can't today, I have a double shift here. But tomorrow, maybe? You don't have plans to hang out with Sinclair then, do you?"

"No," I sigh, and she laughs at my disappointment. "I'm sending him off to, you know, run his kingdom." She laughs again and I can't help the smile that spreads over my face. There's nothing quite like making your sister laugh.

“He must be with Roger, then,” she wonders. “He’s been calling Sinclair for days, begging him to pay attention to some stuff, complaining that the world’s teetering on the brink of collapse without him.” I can almost hear her roll her eyes. “As if that’s anything new.”

“I know,” I murmur, biting my lip and feeling guilty. “That’s all my fault – he’s been paying way too much attention to me –”

“No, Ella,” Cora interrupts, stern. “You come first –”

“Well so does the nation, Cora,” I push back. But then, I perk up. “So you have to come over and babysit me, so he can go save the world or whatever. And tell me all about what’s going on with you and Roger. Don’t think I didn’t notice that you two showed up at my hospital room conveniently at the same time, one too many times.”

Cora hesitates on the other line and I sit up straight. “Wait,” I add, worried. “What’s going on?” “Nothing,” she hesitates. “I just...since you’ve been home, he’s been so busy and I’ve been...”

“You’ve been what,” I beg, a little breathless, worried now.

“Well, I’ve been...spending more time with Hank.”

“Who the hell is Hank?!”

“He’s your doctor, Ella,” she states as if it’s obvious. I grimace, realizing that I really never thought to ask and just called him “doctor” in my head. “You know, the one who took care of you for a week, brought you back from the brink of death? Who your mate hired to care for you, in conjunction with me, your OBGYN?”

“Oh,” I say as I fall back against my pillows, my eyes going wide. “Wait, so you’re not seeing Roger anymore?”

“I was never seeing Roger in the first place, Ella,” she lies, sounding rushed and embarrassed. Then, I hear someone calling her from wherever she is. “I’ve got to go – I’ll fill you in later. Bye, love you! Bye!”

I stare at the screen of my phone in my hand as it fades to black. Cora wasn’t into Roger any more? And she was was dating my doctor? And his name was Hank?

Sinclair

Roger places another pile of paperwork on my desk and I glare at it, resenting it because it represents another few hours away from Ella's side. It's not that I don't want to do this work – I lead this nation, stitch it back together after that sham of a war tore it apart. It's just...

"I know," Roger grunts, giving me a little glare. "You're distracted. But you have to do this, Dominic! It's bad timing to take over a nation when you're mate's halfway through a difficult pregnancy, but –"

"Enough," I bite out, sighing and slumping down in my chair. "Let's just get on with it." He nods and brings the papers forward, explaining their contents to me.

I'm grateful for him, really. In the time that Ella was hospitalized, Roger really stepped up and took control of leading this nation, securing my position when it had been vulnerable. He had negotiated the cease-fire with the human forces, organized the Alphas and assured them of the forthcoming peace, and, perhaps most importantly, had ended any ambitious grabs for the temporarily vacant throne.

Honestly, I couldn't have done it without him. My brother really stepped up for me, and I know that within the next few weeks I'll have to find a way to show my gratitude properly. But right now, all of this paperwork is killing me. Especially when my whole world is actually in the other room right now, eating Swedish fish between bites of wheat toast.

"You need to meet with them, Dominic," Roger insists, bringing my attention back to the matter at hand while crossing his arms over his chest. "With the mayor, and the rest of the heads of the human state. They want a face-to-face, and they're not out of line to demand it."

"Fine," I agree, nodding firmly. "Can they come here, to the house?"

Roger scoffs and sighs, giving me a frustrated look. "Dom, not everything can be done here – you have a palace, built for this kind of meeting –"

"I'm not leaving her –"

"And the risks?" he pushes, drawing his eyebrows together. "You're letting people who consider themselves enemies to all werewolf kind into this house, cease fire or not. Do you want them to have that kind of access to Ella and your child?"

I growl at the very thought of it and Rafe nods, the issue decided. "I'll set it all up," he vows, "and I'll make sure you're briefed –"

"How are you doing all of this?" I interrupt, suddenly curious. "You've done the work of three men in the past few weeks – how are you doing it all? Who is helping you?"

Roger blinks at me, confused by the sudden change in conversation. “What? I have help – secretaries, our allies from the summit. Why does it matter?”

“Is it Cora?” I demand, anger starting to rise in me. “Because her only concern should be Ella – she’s volunteering at that human clinic in her spare time, I know, but if you’ve got her doing this as well –”

“It’s not Cora,” he snaps, looking away from me and down at his papers. I pause suddenly, surprised at the pain on his face. “Roger,” I demand, drawing his eyes back to me. “Are you two...”

“Just leave it, Dominic,” he snaps, using a tone he rarely takes with me. Then he deliberately looks back at the papers, though I can tell he’s not really reading them. Just staring as he gets himself together.

I watch him for a moment but then I let it go. After all, his romantic life is his own business and he and Cora...well, they’d never made any promises, had they? Still. I admit that my curiosity is peaked. I make a mental note to ask Ella later what’s going on between these two. If anyone can get to the bottom of this, she can.

Chapter 278 – Just Like Old Times

Sinclair

“Hey baby!” I say cheerfully to Sinclair as he appears in the doorway to our room late that night, leaning against the frame and smiling tiredly at me. “Do you want some pizza?” I hold up the greasy square box perched on the edge of my nest. “There’s only half a slice left but…” I shrug, “it’s really good.”

“No, Ella,” he replies, laughing and coming into the room, sitting on the edge of the bed. “That’s your cold, hours–old pizza. You keep that for you.”

“Right answer,” I murmur, snapping the box closed, pleased. I was saving that half–slice for my inevitable midnight craving, when I knew I’d be starving for it. “Is it normal?” I ask suddenly, turning my head to Sinclair. “To be this hungry in a werewolf pregnancy?”

He nods, smiling at me and laying down to bring his face closer to my stomach, placing a warm hand on it and saying hello to our pup through the bond. “Yes, it’s normal,” he says, looking back up at me. “There’s a notable uptick in feeding habits in a wolf pregnancy. Baby is hungry and mostly formed, all he has to do now is grow. He needs lots of food for that.”

“Good,” I murmur, running my hands through Sinclair’s hair as he gently strokes my stomach, murmuring little nothings to our pup. “I didn’t just want to be a pig.” As soon as I say the word, though, I have a sudden, striking desire for bacon. My stomach grumbles with longing, making Sinclair laugh.

He looks fondly up at me. “Can I get you anything, oh hungry one?”

I laugh and swat at him. “No,” I say, nodding towards my food reserves on the bedside table. “I’m set for a while. Besides, I just want you.” I scootch myself down so that I’m flat on the bed, moving down so that Sinclair’s face is even with mine, instead of my belly. “I missed you all day,” I pout.

“Did you,” he murmurs, wrapping one of his huge hands around the small of my back to pull me close against him. He angles his head down, nuzzling my mating mark and giving it a gentle lick. I feel a little thrill climb up my spine.

“Yes,” I murmur, running my hands through his dark hair again. “Even though I know you were off being important and powerful,” I sigh dramatically, “It was a great sacrifice for me.”

He laughs and brings his face up closer to mine. “Well, I’m so sorry to have put my angel mate through such an ordeal,” he teases, brushing his lips with mine. “I’ll have to think up some way to make it up to you.”

I freeze at this, at the look and intention I see in his eyes. “Dominic,” I warn, pushing him away a little. “You know we can’t –”

He laughs, pulling me closer. “I know, little mate,” he murmurs, “but just because I’m hungry for you doesn’t mean I can’t control myself. And it doesn’t mean we can’t be close.”

“Oh,” I say, relaxing again in his arms. I feel a little guilty for doubting him – I know, of course, that my safety comes first in his mind, above all other things. “Close?” I ask, curious what he means.

“Yes,” he whispers, leaning away from me for a moment and tugging on the hem of my pajama shirt. “Sit up, Ella,” he orders. “Take this off.”

“Dominic!” I laugh, doing as he says and helping him to pull my shirt up over my head so that I’m sitting only in my pajama pants and a bra. I wonder what the hell he has in mind. “What are you doing? Just because you’re confident in your ability to restrain yourself doesn’t mean I am.”

He pulls his own shirt off, grinning at me. “Don’t worry, trouble,” he says, shaking his head. “I’ll keep you in line. Besides, this is all innocence.” –

“Huh?” I wrinkle my nose in confusion. “Dominic, what on earth is going on?”

He’s standing now, unbuckling his pants and pushing them to the floor, but leaving his boxer-briefs on as he sits back on the bed and gathers me back in his arms. “I’m going to scent mark you,” he mutters against my neck, pulling me close again.

“What!?” I gasp, pushing him away a little. “We haven’t done that for months – and I’m your mate now, don’t I already smell like you?”

“No,” he hums with pleasure, pulling me back against him eagerly, like I’m something he can’t stand to be separated from for more than a moment. “You smell like corn chips.”

“What!” I shriek, horrified and laughing at the same time. “I smell like corn chips?” “Why are you surprised,” he chuckles, glancing at the two empty bags on the nightstand. “You’ve been hoovering them all day –”

“Oh my god,” I moan, covering my face in embarrassment and going limp on his arms. He laughs, letting me fall flat on the mattress. “You can smell that?”

“You’re pregnant, Ella,” he mutters, a little laughter still in his voice as he moves lower on the mattress himself, tugging my pajama pants off and leaving me only in my plain bra and cotton panties. I certainly hadn't worn anything s*xxy or alluring – I hadn't known this was on the table. Beautiful," he mutters, and then slowly moves to cover my body again with his own.

I grasp his face as he brings it close to mine. "Wait," I protest, glancing towards our bathroom. "let me go brush my teeth – corn chips – oh my god –"

"No," he laughs, pushing me back on the bed. "It's not your breath – it's in your skin –"

"Ewww," I groan, covering my eyes with my hand in mortification. "That's it. I'm not eating anything but pineapple for the rest of this pregnancy. I had no idea –"

"It's fine, Ella," he hums as he places a simple kiss on my throat. "You should eat whatever you want – you have to follow your instincts. Your body just telling you what it needs." He brings his face to mine, nudging my nose with his, coaxing a little smile from my mouth. "And when it makes you smell like a truck stop...I'll just. Set you right."

I can't help the laughter that bursts from me at this. His own warm laughter reverberates through his body as he begins the old ceremony. He moves slowly over me, caressing me softly, murmuring his praise and his love for me as he imparts his scent on every inch of my body. I feel myself relax immediately under his hands, closing my eyes and feeling him move over me, his chiseled muscles brushing against my skin. I feel a smile curling on my lips as he goes, planting small kisses on my skin alongside his scent whenever the mood strikes him.

That's new

–

the kisses are new – but so much of it...so much of the experience of him marking me is warm, and familiar, and brings me back to a time when I was so confused, and so frightened about my future and my place with him. A time when my body knew that it belonged to him, and his to me, where it sang that knowledge every time he touched me. But I had been so... naïve, and so afraid of what I didn't know.

And now? Tears fill my eyes as I realize how truly different it is. The marking itself is the same, the way he moves over me soft and warm and familiar. But the way I feel? So held, so treasured, so sure that this – this is right.

"Hey there," Sinclair murmurs, bringing his face close to mine and kissing a tear off my cheek. Everything all right?" He wraps his arms around me, apparently finished, resting his forehead against mine.

"

“Yes,” I sniff, giving him a smile and nodding to let him know it really is okay. “It was just...really nice.”

“I thought you’d like it,” he whispers, stroking my hair and giving me a smile. I yawn then. I’m not sure I knew how tired I was. “You go to sleep now, little mate. Dream about me.”

“No,” I mutter, shaking my head a little. “I’m only going to dream about corn chips. My one true love.” I hear him chuckle as I start to drift off to sleep. “I’m behind the nest and the corn chips now?” he asks softly. “This competition is rough...”

But his voice fades away, and soon I’m in the forest, dreaming. And I know precisely what I want. So, I call for him and patiently wait.

Chapter 279 – Trouble

Ella

“Took you long enough,” I call out when he finally appears. I’m seated on that copy of our bed in the starlit woods. It feels like hours have passed for me, but there’s no way to really know. Time works different here. It was probably just minutes, and my wanting him so badly that made it feel , longer.

“Really,” Sinclair murmurs, his eyes sweeping over me as I sit perched before him, wearing a dark- blue negligee that mirrors the white one I wore the first time we met in this dream state. I toss my hair over my shoulders, letting him smell the arousal on me, letting him know what it is that I want.

He prowls towards me, dressed only in his familiar black dress pants, but with no shirt to block my view of his chiseled abs, the swell of his muscular chest. I feel my mouth go a little dry as I look at him, letting myself want him. He stops at the edge of the bed, towering over me, my heart starting to pound behind my ribcage.

“And here I thought I was going to get a peaceful night’s sleep tonight,” he murmurs, his eyes lingering on the swell of my breasts against the silk of my lingerie.

“Oh,” I reply, raising my eyebrows and pretending to be innocently surprised. I shrug. “Well, if that’s what you want,” I lower myself backwards to lean on my elbows, laying my body out before him and nodding at the space next to me. “Please, make yourself comfortable. I won’t bother you while you nap.”

“Liar,” he smirks, his eyes flashing as he crawls over the bed so that he looms over me. “I know you, trouble. You won’t be able to keep your hands off me.”

“Oh?” I ask, blinking innocently. “Want to see me try?”

“No,” he growls, grabbing me by the neck and pulling my face forward to his. “No, I don’t want that at all.” Then, with aching slowness, he lays his body inch by inch on top of mine. I let my head fall back, my skin singing at the touch of his. So much of this is a repeat of what we were doing just a little bit ago, but the innocence, the restraint, is gone. The feeling of him pressed against me makes me loose with desire, the weight of his body on mine making me moan with wanting him.” There, good girl,” he murmurs against my neck. “That’s what I want. Moan for me.”

My breath starts to come short as I stroke my hands down the hard swell of the muscles of his back, pressing him tighter against me. I can feel the length of him hard and ready, pressed between my legs. I shift my hips, eliciting a growl from him as I grind slowly against that hardness. I press harder, liking the sound, making him want me as much as I want him. I feel myself growing wetter, my body desperate for the feel of him inside me.

“Slow down, trouble,” Sinclair rumbles, pulling his face back to look me in the eye.

“Why,” I ask. Sinclair never stops what could be I freeze, panic slicing through me, making my eyes fly wide. “Wait, do you think it’s....is it bad? Is it dangerous for the baby? Should we...”

“It’s fine,” he assures me, his eyes gentle as he shakes his head. I take a deep and shuddering breath, relaxing against him. I hadn’t even thought hadn’t thought to consider

—

“It’s all right, little mate,” he whispers to me, pressing a soft kiss to my mating mark, making me shiver. “As real as this all feels, it’s all in your mind. Your body is resting, peacefully asleep. What we do here doesn’t affect your physical being.”

“Okay,” I whisper, running my hands through his hair. “I just wanted you to slow down,” he continues, kissing my clavicle and then moving lower to press a kiss between my breasts. “So that I could make sure I get to taste as much of you as I want to before I let you have me.”

“Let me have you?” I laugh, gasping a little as he licks a broad stroke up the center of my belly. “As if I couldn’t take you whenever oh...” my head falls back though as he silences me with his mouth, placing it right where I’d want it to go.

I groan as Sinclair slowly licks me, dragging his tongue over my clit, torturing me with its softness, his languorous pace. He gives me a low little laugh, pressing my hips back down when they buck instinctually towards him, urging him forward, begging for more, more. He continues at his torturous pace until I’m panting for him, my eyes pressed shut.

“Go on, Ella,” he urges, pulling his tongue away for just a moment and making me want to scream. “Beg me.”

“Please,” I moan, fisting the sheets in my hand.

“Good girl,” he murmurs and then, obligingly, lowers his mouth back to that little bundle of nerves at the apex of my thighs and licking me roughly, sliding two of his thick fingers inside of me as he does. I come absolutely to pieces at the sensation, crying out as shudders wrack through my body.

He carries me through my orgasm, his tongue pressed hard against me. Then, when my chest is heaving and my eyes are pressed shut, he raises himself to hover over me.

“Ella,” he murmurs, turning my face to his wit at me, Ella.” a gentle press of his finger against my jaw. “Look I obey, opening my eyes and staring into my mate’s glowing green gaze.

“Feel me,” he orders, and I obey again, reaching down between us to grasp the thick velvet warmth of him, moving my hand slowly across his head. A shudder passes through him and he presses his eyes closed for a moment, and then looks back at me. “Ask me for it,” he demands.

“Please,” I beg again, not knowing what else to say, and he lowers his own hand to grasp the base of his cock, angling it so that it’s pressed against my entrance, but no further.

“Come on Ella,” he teases, laughing at me a little, riling me. “You said you could take me whenever. So? Make me.”

“Please, Dominic,” I moan, “I want you I want to feel you inside of me –” And it’s true. I feel myself pulsing, wanting him again, greedy despite the body-shaking pleasure he just gave me. I want more.

“Make me, Ella,” he growls, making my eyes fly open to hold his own. He presses himself just the tiniest bit inside of me then, just the tip of him widening me, stretching me for him, making me gasp in anticipation, remembering what it feels like to have all of him in me – all at once –

“Oh god damn it,” I gasp, unable to stop myself from dropping the sheets from my hands and grabbing his hips, pulling him forcefully forward. “Please, Dominic – f*ck me now – I need you –” With a mighty growl, my mate obliges me with a single heavy thrust that sheathes him deep within me. I cry out as he fills me, wrapping my arms around the expanse of his back and sinking my teeth into the skin of his shoulder. He shouts as well, a shudder rocking through his frame as his body, his need, takes over, pulsing the thick length of him hard inside of me. Dominic is not gentle as he pounds his hips against mine but I don’t want him to be – not now – it’s been so long

– we need this –

My own body meets him stroke for stroke as I cling to him, the pace of my breath matching his, my hips rocking up so that his every plunge goes deeper, harder, faster, bringing him to his end.

His breath is ragged as he pulls his head away from its spot by my shoulder. He doesn’t slow his pace, not an instant, but he breathes my name, making me open my eyes again and meet his own.” Look at me,” he orders me. “Look at me.” And so I do I look him in the eye as he reaches his climax, my own building in me. I connect with him through our bond, passing him everything that’s in me – all my love, all my desire for him, all of the dedication, the passion that he rises in my soul. And as he shudders into his climax, releasing a heavy groan as he spills himself into me, he passes the feelings back, confirming and reaffirming his commitment, his love. I gasp my own release, pressing his hips hard against me as another orgasm shakes itself loose, leaving me boneless and exhausted against the sheets.

Sinclair collapses a little against me, shifting his weight so as not to crush me beneath him, his limbs trembling. "God damn it, Ella," he pants, resting his forehead against my chest. "What you do to me...it's like..."

"Nothing I've ever felt before," I finish for him, one of my hands in his hair, the other drifting slowly over the sweaty skin of his upper back.

We lay like that for a long time as I stare up at the stars just visible between the trees, just relaxing with each other, content to just be wrapped up in each other's arms. I start, though, when I hear a little snorting nose next to me. I give Sinclair a rough shake.

"Did you did you just fall asleep?" I demand, shocked.

"Wha-?" he mutters, blinking up at me. "You just snored!" I accuse, laughing. "Can you do that? Can you fall asleep in a dream?"

"I don't know, Ella," he murmurs sleepily, putting his head back down on my breast and wrapping his arms around me. "With you, anything's possible. Take it as a compliment. You wiped me out. Now let me rest, woman."

I laugh a little, putting my head back on the pillow and looking back up at the sky, content. True, we may not be able to do this in our real bodies for a while. It was going to be a long three months.

But if we can't have that? Well, at least we have this. So I tilt my head back, and relax, and let myself dream. At least I do for a while, until my mate wakes up, rock hard, and starts it all again.

Chapter 280 – Doctor’s Appointment

Ella

The next morning I’m up and dressed early, eagerly glancing towards the door every few minutes because I know Cora is coming to see me. It’s a social visit as well as a medical one—I run my hand over my belly, eager to hear what she has to say about Rafe’s growth and progress.

A hear someone at the door of my bedroom and I gasp, spinning towards it. But I just scowl when I see that it’s Sinclair standing there, smiling at me, and not my sister. He bursts out laughing when he sees my disappointment “Really?” he asks, pretending to be hurt as I pick up the television remote and start to flick through the channels. “Days ago you were desperate to see me – have I fallen out of favor so fast?”

“No,” I sigh, looking up at him apologetically. He gives me a warm smile, his eyes flicking over me, making sure I’m okay. “I just can’t wait to see her. And she was telling me some really weird things about her and Roger – actually, has he said anything Sinclair holds up a hand to me, stopping me and glancing down the hall to where someone is climbing the steps.

“Cora!” I cry, throwing my legs off of the bed and working to hoist myself up. Sinclair moves aside and I see Hank and Cora at the door.

“No no –” Doctor Hank says, putting out a hand towards me, palm out. “Stay in bed, Ella – no need to get up. We’ll come to you.”

I frown at him (for more reasons than one) but stay on my bed Luckily, Cora gives a little shriek of joy and throws herself into my arms, where I get to wrap her up tight. I laugh and tell my sister how glad I am to see her while Hank, also smiling, places his bag on my side table and starts to unpack it.

“How are you feeling, Ella?” Cora asks, pulling back from me and putting a hand on my belly. “How is the baby?”

“Everything feels good,” I respond, smiling and shrugging. I look down at my stomach. “He’s just swimming around in there, giving me a kick or two every once in a while.”

“He should be too small to kick,” Cora wonders, frowning and probing my belly. “You’re only three months pregnant.”

“Three months pregnant is more like five or six months pregnant in wolf biology,” Hank informs us, popping his stethoscope around his neck and giving me a smile. “It’s easy to get the timeline mixed up, especially if you grew up human and are really used to thinking about pregnancy in terms of how human babies grow and adapt.”

“Yes,” I say, nodding and looking down at myself. “I felt about five months pregnant a few weeks ago, in the desert would have sworn it. But now it feels like more? I don’t know. It’s confusing.”

“He’ll grow rapidly from here,” Hank murmurs, leaning forward and pressing the stethoscope to my back to listen to my heart and breathing. “If we can keep you healthy enough to maintain his rate of growth. Deep breath in, please.”

I do as he orders, smiling at Cora and then at Sinclair, still standing in the door. My checkup takes a while, with Doctor Hank focusing on my general health and then Cora performing a check on the baby. She even used a little portable ultrasound machine that Sinclair ordered so that we could do these kinds of checkups at home while I’m still weak.

I hold my breath through the whole process, desperately hoping for a good report. I’ve been quite good lately, even if it’s been boring – no stairs, spending most of my time in bed, really just doing nothing but getting fat on all the snacks Rafe demands and giving him the time and space he needs to grow strong.

“Well,” Cora says, finishing up the ultrasound and pressing “print” on the little machine so that we can have a picture of it “From my end, everything looks great.” She gives me a big smile.

“My end as well,” Hank says, smiling at me and crossing his arms. “Overall, Ella, you’re doing wonderfully, all things considered. But I have to remind you that you’re still quite fragile, medically, even if you are feeling better. The orders still stand – complete bed rest, as much as possible.”

Even as my heart lifts to hear that the baby and I are healthy, I scowl when I hear about more bedrest. I think, deep down, I was hoping that I’d be miraculously healed and able to be up and about until the baby is born. There’s so much I want to do.

Sinclair has been keeping me informed of what the world is like, and I’ve been keeping an eye on the news. The tentative ceasefire between the wolves and the humans is holding, though there are some humans who are protesting against giving in so easily, and Sinclair has initiated the start of peace talks between our two peoples. Still, there are so many on both sides who are displaced- so many mothers and their children living as refugees – I could do so much good if I could just.

“Are you all right, Ella?” Cora asks, looking at me closely.

“Yes,” I say, embarrassed a little to have faded off into my own thoughts there. “Just thinking I wish I could get out of bed.” I take her hand and squeeze it, looking between her and Hank. “But thank you – I understand that I can’t. It’s all for the best, and I can learn to be patient. Will you tell me, though?” I beg, looking up at the doctor who saved my life “When I can get up, or do a little more?”

“The minute you’re healthy for more activity, I’ll let you know. I promise I won’t hold you back He gives me a nod and the start of a smile, which I return brightly. I can tell he is warming up to me and I’m happy about it.

Doctor Hank surprises me, though, by reaching a hand out to Cora next. “Cora,” he says, “I’ll see you tonight?”

I watch Cora take his hand and give him a tentative little smile, accompanied by a blush. A blush. I can’t help my mouth from falling open a little. “Yes,” she says, giving his hand a little squeeze before dropping it. “I’ll see you at 8.”

The doctor nods to her and then heads towards the door, where Sinclair joins him to walk downstairs and further discuss my condition.

“Are you serious?” I hiss, leaning forward and staring at my sister the moment I think they’re out of ear shot. “Are you dating Doctor Hank?!”

“Ella,” she murmurs, looking down and blushing again. “It’s not like that – we’re just having dinner-”

“What about Roger!?”

“What about Roger?” She snaps, bringing up her gaze to glare at me a little. I sit back in shock. “I just thought...” I reply, hesitating. “You two were doing so well”

“Well,” she shrugs. “He hasn’t called me at all since...well, since after you got out of the hospital, Ella. Complete radio silence. And honestly, I’m not sure it’s the worst possible turnout.”

“But Cora,” I breathe, my heart in my throat. “You two—you love him –”

“Do I?” she asks, her voice a little bitter. “Or do you just want me to love him, sis?”

Chapter 281 – Sisters in Love

“That’s not fair, Cora,” I scold, narrowing my eyes and sitting back against my pillows as I cross my arms.

“Don’t you want it, though?” she accuses, opening her eyes wider as if she’d like to hear me deny it. “It would be very neat, wouldn’t it? Two sisters matched up with two brothers? Our kids would be so close – they wouldn’t even have another set of cousins!”

“I think that sounds amazing!” I exclaim.

“Ella!” she cries, throwing up her hands. “There can’t be any kids!”

My mouth drops open as my mind whirls and Cora glares at me as I start to put my thoughts together. To begin, Cora,” I say, holding up a finger and beginning my argument. I feel, in this moment, that my hours of television post-hospital have benefitted me here – I’ve watched a lot of law dramas, and I lay out my argument like any lawyer in a court room. “Do you even want kids? Because ever since we left the orphanage, I was always the one who was crazy to be a mom, and you were always interested in building your career

“What,” she snaps, crossing her arms, “just because I have a career means I don’t want kids?”

I take a deep breath through my nose. She’s really starting to piss me off now, like a real sister which, of course, she always has been. “Obviously I don’t think that, Cora, and you’re doing me a real discredit by suggesting that I would. I’m just pointing out that it’s never seemed like children were at the top of your list of life desires! But now you’re using it as a reason to break up with Roger!?”

“There’s nothing to break up! We weren’t even going out!” She blurts out, frustrated and defensive. I just shake my head at her, waiting until she looks at me again, which she does after a moment of breathing deeply and pulling herself together.

“Even if you weren’t officially dating, Cora,” I continue. “You know that there was something between you. That there is something between you! Something big. Don’t insult my intelligence by trying to pretend that there wasn’t.”

Cora sighs, folding her hands in her lap and looking down at them. I wait, my patience running thin. “All right, Ella,” she murmurs, still not meeting my eyes. “There is something there. Of course there is Roger he makes me...”

She sighs, unable to put it into words, and I lean forward, adding my hand to my sister’s in her lap, letting her know that I hear her. She looks up at me then, tears in her eyes. “I just don’t know what future there is with us. And I’m scared to...to put my time and my heart into this if I know it just has a bad ending. Why even try, if he's going to leave me for someone who can give him children?"

"Well, that brings me to my second point," I say in a hurry, shaking my head at her in wonder. "If you're so against dating a werewolf because of your biological differences, then why are you dating Doctor Hank?"

Cora's jaw drops open at this. "Ella..."

"What?" I demand, leaning forward Cora bursts out laughing, raising her hand to her mouth and shaking her head at me, a little good-natured pity in her eyes "Ella, Hank is human"

"What!" I gasp, sitting up dead straight. "No he's not – he's a wolf—he is a wolf doctor, he knows all about wolf anatomy-" Cora just laughs harder, falling back on the bed and cackling at me.

"She's right," I hear, and I spin to my mate who I didn't hear approaching the room "You didn't know?" Sinclair asks, leaning against the door frame. "You couldn't smell it on him?"

"What!" I repeat, looking between the two of them, apparently unable to come up with any other exclamation "What!?"

Sinclair joins Cora in her laughter, shaking his head at me and giving me a fond look. I turn a little red with embarrassment and throw pillows at both of them. "Stop laughing at me! How was I supposed to know!"

Cora sits up then, whipping her eyes. "Don't you have like, extra senses that are able to tell you these sorts of things?" she asks, smiling at me, I think happy to have the upper hand again

"Well, sorry I was too busy dying to get a good sniff of him," I grumble, throwing another pillow at her and looking bashfully at Sinclair. "But seriously, if he's human, why does he know so much about wolf biology? Why is he such a great wolf doctor?"

"He dated a wolf in med school at Harvard, apparently," Cora explains, calming down and taking a deep breath now. I lean forward to listen, glad that she's not yelling or laughing at me anymore. She let him in on the secret and he was fascinated. He also saw the opportunity to break into a relatively small medical field and be the top man at the job."

"It's true," Sinclair adds, nodding to me. "While shifters of course have our own medical personnel, not many shifters themselves are drawn to the years' worth of study and toil that it takes to become a doctor. It's not that we're stupid or lazy," he shrugs, "just we tend to be drawn to more physically engaging jobs."

"Oh," I say, curious, my mind drifting towards my baby. Does this mean he's going to be a jock? I was kind of hoping he'd be a nice quiet nerd, so I could keep him home forever. "So, are a lot of wolf doctors humans?"

"Not a lot," Sinclair responds. "But enough. I mean, you saw it – in order to get fertility treatment, I had to go to a human sperm bank. It's a lucrative field, if you can break into it and are quite good at the work. And if, like Hank, you can learn the culture enough to communicate effectively with your clientele. It was helpful to me, when you were ill, that he recognized my Alpha tendencies and was able to respond appropriately."

"Well," I say, glancing at him a little ruefully. "Sounds like everyone is team Hank now except for me." Sinclair frowns and straightens up. "You don't like Hank? Did he do something."

"No," I say, holding up a hand and stopping him from chasing the poor man down and baring his fangs to demand what he did to offend me. "He's fine. I'm just." I sigh, and tip my head back, staring at the ceiling. "I was just rooting for someone else." I give Cora a little glare.

"Well," she says, giving me a prim little shrug. "In this case, it doesn't matter who you root for, because I'm the referee. And I don't listen to the fans."

Sinclair just looks between us, his face screwed up in confusion. "What the hell are you two talking about?" As one, we turn towards him and give him simultaneous sisterly glares. "Nothing," I say, snapping my mouth shut. "Sister stuff," Cora replies haughtily. "You wouldn't understand."

Sinclair just puts his hands up, admitting defeat. "No worries," he concedes, "I don't want to know anyway. I'll go downstairs and get you guys some snacks. Do you want anything in particular? "Oreos!" I shout as he goes. "And hot sauce! Celery with peanut butter on top!"

Cora laughs, leaning forward and poking me in the belly. "This little guy has a weird appetite," she says, grinning. "Yeah," I say, sighing as I look down at my body and wonder what he's thinking in there. "He's got my tastebuds all screwed up."

We're quiet a moment before I start again. "Cora," I say, rubbing my stomach. She looks up at me. "Just don't count him out, okay?"

She frowns, opening her mouth to say something, but I put up a hand, asking her to let me finish. Slowly, she pulls her mouth shut and lets me continue.

"I won't bug you about it, I promise," I continue. "But just don't close the door completely, okay? Not until you're really sure."

"Okay, Ella," she agrees, giving me a little smile. "I won't close it completely."

We grin at each other for a second, but then I can't help myself. I lean forward, eager. "So, did you and Doctor Hank kiss yet? Is he good at it?"

"Ella!" Cora exclaims, laughing. Then she grabs one of the pillows I threw at her and swings it playfully at my head.

Chapter 282 – Hell on Wheels

Ten days pass with agonizing slowness and I think I'm going to lose my mind. On the morning of the eleventh day I just sit in my bed, staring passively at the tv, flicking through the channels and not even caring what comes on. I've seen it all, anyway.

It's not that I haven't tried to keep busy in bed. In fact, I've tried everything. I've sent email after email to all of the aid organizations I can think of, asking if there's any way that I can help from home. They all came back with pleasant congratulations and urges for me to concentrate on my improved health. I scowled at each one of them as I deleted them and silently wondered if Sinclair had anything to do with it, just a quiet word to each of the organization heads that I wasn't to be engaged until after the birth of my child.

When that fails, I try a variety of crafts I've always wanted to get into but have never had time for. But it turns out that knitting is crazy boring, and I'm a terrible painter, and I'll never cut it as a novelist because I can't stitch two words together. When hobbies failed, I tried educating myself, downloading a few language apps so I can become the polyglot I've always wanted to be. But, I swear to god, if that little owl pops up on my phone one more time urging me to practice my French...

Well, let's just say that while I've always braked for birds, I won't be doing that anymore.
(2)

So, now, it's just me and this damn tv. And my brain slowly rotting to much as I sit here on bed“, rest.” Even though it's bed torture.

And it's not that Sinclair isn't kind. We meet every night in the dream space, but in our waking hours he only has so much time. He's working so hard to bring our people together, to unite human and wolf kind, and I don't have the heart to tell him that I'm so bored I've tried to see how many Oreos I can stack on my forehead before they all come crashing down around me.

(Eighteen.)

I know that if I even gave him a hint that I was miserable, he'd drop everything and come to my side, entertain me, make me laugh. But what kind of queen would I be if I took him away from our people? I know that I have to be strong but...damn, it's hard. Who would have thought that a charge through a shelled city towards a temple I could handle, but laying in bed for ten days is really the thing that takes me out?

The only real relief I find is when I am in the dream state, either with Sinclair or alone, so I spend as much time as I can sleeping or napping. I feel freest when it's just me. I love my time with my mate, when we spend our night hours touching and holding each other in ways we can't in the real world, but when I'm alone? I transform into my wolf and run –

I run through rivers and up the sides of mountains, feeling the snow crunch beneath my paws. I run through moonlit forests and drink from silver lakes. I sprint across deserts, the pads of my feet so swift they barely touch the sand. Sometimes, when I look over my shoulder, I see a little pup running along with me, giving little yips of satisfaction and joy. He's not always there, but when he is, I feel my heart could burst from the joy of it.

But a girl can only sleep so much, especially when she's got nothing to do all day but sit around.

So that's what has landed me here, flipping through channel 826. Passively, I wonder what happens after I hit channel 999. Does it go back to 0? Or does it just go on... forever....

Suddenly I sigh and toss the remote across the bed, giving a little growl of aggravation. Damn it, I need something to do. I'm a wolf, after all. We weren't meant to lay in bed all day, passive. I have to get up, I have to move around and see things.

For the millionth time, I wrack my brain, trying to come up with a solution, wondering how the people I love would handle it. Cora, of course, would grit through it, the way she did med school – just putting her head down and enduring the unpleasantness, knowing the great reward is coming at the end. Sinclair...well, he would probably ignore the doctors and push forward with his life. And while that sounds amazing, I promised I wouldn't.

I slump down against my pillows, running through all the people I know, when suddenly my mind alights on Sinclair's father. Henry.

I gasp, inspired, and grab for my phone. As quickly as I can, I pull up his contact information and call him, crossing my fingers and praying that he picks up.

"Hello?"

"Henry!" I burst out. "Henry, I have a great idea. Can you help me out?"

A few hours later, the house is full of people. "Yes, this is perfect," I breathe, holding on to the service technician's arm as he lifts me from the bed. My head snaps up as I hear a ragged snarl rip across the room.

"Get your hands off my mate." I hear Sinclair demand, his voice livid with a murderous threat. The technician spins and, when he sees the huge werewolf in front of him ready to rip his head off, starts to shake so hard he almost drops me.

"No!" I cry as the technician starts to put me back down on the bed. I point a finger in his face, giving him a harsh look and speaking in my best Luna voice. "Don't you dare put me back in that bed. I will flip out."

Torn, the technician whips his head between me and the doorway, not knowing what to do and fearing for his life either way.

Suddenly, Sinclair pulls me from the technician's arms before I can say a word and holds me close against his chest. "Get out," he growls at the man, his voice low. "And if I ever see you again – even once in your life –"

I hear the rapid patter of feet and know that he's gone, but I try to peek around Sinclair's shoulder anyway. "Seriously!?" I cry, glaring up at him. "You had to scare him off like that?!"

"He had his hands on you, Ella," Sinclair snarls, and I can see the rage still alight in his eyes. I smirk, a little pleased by his jealousy beyond my annoyance. Sinclair narrows his eyes at me for a moment and then looks to the side at the shiny new wheelchair sitting there, waiting for me."

What the hell is all of this, Ella?"

"My salvation," I say, beaming at the chair with love in my eyes, admiring its gleaming wheels and all of the buttons on its control board. "It's state of the art – I'll be able to –"

"Ella," my mate snaps, drawing my attention back to him. "You were commanded to stay in bed."

"This is bed-adjacent!" I cry, defiant. "It's the same thing, basically! I sit up in bed, why can't I sit in a chair!" "That's not the point," he explains, angry. "You're supposed to be resting, healing."

"Dominic," I interrupt, letting my face drop so that he can see the desperation beneath. "Please. This is..." I shake my head, hoping he will understand. "It is killing me to sit around all day doing nothing. Please, Dominic. I won't even leave the house. I just have to get out of bed."

My mate pauses for a moment, staring down at me, his eyes softening. "Ella," he says, working hard to keep his voice even. "If you were so miserable, why didn't you tell me –"

But I just slowly shake my head and his words fall away. He knows why. He nods, understanding, and then heaves a big sigh, turning and carrying me out into the hall where workers are buzzing around at the staircase.

"And what are these ones doing?" He asks, yielding to me. "They're putting in my stairlift," I reply, my eyes bright and my words breathless with wonder. "Isn't it amazing?"

“Ella,” he scolds, shaking his head at me. “What is all of this even going to do.

“It’s easy!” I exclaim, feeling true enthusiasm for the first time in a week. “Your dad helped me set it up – just a chair upstairs, and a stairlift, and a chair downstairs, and I have full run of the house! It’s amazing, and I never have to get up! Even Doctor Hank and Cora said it was okay.”

Sinclair takes another deep breath, holding my gaze, but a huge smile bursts onto my face as I see him visibly give in.

“All right, trouble,” he murmurs, carrying me back into the bedroom where he places me gently in my new chair. “But I have a feeling that this is a terrible idea.”

“No! The best idea!” I cry, pressing the forward control on the chair and zooming out into the hall. “It’s going to be great!” Immediately, I hear Sinclair skitter out into the hall after me when he hears the crashing sound that I make, totally by accident. His face is terrified.

“Um,” I say, biting my lip and looking down at the poor broken vase I knocked on the floor. “You didn’t like that one...right?”

Chapter 283 – Zoom zoom

Sinclair

A crash sounds upstairs. The second one today. I groan and put my head in my hand, honestly not wanting to know. “Dominic?” I hear my mate call, requesting my assistance. I press my eyes shut, ignoring her for just...just one minute. “Dominic!”

“Seriously,” Roger murmurs, looking towards the door. “What were you thinking, letting her put this insane plan into action?”

I drop my hand and glare at my brother. “Ask me that again when you’re mated,” I murmur, steeling myself as I head out of the room. Roger doesn’t say anything as I go, though I feel his eyes on me. I ignore it.

“Ella?” I call from the base of the stairs. The seat of her stairlift is at the top, so she must be up there. “Dominic!” Her faint voice comes to me, sounding relieved. “Can you come help? I’m...stuck.” I sigh and pull myself up the stairs.

Three days. Three days she’s had her wheelchairs and her stairlift, and while I’m pleased to see her spirits raised, it’s been a nightmare for me. Three days of watching her zoom around, crashing into every thing I own. I’ve already imagined six thousand ways this could go wrong – Ella sliding off of the stairlift and tumbling down the stairs, Ella somehow miraculously managing to run herself over with the chair, Ella crashing through the banister and flying through the air like Evil Knievel...

And you’d think that I was kidding, or exaggerating, but...

As I get to the top of the stairs, I turn to see her wedged, somehow, behind a potted fern in the corner. “How did you even...do this?” I ask, exasperated, as I walk over to her. She gives me a bright, if embarrassed, little smile. “I don’t know,” she shrugs. “I just...went forward, and it was there...”

I sigh again – my three hundredth sigh of the day and lift the plant, freeing her. She zooms backwards in the wheelchair, grinding potting soil from the plant into my carpet as she goes. I sigh again. Three hundred and one.

“What are you even do-” I start, but she’s off already, waving to me as she heads down the hall towards our bedroom. “Things to do!” she calls, waving over her shoulder. “Go back to work, I’ll catch up with you later!”

I shake my head, following her into the bedroom, eager to put a stop to this. “Ella,” I demand, striding in after her. “This has to stop – I’m going insane with worry –”

“What!” she exclaims, appalled, turning her chair in a little half circle so that she’s facing me. Why are you worried?" I pause, staring at her, my mouth hanging open a little with my incredulity.

"What?" she demands, frowning her pouty little mouth at me. "Tell me!" I shake my head. "Ella, in the past three days you've broken hundreds of dollars' worth of ceramics alone –"

"Ceramics" she mutters, waving a flippant hand. "We can buy new pots who cares about that –"

"Ella!" I insist and she snaps her gaze up at me. I groan again and wipe a hand down my face, trying to figure out how to say this. "Sweetheart, you know I love you..."

She cocks her head to the side, narrowing her eyes at me, sensing a "but" coming. I oblige her. But, I continue, "baby, you're the..you're the worst wheelchair driver I've ever seen. I seriously don't even know how you ever got a driver's license, you are just so bad at."

"What!" she screeches. "I am amazing at this! What are you talking about?!" "Baby," I plead, putting a hand on my heart. "Please, please believe me when I say this – and I love you – but you are awful at this –"

She laughs at me then and I can't help but laugh with her. It's so ridiculous. But I'm so grateful that she finally sees my point. Now I can convince her to give up –

"You're just jealous," she asserts, giving me a clever, wolfish grin.

My mouth drops open and I don't even know what to say. Jealousy... has not even come into the equation. "Ella, seriously," I begin, but she interrupts.

"Seriously!" she picks up. "If I were bad at this, could I do this?"

She spins her chair then in a quick circle that lifts one of the chair's wheels off the ground. My stomach drops as I lurch forward, desperate to keep her from tipping over, but she just laughs at me as the chair rights itself, zooming out of my reach.

"Don't do that!" I gasp, glaring at her.

"What!" she counters. "I'm fine- this chair can't tip over, it's built into the design."

"If anyone can manage it," I caution, "it's you. Ella, please."

"Dominic," she sighs, shaking her head at me. "Don't you think you're being just a little overprotective? I mean, sure, I get stuck behind a potted plant or two." She shrugs. "So" what? I'm fine." She gives me a bright, happy smile, and I have to say it goes to my heart. It's good to see her cheerful and engaged again. That's why I let this go on as long as I did, but honestly? It's enough.

She thinks I didn't notice, the past week or so, how miserable she's been. She thinks she hid it from me to let me go on with my work. But I noticed – of course I did, I could smell her misery on her, could feel it in my very bones. But I could also feel her pride every morning when she sent me off to start my day. In many ways that was the one thing keeping her together – the idea that she was doing this for the baby, and was letting me go for our people. That her misery was, in some way, an act of service for a greater good.

So I went, spending as little time on my work as I in good conscience could, and otherwise spending my time curled up with her, my troublesome little rose-gold mate.

I shake my head a little as I stare at her now, as she smiles up at me. My sweet, clever girl. How do I do this? How do I help her find the balance between misery and keeping herself safe?

"For today, then, Ella," I say calmly, putting out a hand towards her. "Enough chair for the day... my nerves are absolutely at their end. Please. For me. I'll come to bed – we'll watch a movie –"

She pretends to consider it for a moment, tapping her chin as I take a step closer to her, intending to pick her up and carry her to bed. But then, at the last second, a wicked gleam comes into her eyes.

"Nope!" she quips, flicking her fingers over the command board and zooming past me, right out of my grasp. "Ella!" I cry, growling as I turn to watch her fly out of the room.

"If you want to stop me," she calls over her shoulder, "you'll have to catch me!"

Something in me, despite myself, lights up at this little taunt. A growl grows inside of me as I launch myself after her, out into the hallway and to the top of the stairs where she's already seated herself on the stairlift, buckling herself in.

When she sees me coming for her Ella gives a little half scream, half cry of laughter and delight, pressing the button on her stairlift frantically to make it go faster. Luckily, as it was built for the elderly, it has one speed: glacial. I catch her with ease.

"Oh no you don't," I burst out, taking two steps down the stairs so that I'm even with her and pressing the emergency-stop button on the lift. Ella gives another little cry, laughing hard and beating her little fists playfully against me as I unbuckle her belt and lift her up into my arms.

Out of the corner of my eye I see Roger below, peaking out of the office and looking up at us like we're crazy. But I ignore him, carrying my mate definitively into the bedroom and laying her down on the bed. When she's settled I climb onto the bed as well, settling over her but holding myself up on my elbows and my knees, effectually using my body as a cage.

"Big brute Alpha," she pouts, poking me in the chest and wiggling disconsolately into the blankets. "Not letting me have any fun."

I can't help it. Looking down at my gorgeous mate, pouting up at me with those full lips, her full breasts heaving, her rose-gold hair spilled out around her...I'm instantly hard.

"You can have fun," I glower, lowering myself until my face is closer to hers, dragging my nose along the skin of her cheek and taking a deep breath of her incredible scent. "You just can't reenact Grand Theft Auto in our house." "I'm good at it," she whines, crossing her arms and pretending to be madder than she is.

"You're terrible at it," I murmur, mimicking her voice. "And you're forbidden from using the chair again until I can get my dad over here to give you some lessons."

"Forbidden?" she smirks, flicking her eyes over me, not failing to note the new hardness she feels pressed against her swollen stomach. "And what will you do to me if I... break the rules?"

"Punishment," I snarl, bringing my mouth close to hers, "will be swift. And without mercy." I lift one of my hands and slowly slide it down the length of her body, stopping only when I have a full handful of her ass.

And suddenly, her mouth is pressed to mine, gasping, pulling me down to her. She pulls a moan from me and I fall to my side, ever-conscious of the baby and not wanting to crush him though all I want to do is flatten myself against her, pin her beneath me until she's gasping with want for me.

Our kiss deepens and my mate pulls me against her, wrapping her legs around me and running the sharp edge of her teeth over my lips, wiping my mind of any thought but her – her naked, laid out before me – her soft lips wrapped around my cock – her –

"Sinclair," she gasps, pulling her face back from mine, and I freeze as I see fear on her face. "I – I think we should stop Panting, I pull back and take a minute to come back to reality. Suddenly, I'm horrified at myself for letting it go this far. I nod as well. "I'm – I'm sorry, sweetheart –"

–

“No,” she says, giving me a flash of a bright smile and shaking her head. “It’s okay – it’s wonderful – I just...” she bites her lip. “If we go any further, I don’t know if I’ll be able to stop. And the baby...”

I groan, rolling onto my back and covering my face with my hand, knowing that she’s right. Slowly, I nod my head, feeling guilty. God damn it, but she’s just so... I can’t help wanting to touch her, feel her – hell, wanting to bury myself deep inside her, if I’m being honest, whenever she’s around. Her body, her scent, her being all of it just sings to me.

Ella presses her body up against mine, nestling her head against my chest and heaving a sigh. I feel her relax, though, and work hard to even my breathing, forcing my muscles to ungrip. We stay that way for a few long moments, her tracing her fingers lightly over my stomach, me wishing despite myself, even though I wish I didn’t that she’d let that hand drift just a little lower...

“It’s going to be a long three months...” she murmurs, and I feel her shake her head slowly.

“Two and a half,” I breathe, the words coming from between my teeth. I drop my hand and raise myself to glare at her belly a little. “Two and a half, kid, okay? And then you’re out of there. And then I’m taking my mate back.”

Ella laughs, pressing a kiss to my chest as I rest my head back against the pillow. Two and a half months, I think. That’s it. And then all of my dreams would come true.

Chapter 284 – A Long 2 1/2 Months

Ella

One and a half months later, and I'm gigantic.

Gigantic.

"Five months wolf pregnant," I mutter, stirring my yogurt with a little silver spoon, "is about thirteen months human pregnant." Leaning back against my pillows, I raise the spoon to my mouth, but hesitate before taking a bite.

"What?" Sinclair asks, glancing at me from his spot on the bed, where he's reading some reports on his tablet. "Has it gone sour?"

"No," I murmur, stabbing the spoon back into the cup. "I'm just afraid if I eat another bite, this baby is going to get even bigger."

"Good!" Sinclair declares, grinning at my swollen belly and reaching out a fond hand to rub my baby bump. "Let him get big and strong before he's born, that way he can come out running and we can play football within a week.

"Absolutely not," I snap, giving him a little glare and hoping to hell that he's kidding. "I am not growing you a linebacker, Dominic, so get that right out of your head."

Sinclair chuckles and puts his tablet aside, moving lower on the bed to press his ear to my stomach just above where the baby has settled. "What's that, little Rafe?" he asks, loud enough for me to hear. I twist my lips and shake my head a little, knowing this is all for my benefit anyway. If he wanted to talk to Rafe, he could just do it through his bond. "You're perfectly comfortable in there and want to go to full term so you can get big and strong?"

—

I feel the baby move, then, responding to his father's voice, pressing some extremity – a hand or a foot – across my skin, right where Sinclair's face is. Sinclair kisses the spot where the baby presses and I feel a little thrill of Rafe's happiness running through me.

"Tell him it's not true, Rafe," I say aloud, stroking the sides of my stomach, which looks honestly like I've swallowed a giant watermelon. "Tell him you're cramped in there, and would like to stretch out in your comfy little baby bed."

Rafe connects with both of us then, his emotions ringing with happiness, but, indeed, with a little ...pinched feeling, with the desire to stretch. "See?" I say, raising my eyebrow at Sinclair as he looks up at me with a big smile. "He's sick of it too. Time for baby to be born!”

“Well,” Sinclair sighs, sitting up and giving my belly one last pat. “We’ll see what Cora and Hank say this afternoon at your checkup. Sometimes wolf babies come sooner than six months.”

“Really?” I ask, excited.

“Sure,” he shrugs. “It’s not common, but...”

“Well,” I consider aloud, “maybe since he’s one quarter moon goddess...he’ll come fast, and leave me in peace. I wonder what their average gestation period is...”

Sinclair just laughs, coming to my side and putting out his hands to help me to my feet. I accept readily and head to the closet, eager to get out of my pajamas and head to this appointment.

I smile secretly at my mate as he heads back to flop onto the bed, continuing his work while I get ready. He’s been so sweet and supportive, even though I’ve been a bit miserable for the past two weeks, but especially this last one. There’s been some trouble, I know, with human insurgents who are unhappy with how well the peace talks are going. They think that humans are getting the short end of the stick and are threatening violence unless Sinclair and his teams make more concessions. I know it’s stressing him, but he still makes a great deal of time for me in his day. I’m so grateful for him, for my sweet attentive mate.

As I pull on a clean top and stretchy pants, I consider whether I complain too much about this final stretch of my pregnancy. It’s not that it’s not that I’m not enjoying being pregnant – I have loved every minute of feeling my little boy grow stronger inside of me, every little twist and kick, and especially feeling the little messages he sends down our bond to me. He’s gotten so communicative lately, really responding to us like a little baby might telling us how he feels and what he wants.

It’s all been so wonderful. It’s just...I am so uncomfortable now. I’ve always been a petite woman, and even though Rafe was little at the start, it’s very clear that he’s Sinclair’s baby now. He is heavy, and he presses on my back, and my ankles are swollen, and I can’t find a comfortable spot when I sleep – even in my nest...

So, I admit that I’m a bit torn. As much as I love being pregnant, and I’m so happy and grateful for it, it in many ways feels like the end of a wonderful vacation where you start to think about how nice it will be to go back home. I sigh and lean down to pick out a pair of sneakers but stop, suddenly, when I realize that I can’t bend down far enough over my belly to grab them. So I straighten, glare at the shoes, and then kick them out of the closet so that they spill onto the floor of our bedroom.

When I peek out the door, Sinclair is looking towards the closet, his eyebrows raised. "Can you get those?" I ask with a big smile. "I need you to put them on my feet. Baby says no more bending."

My mate gives a warm chuckle and obliges me, coming to scoop up the shoes as I go to sit on the bed. "Sure thing, Cinderella," he smirks, kneeling down on one knee and lifting one of my feet up like the prince he is. "Let's see if the slipper fits."

When we get to the doctor's office, the receptionist gives us a big smile and takes us right back to a private exam room. I look around the crowded waiting room, opening my mouth to protest that we shouldn't be seen before all of these women who have been so patient, but Sinclair presses a hand to my back, ushering me forward. "I paid for this place, after all," he murmurs, giving me a smile. "You can accept just a little special treatment, just this once."

—

I hesitate but then let him herd me along, looking back over my shoulder and feeling guilty. It's true, though Sinclair brokered a deal with both Cora and Hank to have them on call for me at all times throughout the pregnancy. And, after Rafe is born, they'll be our personal physicians for our whole family. In exchange, though, they both requested that he set them up in private practice so that they can see refugee clients for free when we didn't need them. Judging by the swell of people in the lobby, they seem to be taking the latter half of the deal quite seriously.

My train of thought is interrupted by the sound of my sister calling a greeting to me, rushing down the hall to wrap me in a hug. "Ella!" she says, pulling back and looking me up and down. 'Wow, you're huge!'

"Thanks," I grimace, rolling my eyes and rubbing a hand over my stomach. "Just what every woman wants to hear when she walks into a room."

Cora gives Sinclair a nod of greeting and takes me by the arm. "It's different when you're pregnant and visiting your doctor who is your sister," she says, giving me a grin and taking me into the exam room. "We get cart blanche to say whatever we want." "If you say so," I mumble, hoisting myself up onto the exam table with a helping hand from Sinclair.

Cora begins the standard exam, asking me for details of how I'm feeling, if there have been any issues. I report that everything has been fine, just general pregnancy discomfort which I think is normal for the later months of a pregnancy. She nods and listens to the baby in my belly, taking my vitals and generally assessing the baby's growth. Hank comes into the room as she works, nodding warmly to Sinclair and to me.

When Cora is done, he performs his own basic exam of my general health as Cora gets the ultrasound machine working, ready to take a look at the baby.

"I All is going well until Cora puts the jelly on my belly and starts to move the wand around, looking at Rafe on the screen and taking some measurements. I'm smiling at the image of my baby, so well -formed and big and real on the screen when he was just a little blip a few months ago! But I snap my eyes to my sister when I hear her gasp.

"Ella," she says, turning to me and biting her lip. "What," I whisper, my eyes going wide. "What's wrong with my baby?"

Chapter 285 – Spicy Foods, Caster Oil, and...

“Nothing,” she says, shaking her head quickly and realizing her mistake. “I’m so sorry, Ella – I didn’t mean to scare you – he’s just...” she turns again to the monitor, shaking her head at what she sees.

“Cora!” I shout, sitting up fast and grabbing her by the shoulder. “Tell me! Now!” Sinclair is at my side instantly, a warm hand on my back as he peers down at the monitor. Hank likewise turns his head to the screen, curious.

“The baby is just huge,” Cora breathes, in awe. “If these measurements are right...” she shakes her head, looking up at Hank. “I mean, are you seeing what I’m seeing?”

Hank leans forward, considering, and then his eyes likewise go wide. He stands up and leans back, crossing his arms. “She’s right. That is a big baby.”

My breath starts to come short as I look frantically between the screen, my doctors, and my mate before finally settling on my stomach. Oh my god. Is he really huge? Was my idea that he was as big as a watermelon actually true? Is he so big that he’s going to be too large to come out, and so he’ll have to just stay in there until I explode –

“Don’t freak out, Ella,” Hank says, drawing my eyes up to his calm face. “It’s nothing drastic yet. Just...a big baby.”

“That’s a little bit of an understatement, Hank,” Cora says, glancing up at him. “Only a man would, say that a twelve pound baby, not even at full term, is nothing drastic.”

“I’m just saying,” Hank interrupts smoothly, professionally, keeping his eyes on me, “that the baby’s size is at this point no risk to himself or to you – which is really the important thing. Many women – even petite women, like yourself – have delivered twelve pound babies before.”

“Yeah,” I mutter, glaring down at my stomach. “But I’m sure they didn’t enjoy the experience.”

“She’s not even at full term yet, though,” Sinclair says, and I look up to see a worried frown on his face as he looks between Cora and Hank. “If the baby is twelve pounds now, in a month he’ll be...”

“Godzilla,” Cora murmurs unhelpfully, still staring at the screen and moving the wand around on my belly, assessing Rafe’s condition. I give her a little kick and she tosses a smirk in my direction

I ignore her and bite my lip, worried. “Seriously, if he continues to grow at this rate,” I fret, looking between my doctors, “what does that mean a month from now?”

“Well,” Hank says, considering me seriously. “If the baby gets too large to deliver naturally, we’ll consider a cesarian. But I think everyone in this room agrees that a natural birth would be preferable Cora?” He continues, passing her the proverbial baton. “What do you think?”

“I think...” she says, giving the screen one last glance and then looking at me and Sinclair. Honestly, guys, I think this muffin is baked. When I look at that screen, everything I see suggests a full-term baby ready to go. I am not as familiar with wolf deliveries as I’d like to be, but if you were a human woman I’d say that you were nine months pregnant and ready to pop at any moment.”

Hank nods. “I agree. I’ve been reading up on wolf pregnancies and found that six months is more of a deadline than an expectation. I think that your child could be born any day now and, from what we see in the exam, we have every reason to expect that it will be a healthy delivery.” He gives us a wide smile and Cora joins him.

“Congratulations, Alpha and Luna. You’re about to be parents.”

I sit up straight, a thrill running through me both at the anticipation that I could meet my baby soon and that this pregnancy could be done. “Really,” I breathe, looking at them with shining eyes. “Any day now?”

Hank nods happily. “You’ve done beautifully, Ella – your bed rest these past months has really allowed your body to heal and Rafe to grow. I’d say you’re just about as strong as any mom ready to give birth to her first baby. I think you can look to the next steps with confidence.”

I look up at Sinclair, then, my face alive with my happiness. He puts a broad hand on my cheek, bringing his face down to mine and placing a swift kiss on my lips. “You’re a miracle, Ella,” he whispers, sweeping his hand back to tuck my hair behind my ear. “I’m so proud of you, baby.”

—

My eyes fill with tears at my sudden happiness, my love for my mate, my child, our soon-to-be family. The entire pregnancy has been so full of anxiety – to be able to come into the final days of it happy, healthy, and confident...

It’s just such a blessing. And I don’t know what I’ve done to earn it. “Congratulations, sis,” Cora says, taking my hand and beaming at me. I give her hand a squeeze in return and use my other hand to wipe the tears from my eyes as Sinclair straightens up next to me, his hand still confidently on my back.

“Thanks,” I say, laughing my relief. “Thank both of you, so much, for your care. We couldn't have done it without you." "Well, we're not finished yet," Hank replies practically, studying me. "Ella, considering that your baby is fully grown and ready to go, you might consider..."

"What?" I ask when he pauses, cocking my head curiously.

"Well, for your own comfort," he continues, "you might consider some... traditional methods. Of moving the pregnancy along. A twelve-pound baby is a large baby, and if he gets any bigger..." Hank looks to Cora for support.

"He's right," Cora says, looking from Hank to me. "We don't want to do a cesarian if we can avoid it, and we can always induce early if it comes to that, but it's always best for both mother and child if the mother's body goes into labor of its own free will. But, there are some folk remedies which can encourage that..." she begins to smirk.

"Like what?" I ask, frowning, trying to remember. "You can take castor oil," she suggests slowly, her smile growing. "Or eat some spicy foods. Go for a long walk." My eyes light up at the idea of a walk – god, I've been on bed rest for so long, the idea now that I could take a walk sounds amazing –

"Or," she continues, her smile now a grin, "you could...have s*x."

"What?" I breathe, my eyes going wide. I feel Sinclair tense next to me, his body going perfectly still.

Cora nods slowly, starting to laugh a little as she glances between us. "Yup. It's perhaps the most tried-and-true method to start labor. And considering that Ella's body is healthy, and the baby is ready to go," she shrugs, looking up at Hank for confirmation. "I don't see any reason not to."

Hank nods, clearing his throat and looking out the window, apparently eager to avoid eye contact with us. "Yup," he says briskly, suddenly very interested in a squirrel outside running up the trunk of a tree. "I see no reason to abstain any further, if you're -"

But there's no reason for him to finish his sentence, because Sinclair and I are already gone.

Chapter 286 – Home as Fast as we Can

Ella

The minute Hank gave his assent, Sinclair was moving, gathering me up into his arms and striding for the clinic's door. We drew quite a few eyes on our way out – a gigantic man carrying a little pregnant woman bodily out of the doctor's office, and her laughing with glee all the way. But I didn't care. I ignored them all, pressing myself close to Sinclair, eager for his warmth and his comfort and his love.

We don't say a word to each other on the ride home. Instead, I stare out the car's windshield with Sinclair's hand grasped in my own, my breath coming in short pants. My mind wanders back and forth between the thoughts of my child and my pregnancy, and the thought of my mate –

–

My mate his hard-muscled body, which I've wanted for weeks but haven't even dared to touch outside of the dream space, for fear of losing control. Of his mouth, hot on mine, of his thick, hard cock, pressing against me, slipping inside me and

“You have to stop,” Sinclair growls, glancing at me as he speeds through traffic, weaving in and out of slower cars with expert grace. “I can feel what you're thinking – I can smell it – and if you don't stop I'm going to pull this car over right here

”

“Do it,” I dare, smirking at him, squeezing his hand hard. “Pull the car over, Dominic.” Then, I let his hand go and lean forward, slipping my hand onto the soft wool of his suit pants, moving it slowly upwards.

“God damn it, Ella,” Sinclair growls, snatching my hand away and glancing a glare at me. “We didn't come this far to die in a car crash.”

I just smirk, settling back in my seat and closing my eyes, pressing my legs together against the steady ache that's growing there. Then, I lean my head back and let my mind wander, thinking about all the things I'm going to do to him the moment I get him in bed...

Sinclair's snarl rips through the car.

The door to our house bangs open and I see one of our housemaids start in surprise as Sinclair storms through it, me in his arms. I barely manage to shoot her an apologetic look before Sinclair heads for the stairs, taking them two at a time. He moves with an agile grace, faltering only when I lean forward to press a kiss to his neck. He gives me a dirty look for torturing him, one that makes my stomach twist in anticipation, and then kicks our door open, heading straight for the bed.

Things slow down as we get there, though. Sinclair takes a moment to hold me close, lifting my face to his and kissing me deeply, as if never wanting to put me down. I wrap my arms around his neck and kiss him back, letting him feel my joy at being able to hold him again, to be with his body the way that feels right to me, to let him feel my hunger and my desire. After a moment, though, Sinclair kicks the door shut behind us and lays me gently on the bed.

Then, he strips off his shirt and I get a good look at everything that I've been missing. My eyelids drift low as I take in my mate, the rippling muscles of his pecs and abs, the broad shoulders and the tight, tapered waist. God damn it, but I want to run my tongue over every tortured inch of him.

"So, Alpha boss," I tease, leaning back on my elbows and pressing my legs primly together. "What do you want to do now?"

Sinclair becomes a feral thing, a predator looking carefully at his prey, deciding precisely how he wants to pounce. He grips his belt, tugging it loose in a single jerk and pushing the waist of his pants so that they fall to the floor, his shorts going with them. And then he's standing naked before me, his proud cock rigid and eager.

Then, he moves, coming forward onto the bed, crawling over me as he did the last time we were close like this, making his body a cage over me, one from which I have absolutely no desire to escape. As he closes the space between us, I feel my pulse ratchet up even further, watching him move with unending slowness above me.

And suddenly, I realize that this is his game, and I smirk. I tortured him in the car, and now he's paying me back, making me wait while he lingers above me. The wolf in me rises the bait, giving a snarl as I pull his face down to mine, claiming him. Mine mine mine.

to

He melts, then, giving in, his arms almost collapsing as he gives his body what it desires, which is to be close to me, with me, now. I twist to the side, not wanting him to crush me beneath him, and Sinclair lands next to me on the bed as I opening my mouth to him completely, letting him explore me with his tongue as I gasp and moan.

Sinclair's hands move fast now, quickly moving to my hips to shove my stretchy leggings down. He breaks his mouth away from me for a moment to tug the fabric free of my legs and ankles, and then briskly pulls my shirt and my bra up over my head in a flash. I laugh as he works, as eager as he is to be free of these materials, to feel him on every inch of me instead of the cotton that I've had pressed against my skin for weeks.

He growls through clenched teeth as he tosses the clothing away and I press my body fully against his or, at least, as close as I can get, with my gigantic stomach in my way. But I feel absolutely no shame or hesitation, which surprises me. I had always thought that I wouldn't feel s*xxy pregnant, with a big belly and swollen ankles making my body feel unfamiliar. But with the way Sinclair runs his hand along the length of me now – cupping my fully breast eagerly in his palm, moving his hand over the expanse of my body and dipping around my back to grip my ass – I feel so alive, and womanly, and desired. (1)

The hard, eager throb of Sinclair's cock against my leg only confirms this feeling, deepening it, as Sinclair repositions me, turning me so that my back is to him while I lay on my side.

"I can't wait any more, Ella," he murmurs, pressing kisses along my shoulder and neck, taking a moment to run the edge of his sharp teeth against my tender skin and making me shiver with anticipation. "I can't not be inside of you right. f*cking. now.

"

I press my backside against him, letting him know I'm ready, and he slips a hand between my legs, my assent confirmed by the wetness that coats his fingers as he strokes me, making me ready for him. "Good girl," he murmurs, and I shiver with pleasure as he moves his hand to his cock to spread my wetness there. "I've been starving for you for weeks."

Chapter 287 – Weeks to Wait

“Liar,” I murmur, glancing at him over my shoulder as he positions himself against my center, running his head up and down my s*x, teasing me. “You haven’t been starving. You’ve been f*cking me in my dreams. Wasn’t that enough to keep the hunger at bay?”

He chuckles lowly, bringing his cock back to my center and slowly beginning to press into me. “You tell me,” he says, gasping as he goes. “When I f*ck you in your dreams, does it feel anything like this?”

And suddenly I’m gasping too as he starts to fill me, my vision flooded with stars as I press my eyes shut and moan into the fabric of my pillow. Every inch of him stretches me, feeling like an unending fullness as I feel the swell of his head making room for the rest of him on its path deeper inside me. The sensation rips through me like a storm, the pleasure of it and my hips buck against him, urging him on, needing more

Sinclair gives a rough shudder as he finishes seating his length deep inside me. Then, he rocks his hips back, making me groan anew to feel him pull out an inch, and then slam again home. Sinclair wraps himself closer around me, one hand finding my breast as he repeats the action again and again, a rough, feral pounding over which neither of us have control. The sensation builds in me as his other hand slips over my hip, pressing against my swollen and greedy clit, and I cry out as he presses me there, increasing his pace as he does.

“I’m sorry,” he grits through his teeth, completely undone by the intensity of this after months of wanting, and abstaining, and holding back. “F*ck, Ella, I’m sorry – I can’t last – you’re so f*cking

–

And then he gives a final spasm and a cry and I feel him spill loose in me, the sensation warm and thick and rich, and the thought of it – of him bursting thick spurts of hot cum inside of me – makes me spill over, my orgasm making me rock my hips back hard against him, forcing him deeper against that favorite place inside of me that makes me shake and shiver.

We lay there for awhile, spent, my back pressed against his chest, panting quietly. “Ella,” he whispers after a moment, my name barely audible on his breath. “Are you...are you all right?”

I nod my head, my eyes closed, letting my body feel the afterthought of the shivers that still run through me from head to toe.

“No

,

”

he says, shaking my shoulder a bit. “I mean...the baby.”

My eyes fly open at the idea and I look down at myself, quickly assessing...

But...

“No,” I groan, suddenly disappointed. “No, no change, Dominic,” I whisper, turning to give him a little pout. “He’s still...in there. Determined never to come out.”

“Well then,” my mate growls, turning my face further to him and giving me a feral grin. “We’ll just have to keep trying.”

I sigh as I smile and can tell that Sinclair understands my emotions. It’s so wonderful to be able to be with my mate like this again, but if the point of all this is to somehow shake this baby loose? “I don’t know, Sinclair,” I say, running a hand over my stomach. “I’m not feeling anything like labor. I think we’re going to be in this for the long haul.”

He gives a little happy shrug, unperturbed at the idea. “Fine by me,” he murmurs, beginning to kiss his way down my body. “Just gives me more time to enjoy these s*xxy curves, while you’ve still got them.”

I laugh a little, awash with happiness as my mate kisses his way down my body. I suppose he’s right though – even if we do have weeks to wait, at least we can give the term “bed rest” a better definition.

—

We both go to bed a few hours later, sated and content after a long afternoon of being pressed close to one another. It’s not all s*x – though, of course, some of it is. But a great deal of our time is spent just holding each other close, letting our bodies fall into their old rhythms together, our breath and heartbeats aligning in a way they haven’t been able to do for weeks.

I drift off into my dream space feeling totally comfortable, not needing invite Sinclair in tonight because I know he'll be there waiting for me when I wake up. It's not that I don't want him there tonight it's just...a peaceful bed at, where he dreams his dreams and I have mine to myself, separate but together. My body at ease, I eagerly drift off, anticipating my first night of deep rest in a very long time.

to

So it surprises me, a few hours later, when I wake to a deep ache in my lower back. I give a little moan of discomfort, twisting my aching muscles to ease them, but I only feel the ache grow deeper. I gasp a little as a sharp pain runs through me, starting in my middle and then radiating through my body. I frown down at my belly, running my hands over it, wondering what's up. Is it something I ate?...

Because of all things, it feels like...well, like I'm very gassy, maybe? Or starting my period? The pain fades, though, and I drift off to sleep for a little while longer.

I'm wrenched almost to a seated position, however, about ten minutes later when the ache begins again, this time deep and echoing through my muscles. I give a little gasping cry as the pain continues through my back and travels down the inside of my thighs.

Sinclair wakes next to me, sitting up and putting a hand on my shoulder. "Ella?" he asks, worried. "I'm okay," I murmur, giving him a look over my shoulder, rubbing my stomach. "I just think that.

"What?" he presses, worried. "Well," I say, turning and smiling at him. "Maybe that our afternoon wasn't such a waste after all." I give him a big smile and let him press his hands against my stomach.

"Really?" he breathes, staring down at my abdomen, fascinated. Then he looks up at me, curious. Did you ask the baby?"

I laugh a little and shake my head, the ache and the pressure in my lower stomach fading a little. "No," I say. "I didn't think to." Then, I close my eyes and reach for the baby. I can tell, immediately, that he's uncomfortable and eager for change. Not in a bad way, just...

"Wow," I say, my eyes flying open and taking in Sinclair's serious face. His eyes are closed as he too reaches out to Rafe, trying to figure out how he feels. Then, Sinclair's eyes open and he gives me a big smile."

"I think you're right," my mate whispers. "I think he's ready."

My face breaks into a big excited grin. I expect my mate to return it but he leaps suddenly from the bed, rushing to the closet. "Where are you going?" I ask, confused. "I'm getting the hospital bag!" he calls to me. "We have to go!"

I laugh a little at his panic. "Sinclair," I call, holding out a hand to him as he comes out of the closet, the bag in his hand and a look of panic on his face. "We have time – the contractions are still far apart."

"How far apart?" he asks, suspicious. "I don't know," I say, looking down at myself. "But they just started, and they don't hurt a lot yet. It takes some women hours."

"You're not a human, Ella," Sinclair says, coming to my side. "Wolves are different."

"Are they faster?" I ask looking up at him, suddenly worried and wishing I'd thought to ask Hank about this.

Sinclair runs a hand through his hair, glancing anxiously towards the door. "I don't know he responds. I lean over and take his hand, pulling on it, dragging his attention back to me.

,

"

"Let's time them," I say, a little excited. "And we'll text Cora and Hank. I'd rather be here, after all, comfortable in my bed, if it's going to take a whole day for the baby to come."

"Ella..." he hesitates.

"Please, Dominic," I say, smiling up at him. "It's just a few minutes to time the contraction . What's the worst that can happen?" 4)

Chapter 288 – Hesitation

Sinclair

I sigh, sitting down on the bed next to my mate, giving her a significant look as I humor her. She grabs her phone, eagerly pulling up the clock timer and never taking her other hand off her stomach.

“Okay,” she murmurs, looking down at herself. “Well, this contraction has been over for a little bit,” she looks up at me. “Should we just wait for the next one to start the timer and time between that one and the next?”

I breathe out in a huff, closing my eyes and working very hard to control my anxiety and be patient. “Just start the clock and add two minutes to the time, Ella,” I beg. “Please.”

“Okay,” she says. Then I feel her hand on my cheek and I open my eyes to look down into her sweet, excited face. “It’s going to be okay, Dominic. You heard Hank. I’m strong – there’s no reason to rush off to the hospital yet.”

“There’s no reason not to,” I retort, giving her an even stare. But my little mate just wiggles herself closer to me, pressing herself warm against my side. I lower my head to her hair, my heart still beating fast with anxiety and anticipation, and take a deep breath of her warm scent. She’s right, at least a little – there’s no harm in waiting just a few minutes. As I work on my patience, I hear Ella clicking away on her phone.

–

“Okay,

”

she chirps. “I texted Cora she’s up, she says she’ll meet us there when we’re ready. But she says to text her the time between contractions when we’ve got it. She also says it could be false labor,” Ella notes, looking up at me with an interested expression. “Since it’s so early. So, we might be panicking for nothing.”

–

I murmur something back – I honestly don’t know what and wrap my arm around her, concentrating on being steady next to her, where she needs me. Ella is excited, but deep down I know that she’s anxious as well – how could she not be? Throughout this nightmare of a pregnancy, something’s gone wrong at every turn. I know that, like me, she’s on pins and needles, just waiting for the other shoe to drop.

The next few minutes are torture for me. Every instinct in me tells me to get up and move, to prepare, to do something. I could go start the car, have it ready and pointed out to the street so that we can go the moment she's ready. I could double-check this hospital bag, although Ella's packed and re-packed it twelve times. I could go rip that ridiculous stairlift right out of the wall, now that we don't need it anymore,...

That, at least, would give me some satisfaction and burn off some of this anxious energy....

But, despite that impulse, I stay right here by my mate's side, where she needs me. There's no place else I'd dare to be.

"Ohhh," Ella says suddenly, her hand sliding low on her belly as she closes her eyes tightly." Okay," she breathes. "I think this is...another one."

I grab her phone off the bed next to her. Eight minutes. "Ella," I snip, "your contractions are only ten minutes apart. Please."

"Ten minutes," she says, frowning at the phone. "How is that possible, they just started –"

"Ella," my voice is low with warning and anxiety now. "Please we're going –"

"Fine," she says, raising her eyebrows at me and putting her feet on the floor. "I think it's too early but oohhhh," she winces, shuddering with pain and pressing her eyes closed.

–

"What is it," I breathe, leaning close and taking her hand. "What's wrong?" "It's just... sharp..." she says, her teeth gritted. "Ow, I didn't think it would hurt this bad so early..."

"Enough," I growl, scooping her up in my arms, my heart pounding. I head for the door but she stops me, slapping my shoulder.

"The bag!" she cries, and I spin, squatting down to grab it and then leaping from the room in one swift action. I pound down the hall, eagerly headed for the stairs. As I begin down them, though, Ella gives a sharp gasp and convulses in my arms, freeze, holding her close, my eyes tracing the pained lines of her face.

"Ella," I gasp, terrified. But there's nothing I can do I just hold her until she stops, until she opens her eyes and looks shocked into my face and then down at her belly, her face going white.

“Down,” she demands. “Put me down. Something...something happened.”

Ella

I’m still wrapped in his arms as Sinclair jolts back into action, hurrying to the bottom of the stairs where he can put me down. I feel a sudden wetness between my legs, a sticky warmth that...)

G*d damn it, all I can think of is the blood that I saw all over me on the temple steps when I’d nearly lost the baby, when I was so weak and exhausted

What if –

Did something go horribly wrong –

Sinclair reaches the bottom of the stairs as I cling to his shoulders, panic racing through me. He places me down steadily on my feet and I look down at myself, trying as best I can in the darkness to assess what I see –

“Light!” I call, wiping my hand down my legs, trying to assess –

Sinclair is instantly in action, flicking on the hall switch. Frantic, I look down at my hand but see ...clear. There’s liquid on my hand, but it’s clear. I give a frantic little laugh as I stare at my hand and then down at my soaked pajama shorts.

“Ella,” Sinclair gasps, taking me by my shoulders and making me look up at him, “Ella, please what’s wrong – what’s happening –”

“My water broke,” I explain, still laughing, a little hysterical with relief. “I’m all wet – because my water broke “Oh my g*d,” he murmurs, slumping back against the wall and putting a hand to his head. “Ella – I thought –”

“It’s going to be all right,” I say, coming forward and wrapping my arms around his waist. Sinclair, we’re going to make it. I think – I think we’re both just really freaked out, and traumatized, by everything that we’ve been through.”

He opens his eyes and looks at me then, shaking his head a little.

”

“But from here on out?” I insist, looking at him with full confidence. “Everything is going to work out. Easy as pie. And soon we’ll have our baby.”

He smiles at that, pausing his frantic energy for a second to brush my cheek with his finger and lean down and kiss me. But it doesn't last long. "You're right, trouble," he murmurs, pulling away." But if it's all right with you, I'll calm the hell down when we've got you safe and sound in a hospital bed."

"All right," I say, nodding. "But, um," I pause, and bite my lip, a little embarrassed.

"

Can you run upstairs first, and get me a change of pants? I can't...I can't leave the house like this. I look like I peed myself."

Sinclair sighs, rolling his eyes, but he sprints up the stairs as fast as he can to get me a change of clothes.

Five minutes later, we're in the car and on our way, me breathing deeply as I feel another contraction start to come on. I ride through the pain of it, Sinclair giving me worried glances as I do, but the pain passes. We are quiet, Sinclair concentrating on the road, and me on relaxing between contractions, which...damn it, are they speeding up?

The streets are mostly clear as we drive through the city – everyone's asleep now, anyway, and I close my eyes and try to relax, breathing deeply in anticipation of the pain that starts to flare in my back, the contraction that I know is about to rock through me.

Just as I feel the deep pulse of the pain begin, though, my eyes fly open as I hear Sinclair curse. "What the hell start, but the car twists suddenly to the side, skidding to a stop. And then, I scream.

Chapter 289 – Travel Disruption

Ella

The sound of gunfire rings out around us and I feel Sinclair lurch to cover me in the suddenly- still car. Trembling, I try to peek out from beneath his arm as he curses vehemently, his body tense over mine.

The gunfire ends and Sinclair moves, jolting back to the driver's seat and hitting the gas, spinning the car and heading away from the bullhorn that's suddenly blasting words in our direction.

"What's happening?!" I shout, begging for information, doubled over in pain as my body continues its contractions, not caring about the fact that we're suddenly, apparently, in a war zone.

"The insurgents," Sinclair growls, glancing over his shoulder. "Picked fucking tonight to push forward with their rebellion – god damn it –"

I glance over my shoulder as well, suddenly seeing a road block in the middle of the street with figures standing behind it, wearing masks and holding guns.

"Humans?" I ask, desperate. "Who don't want peace?"

Sinclair nods sharply, spinning the car around the city's center square. I look around suddenly – hadn't known where we were my eyes fixing on the temple, the palace, these familiar places I haven't seen in weeks – since Quickly, I dismiss the thoughts from my mind, not letting myself go there. "Can we go back? Can we get out of it?"

—

—

"No," he growls, speeding across the square and skidding to a stop in front of the palace. "They'll have us boxed in by now, and they saw my face. God damn it, I should have seen this coming. They'll come after us now – we have to get you inside."

With that, Sinclair jumps out of the car, coming quickly to my side and pulling my door open. I step out and he lifts me quickly into his arms, charging forward to the palace. There are guards waiting at the door who look at us with shock and surprise.

"Alpha," the guard says. "We weren't expecting

“Let us in,” Sinclair growls, barely stopping to let his command register and ready to burst through the door if the guard doesn’t open it in time, which, fortunately, he does. “Barricade this entrance all of the entrances – get as many guards here as you can, and let no one in except at my command. Is that clear?”

–

The guard nods quickly, all business, ready to follow through on Sinclair’s commands. As soon as we’re in the dark palace, though, I open my mouth, letting out the sharp cry I’ve been holding back. This contraction – it’s horrible, sharper than the others, and fast

–

“Sinclair,” I pant, looking up at him. “The baby is coming – we have to get to a hospital –

”

He shakes his head at me, looking horribly repentant as he pounds up the wide marble stairs. I’m sorry, baby,” he says. “We can’t go anywhere until we know it’s safe.”

”

“Then what are we…” I look around, not recognizing what part of the palace we’re in now. But, apparently, Sinclair knows where he’s going, throwing his shoulder into doors and bursting through them until, quite suddenly, we’re in a beautiful bedroom with a wide four-posted bed with blue velvet curtains hanging down from a rich canopy.

Sinclair slows now and I look around the sumptuous room in awe as he carefully places me on the bed. “Well,” he says, grimacing a little, apology still in his eyes. “A King’s bedroom is as good as any a place for Rafe to be born, don’t you think?”

“Is that where we are?” I wonder aloud, still panting as I look around, the shock of the situation allowing me to ignore my pain for just a moment.

Sinclair nods to me and then sits on the bed by my side. “Ella,” he says urgently, taking my hand. “I need to go organize those guards, make sure that you are safe, make sure that they know to let Hank and Cora in when they get here –”

“Are they even going to be able to get here?” I gasp, looking up into my mate’s eyes, seeing the hesitation and doubt there. “Cora is across town – and I don’t know where Hank is – and we don’t have any medical supplies

—

—

“I

—

“They’ll get here,” Sinclair growls, determination in every word. “But I have to go just for a few minutes – you text Cora, tell her where to come ” Sinclair pauses now, his eyes sweeping over me. “Ella, my love, will you be all right?”

I hesitate and then nod, suddenly, knowing that he has to do it. I want him by my side – don’t want him absent for a minute – but I know that without him to lay out his commands to the troops, this palace could be quickly overrun.

“Go,” I say, nodding encouragingly and working hard to put a little smile on my face. “We’ll be fine.” I move my hand to my belly again, worried, suddenly, as I realize that Rafe can feel my anxiety – an anxiety beyond that which a new mother feels when she goes into labor. My poor baby – he’s already endured so much...

—

Sinclair shakes his head and I know that he, too, feels my guilt. But he leans forward, placing a steady kiss on my forehead, and whispers “I’ll be right back. Right back, Ella.” I nod, and then he’s striding away from me, leaving me alone here in this sumptuous room.

I’m very suddenly overcome by the strangeness and the silence of it all. My contraction has ended, so I’m not currently in pain, but I feel my breathing ratchet up anyway as I look around this gigantic dark room, at the lurking shadowy corners. Was this...was this where Damon slept? Where he lived his life? Where he came with his wife, with...with Lydia?

—

Suddenly, I start to shake with the panic of it all, and thick fat tears squeeze themselves from my eyes. God damn it – just a few hours ago I was so happy – so comfortable, so at peace with everything –

How fast the world turns.

My hands shaking, I pull my phone from the emergency bag and begin to text my sister, letting her know that the plans have changed. Almost as soon as I send the text, though, my phone starts to ring. I pick it up, my voice shaking.

“Hello?”

“What the hell is going on, Ella?” Cora’s voice furiously demands, “You need to get to the hospital.

Now.”

“We can’t,” I explain, my voice shuddering. “We don’t know who is out there or how many people there are – the rebels

“God damn it, Ella, I’m going to kill him,” she snarls.

“Who?” I gasp, desperate and uncomprehending.

“That mate of yours, for getting you into this.”

“It’s not his fault,” I growl, willing to defend Sinclair to the end of this.

–

“Whatever,” Cora snaps. “Listen, just...hold tight until this all gets sorted out, okay? I’m sure that Sinclair will have troops there in a few minutes – a whole wave of them – and they’ll be able to clear those insurgents and get you to the hospital. Fast.”

“Okay,” I say, nodding, a little relief coming to me at the idea. But then, I start to feel the pain rising again in me. “Um, Cora?” I ask, looking down at my stomach as the ache begins to intensify and spread.

“Yeah?” she asks, impatient. I can hear her moving around, objects clattering in the background in her hurry.

“Can you come here anyway? Like, now?”

“I’ll just meet you at the hospital

—

“No, Cora,” I insist. “I need you now.”

There’s a pause on the other end of the phone, complete silence. Then, my sister speaks. “What’s going on, Ella?”

“My contractions,” I explain. “They’re only they’re four minutes apart.”

My sister curses, shocking me a little with the intensity and fluency of her expletives. I blink in shock.

“Just stay put, Ella,” she commands. “I’ll be there as soon as I can.”

“But how will you

”

“I’ll be there —“ she shouts, and then the phone goes blank.

I drop the phone to the bed, my lip starting to tremble with anxiety and fear and loneliness. But then I glance down at myself, fighting against the spasms of shocking pain that are spreading through my center. Because I’m not alone, am I?

Rafe is here. And I need to start concentrating on him.

—

So, I take control – or at least, as much of it as I can. I stand up, ignoring everything in my situation except my baby and my body’s own needs. I peel back the covers of the bed, revealing the clean sheets beneath, and I climb in, stacking pillows behind me to support me as I sit against them and start to breathe through the contraction. I close my eyes and concentrate on the bond between me and my child.

Just me and you, kid, I tell him, wiping my fear away as best I can and sending him a burst of love. I’ve got you. We can do this.

And my heart fills with courage as he sends me a little pulse back: belief.

Rafe trusts me. And it's all I need.

It's time to bring my baby into the world, and I'm ready. I was born for this.

Chapter 290 – Contractions

Ella

Slowly, I breathe through my contractions, taking deep breaths in through my nose and huffing them out of my mouth. The pain is...well, I suppose I can't say like anything I've felt before, can I? Not after all I've been through in the past five months. But it's incredible, the way it radiates through my body, making me grit my teeth against it.

I can feel my body moving, changing along with the contractions. The pain in my pelvis, particularly, is insane, as the bones shift to make room for the baby to pass through. My eyes flash open during one particularly difficult contraction and I hear myself cry out against the pain. God, I would have thought that being a wolf made this easier – wolves seem to have a whole litter of pups without much trouble, by themselves out in the woods.

Passingly, I consider shifting into my wolf form to ease this

–

But then, suddenly, Sinclair bursts into my room, dashing for me.

"What," he gasps, almost skidding to the side, looking me all over for what is wrong. "What is it, Ella – I heard you scream –"

"No," I say, gasping a little as the contraction starts to come to its end. "No, it's just the contraction – god, Dominic, these suck –"

He shakes his head, still panicked, trying to put it all together as he kneels by the side of the bed and takes my hand. "Cora is coming, she's close," he murmurs. "She'll be allowed in."

"And Hank?" I ask, looking at my mate. "And Roger?"

"Roger?" Sinclair asks, confused.

"Yes, Dominic! Roger! I want him here as well!"

"Why?" Sinclair's eyes are wide with wonder now.

"Because!" I smack his shoulder, frowning at him. "He's the child's uncle! And his godfather! He should be here! I can't believe you didn't call him!"

"Ella," Sinclair sighs, reaching for the cell phone in his back pocket as I lean back on into the pillows, taking deep breaths. "I can't believe you're thinking about propriety while you're giving birth with insurgents outside

—

((

"This is going to be as perfect as I can make it for Rafe!" I snap, determined. "And if I have to give birth in a war zone with no epidural, then Roger can damn well get out of bed and come over here to greet his nephew!"

"Oookay..." Sinclair says softly, giving in without any further questions. I hear him tapping on his phone and then he shifts. I watch him stand, leaning over me. Frowning, he leans over and grabs one of the pillows from the other side of the bed, quickly taking the pillowcase between his two hands and ripping off a long strip,

C

"You know you don't need to do the linens thing and boil water that's just in the movies. I'm sure Cora will bring something else to sterilize any instruments she brings—"

"It's not for that," he murmurs, leaning down and wiping the sweat from my brow with the little square of pillowcase folded in his hand. "How are you, love? How do you feel?"

I relax back as much as I can against the pillows, the next contraction not starting yet. "I feel... determined," I say, gazing up at him. "Rafe is ready. He told me so. We're both ready."

"That's my girl," Sinclair says softly, taking my chin between the fingers of his big hand and gazing at me. "So strong."

—

I nod at him, willing myself to believe it too — that I'm strong even though I'm scared and in pain. I am strong. For him, and for Rafe, and yes — for myself — I can be strong.

—

"Ooooh," I say, pressing my eyes shut again, my hands moving low on my stomach. "Here comes another one." >>

Sinclair gets on his knees by my side again, steady and tense. Then, as I start to breathe in that special way Cora made me practice, he breathes along with me. He's there with me, every step.

Time passes quickly this way, with long stretches of pain followed up by a few minutes of respite. Unfortunately, those minutes are coming closer and closer together. I'm moving through this birth process fast, and I don't have any control over it. If I could wait, just hold him in while we wait for Cora to get here...

But no, it seems like Rafe and my body have other plans.

Sinclair talks softly to me throughout the process, helping me get ready in the moments between contractions. He helps me change into a cotton nightgown instead of the travel clothes I was wearing on the way here. He brings me two cool cups of water, one for drinking, the other for dipping more strips of pillowcase in to lay across my hot forehead. Throughout it all, my mate is all attention and support.

But beneath that, I can see on his face the worry and guilt that he's done something horrible in not getting me to the hospital. I hold his gaze steadily whenever I can, letting him know, silently, that we're all going to be all right. We're going to make it.

I don't know how much time has passed when the door bursts open. Cora flies into the room, panting, a medical bag slung over her shoulder. I almost spill the glass of tap water Sinclair just handed me all over myself as I give a little shriek of surprise when she bursts in.

"Ella," she gasps, dashing over to me, almost bowling Sinclair over in her singular focus to be at my side, to look me over and assess my condition.

"Steady," Sinclair murmurs, a little frustrated, as he puts out a hand to balance himself so that he doesn't go sprawling on the floor. Cora ignores him.

enture

"Ella, love," she murmurs, her eyes sweeping over me. "Tell me what's going on

I need to know." She puts a hand on my stomach, feeling for the baby. "He's low..." she murmurs as I fill her in on the timing of my contractions – three minutes apart now – and the aches and pains.

survey of my

"Everything sounds normal, Ella," she says calmly, looking at me in the eye so that I can see her faith. I hear Sinclair give a great sigh of relief, but I keep my eyes on my sister. She breaks my gaze, though, and starts peeling back the sheets. "I need to take a look. Can you lay back all the way?"

I do as she says, clearing the pillows so that I can lay flat on the bed and allowing my sister to examine me. As she does, I look up at Sinclair, who takes my hand.

“Well,” Cora says quietly after a few minutes. “I don’t have all of the tools I would like to make a full assessment, but,” she sits up and looks me in the eyes, giving me a big grin. “Ella, you’ve moved through this remarkably fast. From what I see, you’re ten inches dilated and ready to start pushing.”

Her grin broadens. “Are you ready to have this baby, sis?” Cora asks, reaching forward to take my other hand.

“Really?” I gasp, my eyes going wide. I look between my sister and my mate. “No way – it’s too soon. “It’s time,” she says, “believe it or not, but it’s time.”

“But,” I struggle to sit up and Sinclair offers a helping hand. “Hank isn’t here yet – neither is Roger. “Roger,” Cora snaps, frowning at me a little. “Why is he coming?”

“What is with you two,” I ask, baffled, looking between my mate and my sister. “Why is everyone so shocked that I want the baby’s uncle to be here when he’s born?”

“We just didn’t think of it, love,” Sinclair responds, brushing the damp hair away from my forehead. “Our concentration is on you.”

I open my mouth to respond but a sudden surge of pain hits me and I groan, turning my attention back to my belly, my core, where I can feel my child pressed low against me. “Ooohhhh,” I say, hunching my shoulders forward. “Oh, it’s a big one.”

“They’re all going to be big now,” Cora says, perhaps a little too cheerfully. “Come on, Ella. It’s time to push.”

Chapter 291 – Big Alpha Baby

Ella

I'm gripping my sister's hand, gritting my teeth and groaning through the first of my pushes, when the door bangs open again. I don't open my eyes – can't look –

Quite frankly, at this particular moment I don't care who the hell it is if it's Hank, or Roger, or insurgents coming to kill us – all I care about is the horrible, tearing pain within me as I work to bring my baby into the world.

I moan, throwing my head back against the pillows as I pant, feeling the pain subside a little bit.

"How is she?" I hear Hank ask, and I open my eyes to see him there next to me. I try to give him a little smile, failing a bit. "Hello, Ella," he says softly, his voice warmer than I'm used to. "You look like you're doing great."

I murmur my thanks to him as he turns his attention back to Cora, getting a full report, and I shift my gaze to Roger, who stands awkwardly across the room.

"Roger," I say, putting my hand out to him, inviting him closer. "Hello, Ella!" he calls, awkward. "Happy...happy birth. Or whatever."

Sinclair starts to laugh quietly. "Come over, Roger," he demands and Roger sighs, hanging his head and deliberately choosing not to look at me as he comes to stand with his brother. "What," Sinclair asks him as he arrives at his side. "More of a cigars in the waiting room kind of guy?"

"Yeah," Roger agrees, giving his brother a little glare. "I'd say that's much more my vibe." "I wanted you here," I say to him, giving him a tired little smile. "I want you to meet the baby."

"Of course I want to meet the baby, Ella," Roger says, his voice kinder now as he meets my gaze. "Just...when you've cleaned it up a bit. Gotten some of the goop off."

I laugh, a little, but groan when I feel the pain start to return. Cora climbs up onto the bed for this one, cursing a little at the lack of stirrups and the soft surface of the mattress that makes it harder for her to see what's really going on. Roger tries to muffle his groan as he turns away, which perversely makes me want to laugh in one of the more painful and trying moments of my life.

Hank quickly takes Cora's space at my side, Sinclair solid a solid force next to my head. "You've moved quite quickly through this, Ella," Hank informs me as the contraction ends and I pant, working to catch my breath. "This is rare, even for a wolf birth. But you should be in the final parts of it now," he says, patting my knee and giving me an encouraging smile.

—

I smile back at him but note, interestingly, that Cora rolls her eyes at him a little bit when he says this. I have no idea what that could mean is there trouble in paradise? – but honestly, any of my interest in that question is immediately wiped out when the pain comes again.

This continues for a few rounds, of me huffing and pushing with all of my might during the contractions and then resting, as best I can, in the short spaces between them. I can feel my baby moving inside me, progressing along. It's hard, agonizing work, but my sister calls encouragement to me and my mate is by my side through every moment of it, steadily holding me together.

After what feels like an endless repetition of this pattern, Cora gives a little gasp. "Okay, he's almost here!" she says, and the cheer in her voice is a balm to my agonized body. I look at her with hope in my eyes and she gives me a happy little nod. "One big push, sis, and his head will be born, and then it's easy after that!"

I take a deep breath, looking up excitedly at Sinclair, happy despite the pain ravaging my body. I wait for the next contraction and, when it comes and Cora tells me to, I push – absolutely as hard as I can, giving a guttural yell while I do in that I hope will help me push through, bring him home.

"Oh, his little head!" Cora says, smiling at me, "he's here, Ella! Just a couple more to bring forward his body next!"

I nod, eager, and begin to push again. And push, and push. I gasp, laying back and panting as I feel the contraction end, and I look to Cora for instructions. Instead of a happy smile, though, I see her exchange an odd little glance with Hank.

"What," I demand, working to sit up and moaning at the pain that shoots through my back. "What's wrong? Where's my baby?"

"Is something wrong?" Sinclair asks, suddenly tense next to me. I can tell by his voice that he's working, so hard, to stay still and steady, to let the doctor's do their work. Inaction and the passing of responsibility to another – no matter how much they outstrip him in their expertise – has never been his strong suit. My mate wants to be involved.

"Um," Cora hesitates, "it's okay, Ella – he's almost born – but..." She and Hank hesitate and exchange glances again, then looking down at the baby. I struggle to sit up, to see the child, but my sister shakes her head at me, leaning forward to press me back to the pillows.

“Please,” I beg, my eyes fixed on Sinclair. “Please, you have to tell us. Cora sighs as she sits back and I see that her face is worried. “Ella, he didn’t make any progress in the past few pushes. Which is sometimes a sign that...”

“There is some worry,” Hank continues, “that because he’s such a large baby, that he could be ...stuck.”

“Stuck?” I gasp, suddenly horrified. Sinclair goes rigid next to me. “It’s common,” Hank says hurriedly. “Lots of women experience this with large babies. It’s called shoulder dystocia – we think his shoulder is trapped up behind your pelvis.”

“What?” I gasp, confused, baffled, horribly worried. “What do we –”

“It’s okay!” Cora says, though her worried voice belies her words. “We’re trained for this.

Then, my sister moves across the bed until she’s next to my head. She puts a steady hand under my shoulder, pulling upwards. “Come on, Ella, you need to change your position before the next contraction comes – I’m going to move you on your side to shift your pelvis, and then – ” “Don’t tell me “I gasp, moving with her. “Just do it.” I look up into Sinclair’s worried eyes, knowing mine are a mirror for his. I nod to him, letting him know that it’s okay, and praying – deep inside me – that it’s true. I send a little pulse of love to baby Rafe, but he doesn’t send anything back. He is, predictably, distracted.

–

I moan in pain as Cora shifts me onto my side and then begins to press on my stomach just above my pelvis when the next contraction starts.

“Good, Ella, keep going...” I hear Hank murmur as I pant and push and shout at the pain of it. And then, a few moments later, “No progress, Cora – I’m going to cut

–

“All right,” I hear Cora say, her voice shaky, though my eyes are pressed shut.

I hear a roar from Sinclair at the same moment that I feel the cold press of metal against me. His hand rips from mine, but I don’t know where he goes, and the metal slices further down by the child, eliciting a slow and guttural scream from my throat.

But then, suddenly, there is a lack of pressure low on my body where there wasn’t before and I feel my shoulders collapse and the sudden lack of need to push. I'm still wracked with agonizing pain but I blink and work to sit up as I hear the cry of a baby fill the room.

Rafe.

Rafe is here. I gasp, looking for him, seeing a little form in Hank's bloody hands. I reach for him but feel quite suddenly woozy and, before I can hold my child, I collapse back against my pillows.

Hi. Dear readers

Thank you for your support and love for Accidental Surrogate. Book 1 of the story has ended at Chapter 291. But because of your enthusiasm and anticipation, we wanted to present you new stories after Rafe's birth.

According to the suggestion of the platform editor, the content of book 2 will be updated in this one, so you can continue reading

Chapter 292 – A Gift

Sinclair

Agony.

It's agony for me – obviously, more for my mate, I'm sure – but watching her survive this is ripping me apart.

I struggle against Roger's grip – he shouldn't be stronger than me, he's never stronger than me, I should be able to break away – but something about all of this has just taken it out of me. I am weak, now, watching my mate struggle for her life, watching my son take his first breaths, that rips the energy from me. I gasp for breath, panicked, looking between my Ella and the baby in the doctor's hands.

"Relax," Roger commands, his voice low behind me as he holds me back with a hand on each of my arms. "Let them work. You can't do anything right now. They'll call you when they need you."

I know he's right, but the impulse – I have to do something –

Still, I stand with my brother, letting him take control as I watch Hank and Cora moving, blessing them in my mind with every breath that pants from my lips. Ella lays back against the pillows, pale, breathing faintly, apparently half conscious and half out.

The pair of doctors move fast. Hank glances over the crying child and then quickly hands him to Cora, reaching for the medical bag that sits on the bed between them. Cora does a quick inspection of the baby and then hastily cuts the umbilical cord. Then, she meets my eyes.

"Come and take your child, Dominic," she demands, wrapping him hastily in the scrap of a pillowcase that I tore to pieces not long ago. "He's fine – but Ella needs both Hank and I right now." Roger releases my arms and I move forward, my eyes half on my beautiful Ella as I take the baby from Cora's hands. I can't – how can I greet my son when his mother –

"The child," Cora says, holding my gaze for a brief moment before turning back to Ella. "Concentrate on the baby, Sinclair. We've got Ella for now."

–

And so I do. I look down at my infant son, crying his lusty little heart out, waving his little tiny fists in the air. Something in me takes over something I'm not sure I knew was there – as I begin to shush my child, to rock him, to try to bring him to a peaceful state in this scary new world. Slowly, softly, I raise my hand to wipe at the liquid on his face, to clear it, marveling at the fact that his entire head is completely dwarfed by the size of my palm

And then, following an impulse that's totally new to me, I lean forward and bring my face close to my sons, pressing a kiss to his head and taking a deep breath of his new baby scent, totally new and, somehow, already totally his own. "Welcome, baby," I murmur.

From the corners of my vision I can see Cora and Hank working swiftly with their medical supplies, Hank sewing quickly while Cora crouches by Ella's head, taking her pulse and smacking her cheeks a little.

When I hear Cora call Ella's name, my attention snaps away from Rafe and to the sisters on the bed. "Ella," Cora says, and I see my mate – oh, thank god – I see her blink, and focus on her sister, her face ashen and white. Unbidden, I come to Ella's side, determined to be with her – to give her everything I can.

Cora ignores me as I take my mate's hand, the baby curled in the curve of my other arm.

"Ella," Cora demands, steady. "It's time to access the gift. You need it. Ask her to heal you."

Slowly, Ella nods her head and closes her eyes. But I don't know if that's because....because she's accessing the gift? Or something else...

Something much much worse. I open my mouth, panicked, to call her name, but Cora snaps her attention to me and shakes her head.

And so I close my mouth, and squeeze my mate's hand, and let her do her work.

Ella

–

It's terribly hard to do anything right now to think, to concentrate, to communicate – let alone enter the calm meditative state I need to access my mother's gift.

My body is wracked with pain, and I don't know whether it's blood loss from Hank's medical cut, or some sort of tear within me, or...something else. But my vision fades in and out from a hazy view of the palace bedroom and utter blackness.

But still, in the brief moments when I can concentrate, I see Sinclair standing by my side, feel his hand in my own, and see our little baby wrapped up in a sheet in his arm –

Just as he was in the dream state And I find new determination within me. So, working hard to steady my breathing, to not slip into oblivion, I close my eyes and work to access that state.

It's harder than it's ever been but, eventually, I get there. I watch the insides of my eyelids fade from black and red to that cool lavender, and I feel the balm of my mother's gift begin to wash over me from the inside. Passively, I wonder what my family is seeing –

I wonder if I'm glowing, as Cora was, that day by the temple steps.

Or if, perhaps, they can't see anything at all – if the gift is working inside me, and they're just holding their breaths, hoping that I'm not...I'm not slipping away...

I feel it take hold of me, though, like a mother's welcoming arms. I feel cradled within its warmth, and can almost hear her – the Goddess, my mother whispering to me that she will make it right.

– That for all I've given the world, I have earned this, and that she will make it right.

The magic runs slowly through me like rainwater through grass, seeking the roots of me, wanting to refresh but taking its time getting there. But as it seeps through every inch of me, I feel slowly renewed. I feel an ease return to me.

When I open my eyes, everyone is standing around me, staring at me, their faces shocked. I take a deep breath and look around at the four of them. But I ignore them all, focusing only on the bundle of white blankets resting on my mate's arm. The little baby. Who is not crying.

–

"Rafe," I cry, working hard to sit up, a little rill of pain shooting through me. I grimace at it – apparently, whatever the goddess' gift did, it didn't fix me completely – but mostly I ignore it, reaching for my son.

"It's all right, Ella," Sinclair says, quickly kneeling by my side and offering my son to me. Tears slip down my cheeks and I'm surprised to find that I'm suddenly sobbing as I take my baby into my arms for the first time. As I lay my eyes on my child's face.

"Baby," I whisper-cry, my chest heaving as relief floods through me to see that he is fussy and unhappy, but not sad, not hurt – just...adjusting to his new world. He flinches angrily as my tears fall onto his perfect little face, making me laugh. “Sorry, baby,” I murmur, brushing them away. Sorry about that. Mama’s not always like this.”

–

“It’s all right, Ella,” Sinclair whispers quietly behind me. “He’s safe – you’re safe a few tears on his face are not the worst part of his day –”

“Poor little baby,” I sob, a smile breaking out on my face even as I cry, my whole body a mix of emotions happiness, and guilt, and worry, and joy – all mixing together so that I don’t know who or how I am anymore.

Except, I know that I’m a mother. I’m his mother. That, finally, I know is true. “Let’s give them a minute,” Roger whispers. “Would that be all right?”

I hear Hank murmur his medical assent and look up, suddenly, to see the three of them moving away Cora climbing off the bed and beaming at me.

–

“We’ll be back soon,” she whispers to me. “You’re fine, Ella – the gift did its work. You just...take a minute. Say hello to your child.”

I nod, smiling back at her and wiping away my tears. And then, the three of them troop out of the room together. And I’m left alone, with my perfect little family. My mate, my son, and me. Complete.

Chapter 293 – First Night

Ella

As they close the door I look up at Sinclair and smile. I don't have any words, but the expression on his face lets me know that he feels exactly the same. Warm, and happy, and a little panicked that we now have to take care of this little person, but thrilled. Absolutely thrilled to be here, with him.

"You were magnificent, Ella," Sinclair murmurs, tilting my chin up with his finger as he climbs into the bed with me, ignoring the fact that it's kind of...well. That these sheets will have to be destroyed, to say the least. But Sinclair, I know, doesn't care. He just wants to be near me, near us.

"He's magnificent," I say, turning my attention to my baby and leaning forward to press a kiss to his head. I laugh when I see him squirm. "God, I didn't know he'd be so mad. What an angry little guy!" I say, running a finger down his perfectly-soft little cheek as he mewls and gives little cries.

"Go easy on him," Sinclair remarks, a little bit of a joke in his voice. It does me good to hear it. "He's had a hard day."

"You had a hard day," I say to the baby, rolling my eyes at him. "Kid, don't forget who you're talking to here."

Sinclair laughs lightly and kisses my head, beaming down at our child.

A sudden impulse overtakes me then, and I follow it without really thinking very hard. "Here," I say, quickly handing Sinclair the baby and sitting up straight. He frowns at me, confused, as I pull my ruined white nightgown over my head and toss it to the floor. Then, naked, I reach for the baby again.

Sinclair nods in understanding, handing me the baby. I quickly unwrap him from his makeshift swaddling and press his warm little body against my chest, sighing in relief as I tuck his little head beneath my chin. Then, I close my eyes, feeling relief flood me at the feeling of my little boy's body again close to mine.

I feel Sinclair pull blankets up around us so that we're both warm, and then he folds his arms around us as well, making a neat little cocoon so that we can say hello to our baby.

"Hi, Rafe," I say, smiling as I say his name to him, loving the feel of it on my tongue. "It's nice to finally get to see you. Hold you in my arms. I have been waiting...a long time for this.”

Tears start to seep down my cheeks again now, but my emotions pull together a bit. Warmth, happiness, completion. All the good things I've wanted for a long, long time.

We stay like that – still like that, and mostly silent – for I don't know how long. But a great peace fills me, and I can feel through our bond – that Rafe and Sinclair feel the same.

Well, Sinclair mostly. Rafe is still figuring it out and crying, like babies do. But at the root of him, I can feel that he knows he's safe. A little while later, I hear the door creek open and I look to it to see Cora peeking in.

“Can I come in?” she asks quietly. “Can I meet the baby?”

I laugh, sitting up a little, beckoning her forward. “What do you mean – you met him first!” I call, smiling happily at her. Sinclair stands up, heading to the hospital bag that we packed and brought with us. As Cora comes to the bed to take the baby, he hands her a little baby blanket with an R embroidered on it, and then he hands me a simple t-shirt so, you know, I'm not topless when I'm hanging out with my sister.

I shoot my mate a little grin, thankful. He nods like it's the least he can do. As I pull the shirt over my head I watch my sister with her nephew, cooing to him and admiring him, bouncing him a little as she walks with him around the room.

“He's beautiful, Ella,” she says to me, giving me a warm smile. I open my mouth to confirm her observations when the door opens again, Hank and Roger coming into the room. Hank strides over to us, confident, though Roger hesitates a little, looking a little shocked after the night's events. I laugh when I see him, beckoning him to come closer into the room.

“Ella,” Hank says, beaming down at me. “Congratulations.”

“Thank you, Hank!” I reply, smiling up at him.

“Do you want to get cleaned up?” he asks, all business, gesturing towards the bathroom across the way. “If so, Cora and I can strip these sheets, see what we can do about the mattress before you get -back –”

Realizing that this is probably good advice, I start to sit up, but then I look at the baby again.” Shouldn't I wait? Isn't he hungry?”

“He can wait a few more minutes, Ella,” Cora smiles at me. “Take a moment for yourself.”

I work to stand up, grateful to my mother’s gift which probably makes this more possible than it should be, even though I still feel a great deal of pain in the lower half of my body. Still, I wrap some blankets around my waist as I stand and grab the overnight hospital bag, feeling oddly demure about my naked body. I laugh at the ridiculousness of it, considering what these people have seen in the past few hours, but I just shrug and make my way to the bathroom anyway, the blankets following me like a train.

I’m not going to question any of it. I can’t care.

As I go, I see Cora move to hand the baby to Roger so that she can help Hank. Roger puts up his hands in fearful protest, saying something about not knowing how to hold a baby, but she just laughs up into his face and presses the baby into his arms. I smile as I disappear into the bathroom, seeing a little of their old relationship glowing between them at the moment.

As I close the door, I wonder if maybe...

But no. That’s a question for another time. Today is about Rafe.

I rush through my ablutions, eager to get back to my baby, and am surprised at the transformation made in the bedroom when I return to it. The bed looks almost fresh, with clean sheets and new pillows.

“Wow,” I say, making my way to the other side of the bed dressed in a tshirt and pajama pants. Sinclair is there already, turning down the blankets for me. “Looks almost luxurious in here. No one would guess what a horror show it was an hour ago.”

My mate smiles at me and gestures to the bed as Roger comes over, eagerly handing me my child.

“He’s beautiful, Ella,” Roger says, giving me a warm kiss on the cheek before I sit down on the bed. “Thank you for thinking to invite me. I know it was you that remembered, not Dominic.”

I laugh, but don’t deny it, Sinclair looking rueful beside me.

Then, Hank comes over, looking down at the baby and then giving me a smile. “Cora and I discussed some plans while you were cleaning up. We think that, given the disruption tonight, it might be best for you and Sinclair to stay here in the palace. And then, tomorrow, when you’ve rested a bit, we’ll take you in an ambulance over to the hospital to make sure that everything is fine.”

He smiles down at my fussy baby, then, before continuing. "Of course, I don't anticipate any trouble, especially after the use of the Goddess' gift. But it's always good to be safe."

"Yes," Cora says, coming to stand next to me. "Hanks going to stay in the room next door, if you're all right with it, in case anything happens. I'll stay for a few minutes to make sure you're getting started with the feeding, and then I'll go sleep in my own bed."

I nod, agreeing to the plan.

Chapter 294 – Godparents

Ella

“And I am leaving immediately,” Roger adds in, making us all laugh. “Seriously,” he says, “I’m useless until the kid is old enough to throw a ball. Then, it’s all Uncle Roger.” (2

I smile at him, pleased, and take his hand to squeeze it, letting him know how glad I am that he came. His eyes soften as he looks at me, and I know he feels the same.

“All right,” I say, sighing and climbing into the bed. “Sounds like a plan to me.”

Then, everyone goes to their work, Roger and Hank leaving the room and Cora sitting next to me to help me through the first steps of breastfeeding. Sinclair sits close by, clearly interested, but not interfering as Cora shows me how to help the baby latch. I feel a whole new rush of emotion as I feel him begin to suck, as I feel the milk start to flow and feed my baby.

“There,” Cora says softly, and I look at her with tears in my eyes. “See? You’re a natural.”

“Where should he sleep?” I ask, looking around, suddenly desperate. We don’t have a basinet, of course.

Cora just shrugs. “You’ll figure it out. Use your mom instincts. People were having babies for thousands of years before hospitals came to answer these questions for them about how to have their first night.” She grins a little wickedly at Sinclair and me. “I don’t think you two are going to get much sleep anyway, but...you’ll figure it out.”

I laugh a little and return my gaze to my baby, whose eyes are closed as I hold him warm against my chest. “That’s right, baby,” I whisper. “We’re going to figure it out.”

“Okay,” my sister says, standing and giving me a kiss on the forehead. “You’re a marvel, Ella,” she whispers. “Call me if you need anything. I’ll see you at the hospital tomorrow.”

I nod, but don’t look at her, instead staring at my son. My new baby, this much- and long-desired child who is finally, finally here.

I feel the weight of Sinclair’s body on the bed next to me as the door clicks shut behind Cora, but I don’t take my eyes away from Rafe as Sinclair wraps his arms around me.

“Well,” Sinclair sighs, pressing a kiss to my hair. “This is the start of a whole new era. Are you ready for it?”

“Oh,” I say, turning my head to grin up at my mate, eager. “I’m ready for it. I’ve been waiting for this my whole life.”

Cora

I’m exhausted as I push through the doors of the palace but I also feel oddly...complete. It’s more than the general happiness I feel after one of my patients safely delivers a healthy child. Of course, that’s normal, I think, considering that it’s my sister.

But still, there’s something...else in the air. More than just a job well done. I reflect, suddenly, that maybe it’s the knowledge that I have a new little nephew now, to raise and to help discover the world. There’s something wonderful in that.

1/3

I make eye contact with one of the guards standing at the bottom of the steps, wanting to make sure that it’s safe to leave, and begin to take a step when he waves me forward. However, I jump when I hear the voice behind me.

“So,” it says. And I know without turning who it belongs to. I turn, meeting Roger’s eyes. “I hear we’re going to be godparents together.”

“Oh?” I ask, watching him as he walks slowly over to me, his hands sunk deep in his pockets.” Well, that’s not much of a surprise. The two lone siblings of the father and the mother.”

“Yes,” he says, coming to stand close to me. Close enough that I can almost feel his words as breath on my cheek, as well as hear them. “But only one of us is the daughter of a deity. I think Rafe is making out better on his mother’s side.”

I can’t help the little laugh that spills out of me at that, and I look down at my feet. “Well,” I say, a little awkward. I haven’t talked to Roger in weeks, let alone this casually. “I suppose that’s up for debate, considering I’m a human amongst the wolves.”

“Cora,” Roger says, hesitating, and I see his hand reaching for mine. I flinch away.

“What?” I ask, suddenly mad. “What are you even doing here? Weren’t you so eager to get home?”

Roger hesitates and then pulls his hand back, perhaps wanting to pretend like he never reached but for mine. He gives a casual little shrug, looking out at the newly-quiet city. "The troops quelled the riots, but that doesn't mean that everyone went home and no one's lurking in the dark wanting to make mischief." He looks at me then, pausing before he continues. "I wanted to make sure you got home safe."

"Well, I'm fine," I snap, turning away from him and heading down the steps to where my car is parked. "Thanks for the thought, but I'm fine."

"Cora," he calls after me, his voice full of regret.

"What!" I snap again, turning to glare at him. "What, Roger! I don't need you to protect me! I don't need this!"

"You don't need what?" he asks, challenging me. "You don't need help getting home? Or you don't need me?"

"God damn it, Roger," I growl, almost through my teeth, shaking my head at him. "Seriously? Now? You want to dig into this now, after months of silence on the subject?"

"What subject, Cora?" he asks, his voice angry now. "The absolute nothing that is us?"

I open my mouth to throw his words back at him, but he's too quick for me.

"And even if I wanted to," Roger pushes, "how could I? You're always with him."

0

"Oh?" I ask, sarcastic, my eyes going wide. "Is that the great barrier? Have you never heard of this thing called a phone?"

"You wanted to have this conversation over a phone, Cora?" Roger asks, closing the distance between us, his voice hurt now as well as mad. "That's all you think it deserves?"

"What conversation?" I hiss. "Like you said. It's the nothing that is us. There's nothing to say." I grit my teeth and turn then, heading back down the stairs, fast and mad, wanting to get away from him. Certainly not wanting him to see the new dampness on my lower lashes.

"You killed this, Cora," Roger shouts after me, apparently not caring who hears. "You did this. Not me."

Anger flares in me now, so intensely that I halt in my steps. Then, acting on rage more than logic, I spin and throw myself back up the stairs towards him, stopping when I'm so close to him that a single breath would heave my chest against his.

Then, I raise a single hand, place my splayed fingers against his chest, and push.

He stumbles back, I think more out of surprise than any real strength in me. He's a wolf, anyway. And I'm just a human.

"F*ck you, Roger," I whisper, knowing that he can hear me. "You did this. I was in. And you stopped calling me." (2)

"I was busy –" he protests, "trying to fix the nation

I laugh, shaking my head and turning away from him. "Whatever excuse you want to make," I call over my shoulder, still angry but doing a better job now, I think, of hiding it and playing it cool." But don't blame me just because I didn't wait around for you after you ghosted me."

"Cora!" Roger calls, and, well, even if there is pain in his voice I don't care anymore. Or at least, I walk away like I don't.

I give him a finger over my shoulder and call, more casually than I feel, "I'll see you at the christening."

I roll my eyes when I hear his retort.

"Werewolves don't have christenings!"

"Whatever!" I respond, pulling open the driver's door to my car and sitting down heavily in my seat. I don't look in my rearview mirror as I drive away.

I don't want to know if he watches me leave. Don't want to see the expression on his face.

Because if I see that he's as devastated by this conversation as I am, then...

And I am determined. Determined not to go back.

Chapter 295 – Morning in the Palace

Ella I groan when I wake up, but I don't open my eyes. Not yet. I feel like I just closed them ten minutes ago anyway – my poor eyeballs need more rest.

Instead, I take a moment to feel my body from the inside out, to check in with myself and see what hurts, what feels good. I'm surprised to find that I can feel remnants of my mother's gift running through me – what feels like little sparkling tendrils of sunlight, working through my limbs, perhaps healing me. I smile to think of it, smile to think of my mother giving me something that lasts after so many years of her absence.

She is a mother goddess, after all the mother to us all, not just me. But still, as my actual mother, it feels nice to finally have...a piece of her.

I hear my little baby give a little cry and my eyes fly open, searching for him. I sit up in bed, a hand going to my head, and look blearily around..My eyes are drawn instantly – unsurprisingly – to the huge werewolf standing across the room, bouncing a little bundle of blankets in his arm. I smile at my mate's turned back and quickly climb out of bed, moving towards him.

Sinclair hears me coming and quietly turns, our little boy still fussing a little in his arms.

"Has he been like this long?" I ask, yawning, reaching for my child. Sinclair transfers him into my arms and I feel a quick rushing thrill at the feel of my baby returned to me.

"No," Sinclair replies with a smile. "He's been sleeping well – he just started crying now. Do you think he's hungry?"

I shrug and look up at him. "Probably. I know I am."

Together we carry Rafe back to the bed and I climb in, rearranging my top so that Rafe can try to eat. Sinclair quietly watches as I work and I let out a little sigh of relief when Rafe quickly latches and begins to suck. I watch him for a moment, instinctually doing a little check on our bond and receiving a little push of happiness and satisfaction back from him.

Suddenly, I begin to wonder something.

"Do you still have a bond with him?" I ask Sinclair, my eyes going wide.

He nods easily, his eyes still on the child.

"Do you still have one with your father?" I press further, curious. This brings his eyes up to me, frowning.

“Thave....a bond with my father, certainly,” Sinclair responds. “But no – as you grow, the bond between parents and their children fades a bit. Once a child is able to speak and communicate their needs on their own, it’s not necessary anymore.”

My heart breaks a little bit at this news and Sinclair clicks his tongue and reaches out a hand to cup my cheek when he sees tears fill my eyes.

“I don’t want to lose my bond with my child,” I say, my voice trembling. “I can’t bear the thought of that

–

”

“You won’t” my mate assures me, shaking his head. “It just...changes. You and Rafe will always be tied, just in different ways. Besides, when he grows up and meets his own mate, do you really want to be feeling what he’s feeling?” Sinclair raises his eyebrow at me and gives me a smirk.

I narrow my eyes at Sinclair and then down at my little baby. “No mates for you, Rafe,” I scold. You’re mama’s boy, forever. I’m keeping you.’

Sinclair laughs. “You’ll feel differently when he’s a big hulking teenage wolf stinking up your house.”

”

“No,” I murmur, leaning down to kiss my baby’s head. “I’m going to raise him to be a nice clean nerd, so no one likes him, and I get to keep him. No one will be good enough for him anyway.” “All right,” Sinclair murmurs, shifting his position on the bed and coming to lay next to me, closing his eyes. “Whatever you say, trouble.” I smile at him, watching him drift off to sleep as the sunlight starts to brighten at the edges of the curtains. I suspect that he stayed up all night, rocking the baby in his arms, in order to let me sleep. So it’s the least I can do now to let him have his own rest.

–

Rafe falls asleep again soon after he finishes, and my baby pressed warm against my chest – I begin to drift off into a little half-daze as well. About an hour later, though, a little knock comes at the door, waking me. I hesitate and stand, not knowing what to expect, but as I move towards the door I see it creak open a little crack, someone peeking in.

“Oh, Dr. Hank!” I whisper, cheerful, stopping in the middle of the room and waving him forward. Come in!"

He does, giving me a warm smile, and glancing at Sinclair asleep in the bed. "How are you, Ella?" he asks, curious. He comes and looks down at the baby, reaching out a finger to stroke his cheek.

"We're doing well, I think." I reply, heaving a big yawn. "He's been surprisingly peaceful. Is that... normal?"

"It's not abnormal," Hank says with a little shrug. "Perhaps just lucky. The ambulance is outside waiting – are you ready to go to the hospital for your checkup?"

I nod, eager, suddenly feeling more awake. After a quick discussion, I agree to meet Hank at the palace entrance in a few minutes, after I wake Sinclair. He nods and goes out to let the guards and paramedics know the plan. Then, I move over to the wolf sleeping in the King's bed.

"Dominic," I whisper, running a hand lightly through his hair. "Wake up. Time to go."

"No," he murmurs, rolling over with a groan. "I'm going to be the king anyway. This is my bed. I'll just...stay here, until the coronation."

I laugh, and then look around, a little surprised that I hadn't thought of that myself. I knew, of course, that these were the royal chambers, but all I really thought about was that they were the dead Prince's bedrooms...not that they could one day be my own. As I look around, I find that I have mixed feelings about the prospect. While I like the idea of always having access to the room where my son was born...

The idea of living here, in this place? Where there was so much violence?

Of being the queen of a world torn apart?

2/3

Of raising my son, and hopefully my future children, in that world?

I bite my lip, suddenly anxious about it.

"Hey," Sinclair says, and I feel him reach up to softly brush my arm. "All right?"

"Yes," I say, smiling down at him, Rafe's warm little body pressed against me. "Just...mom worries. I think I'll be having a lot of those, for the rest of my life."

"Not if I have anything to say about it," Sinclair murmurs, standing up from the bed and coming close to me, wrapping an arm around my shoulder and pulling me close against his chest. "We're going to get it all sorted, Ella," he whispers, kissing the top of my head.

I close my eyes, giving a little sigh, believing him but...knowing that that promise is going to be a hard fill.

Chapter 296 – First Checkup

Ella

When we climb out of the ambulance, it seems like a whole team of doctors are waiting for us. I smile at them, a little anxious, as they come forward to escort us into the hospital and run us through our battery of checks. At my side I feel Sinclair shift into his Alpha protection mode, looking at everyone warily, glaring at anyone who comes even close to me and the baby.

I smirk when I notice it, glancing up at his stern and dangerous expression, but I don't dissuade him. Honestly, I kind of like it.

We are escorted quickly into a private room where Hank quickly consults with a panel of experts, clearly ordering a ton of tests. As he works, a smile breaks onto my face as I see Cora turn the corner.

"Cora!" I call, waving to her, Rafe fussing in my arms. Sinclair even glares at Cora as she approaches, though she gives him a curious little look that makes him check his expression. "Sorry," he murmurs. "I'm feeling...protective."

"Understandable," she says, smiling and reaching for the baby. "Where is my little boy!"

"Heeere," I sing, carefully handling over the little bundle to his auntie. We dressed him, before we left, in the little cream sleep sack that we had packed in the hospital bag.

"Cutieeee," Cora coos, holding the baby close and peering down at his little face. She beams at him for a moment before looking up at me. "First night go okay?"

I tell her the details of our first night while Sinclair stands firmly at my side, letting me communicate everything. As I speak, Hank and his team begin to break up, preparing the various checks and treatments that I'll be receiving today. Then, he comes over to us.

"Okay, Ella," he says, giving me a smile. "The plan is that me and my team are going to ensure that you're perfectly healthy. And Cora and hers are going to make sure that Rafe is in top shape. It's going to take awhile but," he glances up at Sinclair quickly and shrugs, "I thought it best to check everything, rather than skimp."

"Damn right, you'll check everything," Sinclair growls, crossing his arms over his chest.

I look up at him and put a hand on his arm. "You need to cool it, Dom," I murmur, giving him a little smile. He sighs and nods, making me laugh. I can tell that he's on edge, fighting his new dad instinct to do everything he can – absolutely everything to protect his vulnerable mate and newborn child.

—

“It’s all right,” Hank says, smiling between us. “You’re in good hands.” Then, he nods at Cora, pausing a moment to place a warm hand on her back between her shoulder blades. I blink, a little surprised, when she simply nods and flinches away from his touch a little bit..

What’s this? I think to myself, a little happiness building in my stomach. But then I chide myself for being happy that there might be discord in my sister’s new relationship. You’re team Cora, I remind myself. Team Cora, whatever that means for her. That’s what side you’re on.

But inside of me, my little wolf turns in a smug little circle, nudging me to let me know that she, at least, knows that I’m lying to myself. But I give her a little nudge in return and she curls up, content to see where this goes.

A few hours later, I’m dozing quietly in a hospital bed, waiting for test results. Rafe is away in the newborn room next door with other babies who were born at the hospital yesterday and today, apparently to be monitored and to give me some time to rest, but I find that I’m restless without him near me. Still, my exhausted body takes advantage of the quiet and I do find myself dozing in and out of sleep.

Sinclair, apparently, has no such qualms about the baby being out of the room, and snores lightly next to me.

I’m instantly awake, though, when the door opens and Dr. Hank comes back into the room. “Sorry,” he says, giving me a little grimace. “I didn’t mean to wake you when you probably need the sleep.

“No,” I sigh, tucking my hair behind my ears as I hear Sinclair stop snoring next to me and sit up in his chair. “It’s all right – I didn’t sleep well without the baby nearby anyway.” I shrug. “Mom stuff.”

“Wolf stuff, too,” Hank murmurs, coming close to the bed. “It’s very interesting – studies have shown that wolf mothers do indeed sleep better if they have physical contact with their child.” He glances between my mate and me. “You two may want to consider systems of co-sleeping in a family bed.”

I beam at the idea, turning to Sinclair to see what he thinks, but he just blinks blearily at me. “Ella,” he says, “you spent hundreds of dollars on bassinets – now you want to put the baby in the bed with us?”

“In the nest!” I exclaim, excited, clutching my hands under my chin with glee. Sinclair murmurs something about us being wolves, not birds, but I ignore him, turning my attention back to Hank. So, am I okay? Can I go home?"

He lifts a clipboard from the bottom of my bed, reading through some of the doctor reports there, and then nods happily to me. "I'm happy to report that you're doing beautifully, Ella. Strikingly healthy – perhaps more than can be expected, after a traumatic birth experience. But perhaps that can be attributed to...your gift? Or however that works."

I nod, understanding and accepting the mystery for what it is.

"If only all mothers had access to such a gift," Hank says, smiling at me warmly. "That would be quite a boon, wouldn't it?"

I nod, agreeing heartily, but then I freeze, suddenly struck with an idea...

But I'm interrupted by the door opening again, a nurse coming into the room with the baby.

I give a little cry of happiness when I see my child and open my arms towards the nurse, eager to hold him again.

"He's hungry," she says, smiling at me. I thank her and bring my child close to my chest, preparing to feed him again. Hank, a little awkward, clears his throat and turns away from me to give me privacy.

"So, if Cora gives you the okay to take him," Hank continues, looking up at the ceiling, "then you're free to go. And I'll see you in a couple of weeks!" With that, he turns towards the door, ready again to leave without acknowledging that he's been with us again through one of the scariest and most traumatic moments of my life, that he's become an important person to me, and that he's dating my sister.

"Hank," I call to him before he can leave. He turns back to me, curious. I take a moment to look him clearly in the eyes, hoping he can see the depth of my warm feelings to him. "Thank you, Hank," I say, sincere.

He surprises me, then, by placing a hand to his heart and giving me a tiny little bow, the sort of genuflection that one would give to...well, to a queen. "It was my pleasure," he murmurs, true warmth in his voice. Sinclair and I both smile at him in return and he turns to leave again.

But, once more, I call him back.

“Hank?”

He pauses again at the door, turning towards me. “What, precisely,” I ask carefully, “are your intentions with my sister?”

Chapter 297 – Home with Baby

Ella,

I hear Sinclair sigh heavily next to me, murmuring “Ella...”

But I ignore him, my eyes fasted on Hank, who blushes a deep red at the door and looks down at his shoes. I don't say a word, though, or make this any easier on him. Instead, I wait patiently for an answer. “Cora is,” he murmurs, awkward, “very special to me...”

“I would imagine so,” I reply, my voice harder than I think I expected it to be. “She's a very special person.”

Hank sighs and raises his eyes seriously to mine. I hold his gaze steadily.

“I'm very serious about Cora,” he says evenly. “I want to build a life with her. But we are moving...slowly. We both want to make sure that this is right.”

My heart warms when I hear him say that he wants to build a life with her, but still – what does that mean? I hold my baby closer to me and shift in my seat. “And do you want to have children?”

“Ella!” Sinclair bursts in, his voice angry, a hand on my arm. “What!” I cry, turning to him with a frown. “It's a legitimate question!”

“It's none of your business!” He hisses back to me, his eyes wide and appalled.

—

my sister's business is

My frown deepens as I open my mouth to object to my mate business, after all – but Hank clears his throat, bringing my attention back to him.

“If there's nothing else,” he says, his eyes flicking between Sinclair and I now, clearly hoping that my questioning is at an end. I sigh, nodding, as Sinclair speaks.

“Thank you, doctor,” he says with finality, letting Sinclair know he's free from my interrogation. “We'll look forward to seeing you soon.” (1

I scowl as Hank leaves the room, my eyes on my baby. “Ella,” Sinclair says slowly, admonishing. I look into his eyes, still mad.

“We need to know, Sinclair. She’s not with Roger because she thinks he wants children they can’t have. If Hank also isn’t on the same page with her about kids, then what’s the point?”

Sinclair’s eyes go up in surprise as he processes this information. “And what’s Cora’s page about kids?” he asks. “Does she want them?”

“Does Roger?” I ask, still bristling that he didn’t let me get information that I very much wanted.

He frowns a little, staring into space and considering it. “Actually, I don’t know…” He brings his eyes back to me, though. “Either way, that’s a conversation between Cora and Roger. Or Cora and Hank. Or…whoever.”

“And me,” I murmur, settling back onto the pillows. “If they’re all too stupid enough to not talk to each other about it, then I am going to talk about it.”

“Trouble is as trouble does,” Sinclair sighs, leaning back on the chair. “I guess I shouldn’t have expected any different.”

“Damn straight,” I murmur in response, smiling down at my baby. Then, I kiss him on his little head. “Don’t worry, baby,” I whisper to him. “I’ll teach you my troublesome ways. And then we’ll torture daddy together.”

Sinclair huffs a little laugh in his chair, but doesn’t bother to counter me. He knows it would be a waste of breath.

Night has fallen by the time we finally get home, all three of us exhausted by the activities of the day. But Cora finally gave us the go-ahead when Rafe’s final set of tests came back clean and we happily headed out.

When we cross the threshold into our home, I gasp a little when I see the variety of gift baskets and flowers waiting for us. “Oh,” I say, fascinated, moving forward to look at them all. Then I look up at my mate. “Did you do all this?” I ask, my eyes wide.

“No,” he says, his eyebrows also raised in interest as he checks some tags on a few of them. “ They look to be presents from friends and well-wishers. See?” He points to one filled with hand-drawn cards set neatly around a fluffy teddy bear. “This one’s from James and Isabel…”

“Oh,” I say, reaching for it, my eyes suddenly filled with sharp tears. “Oh, I miss them…” I bite my lip against the sudden rush of feelings, overwhelmed by all the love in the room when I’ve been so distracted – I haven’t even kept up with everyone as well as I should have

“No no,” Sinclair says quickly, taking me by the shoulders and moving the baby and I towards the stairs. “We’re way too tired for this – if you get into all these cards now, you’ll cry yourself to death –”

“But the teddy bear!” I cry, looking over my shoulder at it as Sinclair guides me up the stairs, a steady hand on my back. “Rafe’s first teddy – we have to get it!”

“It will be there in the morning,” Sinclair says, steady, yawning. “Now? Bed.”

“Okay,” I sigh, nodding to his wisdom and allowing myself to be shepherded upstairs. When we reach the door to our bedroom, though, my eyes fill with tears again as I look up at my mate.

“Baby,” he murmurs, taking my chin between his fingers, exhausted but wanting to be there for me. “What is it this time? What’s wrong?”

“Nothing,” I say, my voice trembling a little, looking between him and the baby. “Just... we’re bringing him home for the first time, Dominic. Putting him to sleep in his own little bed. It’s just...” I shrug, not really knowing how to put all of my emotions into words. “It’s big.”

Sinclair rests his head against mine, speaking to my soul as much as mind as he confirms this. I know, he says, simply. And so I rest my body against him – against the warm, steady bulk of him, grateful – again – to have a mate who understands me so completely. Who doesn’t think I’m crazy or overwrought.

Who understands, really, that this is all a dream to me. And that every moment of it – even one as simple as this is a miracle.

–

“Come on, darling,” he says, after a moment, pulling me further into the room. “Let’s get him settled.”

And so we do. We bring Rafe into our room, and we change him into his tiny sleeping clothes, and we feed him, and tuck him away into the rolling bassinet that I pull close to my side of the bed. And then we each take a shower, and change into soft clothes, and curl up into bed ourselves, one of us always with an eye on our precious, adorable, wonderful little boy.

Sinclair lays behind me, my body pressed tight against his. He is propped up on his arm as he looks over me and into the bassinet at my side. I, too, look down at the sleeping baby.

"I think he's like, really cute," I whisper, considering him carefully. Sinclair laughs lightly, careful not to wake him. "Of course he is."

"No," I say, not taking my eyes from my son. "Like, really cute. Like way cuter than most babies. And that's not just me being his mom – I think he's objectively...really cute."

"He takes after his mother," Sinclair says, laughing lightly and letting his head fall down onto the pillow, closing his eyes. I snuggle down next to him, still looking at my sleeping son.

"Yes, after me," I murmur, pleased and a little teasing.

"So he's cute," Sinclair whispers. "And he'll be trouble."

"No," I say, feeling myself drift off to sleep. "He'll be perfect." "We'll just see about that," Sinclair murmurs, his breathing already deepening as he drifts off.

Fifteen minutes later, Rafe chooses a side. And, unfortunately for me, he chooses trouble. And he cries.

All. Night. Long.

Chapter 298 – On Mom Time Now

For the next two weeks, Sinclair and I don't get much sleep. Instead, our precious. Darling. Wonderful. Amazing. Bundle. Of. Joy...tortures us until we're basically mindless drones, trying to figure out what he wants and giving it to him as soon as possible.

"Oh my god," I say to Sinclair one night at three in the morning, desperate with anxiety and lack of sleep. I walk around the room with Rafe pressed close to my chest, trying to comfort him. "He's been fed, changed, burped... he's probably just sleepy! But he's keeping himself up with all this noise he's making!"

"It will be all right," says my ever-patient mate, holding out his arms. I passed the baby to him and... Rafe instantly quiets.

And this is the moment when I simultaneously figured out the best and the worst thing in my life: that my mate is a baby whisperer, and that my child loves his dad more than he loves me.

Of course, I'm so exhausted at this point that I don't really care that Rafe quiets in Sinclair's arms and not mine. I'm just glad that he's quiet. "Okay," I whisper, slowly backing away, as if from a live grenade. "You just hold him...just like that..."

"Ella," Sinclair says, giving me a tiny scowl. "Don't be ridiculous – it's not as if –" but he takes one step towards me and Rafe begins to cry. I freeze like a deer in the headlights. So does Sinclair. Slowly, he takes a step backwards. Rafe quiets.

"Right there, Dominic," I whisper, backing away towards the bed. "Just stand there for... two, three hours..." I murmur as I climb into my messy nest, "and I'll see you both... later..."

"This is ridiculous, Ella," Sinclair half-whispers to me, but he doesn't move. I barely hear him as I almost immediately fall asleep. We're both completely at Rafe's mercy. He's the Alpha now.

When I wake up a few hours later, the sun is peeking into the room and I raise myself on my elbows, looking around. I see that Sinclair made his way to the rocking chair in the corner of the room and he's sleeping there now, the baby laid flat in a bassinet pulled close. I smile to see that Sinclair rests a large hand on the edge the basket, though, ready to respond if Rafe makes a move or a sound.

–

I laugh a little to myself and shake my head, wondering at the power this little baby has over us. I pull myself out of bed, though, and go to look at both of them my gigantic mate, my tiny baby, next to each other. They look so alike – their coloring, some of their features, the and yet so incredibly different. My heart wrenches with love to see them there. same

–

I stretch my arms over my head and decide to let them sleep, turning to quickly and silently pad out of the room and go down to the kitchen.

This, oddly enough, has become where I spent most of my time now because I am constantly – constantly – hungry. I had assumed that my hunger would abate after I gave birth and was no longer growing a twelve pound baby within a five-month span, but I am still voracious. I head straight to the pantry, reaching for the big box of shredded wheat as well as a king-sized candy bar. I peel the latter open as I head to the counter and pour the former into a bowl.

Slowly munching on the candy, I wonder if I'm going to be hungry like this for the duration of the time that I'm breastfeeding Rafe. I look down at myself, considering that I'm relatively lucky – my body has bounced back fast, at least in terms of health, probably because of my wolf biology and my mother's gift. My figure still hasn't returned to what it was before I was pregnant – I don't care about that but health-wise, I feel as fit as I've ever been.

Smiling to myself, I say a little prayer of thanks and go to grab the milk out of the fridge.

"Chocolate?" someone asks, and I give a little shriek, jumping in the air and spinning around – looking everywhere for the intruder. I'm still panting and on edge when my eyes land on Roger, grinning at me from the doorway. "Chocolate for breakfast? What kind of role model are you being for your child, Ella?" he scolds jokingly.

"First of all," I say, brandishing my candy bar at him, "I'm eating this for him, because he demands it. And also, I'm also eating shredded wheat!" I say, gesturing towards my cereal bowl. "So, healthy!"

Roger laughs and comes forward to give me a hug, which I warmly return. "Eat whatever you want, Ella. Just don't bankrupt my brother to the candy company."

"No promises," I return, returning to the fridge to grab the milk and making my way back to the bowl. "Why are you here so early?" I ask, curious. "We don't need you here until nine."

Roger raises his eyebrows at me and taps his watch. My eyes go wide with disbelief and I glance towards the stove, which reads 9:08. "Oh my god!" I say, looking back at my brother-in-law. "I can't believe it! We're so late!"

He just shrugs and leans against the counter. "It's all right, you're on mom time. It's understandable."

"No, it's not!" I say, tossing the milk back in the fridge without pouring it and bolting for the stairs, "If we miss our appointment at the temple, we'll never get another one! And then the moon ceremony won't happen for another month and everything will be ruined!"

Roger follows to watch me sprint up the stairs, calling after me. "I think they'll make an exception for you, Ella! For the woman who ended the war!"

"No excuses for being rude!" I call over my shoulder, pushing through the door into my room. "Sinclair, quick! We overslept!"

An hour and twenty-two minutes later, we arrive at our appointment at the temple, just barely on time. Cora is there already, waiting anxiously on the steps. She storms over to me the moment we step out of the car.

"Ella!" my sister hisses. "You're late! You left me here all alone, with all the wolves!"

I screw up my face in confusion as I give her a little glare. "We're not late yet," I huff, reaching into the car to unhook the baby's car seat. "And since when do you care about being alone with wolves? You're alone with wolves all the time."

"Yeah, you, and Sinclair, and Rafe," she murmurs, glancing awkwardly over her shoulder at the temple. "Not...strangers."

I look at her carefully as I straighten, Rafe's car seat handle looped over the crook of my arm. He is, thankfully, quiet and calm. "I didn't know you were uncomfortable, Cora," I say softly. "I'm sorry."

"It's fine," she says, rolling her eyes. "I just...don't like being late."

I nod, but study her a little bit. Only since after the war has Cora felt this way about being a human amongst wolves. Did her breakup – or was it even a breakup? – mess with her mind this much? I'm about to ask, but unfortunately the man in question comes around the car at just that moment.

"Hello, Cora," Roger says softly, carefully. "It's nice to see you."

Cora doesn't say anything, just looks at him with a little disdain. I raise my eyebrows and look between them. I know that they haven't seen each other since Rafe's birth – but they had been fine with each other in the room that night. What did I miss?

Chapter 299 – Godparent Duties

“Welcome,” a priestess says, coming out of the temple and giving us a big smile. I return her smile eagerly, walking up the stairs carrying the car seat and introducing our party. She knows who we are, of course – nobody could mistake Sinclair for anyone else anymore, not with his face all over the media every day and his coronation imminent.

But as she nods a hello to all of us and walks us into the temple itself, I do wonder if she knows ...that she’s running a temple dedicated to my mom. I mean, it’s not precisely public knowledge, but I do wonder how much she suspects.

Cora walks next to me, looking around the beautiful open space of the temple, her eyes inevitably drawn to the gorgeous, giant gold mosaic of the Goddess built into the wall behind her altar. After she looks at the image for a moment, she turns to me and smirks a little.

I can’t help the giggle that escapes my lips and I cover my mouth in a hurry. The image looks nothing like our mom. But, I guess it doesn’t matter, and it certainly won’t do any good to tell them they’ve got it all wrong.

The priestess looks at us curiously, but I shake my head in apology, silently asking her forgiveness. She just gives us a warm smile and leads us to a set of chairs set next to a calm reflecting pool in one corner of the room.

“So,” she says, smiling at the four of us as we seat ourselves and peering down at the baby. We’re here to plan little Rafe’s dedication to the goddess, yes?”

I quirk my head to the side, curious. “I thought it was a moon baptism?”

She laughs a little and gives me a smile. “Yes, a more colloquial term, I think, but not inaccurate. Though, of course, he will not be sprinkled with any holy water as in a Christian baptism. Many of the other traditions, though, are similar.’

The priestess looks to Roger and Cora now. “You two, I assume, are being presented as godparents?” Roger nods solemnly but Cora looks anxious. I reach out and take her hand.

The priestess seems to notice Cora’s unease and gives her a smile. “That’s all right – it’s not a hard job, even though you two will have more to do than the parents. On the evening of the full moon, the two of you will take the child into the woods by yourselves –”

“The woods? By ourselves?” Cora asks, a little aghast. “Yes,” the priestess says, blinking at her in surprise. “Did no one tell you?”

“No,” she huffs, looking at me and Sinclair with wide eyes. “I thought we had to go to a church, hold him over a...baptismal font. Or whatever.”

The priestess shakes her head slowly, hesitant now at Cora’s apparent protest. “No, we plan the event here at the temple, but the actual ceremony occurs in the open air. Under the light of the first full moon after the child’s birth.”

—

“What’s the problem, Cora?” I ask, confused but working to be gentle. “You’re an OBGYN – babies are your thing you’ll be totally fine. “No, it’s fine,” Cora says, looking down at her hands, clearly flustered. “I just...didn’t know.”

The priestess looks to me, still hesitant, but I smile at her encouragingly and nod. Then, she explains the details of the rest of the process to us, answering our questions and making sure that we all know our roles. It’s a new experience for me, of course – I myself was not dedicated to the goddess under the light of the full moon. But Sinclair and Roger were, and it’s an important ceremony to usher my baby into his culture. I have to admit, I’m excited for it.

As I look at Cora, though, I’m shocked to see that she’s clearly uncomfortable. I frown, confused and a little frustrated. This was in no way out of her comfort zone, as far as I knew – all she had to do was carry a baby into the woods a little distance. What the hell was going on?

When the priestess finishes explaining the details, she goes over some paperwork with Sinclair and I take the opportunity to talk to Cora alone.

“Cora,” I say casually, unbuckling Rafe from his carrier and lifting him into my arms. “Will you come help me? I want to feed him before the ride home.”

“Sure,” she says, unquestioning. Together, we head to the other side of the temple, to a quiet little alcove with a stone bench. “What is going on with you?” I ask, spinning on her with a little frown when we’re finally alone.

“Wha-” she says, blinking at me, her mouth falling open. “I thought we were coming to feed the baby –

“Oh he’s not hungry,” I say, waving a hand to dismiss her concern. “I just said that to get you over here. But seriously – what’s wrong?”

“Nothing,” she murmurs, uncomfortable, wrapping her arms around herself awkwardly.

“Seriously?” I huff, swatting at her, getting frustrated. “Cora – I can read you like a book.

I know you're upset. Just tell me!"

"Ella," she sighs, looking me in the eye. "I don't think you're realizing how weird this can all be for me. I mean, the world has changed now. It was different, when werewolves were a secret and I was one human who knew. Now everyone knows, and there's a huge rift between our two worlds! And I know that you're a wolf now, and I think that's great but..."

She shrugs and looks awkwardly around the temple. "But I'm a human," she continues, hesitant. "And it's...weird. You should hear the way that humans talk about the wolves, and the way they look at me when I say that I...I work with wolves, and I am an OBGYN for wolf kind as well as humans." She shrugs and my heart sinks to hear the pain in her voice. "They look at me like I'm a traitor, Ella. Some of the human women refuse to be seen by me because I work with wolves too."

"Oh, Cora," I murmur, taking a step closer to her and wrapping her in a one-armed hug, the baby between us. "You know that we don't feel that way, right? You are our family –"

"I know, Ella," she says, nodding, but still looking at the floor. "But even in this family – I know that you feel that I'm not different but," she hesitates and then glances over at Sinclair and Roger. "I'm not sure that's true of everyone."

I sigh, following her gaze across the room and focusing on Roger. He, I know, is the source of it all. What on earth happened between them?

"Has he said something to you, Cora?" I ask quietly, dying to know, but also really, really wanting to help her, to fix this rift between them. Even if they're never...what they were. It's important to me that they both feel comfortable around each other, for the baby's sake.

Cora bites her lip and I can tell that she doesn't really want to share. "Not really, Ella," she says, thinking through it herself. "It's less about what he said and more about how he acted. Just...when we came home, and there were more humans around, it just became abundantly clear that...we're from different worlds. And it's not just me who noticed it. He feels weird about it too."

Chapter 300 – A Brotherhood of Wolves

Sinclair

I move quickly through the paperwork that the priestess gives us, half of my attention on Ella and Cora across the room. Rafe isn't hungry yet I know this for sure, and I know that Ella knows too. He ate on the way here, in the car. So, what the hell is she up to?

I hand the paperwork back to the priestess, who gives us a warm smile and tells me she's looking forward to seeing us on the night of the full moon. Roger and I murmur our polite goodbyes and then we both turn our attention back to the sisters.

"What's going on over there," Roger asks, watching them with his arms crossed. I take a moment to look him over. His body is tense, his brow low with worry. "Why don't you tell me?" I say quietly, my voice low and a little frustrated.

My brother snaps his head back to me, frowning. "What?" "Come on, Roger," I respond, shaking my head. "Don't pretend they're not talking about you."

"Me?!" he says, aghast. "What did I do?" But towards the end of his sentence, his eyes flick to the floor. Guilty.

"What's even going on with you two?" I ask, sighing, not really wanting to have the conversation but feeling pressed to it now if it's disrupting our plans for our child's dedication. It's an important day – I want it to go smoothly, undisturbed by this drama.

"That's Ella," Roger murmurs, shaking his head, "speaking through you. You don't actually care what's going on between us."

"I do care," I return, a little offended. "I care, Roger. But yeah...Ella has brought this... issue to my attention. More than I would have noticed otherwise. She calls you two..." I sigh, a little embarrassed, "Codger."

"What?" he asks, confused, spinning to me. "What's Codger?"

"Your couple name," I say, sighing and pressing the bridge of my nose between my thumb and forefinger. "A mix between Cora and Rodger."

"Codger?!"

"It was that or Rora."

"Oh my god," he murmurs, putting his forehead in his hand and taking a deep breath. "You guys talk about it enough that it has a nickname?"

“She’s upset with you, Roger,” I explain, looking again at my beautiful, sweet mate, who wants the best for both of them. “I think Cora is upset. And I thought it was just Ella being Ella until...today. When I see that Cora really is upset. So, did you do something to her?”

My brother sighs again and runs his hand down his face so that it’s covering his mouth as he, too, looks across the room at this incredible pair of sisters. “I stopped calling her. I regret it, Dominic – I...” he sighs, as if having trouble putting it into words. “But it’s not easy, with her being a human. I thought it would be simpler, but it’s...”

I nod, understanding, and put a steady hand on his back, letting him know that I’m here. “You’ll figure it out,” I say, hoping it’s the right thing. He nods quietly, and I can tell that he hopes I’m right.

“But Rodger,” I say carefully. He looks up at me, a little exhausted but ready to listen. “If you mess up this ceremony...”

He opens his mouth to protest, but I hold up a hand. He shuts his mouth, letting me finish. “If you mess up this ceremony, Ella is going to kill both of us. Just rip us to shreds.”

A little laugh bursts from my brother and he shakes his head, looking over at her. “How is that even a threat?” he breathes, wondering. “She’s so...tiny.”

“Tiny,” I agree, “but fierce. And she’s got mom strength now. So let’s just...not cross her. And do our best to make Cora feel welcome, because if Cora’s not happy then Ella’s not happy, and if Ella’s not happy...”

Roger nods slowly, lifting his hand into the air and making an explosion sound with his mouth, simultaneously opening his hand like a bomb.

“Exactly,” I respond, nodding.

We’re silent for a moment, looking over at the girls, each thinking our private thoughts. But after a moment, Roger asks a question of his own.

“Wait,” he says, frowning at me. I start out of my reverie, looking at him. “If we’re Codger,” he muses, “...what are you?”

“Nothing,” I respond, firm, looking away. “We don’t need a couple name. We’re just Dominic and Ella.”

“Della,” he supplies. I glare at him.

“Elomonic?”

My glare turns into a snarl.

“Sinclella!” he says, starting to laugh. I just give him a shove, unable to help the smile that pulls at my lips.

“Shut up,” I murmur.

“Wait, no, it has to be Éclair!”

“Oh my god,” I breathe, defeated. “Don’t say that to her she’ll love it, she’ll never let it go

“I’m going to tell her right now —

Roger starts across the room, but I grab his arm, laughing.

“I swear to god, Roger, one word and I’m throwing you in the pool

Ella

I frown at my sister, confused and wanting to make it all better, and then I sigh when I realize that I can’t. “I guess I thought mom’s gift fixed it all,” I murmur, “after you gave it to the world. It was enough, I guess, to end the war to ask wolves and humans alike to stop fighting. But not enough to squash all of the fears and prejudices.”

Cora nods, agreeing, looking at me again and working hard to give me a little smile. “I want to be a part of your life, Ella,” she says, looking down at the baby and smiling. “And, of course, of baby Rafe’s. But if you could please try to remember that... I’m not as much a part of your world as you think I am, then that would be helpful.”

“You are a part of my world, Cora,” I insist, taking her hand and looking at her seriously. “You’re my flesh and blood, and you’ve always been my sister, even if we didn’t know about the biological part for a long time. There’s no part of you that’s not part of my world, okay?”

She nods, giving me a little smile. “But also,” I continue, still holding her gaze. “I hear you. And I’ll try harder. “Thanks, Ella,” she says, her voice soft.

I pull my sister close again for a hug, the baby fussing between us. We laugh, looking down at him, and then I nod towards the group, asking her if she wants to go back. Cora nods and, taking my hand, we return again to the wolves waiting for us.

Along the way, I admit that I’m torn. Because as much as I’m glad that my sister told me what's wrong, I admit that I feel guilty. Guilty that she feels different at all, and guilty that...

Well, that I got so distracted in the pregnancy and the birth of my son. That I didn't even realize that my sister felt that way. That I didn't even realize that things were this bad, between the humans and the wolves.

Sinclair and Roger are laughing and roughhousing a little, by the looks of it, as we make our way over to them. I can't help smiling at this I like to see my mate happy and at peace. He catches my serious look, though, as I come more clearly into sight. He stops, then, looking curiously at me, quirking his head to the side. I just give him a little nod, letting him know all Because the two of us? The leaders of these people?

We have work to do. "Hey, Ella," Roger says, grinning wickedly at me. "Are you hungry, do you want some breakfast? Maybe some eclairs?"

Sinclair snaps his head to him. "You're dead." "Actually," I say, my eyebrows going up. "Pastries sound great."

Chapter 301 – Old Friends Home Again

Ella

The morning of the moon ceremony finds me, unsurprisingly, in the kitchen. Eating. Rafe is with me this time, giggling happily as I dance happily around the room with him, singing about how delicious carrots are as I pour some baby carrots out from their bag onto a plate and begin to munch on them.

I'm just getting to the part of the song which I'm making up as I go along about how they're good for your vision and help you make friends with rabbits when I hear an odd, familiar sound out in the hall.

I gasp, spinning towards the door as the mechanical hum grows louder, and I'm nearly run over when Henry wheels into the room.

"Henry!" I gasp, tears instantly lining my eyes, stumbling in my hurry to hug him close, almost falling into his lap.

"Steady, girl!" Henry laughs, putting out his hands to catch me and help me find my feet, laughing a little. He beams up at me and I'm laughing too, shaking my head at myself as I lean down to give him a proper hug and then a kiss on both cheeks.

"We missed you so much!" I gush, my heart in my throat as I pull away. "I'm so glad you're home – and in time! A miracle!"

"Certainly took some doing," he says, raising his eyebrows at me. "I rode in a cargo plane to get here – this little man had better impress." He shifts his gaze, then, to the baby in my arms.

"Oh!" I say, standing up straight and remembering my manners. "Henry, may I please have the pleasure of introducing you to your grandchild?"

"Nothing would give me more joy," he replies, his own eyes wet now. I lean down to place Rafe in his grandfather's arms for the first time, trying hard not to be overwhelmed by the beauty of the moment. "This is Rafe Henry Sinclair," I say quietly, watching his face.

"Rafe Henry," Henry says, looking up at me, touched, and then down at the baby. "He's a beauty, Ella. Wonderful." He shakes his head, staring at my son. Though I'm overwhelmed by the moment, part of me reflects that I'm glad Henry met Rafe while the baby is in a good mood. He still spends most of his time crying.

I hear footsteps on the stairs and look towards the door, smiling when I see Sinclair hurry through it.

“Dad!” he booms, a huge smile on his face. I step back as Henry turns his chair, raising one arm towards his son, the baby still held in the other. Sinclair bends down low to give his father a long, warm hug and I bite my lip to see it. Sinclair never admitted it, but he worried about his father, and missed him. He’s glad, I know, to have him back home, nearby.

The two release each other and the kitchen is filled with happy noise for the next few minutes as we all buzz around each other, trying to do nice things for each other and make sure everyone’s comfortable. I laugh after a minute, raising my hands and calling for silence.

“Okay!” I declare. “You two -” I say, pointing between Henry and Sinclair, “ go into the living room, take the baby, and relax. I’ll bring in coffee in a moment. Then we’ll catch up. All right?”

The two of them nod and comply, heading out of the room. A few minutes later I follow them carrying a silver tray heaped with coffee and food. My stomach rumbles as I look down at it all and I roll my eyes at myself. How can I still be hungry?

“He really is wonderful, Ella,” Henry says fondly, looking down at his grandchild when I enter the room.

“Yes, I’m easily persuaded of that,” I say casually, putting the tray down on the coffee table and sitting close next to Sinclair. “Would you like me to take him?”

“No,” Henry says quickly, looking up at me. “I mean if it’s all the same to you, I’ll hold him a little longer.” I nod eagerly, touched deeply to see the bond forming between them already.

“He looks like you,” Henry says, smiling at my mate. “You, too, were a little bowling ball when you were born. With the same shock of black hair.”

I bite my lip, pleased to hear these sorts of details that Sinclair wouldn’t know. Do you have pictures?” I ask, curious. Henry nods eagerly and promises to show them to me next time I’m over.

We spend a pleasant half hour catching up, with Henry telling us all about the harrows of his travel back to us, how much he wanted to get here in time for the ceremony. He also catches us up on the lives of our friends who we unfortunately had to left behind, and surprises us by telling us that Isabel, James, and Sadie came along with him so that they, too, could attend.

“Really?” I gasp, excited.

“Oh no,” Henry says, looking between us. “It wasn’t a secret, was it?” “Only until we knew for sure,” Sinclair says, smiling at me. “I didn’t want you to be disappointed if they couldn’t make it.”

“It’s wonderful,” I say, my eyes filling with tears again at the thought of seeing my friends. “Thank you.”

Sinclair murmurs “of course” and kisses my hair, but I also see him glance at the door. He’s torn, I know, between wanting to spend time with his dad and the duties I know are pressing on him to finish up before the ceremony tonight.

“Go,” I say, giving him a nudge and a smile. “We’re perfectly all right here on our own.” “Are you sure?” he asks, glancing at me first and then his father.

“Go!” His father says, waving his hand at his son. Then he smiles and pats the arm chair next to him. “You come sit by me, Ella.”

Grinning, I do as he says as Sinclair heads out of the room, a mix of regret and relief on his face. He wants to be here, I know but...well, heavy is the crown. “I’m so glad you’re here,” I say, smiling widely at Henry.

“Well, it’s a very important event,” Henry says seriously, nodding to me. “I know that you didn’t have a dedication, and that you haven’t been to one, but they are... they’re quite special, Ella. I wouldn’t miss it for the world.”

“Good,” I murmur, smiling down at my son. “I want everyone here who loves him.” “It feels like yesterday that Dominic and Roger were dedicated,” Henry muses, likewise looking at my boy and shaking his head. “I can’t believe it’s already time for a new generation.”

“Do you remember it well?” I ask, hoping that he’ll tell me more about it. “Oh yes,” Henry says, his eyes raised. “As well as the experience of being a godfather myself.”

“Godfather,” I consider, turning my head to the side. “Why not Goddessfather?” He laughs a little, shrugging. “Who knows, Ella. Simplicity or misogyny, take your pick.” I laugh with him, letting the question pass. He’s right – it doesn’t matter.

“So, you’re a godfather as well?” I prompt. Henry nods sagely. “Yes. It’s very special – very intimate. When you’re in the forest alone with the child you are” he pauses, considering how to phrase it. “You’re treated to some insights into the child’s spirit, their future. It’s quite unique. In exchange for the dedication, the goddess gives a... prophecy of sorts.”

My eyes go wide and I look down at my little boy, fascinated. "Really?" I breathe. "We get to learn about Rafe's future tonight?"

Chapter 302 – Moonlight Baptism

“Well,” Henry answers, hesitating. “Cora and Roger will see the prophecy.” My face falls a little when I realize the implications of this. “Really? Unfair,” I declare, pouting. Henry laughs a little along with me. “It will bring them closer to him, give them a bond.”

“Well,” I sigh, “I want them to have that. What sort of things do you learn, though? Do you share them with the parents?”

“If you choose,” Henry shrugs. “I always did. And Sinclair and Roger’s godparents shared with me, for which I was grateful.”

“What did they tell you?” I ask, curious. “That Sinclair would be a great leader of men,” Henry says, looking down at the baby again, clearly remembering his baby who looked so like this one. That was no surprise. But Roger, that was...”

I pause, curious, suddenly fascinated. “What did they say?” He hesitates and then meets my eye. “I never even told Roger about it. But they told me that his destiny laid less with who he was, and more with the children he would sire. The many children, who would be...” he looks away a bit, trying to sort his thoughts, “it was hard to understand. But something about a set of extraordinary children who would bring much joy to the world.”

My stomach drops at this, though I work hard to keep it off my face. I guess Cora was right. Being a father is important to Roger his destiny, even. And if Cora can’t give him children....

Henry meets, my eyes, perhaps understanding the direction of my thoughts. He takes my hand. “The goddess gives us many mysteries, Ella,” he says quietly. “Don’t think too hard on her messages – they often present themselves in the most surprising ways.”

“You’re right,” I say, giving him a little smile, fighting against my own disappointment. I sit up straighter in my chair, smiling down at my baby, who’s staring up at me with his wide eyes, which are just starting to turn green. “Besides, today is about this little one. And his future.”

“Precisely right,” Henry says, peeking over at him again. “And his future is very, very bright. This I know for sure.”

Our house is filled with people later that evening, and my heart is full to bursting to see all of them – especially Isabel, James, and Sadie, who I think I hugged for a solid fifteen minutes when they arrived.

Unfortunately, I didn’t get to catch up with them as much as I wanted to, as I have to greet all of our guests and introduce Rafe around to his new friends and family. But still,

Isabel and I make plans to have a good long talk later this week before Cora comes to stand with her, giving me a wink to let me know that she has our visitors in good hands.

I'm almost breathless with excitement and stress as the time approaches. Anxious, I straighten the top of my glittering silver gown, which I picked expressly for the occasion. It's perhaps too much for a trip to the woods, but we'll be having champagne later – and then everyone coming back to the house to celebrate all evening – so it seemed right that we be formal tonight. But was it right? God, I don't know. I've never held a midnight baptism before.

"Calmly," Sinclair says, coming up behind me, looking gorgeous in his tuxedo. He rests two reassuring hands on my shoulders. "Everything is in order, Ella – you don't need to micromanage everything. It's all going smoothly."

I laugh and shake my head, grateful that my mate can read my mind in more ways than one. "I just want everything to go smoothly, and everyone to have a nice time, and to make sure that everyone gets enough time with Rafe -"

"Not necessary," he whispers in my ear, and I can feel him smiling as he does it. "You don't need to be everything to everyone, trouble.. They're here to help you. You could have come down in pajamas ten minutes before the ceremony, with baby vomit streaked down your shirt, and no one would have cared."

"I would have cared," I say, turning on him with wide eyes. "Ew!"

He laughs, drawing me in for a quick kiss. "What I mean, Ella, is that you should just calm down and enjoy the night. It's for us, as much as for him. The guests are just happy to be along for the ride."

"You're right," I murmur, smiling against his lips and then looking down at my happy baby in my arms. "I need to...live in the moment."

"Right," he says, putting an arm around my shoulders and moving towards the door. "It's good that you figured that out now, because it's time to go."

"Oh!" I say, surprised, looking around at everyone who is likewise streaming towards the entrance, towards the two vans waiting to take us all out in the woods. "Oh, Dominic!" I say, spinning in his arms and looking towards the kitchen. "Did we remember the champagne – and all the glasses -"

"Packed, Ella," he says, looking down at me with a stern little smile. "Stop. Turn. Enjoy." I take a deep breath and look up at him with wide eyes, making him laugh. "I'll try. I really will."

He nods and bends down a little to grab Rafe's car seat, waiting by the door. "You try, I'll be here to help. We've got this, little mate."

I grin, standing on my tiptoes and turning my face up for another kiss, happy when my mate obliges. "Thank you, Dominic," I whisper, and then we're out the door. Off to the woods.

We arrive about forty minutes later and I'm thrilled to see that our guests are having a good time and that the baby is, miraculously, sleeping soundly in his car seat. I bite my lip, hoping he wakes up for the actual dedication part, though...

Well, I suppose it doesn't matter if he's awake or not. Cora and Roger have to do all the work, Rafe just has to...be there. "Ready?" Cora says, leaning across the aisle of the van and smiling at me.

"Are you?" I ask, raising my eyebrows at her. She nods eagerly. I lean closer, lowering my voice further, though I know it's more of a gesture than an effective way to pass a secret in this van full of wolves with enhanced hearing. (And are you two..." I glance furtively at Rodger.

Cora gives me a happy little nod. "We're all good, Ella," she says, smiling. I narrow my eyes and wonder if she's lying for my sake. My sister reads my mind, though, and laughs at me. "Seriously!" she says eagerly. "All good. We're here for Rafe, anyway."

"Okay," I say, my eyes still narrowed at her as I stand up and begin to unbuckle Rafe from his chair and lift him into my arms. Then, as a group, we all disembark from the vans. A special lift lowers Henry to the ground and, when he gives me a thumbs-up to let me know he's ready, we all spill out into the woods, preparing ourselves to dedicate my son to the Goddess.

Chapter 303 – Dedicated to the Goddess

Ella

As a group, we head together into the darkness of the forest. “Did we have to go somewhere so creepy for this?” I ask Sinclair, looking warily around the woods. Usually my wolf thrills to be under the canopy of the trees, but today, I can feel her wary inside me. “It’s a sacred space,” Sinclair explains, smiling down at me, placing one hand on my back to ensure that I don’t trip over any errant roots. “Are you feeling it too? The magic in the air?”

“How could I miss it,” I murmur, looking around. “This place is... thick with it.”

—

It’s true – I can’t see anything in the air around us, but I’m certainly aware that this place is sacred. Either because it was always a special place, or made special due to the repeated process of bringing children here with the intent of dedication, this patch of forest is unique. Even the trees around us are just a little different – their trunks darker, thicker. The way that the branches twine up towards the sky is more elegantly twisted than I’ve seen elsewhere.

Overall it’s not a bad feeling just...different.

I glance over my shoulder at Cora, who I can see is uncomfortable. She’s the only human in the party today and, even though she doesn’t have a wolf who can sense the magic like mine can, I can tell that she, too, senses the difference of this place. I give her a warm smile which she returns, coming closer to my side.

“This place is weird,” she says softly, rubbing her hands up and down her arms as if she’s cold. “Scared,” I correct. “But yeah, sacred and weird.”

We take a little path deeper into the woods, worn flat enough by the passing of thousands of feet over the years that Henry’s chair has no trouble passing down it. When we lose sight of the vans behind us, so deep in the forest that the trees obscure our sight of the road, I see a figure ahead, dressed in silver robes.

“Welcome,” she calls to us, and I recognize the voice of the priestess who we met in the temple. We murmur our greetings when we come close and she bends down to smile at Rafe, who is still asleep in my arms.

“Are you ready?” The priestess asks me, and I feel a little twist in my stomach. Actually, I’m not ready – not at all. I haven’t been parted from Rafe since that day in the hospital where he slept in the nursery for a few hours. Since then, I haven’t been further than one room away from him, and even that I kept as short as possible. And now I was going to hand him over to his godparents to take him into the woods alone at night?

All of my motherly instincts scream at me to take my baby home and curl up warm and safe in bed, but the priestess gives me a warm smile, perhaps reading my mind. My wolf gives me a little nudge with her nose too, letting me know that it's all right.

"As ready as I'll ever be," I sigh, still anxious. I feel Sinclair's hand press more firmly against my spine, supporting me.

"The child?" she asks, putting out her hands in a request for me to hand him over to her. Sighing, I do, and then I wrap my arms around Sinclair's waist, resting my head against his chest. I know that Cora and Roger will take good care of Rafe but...until I have my baby back, I'm going to need to keep Sinclair close.

The priestess coos to the baby, who starts to fuss in her arms, and then nods to Cora and Roger, who each take a step forward. She holds the baby carefully against her as she begins the ceremony in front of our gathered group of family and friends.

"Who presents this child for dedication?" she calls out, her voice steady and resonant.

"We do," Sinclair responds, his voice resonant and strong. "His mother and I."

The priestess nods deeply to us, part of the ritual, recognizing our intent. Then, she continues. "And who will carry this boy to meet the Goddess?"

"

"We will," Roger responds, taking a few steps to stand next to Cora and surprising me by taking her hand. I look up at Sinclair, wondering if that's part of the ceremony or just Roger being Roger, but my mate's face gives nothing away. I turn to Cora, then, who looks just as surprised as me. The priestess nods to Roger and Cora in turn and then crosses to them, placing my baby in my sister's arms. "Take him," she says, waving a hand behind her into the forest. "Forward, to the pool. Let him bask in the light of the full moon so that he may know his Goddess. In return, she may give you insight into his future life. Take it for the gift that it is."

"We will," Roger replies, steady. Cora nods as well, less sure about what to say but certainly determined to do right by her nephew.

The priestess nods again and steps aside so that Cora and Roger can pass.

Then, together, my sister and Sinclair's brother carry Rafe into the forest. I watch them until they are swallowed by darkness, my heart in my throat. And then, when I can't see them anymore, I hold my breath and wait.

Cora

"You'd think," I mutter, frustrated as I trip again over another root, "that they'd spend a little more time clearing the path to this pool, if people come out here every month to dedicate their children."

"Here, give Rafe to me," Roger replies, wanting to be helpful but irritated, a little, by my slow pace. If you fall you'll crush him –"

"No!" I retort, glaring at him a little in the dark. "The priestess gave the baby to me, she wants me to carry him."

"I'm sure that's not what she meant, Cora," Roger replies, his voice a little crabby. "And she's not going to be happy if you give her back a flat pancake baby because you tripped

"

"Oh shut up," I say under my breath, hastening my pace in my eagerness to get this over with. There's no one I'd like to be alone in the woods with right now less than Roger Sinclair. But, I almost immediately trip over another root, stumbling in the darkness. Roger catches me in time, before I can indeed fall flat and crush the baby, grabbing me by the shoulders and steadying me.

"

2/3

"All right?" he asks.

"Fine," I bite out, embarrassed and determined to get this done. I shoot him another little glare, but he just laughs at me and takes his hands away, putting them up like a criminal caught at gunpoint.

"Sorry," he says. "Next time I'll let you fall."

"Just... take the baby, okay?" I sigh, handing Rafe to Roger, who holds him awkwardly. It's my time to laugh a little now, derisive to see him holding the child like a football.

He shoots me a little glare of his own in response. "I don't...hold a lot of kids..." he murmurs, adjusting the fussing Rafe to try to make him more comfortable.

“Clearly,” I reply, crossing my arm’s and smirking at him.

“Let’s just go,” Roger sighs, starting off again into the woods.

I’m grateful, a few moments later, when I start to see the edges of a silver pool off in the distance.” Great,” I say, half to myself. “There’s the pool – now let’s go dedicate this kid and get this over with.”

“Agreed,” Roger replies, nodding and heading off ahead of me at a brisk pace.

“Hey!” I call after him, frustrated as he outstrips me. “Wait up!”

Chapter 304 – The Goddess’s Light

Cora

I’m a little out of breath when I finally catch up with Roger and Rafe, having had to work hard to keep up with his long wolf stride.

“Rude,” I say when I finally come to a stop next to them. “You couldn’t have waited for me?”

“I’m being rude?” Roger says, raising his eyebrows at me in disbelief. “Cora, you’ve been nothing but unpleasant since the moment we stepped into the forest –”

I open my mouth with a little squeak of protest but Roger just rolls his eyes and ignores me, going on anyway. “This is supposed to be a sacred experience for Rafe and for us and you’ve done nothing but moan and complain. So yeah, forgive me if I wanted to get away for a moment and concentrate on the magic of this place

“Oh whatever,” I mumble, reaching out my arms so that he can hand me the baby.

“No from you way,” Roger retorts, holding the baby closer to his chest and turning a little away from me. “You don’t get to hold the baby now that we’re at the pool

“Yes I do!” I cry, “the priestess gave him to me!”

“I’m his godparent just as much as you are

—

“(

But suddenly, there’s a flare in the light from the pool, and Roger and I turn to it, surprised, both of our mouths falling open. I don’t know how I know it but...well, somehow, I get the sense that the pool – or whatever magic is in it – is irritated with us.

“Sorry,” I murmur to the pool, taking a step closer, a little embarrassed. Honestly, it never occurred to me that my behavior with Roger right now was being...watched.

Roger murmurs his own apology, coming closer to the edge. We look at each other, then, united anew at being...well, a little freaked out, suddenly. We’re both very aware that there’s magic in the world, but sometimes when you’re confronted with it so blatantly it can be weird.

I take a deep breath, then, nodding to him, and start to say that words that the priestess taught us as part of the ceremony.

“Goddess,” I begin, letting my voice ring out across the smooth surface of the silver pool. “We bring to you, tonight, this child, so that he may begin to know you.”

“We wish to show him your light, and in doing so, let you see him and bring him into the spirit of your grace,” Roger continues, his own resonant voice sending shivers down my spine. The light coming off the pool brightens – slower this time, though, as if she’s listening.

I glance upwards through the trees and am treated by the sight of the full moon itself, beaming brilliantly down on us from above. Hey, mom, I say quietly in my mind, my heartrate suddenly increasing and my stomach twisting with the emotion of the moment. Because she is here, now, with us – ready to meet her grandchild. I can feel it.

Even Rafe begins to open his little eyes and look around. I know that he can’t really see anything – his vision hasn’t developed well enough yet – but he’s certainly curious. I put my hands out for him and this time Roger does hand him to me, letting me take the baby and unwrap his swaddling blanket. Then, when he’s free of it, Roger and I slowly walk as close as we can to the edge of the pool and hold the baby out over it.

The moonlight streams down onto the baby, growing brighter as the moments pass. My heart fills to see Rafe looking up into the sky, to see the light surrounding him as it falls from the moon above and reflects upwards from the mirrored surface of the pool.

“He is called Rafe Sinclair,” Roger says softly, reverent. “His parents, Ella and Dominic, have asked us to bring him here to dedicate him to you. We do so in their name.”

I smile as I look at the baby, and at Roger, and at the moonlight. It’s a beautiful moment, introducing the child to the world and to all the magic within it. I open my mouth to say something, to tell Roger that I’m sorry, and that I’m glad I’m here with him to do this, when suddenly I can see something in the moonlight.

I gasp, suddenly afraid, but Roger brings a quick hand to my waist, steadying me.

“Don’t pull the baby back,” he says, peering into the white light of the moon, likewise trying to make it out. “If you do, we won’t be able to see...”

So I keep holding the baby out, my arms trembling a little, and watch the story form in the air.

It’s not...not totally visual. Like, it’s not like watching a movie projected into smoke in the air. Instead, it’s...felt as much as it is seen, communicated to our hearts and minds as much as our eyes. But suddenly, quite suddenly, it's perfectly clear.

I see a little boy, tall, with warm green eyes bending down to take the hand of a dark-haired little girl who has fallen to the ground, helping her up and brushing the tears from her face. Then, I see him again – older, but still young.- running across a battlefield, fear on his face but courage in every line of his limbs as he pushes himself to do what is right. We're passed that quite quickly, though, and I see him again with that girl – though she's older now too – laughing. And though I know there's no reason for me to know it, I sense – somehow that she, like me, has no wolf.

–

Rafe – he has a crown on his head, and another in his hands, which he slowly lifts to place on the girl's head as well. She smiles up at him with such love in her eyes and then the door to the room bursts open, his family spilling in

–

There's Sinclair, and Ella, and more of their children – and a light-haired boy I don't know, just about Rafe's age- and more children, so many more and me and...and...

–

Rafe is embraced by his family, who surround him, laughing and hugging Rafe and the girl, their eyes warm and light with hope. And suddenly, I know, that Rafe will be a great leader of his people, and that he will guide them with love in his heart, a love sustained and made true by this girl. I know that Rafe will meet his mate and that she will be...

Human.

I gasp, my eyes filling with tears, and slowly the moonlight fades, returning to its natural hue. I bring the baby back to my chest, holding him tight, and turn to look up at Roger, who looks at me as well with tears streaming down his cheeks.

"Did you see it?" he whispers.

"Yes," I reply.

"He will love her," Roger continues, shaking his head, staring down at me with so much love in his eyes. "And it won't matter to him – not at all –"

I'm crying in truth then, little sobs wracking my chest as I hold my nephew to me. My nephew, with his whole life laid out before him, a great love waiting for him in the future to sooth the great pain he will surely endure as he leads his people, human and wolf alike. I open my mouth to say something to Roger – to say anything –

–

But no words come out. Instead, I just tuck my head against my nephew and let myself cry.

How can this little baby, only two weeks old, already hold so much wisdom? How can he have already have given me such a gift?

I feel Roger's arms around us then, warm and steady. He brings me close to his chest, tucking me beneath his chin and pressing a kiss to my hair. Then, silent, he lets me cry, lets me process the experience all I need. A few minutes later, when I am again steady, I take a deep breath and turn my face up to him, ready to give him my thanks.

But before I can say anything, Roger acts, closing the distance between us.

And pressing a soft kiss to my mouth.

Chapter 305 – Sister Talk

Ella

It feels like my sister has been gone with my baby for...hours. But in reality I know that it has been, at best, maybe half an hour. Still, while the rest of us mill around the dark forest, drinking champagne and waiting, I can't keep myself from continuing to glance anxiously into the darkness.

What's keeping them? Why won't they come back? "Patience, trouble," Sinclair says behind me and I sigh. Without looking at him, I lean back against his chest and raise my champagne flute to my mouth, taking a little sip.

"Those are two words that don't go together, and you know it," I mutter, frustrated. His warm chuckle resonates against my back as he wraps an arm—around me. "Only you would try to rush a goddess."

"She's my mom!" I huff, looking up at him as I cross my arms. "I'll rush her all I want. Sinclair laughs again and shakes his head at me. "Let Cora and Roger have this time with Rafe. It's special for them too."

"I'm dying to know if they'll see anything about his future," I say, looking back at my mate with a wide smile. "Do you think they will?"

"If I had to put money on it?" Sinclair says, contemplative. "Considering who Rafe's grandmother is? Then...yeah, I think they'll get a glimpse. But don't push them too hard on it, Ella," he advises. "It's their experience as much as his. If they choose to keep it to themselves, that's their right."

"Oh, yeah, whatever," I say, rolling my eyes. Fat chance I'm letting Cora keep secrets about my son's future from me. As my mind goes wild with the possibilities, I see something flicker in the darkness. I stand up straight, eager, peering into the darkness. I feel Sinclair do the same behind me.

And then I burst into a little joyous laugh as I see my sister, Rafe tucked happy in her arms, coming through the trees, Roger's arm warm around her shoulder. Sinclair puts two fingers in his mouth and lets out a sharp whistle as I shout "Cora!" and dash into the woods, happy to see all three of them.

My sister gives me a broad smile as we meet beneath the trees, happily handing my baby over into my waiting arms. I coo a little greeting to him, doing a little check down the bond to see that he's fine. When I'm satisfied that he's happy and relaxed I look up at Roger and Cora eagerly. "So?" I ask, a little breathless. "How'd it go?"

"It went well," Roger says reassuringly. "No problems, he did beautifully."

“Of course he did!” I laugh, smiling down at my baby, who fusses a little in his blankets. He’s tired, I’m sure, even though he’s always up at this time of night anyway. “He didn’t have to do much, after all, just lay out basking in the moonlight.”

Cora laughs and steps away from Roger, putting an arm around me. “Come on, sis,” she says. Let’s go get a glass of champagne and I’ll tell you everything.”

When we return to the little group of family and friends, everyone lets out a little cheer and raises their glasses to us, a gesture that fills me with warmth. It is so wonderful to see this milestone in my child’s life celebrated so. I lean down and give my baby a little kiss on the head as Sinclair hands Cora and Roger glasses of champagne and then comes to my side.

“How is he?” Sinclair murmurs, leaning down to check on the baby.

“Perfect, angelic, magnificent, as usual,” I murmur. “As usual?” Sinclair asks, raising an amused eyebrow at me. “Usually he’s screaming like a banshee.”

I blink innocently at my mate. “That does nothing to take away from his perfection. He’s just... expressive.”

Sinclair laughs and shakes his head at me a little and then turns to Cora and Roger, who come closer to us. “Soooooo?” I ask leadingly, excited. “Did you...see anything?”

“Ella,” Roger says, smirking at me and sinking his hands into his pockets. “Don’t you know that it’s a private affair, what happens between a child, his godparents, and the goddess on the night of his baptism?”

“I swear, Roger,” I warn, narrowing my eyes at him, “if you keep this from me, I will torture you for the rest of your life –”

My brother-in-law bares his teeth at me playfully, leaning forward. “Ah, Ella, but don’t you see? Now I have the power to torture you, as I have information you want, and I’m going to make you pay through the nose for it.”

“You’re dead to me,” I declare impassively, turning to my sister. “Well?” I ask, my question directed only to her as Roger laughs.

“Oh, you know,” she says casually, unable to keep her lips from twitching. “We just saw the normal sorts of things for a little boy. His life is going to be rather boring, actually. Uneventful, dull.”

“What?!” I ask, my face falling, glancing between her and the baby.

“Yeah,” she says with a little shrug. “We saw a lot of crossword puzzles in his future. He’s going to get really, really into rock collecting, but not in an interesting way that leads to a career in geology. Just...hoarding rocks. In his bedroom. Through his forties.”

I snap my eyes back up to her and glare, taking in the little smile on her lips. “Liar,” I say, starting to laugh, my sister joining in with me. She glances back at Roger, who wrinkles his nose at her and raises his champagne glass in her direction. I watch this exchange, curious. Did something...else happen in the woods?

But I don’t let myself be distracted. “Come on, Cora,” I push, taking her by the arm and drawing her away from Sinclair and Roger. “Tell me, please, for real. Did you see anything?”

“We did,” she says, warm. “He has...a big future, Ella. But it will be a happy one, with love and courage to balance the trials. I know more but...do you want to know?”

And suddenly I realize that...I don’t. I look my sister in the eyes and realize that...well, that I want to be surprised. That I want to watch my son’s life unfold organically, to experience it along with him. I tilt my head to the side, considering it, and realizing that this is perhaps why godparents take the child to this ceremony – because the gift of the goddess is too much for those who love him most. That perhaps the best gift is the mystery.

“No, Cora,” I say, putting out an arm and pulling her close in a hug. “Thank you. That’s perfect. That’s all I need.”

She nods to me, understanding, and turns to rejoin the group. But I don’t let her go just yet.

“Cora,” I whisper, pulling her close again, biting my lip eagerly. “When you went into the woods with Roger you were...different than when you came out. Did...did something...”

She just gives me a little smirk and a shrug. “That, sister,” she says quietly, pulling me forward, “is a secret I’m keeping to myself. You’re too nosy. Some things are private.”

“So there is a thing!” I exclaim, digging in my heels, desperately wanting to know this mystery, if not my son’s. “If you’re keeping something private, something happened!”

“Come on, Ella,” Cora says, laughing at me. “Come celebrate with us. I’m not telling you a thing.”

“She’s selfish, Rafe,” I sigh, shaking my head down at my son, who is falling asleep. “Cruel auntie doesn’t tell us anything. But you know, and I’ll get you to tell me as soon as you're big enough to talk."

He just makes a face and squirms away from me a bit. I narrow my eyes at him, wondering if my baby is taking Cora's side.

"Come on, little mate," Sinclair says, wrapping an arm around me and ushering me forward into the group. "Let everyone see the baby, and then let's go home. It's time for breakfast."

Chapter 306 – Old Friends

Ella

Two hours later, Sinclair and I welcome our friends back to our house for a casual breakfast and coffee or mimosas, according to preference to celebrate Rafe's moonlight baptism. I can tell our guests are dragging – they've been up all night, after all – but spirits are high.

"Wow," I say, leaning back against Sinclair's chest with a croissant in one hand, a cup of coffee in the other. Rafe, thankfully, is asleep in his little recline stroller. Usually I'd put him to bed in his crib, but I want people to be able to say goodbye if they have to leave. "I can't believe everyone I still up," I say, peering around at our friends and family. "I mean, I know we're on baby time so normal hours mean nothing anymore, but everyone else..."

"It's a special occasion," Sinclair murmurs; lowering his face to my hair and taking a long sniff of my scent. "We're used to it. In wolf culture shifter children are rarer than we'd like, so we take the time to celebrate them when they're born."

"That's so nice..." I say, sniffing a little, my eyes filling with tears. "What?" Sinclair asks, pulling away from me a little, shocked. "Are you – why are you crying –"

I swat at him, laughing a little. "What! Hormones! I'm tired! Leave me be." Then I brush the tears off my cheeks, smiling despite them. I'm just overwhelmed and grateful, honestly, for all the love that our family has shown our baby. "It really is a beautiful tradition," I murmur, and Sinclair kisses my cheek before moving away to talk to some of the Alphas who have come to see their new prince.

As Sinclair moves away, Isabel quickly moves to my side to take his place. "Hi, mama," she says, giving me a warm smile as she wraps an arm around my waist. "How are you doing?"

"Forget about me!" I cry out, wrapping my arms around her again, "how are you? How are James, and Sadie?"

"They're good," she says, but the way she smiles at her mate across the room lets me know that her words are an understatement. James raises a hand to me, little Sadie slumped against his shoulder, deeply asleep.

"Do you want to put her upstairs in one of the guest rooms?" I ask Isabel quickly, taking her hand and squeezing it. "You can stay as long as you like –"

"No," she says, giving me a smile. "I'm so glad we could be here and meet the baby – but we both want to get home. We have...a lot of work to do there." Her face changes, then, and I feel my stomach twist to see it.

“Is everything okay?” I ask, anxious, tugging her hand and urging her to tell me. She nods to a little love seat in the corner and I follow her there, Rafe’s little pram in tow, so that we are away from everyone and as private as we can be.

“Ella,” Isabel says, her voice soft and a little sad, “I know that you’ve been distracted – and there’s nothing wrong with that you’ve had such a hard pregnancy, and I know that the birth wasn’t easy on you either – you really shouldn’t have been paying attention to anything besides your body and Rafe and Sinclair – ”

“Please, Isabel,” I say, staring at her and tightening my hold on her hand, “please just tell me –“My stomach is roiling with guilt to think that I’ve neglected something when I could have helped.

—

“It’s just...I don’t think that Sinclair has told you absolutely everything,” she says, “about how bad the refugee problem is now, after the last days of the war when you were away on the boat. It’s nothing that he’s done wrong – Sinclair has made so many strides – but we have more children than ever in our centers, and there are even mothers out there who are simply missing their children

My face goes pale at the idea and I flick my glance towards my sleeping baby. If I were ever separated from him by war – just, had no idea where he was, if he was cared for – my heart wrenches to think of it. Isabel notes my paling face, my eyes filling with tears.

“Please, Ella,” she says softly, anxiously looking to where Sinclair is standing. “I’m sorry maybe I shouldn’t have told you –”

“No,” I say, shaking my head and looking at her with a new determination on my face. “I need to know, Isabel -I’m getting strong, I need to do this sort of work. If Sinclair intends to lead these people, I don’t intend to stay home and be a happy little house wife while others suffer. I want to help.”

She nods, understanding. “I knew that you’d feel that way. That’s why I told you – not because ...well, Ella, if you’re still healing, you need to focus on yourself first. You can be so selfless you always put others ahead of yourself.”

—

My heart softens and I take a deep breath, still worried but touched by my friend’s concern. She knows me so well. “Thank you, love,” I say, giving her a little smile. “I’ll take care of myself, and my family. But I’m going to help too. Can you tell me? Who is the worst hit, where should I begin?"

"Well," she says, lowering her voice and looking around the room. "It's...complicated."

I frown at her, not understanding, but giving her the space to work through her thoughts.

"Ella," she says, more urgent now, "we both know that the right side won this war. That Damon would have worked to disenfranchise the humans completely, to enslave them if he could. Sinclair, we know, wants equal rights and peace – but there are people even on Sinclair's side who still have...complicated ideas about hierarchies between shifters and humans."

I nod, understanding her, remembering the councils during the war when even some of Sinclair's allies looked askance at the humans, at Cora, my own sister. I frown to think of it, to see some of those men in this room now. Sighing, I turn back to Isabel.

"I hear you – and I'm aware. It's something that I know Sinclair is working on but...old prejudices, they die hard. But, Isabel, what does that have to do with refugees?" I ask, confused.

She shrugs a little. "It just means that since the humans were less prepared for the war – it came out of the blue for them a little bit – that they don't have the resources that the wolves have to help their people in the aftermath. And there are some among shifter-kind who are eager to divert all resources towards shifters first, meaning..."

I let out a big exhale, both of exhaustion and understanding. "That the humans are getting the short end of the stick." Slowly, Isabel nods.

"In all areas," she says slowly, "and Ella," she bites her lip, looking me in the eye and perhaps not wanting to say it, "it means that...resentment is building. Humans feel lied to, and now that they know the truth, it in many ways seems like Sinclair has offered them peace but is not giving them the resources to survive their new reality."

My eyebrows fly up at this and I follow my knee-jerk reaction to defend my mate. "Sinclair is doing everything he

–

"I know, Ella," Isabel says softly, leaning forward to put a reassuring hand on my knee. "I'm just saying, from the human's perspective? ...The trust is not there. They need help, and they need a reason to believe in Sinclair."

I nod, looking away from my friend and staring into space a little bit, trying to figure out what I can do next.

“Maybe,” Isabel suggests softly, “his mate, who was raised human for most of her life, and thought she was human until she conceived a wolf child, and who has a human sister...”

I turn back to Isabel, nodding slowly. “Perhaps I’m the link we need.”

—

need your help. You I give my friend a warm smile and she squeezes my hand, a plan starting to form between us. Please stay,” I whisper to her, shaking my head a little. “I need you here could do so much good here, on my team.”

She sighs and looks towards James, considering. “I’ll talk to him,” she says, smiling at her mate and her little girl. “We’ll decide, together, what’s best.”

Chapter 307 – How Dare You?

Ella

My guests surprise me by staying almost until noon. Well, at least, some of them – mostly those who started hitting the mimosas hard when we got back to the house and then moved to whiskey.

After the baby wakes up and has a little lunch, I come yawning back into the front of the house, where I smile to see that Sinclair has loosened his tie and is enjoying a little banter with Roger and some of the other Alphas.

Isabel and James have gone, back to their hotel to let little Sadie sleep in peace, but Cora is still here, curled up on a couch and half dozing as Henry – I laugh to see him a little tipsy as well – tells her stories of his youth. I move over to them, tired but happy to see everyone enjoying themselves.

“How are you, Ella,” Henry asks, smiling at me warmly and peeking at the baby, who looks at him curiously when I hand him over.

“I am good, happy,” I say, grinning at both of them. “Though I wouldn’t say no to sometime soon –”

“Oh my,” Henry says, glancing up at the clock. “We’ve overstayed our welcome –”

my bed “No,” I say, appalled at myself for such a rude comment, “It wasn’t a hint – I’m sorry, stay

“No, Ella,” Cora says, laughing and standing up. “Henry is right, and so are you – it is late. Or early or...” she screws up her face in concentration, “whatever. Time to go home!”

We both give Henry a kiss goodbye before he hands my baby back to me and wheels towards the door. Cora leans in to give me a kiss goodbye as well, but I hold her close and whisper in her ear before she can pull away, the baby fussing a little to be smushed, just a bit, between us. “Cora, why didn’t Doctor Hank come today?”

She frowns at me, a little chagrined, as she stands straight again. “Well, did you invite him?”

“Of course I invited him,” I say, narrowing my eyes at her. But then I hesitate. “Or...” I slap my hand to my mouth, realizing... “Cora! I thought you were going to bring him! I didn’t send him an invitation because I assumed he would come as your plus one!”

She raises an eyebrow at me, a little offended. “Ella, Hank is not my boyfriend –”

“He’s not?!” I gasp. Then I scrape a frustrated hand down my face, confused. “Cora, if he’s not your boyfriend then what is he –”

“He’s whatever he is!” she hisses, looking around the room awkwardly in the hope that no one’s listening. I note that her eyes linger on Roger and put the pieces together.

“Cora,” I say, crossing my arms over my chest. “Hank told me that he wants to build a life with you

“What! When did he –”

“But if you’re stopping him because you’re holding a space open for someone else –”

“Ella! I thought you wanted me to –”

“I want you to be happy!” I interrupt, my voice raised in frustration. My words echo around the room a little bit and I blush, realizing that our little tiff is...well, not exactly private anymore. I take my sister by the shoulder and turn her towards the corner of the room.

“You’re starting to cross a line, Ella,” Cora says, glaring at me. “This is my life, and my business – and you’re getting in my head! Telling me you want me to be happy, and then telling me you want me to be with Roger, and then kind of yelling at me for not bringing Hank into a literal pack of wolves for a magical moonlight baptism!” Exasperated, Cora runs her hand through her hair. “I don’t even know what I want anymore, Ella, because you’re too busy telling me what you want!”

I inhale deeply through my nose, glaring back at my sister but...well, hearing her. “I just want the best for you, Cora,” I say back to her, a little mad. “And I thought that you decided that that was Hank! But if you’re still keeping space for Roger...” I turn my glare on the back of his head now, angry again. “What happened out in those woods? Did he say something to you? Did he did he kiss you?”

–

“Ella,” Cora says, taking me by the shoulders and giving me a little shake, though I can see a blush on her cheeks. “Let it go.”

“Fine,” I lie, still frowning at her. Cora sighs and shakes her head. “I’m tired, Ella,” she says, looking towards the door and then back at me. “I’m going home, but I don’t want to leave it this way. It was a great night – really ...special. Can we just tell each other we love each other, and then go take much-needed naps?”

“Yes,” I sigh, my eyes softening as I pull my sister close to me. “I’m sorry, Cora, you’re right. I’m – I must just be over-tired. It’s been a big night.”

“You did amazing,” Cora murmurs to me, and then bends to kiss the baby’s head before squeezing my hand and heading for the door, stopping to say goodbye to some people on the way out. I watch my sister go, feeling guilty for bothering her about it but...

Well. I’m still mad. And I know exactly who to take it out on.

Conveniently, Roger backs away from the group of Alphas with whom he’s been talking, heading to the little bar we set up to refill his drink. I intercept him on the way.

“You stay away from Cora – “I say, stepping in front of him and pointing a finger in his face.”

I know what happened between you two tonight” – that’s a lie, but he doesn’t know that and I think you’re being rotten to her, Roger “What?” Roger says, blinking at me, completely shocked. “Ella, I –”

“I’m serious, Roger!” I say, my anger getting deeper when he doesn’t immediately comply with my demands. I hold my baby tight against my chest as I take another step towards him. “ That’s my sister you’re messing with, and I’m not going to let you break her heart more than you already have –”

“Ella!” Roger snaps, swatting away my finger, which, I admit, is coming dangerously close to his face. “I don’t even know what you’re talking about!”

I narrow my eyes at him. “Don’t play dumb with me, Roger. You know she still has feelings for you – but if you have no intention of taking her seriously because she can never have your children, then you need to leave her alone. Let her go and be with someone who can appreciate her for the wonderful woman she is, whether or not she can give them children.”

I see something change on Roger’s face then. He goes a little pale, his jaw dropping, as if... well, as if I’ve spoken the inner secret that’s been nagging at his heart for weeks. I feel a little bitter, victorious smile pull at my lips.

“Ella,” Roger sighs, taking a step closer to me. “It’s more complicated than that – ”

–

“It’s really not,” I insist, shaking my head at him, my eyes wide. “And as someone who for years was put down by her partner because she couldn’t have his kids for no fault of her own

Roger's face drops further as I say this, the guilt written obviously on his features now. He hadn't put it together before, I realize that what he's doing to Cora great deal in common with how Mike treated me before I met Sinclair.

or might do has a

—

"I'm telling you right now," I continue, "to either love her for who she is and how she is, or leave her alone. But don't you dare drag her along just to break her heart, Roger Sinclair. If you do that, I'll tear you to pieces."

The last words are uttered through my bared teeth, and I mean every word of them. I'm so worked up that I don't even notice Sinclair come up behind me. "Ella," my mate says, stern. "You need to back off."

I spin on him, glaring up at his gigantic Alpha self. "What, are you going to tell me that I'm wrong?" I ask him, righteous. "Because if so, I say, looking between the two of them, my newborn baby still held tight against me, "I'll take on you both at once!"

Chapter 308 – Between a Brother and a Mate

Sinclair

I know it's a little perverse, but, as I look down at my furious little spitfire mate, glaring angrily between my brother and I who outweigh her by three or four times...

God damn it, but I get a little hard. She's just so passionate, and when she's all worked up like this all I want to do is grab her, carry her upstairs and redirect that anger to-

"Ella," Roger sighs, looking down at his feet. "I'm – I don't know what to say." "Damn right you don't," she growls, spinning on him and starting to advance on him again.

"Enough," I groan, reaching for her arm – the one without the baby – and wrapping my hand firmly around it. She turns and looks up at me, a little snarl on her plump lips, but when she sees the coolness on my face and in my eyes Ella hesitates, just a little. And then she huffs, relenting against her will, her expression reflecting the words she sends directly to my mind:

Fine. But you're going to pay for this later. I smirk at her, letting her feel a little of my arousal down the bond. Oh baby, I say back, I'd better.

I see her lips twitch with amusement, but not enough to quell her anger totally. She turns back to Roger then and I let go of her arm, trusting her to contain herself.

"I'm sorry, Roger," she says stiffly, making him look up at her in surprise. "I meant what I said but...I understand it's complicated. And this wasn't the time or the place." Ella gives a little shrug then, clearly communicating that she's sorry that she's really not very sorry, but still ending the fight.

"Okay," Roger says awkwardly. "Um," my brother looks up at me, shame and regret in his eyes. "I think I'm going to go..."

"Stay," I say, meaning it, taking a step towards him. "Stay overnight, at least – we've got plenty of room –

((

"No," he says, giving us a little half-smile as he looks between us. "It's all right – I'm not far, and all I really want to do is be in my own bed." He gives a fake yawn, stretching his arms over his head.

"All right," I say, putting my hands in my pockets and studying him. "Thank you, brother, for everything."

“Anytime,” he murmurs, coming forward to give me a hug and then dipping down to give Ella an awkward kiss on the cheek and to chuck baby Rafe under the chin. “See you guys around,” he murmurs, clearly lost in his thoughts as he heads for the door.

Noticing that both of the godparents are gone now, the rest of our guests quickly get the message and spend the next few minutes saying their goodbyes. I see the last few out the door as Ella takes the baby upstairs to lay him down.

I stand at the bottom of the staircase after everyone is gone, sighing and delaying going upstairs as long as possible. Because I know that the minute we get up there? We’re going to have to have this fight.

Sighing, shaking my head, I start up the stairs. She’s ready for me when I come into the room. “How could you not back me up on this, Dominic,” Ella says, standing next to the baby’s bassinet with her arms crossed.

“Ella,” I say, leaning against the door frame and covering my eyes with my hand. “It’s not that I don’t back you up.

“But you didn’t!” she insists, and I can hear in her voice that she’s still furious. I sigh, tired, but I try not to let her see my frustration. She’s entitled to her emotions on this point, and I don’t want to invalidate how she feels. “You told me to stop,” she continues, “you took his side!”

“No,” I disagree softly, evenly. “I didn’t take his side – I just asked you to stop, because we had other guests, and I didn’t want to make Roger and Cora’s business everyone’s business.”

“Is that what you’re saying I was doing?” Ella asks, getting steamed again. She opens her mouth to say more, but I cross the room to her quickly.

“Ella,” I say, placing my hands evenly on her shoulders and looking into her face. “Please. I know you’re upset. But please, you know that’s not what I meant. Right?”

She pauses a moment and I see her check herself. I can’t help but smile at her, loving the ferocity with which she protects the people that she loves. I open this feeling to her down the bond, letting her see how I really feel, that I don’t hold it against her.

Ella bends, then, a little bit, sighing and tripping forward to lean against me. I wrap my arms around my angry, hard-loving little mate, holding her close, curling my body around her protectively. As much as she loves and fights for those she loves, I’m there, right with her, protecting her just as fiercely.

“You know I’ve always got your back, Ella,” I murmur, tucking my face against her hair. “I know, Dominic," she sighs. "I just got...mad. I'm sorry I took it out on you." "I can take it," I reply, smirking a little. "Plus, you're really sexy when you get all worked up like that."

"What!?" she replies, looking back at me with shock and a little bit of pleasure on her face Seriously?"

"Sure," I say, running a hand over her pretty rose-gold hair. "The sight of you taking on two Alphas like that, looking like you were ready to take us both out at the knees with a baby on your hip? Damn, girl." My last two words are a lusty snarl. "I'm going to be thinking of that look on your face for a loooong time."

Ella smiles at me and presses her body against mine, pulling me close and turning her face up towards me. "Okay, now tell me I was right. That's what will get me all worked up."

"You were right," I whisper, hoisting her up into my arms. She laughs and wraps her legs around my waist.

"Oh baby, say it again," she murmurs to me, her words a throaty whisper. But I just laugh and kiss her neck, running my lips down her shoulder and over the mating mark I left there not too long ago. I feel a little shiver travel through her as I run my tongue over it as well.

"How long to we have to wait?" she asks, her voice a little breathy. "Doctor Hank said three weeks. Half the time as the wait after a human pregnancy."

She sighs. "So, one more to go. But still, thank the goddess for this wolf biology. I don't think we'd have made it to six."

I shrug, smiling at my little mate and letting my hand rove over her ass. "We'd have found ways to be creative."

"But I don't want to be creative," she whispers, smiling at me and nudging my nose with hers. "I just want you. Pure and simple."

I kiss her again, slowly, deliberately not giving her all of myself. I don't think that I could stand...well. Let's just say, I don't want to get myself all worked up, when I know I can't get her all worked up as well. Then, I carry her over to the bed and sink down into it, laying down with her on top of me.

Chapter 309 – the Note

Ella

I sigh and spreads my body out against Sinclair's, tracing the lines of his body beneath his clothes. I close my eyes, relaxing, letting myself feel the warmth of him, basking in the joy of having him safe and healthy and near, of the knowledge that our baby boy is asleep on the other side of the room. "You do agree with me though, right?" I ask quietly. "All jokes aside?"

Sinclair takes a minute to consider and then he nods, his eyes still closed. "I think they should sort it out themselves," he answers quietly. "But I agree, Ella – if he's not willing to take her whether or not she can give him children...he should let her find someone who will."

"Thank you, Dominic," I respond, my voice barely audible, sending a little pulse of sincere gratitude down our bond. He sends love back. And then we both relax, our bodies falling into a deeper rhythm of breathing that carries us near sleep.

Sleep that's interrupted, suddenly, by the sound of the doorbell below. I groan, pulling my head up off of Sinclair's chest. "Who the hell could that be."

"Probably someone who forgot a purse. Or a shoe. Or...whatever," Sinclair mutters, working to sit up. I rise too, letting him up, smiling at my sleepy mate who is so tired that his words aren't making much sense. He sighs, rising to his feet, and I get up with him.

"Stay," he says, putting a hand on my shoulder, nodding back to the bed. "No," I sigh. "I'll come with you. It's probably for me, anyway. A package or something." I'm rueful, suddenly, that we've let all of the staff have the day off after the long night. It would be nice to have someone else to answer the door...

...but then I realize that that's horribly selfish and privileged, and I take my mate's hand, tugging him towards the door and grabbing the baby monitor on the way, switching it on. Who have I become, really, that I'm turning my nose up at having to answer my own door?

Considering some of the conditions I've lived in previously in my life, I should be thanking my lucky stars that I even have a door. Frustrated with myself, I hurry down the stairs, Sinclair following steadily behind.

When I pull open the door, though, there's nobody there. Frowning, I look around, and then down at the doormat, where there's a little folded piece of paper.

"What's this?" I ask, bending quickly to pick it up, the baby monitor making little static noises in my left hand.

I hold it up between me and Sinclair as he frowns at it, looking quickly around the neighborhood before pulling the door shut, obviously on alert.

“Is it addressed to anyone?” he asks quietly, suspicious. “No,” I say, my curiosity growing with every step. Quickly, I turn the envelope over and begin to slip my finger beneath the seal when Sinclair grabs my hand. “Ella” he says, his voice harsh with worry. “Don’t.”

—

“What?” I ask, looking up at him, suddenly worried myself. “Why?”

He shakes his head at me. “I just...it’s strange. Let’s...treat it carefully. All right?” “Okay,” I say. He holds his hand out and I place the letter in his open palm.

“Come on,” he says, taking my hand and heading for the kitchen. I follow eagerly, desperate to know, a little knot of anxiety forming in my stomach.

When we get into the kitchen, Sinclair puts a hand on my shoulder, walking me backwards until my back is pressed against the door of the pantry. “Stay here,” he murmurs, still looking down at the letter, and then he crosses swiftly to the butcher block by the sink.

“Sinclair,” I call, holding the baby monitor tightly between my hands. “Why “Precautions,” he responds, concentrating on the note. Then, he carefully places it on the butcher block and grabs a knife, moving his body away as far as he can as he begins to carefully slice the sticky seal holding the envelope shut.

“What,” I say, laughing a little desperately, wanting to make light of it – hoping, needing him to be overreacting right now “do you think it’s going to explode or something?”

He doesn’t answer me, just slowly finishes slicing the seal. When nothing happens, he stands up straight.

“What is it?” I whisper, my anxiety keeping me absolutely on edge. My heart is racing now –

“Just, one more minute, Ella,” Sinclair murmurs, holding up a hand to keep me back. I can’t take my eyes off of him as he steps closer to the envelope, holding it carefully in his hands and turning it upside down, shaking it to see what falls out.

But only a piece of paper falls out of the envelope, clattering lightly against the wood.

Sinclair takes a minute to pród at the piece of paper with his knife, flipping it over, making sure there's nothing strange about it, and then he stands up straight and steps closer to the butcher block, his shoulders relaxing.

"It's just a note," he says, looking over to me, confused. "Oh my god," I breathe out, relieved, rushing to his side. "You had me going crazy, Dominic," I say, glaring at him a little as I wrap my arms around him and peer at it. "What does it say?"

He shrugs a little bit and flips open the note, revealing a hurried scrawl of handwriting inside – just a few lines. We both read it hurriedly.

And then I blink, the blood draining from my face as I read it again, horror racing through my veins. I'm sorry – This is coming too late – but I had to do what is right They are coming for him for the little baby –

–

The ones who made him, who planned for him to be born –

They're coming I'm sorry My face snatches up to Sinclair's, my breathing short – I can barely pull air into my lungs as I panic –

Sinclair's face is still with rage as he reads the note again and again and then crumples it in his fist, which he slams down on the butcher block.

"Oh my god," I whisper to him, my whole body shaking. "Dominic – who. "The baby," he growls, spinning towards the door.

And then I gasp, and look down at the monitor in my hands, clicking the buttons – hearing nothing but static – but also seeing – seeing nothing. "Oh my god," I wheeze, my breath leaving me completely as I whip my eyes up to Sinclair's face. "The baby –"

My mate tears away from me, launching himself towards the SUS. I scurry behind, pulsing my limbs as hard as I can, taking the steps two at a time –

But my mate is too fast for me, quickly outstripping me as he pounds up the stairs, a snarl on his lips, death on his teeth for anything – anyone – he might meet that poses a threat to our child –

I'm half a hallway behind when Sinclair rips into our room, a roar on his breath as he goes. When I arrive, gasping, at the door, I slam into the doorframe, unable to move any further as I watch my mate dash across the room towards the bassinet –

If anything, anyone has hurt my baby –

I hold my breath, watching my mate bend over the little white basket, looking for our son.
(2)

Chapter 310 – Defense

Ella

Sinclair whips his face up to mine, relief in every line of it. “It’s fine,” he says, his body shaking with his unused adrenaline, “he’s...he’s here...he’s still asleep...”

A sob breaks from my throat as I press my eyes closed and sink to the floor, still clutching the door frame, unable to stop the tremors that run through my body. The past minute – the past thirty seconds, even – were some of the most horrible of my life –

The idea the bare idea that someone had come for my baby – my brand–new child, who I love so much, who I worked so hard to bring into this world –

I’m sobbing freely now, unable to catch my breath, panic overtaking me at the thought. I lean my head against the wood, pressing my face against it, unable to contain myself – to even think to do anything but cry my heart out in fear, and panic, and grief and, relief at what I thought happened – but actually didn’t happen at all.

I barely feel Sinclair as he crouches next to me, his hand warm on my back, and it’s only when I hear Rafe’s little mew of unhappiness that I snap my face towards him. Sinclair is kneeling next to me, tears streaking down his own face, holding my baby out towards me – Rafe so small and precious that he almost fits in his father’s huge hand.

Desperate, I grab for Rafe, needing the corporeal reality of him against me. I cry harder then, but am able to take deep breaths as I hold my baby in my arms, pressing him against my chest, and running a shaking hand over his hair. He’s crying a little now too, his sleep interrupted –

“You” I say, my voice trembling as I look up at Sinclair, “you sh–shouldn’t have – woken – him up – ”

Sinclair shakes his head at me, his own lip trembling as he works to hold himself together. “You needed him more than he needed the sleep – we need him.

Sinclair lowers himself fully to the floor then, drawing me and the baby into his lap, wrapping his arms around us. I can feel his breath deepening behind me as I stare down at my child, shushing him, helping him to fall back asleep. It’s a long time before he does, but when he finally does, I take a deep breath and look back up at my mate. “What are we going to do?” I ask, bewildered, desperate.

“What we were always going to do,” Sinclair answers, his voice iron. “Protect our family.” He meets my eyes then, his green gaze glowing with ferocity. “No one will touch our son, Ella," he promises. "You have my word on that. I'll die before I let anyone touch him."

Slowly, I nod, believing every word. Then, new resolve building in me, I take a deep breath and lift myself off of Sinclair's lap, standing up on shaky legs.

"Where is the note?" I ask, surprised by the solidity of my voice. "Here," Sinclair says, unfolding his fist which I think he's probably had clenched since he folded the note the first time.

"Do we," I say, sniffing a little and looking around the room. "Do we have enough security for this?"

"No," Sinclair growls, standing up as well and striding across the room to where his phone is on the bedstand. "I'll set that up now. Until then, Ella?" he says seriously. "None of us leave this room. Not once. We are all going to stay within each others' line of view until the security is in place. Is that understood?"

I nod, feeling a little better to hear the Alpha command taking root in my mate's voice. Then, I head back to Rafe's bassinet, moving slowly and deliberately. When I get there, I calmly lay my baby back down so he can get his rest, exhaling a deep breath as I stand up and smooth my hands over my dress.

—

whoever

I feel control return to me more and more as every moment passes. This person they are — they scared me, I'll admit it. But as I stare down at my child and hear my mate issuing commands into my phone, I reassure myself that whoever this is?

They've taken on the wrong people.

My child is the most precious thing to me in this world. My mate is the most powerful Alpha in the world, perhaps that's ever been born. And me?

Well. Let's just say they'd better be prepared to face the wrath of a goddess, if they ever want to take what's mine.

And this baby is mine.

Fifteen minutes later, the house is swarming with guards. I don't speak with any of them, letting Sinclair handle it. Instead, I sit in the armchair next to Rafe's bassinet, the basket pulled close to me, not letting anyone near us. My wolf inside me has her hackles raised, eyeing every person who passes the door to the room with her teeth bared, suspicious.

That one, she says to me, it's him –

it's him I know it is I know it is – didn't you see his shifty eyes?

I shush her, my teeth clenched, telling myself that Sinclair has clearly vetted our security team that he wouldn't let anyone in this house unless he had secured their loyalties years before.

Still – my wolf growls – someone got close enough to use to leave a note on our doorstep. How good could his security have been? Or, even if his security is as good as we think, what are the holes?

I nod, my wolf's anxiety feeding my own. Was it someone we knew, someone leaving the party? Was it a friend, someone we hold dear?

My mind spins in many different directions, all of them dark and twisted. Still, though my wolf claws inside of me, urging me to chase them all down, to lock the doors, I wait, patiently, for my mate to come into the room. My trust is in him – he will protect us. This, I know, in my bones.

Soon, my patience pays off, and Sinclair strides back into the room. "Ella," he says softly, looking me from head to toe, and then glancing at Rafe, still asleep in his bed. "Are you all right? Is he?"

"We're fine," I say simply, looking into his face and letting him know that even though I am not fine – far, far from it, in fact – that we're well enough that we don't need his direct concern. Sinclair reads this on my face and gives me a sharp nod. "Well?" I ask, all the joy and love that this day raised in me tamped deep down inside my heart. There is nothing left in me, right now, except grim determination. "What did you find out?"

"An old lead," Sinclair says, sighing and crouching down at my side. "An investigation we started months ago – that got lost in the war."

I cock my head to the side, curious. "Ella," he says, taking my hand, "do you remember? Back, in the early stages of your pregnancy, the investigation that I started into who switched the sperm samples in the first place?"

I blink, my mind instantly thrown back to what feels like another life. "We – we weren't even mated then. We weren't even...together. I was your...accidental surrogate..."

He nods, signing and looking down at the floor, clearly frustrated. "My team discovered that someone powerful was behind the switch – that it wasn't Cora, and it wasn't you, obviously, but that someone did switch the samples. Someone wanted you to get pregnant with this child. With Rafe.”

I gasp, my hand going to my mouth as I suddenly remember. I can't believe that we let this slip.

“It's my fault,” Sinclair utters, grief and sorrow and self-ridicule in his voice as he raises his eyes to me and takes my hand. “I...I let it drop. I got distracted. And now...whoever it is that switched them...”

“They're coming to collect...” I breathe, clenching his fingers tightly in mine.

Someone

—

someone who knew my lineage, who knew me more than I knew myself – wanted me pregnant with this child, with Dominic Sinclair's child. And now that he's born?

They want him.

Chapter 311 – Cora at Home

Cora

When I wake up it's almost eight at night and I groan, realizing that my sleep schedule is completely wrecked. I'm reminded, suddenly, of my years as a medical resident when this sort of thing was normal – sleeping all day, taking night shifts, living moment to moment rather than a steady, scheduled life.

And quite frankly, right now? That sounds really wonderful, compared against a whole night of empty hours in which I have nothing to do but...think.

Think about what I'm doing in my life, think about my career which has gone in a really weird direction, think about my relationship...s.

About a certain kiss in the woods. About a sweet doctor who, apparently, wants to build a life with me.

I sigh and sit up, looking around at my sterile little apartment. I never really decorated, I realize as I look around at the grey and beige furniture, the simple linens, the charmless curtains. Everything is functional and high quality but none of it is...me?

Or is it? I frown at my space, thinking of Ella's sweet home that – even though Sinclair picked out most of the furniture before she moved in still sings Ella Ella Ella in every corner. It's warm and sweet and comfortable. What does my space say about me?

I mean, I'm an orphan – I never had any possessions or any control over the environments in which I lived, so where would I have learned to decorate? I never had a mother to show me how. So where did Ella....

I groan, rolling my eyes at myself, sick, again, of being jealous of my sister. I love her so, so much and I'm so happy she has what she wants in her life. But sometimes she's just so... perfect. That it makes me realize how unhappy I am, when I stand next to her.

I roll over, reaching for my phone, seeking some kind of distraction from these disquieting thoughts. But when I pick it up the first thing I see is one of those relationships I'm trying to avoid leaving me an assortment of messages. I sigh and click open my message app. Hank: Hey, Cora – how did the baptism go? Dinner later?

Hank: Cora? You okay? Hank: Hey, send me a text when you get up I know you were up all night but I'm worried that I haven't heard from you.

Sighing, I swipe the messages away and click through the rest of my phone, trying, determinedly, to not let it bother me that there's nothing at all from Roger. Not a peep. As I take a deep breath and check my email, another message from Hank pops up.

Hank: Hey, are you home? I'm...I mean, this is a little pathetic, but I'm outside. Can you let me in? I brought Chinese, in case you're hungry. If I don't hear from you I'll leave it on the table outside your apartment door...

My heart twinges a little bit when I see that. Hank. He's being so sweet and I'm ...well, I'm not being fair to him, am I?

Ella's right. I'm holding a space for Roger, one he doesn't even want – despite what might have passed between us last night, it doesn't change anything. And there's a man standing outside my door with mooshoo pork, dying to love me.

God, what's wrong with me? Quickly, I jump out of my bed and dash for the front door of my apartment.

When I get to it, I yank it open, hoping Hank jumps a little, his eyes going wide, accidentally dropping the large bag of Chinese on the little mail table I keep outside my door. "Gah!"

"Hi!" I say, bright, cheerful – maybe too bright, too cheerful. "I'm so sorry, I continue, smiling at him, "I just woke up – we were up all night. It's I'm very sorry. I should have texted before I fell asleep."

"It's okay," Hank says, giving me his rare, warm smile. "I get it – you had a busy night."

"Do you want to come in?" I ask, leaning against my door frame and gesturing towards my little apartment. "I am...well, I am starving."

"Sure," he says, his lips turning up a bit at the corner. "That sounds great, Cora."

As we sit on the house, the Chinese spread out around us on the coffee table, eating right out of the containers with the supplied chopsticks, Hank tells me all about his day. He held down the fort at the little free clinic we both work at, seeing both prospective mothers as well as general ailments from humans and wolves who currently don't have access to their regular healthcare providers.

It was, apparently, a busy day with some tricky cases. I watch Hank closely as he tells me his story, my eyes flicking over his handsome, serious face his thick brown hair – his strong, capable hands-

And I feel something twist in my stomach as I watch him, something that makes me... well, makes me want to jump across the couch and kiss him....

"Cora?" he asks, making me blink and focus on him. "Did you hear me?" "Hmm?" I ask, shaking myself and forcing myself to listen to his words. Then, I grimace a little. "I'm sorry, Hank," I say, giving him an apologetic look. "I got...lost in my thoughts a little bit. Forgive me. Can you start again?"

"It's okay," he responds, giving me a little wink and reaching out to grab my hand, squeezing it a bit before sitting back. "I was just curious if you think Ella would want to be more involved in the clinic."

"I think she'd be dying to be more involved in the clinic," I respond instantly, looking down at my chicken with broccoli and picking up a morsel."

But she doesn't have any medical experience. Would she really be helpful there? I think that she would do anything – but she's got a big heart, and she's good with people – her skills might be lost on the small sort of administrative help we need most."

"I wasn't thinking about administration," Hank says, swirling some noodles around his chopsticks. And it's true that she doesn't have medical experience, but she does have... healing experience."

I cock my head at him, confused. "Or more precisely...healing powers," Hank clarifies quietly. "Our mother's gift?" I ask, raising my eyebrows at him.

He shrugs a little. "It was incredible, what she was able to do to herself twice now. To bring herself out of that coma that should have killed her. And then I saw her, before my eyes, almost instantly heal wounds that should have incapacitated her for days. If she were able to harness that power...Or, Cora," he says seriously, meeting my eyes now, "if you were able to harness that power..."

"Oh," I say, my mouth going to a little "o" as I lower the takeout to my lap. I had honestly never thought of it – of leveraging my mother's power for the practice of medicine. It seemed somehow...too sacred, too special, to be used to heal bumps and bruises. But could it, should it, be used to cure people on the edge of death, like Ella had been?

Could it be used to fight things like terminal cancer, or deadly wounds? My skin starts to tingle at the possibilities, but I'm wary. I mean, I gave the gift back to Ella – and our mother gave it to her in the first place.

It's hers to use as she wishes. But if I had it, would I use it differently than Ella might? "Sorry," Hank says softly. "Did I...was it wrong to suggest it?"

"No," I say, snapping my attention back to him. "Um, but it's a bigger question than just I can answer. We'll have to ask Ella."

"Well," Hank says with a smile, "now that she's feeling better, maybe we can have that conversation soon. If the gift can truly heal...she could help a lot of people. Quickly.”

“Yeah,” I say, grinning at him, excited. “And it’s not like she’s got anything else on her plate at the moment.”

“Well, neither do we,” says Hank, pushing his takeout aside and moving across the couch to me, taking the container of food out of my hands and putting it on the table next to me. “At least, not for the next twelve hours or so, until we have to go to work.”

I laugh lightly as he moves his body over mine, bringing his face close to me and slipping a hand behind my back.

“Whatever shall we do?” I murmur, happy as I let Hank use that hand on my back to lay me flat on the couch. Then I close my eyes as Hank brings his mouth to mine.

Chapter 312 – Reinforcements

Cora

Hank and I are tangled in the sheets of my bed, talking softly to each other about nothing, when suddenly I hear a pounding on my door – a dangerous, feral, fervent sound.

“What the hell is that,” Hank gasps, sitting up and whipping his head to look towards the front of my apartment.

“I – I don’t know -” I stutter, fear racing through me. The pounding halts for a moment and we both sit there, frozen, not knowing what to do. Then, suddenly, a voice breaks through the silence.

“Cora!” it shouts, and my jaw drops a little because...well, because I know that voice. “Open the damn door, Cora!”

“Oh my god,” I murmur, standing up and wrapping my naked body in my sheets weirdly bashful in this moment. As I do, the pounding starts again. “Do you know who it is?” Hank asks, hurriedly getting out of bed and pulling his pants on.

“Yes,” I breathe, quickly switching the sheets for my robe hanging on the back of my door and then rushing through the living room. “It’s fucking...”

But Hank, standing at the doorway to my bedroom, sees for himself the moment I pull the door open. Roger’s fist is still raised as my door flies open, but he drops it as he glares down at me. “God damn it, Cora,” he growls, storming past me into the apartment, don’t you ever check your pho-

He freezes and goes silent, though, the moment he sees Hank standing in the doorway to my bedroom, pulling on his shirt. And then Roger turns slowly and looks at me, taking me in from head to toe in my bathrobe. He doesn’t say a word, rendered, apparently, speechless.

“What are you doing here, Roger?!” I hiss, filling the void that his silence left as I slamming the door shut and stalking forward to give him a shove. “You scared the hell out of us!”

“Cora, damn it,” Roger growls, snapping out of his shock and turning his attention to me as he blatantly ignores Hank. “It’s a crisis – Ella and Sinclair have been blowing up your phone for an hour -”

“What?!” I gasp, looking all over – and then finally spotting my phone, wedged between the pillows of the couch. I dash to it and grab it and see that Roger is right – that Ella has been calling me for the past hour, as well as sending texts. I quickly flick through them, glancing at Roger as I do.

“What’s what’s this all about ” I stutter in fear, my heart suddenly in my throat. I can’t grasp the whole situation – but there’s something about Rafe, and kidnapping, and a note – “Is the baby-”

“He’s fine for now,” Roger growls, moving close to me and wrapping his hand around my upper arm, “but they need you. It’s something about the sperm bank, they think they want to talk to you about what happened that day-”

I look up at him, shocked. “What? The sperm months ago!?” “Yes!” he almost yells. “God, Cora, let’s go – – you can ask all of these questions in the car!”

I sense his fury, his worry and his impatience, but all it breeds in me is defiance. “Fine!” I shout. “God, Roger, give me ten seconds! Obviously I’m coming!” I rip my arm from his hand and glare at him as I move towards my bedroom door, giving Hank a not-too-gentle nudge back into the bedroom and closing the door behind us.

“What’s going on?” Hank asks, all steady cool and deliberation. I glance at him, my stomach warming. At least he’s good in a crisis. I hand Hank my phone as I move to my dresser. “Can you give me a summary of Ella’s texts as I get dressed? I can’t do both at once.”

Hank nods, brisk, and does as I ask, reading some of the texts aloud to me, skipping through the ones that he deems less important. Overall I get the gist and my heart wrenches to think of what my sister is going through as I hurriedly pull on some sporty leggings and a t-shirt. After all that she went through with the pregnancy, I had thought this was over for her –

“Cora!” Roger shouts, banging on my door, interrupting one of Hank’s readings. “Seriously!? What’s taking so long! Let’s go!”

“I’m COMING!” I shout towards the door, fed up with his impatience. “God damn Alpha bullshit...” I mutter as I pull on my sneakers, not bothering to tie the laces. Then, I stand up, tucking my hair behind my ears as Hank crosses the room to me and hands me my phone, lifting one hand to my face.

“That’s a pretty good summary of the messages,” he says softly, rubbing his thumb over my cheek and looking into my eyes. “Are you going to be all right? Is there any way I can help?”

“No,” I sigh, lifting my hand to cover his and shaking my head a little. ” Thank you, Hank, but -”

“Cora!” The yell and a single pound comes again and I realize, suddenly, that of course Roger has wolf hearing and is using it to spy on our conversation.

I glare at the door, hate in my eyes, but then I nod towards it. “Come on,” I say, moving away from Hank. “We’d better get moving before he rips it down.”

“I’m not going to rip it down,” I hear Roger growl, disgruntled, but I just roll my eyes and pull the door open.

“Ready?” I ask, breezing past him. “I’ve been ready,” he snarls, walking swiftly to keep up with me. We pass through the door together and then awkwardly wait for Hank to catch up.

“Thanks, Hank,” I say, giving him a smile as I lean down to lock my apartment door. “For the food and...the nice time.”

“Anytime, Cora,” he replies, and I can hear the smile in his voice even as I concentrate on my keys. “You’ll let me know how it goes?”

“Of course I will” I respond, turning towards him, but suddenly I’m almost yanked off my feet by someone grabbing my hand and tugging me with them.

“Oh my god,” Roger groans, hauling me away from Hank and down the hall. “Cora let’s go!”

“Let go of me!” I cry, smacking at his hand on mine, but it does nothing. I remember to turn and wave to Hank as we turn the corner towards the stairs. Hank awkwardly returns my wave as he watches Roger and I disappear.

Roger, predictably, does not let go of me and I almost have to jog behind him as he strides down the stairs and out to the parking lot where his car is still running.

“Is Rafe being kidnapped right now?” I ask, angry, moving fast towards the passenger seat when he lets go of my hand. “What’s the rush?”

“The rush,” Roger replies, glaring at me as he and I simultaneously sink into our seats and close the doors behind us, “is that our nephew is in danger, and our siblings want us there now.”

“Fine,” I reply, sneering at him a bit as I buckle my seat belt. “Drive on. Try not to get us killed on the way.”

Roger doesn’t reply, just peels out of the parking lot and heads down the dark road at breakneck speed. I'm pinned back into my seat but am surprised to find that I'm not at all scared. Somehow, I trust Rodger's reflexes and his driving skills. I trust that he knows what he's doing. "God," Roger says, rolling down the window and huffing out a breath of disgust.

"What?" I ask, inclined to be angry but curious about what he hell could bother him now. He got me into the car in less than five minutes, didn't he? What could possibly be wrong?

"You smell like him," Roger growls, revulsion and...something else thick on his words. "He's all over you. Gross."

I stare at Roger for a second, appalled, and then I can't help the little smile that creeps onto my lips, despite everything.

"Don't be jealous," I murmur, my words barely audible as I turn to look out the window and watch the scenery pass. But with that wolf hearing? I know he hears me. And I see the effect of my words in the window's reflection as I watch him flinch.

Chapter 313 – Sister Support

Ella

“Ella!” I hear my sister’s voice cry the same moment I hear the front door to the house open. I stand quickly from my seat in Sinclair’s office, Rafe awake and peaceful in my arms, and move to the open doorway.

“Cora!” I call. I see her spin away from the living room where she was looking for me and jog down the hall towards me, Roger closing the house’s main door behind him as he enters as well. Cora takes my shoulders in her hands as soon as she gets close.

“Are you – are you all right?” she gasps, looking me over, and then looking down towards the baby. I can see a little relief come into her face the moment she sees us both before her, intact and safe.

“We’re okay,” I say, giving her a little smile. “For right now,” we’re okay. Thank you for coming so late at night.” My sister snaps her eyes up at me, frowning a little.

“What?” I ask. “I just...” she says, confused, glancing back at Roger, “I didn’t expect you to be so calm.”

“Well, it happened like, eleven hours ago,” I say, raising my eyebrows at her. “We’ve had some time to process and plan – ”

Suddenly she scowls, turning fully to glare at Roger coming down the hall towards us. “The way this one was pounding on my door, flying around like a bat out of hell – ”

“More like a bat into hell,” he mutters, his frustrated expression matching Cora’s. “It wasn’t exactly peaceful heading into your apartment, which smelled like wonton soup and -”

“Oh shut up,” Cora huffs, narrowing her eyes at Roger and then turning back to me. Roger opens his mouth to retort but I reach out and give him a little shove and turn to my sister. Clearly in a mood, Roger just shakes his head and goes into the office, where Sinclair is still talking to some of the investigators.

“Ella,” Cora continues when he’s gone, “why didn’t you text me earlier if this happened hours ago? There wasn’t anything on my phone when I woke up from my nap at 9 – and then all of a sudden Roger’s pounding on my door – ”

“It’s complicated,” I say, hesitating and looping my arm with Cora’s at the elbow, pulling my sister close because I know what I’m about to say is going to piss her off. “Sinclair brought in his team of investigators – the ones who were working on the question of the switched sperm sample before the war and they wanted to...clear you. Before I was allowed to text you.” “Clear me?” Cora asks, confused..

“Yeah,” I say, my mouth pulling into a grimace. “As a...suspect.” “WHAT!?” My sister shouts, her voice ringing out through the house. Rafe flinches and starts to cry, still cuddled in my arm.

“Cora!” I sigh, giving her an exasperated look as I unloop my arm from hers and work to settle the baby, bobbing him in my arms. “Obviously Sinclair and I don’t suspect you! But his team needs to be thorough, and you were the last one who we know had the sample! It makes sense, from an investigative standpoint!”

“I can’t believe I was a suspect! After everything!” Cora says, her voice softer now, but no less angry.

“You were a suspect for like, three hours,” I reply, rolling my eyes and wishing to mollify her because, honestly, it was more like six hours. ” And obviously you were cleared! So!” I shrug and look at her pleadingly, ” maybe move on from it!”

My sister brings both of her hands to her face and covers it, taking a minute to breathe in deeply and then exhale. Then, slowly, she pulls her hands down her face, tucking them beneath her chin in two fists, a gesture I remember from our childhood when she was truly upset.

“You know I would never hurt you, Ella,” Cora says, her voice as pleading as it is insistent. “Cora,” I say, shaking my head at her, my eyes wide with apology. “You know that I know you have nothing to do with this just...please, let it pass.”

“It’s true, Cora,” Sinclair says, peeking out from the office. “Forgive my investigators – they were just following process and being thorough.”

Cora sighs and I see that she understands. “Okay,” she says, nodding. “I get it. But, what can I do now?”

“We need to go back to that day,” Sinclair says, his hands in his pockets as he slowly walks over to us. “You have more knowledge of it than the rest of us – you were there. We’d like to see if you remember anything from that afternoon that could help.”

“I mean,” Cora says, running a hand through her hair. “Of course – se – I’ll tell you everything. But don’t your investigators have the notes?” Cora asks, confused, “from the last time we talked? I told you everything I know.”

I give my sister a wide, too-eager smile. “Well...” I say, my voice wheedling as I passes the baby to Sinclair and take both of Cora's hands. The baby calms almost instantly in Sinclair's arms. "How do you feel about...trying a little recreational drug common in Vanara!?"

Cora's face drops along with her jaw. "Are you serious? Ether?" she asks, awed. "Do you – you want me to do hypnosis?"

"It's not bad!" I insist, that too-big smile still pasted on my face. "It just makes you remember! And then you're just a little hungry afterwards, that's all!"

Cora opens her mouth but she's interrupted by a knock at the door. I look up at Sinclair, who nods to me, handing the baby back and going to answer it himself. After all, if someone is coming to take our baby they're going to think twice when they realize that they have to go through my gigantic mate to get him.

And also, they probably wouldn't knock politely on the front door. Cora and I watch interestedly as Sinclair opens the door and peeks out, and then opens it wide. "Leon!" Sinclair says warmly, inviting the doctor in with a warm handshake. "Thank you so much for coming out so late at night."

"You brought the hypnotist in?" Cora whispered to me, awed. "From Vanara?" "He was already here," I respond dismissively, waving my hand. Sinclair had him flown over weeks ago, he's on call. "For what!"

"Whatever hypnosis needs crop up," I say, looking at my sister, surprised at the question. Isn't it obvious?

Cora crosses her arms. "Do you seriously think that's necessary?" she asks, raising an eyebrow. "Well," I say, waving around at the house, indicating our current situation. "Aren't you glad he did?!"

Cora groans a little and sighs. "Well, sure, she says, "I'm glad you'll get your answers, Ella, but I have to say that I'm not looking forward to having to take drugs to do it. You know I don't like mind-altering things."

"It's okay," I reply, moving close to my 'sister and giving her a little nudge with my shoulder. "It's not so bad. You know I appreciate this, right?" I ask, looking into my sister's eyes, needing her to understand that I'd never ask unless it was necessary.

"Duh, Ella," she says, crossing her arms and sighing. "Obviously I'll do it – anything for you. But I'm allowed to wish other methods were possible."

"Thank you," I say, coming close to give Cora a little kiss and then taking her arm and pulling her towards the kitchen. “Now come on, let’s go pick out some snacks for after. I’ve got some really good ones...”

Chapter 314 – Ether Confessions

Ella

“I really must insist,” Leon says awkwardly, looking around at the packed guest bedroom, “that we...thin the crowd. Just a bit.”

“Well, I’m not leaving,” I say, stepping forward and bouncing Rafe in my arms as I look down at my sister laying on the bed. Cora is awkward and uncomfortable as she looks around at the collection of investigators, at Roger, at me, Rafe, and Sinclair, all standing around her. Leon sits primly squeezed into a chair at her side.

“Perhaps...the child?” Leon suggests and I sigh, realizing that he’s right. I turn to Sinclair, my eyes pleading. “Can you?” I ask. Sinclair blanches at me. “Ella – I have to be here to hear this ”

“Please,” I say, stepping towards him.” Maybe we can...like, is there a way to make a video feed? Or sound? So you can hear in another room?”

Leon’s eyebrows go up. “That would work,” he says, looking at Sinclair, who nods firmly, reaching out for Rafe.

“I owe you,” I whisper to him, standing on my toes to give him a kiss on the cheek and handing the baby to him. “I can’t leave her.”

“I understand,” Sinclair murmurs back, “I’ll send someone up with AV equipment in a few minutes.” He brushes my cheek with his thumb before signaling to the investigators to leave the room with him. I turn back to my sister and then blink when I see Roger still standing in the corner, his arms crossed.

“What are you still doing here?” I ask, surprised. Roger just stares at me for a moment, apparently appalled that I would ask. “I’m the lead investigator on this, Ella!” he informs me, frustrated, throwing out an explanatory hand. “I need to be here! To ask questions! To guide the investigation!”

“Ooooookay!” I say, putting my hands up placatingly. “I just didn’t know lead investigators were usually so pissy.” “Pissy!” Roger gasps, leaning forward to me, aghast. “Ella, I -”

“Roger,” Leon says, holding up a hand towards him. “We need a calm environment for this to work, and your level of agitation is...non-conducive.”

Roger stares at Leon, his mouth open, shocked to have been put in his place so politely. “Yeah,” Cora says, grinning at Roger and wrinkling her nose at him. “So, in other words, stop being so pissy.”

Roger stares between us for a moment and then leans back against the wall with his eyes closed, taking a deep breath and raising a hand to press the bridge of his nose between his fingers. Sisters..." he mutters, "I am never again spending any time at all with... sisters."

A younger member of Sinclair's team enters quietly then, nodding to me and beginning to set up a computer and a microphone on Cora's far side. He works quickly while Roger composes himself and Leon prepares the ether shot. I sit down on the end of the bed, putting a hand on Cora's ankle – the only thing near enough for me to touch and mouth "thank you" to her.

She sighs and leans her head back on the pillow, nodding to me and accepting her fate.

"Now Cora," Leon says, placing a comforting hand on her shoulder that makes her flinch. I grimace, knowing how tense she is about this. "I know that you're aware of some of Ella's experiences with hypnosis, but everyone's journeys are a little different. I'm going to give you the shot, and then I'll guide you back to your memories of that day. You'll hear my voice, and then, when you've accessed your memories, Roger will join me in asking you some questions. Is that all right?"

"Can I stop whenever I want?" Cora asks, looking anxiously up at the doctor. "If I get... scared?"

"Yes," the doctor assures her, tightening his hand a little on her shoulder. "The antidote is right here. We will stop whenever you'd like. And if you'd like to give permission to your sister as well, we can stop whenever she gives the word as well, if she sees that you are in distress. Would you like to give your sister permission for that?"

Cora nods eagerly and looks at me for confirmation. I slowly bob my head, letting her know that I've got her back, as I always do.

"All right then," Leon says, smiling around at Cora and Roger and me. Then let's get this started, nice and easy."

Cora exhales a deep breath and closes her eyes again. She doesn't flinch at all as Leon presses the needle to her arm, though I suppose that is normal, as she's a doctor who gives injections all day long.

I see Cora's eyes start to flicker, though, a little behind her eyelids as the ether takes over and she quickly enters a dreamy half-awake state. I watch her, curious, wondering if I looked the same under Leon's care. His eyes also on Cora, Roger comes and sits next to me on the bed, wanting to be closer to the action. I give him a warm little nudge of my shoulder, both in welcome and apology for teasing him a few minutes earlier. I'm glad he's here.

"Hello Cora," Leon says quietly after a few minutes. "How are you feeling?"

"I'm just fine," she says, a peaceful smile on her face. "Where are you?" he asks. "I'm at my apartment," Cora replies, her voice carefree. I blink, surprised. This is indeed different than my own hypnotic states.

"Ah," Leon says, nodding and taking a little notepad out of the bag at his side, starting to write a little. "And is this a happy place for you?" Cora shrugs and makes a noncommittal noise. "Eh. I'd rather be at work."

"Do you like work, Cora?" I see my sister nod and smile, my heart warming to see her happiness. "I like to be helpful," she says, her voice breezy. "And busy."

"That is lovely, Cora. Why don't you go to work now, and tell me when you're there." There's a pause and then Cora nods. Leon continues. "What day is it, Cora?" he asks, his voice gentle. "It's today," she says, almost as if Leon is stupid for asking. "Duh." I bite my lip to hold back a little laugh.

"Well today is very dull isn't it," Leon says, his voice peaceful, soothing, and persuasive. "Let's go back a little bit in time. To that day, a few months ago, when your sister came to you and you helped her conceive her little baby. Can you go there?"

Cora inhales a deep, peaceful breath and then a few moments later exhales it. "All right," she says, her voice humming now with contentment and ease. "Ella is coming soon. I am excited."

"Go ahead, Cora," Leon encourages, and I shift my gaze to him, interested to see the different way that he's handling my sister's hypnosis. He took a much more hands-off approach when I was in his care, but I can see that his careful guidance here is really precisely what Cora needs. I smile at him, pleased that Sinclair had the forethought to bring him onto our team. "Tell us what is happening," Leon continues.

"I'm preparing the sample," Cora reports, a happy little smile on her lips. "We keep them onsite frozen in liquid nitrogen. We had...several vials of this patient." She yawns a little, relaxing more deeply into the memory. "But I'm just taking out one."

"And were you quite careful, Cora?" Leon asks, his voice more curious than accusatory. "To ensure that it was the sample from the donor that Ella selected?"

"Oh yes," Cora murmurs. "No mistakes there. Donor 284726. I can see it on the vial as well as on the paperwork. It's the right one." My eyes raise, interested to see that under hypnosis she can remember such details.

“What’s next, Cora?” Leon prods, still calmly taking notes on his sheet. “I take it into the lab for thawing to room temperature,” she murmurs. Then, I will check it for motility to ensure that the specimen is viable.”

“Is that what you’re doing now?” Leon asks. “No,” Cora replies with a happy little sigh. “No, I can’t. Because there’s someone already in the lab,” she replies, content. My blood runs cold at her words, as I realize that this is a detail she didn’t tell us before.

“Who is it?” Leon says calmly, as if Cora just told him she saw a pretty bird and he’s asking what color its feathers were. His voice betrays none of my shock and anxiety.

“A priest,” she murmurs. “A priest?” Leon continues. “What kind of priest – a catholic priest? Or a priest of the goddess?”

“No,” she murmurs, shaking her head as if that’s a silly suggestion. “No, this one’s robes are like the goddess robes. But they’re all black.”

Chapter 315 – Determination

Ella

I gasp and quickly reach out my hand to clasp Roger's. I feel that he is just as tense as I am as we both sit on the end of the bed, staring at Cora.

Leon flicks his gaze to me and gives me a very subtle shake of his head and a tiny frown. It's a small gesture, but the meaning is clear: I absolutely must not disturb Cora's state. As a precaution, I raise a hand to my mouth and cover it, knowing that in the upcoming moments I may hear details that make me react involuntarily.

Roger squeezes my other hand tightly as Leon continues. "Cora," Leon continues, curious. "I admit that I am intrigued by this man, this priest. Can you tell me more about him? What details do you remember?"

"It's...hard," Cora says, and I see her brow ruffle. "He...he didn't want me to remember." "That's very frustrating," Leon continues, his voice like honey. "Just tell me what you see."

"He's tall," Cora says, her frown deepening. "He has pale skin and dark hair...he's not old, but not young. His robe is black." She gives a little shrug and huffs a sigh through her nose. I can see that she's frustrated, even in her hypnotic state.

"That's all right, Cora, that's wonderful detail," Leon says soothingly. I hear Roger's mouth pop open and snap my head to him, but Leon holds up one finger towards us, begging patience while he continues. "What happened next, my dear?" Leon asks.

"He told me," she says, sighing, "to destroy the sample in my hand – to wash it down the sink, and then discard the vial. And then, once I did that," she sighs, almost peaceful again, "he had me go to the other freezer – the one with the shifter samples – and to take out number 7285692. So I did. And then I prepared that, and tested it for motility, and when it was ready," she shrugs, "I went into the exam room and helped Ella."

"Thank you, Cora," Leon says smoothly, smiling at her. "That is wonderful detail. You've remembered it all so beautifully." Then, he turns to Roger and nods, giving him permission to take control of the investigation.

"Cora," Roger says, releasing my hand and crossing his arms over his chest. "Can you hear me?" "Roger?" she asks, her eyes still closed. "What are you doing here in my lab?"

"I'm just...visiting..." he says awkwardly, clearly not very good at the kind of play acting that Cora's hypnosis requires.

"You're not allowed to be back here," she says, frowning.

Roger scoffs a little, as if remembering that she had no protests about a strange man in black robes who apparently took control of her will and made her switch sperm samples before inseminating me. I give Roger a hard nudge with my elbow and when he turns to me I give him a stern frown, clearly communicating that he needs to be nice to my sister. This was, after all, not her fault.

Roger sighs and nods, agreeing to my terms. "Cora," he continues, "what did the priest say to you before he left? Did he ask you to...forget anything? Or do anything special with the sample?"

"No," she says, turning her head to the side and considering. "He simply...took my hands, before I went, and there was a white light...and then he was gone. "And then you took the sample," Roger asks, "and you didn't know to whom it belonged?"

"No," she says, folding her hands in her lap, looking – if anything – a little bored. "I thought, at the time, that it was the right sample. I thought it was the donor."

"Very good, Cora," Leon murmurs reassuringly next to her. "You're doing wonderfully." A little smile comes onto her face.

"Cora," Roger says again. "Did you ever see the priest again?" he asks, after that day?"

"No," she says simply, with a little shrug. But then, a darkness passes over her face, and she frowns. Leon sits up, peering at her closely, and then looks at me, worried.

"Cora," I say, intuiting that Roger may have hit on something here but... perhaps, just asked the wrong question. "Ella?" she says, her voice a little scared.

"Yes, Cora, it's me," I say softly, quickly standing up and moving to her side, sitting back down on the bed and taking her hand. I'm probably blocking the remote investigators' view of Cora now, but I don't care. My sister is more important.

"Oh hey, Ella," she says, her voice wavering a little bit, afraid. "Cora," I say, as gently as I can. "You said you don't remember seeing the man in the black robe after that day.... but did you ever see him before?"

"Ella," my sister says, her lip starting to tremble. She turns to me, unseeing, and grasps my hand tightly. "Ella..."

"Cora," I say, worried, glancing between her and Leon, desperate. And then, my sister goes rigid with terror, her eyes flying open, and she tilts back her head and screams. Again and again – her screams are unending – she barely draws breath before the next one begins –

“The antidote!” I shout, throwing my body across her, working to hold her, to keep her down. Leon, clearly startled, fumbles with the shot at her side, his hands shaking. But suddenly Roger is there, snatching it from his hands – leaning over and injecting Cora in the arm where Leon administered the first shot – and all the time she’s screaming, a sound of pure terror –

Roger’s leans over Cora now, reaching for her face, calling her name – and then slowly, so slowly, her screams subside, and she comes back to us.

“Cora,” I say, raising both of my hands to her cheeks as tears slip down her face. She looks at me, panting, starting to sob.

“Ella,” she cries, reaching for me, and I wrap my sister in my arms, climbing fully onto the bed so I can hold her close. Roger, panting with the anxiety of the situation, watches us for a second as the door behind him bursts open and Sinclair is suddenly there.

“Is she is she all right?” he gasps, moving briskly into the room, his team of investigators behind him.

“She’ll be fine,” I murmur soothingly, hoping desperately that I’m right. My sister looks at no one, her face buried against my shoulder as I slowly rub her back, rocking her. I make quiet shushing sounds, the same I make to Rafe when he’s having a hard night. It’s all I know to do in a moment like this- just to be soft, and quiet, and create a safe space for her to deal with whatever just happened.

“I’m I’m so sorry,” Leon says shakily, “it must have been a traumatic memory-”

“It’s all right,” I say quietly, both to him and to Cora. “It’s no one’s fault – it’s okay.”

Sinclair reaches out a hand and puts it warmly on Leon’s shoulder, nodding to him, letting him know that we don’t hold his practice to blame. Then Sinclair nods towards the door, suggesting that Leon can leave the room if he wishes, an invitation which Leon accepts with a shaky nod. I watch the two of them leave to join the investigators in the hall. Sinclair closes the door behind them to give us some privacy.

“Cora,” Roger begins, hesitating. I watch him as he puts a hand out to her shoulder, laying it softly there, a gesture which makes Cora flinch at first, but from which she doesn’t pull away. Then, he pushes. “Cora, what did you see?”

Cora gasps and curls hard against me, and I can feel her whole body go rigid as she turns away from the memory – whatever it is –

Clearly, she is not ready to share. “Go, Roger,” I growl at him, holding my sister tighter. “But we need to -” “Go!” I snap, ready to tear him to pieces. It’s a bit of an unfair reaction, I know, but when my sister is upset like this? I’m not going to let anyone push her beyond her boundaries. Not for an instant.

“Ella,” Roger says warningly, frowning at me as he stands and sinks his hands into his pockets. He’s desperate, I know, to know more – which is his job, I remind myself. He’s trying to help – to answer important questions that will help me protect our child. I force myself to be more graceful than I feel. Like being in this current moment.

“Just...give us a second, Roger,” I say, meeting his eyes steadily, hoping he sees and recognizes the full complications of this moment, how torn I am, along with him. “Just give us a minute, okay?”

He sighs, but then nods. “All right. I...I hope...” then he sighs again, shaking his head. “I’ll give you two a minute.” And then he leaves the room, and I hold my sister until she cries herself out.

Chapter 316 – Safe?

Ella

Forty-five minutes later, I back out of the bedroom, snicking the door shut behind me. Then, I stand up, closing my eyes and exhaling a long breath. “Is she all right?” a voice hisses, right behind me.

I leap about a foot in the air, managing to muffle my shriek as I spin to see my mate standing about six inches from me, looking down with a worried expression. I smack him, hard, against the chest – more to get my adrenaline out than to actually hurt him – and glare up at him, mad at him for scaring me like that. Sinclair just blinks at me, waiting, my smack having had no effect on him at all.

“Back up,” I whisper, putting my hands on his wide, muscled chest and pushing backwards. “She’s asleep, finally where is the baby?”

“He’s here,” Roger says, standing at the end of the hall with his godson in his arms. I smile, a little, at the sight as I move forward with my arms open. Roger quietly passes my baby to me and I smile down at my son, something in my body that has been anxious without him in the same room as me finally coming to rest.

“Seriously, Ella,” Sinclair says, looking back towards the closed door of our guest room. “Is Cora okay?”

“I don’t know,” I say, looking towards the door anxiously. “Leon came back about ten minutes later, offering a sedative so she could sleep. I told him to give it as long as it wouldn’t give her bad dreams. Or any dreams.”

“Did she...say anything?” Sinclair asks, still facing the door. I frown up at him, a little annoyed by his singular focus on information. “You know she’s your sister too now, Dominic,” I snap, my own emotions a bit on edge. “You could show a little more concern for her welfare, and not just see her as a source of information.”

Sinclair swiftly turns his attention to me, anger and frustration immediately on his face, but then he softens. “I’m sorry, Ella,” he says, sincere. “I didn’t mean it like that. You know her health and safety are my first priority. I was just curious if you learned anything new.”

I sigh, stepping forward closer to my mate, leaning my body against him. “I’m sorry,” I murmur. “I was unfair.” “You’re tired, and stressed,” he murmurs against my hair. “You haven’t had any sleep in about forty- eight hours...”

“I’m going in with her,” Roger says suddenly, striding towards the guest room door. “Wha-“I start, but he turns to me with his hand on the knob, giving me a look so fierce it steals the words from my mouth.

“I’m not going to do anything, Ella,” Roger bites out, his voice stern but with an undercurrent of strong emotion. “I’m just going to...be there, all right? In case she needs anything. You two go get some sleep,” he says, his face softening. “The house is guarded – Cora will be all right with me. Just... you need sleep. She needs someone to sit with her. It makes sense. Okay?”

I feel my eyes fill with tears at the sweet sincerity of my brother-in-law and, seeing them, Sinclair wraps an arm around my shoulder. “Come on, trouble,” he murmurs to me, nodding to Roger – who disappears into the bedroom and guiding me towards our – own room. “You’re overwrought – let’s get you down for a nap.’

“How can I sleep,” I gasp, my voice shaky, wiping a tear from my face. “How can I sleep when someone is coming for my baby – when my sister –

“You have to sleep,” Sinclair murmurs, ushering Rafe and I into the room and closing the door behind us. Then he takes me by the shoulders and moves me towards the bed, taking the sleeping baby from my arms and placing him in his basinet close to my side of the bed.

I cry out a little when my baby leaves my arms. “Just for a moment,” Sinclair murmurs, turning back to me and – to my surprise – beginning to undress me, tugging my shirt up over my head and arms and then sitting me down on the mattress, tugging off my leggings.

When I’m in my underwear he leaves me for a moment, disappearing into the closet and returning with a soft nightgown, which he slides gently over my head. That done, he quickly dips down, lifting Rafe and returning him to my arms.

“There now,” he says, kneeling down in front of me, which absurdly brings his head basically eye-level with mine. “You trust me, right?” he asks, and, sniffing, I nod vigorously. “And you know I’d never let anyone hurt or take Rafe, yes?”

Again, I nod. “Then, sleep, darling,” he says, lifting a hand to my face and gently cupping my cheek. “Because in a couple of hours, your baby is going to need you – and your sister – and your pack. You’ve got to sleep so you can be strong for them.”

My lip trembles a little in overwrought exhaustion then. A little part of me knows that Sinclair is talking to me like a child, and resents it, but a larger part of me...god, it needs it. It needs the simple reassurance, the warm reminder that – at my most basic level. – I am cared for, and safe.

Nodding to Sinclair and sending a burst of gratitude down our bond, I turn away from my mate and tuck my feet in underneath the blankets, taking the baby with me. "Tonight he sleeps in the bed with us, okay?" I murmur, laying the swaddled baby down flat on the mattress between where Sinclair and I sleep. I move all of the pillows and blankets away from him so he'll be safe. "I want him close."

"Excellent idea," Sinclair murmurs, stripping down to his underwear and climbing into the bed with us. Then, he leans forward, kissing Rafe softly on the head before laying his own head back on the pillow.

I almost fall asleep when, scared, I open my eyes again, looking around. But all I see is Sinclair's eyes, open, meeting mine calmly. "You're safe, Ella," he whispers. "We all are. Go to sleep."

And so, comforted, I obey.

Cora

My body flinches, awake in an instant, and I sit stark straight in the bed in the strange room – looking around – frantic –

I hear noise at my side and flinch away from it spinning to see –

But to my surprise, it's just...Roger, starting awake in an armchair by the side of my bed –

"Cora," he gasps, his voice still thick with sleep. "You scared me. Are you -"

But I'm panting, a hand pressed to my heart as I stare at him as I remember the events of last night – the strange, half-waking dream where I remembered...

And then I'm scurrying backwards in the bed, eager to press my back against something, looking around the room for him for the priest in the black robes –

My breath comes fast and I'm panting, my heartrate instantly soaring despite being asleep moments ago –

"Cora!" Roger exclaims, instantly at my side, taking my hand. I cling to his fingers, my hand still pressed against my chest as I panic. "It's all right," he says, his voice soothing as he hesitates and then moves closer to me Suddenly he's at my side, the right side of his body pressed to my left. He lets go of my hand for a moment to slide that arm around my shoulders, pulling me tight against him.

"You're all right, Cora," Roger murmurs reassuringly, holding me tight against him.

"You're all right. I've got you.

And then, slowly, I start to believe him. I close my eyes, trusting him, allowing my heartrate to come back down to a normal pace. I take a deep breath and make myself remember that I am in my sister's house, which is heavily guarded. That no one can get in. That... that Roger's here. That I'm safe.

"Roger," I say softly a minute later, when I feel able. "Roger, I remember everything..."

"Tell me, Cora," he murmurs, his lips soft against my hair. "Tell me everything."

Chapter 317 – Difficult Memories

Cora

“Um, should we go get Ella?” I ask, hesitant. Because while I do just want to spill everything right here, right now, while I feel so safe with Roger, I do know that Ella will want to hear this. And quite frankly, I don’t want to tell it twice.

I see him walking towards the door and instantly miss his warmth beside me. Suddenly, I very much don’t want to be alone in this room. “I’ll come with you,” I say in a hurry, scootching off the bed and moving to his side.

“All right,” he says, smiling down at me as he opens the door. Then, we both move through it together, me just a step behind so that Roger can lead the way. I glance at the grandfather clock down the wall – still a little askew, I realize, from one of Ella’s wheelchair adventures – and see that it’s early – probably too early to wake them, when they’ve gotten so little sleep.

“Should we,” I say, hesitating as we arrive at their bedroom door, but Roger just shakes his head at me. “They’ll want to know,” he says, twisting the knob and pushing the door open just a crack so we can peek inside.

We’re met with an instant snarl as Sinclair sits up in bed, hearing the door open and reacting instantly against a potential threat. I gasp, falling back a step, but Roger’s hand is instantly on my back, holding me steady.

“It’s all right, Dominic,” Roger calls out, pushing the door open fully so Sinclair and Ella can see us. I see, then, that the pair of them were already mostly awake – Ella nursing Rafe quietly in bed while Sinclair dozed next to her. The instinctual fear that kindled in me at the sound of Sinclair’s snarl begins to fade as I see the actual sweet reality of the scene before me.

“Cora!” Ella, cries, working to stand up, but I move into the bedroom before she can.

“No,” I say, crossing the room to her bedside. “Stay down – you’re busy, obviously “Are you all right?” she asks, worried, reaching out a hand to take mine.

“Um,” I say, looking between her and Sinclair, blushing a little to see that Sinclair is mostly naked. Roger, at my side again, doesn’t blush at all even though he can see most of Ella’s breast as she mothers all the time – but the casual way that wolves accept the naked body...I’m not sure I’ll ever get used to it.

I’m reminded, quite suddenly, of Hank’s awkwardness when confronted with Ella and Sinclair’s frank comfort with their bodies and their sexuality – he’s a surgeon, after all, not an OBGYN – and suddenly I think –

Oh my god, Hank.

–

I haven't – I haven't contacted him all since I've been here at Ella's house, he's probably going crazy with worry – honestly, I haven't even thought of him, and suddenly I feel so incredibly guilty considering that last night we...

Blushing, I feel in my pockets for my phone, but it's not there "Everything... all right?" Roger asks, looking down at me with concern and maybe a little bit of suspicion.

"Fine," I return, giving him a false little smile and folding my hands neatly in front of me. I'll contact Hank later. Now, we've got more important things to do. "Ella," I say, looking at her seriously again. "I...I remember things. Important things. I think you should hear it."

"All right," Ella says, her eyes wide and genuine, curious but not pressuring me. "Whenever you're ready."

Ella

Cora sits down on my bed, exhaling a deep, shaky breath. I look up at Roger curiously for a second, but his eyes are trained on my sister, watching, listening. I adjust my hold on Rafe, who is still happily eating, and lean back against Sinclair, who wraps his arms around me for physical and emotional support.

"I can't believe I forgot it," Cora says, looking down at her hands and shaking her head. "It's like a nightmare you forget about it in the morning when you wake up, but then something reminds you of it, and it all comes crashing back."

"What is it, Cora?" I whisper, wanting to let her go at her own pace but also dying to know.

"The man," she says, looking up and meeting my gaze. "Don't you remember him, Ella?"

"I—I didn't see him, Cora," I say, shaking my head. "I didn't see what you saw in the hypnosis. Maybe if I did – I'd have the same memories – but, no..."

"He's – he's been following us our whole lives," Cora whispers, looking down at her hands. I can see tears starting in her eyes again and my heart wrenches to see her so upset. "He never approached us – never spoke to us. But I would see him, like a specter from a dream – suddenly, he'd be there. Standing across the school yard, watching us. At the end of the hall in the dark, watching us. And then, once, at the foot of my bed in the orphanage – I saw him, standing there, watching me sleep.

Cora's voice catches now and she presses a hand to her neck, closing her eyes tight against the memory. "And every time I saw him – I'd forget him, until I saw him again – and then I'd remember –"

"Oh, Cora," I coo, leaning forward towards her. "That's so horrible

"And he's the one," she says, raising her eyes and shaking her head at me. "He's the one who made me switch the sperm samples – I'm so sorry, Ella – it's all my fault it really was me who did it – "

"No, Cora," I say, fierce, taking her hand and squeezing it hard. "You did everything right – that priest, he did something to you, hypnotized you, made you forget.

"Don't forget, Cora," Sinclair adds, his deep voice sympathetic. "We're not new to this – the priests who followed Ella her whole life, they wiped memories from her mind as well."

"But they're not the same priests," Cora breathes, looking between Sinclair and me and wiping a tear from her eye. "I can tell – I know it in my bones. There's a tie there, some... similarity. But they're not the same order. This man he – he serves someone else. Not the Goddess"

I look between Roger and Sinclair, who know more about shifter religion than I do. "Are you aware of some...subset? Or a cult of priests? Who wear black robes?"

"No," Roger replies, breathing out a long breath as he runs a hand through his hair. "I tried to do some research last night before I fell asleep, but I came up empty. That doesn't mean it's a dead end, though there are lots of people who have better access to occult archives than I do."

"But don't you see?" Cora asks, looking between the three of us. "It's it's me. I'm the tie. I'm the thing that brings it all together."

I turn my head and stare at my sister, not understanding. “Ella,” she says, leaning forward. “That priest – he let me see him, let us see him, when we were girls. He wiped the memories from our

If he’d wanted to do it invisibly, he could have. Ella, he wanted us to know him, to recognize him.”

She swallows, taking her hand from mine and gripping her own hands together in her lap. “He wanted to be seen.”

“We don’t know that, Cora,” Ella replies, shaking her head. “We don’t know the details – it could have been a mistake, you seeing him. And – and me, if you say I was there.”

“But don’t you see, Ella?” Cora whispers. “He’s been following us our whole lives. Us, not just you Me, somehow? Somehow...I’ve been part of this plan all along.”

“Well,” I say softly, “you, too, are the daughter of a goddess. If he somehow knew our history, and wanted a child of her line...”

“Then it makes sense,” Cora whispers, finishing my sentence when I cannot, “that he’d want two viable options.”

I stare at my sister, my heart dropping as I realize that this...is so much deeper, and more complicated, than we ever could have known.

Chapter 318 – Investigation

Sinclair

As Cora sits on the bed with her sister, I meet my brother's eyes above her head and nod towards the door. He nods as well, agreeing. He places a hand on Cora's shoulder and gives her a little squeeze before heading to the door.

Ella turns towards me as I stand up, grabbing my phone and heading to the closet, but I speak to her mind-to-mind to let her know that everything's fine as I quickly pull on some casual clothes. Take care of Cora, I say to Ella, trying to send warmth and support along with my words. We're just going to go talk downstairs with the team.

Ella nods to me, with a little smile, and then when I meet Roger at the door we walk out together, closing it behind us.

As soon as the door is shut, we're instantly in motion. "We need more information," Roger says, striding for the stairs. "And we need a drawing of this man, if we can convince Cora to speak to a sketch artist – it could be incredibly helpful –

"That shouldn't be difficult," I agree as the two of us hurry down the stairs to my office, where a team of investigators worked through the night on the case. "I'll have a trained sketch artist come by as soon as possible – I'm sure Cora will comply –" I pull my phone from my pocket and start looking through my contacts.

"Someone should contact Hank," Roger murmurs, striding into the office and moving behind the desk. "To let him know that she won't be in to work anytime soon – we need her here –"

—

I pause, a little, in my search for someone who can contact a reliable and discreet sketch artist to look at Roger and raise an eyebrow at him. "Didn't think you'd be showing such concern for Dr. Hank anytime soon," I murmur.

Roger shoots me a dirty glance. "It's strictly professional," he murmurs, sorting through some papers on the desk and handing them off to the investigators to properly file. "And after last night, he knows something is up –"

"Does he?" I ask, looking at Roger fully now. "Hank was there last night? At Cora's?"

"Roger sighs, placing both hands evenly on the desk and then lifting his head to meet my eyes. Can we not?" he asks, impatient. "Can we not do this, during a crisis regarding your child's safety?"

I nod, but I can't keep the smirk off my face as I do so. Honestly, I could use a little distraction from waiting for someone to bust into my house to steal my child, and teasing Roger about Cora seems like just the thing. But I can tell that he's perturbed, so I leave it alone. For now.

"It seems to me," I say after a moment, crossing my arms and thinking aloud. "That the best clue we have so far is the black robes. Cora said that several times – the man was consistently dressed like one of the Goddess' dedicated priests, but in black robes. That has got to be a clue we can follow up."

"I agree," Roger says, grabbing a laptop and pulling it close to him, "Don't you have someplace where you can start with that?" he asks passively, already sitting down and starting to type.

was a fraud, and that her wolf was dormant?"

"Adolpho," I confirm, nodding and making a mental note to contact him after I find the sketch artist. "We were in touch with him yesterday in case he had come across anything useful in the past few months – but now that we have new information, I'll ask again."

"Good," Roger confirms, still searching.

"What are you looking for?" I ask, working to peer over his shoulder.

"There's an archive," Roger murmurs, still searching. "With some...rare books. On the subject of the history of shifter religion." He shrugs and turns the computer to me so that I can see a very old, very basic website that includes a description of some archaic holdings. "It's about five hours away – if Adolpho comes up with nothing, then perhaps we can contact the people here. It's a closed-stack collection but," he shrugs, "I'm sure you can pull some strings. Get us in to see what they've got."

"What's the point of this?" I ask, leaning over the computer and scrolling through the options. Roger wants to go to a library? Now?

"It's the most complete collection of its kind," he replies. "Hundreds of years of shifter religious history. If anyone's going to have an answer about the priest in the black robes, I have a feeling it will be them."

"Good," I say, standing up straight and nodding, looking back to my phone to again chase down that sketch artist. "You'll go tonight. Take Cora."

"What?!"

"After she is done with the sketch artist," I continue, looking up to meet his eyes seriously. "You'll take her to this library with you."

"Why?" Roger growls and I raise my eyebrows at his defiance of my command. Roger sighs, his teeth gritted, clearly frustrated. I'm curious about this. Why does he suddenly not want to go with Cora? "I mean, what is Cora going to add to the investigation? Why can't she stay here with you, where she's safe?"

"Cora gave us a very vague description," I reply, turning my attention back to the phone. "But that. doesn't mean she doesn't remember more details. It just means she didn't tell us about them in the moment because she didn't think they were important, or because she's upset. If you come across a detail that matches her memory in the archive, it will be important to have her there to confirm it."

Roger sits back in his chair, nodding. I work hard to keep the smirk to my face as I see how disgruntled he is at the assignment.

"Unless," I say casually. "You'd prefer I sent Hank along with her, on the mission...he's clever enough. Probably a good researcher, to get out of med school with such a good ranking –"

"Its fine," Roger snaps, and as I steal a glance at my brother I see that he's glaring at me, knowing precisely what it is that I'm implying. "Cora and I will go tonight. It will be fine."/

"I'll set up the transport," I say casually, pressing a contact on my phone and striding out of the see Cora and Ella coming down the stairs, the baby in Ella's arms, presumably heading for the kitchen.

"All right?" I ask, and they both nod to me. Someone answers the phone in my hand, but I hang up quickly, knowing I can call back. "Cora," I say, as she comes to the bottom of the stairs. She turns her head up to me and I quickly explain the situation, how we want her to work with a sketch artist and then accompany Roger to the archive, Ella stands by her sister, her eyebrows raised at the second proposal.

"Dominic," she says, looking between her sister and I, worried. "Are you sure it's...wise? To send Cora off? Shouldn't we keep her at home?"

I open my mouth to deny that, but Ella gives me a little nudge down our bond, urging me to let this play out.

“You can’t keep me here, Ella,” Cora says, frowning at her sister and crossing her arms defiantly. “If I wasn’t going to go to this archive, then I would certainly be going to work.”

“What?” Ella breathes, her shock a little too prominent, her eyebrows a little too high. She sends another pulse down our bond to me then, a troublesome, wicked little thing. I work hard to keep the smirk from my face. “No, Cora,” she gasps, “you have to stay here, with me, where you’re safe –

“No way in hell, Ella,” Cora counters, frowning at her sister angrily. “You can’t keep me locked up here

”

“But for your safety!” Ella cries out. Just until we figure out who’s behind this and make sure it’s okay to leave the house!”

“Tell Roger I’ll be ready,” Cora orders me, rolling her eyes and striding into the kitchen away from her sister, her mind made up.

“Cora!” Ella cries after her, her voice all worry, but as the kitchen door swings shut behind Cora Ella turns to me with a grin. “She’d never have agreed to go so easily if we didn’t threaten imprisonment,” she whispers.

“Well done, trouble,” I say, raising my hand up, palm out Ella gives me a quick high-five, grinning towards the kitchen. I laugh and quickly give her a kiss on the head, raising my phone back again and starting to make that call.

I’m interrupted, though, by my mate’s soft hand on my arm. “She’ll be safe?” Ella asks softly when I turn to her. “With Roger?”

“I’ll send guards,” I say with a little shrug. “But Ella...I’m starting to get the feeling that Roger...”

She nods, understanding me. “Would protect her with his life,” she finishes. I give her a sad little smile, knowing that it’s complicated between them, but still somehow knowing...

...that on some level?

It’s not complicated. Not at all. (1)

Chapter 319 – The Archive

That evening, our car rumbles down the road towards the archive, Roger steady at the wheel. Another car with two guards follows behind us, keeping a steady eye out for anything strange. I sigh, already exhausted, even though I got more sleep than Ella or Roger or Sinclair last night. Still it wasn't exactly a peaceful sleep – and then today, with the sketch artist...

"You all right?" Roger asks, glancing over at me. "Yeah," I say, sighing again, my eyes on the road. "How long until we get there?"

"About two more hours," he replies evenly, nodding towards the GPS system running on his phone. "We're lucky that they're staying open late for us."

"We're not lucky," I murmur, leaning down to tug at the bottom of the jeans that Ella loaned to me which are, predictably, too short. "Sinclair is rich. Anyone will stay open that late in exchange for an insane donation."

Roger smirks, glancing at me, but doesn't reply. Because he knows I'm right. I feel my phone buzz then, tucked under my thigh, and I pull it out, unlocking it and looking at the new message on my screen.

Hank: It's okay, I totally understand. I'm glad the baby is okay. Don't worry about the clinic – I can hold it down for as long as you need. Have fun? Is that the right sentiment for a trip to an obscure shifter archive?

I smile, laughing a little inwardly at his joke. No, fun was not precisely the word I'd choose either, not for this trip. My smile falls, though, when another message pops onto the screen.

Hank: I miss you.

I glance away from it, licking my lips awkwardly and tucking the phone back under my leg. I look back to the windshield and realize that Roger is watching me from the corner of his eye.

"Who was that?" he asks, smug. I know, instantly, that he already knows.

"Nobody," I murmur, turning away.

"Was it Ella?" he quips, needling me.

I turn to send a little glare his way. "It wasn't Ella."

"Oh," he says, smirking now. But he lets it drop. It's enough for him, I guess, to let me know that he knows. I sigh, closing my eyes and letting my head rest back against my seat, my face turned away from Roger, wanting a little nap but knowing I'm not going to get it.

Instead, my mind wanders to Hank, and I think of him seeing patients alone in our little clinic all night – god, was it only last night? – when I'd pulled him half dressed into my bedroom, gasping for him, and let him peel my clothes from my body before...

Well. Before stuff happened. Good stuff. Great stuff, even. So why can't I text him back and tell him that I miss him too?

I sigh, willing my mind away from it, turning it towards other things. I listen to the steady hum of the car, to the very, very faint sound of Roger breathing next to me. But I don't reach for my phone. Somehow, I just don't want to.

And as I drift off to sleep, I wonder if that makes me just....incredibly cruel. I sigh, kind of hating myself right now, but not knowing what to do about it.

Two hours later, I jump at the soft touch of a hand on my shoulder. I gasp, spinning, to see Roger looking at me curiously.

"Eye for an eye," he says, giving me a warm little smirk. "That's how you woke me up this morning. With a jolt."

"Sorry," I murmur, rubbing my eye sleepily and looking around in the dark. "Are we here?" The car is parked but still running, the windshield wipers slowly moving against a light rain. I look at it curiously, surprised. The forecast didn't say anything about rain tonight.

"Yup," Roger says. "Are you ready to go in? Do you need a minute?"

I stretch in my seat, my eyes closed, and take a mental inventory of myself. Body? Stiff, but all right. Mind? Thoroughly shaken. Heart?

...best left uninvestigated, for the moment.

"Yup," I say, turning a sunny smile Roger's way. He blinks a little bit, perhaps surprised to see it. 'Did you hear anything from Ella and Sinclair?"

Roger shakes his head, turning off the car and unbuckling his seatbelt. "I heard from them," he says, "but nothing of note. All is well at home. If we're lucky, we can do our research here tonight and be home by dawn."

We both climb out of the car and I frown at him over the roof. "But then you won't have slept at all, for twenty-four hours," I say.

Roger gives me a swift wink, stretching himself after long hours at the wheel. "Don't worry about me, baby," he says. "I've got stamina." And then he heads for the entrance to the ornate building in front of us, jogging up the stairs without me.

As I turn to follow, the last thought echoing in my mind is...I bet you fucking do, Roger.

Inside, we're greeted by a friendly, eager librarian. As she smiles widely at us and leads us into a pretty reading room, dimly lit by golden sconces on the wall, I remind myself that she's not actually excited to see us.- she's pumped about the gigantic donation that Sinclair must have made to get us in here overnight.

we've punen some books that we w you use, me mua says, gestumy towards a stack of maybe one hundred and twenty old leather tomes stacked on the tables in front of us. My eyes go wide, taking in the extent of them. "We do know that the Cult of the Goddess adopted the robe that we now understand to be traditional about five hundred years ago. Assuming that the cult that you are searching for is in some way imitating that tradition, we were able to narrow down the selection to the past five hundred years."

"This?" I say, gesturing towards the books with my brows raised. "This is the narrowed selection?"

The librarian nods at me, giving us both an eager smile.

"Thank you," Roger says, smiling back at her warmly.

"I'll be here if you need me," the librarian-says, gesturing towards the desk at the head of the room. "But please, make yourself at home. Just..." she hesitates, looking between us. "Please no...food or drink...around the books."

"We promise," Roger says, giving her the most charming smile I've ever seen from him. "We'll protect the books at all costs. No sticky fingers here." The librarian blushes, then giggles, and scurries away.

"Wow," I say, coming to Roger's side. "You had...quite the effect on her," I whisper, watching her go. "Librarians love me," Roger says, giving a little shrug. "I don't know why. It's always been a thing! "Are you sure you just don't like librarians?" I ask, smirking and raising a single brow in his direction. Roger looks at me consideringly and I raise my hand to the side of my face, pretending to lower a pair of horn-rimmed glasses down the length of my nose, looking at him seductively over the edge of them. "Oh Mr. Sinclair, please, let me tell you all about the Dewey Decimal system,” I tease, my voice breathy and sensual.

Roger smirks at me, taking a step closer. “You watch yourself with that,” he murmurs, looking down at me with a little pretend heat behind his eyes. At least...I think it’s pretend. “If you’re not careful, I’ll pull you behind the stacks and ravish you. Won’t be able to stop myself.”

—

I laugh, then, suddenly, at the shock of it – at Roger making a joke to me, to begin, and then a funny one at that. The sound is too loud in this quiet space. I slap a hand over my mouth, still giggling, and look over at the little librarian, who looks towards us, a little shocked. Roger laughs as well, his sound much more library–appropriate, contained and measured. “Come on,” he nodding towards the pile. “Let’s get started.”

Smiling, I comply, sitting down at the table and pulling the first book towards me.

says,

Chapter 320 – The Cult

About three hours later I am...over books. As a genre, in their entirety. My hands are dusty, and I'm sick of the smell of musty old pages, and they're just so boring –

Page after page of history regarding shifter worship practices – who genuflected to this god, and how, and where, and for how long, and the minute changes in the practices...

I groan, pushing my twentieth book away from me and looking dourly at the stack of about fifty still left in my pile.

"Come on, Cora," Roger says, sitting comfortably across from me, smirking at me over the edge of a neat little green text. "You're supposed to be the smart one in the family. I thought you'd have more staying power than this."

"Ella's smart," I reply, immediately defensive. He nods, conceding the point. "But you gave me all the dusty books," I sigh, frowning and pulling the next one off the top of the pile and towards me. I cough when it raises a puff of dust into the air on its way.

"I gave you all the ones with more pictures," Roger murmurs, closing his book and reaching for his next as well. "Wanted to make it easy on you."

My mouth drops open in a little outrage at his implication there but then I see the upturned corner of his lip. "Liar," I say, smiling down at my book as I open the cover. The title page reads A Complete History of the Cults of the Dark God, 1862. "You just didn't want to get your hands and clothes dusty touching all these old ones." Passively, I gesture to my clothes – which are indeed covered in a light layer of grey library dust.

"You've got a little on your ass," Roger murmurs indifferently. "Come here, I'll help you brush it off."

I smirk, shaking my head, but ignore him and continue to page through the book. This one, to Roger's point, is indeed heavily illustrated, with many pictures of occult ceremonies and practices that I find fascinating, if not a little disturbing. I'm letting my eyes drift over the description of a summoning ceremony when I turn the page and –

I stop, frozen.

Because it's him, right in front of me. Well, not him – not precisely, the face is not the same – but of course it's not, then he'd be over one hundred years old –

"Roger," I breathe, and his attention is instantly on me. "I think...I think I found something."

Roger is at my side in a moment, faster than I thought he could be, leaning over–the book next to me. I point at the image, which takes up three quarters of a page and shows a monk with a partially shaved head striding through a forest in a dark robe, tied at the waist with a rope from which charms dangle. In his hand is a stick – or a staff, I don't know – which he carries with reverence.

Black Tubes, nuyer 111

is uns what you saw, GUTA!

“Yes,” I whisper, swallowing hard. “Um – it has details... details I'm not sure I remembered in the moment. I'm sorry about that – but the charms, and the rod and and something about the hair

“It's all right, Cora,” Roger says comfortingly, the tips of his fingers suddenly light on my lower back, not brushing against me by accident but staying there, steady. “No one expects you to remember every detail all at once.”

I nod, and then we both lean forward, reading,

The Monastic Cult of the God of Darkness is a minor but powerful cult developed in the eighteenth. century. They were formulated in direct opposition to the Cult of the Goddess, which professed at mission of peace between all living things. What is known of their stated mission – passed from brother to brother, never written down – emphasizes hierarchy, war, and discord between peoples. in order to honor their lord, the God of Darkness, who they understand as best worshiped by sowing disharmony as well as blood sacrifice, From the eighteenth to the nineteenth centuries. the Cult developed significant magical prowess and their abilities to manipulate the elements should not be underestimated. While the most devoted members of the Cult exclusively wear the trademark black robes, many others move through the world in disguise. Devotees tend to flock to high-powered jobs amongst their enemies, particularly in the fields of law, politics, and medicine.

I turn the page, seeking more, but am shocked and disappointed to find that that's the end. “That's it?” I gasp.

“It's enough,” Roger says, his hand flattening against my back. I turn to him, not knowing what to do. “Are you sure, Cora?” he asks me, turning the page back and pointing to the picture. “Are you sure that this is precisely what you saw in your hypnosis and when you were a child?”

“Yes,” I say, nodding steadily. “When I saw it – it was like déjà vu. Just an immediate return to those memories. If I had seen that image, even without the hypnosis, it would have...brought me right back.”

—

see

“Good,” he says, nodding seriously to me. “You did beautifully, Cora,” he says, pulling me against him for a moment in a quick hug and then releasing me. “Look through the rest of the book if anything else rings a bell. I’m going to go call Sinclair, get his team working on finding out anything else they can about this cult.”

I nod, turning back to the book and quickly looking through the pages, my mind whirling. What the hell was this cult? And what on earth can they want with Ella’s little baby? Why did they work so hard for him to be born if they...

If they worship the god who works in opposition his grandmother’s mission...

My eyes light again on the phrase “blood sacrifice” and my heart drops to my stomach, my breathing ratcheting up.

“Miss?” the librarian says at my shoulder and I jump, spinning towards her. “I’m so sorry!” she says, her hands out.

“It’s okay,” I murmur, laughing a little. “Just a lot of work on a little sleep.”

—

Tunesta, Sie Says, K, as to make a copy of ally payes at um sigmcant. I thank her, indicating the page with the image and the description of the Monastic Cult, and she swiftly carries the book away to a scanner so that she can print copies. I lean against the table, anxiously watching the door for Roger’s return.

He comes back a few minutes later and moves swiftly to my side, sliding his phone into his back pocket. As he reaches me, the librarian comes over with about twenty warm copies of the page.

“Thank you,” Roger says, giving her a warm smile, and I feel something growl in me as I look between the two of them. She puts on a shy, demure little expression, twirling a strand of her hair, and asks us if there’s anything else we need, but Roger quickly and politely says no, that we’ll be leaving now. I can’t help but give her a little glare that she doesn’t deserve as we head towards the door.

Roger, to his credit, doesn't look back as we leave the library and head to the car, pressing the copies of the pages to his chest protectively against the rain that's pouring down over us now. We both dash to the car, eager to get inside, and as we pull our doors open and throw ourselves into our seats the car with the guards, parked next to us, likewise starts up.

"Sinclair wants us home now," Roger murmurs, filling me in. "We'll be safer there, and more productive, I think."

"Okay," I say, a little guilty. Part of me knows I need to return to the clinic, to my work there. But honestly, the only place I want to be..

I think of Ella, and the baby, and solidify my determination. Roger's watching me quietly as I turn to him. "To Ella's," I say, nodding. "Let me know if you need me to drive," I offer. "Like, if you get tired."

"Thanks," he says, smiling at me, but then he looks up through the windshield at the angry sky." But I think we might need shifter reflexes to get through this storm."

"This storm," I murmur, buckling my seatbelt. "Where did it even come from? The weather was supposed to be sunny for days..."

Chapter 321 – The Storm

Cora

The weather, bizarrely, gets worse as we drive. I'm usually not skittish about driving in bad weather, but as the miles pass I feel myself getting more and more anxious. The water pounds against the windshield and thunder booms around us, lightning flashing through the forests through which we drive.

"What the hell is this," Roger growls, leaning forward to look up into the sky. "I can't believe it's lasted this long and it's raining harder, not letting up.."

"Can you even see?" I ask, my hands gripping the leather of my seat anxiously now as I stare out the windshield in front of us. To me it looks like a vast sheet of grey water with the occasional flare of the guard car's brake lights ahead of us.

"I can see," Roger murmurs in reply, a little annoyed, apparently, that I'd even call his skills into question. I roll my eyes at this, but trust him there must be something about his wolf senses that can see into the road ahead of us that my eyes cannot make out. Still, despite my trust, I'm anxious. We could run into another car, or a fallen tree, or a lost animal at any moment – how could we even see it coming?

My phone lights up in the cupholder next to me and I release my grip on my seat to grab it, looking at the new text from Ella. "Roger," I say, anxious, glancing at him. "Ella says it's not even raining at home what –"

But suddenly the car lurches, skidding sideways a little I see the diver's wheel shift in Roger's hands, moving without his control – hear him curse under his breath as the car hydroplanes and drifts at high speed to our left. I give a little shriek, pressing my eyes.

closed, my whole body tense – anticipating at any moment that we'll slam into a tree, or fly off a cliff –

But we just slow, and then come to a stop, and I peek my eyes open.

"It's all right, Cora," Roger murmurs, frustrated but in control of the car again. "We skidded but we're okay. We just hit some high water "Where's the other car?" I gasp, still freaked out, looking steadily out the window.

"They got through it," he tells me, putting the car in park and picking up his phone, glancing at the road ahead of us. "I don't know how, though, it looks completely flooded..."

the road ahead of us. Roger's on his phone now, speaking to the guards in the car, who have stopped on the other side of the flooded road, separated from us. They speak for a few moments, trying to figure out a plan, but they don't come up with much.

"It's no good, Cora," Roger says, hanging up the phone and turning to me. "They can't come back across the road. We're going to have to backtrack and find a new route."

"Seriously?" I ask, my eyes wide with anxiety. "We can't like... ford the river, or whatever?"

Roger raises an eyebrow and gestures towards the water in front of us, which looks like it's rising by the minute. As I watch, what looks like an entire tree floats by what is quickly becoming a river across the road.

"How did that happen so fast?" I ask, a little breathless. "Between one car length and another?"

"I don't know," Roger replies, his voice tight as he turns in his seat and puts the car in reverse, backing away from the rising water line. I watch him, waiting for him to continue, but he doesn't, his brows knit together.

And then, suddenly, I realize that he already knows what I'm just now figuring out. That this storm...is not natural.

"Roger," I whisper, my words shaking. "What's happening?"

"We're going to get through it, Cora," he promises, his eyes on the road as he turns the car around and heads in the other direction. "Do you trust me?"

And I do. I know it, deep down in my gut, that I trust him to get us out of this. But instead of telling him that, I just nod, sitting back tensely in my seat as we retrace the ground we've already crossed. Even as we drive back down the road, though, the storm does not let up.

Lightening crashes around us and the tree limbs whip wildly above, threatening to come down on us at any moment.

When it starts to hail, big golf-ball sized pieces of ice, I open my mouth to say we need to do get out of this But Roger beats me to it. "It's no good, Cora," he murmurs, glancing at me. "We have to stop."

"Okay," I breathe, somehow at once more anxious and simultaneously relieved. I want to stop I know that for sure, I don't want to ride on this road any longer in this storm – but what's waiting for us when we stop? Something is fighting to keep us here. What happens

"I think I remember..." Roger begins, peering out the window, but his words fade off as he looks. I wait, holding my breath, not wanting to interrupt his concentration, looking out the windshield along with him, unable to tear my eyes away. But as I watch – a red neon glow comes barely into sight in the distance. "Yes," he murmurs. "A motel. Thank god."

I breathe a big sigh of relief as Roger pulls into the parking lot, the wind hitting us so hard now from the side the car rocks as he slides the gears into park. The rain is coming at us sideways now, punishing and incessant. As I stare at it, baffled by the sudden hurricane conditions, Roger surprises me by taking my hand.

"We can stay in the car," he offers, "if that feels safer. But...I think we should get inside, Cora. What do you think? Make a run for the lobby?" He gestures towards it, just a few feet away, but somehow in this insane weather it feels as if getting there means running a gauntlet.

"Roger," I say, anxious, looking into his eyes. "What's going on? What is this?"

"I don't know," he says, concerned, shaking his head at me. "I honestly don't, Cora. But we can't drive in it not now. So our only choice, I think, is to weather the storm. And we can do that here, in the cold car. Or...there," he says, nodding to the motel.

"In a flea-infested bedroom with rusty tap water," I murmur, grimacing a little and looking at the motel's run-down façade.

"Yup," he says, putting a hand out to me. "What do you think? Want to make a run for it with me?"

Suddenly a huge gust comes, shifting the car so that it feels almost as if it lifts up on two wheels instead of staying steadily on four, as a car should.

"Yup!" I say, giving him a big anxious grin. "Let's go!" and I slap my palm against his, tightening my fingers to grip his hand.

Roger gives me a little wink and then grabs his car door's handle. "On the count of three..."

"Wait!" I gasp, sliding my phone into my back pocket and then grabbing for the copies of the pages from the book and shoving them hastily under my shirt, where I hope they'll keep relatively dry.

Roger pauses for a moment, still holding my hand tightly, and then smirks, murmuring "lucky paper." Then he meets my eyes and begins to count. "One?" he asks.

“Two,” I say, meeting his eyes and smiling a little bit, despite myself.

“Three!” he shouts, and we both throw open our doors, leaping out into the elements. I am almost instantly soaked as I sprint for the doors of the motel, Roger at my side for every step.

Chapter 322 – Cheap Roadside Motel

Cora

I'm gasping as we burst through the door of the motel, Roger quickly turning to force it closed behind us as the wind batters us, making his job hard. I pant, looking around, my eyes settling on the startled eyes of the gnarled little man sitting behind the front desk. I work hard to give him a polite smile as Roger grunts, finally forcing the door shut behind. "Nasty weather out there, ain't it," the desk attendant says, giving us a toothless grin.

"Bit of an understatement," Roger murmurs, straightening and looking anxiously over his shoulder as he moves forward to the desk. I follow him, my hand pressed to the papers under my shirt. Some of them the outer ones, I think – are probably ones feel dry against my stomach...

– are probably ruined, but the inner "Well, you'll be good and dry here," the attendant says, giving us a happy little nod. "You lookin' for a room?"

"Sure," Roger says, shrugging and glancing at me. I nod and shrug back. We could wait it out in this lobby, I guess, but as I look around and take in the patchworked chairs and the musty smell...honestly, being able to sit down somewhere a little cleaner sounds good to

"We got room six," the attendant says contemplatively, turning to point at a set of keys on the wall. "That's our best room, but you gotta go out into the storm to get to it." He points to a set of keys labeled "12" next. "Twelve ain't as nice, but it's just in the back of this building," he says. "So you can stay inside, if you don't want to get wet..." he turns back to us then and grimaces a little. "Or, well...wetter."

"Twelve," Roger and I say in unison, our faces serious. The attendant smiles at us and hands over the key. Roger nods and takes his wallet out of his back pocket, sliding some cash out and pushing it across the counter to the man.

Seeing the line of green bills left in Roger's wallet, the attendant's eyes light up. "Will you be needing any room service on top of that, then?" he asks.

"No," Roger replies firmly and I'm grateful for it, thinking about what kind of delicacies a place like this might serve up. My stomach turns over a little at the thought of it. The man nods and tosses the key to Roger, who catches it in the air. Then, he takes my hand and a polite smile and he returns it with a naughty little wink which makes me realize –

Oh my god, I think, as Roger leads me firmly down the hall towards the rooms at the back of the main building. That guy thinks we're a couple... that we're going in here to...

And then I realize that... that I'm actually in a sleazy motel with Roger Sinclair. And that we were going to go into a room, alone. With beds. To wait out this storm. Suddenly my heart begins to pound as I follow Roger down the hall. Roger, perhaps hearing the change in my heartbeat, or smelling some physical change in my body's scent, looks over his shoulder at me with a little smirk. I return it with a glare, but he just tightens his grip on my hand as the numbered rooms pass.

When we arrive at twelve, he deftly puts the key in the lock and twists it, pushing the door open to reveal...

"Oh my god," I murmur, all ideas of scandal wiped from my mind as I go rigid at the sight of the water-marked ceiling, the rug with the mysterious stains, the television that looks like it might actually be the first television ever created. A ceiling fan whirls at the center of the room, wobbling with an ominous threat that it might just give up at any moment and come plummeting to the ground.

There are windows at the far side of the room next to a door that leads to the parking lot outside and a set of woods beyond that. The window is slightly fogged, but it clearly shows that the storm outside still rages.

"Actually, I kind of like it," Roger murmurs, looking around, his eyebrows up. "What?!" I gasp, appalled.

"Sure," he says, looking at me with a little grin. "It's very true crime, very 'will they or won't they get murdered.' I like a motel room with a little bit of an edge. Keeps things exciting."

I somehow manage to roll my eyes and glare at him at once, dropping his hand and sweeping into the room. Roger laughs behind me as he closes the door. I quickly approach the slim bed in the center of the room, leaning over to take a good look at the stained blanket on the top.

"This is...not sanitary," I murmur, grasping the very corner of the blanket between my fingers and then quickly whipping it off the bed and tossing it to the floor, revealing what actually looks like a set of crisp white sheets beneath. "That's better," I say, surprised and standing up straight.

"So eager to get between the sheets, Cora," Roger says as he crosses the room and sits on a wooden chair by the window, pulling off his soaked shoes. "I always took you for a girl

"Don't be gross," I murmur, pulling the papers out from under my shirt and placing them, along with my phone, on the bedside table. Then I turn my back to Roger and sit down on the bed, working at my own shoes then, wanting very much to be dry and warm

Roger just chuckles and says nothing, though I feel his weight on the other side of the mattress as I pull my second shoe off and work at my soaked sock. I turn then, honestly surprised that he came to the bed, and freeze when I see him pulling off his shirt as well.

“Wha “I gasp, my eyes going wide, my forgotten wet sock still dangling from my fingers. I can’t help myself, though, from glancing at the contours of his abs, which I haven’t seen. since that night when he cried in my arms. My mind flashes suddenly to that moment, the intimacy of it – but that’s all wiped away when I realize that Roger right now isn’t wearing any pants –

“Oh my god!” I say, jumping up and turning towards him. “Where are your clothes!?” “Over there, Cora,” he says simply, a little frustrated, gesturing to the heap of his pants on the floor and tossing his shirt on top of them. “They’re soaked. I’m not sitting in wet clothes all afternoon until this rain stops.” He smirks at me, then I think pleased to see how much he’s unsettled me with his nearly-naked body. Then, to my shock, he leans back. against the headboard, lifting one leg lazily onto the bed, bending it at the knee and looking completely relaxed. “Besides,” he continues, smug. “I don’t see you complaining.

And I hate him, in that moment and myself, a little bit as the first thought that pops into my mind is that he looks like a damn underwear model, laying there like that, his gorgeous tan set off nicely by the crisp white sheets.

“Complaint registered,” I growl, and, frustrated, I whip my wet sock at him, which smacks. wetly against his abs. Roger just laughs, brushing the sock away as I stalk towards the bathroom and slam the door shut behind me.

I take a few deep breaths, then, looking at myself in the mirror. I close my eyes and listen to the storm raging outside separated from me only by a few inches of brick and drywall. My stomach drops when I think about it as I wonder about why the hell it’s here, and who sent it, and why. Because I know and I know Roger does too – that there’s nothing. natural about this storm

But somehow despite that insane, horrible realization all I can think about is the rain-slicked werewolf laying on the bed on the other side of that door. I grit my teeth and press my eyes shut, leaning against the sink and wishing to the death of me that he was just

Just....

Ugh, just a little less hot. Or that his particular brand of swaggering arrogance, mixed with occasional thoughtfulness, didn’t sing to me as enticingly as it apparently does. "Cora?" Roger calls with a gentle knock at the door, making my eyes fly open. "Are you all right in there?"

"Fine!" I call back, my voice a little too shrill. "Just...splashing some water on my face!" I reply.

"All right," he says, his voice a little worried. But I hear him move away. I turn to face myself in the mirror again. "Come on, Cora," I growl, taking a deep breath as I stare into my own eyes. "You have to control yourself for one afternoon. Just one afternoon. You have a boyfriend, after all. You can do this."

But even as I nod to myself, my face set with determination, as I turn towards the door and put my hand on the knob?

Something inside of me nudges me, laughing, and whispers no, baby. No, you can't. But why would you want to?

Chapter 323 – Sister Stuff

Ella

“I wonder what Cora’s up to,” I sigh as I stand by the window rocking Rafe, who his crying a little and fussing in my arms. I know that he doesn’t need anything – he’s been fed, burped, changed, and everything else a baby could want. He’s just crying to cry, and I give a defeated little sigh, smiling at him and knowing that he just has to take a minute to work it out.

Sinclair, sitting on the bed with papers spread out all around him, glances up at me. You haven’t had any word from her?” he asks.

“No,” I reply, shaking my head. The last thing I heard was from the guards, who said they got separated from Cora and Roger by a flash flood. I’m...worried about her.”

“You know Roger will take care of her,” Sinclair says passively, flicking through the papers, looking for one in particular.

“I know,” I sigh, bobbing Rafe in my arms. “But even Roger can’t protect against the forces of nature. It’s just so strange – they’re only three hours away, and they’re apparently caught in some kind of hurricane? And we’ve got sunny skies?” I turn again towards the window, frowning. Something that feels uncannily like my mother’s gift pulses inside me, making my wolf turn towards it in attention, cocking her head to the side curiously. But neither of us know what to make of it, so I sigh again.

Rafe lets out a little wail then, working one of his little arms free of his blanket and waving an angry fist in the air.

“Oh baby,” I murmur, leaning down to give him a little kiss. “What do you have to worry about? You’re not stuck out in a storm. You’re here safe, with mommy!”

“Maybe he’s picking up on mommy’s anxiety,” Sinclair says, standing up from the bed and coming next to us, reaching for the baby. “Maybe he feels it down the bond

“Don’t blame me for your child’s bad attitude,” I say, joking and handing Rafe over into his father’s arms, whose size remind me again of the tiny delicacy of my baby boy “He gets that from your side. I’m no crybaby”

Sinclair laughs, rocking the baby in his arms, and Rafe quiets almost instantly, his yowl softening to an angry little murmur “Why,” Sinclair asks, “do you always suggest that his undesirable qualities come from me? I come from excellent stock”

SIL...

"Because," I say, standing on tip toe to look down at my baby's perfect little face, raising a hand to tieke his belly a little I'm jealous, a bit, that he quiets so readily in his father's aums, but not jealous enough to take him back if it means he'll cry. Alongside the jealousy, there's also a part of me that loves Rafe's connection with his father, that he like me – finds comfort in the Alpha's arms "My genetic line is that of a perfect Goddess You can't beat that "

"You have a father too, you know," Sinclair reminds me. "Yes," I say, grinning up at him. "A king. I win. Again."

Sinclair laughs, opening his mouth to retort, when we hear a little knock at the door. We both turn to it, Rafe settling down more completely now, and Sinclair's mouth drops at little to see his father there, wheeling forward.

"Am linterrupting?" Henry asks curiously. "Dad," Sinclair says, smiling and moving forward. "No- but how-how did you get up here?"

"Ella's excellent lift system," Henry says, as if it's obvious. He looks to me then. This chair is really state of the art," he says, gesturing to the chair I ordered for my bed rest. Tll really have to consider one of these for myself."

"Ella," Sinclair says, frowning at me. "I thought I told you to arrange to get rid of the chairs. And the lift."

"But Henry needs them!" I say, grinning widely to hide the fact that I completely ignored that command.

Sinclair groans, tilting his head back, realizing he's never going to get his house back to the way it was. I pat him on the arm, knowing that it's the right choice Henry should have free run of the house, and if I'm ever pregnant again.

"It's very practical," Henry says, raising his eyebrows at his son "But I came up with information," he says, pulling a folder from the little pocket by his side, "on the cult that Roger and Cora discovered"

"Oh," I say, moving behind his chair to look over his shoulder, eager to know more. Sinclair likewise steps forward, a protective hand on Rafe as he leans forward "What did you find?"

"Well, unfortunately, that the cult is alive and well It actually makes sense that the book that Cora and Roger found was so old, because the Monastic Cult of the God of Darkness secrecy. As the book reports, they never write anything down and pass all of their traditions from brother to brother. This has allowed them to operate in the background for decades, largely unnoticed. It's actually rather a miracle that that book reported anything about them – our best guess is that, in fact, the scholar who wrote it must have been an ex- member of the brotherhood themselves.”

“Wow,” I say, looking between Henry and my mate. “But they’re still...operating? In secrecy?”

“In full force, apparently,” Henry says, looking up at me and tapping the report. Then he looks at his son. “Your investigative team did quite well once they had this lead. The Cult has, by necessity, had to start leaving a bit of a trail on the dark web and other such underground spaces, in order to communicate across distances and acquire rare materials for their ceremonies. But from what your investigators estimate, they’re more powerful than they’ve ever been.”

“And these men,” Sinclair considers, standing and rocking the baby absentmindedly. They’re responsible for switching the sperm that brought Ella and I together. They, for some reason, wanted Rafe to be born.”

“Indeed,” Henry says, raising his eyebrows. “But it is particularly curious that they showed their hand a bit in sending a robed member to do their work. The high-ranking members of the Cult who wear the robe are, apparently, notoriously reclusive. It is perhaps to our luck that the man who tricked Cora – and,” he shifts his gaze to me, “who has been, apparently, following the two of you your whole lives, is a high-ranking member of the cult. If it had been a plain-clothes member, we may never have been able to discover who was behind this.”

“Why is that, though?” I consider, coming to stand at Sinclair’s side and folding my arms over my chest. “Why didn’t they send someone in normal clothes?”

“I don’t know,” Henry says, with a shrug. “Perhaps they needed someone with a particular affinity for magic, or someone with great strength. We know, for instance, that the Goddess’s priests were keeping an eye on you. It is likely that they needed someone very strong to evade their detection.”

I nod, considering that that makes sense, and look up at my mate. His eyes, however, are fixed steadily on his father. “What is it, dad,” Sinclair says, his tone suddenly sharp. “What is it you’re not telling us?”

Surprised, I look back at Henry, curious. There’s nothing on his face that speaks any secrecy to me, and I look back up at Sinclair, confused.

Henry sighs, though. “I should have known that you’d see through me, Dominic,” he murmurs. “You always could read me like a book.”

“Out with it, dad,” Sinclair says, his whole body tense now. I glance at Rafe, registering that he’s fully asleep, and can’t help myself from noting that he’s certainly not letting his father’s clear anxiety affect his own moods, as he does mine. I purse my lips at my baby and then turn my attention to my father-in-law.

“Your intel has spoken to an escaped member of the cult,” Henry says. “The man insists on being anonymous, but he was willing to divulge some of their practices.”

“Well that’s wonderful,” I say, hope blooming in me. “That’s so helpful -”

“It is,” Henry says, looking up at me, his eyes still worried. “We’re grateful for that, of course, but...”

“Dad,” Sinclair growls at Henry’s hesitation, annoyed now at the further delay.

“All right, Dominic,” Henry says, putting his hands up and sighing. “It’s just – he told us that their standard method of operation is to play the long game – to place a member of the cult within the target’s inner circle. To spend months, if not years, becoming a confidant of the target, becoming a best friend or a member of the family. And then, when the Cult decides that the time is right, that person strikes. The victims are...almost always completely blindsided by the betrayal.”

“Oh my god,” I gasp, looking between Henry and Sinclair. “This means...it could be someone we know and love? Someone close to us?”

“Yes,” Henry concludes, nodding slowly. “It is very likely that the Cult has been working for years to bring about the birth of this child. And we still don’t know why they wanted Rafe to be born, and for you to be his particular mother and father, but we do know...”

“That if they’re working that hard,” Sinclair says, picking up his father’s line of thought. “That they’ve certainly placed someone within our inner circle who is seeking to betray us.”

“Oh my god,” I say, my hands flying to my mouth in shock. And then I wrack my mind, wondering who on earth it could be. But no one comes to mind everyone I know and love none of them could be involved in such a nefarious scheme to steal my baby away Right?

Chapter 324 – But Why Would You Want To?

Cora

I drop my hand from the doorknob, suddenly, making a split decision and not letting myself think too hard about what I'm doing and why. Then, I strip my wet shirt and leggings from my body, grabbing a dry towel off of the shelf and wrapping it around myself. My skin is grateful for this, wanting to be free and dry, but my anxiety rises as I tuck the towel into itself above my bra so that it will hold itself together.

I close my eyes as I grasp the door knob again, exhaling a deep breath and then pushing it open, striding back into the room.

A little pulse of satisfaction runs through me as I see Roger do a double-take at my appearance. He has laid himself back on the bed in the same position he took before – shoulders against the headboard, one leg casually bent at the knee and propped on the mattress, the other foot on the floor. He watches me steadily as I swiftly cross the room, coming to the other side of the bed and primly sitting myself down on it, my whole back against the headboard. I pull my legs up, wrapping my arms around my knees and staring steadily at the blank television screen. “Does the tv work?” I ask, my voice shaking a little despite myself.

“I...don't know...” Roger replies, his tone curious. “Do you want me to try it?”

“Mmmhmm!” I say, my hum an octave higher than it would usually be. Slowly, Roger stands up and moves to the TV, treating me to the opportunity to scan the broad muscles of his back, which sweep downward to a trim waist. He even has two little dimples on either side of his spine right above his perfect ass...

I grit my teeth to keep from making any noise, giving him any indication of what seeing him undressed like this makes me want to do to him. Roger reaches out and twists the dial on the TV, but there's no reaction from it. He tries the other two, but the tv stays stubbornly dark. Then, too slowly, Roger turns to me,

I inhale, sharply, when I see the way that he looks at me beneath his lowered brows. His face is serious, and a muscle in his cheek flickers, letting me know that he's clenching his teeth, holding back from...something. But the darkness in his eyes, the intensity there...

“No such luck,” he purrs, dropping his hand from the television and focusing his entire attention on me. It falls on me like a real weight on my chest and I feel my breathing deepen, fighting “Oh,” I say, something in me screaming at the lameness of that response.

Roger doesn't say anything. He just begins to prowl back across the room, heading – my breath catches to see – not back to his side of the bed, but to mine. He stops about three feet from me, slowly lowering himself to sit on the mattress next to me. He puts a hand out to rest on the sheets, a few inches from my feet, and leans forward towards me.

Roger doesn't touch me at all, but he doesn't need to. The space between us in this moment is thick with electricity, with a palpable intensity that may as well be his wolf's tongue licking up the side of my throat for all it's doing to me right now. I realize, suddenly, that I'm panting as I see his eyes move to my parted lips, as I hear the growl beginning to resonate in his chest.

He reaches out then, slowly, as if to a startled hare, but I don't move. My body is fully pressed against the headrest, every inch of me tensed as if to run, but I don't. move. an. inch.

Roger's hand is moments from my face, reaching for me, every inch of it a plea as much as a craving to just touch me, just once – when suddenly, a spark – a literal spark – flies between us – from his thumb to my lower lip, just–millimeters away. And I jump suddenly at the unexpected pain of it, my hand flying to my mouth, stunned.

Roger blinks and pulls his hand back, looking at it. "What the," he says, looking at his fingers as if he somehow willed this thing between us to take form to become actual lightning. But as he looks at his hand, my entire reality comes crashing down on me.

—

My mind flashes through memories in an instant – first I see him, Roger, crying in my arms when he thought his brother was dead – and then to me, running out to check and see if he had left on that mission to the expression on his face as he held me safe to those days on the ship, when he hadn't touched me, but had let me know every day with his eyes, with his steady presence, that he was mine, waiting for me, as soon as I wanted to claim him-

—

And then my heart wrenches when I remember, again, the absolute heartache in the weeks after when he didn't call – when I'd stay up at night, staring at the blackened screen of my phone, waiting for him to reply to my texts when I'd cried myself to sleep night after night realizing that whatever magic had been between us was gone –

—

And then Hank! I actually groan when I remember Hank, and I put my face in my hands, my shoulders hunching with shame. Hank, who has been so sweet and patient with me. I know that he knows something had been between me and Roger – and he gave me so much space to figure it Hank, with his soft lips, who turned out to be so surprisingly good in bed –

But even when I'd been with him, I'd thought of Roger's mouth on mine at the moonlight baptism – of everything that passed between us –

And suddenly, my groan becomes a sob ripping from my throat. Barely a moment has passed since Roger reached out to touch me, and despite my face buried in my hands I can feel his heavy attention on me again.

—

“Cora!” he whispers, his voice shocked. “What’s what’s wrong –”

“I can’t do this,” I bawl and suddenly I’m on my feet, past him, headed inexplicably for the door that leads outside to the parking lot –.

“Cora!” I hear behind me, hear Roger stumbling over his own feet in his surprise to see me gone so fast-

But I’m already gone, already out the door, which hangs open behind me, banging against the wall of the motel in the wind. I’m running now I have no idea where running, and crying, my tears lost to the streams of water that fall from the sky. My body pushes itself, responding to something in me needs to be out in the storm. – that matches it, that seeks some clarity within it. And so I run, my body pumping almost in time with the thunder rumbling above me, my lungs gasping like the rain pounding against the forest floor where I’m running. I need this space need the water running down my skin – I need to be somewhere else where things make sense –

Where I make sense, where I’m not totally and devastatingly in love with a guy who abandoned me after making me feel like I had his heart, who wants children I can’t give him – who is somehow now, back who comforts me, and flirts with me, and looks at me like that – but who hasn’t made.

—

me any promises –

Suddenly, something grabs my arm, pulling me almost off my feet as it yanks me backwards. I can't stop the scream that tears from my throat. (1)

Chapter 325 – Finally. Finally.

I cry out as I'm pulled backwards – surprised more than hurt and suddenly I'm pressed against him in the pouring rain. Roger holds me tight, one hand around my upper arm, the other wrapped firmly around me, pressing my body to his. And the feel of him, of his skin hot against my own – my towel is gone, I have no idea where – I cry harder at the feel of him and rest my forehead against his chest, because I know I can't have it – I can't-

"Cora!" Roger shouts, above the wind and the rain. "What – Cora! What the hell are you doing?!"

"I can't!" I sob. "I can't do this, Roger! I can't be with you like this, not if you'll...you'll never love me! I can't have you in half measures!" I look up at him then, into his face, realizing the truth of it in that moment. "I can't do this if you can't take me for who I am! Human! Broken! Complicated, difficult! Confused, and jealous, and mad pretty much all the time! If you can't take me like that," I shout, begging now, "then let me go, Roger! Because I can't –"

I glance back in the direction of the hotel, my sobbing breaths tearing at my lungs, "I can't have half of you. I can't have – just.... lust. It will kill me! It will break my heart, and I'll never survive it!"

With the last words I pound my free hand against his chest, my palm slapping wet against his skin.

Roger stares down at me as I confess everything to him- my whole heart – listening to every word. And then, when I'm done, when the words stop pouring from my mouth and all that's left is my panting breath, he tightens his arms around me, giving me an angry little shake. He clenches his jaw and I can tell that he's mad – but I have no idea why. "God damn it, Cora," Roger growls, glaring down at me. "You're my fucking mate."
5

And then he sweeps me up in his arms, the gesture not at all sweet or romantic – but possessive, and conclusive, incensed. "All I've ever wanted is all of you – my whole life, I've been waiting for it. And I was an idiot" he continues, his voice breaking, "I hesitated, and I'll regret it until the day I die because there was no denying that all I want – all I'll ever want is this –"

And then he kisses me, his mouth hard on mine, and my body reacts instantly, my back arching and pressing myself harder against him. My arms are around his neck, pulling him closer to me, my mouth open to him as every piece of me – every molecule – gives in.

He's mine. Mine, something in me screams to the universe. And god damn it, if I can have him And the universe responds, lightening cracking above us, the rain pouring around us as Roger presses me fervently too him and ravages my mouth with his kisses me like the world is falling to pieces around us, which it very well might be. The water rushes around his ankles, threatening to sweep us away. But Roger is adamant against it and something fierce within me sings that he and I can weather it, that I've been a fool to run from this. That we can face this storm, and whichever ones comes next.

My hand is on his face when Roger pulls away from me. "Come on," he growls, his skin shivering against the cold rain. Thunder cracks again as he turns back towards the safety of the motel. "I'm getting you inside. Now." Then he shakes his head at me, frustrated, and mutters "you idiot."

I nod fervently, ignoring his insult, tucking my head against his shoulder and breathing hard as I let him carry me back to the motel. Barely above the sound of the storm, I hear him growling more frustrated words with every step, something about insane women who run naked into storms and how he should have known better, because he's met my sister, and madness is frequently genetic... 1

I'm shocked to find myself smiling, laughing a little and wrapping my arms more tightly around his neck. Because Roger is about to find out precisely how crazy I can really be.

The door to our motel room is hanging open, blowing in the wind, but Roger ignores the rain water pouring through it as he strides through the entrance, kicking the door shut behind him, not bothering to lock it as he moves steadily towards the bed. When we get there he throws me.

down against the mattress, a little angry and not bothering to be gentle.

And, god damn it, but I laugh again – laugh, a little recklessly, as I bounce against the tired springs of this worn out motel bed. Laugh, because he's so fucking mad at me, and me at him, and we're both so mad at ourselves and I want to tear him to pieces, and I know he wants to do the same to me –

–

"Shut up," Roger growls, 'swiftly lowering himself to the bed and covering his body with mine. I grin as the corners of his mouth turn up, as he lays his cool wet skin against mine, as he wraps his arms around me, one low behind my waist, the other tight behind my shoulders.

"Make me," I snarl back at him, my eyes narrow and teasing.

And, god damn it, he does.

His mouth is on mine again, hard and fast, and I press my eyes shut, opening my mouth to him and sliding my leg up the outside of his thigh, wrapping it around his hips, pulling him closer. There's nothing delicate or hesitant about us anymore – no more games, no more testing, no more pulling back. Instead, his hands are eager against my body as his tongue sweeps through my mouth, as I lean my head back to give him access to my throat, where he laps the rain water off my skin like he's been thirsty for weeks.

His hands work quickly now, unsnapping the clasp of my bra and then moving lower to grasp my panties, yanking them down. He pulls away for a moment, trying to make space between us so that he can slide the panties off of my legs but I moan in protest, pulling him back, not wanting him away from me for a second –

“God damn it, Cora,” Roger snarls, sending me a quick glare as the fabric is again trapped between us, stopping him from – “would you just let me do this?”

I laugh then, again, realizing my mistake, and I unloop my leg from its place around his back so that he slip the fabric off of me and toss it somewhere on the ground. An instant later he's back, his face pressed against my stomach as he kisses and licks his way up my body. I tear my bra off and toss it away, clearing the path for Roger to move up my chest and bring his face back to mine.

He groans, a little, as he kisses me and moves a hand to capture one of my breasts, softly squeezing it in his broad palm. “Fuck,” he moans, his body clenching so that he has to pull his mouth from mine at the intensity of it, “fuck, Cora, I've wanted this for so long “Then fucking do it Roger,” I pant, impatient, wanting him now.

Chapter 326 – Away from the World

Cora

I want him right now – immediately – so I impatiently sit up to fumble at the top of his boxer briefs, to push them downwards –

Roger glares at me a little again, at the challenge in my voice, and I glare right back.

“Fine,” he snarls, rolling briskly away from me so that he’s sitting on the bed next to me, pushing his shorts down and kicking them off. I barely have a moment to look at him, my eyes widening at the sight of that thick, hard cock – before he grabs me, hauling me bodily on top of him so that my chest is pressed against his, my legs straddled on either side of his hips, my oh my god, the slick center of me pressed directly against the mass of his cock

“Fine, Cora,” Roger snaps, looking directly into my eyes, his temper riled, just how I like him.” Then let’s fucking do it.”

Without a word, still holding his gaze, I shift my hips upwards and reach one hand between us, feeling the proud length of him against my palm. I pump him once, twice, my mouth falling open as I realize the full size of him, Roger shuddering hard at my touch. And then, slowly, delicately, I position the tip of him directly at my entrance and then lower myself down.

I can’t help the noise that crawls from my throat as I lower myself fully onto Roger’s cock, the moan that turns into a cry as he slowly fills me far beyond the point I thought I could be stretched. Roger groans deeply, his head falling against my shoulder, panting as I take all of him in until my body is pressed flush against his.

“Fuck,” he whispers, and I feel the word as breath against my skin. “Fuck, Cora...”

My body starts to shake a little as I adjust to the feel of him inside of me, my face turned up to the ceiling as my hips start to pulse of their own accord, wanting to feel him moving against my inner walls.

“Fuck,” Roger says again, more definitive this time, and then he curls his back, pressing his hips.

upward, sinking more completely into me, making my whole body rock forward at the sudden intensity of it. And then he’s pulsing, pounding up into me, and it’s all I can do to cling to his shoulders and weather him as he holds my hips steady with his hands, pounding his thick dick, deep into me stroke after stroke.

I feel my climax building quickly and I welcome it, wanting it, angling my body so that

Roger's Until –

I'm gasping, suddenly, everything in me spilling over and clenching hard against Roger as I wrap my arms around his neck, pressing my forehead to his shoulder as everything I am comes to pieces, as the tension snaps and pleasure sweeps through my body. Roger holds me through it, wrapping his arms tight around me, and something in me is aware of his hips pulsing three more times, harsh, before he cries out, his whole body going still as he sinks all the way into me, spilling himself into me as I lay my head against the curve of his neck and pant against his shoulder.

We stay like that for a long time, Roger with his arms wrapped around me, pressing me tight against him as I tremble lightly and I catch my breath.

"Cora," he whispers, his words thick, his throat raw. "Do you want it?"

"Huh?" I ask, pulling my head up so that I can look at him, my eyes still a little bleary with intensity, with the afterglow.

"Do you want it," he asks, raising a hand to my cheek, brushing my face with his thumb and looking at me with such – such love in his eyes – I catch my breath at the sight of him. "Do you want my mark? You can have it –"

"Oh," I say, my eyes going wide as I realize what he's asking me – and the significance of it. It's such an incredibly intimate moment – Roger is still pressed inside of me, his arms wrapped around my body, his face just millimeters from mine, so close that our lips brush as he talks."

Roger," I say, suddenly afraid, pulling away a little bit. "Can – can humans even take a wolf's mark?"

He knits his brows together for a moment, frowning, and I can see that he also just doesn't know "Roger," I say, leaning back a little so that I can take his face in my hands, feeling him groan as I shift against his new newly-sensitive cock. "Roger," I say again, waiting for him to focus on me. "I want it. I do," I say, nodding, making sure he understands me and waiting until he nods to let me know he hears me. "But...can we wait? Until we know how my body is going to react?"

He pauses for a moment and then pulls me a little closer so he can rest his forehead against mine. "Yes, Cora," he breathes, and then, laughing, he twists in the bed so quickly that I shriek with surprise and then laughter as my back hits the mattress and he pins me down against it with the weight of his own tanned, muscled form.

–

“But know this, little mate,” he growls, looking me in the eyes and then lowering his head to drag his teeth down the length of my neck to the soft, tender space where my flesh arches down into my shoulder. “I’m going to mark you right...here...” he says, pressing his sharp teeth against it. I gasp a little at the sensation, at the preview of what he’ll do.

“I’m going to do it,” he continues, flicking his tongue lovingly over the spot, “as soon as we know it won’t make you like. Explode or something.”

I burst into laughter at this, rolling with it, and Roger’s body shakes along with mine as he pulls me tight against him, not wanting to let me go. I let him, not wanting to be separated either, until my laughter fades and I find us both lying on our sides, our faces close together, our noses nearly touching.

“I love you, Roger,” I say, quite simply, surprising myself. Because...well, I’ve never said it to someone before. And I always thought it would be hard or scary. –

But somehow, in this moment...it’s just the simple truth, as easy as observing that it’s still raining outside, or that he’s beautiful.

Roger pauses for a long second, I think because he knows how big of a step that is for me. And then he closes the distance between us, kissing me thoroughly, recklessly, his whole heart in every movement of his lips. I’m out of breath when he pulls away and I blink my eyes open to find him already staring at me.

“I’m very much in love with you too, Cora,” Roger sighs, shaking his head a little. “Though we didn’t make it easy for each other, did we?”

“No,” I murmur, moving my body closer to him, if that’s possible. “But,” I say, with a little smirk, “it wouldn’t be very us if we did, would it?”

“No,” he agrees, shaking his head and smirking at me. “But the rest,” he says, nodding urgently.

The rest let’s make that simple. I love you, and I always will, and that’s the only thing that matters. All right?” (1

“All right,” I say, sighing and allowing myself to rest against him. And, deep inside, I hope very much that that will be true.

Chapter 327 – Back to the Real World

Ella

I'm sitting anxiously by Rafe's basinet, watching him sleep, while my mind wanders impatiently elsewhere. It's been twenty-four hours since we heard from Cora and Roger and I feel, just a tiny little bit, that every passing minute is a knife in my heart.

Where is my sister? I wonder to myself, sighing as I look down at my baby and honestly barely seeing him.

It's okay, my wolf says to me, rubbing her body warmly against my poor aching heart, nuzzling me with her snout. Roger will take care of her – I know it. He can't not.

But what if he couldn't, I think anxiously, my mind turning inevitably to that freak storm that they hit – the storm which separated them from their guards, which seemed....just, too precise.

Too convenient. Too perfect to be coincidence. What if the cult trapped them? And hurt them both?

I wail, inwardly, my wolf giving in a little and sitting back on her haunches to raise her nose to the sky and howl a little along with me. She still believes, but she's overwhelmed, a little, by my despair, even though inwardly she keeps the faith.

"Ella!" I hear Sinclair shout from downstairs. I jump a little, turning towards the door, but I freeze, not allowing myself to hope. If it was bad news – he wouldn't be shouting from downstairs –

But something very urgent could be happening so he can't come up –

"Ella!" he calls again. "Come down! There's a car in the drive!"

I gasp, leaning down to quickly scoop Rafe up into my arms. He gives a little half-hearted cry of protest and I know that I should leave him here to sleep more – but damn it, with the cult out there looking for him, there's no way I'm leaving him out of one of his parents' sight for an instant. Not until I know he's safe.

I dash out of the room and pound down the stairs, looking anxiously into my mate's face as he stands at the bottom, a hand raised to take mine. I slip my hand into his as I reach him, my eyes not leaving his. "Is it" I gasp.

–

He doesn't say anything and I realize that he doesn't know he came to get me before he could tell so, together, we both stride to the front door, which Sinclair throws open.

And I give a little moan of relief, sinking against Sinclair as my knees weaken, just a little, as I door. And behind her – I can see Roger, turning towards her and saying a few words before they both open their doors and climb out.

“Cora!” I cry, tears filling my eyes as I dash towards her.

“Ella!” she laughs, giving me a big smile as I throw myself at her, tossing my arm around her neck. Cora takes too steadying steps backwards at the force of me, but wraps her arms around me nonetheless. “Easy, sis!” she says, still laughing a little. “Don’t crush the baby.”

—

“Screw the baby,” I mutter, angrily

the side as I hugged my sister, but well, in this moment, all I care about is that I have my sister back, safe. “Where were you?” I demand, stepping back and wiping at my eyes, shifting Rafe again so that he’s safely against my chest. “Why didn’t you call?”

– not meaning it at all, of course – I made sure to hold Rafe to “Our phones died,” Cora says, shrugging at me. “We were in the storm for a long time –”

“And you didn’t have a charger?” I ask, exasperated. “We didn’t plan to stay so long “No charging cord in the car?”

“No, there wasn’t one –”

“Couldn’t have stopped,” I cry, “at a gas station to buy one?!”

“Ella,” Cora says, stepping forward and looking into my eyes with her own wide with shock. “I’m sorry I didn’t know you were so worried. We were fine. – we are fine! We didn’t want to stop anywhere on the way home, we just wanted to get here quickly. I’m sorry I didn’t think of it.”

—

“Well, you should have,” I say, sniffing a little and wiping my angry tears of relief away from my eyes. “I can’t lose you, Cora. I was worried I did.”

“You didn’t,” she says, putting a warm arm around me. “I’m sorry, Ella,” she says, as Roger and Sinclair come slowly over to us. “You’re right we should have called, or texted, or sent a smoke signal. It’s our fault. We were...” she hesitates here, but Roger finishes for her.

“Distracted,” he says, smirking smugly at me and sinking his hands into his pockets. “What?” I ask, confused, looking between the two of them. “Distracted by what?”

Cora blushes –

Blushes?!

My mouth drops open.

And then Cora, a little chagrined but smiling a little at Roger, explains. “The storm was bad – we stopped...at a little motel. Just to weather it out.” She doesn’t say anything else but the big smile that creeps across her face then says everything I need to know.

“Oh, ew!” I shout, shoving her a little. “I’m sitting here, for hours, worried to death, and you’re out there having motel s3x!?”

“You should try it sometime, Ella,” Roger quips, and when I turn to him I see that he’s smirking at me again. “There’s nothing ‘ew’ about it.”

“Oh my god,” I say, suddenly realizing the implications of this. “Oh my god,” I repeat, taking a step forward to shove Roger for his comment for good measure and then turning to Cora. “Does this mean – are you two –” I’m unable to finish my sentence, my mouth hanging open in hope and awe.

“We’re together,” Roger says smoothly, ignoring my little shove and closing the distance between him and Cora to take her hand.

I stare at them, frozen in shock, for so long that Cora’s smile falters on her face and she looks at me with new worry in my eyes. “Ella,” she starts, “are you –”

“Yes!” I shriek, tossing my head back and shouting the word to the sky. “YES! FINALLY!” I pump a fist into the air and then start to dance in a little happy circle, laughing with my glee. “Codger exists! Codger forever!”

“Roger,” Sinclair sighs, and I see him glare at his brother on one of my happy loops. “You know you need to tell her these things slowly – she’s going to shake the baby “I’m not shaking the baby,” I scold, giving my mate a happy little glare and continuing to dance, Rafe safe in my arms, awake now and giving me a happy little smile. "See?" I say, "he likes it!"

Then I turn my little dance into a song, dancing a loop around them all, "Baby Rafe is happpppy!"

He is also team Codgerrrr! He knewwww it was gonna happpppen!"

Sinclair laughs at me, putting his hands in his pockets, shaking his head but grinning at me. I give him a wink and wiggle my hips and he sends me a little pulse of happy lust down our bond that lets me know he likes it. A lot.

"Not dating," Roger said, putting an arm around Cora's shoulders. "Mated."

"What," I gasp, laughing a little as I spin towards my sister and, apparently, now, her mate. "How did that happen? Let me see!" I reach out my hand to pull back the collar of her shirt – which looks wrecked, by the way, like it's been through the storm and back.

"Ella," Cora says, pursing her lips at me and swatting my hand away. "There's no mark yet. We don't know if..." she hesitates, looking at him. "We don't know what will happen," he says, "if I try to mark her."

"Oh," I say, my eyebrows going up. Because, obviously, I don't know myself. "Well," I say, turning to look at Sinclair. "Is the intent enough?"

"Yes," he says, smiling at his brother and holding out a hand, which Roger grasps warmly. "Yes, it certainly is. Congratulations, brother." Roger says something serious back to him, but I don't hear it because I'm shrieking with happiness again and hugging my sister close. She laughs and hugs me as well.

"Oh geeze," I say, laughing as I pull away from her. "It has been...a lot of emotions for me in the past ten minutes," I say, putting a hand to my head. "I thought you were dead, and it turns out instead that you're mated!" I smile softly at her now, taking her hand. "I'm so happy for you, Cora," I say sincerely, squeezing her fingers in mine. "I think...it's right."

"It is," she says, nodding and smiling at me. Then she looks at Roger, distracted by Sinclair, and sighs a happy little sigh. "We have a lot to figure out, but..." she shrugs. "We're going to figure it out."

"You will," I say, stepping closer to her and wrapping my arm around her waist. "You really will, Cora. I can feel it."

And inside me, my little wolf gives a little howl of victory and starts to dance around herself.

Chapter 328 – Reconnaissance

Ella

“As happy as this is,” Sinclair says, folding his arms over his chest and looking around at the four of us. “And it is happy,” he says, looking at Cora and Roger to let them know that he’s sincere. They nod their understanding. “We do still have a problem on our hands,” he says, nodding to Rafe in my arms.

“Yes,” I say, looking eagerly up at Cora. “Henry found out some more about the cult – I’ll tell you all about it. It’s...not good,” I say, with a little grimace.

“Oh,” she says, drawing her brows together. “Okay – yes, I want to hear everything.” I nod, tugging at her waist so that she’ll follow me into the house. Sinclair and Roger come close behind.

“Did you find anything else out?” Sinclair asks Roger. “No,” Roger replies, a little apologetic. “Just what we sent you from the library. Was it useful?”

“Incredibly,” Sinclair confirms, thankful. “But yes, we found out more...”

My mate and I take Roger and Cora into the little office and tell them everything, seating Rafe in a little swing that we’ve placed there temporarily since we’ve been spending so much time here.

working on this issue. They’re both as horrified as we were to discover that we likely have someone in our midst who is working for the cult, who either has already betrayed us or will soon. Though both wrack their minds they, like us, can’t come up with a viable candidate for who it is.

“We need more information,” Sinclair growls, thoughtful, as he flips through what paperwork his investigators have produced for the case, as if he might find something else there. I nod, agreeing, but I look at Cora and see her fading a bit.

“You haven’t slept, have you?” I ask, concerned. She smiles at me, apologetic, but shakes her head. “I’m sorry, Ella,” she says. “I want to help but I think...”

“Upstairs,” I say, my voice definitive, swatting her on the rear. “Immediately, sleep.”

“I’ll take her,” Roger says, stepping forward to take Cora by the arm. “Noooo,” I say, putting a hand on his chest and shoving him back. Though I’m not actually strong enough to stop him, Roger complies, laughing and falling back a bit. “I said sleep. Not bed.”

Roger laughs, putting his hands up. “I promise,” he says, “I just want to see my mate comfortably tucked in. All right?"

"All right," I say, narrowing my eyes and then giving Cora a peck on her cheek. "We'll figure it all out when you wake up, okay?" I say, giving her a little nudge towards the door.

"We will," she agrees, giving me a steady look. "Really, we will." And then she takes Roger's hand and walks out the door and up the stairs with him.

I move to Sinclair's side as we watch them disappear from our sight. "I'm so happy," I say, leaning against his chest and sighing contentedly. He wraps his arms around my shoulders, dipping his head to give me a kiss on the cheek.

"Me too," he says, holding me tight against him. "They're idiots for not doing it sooner."

I don't say anything for a moment, considering all the things that held them back in the first place. "It's not going to always be easy for them," I sigh. "Not like it was for us."

"Ella," Sinclair says, and I can feel him shake his head against the back of my neck. "You almost died like, four times since we've been together. How is that easy?"

"Because," I say, turning in his arms and looking sincerely up at him. "We always had Rafe. And once we figured out that we loved each other, and especially that I was a wolf too, then..." I shrug, "at least with us, it was always smooth sailing."

"I see what you mean," he says, looking calmly down into my eyes. "But their love is a big love, Ella," he says, nodding to me. "Like ours. They're going to work it out."

"I hope so," I sigh, resting my head against his chest and closing my eyes. "That's all I want. For both of them."

The next five days pass with that seeming like a very real possibility. Cora and Roger stay with us, partially because I keep making up reasons why they can't go, and it fills my heart with joy every day to see them growing closer. To see the tiny little touches he places on her back when he leans down to say something in her ear, to see the way she turns her face up to him and laughs at one of his dark, wry little jokes.

But then, on day six, Cora takes me by the shoulders and gives me a little shake, insisting that she must go back to the clinic.

"Whyyyyy," I whine, tilting my head back on my neck and groaning. "Just stay here with us. We need you!"

”

“You don’t need me,” she says, taking her hands back and folding her arms across her chest. You’re just trying to keep me in a little love bubble with Roger so that I don’t change my mind or something.”

“Well,” I say, raising my eyebrows at her and giving her a too–innocent smile. “Is it working?”

She laughs, shaking her head at me. “I’m not changing my mind, Ella. I’m in love with him.” I squeal a little to hear her say it but she holds a finger up, stopping me. “But I have a life. And a boyfriend who I never broke up with. And a job that requires me to actually help people. And I have to go deal with all of that! Okay?”

“Okay,” I mumble, looking petulantly down at my shoes. “Did you seriously never break up with Hank?” I ask, glancing up at her.

“No,” she says, raising a guilty hand to her forehead and shading her eyes, embarrassed. “I kind of ...ghosted him. But I need to be a big girl and go...do it.”

“Okay,” I say, stepping forward and rubbing her on the arm in what I hope is a comforting way. Be nice to him, all right? I like Doctor Hank.”

“I like him too,” she says, shaking her head. “I feel terrible, Ella. But...I’ve got to go set it right.

Okay?” Roger comes around the corner then from the kitchen, carrying me a little lunch bag that very clearly says “To Cora from Roger” on it in black pen. I smirk when I see it.

“What is this,” Cora sighs, snatching the brown paper bag from Roger’s hand and giving him a little glare.

“Your lunch,” Roger replies, innocent. Cora looks into it and then glares at him again, shoving the bag at his chest and forcing him to take it. “There’s nothing in there except an apple and the sharpie you used to write the message.”

“What!” Roger protests, laughing. “It’s nutritious, and doctors are always losing their pens.”

Cora glares at him and crosses her arms. “You’re just trying to make Hank get the message the moment I walk in the door instead of letting me do this on my own time.”

“Um, yeah,” Roger says, as if it’s obvious. I can’t stop the laugh that spills out of me at that. “But also,” he continues, gesturing towards the bag now in his hands, “an apple! For strength!”

“Roger,” Cora says, laughing as well and stepping close to him, lining her body tight against his. ”

You’re sweet, but also a little bit psycho. Can you please let me go do this?”

“Fine,” he murmurs, smiling as he kisses her hair. “But then I’m not saving this apple for you. Ella will probably devour it, as she does everything else in this house anyway.”

“My apple to begin with,” I mutter, snatching the bag from his hand. Cora rolls her eyes at both of us and gives Roger a kiss before blowing me one as she heads out the door.

“See you, Cora!” I call after her. “Come back as soon as you can!”

“I promise,” she calls over her shoulder, laughing. I shut the door behind her with a happy little sigh, thinking that I’ll see her that night. But five days later, she still hasn’t come back.

Chapter 329 – Missing

Sinclair

“Where is she,” Roger growls, pacing through our living room as Ella sit on the couch feeding Rafe, watching him anxiously. “I’ve been everywhere looking for her – at the clinic, at her apartment –”

“You must have just missed her, Roger,” Ella says, as worried as he us but wanting to calm him down. “She calls me every morning and night to fill me in. It sounds like she’s just super busy at the clinic it got very overwhelmed when she disappeared with us for a few days.”

“He’s keeping her there,” Roger murmurs suspiciously, his anxiety really doing a number on him.

“She broke up with him, and he pretended to accept it, but he’s keeping her trapped in the clinic so she’ll agree to give him another shot –”

“You know she’s not doing that, Roger,” I say, leaning against the fireplace mantle and taking a deep breath. Honestly, I don’t want to be in here handling my brother’s paranoia, but Ella sent me a little shout down the bond letting me know that she needed some help. He’s been worked up for days, of course, but really seems to be going off the deep end now. Not that I wouldn’t be too, honestly, if I was freshly mated to Ella and then she disappeared for five days.

“How do you know,” Roger snaps at me, his eyes flashing with rage.

“Because,” I reply, my wolf responding to the challenge in his voice by raising his hackles. “I know Cora. She wouldn’t do that. You have to trust her.” I stand up straight, my body language communicating to Roger that I can take him, and if he needs someone to pin him to the floor, that I’ll do it. After all, my mate and my infant child are in this room. If he flips out... their safety is my priority. Not his.

“He’s right, Roger,” Ella says, trying to keep her voice even. “Honestly, she sounds fine, she’s just really busy. She told me to... tell you she loves you.”

“But why won’t she pick up my calls?” Roger snaps, spinning on her, “why, when I go to the clinic to see her, is she conveniently not there? Why is she never in her apartment when she says she is!?”

Instinctually, I take a step forward, interposing my body between my mate and my mate and my brother.

“Oh back off, Dominic,” Roger growls, forcing himself to turn away and stalk to the window, looking for Cora, hoping she'll magically appear in the driveway. "I'm not going to hurt anyone."

"You'd better not," I murmur, leaning back against the mantle.

"I'm going to take Rafe upstairs," Ella sighs, nodding to the baby, who has finished eating. "See if I can get him down for a nap."

I nod to her, watching her carry our little boy out of the room, my heart surging with love for them. When they're gone, I turn my attention back to my brother.

"I need you to come back, Roger," I say, my voice soft. "We need you here."

"How," he growls, digging his fingers into the windowsill and not turning towards me. "How can I concentrate on anything when she hasn't talked to me for days. And I don't even know what I did wrong."

"Well," I say after a long pause, considering. "Did you do anything wrong?"

"What?" Rodger spits, spinning on me.

"It's just a question, Roger," I say, shrugging and meeting his furious eyes. "Did you do something to make her question your mating?"

"NO, Dominic!" he shouts. "I didn't do anything!"

"Well, then there's your answer," I reply with a little shrug. "If you didn't do anything, then it's all with her. And your only choice is to keep reaching out, and wait for her to come to you when she's ready. There's literally nothing you can do now except be patient."

"You're ridiculous," he snarls, turning away from me again, desperate.

"You just don't like the truth," I reply, sighing. "Because my answer wasn't 'go rip the world apart until you find her, and then sling her over your shoulder so you can more easily carry her home.'"

"Well, yeah," Roger replies, arrogant and angry. "Obviously that's what I would do, if I even knew where she was."

I laugh and move over to him, putting a hand on his shoulder that makes him jump a little bit. But I don't move away – I'm bigger than he is, anyway. I can take what he throws at me.

"Trust her, Roger," I say quietly. "She'll thank you for it, in the end, if you approach this with faith instead of suspicion. And in the meantime, let me distract you.”

“You just want me to work harder on this cult problem,” he sighs, closing his eyes and hanging his head, giving into my advice a little bit.

“Just think of it as a puzzle,” I say, slipping my arm around his shoulder and giving him a steadying little squeeze, “and when you finish it, your reward is that my son doesn’t get kidnapped! Isn’t that a great prize?”

“Fine,” he sighs, shaking his head and covering his eyes with his hand. “But you get maybe three hours of this,” he continues, “before I’m out there looking for her again.”

“Okay,” I reply, nodding and lying through my teeth. Because there’s no way I’m letting him prowl the streets looking for Cora when he’s like this. He’ll completely freak her out, and it sounds like she’s spooked already. So I turn him, my arm still around his shoulders, towards the door and we head to the office to sort through the evidence we’ve sorted through a thousand times.

We spend hours doing this, wearing ourselves out looking for loopholes that we haven’t explored before, calling our interrogative team together to better speculate about the possibilities, when suddenly, the front door to the house slams open.

Roger is instantly on his feet and moving towards the door, only one person clear on his mind. But I’m more wary, more aware of the possibilities and my muscles bunch as I sprint to get in front of him, pushing behind me as we reach the office door together so that I can get into the hall first, just in case it’s a threat –

—

My eyes go dark as I see my reconnaissance team forcing their way in, a black-robed figure trapped in their arms with a sack over his head. I think several things at once, the first being that they would never, ever come through the first door if they didn’t have to. And second, that they barely have a hold on him.

“Roger!” I shout, my voice deep with the Alpha’s command. “The door! NOW!”

He realizes instantly that it’s not Cora, but he responds ably, seeing the importance of the moment. Roger sprints past the struggling reconnaissance team to slam the door shut behind them while I stride forward, pushing one of my men aside and slipping behind the priest’s back, wrapping an arm around his throat and cutting off his air so he can’t breathe.

—

The priest, who cannot see anything at all, struggles hard against me and even though he's a small man – he must have some magic working on his side to be able to resist me so well. Still, he's no match for me, and I get one of his hands twisted up behind his back, yanking it so that he screeches in pain.

“Enough,” I growl in his ear, yanking his arm again so that he whimpers, his arm almost qualms with breaking each one of your bones before I tear your limbs apart. Am I understood?”

The priest hesitates for a moment but, luckily for him, realizes that he's been beat. Quickly, he nods. As he does, I nod to the team to let them know I've got him. “Ropes, cuffs,” I command, tasers.” Most of them scatter to gather the supplies I order to interrogate our prisoner as I move forward, pushing the man towards the office where we've gathered our intel. Honestly, the basement would be more convenient, but until we have him contained...

“Dominic,” Roger says, coming to my side as we enter the office and then pulling up a chair so that I can sink the priest into it when the team comes back, “Let me take charge on this.”

“Can you do it?” I demand, my voice harsh. “Is your head in the right place?”

My brother looks at me steadily and then nods once. “I need this,” he says and I nod as well, consenting. Honestly, it's probably better – I'm too close to this, my emotions might get the better of me –

There's a fair chance I'm going to snap this priest's neck from rage if I'm in charge, so Roger...he really is the right choice, now.

Luckily, before I can act on it, the team floods the room with supplies and together we get the priest into the chair. He struggles again as my team strap him down but I punch him, hard, across the face behind his hood, warning him without words to stop struggling. He cries out in shock and pain, but we've got him now, his arms and legs securely strapped to the chair.

Dominic? Ella's voice asks, quavering, through our bond. I heard something – what's going on? Is everything okay?

Stay upstairs, Ella, I command, sending her a feeling of reassurance as well to let her know that I'm okay, Roger's okay. We've got a priest. We're going to ask him a few questions. I'll tell you everything – just, stay upstairs. Where it's safe.

Ella sends me a little pulse of compliance, tinged with fear, and I turn my concentration back to the priest just as Roger whips the hood from the priest's head, revealing the face of my enemy.

Chapter 330 – Protecting my Own

Sinclair

I growl down at the man before me, who is younger than I thought he would be, for one with such power. He has thick black hair and a day's worth of stubble on his thin cheeks. The man glares up at me with dark, angry eyes and opens his mouth to speak but before he can, I slap him – hard with an open palm.

–

The man gasps with surprise and pain, his eyes going wide as he stares down at the floor, and I smirk. I doubt this man has been slapped anytime recently, if ever. He has the smug look of someone used to being in charge.

But he's in my house now.

"You'll speak when we tell you to speak," I growl, and then I turn to the head of my reconnaissance team, who is standing against the wall, his hands on his knees, panting a little. Craig isn't a small man to see him so undone by the efforts suggests that this diminutive priest is, indeed, powerful in other ways.

"How did you catch him?" I snap. Craig looks up at me and does his best to straighten up.

"We followed the leads, sir," he replies, looking me in the eyes, "that we gleaned from the conversation with the other priest, who wished to remain anonymous. They were... fruitful. We found this one's lair, for lack of a better word. It was actually in a sewer -in an abandoned maintenance room. He was living there doing..." Craig hesitates and then shrugs. "Forgive me, Sir, for the dramatic language, but 'arcane magics' are the only words coming to my mind now. Lizard skins...and and snail shells, in jars – he had a cauldron –"

"Thank you," I say, interrupting and nodding towards the head of my investigative team. "You will give your details to Alastair, as soon as you can. For now, though I want everyone here for the interrogation." I lean forward towards the priest, who watches me with wary eyes and a clenched jaw.

"An interrogation," I continue, lowering my voice and slowing my words, "will be long, and bloody, if need be."

The priest proves himself a brave man, then, by baring his teeth at me in a little snarl. But I just laugh at him, which makes him falter. And then I step away, secretly grateful for it, because each of my muscles are tensed, ready to rip this man's head off. Roger steps in to take my place.

“Tell us,” Roger commands, his arms crossed as he looks down at the man strapped to the chair,” who you are. And what your people want with my brother’s child.”

The man just grins at Roger, a too-wide expression that shows all of his teeth. “No,” he growls, a little laughter in his voice now. Roger stares at him blandly for a moment and then shifts his eyes to a member of the reconnaissance team standing behind the priest who whips forward a taser and places it swiftly against the priest’s neck.

The bolt flies through the priest’s body, making him shriek and twist in pain, but my man, well trained, pulls it away quickly. The priest goes a little slack in his chair, panting.

“Let’s try again,” Roger says, kicking the leg of the chair to get the priest’s attention. “What do your people want with my nephew.”

My eyes narrow, though, as the priest looks up at Roger again and just huffs a short, humorless laugh. “It doesn’t matter,” the priest says, shaking his head and holding his gaze. “Because,” he pants, a smile growing on his face. “You are already...too late.”

And then he starts to laugh – really, truly laugh, as a crash of glass sounds and a scream erupts upstairs –

And my heart stops as I recognize it, instantly, as Ella.

Ella

I was just sitting here, tense, in my rocking chair by Rafe’s basinet, one hand on the edge of it – as it always is – shushing him quietly as he falls asleep when –

–

I heard a little tapping sound at the glass of his window –

I looked towards it curiously, expecting a little bird – maybe a squirrel –

But terror flooded me when I saw a black-masked face calmly tapping on my window, grinning at me. I gasped, my body turning to ice as I froze, as he quietly pointed to the basinet and mouthed “I’m coming for him.” (2)

–

And then it seemed to go so fast – the man pulled back his arm, and made a fist, and crashed it through the window –

I don't know how he did it – it should have broken his hand – Sinclair paid to have those forced his body, head-first, into the room through the hole he made with his fist, the rest of the glass of the window cracking and shattering around him.

–

But the moment he hit the floor, only half an instant later, my instincts came back to me, and I pulled my child's rolling basinet behind me and screamed –

I shove the rocking chair away and back into the corner now, Rafe in his cradle behind me, as the man gets to his feet at the foot of the window. As he stands, my heart jumps when I see that there are more more men behind him, working their way up to the window and through it

–

moving unnaturally fast –

The man in the lead is on his feet now, grinning at me, starting to prowl towards me –

And all of my wolf instincts kick in, all of them, at once. And suddenly I'm snarling at them, the nails on my fingers elongating to claws, my teeth sharpening in my mouth. It's not a full transformation – not yet – but it's enough, now, to make it clear to the men who gain on me –

That they will not take my child –

Not ever.

Not even over my dead body. I will never let them take him.

"Here, kitty kitty," the man says, menacing, only a foot from me now. "Hand over your little kitten, like a good girl –"

–

I roar and swipe at his face, stepping only one foot forward so that I'm still protecting Rafe with my body but enough that I catch his cheek even though he flinches back. My claws open three long, deep cuts across his face that I can see through the mask, marks that stretch from his ear downward, across his nose and his mouth.

The man flinches back in pain and then, at least eight men behind him now, glares at me again. "You'll pay for that, bitch," he snarls.

But I just open my mouth and roar at him, at all of them, fury in every line of my body, ready to shred them with my bare hands – every single one –

My message couldn't be clearer.

Come at me.

But the man in the lead just laughs, and then they do.

I'm overwhelmed almost at once, pressing my back to Rafe's basinet and swiping with my claws, tearing at whatever flesh is closest to me, my mouth open in a constant roar. But there's too many of them for me – I'm pulled away from the basinet and feel something cut harshly against my back.

I scream again – in pain this time and turn to see – I gasp the basinet –

–

– one of those men, reaching into "RAFE!" I scream, reaching for him.

–

But something grabs me, hauling me away, as one of the black-masked men lifts my child into his arms and turns to smile at me.

Chapter 331 – Red in Tooth and Claw

Ella

“NO!” I scream, but the word is transferred instantly to a roar as I transition into my wolf, my but I barely bones and body shifting in a flash. It hurts – less than it did the first time, of course – notice it because I shake myself out of my captor’s hands and am halfway across the room at once, leaping for the man who holds Rafe, my jaws gaping. He goes a little pale, taking a step backwards and putting out a hand towards me to stop me –

But that hand, it disappears into my mouth. And I snap my teeth down. The man’s scream pierces my sensitive ears as my teeth meet together around his wrist, as I wrench my head to the side, tossing his torn hand aside, savoring the taste of his blood in my mouth. He screams again as he looks at the bloody stump I’ve left behind, as I prowl another step forward –

But suddenly, I feel a great blow against my shoulder that sends me staggering sideways. And then, almost at the same instant, I hear what sounds like an explosion behind me – I don’t turn to it, my eyes fixed on the man who holds my son in his arms – but I know, through the bond, through some other wolf instinct, that it is Sinclair.

I don’t take my eyes off the man who holds Rafe, instead finding my feet and beginning to prowl slowly forward towards him again. He backs up, step by step, looking over my shoulders at his colleagues as they die. I can see the progress of the battle in his expression, in the fear that comes into his eyes, in the blood that drains from his face as he realizes that he’s not getting out of this.

room. That he’s going to die here, but not until he watches all of his friends die first.

I hear the ripping sounds my mate makes in his gigantic wolf form, the screams of the masked men as he takes them down, his snarls and his roars, the rending sound of flesh. And each blow rings through me like a song as I bare my teeth at the man holding my child, as I stare him down.

It doesn’t take long for Sinclair to finish. I didn’t think it would.

—

It seems only moments later though surely it was minutes – before I feel a warm human hand on my scruff, gentle fingers digging deep into my fur until they reach my skin. I’m not scared. I know who it is. The only other man left alive in this room is my mate, and only he would I let touch me like that.

“It’s all right, Ella,” Sinclair says, a growl still resonating in his voice, the fury still pulsing time to look up at him, at my mate, covered in our enemies’ blood. Something soars in me at the sight of him like that – my warrior mate with his barbarian soul.

Our

eyes meet for just a moment, and then he sees the determination in me and nods once.

Then, Sinclair turns back to the man holding my crying child. “Give him to me,” he demands, just once. The man does so, immediately, blood dripping from his trembling arm, knowing that his cause is lost – perhaps looking for some clemency if he obliges us now.

Sinclair takes Rafe safely in his gigantic arms and turns away from the man, from me, walking away from us, shushing our child and bobbing him lightly in his arms.

And then, it’s just me, and this man, and my murderous rage. I prowl another step forward. The man raises his hands towards me, palms out. “Please,” he whispers.

But it’s a waste of breath. I coil my limbs and leap for him, my paws hitting him in the chest first and slamming him back into the wall moments before I sink my teeth into his neck, ripping out his throat.

The man falls gurgling to the floor with me on top of him, growling down into his face as the life leaves his eyes.

And then, when it’s done, I turn back to my mate, who stands in the middle of a room covered in bodies and gore, his mouth curved up on one side into a proud smile.

I shift, then, back into my human body, standing up, the man’s blood still covering the bottom half of my face and running down my neck. And then, with perfect control, I cross the room and let my mate wrap me in his arms as I stare down at my child, who cries his little scared heart out.

And I relish every scream that echoes in my ears.

Because if I can hear him, it means that he’s still here, he’s still mine.

And I’ve done my job. I’ve kept him safe.

Sinclair

I turn, a little, taking Ella and Rafe with me as Roger bursts into the room, followed by a few to command them to stay with the priest – to make sure that we kept him, as I delt with whatever was happening up here.

Then, once the priest was secure, they were to come and help.

“Oh my god,” Roger says, his eyes going wide as he looks at the blood all over our bedroom – on all the bedding, all the walls, even the ceiling – and at the bodies scattered almost creatively on every surface. “What the – how did you –”

“They came for Rafe,” Ella explains, and I look down at her, a little surprised at the cool calm with which she replies to my brother. This is the woman who cried when she saw Rafe’s first teddy bear who once told me that she won’t eat chocolate Easter bunnies because it feels too cruel to bite their ears off. But there is a level of ferocity in my little rose–gold mate that I think many – including my brother – forget about her.

I smirk down at her, pleased and proud. She has certainly reminded everyone of that today. “We killed them,” Ella says, her arms wrapped around my waist, giving a cool little shrug.

“You....sure did,” Roger says, still looking around with wide eyes. But then, his surprise fading, Roger looks back at me with a grave expression. “Sinclair...” he hesitates.

–

“What?” I ask, my body tensing. I feel Ella go tense beside me as well as she gives half her attention to Roger, the other half to Rafe, who she takes from my arms, resting her back against me and allowing me to wrap my arms around both of them.

“The priest...” he says, shaking his head.

“He escaped?” I growl, suddenly filled with rage. “No,” Roger says, his eyes going wide again. “Well, I mean – yes – but Sinclair, he disappeared. Just vanished.”

–

“Fuck,” I snarl, whipping my head to the side and staring into space for a moment, trying to decide our next move. Somehow, all of this was tied either the priest allowed himself to be taken here to coincide with the attempt to kidnap on our child to distract us, or the kidnapping attempt was the distraction – a sacrifice so that the priest could go free –

–

Or, something else entirely –

–

But damn it, we just didn't have enough information. And as was made clear today, the cult is beginning to make its moves. And we are simply not ready for them.

Chapter 332 – Bunker

Ella

“We have to go,” Sinclair commands, looking at his brother and then at me, both of our eyes trained on him. “To one of the bunkers. Where we’re better prepared for a siege, if need be.”

I don’t know what he means – not entirely – but I just give my mate a single nod, agreeing to his plan, trusting him. Roger nods as well, and I’m sure he knows more about it than I do. Sinclair shifts his gaze to the team standing wide-eyed behind Roger and nods to them. Understanding Sinclair’s command to prepare to move, they turn away, instantly in action.

Roger, however, stays perfectly still. “Cora,” he says, looking into Sinclair’s eyes, his intention perfectly clear. He won’t go without her.

“We’ll find her,” I answer, my voice assured. “She’s coming, Roger. I won’t have it any other way.”

Roger looks between us for a moment, his mouth tightening, and then nods once before turning to leave the room to make his own preparations.

“Ten minutes!” Sinclair calls after him. “Less, if we can!” I see the back of Roger’s head nod in understanding, though he doesn’t turn to say anything else.

Then, my mate turns his attention to me, loosening his arms around me and the baby and coming around to look down into my face. “You’re a mess, little mate,” he murmurs, smiling a little.”

Though I have to admit that I rather like the sight of you covered in the blood of your enemies, “Thanks,” I say, tossing my hair over my shoulder and pretending a casual air I don’t feel. “I hear it’s the next big thing in fashion. Very chic.”

He laughs a little at my joke and shakes his head at me, but still looks down at me. “Are you all right, darling?” he asks, and something about his voice – the worry in it, the need for me to be okay, loosens the resolve in me. I feel my face fall then, my knees go a little weak –

Because, really, I can be weak now with him here. My baby needed me before – I don’t regret a moment of it – but I have Sinclair at my side now to keep me safe and I’m free to be vulnerable again.

“I’m not okay,” I say honestly, shaking my head, my voice trembling a little. Sinclair looks steadily into my eyes, listening. “But I will be.”

“You will,” he promises, drawing me close and placing a single kiss on my hair: “But we have to move

“Yes,” I say, zipping myself back up a little and squaring my shoulders as I look my mate up and down. “Um – all this blood –”

“There are showers at the bunker,” he says, shaking his head a little bit and looking around the room. “Maybe – baby wipes? To get the worst of it from our faces and hands? But the rest of the time – we need to pack the essentials and get downstairs.”

I laugh a little, heading to Rafe’s changing station with Sinclair in tow, tugging a few baby wipes from the little container and handing them to my mate before grabbing some to wipe my own face. “To think, when I bought these,” I murmur, “this is not the task for which they were intended”

–

Sinclair’s laugh rumbles a little but we both move on quickly, heading together to the closet to pack two small bags with the essentials – a bit of our clothing, and Rafe’s, and then a diaper bag with as many diapers and changing essentials as we can fit. Neither of us put Rafe down for a moment, just passing him between our arms when the other needs both hands. It is an instinct, I think, to keep him close.

As much as we came out of this horrible day largely unscathed, we are both, I know, shaken.

We’re done packing in only a few minutes and head for the bedroom door – which I suddenly realize is shattered off its hinges.

“Do we need anything else?” Sinclair asks, passing through and not even looking at the splintered remains of our entry.

“Probably,” I shrug, following close behind him. “But we can improvise, yes?”

He nods and turns, taking my hand as we hurry down the stairs, not wanting to leave my side for a second.

Roger’s waiting for us at the doorway with a backpack over his shoulder, a group of soldiers next to him carrying boxes of whatever they could quickly gather from the investigation.

“My phone,” I murmur, tugging Sinclair into the living room quickly, where I grab it off the table.

Then, all finished, the group of us move out of the house. Sinclair, the baby, and I move towards one car while Roger moves towards another. There are second cars behind each of these two, which the teams fill. I don't ask about the plan, trusting that Sinclair and Roger already have plans in place for this kind of event.

It has been perhaps...seven minutes, since we executed nine men upstairs in our room? Seven minutes since my entire world exploded. And I'm so grateful that I have a mate who, seven minutes later, is already in action to make us safe again.

Because, I think as I pull the SUV's door shut behind me and turn to buckle Rafe into the little car seat squeezed into the middle seat between me and Sinclair, it hasn't been real, not until now.

Until now, it has just been a strange note and a wild goose chase, trying to find information about who might be coming after our child.

But today? Today it was very real.

The car begins to move as soon as I click Rafe's tiny buckle over his belly, and then I fasten my own seatbelt and reach my hand instinctually for Sinclair's, which is waiting for mine over top of Rafe's carrier. I look forward, not at him, a little lost in my thoughts.

I thank the goddess, honestly, for whoever sent me that note on the morning after Rafe's christening. Because without it....

Tonight may have been a surprise.

And we may have lost him. I press my eyes shut against the horrible thought, loosing a shaky breath. I feel Sinclair's hand tighten on my own, supporting me, and a small smile tugs at my lips.

Because I am safe. And so is my mate, and my baby. And with that in mind, I can now work on the next step, which is making sure everyone else I love is safe too.

"Your dad?" I say to Sinclair, turning to look at him finally...

"Roger's already on it," he says, looking down at his phone. "It's part of the emergency plan — it's been in place for a long time, and adapted since the moment we found out you were pregnant. I get you to the bunker, Roger goes for dad."

"And..." I say, hesitating. "Who gets Cora?" "We send a car for her," Sinclair replies, looking me in the eye. "As soon as you find out where she is."

I nod and then scowl down at my phone as I pull up my contact information, sure that Roger is going absolutely insane right now at his assignment to fetch his father when I'm sure that all he's howling to do is chase Cora down immediately and ensure that she's safe.

God damn it, I think, my little wolf inside me prowling around in frustration, of all days for her to be shady evasive Cora...

I scowl as I press the "call" button and wait for her to pick up. When she doesn't, I call again. And again.

Chapter 333 – Underground

Cora picks up the third call and I narrow my eyes at her even though she can't see me. I can tell she was screening my calls and only picked up because I'd never, ever triple-call her unless something had happened.

"Ella?" I hear her worried voice say, "what's wrong?"

"Where are you, Cora," I demand, letting my tone tell her not to fight me.

"What -"

"Where. Are. You." "I'm I'm at the clinic -" she says. "What's happening?"

"We're sending a car for you at the clinic, now," I say, glancing at Sinclair, who nods to me to let me know he's on it. "Get in it immediately, Cora. Don't speak to anyone else. Don't ask any questions."

"Ella," she hesitates, her voice wavering. "I can't-

"This is not a request, Cora," I growl. "They came for him. They tried to take Rafe. We are sending, a car for you, and you are getting in it."

I hear a sharp intake of breath from her side of the line, and then a moment of hesitation, and then she agrees. "All right," she says, and I can almost see her nodding anxiously. "Okay. I'll do it."

I exhale a deep breath of relief and nod. "Okay. I love you, Cora," I say, my voice wavering a little.

—

"I love you too," she replies, with I don't know what regret? In her voice? But before I can ask more, she hangs up.

"The car is five minutes from her," Sinclair murmurs, squeezing my hand again. "We'll get her. It will be fine."

"Okay," I say, closing my eyes and resting my head back against the leather of my seat. And then no one says another word for the rest of the hour-long ride away from the city and deep, deep into the forest.

I'm a little surprised when the car slows down and Sinclair sits up in his seat, looking around in a satisfied way that lets me know that we've arrived because really, it doesn't look like we're anywhere.

“Good,” he says as the car comes to the end of what is basically a dirt trail honestly, the past five minutes have been a very uncomfortable ride and Rafe let us all know that he was not happy.

“Made it...where?” I ask, looking around at the trees on every side.

“Here,” he says, and nods to the driver, who presses a button on the ceiling of the car, one of the buttons usually reserved for a garage door opener. And then my mouth drops open as, in front of us, the earth just...opens, sliding upwards like the jaws of some great creature and revealing beneath it a metal tunnel filled with orange light.

“Oh my god,” I murmur, my eyes going wide as I stare into it. “That is so creepy.”

“It’s cool,” Sinclair corrects, shooting me a little smirk. “I mean, it’s impressive,” I continue as we drive into the entrance and start to drive down a steep incline into the earth. “But if you’re claustrophobic it is...nonpreferred.”

“Says my little mate,” Sinclair murmurs, turning to the window to hide his smirk, “who ripped someone’s throat out not two hours ago.”

“Yes,” I sigh, shaking my head and putting a hand on Rafe, who stops screeching and looks around in wonder at the sudden change of color, “so imagine what I would have done if he was trying to entomb me.”

Sinclair laughs but otherwise we don’t say anything else as the car drives a long way down the tunnel before the passage opens out into a wide space, like a large underground car park. There are a few more cars already down here, but the light layer of dust on them suggests that they haven’t been moved in a while.

I let out another inhale of breath, feeling suddenly quite safe, if just for the moment. I hadn’t realized that I was waiting for that but, perhaps a little bit of me was expecting another blindside on the ride. It is good, honestly, to be here, underground, where I hope no one can find us.

The driver pulls us into the next free space and Sinclair and I quickly unbuckle our seatbelts and prepare to get out of the car. The other car pulls up next to us and I see Sinclair’s men likewise on the move.

“Is it all underground?” I ask, looking around. “Most of it,” Sinclair replies, “for safety. Though there are some living quarters that peek out into the forest, if we deem it safe to use them.”

I nod, understanding, and I lift Rafe’s carrier with me as I back out of the car and shut the door Then, I follow my mate and our two guards through the entry that leads to the bunker itself I grimace when I see that the entire structure is very military As we walk through the hallway I peer into some rooms we pass and note that the walls, floor, and ceiling of all of them and the hallway itself are made with shining metal What sparse furniture there is in the rooms is likewise rough and utilitarian I sigh a little, wishing for my comfortable little home But then I remind myself that my bedroom is currently covered in corpses and blood. So. This looks pretty good for now.

Sinclair stops at a door almost at the end of the long hallway and pushes it open. I peer in, seeing a basic little living chamber that, luckily, has a queen-sized bed. I move inside it as Sinclair says a few words to the men who follow us, giving them orders for how to settle in while we wait for Roger, Henry, and Cora. Then, he follows me into the room.

"Is this all right?" he asks, looking around at the very basic accommodations. "It's perfect," I breathe, setting Rafe's carrier down on the bed next to me and smiling at him as I begin to unbuckle the baby. "It will do just fine. Do you have....a plan? For what to do next?"

"The start of one," Sinclair sighs, running a hand over his hair and staring at the door. "You can go," I say, raising my eyebrows at Sinclair and holding the baby straight up against my chest letting him look around the room over my left shoulder. "I know you have work to do I'll be okay."

"I don't want to leave you, Ella," Sinclair growls, turning his eyes back to me so that I can see that they're lit with a fury fueled by anger, and fear, and the knowledge that he came so close to losing us both today.

"It's okay," I whisper, holding that gaze, letting him know I don't fear it. "It's safe – you know it is. Go do your work. And when Cora comes, she'll sit with me. All right?"

He hesitates, so I continue. "You have to do work to keep us safe, Dominic," I point out. "You can do more to help us if you're strategizing with your men than sitting with me in this metal room."

"Fine," Sinclair growls, hating it but nodding. Then, he points to an intercom on the wall. "White button," he says, "speaks everywhere. You need anything, you call. Yes?"

I nod and smile at him, letting him know that I understand. He gives me one last longing look and then leaves, shutting the metal door behind him with a clank.

"Well," I say to Rafe, holding him back so I can look at his cute little face. "It's just me and you now, kiddo" He gurgles and looks at me, giving me a little smile that makes me laugh. I just shake my head at him a little before returning him to his place on my shoulder.

“And they call me trouble,” I murmur, closing my eyes and holding my little boy close “Nobody’s come to kidnap me in awhile now Trouble Jr is right.”

Chapter 334 – Sister to Sister

Sinclair

I know the moment that Roger arrives at the bunker because he's loud as hell, making sure that we all hear him pounding through the metal hallways. I wince a little, groaning and reminding myself that though metal is secure, it is loud.

Roger's angry footsteps pound down the hallway towards me, towards the conference room at the end of the hall where I'm strategizing with the members of my team who have arrived. Roger knows we'll be right here and he slams the door open as he strides into the room.

"Where is she" he snarls, looking around, as if he imagines that Cora will be sitting at the desk sorting through the paperwork with the investigative team.

"Oh hey, Roger," I say casually, standing back and crossing my arms. "How are you?" I know that I shouldn't piss my brother off any further – I know he's on the edge as it is – but I'm unable to resist the chance to needle him a little bit. He's being a dick right now anyway. He deserves it.

"Cut the shit, Dominic," Roger snaps, his chest heaving a little bit as he stares at me, his fingers curved like talons at his side. "Where is she."

"Ellas in our room with the baby-

"Cora," Roger shouts, his voice ringing through the room and making the rest of us wince. "Where is Cora!?"

"Damn it, Roger," I say, lifting a hand to cover my ear as his words echo through the room. "Can you cool it? She's on her way."

"Where," he growls, advancing towards me across the room, "where precisely is -"

But as he gets within a foot of me I swiftly raise my hand and smack him in the back of the head like I used to do when we were kids, making him stumble a few steps forward and gasp in outrage

"Would you chill out?" I snarl at Roger, starting to get frustrated with him. "She's fine, she's safe, she can't get here any faster just because you're freaking out about it."

Roger spins to glare at me after he finds his feet again and opens his mouth to retort when our father interrupts

"Boys," dad says, his voice low with the warning we've both been familiar with since we were old enough to be scolded We both react to it instinctually, straightening up and turning towards him like we've just been caught "Enough of that," he continues, rolling into the room and looking at us sternly

"Sorry, dad," we both murmur, and then we look to each other again.

"I'm sorry, Roger," I say brusksly, meaning it but eager to move on. "But she's seriously getting here as fast as we can the plan is working. So, can we just concentrate on other things? You standing by the door panting for her like a golden retriever who's been left home alone all day isn't going to help anything."

Roger glares at me but nods once, agreeing to my logic and – I think – wanting something to distract him.

"Good boys," my father says, rolling up to the head of the table. Then he focuses on me. "Roger updated me," he says. "I'm so sorry to hear what happened to your family today. And so grateful that you came through it unscathed."

I nod to him. "I am as well. But now we need to get to work. Are you ready?"

Both of them nod back to me and, together, we focus on our team, coming up with a plan to better defend against this cult that wants my child and to formulate a counter attack. Because now, after what they did today? This is war.

Ella

—

I look up when my door creaks open, expecting Sinclair and hoping a little that he's brought me some food, but my eyes go wide when I see Cora peeking through..

"Cora!" I gasp, jumping to my feet and almost leaping across the room to her, Rafe still perched, against my chest looking over my shoulder. Cora slides through the small opening in the door and presses it shut behind her as I reach her.

"Oh my god," I say as I wrap my grateful arms around her, "I'm so glad you're safe. Are you all right?"

Then I pull back a little bit to get a good look at her, to assess her condition. Her body looks fine. health-wise, but her face...

"What's wrong?" I ask, suddenly knowing that something is truly, deeply wrong as if I didn't know it already, from her absence the past five days, her unwillingness to return Roger's calls.

“What’s wrong with me,” Cora gasps, bringing her hand to her face as she studies me. “Ella – you’re covered in blood!”

I look down at myself and blink a little “Oh,” I say Honestly, I’d forgotten Then I look back up at her. “Well, none of it’s mine,” I insist and change the subject. “But seriously, Cora, what’s wrong? Don’t say nothing. I can tell ”

“Nothing,” Cora lies, taking my face in her hands “You were the one attacked today – seriously, me frown. But her words and her face are sincere with worry so I nod, taking a minute to reassure her before I get to my own questions.

Quickly, I pull Cora to the bed to sit down with me and fill her in on the events of the afternoon. I watch her eyes go wide and her face go pale as I continue, telling her all about the priest that they captured, and the men who invaded my bedroom, and how they pulled me away from my baby and grabbed him. And then about Sinclair’s intervention, and my own participation in the gory scene.

“And then we decided to come here,” I finish with a little shrug. “Almost instantly. Apparently they already had some kind of crazy apocalypse plan, we just had to put it in motion. You were the only wildcard that we had to improvise about, though, and send a car to find you.”

Cora nods, understanding, and glancing away from me now that the conversation has turned back to her.

“Cora,” I say, taking a moment to lower Rafe back into his little carrier and leaning forward to take her hand. “What has been going on with you?”

She still won’t look at me, though I can see her shoulders start to shake with repressed tears.

“Oh, baby,” I murmur, moving closer to her and wrapping my arms around her. “What’s wrong? How bad can it be?”

“It’s really bad, Ella,” she whispers, her voice shaking with her emotions. I hold her tight and feel a few tears spill out onto my arm. I shush to my sister, making soothing sounds and rocking her a little bit.

“I’m here,” I promise softly, meaning every word of it. “Whatever’s wrong – whatever happened I’m here for you Cora.”

A few minutes pass as Cora cries a little bit, but she lets me hold her. Then, when she’s ready. she pulls away from me. Just a little bit.

"I know you're here for me, Ella," she says, sniffing and wiping at her face. "But he – he'll never forgive me..."

"Who?" I ask, baffled. She can't mean Roger – he'll forgive her anything – what could she have possibly done that her mate wouldn't forgive her for –

But when she raises her eyes to me, I know suddenly that's precisely who she means. "No, Ella," Cora murmurs, shaking her head slowly at me. "Not for this Not This"

"What," I breathe, my stomach turning with anxiety as I stare at my sister, desperate to know Cora releases a shaking breath and then reaches into her back pocket, pulling out a folded piece. of paper that she hands to me. I take it with trembling hands and unfold it, staring at it. But then I "I'm pregnant, Ella," Cora whispers.

My mouth falls open and I stare at my sister, incredulous. She gives me a moment to put the pieces together and then I'm like a gaping fish, opening and closing my mouth, trying to force the words out.

–

"How "I gasp, still staring at her. "But if you – and Roger can't -"

And then slowly she shakes her head. "No, Ella," she says, her lower lip starting to tremble with her grief. I snap my mouth shut and stare at her, realizing that if Roger can't...

"Hank," she sighs, her voice quavering. "Hank is the father of my child."

Chapter 335 – Cora, How Could You?

Ella

My hands fly to my mouth, covering it in an attempt to hide my shock, but it's not enough Cora can see my every emotion in my eyes and my body, which has gone still with shock. And as she takes me in, seeing that my own thoughts are trending towards her worst fears –

That Roger is, indeed, not going to have an easy time with this that it could very well spell the end of their very new relationship, especially as he has not yet given her his mark – She bursts into tears, burying her face in her hands.

“Oh no!” I breathe, dropping my hands from my face and throwing my arms around her again. “I’m so sorry, Cora! I didn’t mean it! It’s not that bad!”

“Yes it is!” she sobs. “He’s the only thing I want – I know that now – and he’s never going to be able to accept this-”

“Sure he is!” I assure her, hoping to hell that I’m right, but then I frown towards the door as if Roger is standing right on the other side of it. And I narrow my eyes, wondering if there’s somehow I can force him to go easy on her maybe even to accept the baby as his own –

But inwardly, my wolf turns around with anxiety. Not his baby, not for Roger, she says to me, pacing back and forth, he can’t feel that way about another man’s baby – his wolf will never accept it –

And I scowl, knowing that my wolf is right somehow. She knows Roger well and has intuited that Roger is the kind of wolf who would feel his paternity on a very visceral level, who would need the blood link in order to feel connected to the child.

I know that it’s different with me that adoption would be a very real possibility for me in the future, especially as I was myself an orphan. I understand it and could welcome a child not of my blood as my own. But Roger...

Passingly, I wonder where Sinclair falls along this line – I know that he treasures his biological connection to Rafe but would he – Quickly, I dismiss the thought, turning my attention back to my poor sister, knowing that she needs my full attention right now. Slowly, I pull away from her and rub her back as she sobs. Then, as her cries start to lessen, I move my fingers to Cora’s wrists and pull her hands away from her face, making her look at me.

“Cora,” I whisper, shaking my head back and forth. “No matter what happens, you know I support you. I've got your back. Yes?"

Trembling a little, clearly still devastated, Cora nods. But I hold her gaze, communicating as clearly to her as I can that we are going to find a way through this. To make this right. And I decide, suddenly, that I've got to get her talking – have to get her out of her grief spiral and onto a plan. It would be best if I could get her a bit angry, determined – but, well, we'll see where it goes.

"Cora," I say again, taking her face in my hands. "How did this happen?" And she begins to tell me everything, about how Roger stopped calling her after we came back home – and god, I could kill him for that – and then all about the night she spent with Hank after the baptism, about how good Hank has been to her, and kind, and patient, and how she decided that even though she felt so intensely about Roger

"You thought he was never going to love you," I murmur, and then I drop my head, cursing myself. Because I was the one who kept hammering that idea in her head – that they should be apart if they couldn't agree on children. I'm the one who drove her into Hank's arms, resulting in...this.

"Shit, Cora," I murmur. "This is all my fault."

"No, Ella!" Cora disagrees, putting her arms on my shoulders. "It's not. You were just trying to be there for me. And," she laughs now, low and ironic. "And seriously, if it's anyone's fault, it's mine. What was I thinking, not using contraception? I'm a fertility doctor, for heaven's sake. If anyone knows the risks, it's me."

I whip my head up at that. "Seriously, Cora," I say, my eyes wide. "What were you thinking?" And then we both just stare at each other, and, quite suddenly, burst out laughing. And it carries on, and on- and even though nothing about this is funny, not really, we can't seem to hold ourselves together. As soon as one of us starts to stop, we catch each other's eyes again and the peels of laughter start all over desperate, humorless laughter, as if we're clutching to the edges of our sanity.

"Oh my god," Cora says, bent over, clutching her cramping stomach and wiping a tear from her eye. "It's so not funny, Ella..." she murmurs.

"I know," I reply, my giggles still peeling from me. "I feel so horrible. It's just so ridiculous, Cora – just the incredibly bad luck of it -"

And then, slowly, we come back to each other. And honestly, like rain, the laughter brought a little peace. I can see it in her face now, that she believes me, that she knows that whatever happens she still has her sister on her side. And even at the worst, we'll still find something to laugh at.

“God, Cora,” I murmur, shaking my head at her and taking her hand and giving her a sad little smile. “What are you going to do?”

“I don’t know, Ella,” she sighs, holding my gaze steadily, her eyes a little lost. “Are you going to...keep it?” I ask, and I watch as her hand drifts to her stomach.

“I don’t know,” she repeats, shrugging and looking away from me now. “Honestly, I never thought much about being a mom. It was never on the table. And since Roger and I got together...it was even more of a non- issue.”

“Okay,” I say, not wanting to push her on it. “Have you told Hank?”

Slowly, looking at the floor, she shakes her head. “I can’t be with him, Ella. We we broke up. I did it, the day I went back to the clinic, after spending all that time at your house with Roger.” She looks up at me then, her expression grieved anew. “It was horrible. You know how stoic Hank is he was so upset, but he was trying to hold it together.... I mean, I don’t know how I go back to him now and tell him I’m having his kid.”

“I get it,” I say, squeezing her hand. We’re silent for a moment before I breach the topic I know that she really doesn’t want to address. But I know that it’s time. “Cora,” I start, hesitating, “Roger has been... completely flipping out since you’ve been gone.”

“I know,” she groans, putting her face in her hand. “He has been blowing up my phone. But once I found out I was pregnant – honestly, I just took a test on a whim because I didn’t get my period after one day – I just...I couldn’t I squeeze her hand.

Honestly, it wouldn’t have been my choice – I would have run to Sinclair, needing his comfort, wanting his help, even if I’d done something that I knew was going to feel like a knife in his chest. After all, Cora didn’t mean for this to happen – and it happened before she and Roger were together. So it’s not a betrayal...

But still. I try to imagine Sinclair’s face if I had to tell him I was pregnant with someone else’s child, even if it was a mistake...

And the pain I feel, just imagining it...I reach out and put a hand on Cora’s shoulder, understanding anew. Rafe lets out a little chirping cry as I stare at my sister – he’s not unhappy, just suddenly aware –

And the door to the room opens. Cora and I both spin to look at it, our eyes wide –

Shit, shit I think as I look to see –

But I let out my breath when I see that it’s just Sinclair, carrying a tray of food for me. He smiles when he sees Cora, crossing the room to greet her, but after he takes a few steps he stops as if he hits a wall.

Sinclair's face falls, his eyes going wide, as he focuses on her, staring at her, his gaze flicking fast over her form. And suddenly, I realize that he knows that he can smell her –

“Oh my god,” he says, his voice shaking. “The door!” I shout, knowing that if Sinclair is here, Roger isn't far behind –

Sinclair goes pale, spinning to slam the door shut – and he almost gets there, almost gets it closed – But Roger shoves his shoulder against it before the door can click.

“Hey!” he shouts, cheerful, not yet realizing that Cora is here, clearly thinking that Sinclair is just playing some kind of game and pretending to keep him out.

Tense, staring at the door, Cora grabs my hand. Sinclair works frantically to shut the door, but Roger realizes something is wrong and growls, slamming his entire weight against the door so that Sinclair stumbles back into the room.

Roger storms in, worried, intuiting that we're keeping something from him, but his face brightens immediately when he sees Cora on the bed next to me.

“Cora!” he cries, relief and delight chasing each other across his expression as he takes three steps into the room.

And then her scent hits him. And he falls immediately into a crouch, his face confused and worried and defensive – “Roger!” Sinclair snaps. “Calm down! Stop!”

But Roger ignores him, slowly prowling towards Cora, who jumps to her feet next to me, going pale. I stand too, placing myself between them, but Roger continues to slink towards us.

“How...” he growls, his eyes sweeping over her and I realize suddenly that – he's not... he's not mad...

He's terrified.

“How?” he asks again. “How Cora? How did you get my pup?”

Chapter 336 – Explode

Ella

I gasp, my hands again flying to my mouth –

His pup his –“Oh my god,” I murmur, my eyes flashing to Cora’s shocked face But before I can do anything, say anything else, Roger leaps forward, grabbing Cora hard by the arms. She screams, terrified, and I can see the very real shock and fear on her face as Roger shakes her once, hard.

“How, Cora!” he yells, his eyes wide- so wide I can see the whites all around them – I gasp, realizing that Roger is completely flipping out – realizing that he’s he’s turning.

Sinclair sees it the moment I do and bellows, crossing the room in two steps and grabbing Roger around the waist, tackling him to the floor as Roger’s body changes swiftly, flashing into his wolf form in the blink of an eye. I move to reach for Cora, wanting her by my side, but Sinclair and Roger are between us.

I move, fast, grabbing Rafe’s carrier and dashing along the wall to the back of the room, watching Cora stumble backwards towards it as well. Rafe starts to wail with the shock and the noise of it all, but we reach the back wall at the same time as Cora.

Snarls rip through the air as I take Cora’s hand. As I snap my attention back to our mates I see that they’re both in their wolf forms, snapping at each other, wrestling on the ground, each seeking dominance –

“Oh my god,” Cora murmurs, her hand shaking as she raises it to her mouth, unable to take her eyes away from her mate fighting mine.

“It’s okay,” I assure her, reaching out and taking her hand, hoping that I’m right, “He was just – he was just really freaked out Cora –”

She turns her eyes to me, scared, but I squeeze her hand, willing her to believe that it’s all right. I open my mouth to say something, but my words are drowned out by a mighty roar and we both spin our heads back to the wolves to see Sinclair standing over Roger, pinning him down beneath his paws, Sinclair’s mouth open and with all his razor teeth on display.

Next to me, I feel Cora tremble and realize that while she’s lived amongst wolves for a while now – and while I’ve had time to get used to this kind of ferocity as part of my life and my own identity

That, well, this is perhaps the first time she’s experiencing it for herself. And that, perhaps, it’s not the best moment for her to have this experience.

Even though he's crying, and even though it goes against everything in my mother's heart to put Rafe's carrier down and ignore him, I do just that. And then I wrap my arms around my sister and let her tuck her face against my shoulder, crying her heart out in fear, and grief, and shock, and surprise

And whatever else it is she's feeling.

As she does, I look over her head at Sinclair, who I see is stepping away from Roger now, some of the intensity going out of them. All right? I ask him, mind-to-mind.

Yes, he replies instantly, looking at me with his fierce wolf's eyes. He flipped out – it was a purely bodily reaction to the shock, stress, and surprise. Fight or flight, and his body unfortunately-picked fight. I needed to pin him down so he could take a second and realize that he's being an ass.

I nod, understanding, and I feel my mate smirk as he transforms back into his human body. And in a flash of light, he's there, that smirk right on his face where I knew it would be. Sinclair tucks his hands into his pockets and nudges Roger's wolf with his toe. "He's embarrassed, now," he says, his voice light. "He knows he's behaved badly, and he doesn't want to face you all."

I feel Cora lift her head from my shoulder, surprised as she watches Roger's wolf get to his feet hanging his head a little but looking directly at her. Slowly, she uncurls herself from me and stands on her own, looking into his face.

"Come on, Roger," I urge softly, kneeling down to attend to my own baby boy, lifting him up into my arms and bobbing him, hoping he settles. "It will be all right."

And then there's a flash of light, and he's standing there in front of us, devastated.

"Cora," Roger breathes, shaking his head, his face full of grief. "Cora, I'm so sorry "It's okay," she murmurs, her hands still shaking.

He crosses to her in a few steps and takes her face in his hands, staring down into her eyes. You're you're all right? God, Cora, if I hurt you I'd kill myself "

"I'm okay," she stumbles out, laughing a little and looking up at him, and as I stand with Rafe in my arms I can feel my heart in my throat to see the love she has for him written plain on her face. "I'm a a little shaken, Roger – you scared me –"

"I'm sorry," he whispers again, shaking his head, earnest apology written in every line of him. " I'm so sorry, Cora:"

And then he takes a step back, his hands sliding to Cora's shoulders as he looks down at her stomach, marveling.

"Is it..." she says, her hands going to her stomach as she likewise looks down at herself. "Is it really..."

"Yes," he breathes and they look up at each other again. "It is I can smell it, can sense the bloodline – Cora –"

And then laughter bubbles out of her shocked, relieved, delighted laughter And Roger stares at her face for a second, and then he's laughing too. And he grabs her again different this time, with no fear, no aggression – just sweeping her up in his arms and spinning her around in a circle as they marvel at themselves, at this impossible thing they made –

I tear my eyes away from them, just for a second, a huge smile on my face as I meet Sinclair's. eyes beyond them. I see the same expression on his face as he and I stare at each other.

–

Because whatever this is however it happened It's a miracle. And it's good. take a step towards Cora as Roger places her back on her feet, but Sinclair nudges me in my mind. Come on, trouble, he urges. Give them a minute.

But – I gasp, looking at him with pleading in my eyes. Sinclair just cocks his head at me and narrows his eyes. I scowl, realizing that he's right. I glance again at Cora and Roger and find them totally lost in each other, their faces hardly an inch apart as they whisper whatever it is they're whispering – how much they love each other, their future plans, speculations about what the hell is going on.

And I sigh, desperately wanting to be in on those conversations, but I pout and move to my mate's side instead, my still-crying baby in my arms.

"Give him to me," he says, and I do, settling Rafe into the baby-whisperer's arms and leaning my head on Sinclair's shoulder as we walk out of the room and shut the door behind us.

"Unfair," I sigh, looking over my shoulder at the closed door as we walk down the hall towards the conference room. "Cora got to be there when all the drama went down when I got pregnant. But now she's the human pregnant with a wolf baby and it is deeply unfair that I have to give her privacy."

"You're right," Sinclair says, not meaning it, but humoring me. I can tell by the smirk I still see on his face as I look up at him. "But hey," he says, grinning down at me. "At least, in recompense, they're giving Rafe a little cousin to play with."

And I gasp as I look down at Rafe in my mate's arms, a little chagrined to see how easily he quieted there but filled with excitement none the less.

"Hear that, baby?" I whisper to him. "A new cousin to play with!"

But Rafe doesn't really seem to care, frowning and turning his face away from me and towards his dad, clearly wanting to sleep.

"He doesn't get it," I say, smiling up at my mate. "He will," Sinclair says. "A new baby Sinclair. This one as much a miracle as the last."

"But no where near as cute," I whisper, grinning up at my mate. Sinclair doesn't commit to a side, but he gives me a wink, and I know that he, too, knows it's true. And so I kiss him, and the two of us settle in to wait until Cora and Roger are ready to come out and tell us everything.

Chapter 337 – Fatherhood

337

–

Fatherhood

Cora

I don't really notice when Ella leaves. I'm too busy crying.

I think I scare Roger again when I start, because it's just a few tears at first, but then suddenly I'm blubbering against his shoulder because it feels like every single emotion I've ever had – every single one – is racing through me at once.

–

"Cora," Roger whispers, concerned, pulling me to him. But when I don't stop he just holds me tight, shushing me and rubbing a hand up and down my back. Then, when I continue, he slowly walks backwards with me in his arms until his legs hit the bed, and then he sits down, pulling me into his lap, and lays back, taking me with him.

I start to calm down then

,

curled against Roger's body, breathing in the warm scent of him as he makes soft comforting noises and kisses my head and whispers to me that it's all right and that I'm lovely.

I'm embarrassed when I get myself together – seriously, the guy finds out that he's going to be a dad and all I do is cry about it for five solid minutes – but when I look up at him he gives me a gentle smile, like he doesn't mind at all.

"I'm so sorry, Roger," I murmur.

"What?" he asks. "Cora, I'm the one who grabbed you and flipped out and spontaneously transformed into my wolf in a panic –"

“Yes,” I concede, nodding, but still feeling guilty. “But Roger, I didn’t call you for five days

“That’s all right Cora,” Roger replies, dismissing it way too easily as he strokes my hair.

And I shake my head at him as I realize that he’s just completely overwhelmed by his excitement about the baby right now – that he’s willing to forgive me anything in this moment because he’s not thinking straight. But then his hand pauses on my hair and I see him start to figure it out. “Wait,” he says, hesitating and looking at me more seriously. “Cora, why didn’t you call me for five days?”

–

“Because,” I answer, holding his eyes but blushing regardless, not wanting – at all – to talk about my other sex partners with my mate. Especially now, when he’s probably newly volatile and protective with his new dad instincts to kill anyone who threatens to take me away from him.

“Because, Roger...until you came into this room right now, and sensed your connection?

I thought the baby was Hank’s.”

“Oh,” Roger says, his eyes going wide as he stares at me. Then, slowly, he rests his head back

“I mean,

”

I say, hesitating. “I didn’t want it to be. It was just... the logical thing to think at the time. I can’t smell the baby’s bloodline, and had no reason to assume that I – unlike literally any other human woman could, somehow, carry a wolf baby...”

–

“No, I get it,” Roger replies evenly, still staring the ceiling and I think sorting through his own feelings.

—
“I’m sorry,” I whisper. “I should have told you – I was a coward. I just... I didn’t know what to say didn’t want to face it, especially if it meant...” I bite my lip, not wanting to face it.

.
I

“Did you think I would leave you?” Roger asks, his voice quiet, looking down at me now.

“I don’t know,” I answer, honest. “Would you have

?

”

“No,” he replies instantly, but then he hesitates. “ mean, Cora, it would have been...incredibly difficult for me. And I love you

I

– I don’t think I’d ever find another mate – but,” he sighs and puts a hand over his face as he shakes his head, admitting the truth to himself. “If you were carrying another man’s baby...it would have put an incredible strain on our relationship.”

—

I sit quietly, looking at him for a few moments. “But,” I say after a long pause. “It’s... not someone else’s child. It’s yours.” The words are shaky as they fall from my mouth, because I still can’t believe it.

“Yes, that’s right,” Roger replies, moving his hand down his face and looking at me, a little smile on his mouth. “So...do we even need to...think about it?”

“Do you want to?” I ask, curious.

“Not...a lot...” he confesses, grimacing.

"I mean," I say, cocking my head to the side. "Do you forgive me? For...sleeping with him

?

"

"Cora," Roger murmurs, sitting up and obliging me to sit up as well, considering that I'm laying on his chest. Then he takes my face in his hands again. "There's nothing to forgive. I don't care if you've had a romantic past – we weren't even together when you slept with him. I didn't like it, but I'd never hold it against you."

—

I blush, realizing that I've perhaps been feeling...well, feeling a little slutty about the fact that I slept with Hank two days before I slept with Roger. But as I look up into Roger's eyes I realize that that's a completely human emotion – that wolves, unlike humans, are not precious about chastity or prude about sex. They're incredibly fierce about their mates, of course, but...we weren't mated when it happened.

"All I care about," Roger says, shaking his head slowly from side to side as he stares at me

,

"is our future. All right? Me, you, and this

... weird little baby..." he murmurs, looking down at my stomach.

"Is it weird?" I ask, looking down at my stomach again, suddenly scared that Roger can smell something strange about the baby

—

"Well, yeah, it's weird," he says, but when he looks up at my face he sees that he's scared me a little bit. "No, Cora –" Roger says quickly, laughing and pressing a quick kiss to my mouth. "Not like that – just... we didn't think it could exist. Right?"

“Okay,” I say on a relieved exhale of breath. “Okay.” And then I lay my head against Roger’s chest again as he lays back down on the bed, wrapping his arms around me, and I close my eyes and let myself feel...

Safe.

For the first time in days, I feel safe.

As I exhale again, though, I hear Roger take a deep breath and hold it. I look up at him, curious. “What is it?” I ask.

“Cora,” Roger says, staring guiltily up at the ceiling. “You’ve taken most of the blame for this whole Hank situation,” he sighs, shaking his head again. “But honestly...it’s all my fault. I haven’t been fair to you.”

“What?” I ask, frowning at him. And then Roger moves to sit up again, folding his legs together on the bed and taking my hands. Unnerved a bit, but curious, I do the same, sitting across from him so that I can see his face.

“Cora,” Roger says, holding my gaze like a penitent man even though guilt is clearly written all over him, you didn’t call me for five days this week. But I...” he sighs, looking down at the bed and shaking his head again. “I didn’t call you for weeks when we got back to the capital, after our time in the desert.”

“

—

“But,” I whisper, frowning at him. “It’s different,” I point out. “We we weren’t mated.”

“I know,

”

he says, meeting my eyes again and nodding. “But...I never told you why I stopped calling you.”

And I go a little pale as he says this. Honestly, I just thought that he had lost interest in me – or that he decided that wanting to be a father was more important to him than his attraction to a human woman.

But now he tells me that there’s a reason? A real

,

concrete reason, why he didn’t call?

And I hold my breath, not sure if I actually want to know.

Chapter 338 – Choices

338

–

Choices

Cora

“It’s all right,” Roger says, his eyes going wide as he takes in my pale face, my scared expression and realizes that he’s freaked me out for the third or fourth time today.

“It’s not – it’s not bad, I was just kind of a dick – it was a misunderstanding –”

“What?” I ask, more confused now than ever.

–

“Listen,” he says, leaning in towards me. “Just let me tell you, all right? It was going to tell you

at some point, definitely not like this but...” he sighs, looking into my face and then down at my stomach, and then back up into my eyes. “I think that... if we’re going to start on this new part of our lives – this parent thing – well,” he says, giving me a charming little half-smile and a shrug. “We should be on the same page, right?”

–

–

I nod, agreeing, but looking at him a little askance. “Did you not think that we should...go into our mating? On the same page?”

He sighs and runs a hand through his hair. “It’s a little different, Cora – because it didn’t matter – I didn’t think we could have kids

–

I frown at him – not mad or angry, but confused...

“Listen, let me just tell it,” he says, leaning forward and looking at me with pleading eyes.

“Okay,” I say, quite simply, taking his hands and leaning even closer to press a kiss to his mouth letting him know that I’m listening with an open heart.

“Okay,” Roger says again, taking a deep breath before he begins. “Do you remember... when you and Ella went into the desert with her mother, Regina?”

“Reina,” I correct softly, and he laughs.

“Right,” he says, shaking his head. “Those names are so easy to mix up. Anyway – you three were out on your girls trip, and my choice was either to hang out with those priests in the temple, or go back on to the ship all alone.

”

I smirk at him, knowing precisely which one he chose. He sees my smile and laughs a little.

“Yeah,” he says, grinning at me. “I chose solitude. Or at least...I thought I did.”

“Was there someone on the ship?” I ask curious.

,

“

Not precisely

,

”

he replies. “I was standing at the bow looking out at the desert – honestly, a little pissed off at being left behind. Sinclair sent me to protect Ella, and there’s frankly nowhere I wanted to be except at your side

—

”

I

smile when I hear this, but I don't interrupt.

“But then, as I was looking at the sky, staring at the moon, it started to grow... brighter and brighter. And at first I thought that I was just crazy or drunk I mean, the captain gave me a little of his whiskey when he saw how upset I was

I squeeze his hands a little, begging him to focus, and he looks at me again and nods.

“And suddenly,” he says, his voice faltering a little, looking down at our joined hands, “she was there.”

“Who?” I ask, a little breathless, but some part of me knowing already.

Roger looks up at me now, his eyes wide and still a little startled by the experience. “Your mother, Cora. Except...at the time, I didn't know she was your mom.”

“Oh

,

” I reply, and I try to keep my face steady but honestly... some part of me is a little jealous. We all met the goddess that night in the temple with Ella – Roger met her, and me, but she had only spoken to Ella beyond a brief introduction that Ella insisted on giving us. And at the time it had made sense – Ella was her daughter, the one she wanted to see.

But now? Now that I know that she's my mother too? And that she only spoke to Ella in the temple, and then went to Roger later that night for a little chat?

I sigh a little through my nose, disappointed. Why does she want to talk to everyone but me?

"I know," Roger murmurs, reaching forward and brushing my cheek with his thumb. "It's half of why I didn't want to tell you, Cora," he continues, his face all sympathy. "I knew that it would... hurt."

"Well, what did she do?" I ask, pushing past my jealousy and truly wanting to know.

He sighs, looking off into the distance a little as he continues his story. "She didn't come in her bodily form," he says, "like she did in the temple. Instead, it was just...a vision of sorts, more like the baptism but... not quite." He shakes his head a little, at a loss to explain it. "But her message was perfectly clear."

I squeeze his hands again, letting him know that it's okay. That he can tell me. So Roger turns back to me and looks at me directly, not holding anything back.

"She told me," he says, "that

I

was chasing the wrong destiny. That my future was not in war and politics, as my brother's was – and you have to realize, that that was devastating to hear at the time, considering that we were in a war and Dominic had just made me his Beta –

–

"

I nod, understanding, concentrating on nothing else but his words.

"But then she said," he twists his mouth a little, concentrating. "It's hard to know how to phrase it – because it wasn't precisely words – but that for the future of the world, I had to focus on family.

family -on finding my mate, and having children, and being a dad, and raising my kids well to be leaders of their generation."

"Oh," I say, blinking with surprise. And then I lean forward, finally getting it. "Oh, so you stopped calling me because..."

"Because I didn't think we could have kids, Cora..." he whispers, clutching my hands tightly. "And it fucking broke my heart to do it because I loved you I was obsessed with you,

you know that I

при

7

was and before she said anything to me I didn't even care about kids – didn't even really want them it was always Dominic who was dying to be a dad, not me –

–

”

“Oh!” I say again, my eyes going wide.

“Don't listen to me,” Roger murmurs, apologetic, “I'm fucking it all up, Cora – I'm thrilled that you're pregnant, and not just because the goddess told me to be. I want –” He pauses. He pauses his confused language for a moment and steadies himself, choosing his next words carefully to make sure that I understand.

“I very much want this child, Cora” he tells me, pausing to ensure that I hear him, “and I can't wait to build a family with you.”

–

And I nod, because I do. I really get it. Honestly, I'm kind of in the same boat – I was like wise unsure if I wanted kids. But the moment I really understood that this was our child – mind and Rogers...

There's nothing else I wanted in the world.

“So, you stopped calling me,” I whisper, “because you thought...my mom told you to.”

–

“I was so fucking dumb

,

Cora,” Roger murmurs, his eyes going wide as he again runs his hand through his hair. “I was totally freaked out I didn't want to , but when a goddess tells you to do something you feel compelled to do it – and I thought she was telling me to run from you, when she probably was telling me to run to you to take you

directly

to my stupid tiny bunk in that

—

—

awful little ship and knock you up right then and there –”

I can't help the little laugh that spills from me then, thinking about the nights I lay in my own ship bunk, aching for him. “Honestly,” I murmur, probably would have let you.”

“

I

—

—

“See?” he says, laughing with me and leaning close. “She shouldn't have come to me at all – she should have just let things pan out the way they were going to should have known that I'm too stupid to understand a goddess's meanings and prophecy

—

”

I'm laughing harder now, shaking my head and considering that we could have saved ourselves so much grief if my mom had just butted out and left us to our own devices –

–

77

Roger laughs along with me, and suddenly he's gathering me up in his arms, pulling me into his

Roger, misinterpreting my mom – me, crying for weeks and running to Hank for no reason –

And I'm kissing him, loving my sweet mate, who never stopped loving me –

When suddenly I realize –

“Oh my god,” I murmur, pulling back from him. “Roger, when you mated with me...”

He frowns at me, not understanding where I'm going with this.

“You...” I whisper, shocked. “You thought you were picking me despite the fact that we'd never have kids. You thought you were...defying a goddess.”

Roger's smile is slow, but deep, and he nudges me with his nose before pressing a long, slow kiss to my lips. “You were worth it, Cora)” he whispers. “I was ridiculous to try to stay away from you. I'd defy a thousand gods to live this life by your side. It's the only place I want to be.”

And I close my eyes, and kiss my mate, and let his love sweep through me.

Because even though it sometimes feels like my entire life I've been abandoned... Roger chose me.

Above everything else. Above his future, his family, the orders of a goddess, his destiny even... Roger chose me.

–

And as I kiss him, as I hold him close to me, I know that I chose him a long time ago, and now every part of me sings that despite all obstacles and hesitations – that choice was right, right, right.

Chapter 339 – Miracle

–
Miracle

Ella

“I can’t wait any longer” I say, two hours, one shower, and three sandwiches later. I stand up in the tiny steel kitchen, accidentally scattering the bag of chips I was picking at all over the counter. Honestly, I wasn’t even eating because I was as hungry

.

I was just trying to distract myself.

“Ella,” Sinclair sighs, reaching for my wrist.

“No!” I say

,

moving away from his grasp. “They’re being selfish! They know I’m dying to know!”

“Let them take their time!” Sinclair urges, standing up with me. I turn to glare at him and see him looking longingly at the hallway as well.

“See?” I say, pointing at him and narrowing my eyes. “You want to go too.”

Caught, he looks at me and grimaces a little. “Well, obviously I want to go talk to them, Ella,” he says, rolling his eyes. “He’s my brother as much as she’s your sister – I want to know as badly as you do –”

“Then let’s go!” I laugh, slapping my hand on the table and grinning down at the baby, who looks at me curiously. I laugh again at his expression and coo down at him. “Let’s go see your auntie and your Roger and your new cousin!”

“Ella,

”

Sinclair warns, stoic. “It’s not right. They’re entitled to their time alone!”

“Oh whatever,” I say, waving a hand to dismiss the Idea as I grabbing the half-empty bag of chips off the table. “She’s probably hungry. She’s a pregnant woman! She needs sustenance!”

And then, before he can stop me, I’m charging down the hall, determined to see my sister and learn everything.

“No, stop!” Sinclair calls half-heartedly behind me, and grin over my shoulder at him, because I know he could catch and stop me if he wanted to. I laugh then, hurrying towards the door to our room and reaching for it, thinking that my mate is just as nosy as I am – he just has more qualms about indulging in it.

rap lightly on the door before pushing it open. “Hello!” I sing, sweeping into the room, my heart swelling with happiness when I see Cora laying down on the bed, her head propped up against the pillows, her shirt pushed up a little and Roger pressing his ear low against her stomach.

“Hey!” she says, her face breaking out into a huge smile that does my heart so, so good to see, especially after how incredibly sad she was when she arrived at the bunker. And as I cross to her I think, suddenly, about the insane swing that this day has taken.

まず

My face falls as I remember that we were attacked this morning – that I killed a man, ripped his bedroom...

“Ella,” Cora gasps, her voice suddenly worried. Suddenly alert, Roger sits up, likewise looking at me with concern.

“No,” I say, letting myself sit down hard on the bed and doing my best to smile at them as Sinclair comes to the door. “It’s just been a...big day, hasn’t it?”

Cora clicks her tongue, realizing that she, too, forgot about my morning in the excitement of this afternoon, and she opens her arms to me so I can come in for a hug. Sinclair closes the door behind him and comes to my side, taking the baby from me before I move across the bed and allow Cora to wrap me in her arms, surrounding me with support.

Watching me closely, Sinclair sits down on the edge of the bed, the baby happily tucked against his arm. All right? he asks me, with a little concerned nudge to my mind.

I nod happily to him and then turn to Cora. "Come on," I say, poking her with my elbow. "Cheer me up, then, distract me from the fact that my baby was almost kidnapped this morning by telling me all about your miracle."

Cora laughs a little and complies with my request, looking down at her bare flat stomach and giving a little shrug. "There's nothing much to say yet, Ella, she says. "I'm barely pregnant. If a woman came to me in this condition, just hardly having missed her period, I would honestly advise her not to tell any family or friends that she's pregnant yet. A lot can happen in these early stages."

"

"

No

to this baby,

"

Roger murmurs, definitive, returning his ear to her stomach. "This one's strong! "How do you know?" she asks, laughing and casually brushing his hair away from his face. "Because he says, smug, "the child has incredible genes – the paternal line is especially fierce, not to mention good looking

,

"

Cora and I both laugh and she swats his head a little, making him sit up and grin at her.

Sinclair leans towards his brother, curious.

"

Do you feel the bond, Roger?

"

Roger turns towards him then, and his face drops a little, making my stomach twist. Cora likewise notices that something is off and she sits forward, worried.

“The bond?” she asks, and then she looks at Sinclair, blinking, remembering. “Yes,” she says softly. “I remember you talking about the bond.” She turns to Roger now. “ can feel the same thing?”

You

“I can feel it,” he says to her, reassuring, but then he looks back at Sinclair. “But it feels....different to me,” he adds, “than the way you described it with Rafe.”

“Well, the important thing is that you feel it, yes?

”

I say eagerly, leaning forward, wanting it to be all right. Sinclair slides his hand over to take mine, reassuring.

“Ella’s right,” he says, looking only at his brother. “All bonds are different, it doesn’t have to be exactly like what I felt with Rafe. If you feel it, it’s real. But what do you mean when you say it’s different

?

”

“Well,” Roger says, turning back to Cora and then looking down at her stomach. “You could... communicate with the baby, from very early on. And you said that you knew that Rafe was a boy from the very first moment you sensed your link...”

“You’re not getting a sense of the baby’s sex?” I ask, leaning forward to stare at him curious.

,

“No,” he murmurs, closing his eyes and trying harder.

“I feel the link, for sure. But I’m getting...” he sighs and opens his eyes, looking over at Sinclair. “Less information, I guess, than you did.”

Sinclair leans forward and puts a hand on his brother’s shoulder, not concerned but wanting to support him.

“Do you think it’s because the baby’s half human?” Cora asks, curious.

“Is it?” I ask, looking wide-eyed at her and then at Roger.

“What?” Cora asks

,

turning to me. “Ella, of course it is,” she says

,

gesturing towards herself.

“Well, I don’t know,” I say

,

shrugging. “Some kids get or express – more genes from their fathers than their mothers, and vice versa. Maybe it’s...90% wolf and 10% human, or the other way around. Or maybe it’s like...” I grin, laughing a little to myself, “a little Roger clone.”

Cora wrinkles her nose at me at the idea but Roger grins happily, and I laugh again at their opposing reactions.

I look to Sinclair, seeing what he thinks, but he just shrugs. “As far as I know, this is the first pregnancy of its kind,” he murmurs, smiling around at us. “Anything could happen.”

“Is it, though?” Cora murmurs, her hands going to her stomach, suddenly worried, Then she looks at me. “Ella...”

“What?”

”

I ask.

“Well,” she continues, hesitating and glancing at Roger. “I mean, we know that Roger is the father, because he can sense his bloodline. But...you don’t think it could be like...what mom did, do

you

? To our mothers? Where she... took one of her embryos, and put it in me, and then gave the father a nudge to go to their beds? I mean..this baby was probably conceived during that freak storm...” she says, biting her lip and looking at Roger, who goes pale.

“No

,

Cora,” I say, reaching out and grabbing her hand, shaking my head and making her look at me.

“

Mom asked Reina- and your mother too

,

I’m sure to carry us. They consented to it.

—

“But what if

,” she says, hesitating again, “what if it wasn’t mom? What she looks worriedly around at all of us again. “What if...it’s the god of darkness? Who also arranged for Rafe to be born? What if he...”

if

,

”

—

Cora bites her lip, looking down at her belly before continuing in a whisper. “What if he arranged for this baby too, and because he’s a different kind of god from our mother – didn’t bother to ask me if I consented to it? What if this baby is not mine at all?”

”

Chapter 340 – Reassurance

Ella

We all go a little pale, I think, as we consider the possibility that Cora, too, is an accidental – or not so accidental – surrogate.

“I’m sure that’s not true,” I say suddenly, shaking my head but a little shaken – I admit – by the idea that the baby was conceived during a storm that basically forced Roger and Cora off the road and into an empty room with not much in it besides a bed. It seems...a little too convenient to be chance, didn’t it?

“This is your baby, Cora,” I say with assurance, knowing it to be true.

“She’s right,” Roger says, nodding at Cora without doubt in his eyes. “You are this baby’s mother, and I’m its father, and that’s the end of the story. All right?”

Cora nods, but I can see her hesitate still.

“We’ll get answers, Cora,” Sinclair says quietly. “I agree with Ella and Roger – but if you’d like, we can consult the elders, like we did when we wanted information on how Ella was pregnant.”

“Oh,” she says, her eyebrows going up. “Yes, can we do that? That would be great.”

Sinclair nods, giving her a little smile and letting her know that he’ll set it up as soon as can be arranged. I realize something and gasp with excitement, bouncing a little on the bed.

“Maybe you’re a wolf, Cora!” I say, “like me! Maybe you just didn’t realize it! Maybe the same thing happened!”

“No, Ella,” Cora says, laughing at my excitement a little. “Our mother made it very clear to me on the temple steps that day – two daughters, one wolf, one human. I’m the human.”

“Oh,” I say, suddenly disappointed. But I take a deep breath and dismiss the thought, wrapping my arms around my sister’s shoulders and pressing my cheek to hers. “Well, whatever!” I say, cheerful. “Whatever this baby’s genetic makeup is, I’m excited. And we’ll love little ‘it’ so much.”

“I’m inclined to think the baby is a hybrid,” Sinclair says, carefully laying down on the bed and putting his head in my lap, resting the baby on the bed next to him, letting Rafe have some tummy time. “The first of its kind. Which is...very cool.”

Roger looks at him, curious. "Why do you think the baby's a hybrid?"

"The bond," Sinclair says, looking him in the eye. "If the baby were half human, it maybe makes some kind of logical sense that you only have access to half of the kind of link you would have with a baby who was genetically all wolf."

Roger cocks his head to the side, considering. "I wouldn't mind that," he murmurs, and then he looks at Cora and smirks. "I have a weak spot for humans. Cute ones, at least."

She wrinkles her nose at him and I sigh, glad we're on happier conversational ground again. "I think it's cool that we don't know the gender," I sigh, looking over at my little boy who works to hold his head up.

"You were happy enough to know Rafe's," Sinclair reminds me. "I seem to remember you tackling me in excitement when I told you he was a boy."

"Yes," I say, remembering it fondly. "But there's something good about the mystery too. The wait."

Cora laughs, drawing my attention back to her and I see her looking at Roger, grinning at the clear disappointment on his face. "You wish you knew," she guesses with a grin.

"Well, yeah," he says, huffing a sigh. "It's not usual for wolves to wait to know the sex. We always know. It's like someone telling you that it's Christmas but then having to wait six months to get the gift."

My sister laughs again and reaches forward to give him a little shove. "You just want to be assured it's a boy," she accuses, her grin deepening. "You won't be able to rest until you know."

Roger smirks at Cora, rueful, but doesn't deny it. "You don't want a girl!?" I gasp, my hands flying to my heart. "A lovely little girl!?"

"You wanted a boy," Sinclair reminds me, laughing as well. "Yes," I agree, shooting him a very tiny glare before turning back to Roger.

"But I also wanted a girl."

"How can you want both?" he asks, confused but laughing anyway. "Because!" I declare, "you just can!" Everyone is laughing now and I turn to Cora, nudging her with my elbow. "Back me up here!"

"Sorry, sis," she says, quirking a little smile at me. "I'm team girl. If we have a boy I'm handing it immediately off to Roger," she declares, though we all know she doesn't mean it as she pretends to dust her hands off and be done with it.

“Why are you leaning towards a girl,” Sinclair asks, amused and curious.

“Because,” she says to him with a smile. “Girls get all the good stuff. Dress-up and books and imagination and mermaids,” she shrugs. “Boys just get football. And turtles.” She sticks out her tongue to let them know what she thinks of that.

We all laugh at this and I tuck my head against my sister’s shoulder, pressing a quick kiss to it first, so terribly excited for her.

“If the child is hybrid,” I consider aloud. “Do you think you’ll be pregnant for six months? Or nine? Or... something between?”

“I don’t know,” she murmurs, stroking her stomach again and then transferring her hand to Roger’s hair as he bends down to press his ear to her stomach again, listening for the baby, though I don’t know what he’ll hear at this point. It’s probably just an embryo right now.

“Well, you’re probably amongst the few people on earth with the best guess,” I murmur, my eyes on Roger, so excited for him to become a dad alongside my sister. “As one of the very few OBGYN’s in the world who work with both wolf and human populations.

“Sure,” she sighs, “but I’m not geneticist. We have a lot to learn.”

“That’s okay,” I say, looking over at my mate and my baby as I speak. “But if I have learned anything at all from my own surprise wolf pregnancy...it goes faster than you think. Try to remember everything...”

My mate smiles at me, and I at him, and then I close my eyes with my head still pillowed on my sister’s shoulder.

As I relax the memories of this morning nag at me a little bit, dragging against my consciousness and trying to force me to remember that someone is coming for my child – someone powerful, and determined, and clever.

But in this moment, I choose to dismiss those fears and lean into the love.

Because there is so much of my life that has been so incredibly lucky and I choose, now, to believe in the strength of my family and hope for better times to come.

Because they will come. We’ll make them come, the four of us, for Rafe and little “it.” We will build the best world for them, no matter what it takes.

Chapter 341 – A Quiet Night

Ella

We had dinner a little later, and Henry got to give Cora his shocked congratulations on her pregnancy. His eyes were wet, a little, at the thought of his second grandchild, but it was all for joy. It was a wonderful evening that we all spent together surprising after such a horrible morning.

Tomorrow, I know, we have a lot to think about and decide. But tonight? Tonight I just want to sleep in my mate's arms and get some rest under the knowledge that nobody is going to attack us and try to take my baby.

I'm tired, then, when Sinclair and I head back to our room with little Rafe in my arms, already asleep. As Sinclair opens the door for us I give a little wave to my sister and Roger, who are sleeping a few doors down.

"Aw," I say, looking up at Sinclair as we walk into the room. "I'm jealous. I want to get knocked up."

"What!?" Sinclair exclaims, laughing as he moves across the room to the little table where we've unpacked our clothes, eager to get ready for bed.

I pout as I move to the little makeshift cradle waiting by our bed that Henry instructed Sinclair's men to make for us this afternoon, laying my sleeping baby down on the thin, firm mattress waiting there for him.

"I'm just a little jealous!" I declare, laughing a little.

"Ella," Sinclair sighs, pulling his shirt over his head and coming over to me. I turn to my mate, eager, and wrap my arms around his neck, smiling up at him. "You do realize that you just gave birth to our perfect little baby, and that it was an incredibly complicated and dramatic pregnancy. Are you really so eager to be pregnant again?"

"No," I say, grinning up at him. "That's not what I said. I don't want to be pregnant at least, not right now. Not yet. I just want to get knocked up!"

"Okay," Sinclair replies, laughing again and smiling down at me so broadly that it brings out all the little crinkles around his eyes that I love." Please explain, then, my love, the difference between the terms."

"I just think it would be nice," I say softly, "to just..." I shrug, "not be trying to get pregnant, and then one day poof! Surprise!" I look up into his eyes, still smiling, "suddenly knocked up!"

“Hmm,” he says, beginning to stroke my hair and, I think, understand. But he wants to hear more. “And why, Ella,” he asks, “does that sound so appealing?”

“Because,” I continue, taking a deep breath and resting my face against his chest. “You know I love everything about our story, Sinclair – we never would have met, or had our baby, if we hadn’t been thrown into that situation. But there was so much that was stressful about how Rafe was conceived – I had to spend so much money, and just hope that it worked, and frankly the idea that my sister put your defrosted sperm in me when you were just like ” somewhere else on the earth.

He laughs now and I can feel him nodding. “Yes,” he agrees. “I see. A little...less romantic and intimate than it could be.”

“Precisely,” I say. “Roger and Cora... it’s been so complicated for them, but there is something beautiful about them making that little miracle baby because they loved each other so much.”

I feel Sinclairs knuckles graze my face and look up at him again.

“I’ll give you as many children as you want, Ella,” he murmurs softly, “and they will all be conceived in love. Rafe too.”

“I know,” I say, smiling up at him. “ I’m excited. It will happen one day.” And a memory flashes in my mind of the prophecy the priests showed me, of our little family of four. Could that really be possible? I mean, the eldest child in that vision was a dark-haired boy just like my sweet Rafe. Would the rest come true as well?

“I mean,” Sinclair says, interrupting my reverie and sliding his hands down my back to grip my ass. “If you’re that eager to get knocked up – I’m right here and there is a bed – I am very happy to oblige I laugh, biting my lip as I look up at him and pressing my body closer to his. But then I hesitate. “Let’s wait, a little,” I say quietly, “before we think about a second child. Until all of this,” I say, waving a hand to encapsulate the bunker and all of the reasons why we’re here, “is sorted. Is that all right?”

“Yes, Ella,” Sinclair says, bending down a little further to get a better grip on my ass and using the leverage to pick me up in his arms. I laugh and wrap my legs around his waist, hands looped casually behind his neck. “You control the timeline. In the meantime,” he growls playfully as he moves his face closer to mine, “we’ll just...practice.”

“Good,” I murmur softly against his lips, a little thrill running through me as I remember that enough time has passed. I can take my mate to bed -really to bed – anytime I want now. But as I think about it, I pull away for a second, curious. “Dominic, what do wolves use for birth control?”

“Self-restraint,” he murmurs against my shoulder, carrying me the few steps to the bed and sitting down hard on it, taking me with him. He rolls then and I laugh as he presses me down against the mattress, kissing down my neck. “We’re horrible at it,” he adds, “that’s why there are legions of wolf babies out there...”

I laugh again and lean my head back, enjoying the feeling of him running his lips over me, his hands under my shirt now, warm against my stomach. I idly play with his hair as I force the conversation to continue. “But really, love,” I ask. “If we decide to wait a little bit for another child, how do we make sure that happens? Because, you know we’re not going to be able to practice abstinence. If that’s the only solution we’re going to pop out a kid every six months.”

Sinclair laughs at the idea and then sits up, pulling me with him and then tugging my shirt up over my head and looking hungrily down at my mostly- naked torso. He quickly un-snaps my bra, pulling it off my shoulders and tossing it aside before laying me back down on the mattress. “There are herbs,” he informs me, kissing down my stomach now as he raises a hand to hold my breast, his thumb idly flicking over my nipple and sending a little shiver through me. “But you won’t need them for a while. Wolf bodies are more diligent than humans about making sure that there’s time between pups. It’s very unlikely that you will ovulate at all while you’re still breastfeeding.”

“Oh,” I say, surprised.

“Mmmhmm,” he says, tugging at the waistband of my pants now, getting distracted from the conversation. “Our pups are rare as you know. So the female wolf body is designed to ensure that the pup gets all the nutrients it needs before making a new one. You don’t have to worry about it for a while, but we can talk to Cora if you want _”

“Later,” I murmur, looking down at my mate as he slides my pants and underwear down off my body. Then I’m panting in anticipation as Sinclair slides one of my knees over his shoulders, dipping his head down to give me a long, thorough lick just where I want him to. I moan a little, letting my head fall back on the pillow. “Let’s worry about all of that... later...” I whisper.

My mate murmurs his agreement and then, fully distracted, gets to work.

Chapter 342 – Bunker Life

Ella

Sinclair and I wake up late the next morning and frankly I'm grateful that everyone let us sleep in. We had to get up to feed Rafe, of course, but even with that? It's the most sleep I've gotten in a long time.

"Morning," I murmur, turning over to Sinclair and slinging a leg up over his hip, feeling just...ridiculously relaxed for someone who fought off a pack of kidnappers in her bedroom yesterday.

Sinclair doesn't say anything, just growls a hungry little greeting and pulls my naked body closer to his, rolling over me a little so that I can feel the delicious weight of him on top of me as he kisses my neck, my shoulder, and then my mouth. "We're skipping breakfast," he murmurs, sliding his hand leisurely down the length of my body. "I have different idea for how we can spend the time -"

"Nooooo," I moan in protest, my stomach audibly growling in support. I need foood!"

Sinclair laughs and pulls away from me then. "Am I not sustenance enough for you?" he asks, pretending to be offended. "Here," he says, offering his arm, bulging with muscles, "take a bite. It will keep you going."

I bare my teeth and lean forward towards it, making my mate laugh, but then I just press a quick kiss to the arm and push him away, reaching for the baby who is starting to fuss in his cradle at the sound of our voices.

"As delicious as you are," I call over my shoulder to Sinclair as I lean down to scoop Rafe into my arms, "the baby and I need pancakes."

"Then pancakes you shall have,"

Sinclair murmurs yawning and crossing to the little metal bathroom door in the corner of the room. "But I hope that you are aware that these will be bunker pancakes," he adds, twisting the knob and pushing his way through, by which I mean...plain toast."

I laugh, nodding to indicate that that's fine by me, and then I spend a few sweet minutes alone with my son, talking softly to him while I feed him his own breakfast, taking my time looking over, admiring his little face and his thick thatch of black hair, mussed from sleep.

I sigh a little, thinking that this will surely be a busy, complicated day. But with sweet starts like this...how can it end badly?

Sinclair

A little later in the morning we gather in the conference room at the end of the bunker's long hall, our teams ready to come up with a plan for a counter- attack on the Cult. I keep my face impassive as I look around at the men who we have brought with us, but honestly I'm proud of them. Many worked through the night to develop our reconnaissance, to make a plan.

A little pang of guilt runs through me as I realize that they were working, losing sleep, while I was relaxing and... well, doing a bit more than relaxing with my mate. But...

Well, I'm the boss. I built this system, I put in the hours in my younger years to get to where I am. I am allowed to indulge, a little, in some of the privileges of being in charge – even if my constant instinct is to work, and to push, and to keep going. Ella and Rafe need my attention as well, just as much as my business and political life. And considering what Roger and Cora went through yesterday, they needed me last night too.

"You're doing fine, Dominic," my father murmurs to me as he rolls up to my side, his voice quiet enough that no one is likely to hear.

"What?" I ask, surprised.

My dad gives me a little smirk, just for a moment, before placing some paperwork on the table and beginning to sort through it. "You think I can't read the emotions on your face, even when you work to keep it clear? I'm your father, boy. We still have a bond, even if it's changed with time."

I smile, then, and clasp a hand on my father's shoulder, grateful for him. Roger comes over to us and gives us a sharp little nod, which we both return, and then I laugh a little bit as I realize how much of our bodily movements we all have in common. My dad laughs a little too.

"What?" Roger asks, a little out of the loop, but I shake my head at him a little to let him know he's not missing anything big and he just shrugs it off, leaning in front of me to look at the plans that dad came up with last night.

Roger stands up straight, though, when Cora and Ella come through the door, saying warm greetings to everyone they encounter, Ella showing off the baby to anyone who wants to come greet him and Cora handing out little cups of coffee that they thoughtfully made.

"Uh-oh," Roger says, his eyes wide as he looks at the girls. "What?" I ask, looking between Roger and our mates, trying to figure out the problem.

“Dominic,” Roger says, his voice tight, “do you not see the issue here?”

he gestures towards them. Frowning, a little disturbed that I don’t, I shake my head.

“Dom,” Roger sighs, scrubbing his hand down his face swiftly in a mix of worry and frustration. “I’m going to forgive you for this, since you’ve been a little...hypnotized by Ella since the moment she walked into your life – ”

“Wha-!” I start, but Roger gives me a significant look and I shut my mouth, frowning and crossing my arms over my chest but letting him continue.

“Seriously, Dom,” he continues, speaking quickly, “Ella’s amazing, and I love her, but you let her get away with things that you wouldn’t let anyone get away with -”

“She’s usually right!” I protest, but he continues speaking, cutting me off.

“She is and I’m not calling your judgement into doubt – but I have had the privilege of getting to know both Ella and Cora without being in love with one of them from the jump –

I raise my eyebrow at Roger, but he ignores me.

“And,” Roger continues, “I thus am more aware of what they can do when they combine their powers. You have a sweet spot for Ella, you think she’s funny – and now Cora’s got me all wrapped up -”

I smirk, and look over at the two girls, realizing that he’s right.

“And,” I continue, speaking his thoughts for him, “with the two of us under their thumbs? If they want to, they’re going to control this meeting.”

“Yah,” Roger replies, sighing and folding his arms as he turns to watch both of them, as I’m currently doing..

“Shit,” I murmur, shaking my head. Ella turns to me by chance now, catching both of us looking at her, and her face bursts into a wicked little grin before she replaces it with a sweet smile and blows me a kiss, taking a paper cup of coffee off of Cora’s tray and handing it to another one of our men.

“Oh no,” Roger moans, seeing Ella’s changing expression. “They’ve become aware of their power – they know – ”

“Shiiiiit,” I murmur again, shaking my head even harder now.

“This is why,” Roger snaps, turning to frown at me, “we never should have gotten involved with sisters – what the hell were we thinking – we should have mated with two women who are mortal enemies so that they can never team up against us – ”

“You’re right,” I agree, sighing. “But it’s too late now. Unless you want to give yours up,” I quip, turning to grin at him.

“Not on your life,” Roger murmurs, smirking. “I got the hot one.”

“Whatever,” I laugh, knowing he’s wrong but happy to let him think that he’s right. That’s the way one should love their mate – believing them incomparable. I’m glad he sees Cora like that, the same way I see Ella.

Ready to begin, I clap my hands, loudly, calling the group to order. As everyone shuffles around to take their places at the table, I’m grateful that Roger has made me newly aware that Ella and Cora came to this meeting not as innocent bystanders, but as people very intent on having their say in the plans. Indeed, they take two diminutive seats from us as far away as possible, Rafe bundled warmly in Ella’s arms.

But I note, as I see them sit, that even though the seats they choose are at the end of the group, those seats could also be considered the head of the table.

And they are not going to like, at all, the direction in which we’re heading.

I grin a little, preparing for a fight.

Chapter 343 – Preparations

Sinclair

“All right,” I say, keeping half an eye on trouble and sister-trouble as I look around the room at my assembled team. “We’re here today to make a concrete plan regarding our next moves against the Cult that attacked our pack and attempted to kidnap my child. Everyone here has been briefed on the events that occurred yesterday. I applaud your work in coming up with the information we need to make the next best step we can. But now it’s time to act. Dad?”

I turn the group’s attention to him, eager to hear what he has to say regarding the reconnaissance that we assigned teams to complete yesterday and last night.

“Right,” my father starts, leaning forward in his chair and glancing over his papers, though I know he’s memorized every word on them. “Our capture of a Dark Priest yesterday morning resulted in a great deal of new information, if not yet definitive answers regarding how to stop these attacks. However, one of the most significant pieces of information that we’ve gathered came in last night.”

I listen while my father speaks but keep my eyes on everyone in the room, wanting to judge my men’s physical reactions to the information. I know that we’re going to need to put together an assault team at some point, and I’m going to want the best and most engaged on it. At my father’s last line, everyone seems to perk up a little, but I spot a few men whose eyes burn with a particular hunger at this turn.

“Last night, there was significant consideration of the fact that, while Ella and Dominic shifted into their wolves to attack the men who came for Rafe yesterday, the attackers themselves did not shift. I want to particularly applaud Conner O’Mally for noticing this particular fact.”

All eyes move, then, to a bulky red- haired young man who nods humbly, even when a slight blush at the recognition colors his pale cheeks. I nod at him, marking him mentally as one I might want by my side.

“At least one of the men,” my father continues, “would have had to stay in his human body in order to carry the child, of course. But the others continued the assault without shifting which, as we all know, is unique. And put them at a particular disadvantage.”

Ella catches my eye here and we raise our brows at each other. We were caught up in the moment, of course, but I feel, quite suddenly, a little stupid that neither of us noticed this. It’s true – considering the numbers we went up against, it should have been a more difficult fight and it would have been, had they shifted.

“There was speculation,” Henry continues, “that these men never intended to take my grandson yesterday, that they were, instead, a distraction meant to get Dominic and Roger out of the room so that the captured Priest could escape – which he did.”

My father nods a little, considering this fact and the entire room listens eagerly, on the edge of our seats.

“However,” dad continues, looking now to a slim dark-haired young man down the table, “Simon suggested an alternative. Simon?” Henry invites, “if you would?”

“Okay,” Simon says, leaning forward, I think a little put on the spot but responding ably to the pressure. “The men who came into the bedroom, according to reports,” he nods politely to my mate here and she smiles at him, “moved with incredible speed and were able to break glass that they should not have been able to break, which was installed recently against just such an assault. The obvious conclusion here is that the attackers called upon the magic that the members of this Cult are known for in order to aid them in their mission.”

“Ella,” I say, breaking in and turning towards her now, wanting her input. Does this line up with your memory of the event?”

“Yes,” she says, sitting up and looking around. “It was incredible how fast they entered and how they came through the window. It is difficult to describe but...it was not something the average wolf could do unaided.”

I give her a sharp nod in thanks and she smiles at me in return. I can’t help the little smile that twitches at my lips then, though I usually work hard to keep all of my emotions off my face while I work.

She’s just so...cute. Damn, but it’s hard to keep a straight face around her. Roger’s right – I let her get away with more than anyone else.

I ignore these thoughts and turn back to Simon, giving him a nod and inviting him to continue. As he begins I consider that he’s a little too small for an assault team, though he’s clearly clever. I make a mental note to assign him more rigorous tasks to see how he does.

“One potential explanation for this,” Simon continues, “the lack of shifting, as well as the use of magic – is rooted in my understanding of how certain priestesses of the Goddess operate. It is not a common practice, but there are certain enclaves where priestesses worship remote ones, monasteries really – where priestesses actually bind their wolves in order to differently access the magic that would allow them to communicate with their wolf and transform into it.”

“Oh,” Cora says, clearly surprised, though she’s the only one who responds aloud. The rest of us shift uncomfortably in our chairs. It would be ...incredibly painful, and isolating, I consider, to choose to turn away from the wolf that lives inside me and forcibly bind him. An act of cruel self-flagellation that, I know, every other wolf in this room shudders to consider.

Inside of me my own wolf bares his teeth at the idea, snapping at it. I run a mental hand down his black fur, assuring him that I'd never do it.

"How do you know this," Roger asks, sharp but curious. "I've never heard of this practice."

"Um..." Simon says, looking down at the table for a moment, perhaps a little embarrassed. "My mother...lives in one of these communities. I was born there."

My eyebrows raise in surprise. I hired Simon three years ago, selected him for his intelligence as well as his hard work and potential. We did a thorough background check on him and while I knew he came from a remote region, I was unaware of his unique connections to a priestess of the Goddess. I make a mental note to have a further discussion with him, both about his background and about transparency.

But still, even as part of me rankles at not having all the information, another part of me understands. If practices like this exist, they surely happen in remote communities that would otherwise be shunned. Perhaps Simon kept his secret because he didn't want to expose his mother, or have his fellow workers mark him as a misfit.

I catch Simon's eye and nod to him, warm enough to let him know that he did right by telling us but firm enough for him to understand that we will be having further conversations about this. Simon holds my gaze and nods in return.

Then, I turn back to my father. "This is significant, if true," I say aloud. I know what I think it means, but I want his opinion before I voice it, so I nod to him, giving my dad back the floor.

"The consideration here," Henry continues, "is that we may have a significant advantage over these priests if we attack in a large force. If we are facing cult members who do not have access to their wolves, even if they do have access to magic, there is a good chance that the sheer physical force of us could be overwhelming. My suggestion would be to move fast, now, before they figure out what we know."

I nod, agreeing, pleased that my own thoughts are aligned with my father's. We move tonight, as soon as we can," I declare. "Roger and I will take lead."

"Absolutely not," Ella growls, and I turn to see my little rose-gold mate standing up and looking at me fiercely. "I will not allow it."

Everyone freezes, awkward, not knowing what to do. Honestly, it's the first time they've seen anyone counter me. But then again, it's the first time Ella's come to the table.

Ella and I glare at each other, locked in a stare from which we are both determined to never back down.

Chapter 344 – Counter Moves

Sinclair

Cora breaks the tension between Ella and I, but unfortunately not in a way that benefits me.

“I agree,” she says, standing next to her sister, her eyes locked on Roger’s. I sigh inwardly, my wolf grumbling with discontent, as I realize that Roger’s warning at the start of this meeting was quite apt. Each on their own is willful, but together they’re a disruptive force.

“It’s too dangerous,” Cora continues, shaking her head, “we don’t know enough about this magic to send anyone in like this – people could be seriously hurt.”

She says “people” but I know, of course, that she really only means Roger and maybe me. Cora is not cold she cares about the other team members, but as a newly-mated newly- pregnant woman, I imagine that her main concern is, at this point, quite narrow.

“We have to press the advantage when we can, Cora,” Roger explains, angry but wanting her to understand. “Time is not on our side -” Cora opens her mouth to argue but I interrupt.

“Enough,” I snap, glaring at her and at Ella. Sit, I command Ella firmly, mind to mind. Her eyes flare at the authority in my voice, both audible and internal, but slowly I shake my head at her, communicating as coolly as I can that this is not the time to press me.

I see their concern – I share it, honestly – but this is not the time for me to back down in front of my men. I hold her gaze steadily, not relenting, and slowly Ella sits herself back into her seat. Seeing her back off, Cora hesitates but then does the same.

The tight muscle of Ella’s jaw lets me know that this fight is not over, even if she has consented to sit and, as she settles back in the chair, I give her a deep nod, letting her know that I will hear her. Just Not Now.

Then, I turn back to my men, moving on as if it didn’t happen.

“And where do we plan to strike?” Roger asks, his voice tight but likewise working to get back to business. He looks down at the paperwork our father provided and, I think, figures it out based on the few maps that my father has placed on the table.

“The sewer,” dad says, pointing at some underground schematics of the city which indicate where, precisely, entrances and exits were built for workers and maintenance in the sewer system. “The priest we lost yesterday set up significant shop down there and it’s likely that he cannot operate without some of the materials he left. If we want to capture him again – and, I propose that that is our best move forward then our best shot is to start there. Best case scenario he is still there, gathering the significant number of supplies he left, which will take a long time to move out. Worst, we can begin to learn his practices and his scent.”

“Good,” I agree, nodding. “Any opposing suggestions for how to proceed?” I ask, looking at my oldest and most established men to see if there are any other ideas. I deliberately do not look at Ella and Cora. But no one says a word.

“It’s decided then,” I say, standing and crossing my arms over my chest, looking to the side at my brother. “ Roger and I will pick a team and take lead. We’ll give word when we are ready.”

I decidedly refuse to look at Ella and Cora as the men filter out of the room, some coming to have a quick word with me before moving on to their individual team tasks which they already know they must take up. Some move to check the armory and prepare the assault, others gather to discuss the best way to approach the sewers, and still more move to another room to prepare to select members of the team. Those, I know, are the ones who I will be joining in a few minutes.

But before that...

My father gathers up the papers in front of him and tucks them into the side pocket of his wheelchair before looking up at me, giving me a wry little smile. “I’ll see you two in a few minutes?” he asks..

“We’re coming now, dad,” Roger growls, turning away from the last of the men and towards the two of us.

“No, you’re not,” dad replies cheerfully, beginning to spin his chair away. “You boys know that I miss your mother but...” he laughs a little as he begins to roll towards the door. “Not quite as much, in moments like this.”

Dad gives us a little wave and rolls through the door next to which Cora and Ella stand, my baby boy still sleeping happily in my mate’s arms. As soon as dad rolls out with the last of the men, Ella shuts the door and turns to renew her glare.

I fold my arms over my chest again, glaring back, ready to renew our stalemate but Roger interrupts, walking quickly to Cora’s side.

“Cora,” he breathes, shaking his head, shocking me with the apology on his lips. “I’m sorry, Cora – I know you’re upset – ”

“Upset!” she gasps, and Ella spins her head to look at Cora, breaking my gaze. I blink, surprised. I had honestly thought we were going to be locked in that for...I don't know. Days?

Perhaps Roger knows how to handle them better than me. As they start to argue, I begin to slowly walk over and join the group.

“Upset doesn't cover it, Roger!” Cora spits, glaring up at him and brushing away the hand he attempts to put on her shoulder. “We find out that we're having a baby and the first thing you want to do is rush off to get killed!?”

“We're not going to get killed,” Roger replies, stating it in a breezy way that clearly lights a fire in his mate.

“You don't know that!” Cora shouts. ”

Damn it, Roger!” She steps closer to him and I can see tears in her eyes now. “How am I supposed to let you walk out of her and put your life on your line! When we we finally -”

And my heart twists when I see Cora relent, a little, closing the distance between them and fisting her hands in his shirt as if she'll never let him go.

I turn to Ella then, standing a few feet from me, hoping for the same kind of honest communication, but when I meet her eyes they're still steel.

“Oh no you don't,” she says, pointing a finger up into my face and setting her jaw. “Just because Cora is crying and is going to let Roger talk her into it doesn't mean I will.”

Cora gasps and turns to her, “I'm not.

“Yes you are,” Ella snaps, flashing Cora a little glare. “He's got you all softened up with an apology and now you're puddy in his hands.”

Cora gasps again, betrayed this time instead of surprised, and steps away from Roger, coming to Ella's side.” She's right!” Cora cries. “You softened me up!”

Roger and I both sigh sharply through our noses, turning to look at each other, frustrated, and he gives me a little shrug that clearly says well, it was worth a shot. I nod consideringly, giving him credit for trying. Then, I turn back to Ella and try another tactic: brutal honesty.

“Ella,” I say, sliding my hands into my pockets and meeting her angry gaze. This is happening. There is no other way. We're not going to send our men out there without us – Roger and I are each stronger than four of them put together, it's in our bloodline. This is part of our jobs, this is why we're in charge. There is no other choice."

Her face falls a little then, and I can see that I'm making her understand. I take a step towards her then, my heart breaking to see her so upset, so worried. But it was the truth: we have to go. They need us.

"Can't you," she says, her eyes darting a little as she thinks, "can't you just delay – by a day or two – just until you get more information – "

"We will lose the opportunity," I reply, taking another step closer and reaching a hand out towards her, begging her to see the truth of it. And then, as I look down into the face of my darling mate, I see her lip begin to tremble as she comes to understand. And slowly, she raises her hand and takes mine, and then in a flash she's pressed against me, her free arm wrapped around my waist, and I wrap mine around her shoulders, wanting to press her tight against me but, of course, not wanting to crush the baby between us.

"I don't want you to go," she murmurs, and I can hear a little hitch in her throat. "I can't lose you. We have so much...we just got safe..."

"You won't lose me," I murmur, bending down to kiss the top of her head, meaning every word of it. "I promise, Ella. I promise."

"So do I," Roger says, turning to Cora, and I turn a little to watch them, seeing him step towards her as well.

But Cora surprises me by stepping back. "Oh, I don't need your promise," she says, holding up a hand between them. "Because I'm going with you."

Chapter 345 – Parting

Ella

I blink, surprised, when I hear a laugh tumble from Roger's mouth. Honestly, I had expected anything else. Yelling? Yes. Begging? Sure. Stern orders? Absolutely.

Anything, really, except the low chuckle that falls from Roger's lips as he leans back and puts his hands in his pockets. "I'm serious," Cora says, crossing her arms and glaring at him. "I'm going with you. You need me."

"Cora," Roger says, shaking his head. "I need you, absolutely. But if you think for a second that I'm letting my pregnant mate climb into a sewer with me as part of an attack on an unknown enemy.

"Well if you wouldn't let me do it, why on earth would I let you do it!" she counters, angry.

"Because I'm not pregnant!" Roger shouts back, angry, as if it's obvious. Sinclair shifts a little, moving behind me – his arms still around my shoulders – so we can both watch.

"We're pregnant," Cora shouts, pointing between herself and him. "This is not a me or a you kind of thing! I am not interested in single motherhood on what is essentially day two of this pregnancy!"

"Cora," Roger sighs, putting an exhausted hand on his forehead. "This is my job. This is what we do. You can't ask me to back away from it."

"Why not, when you're doing the same to me?" Cora counters, shaking her head at him, being stubborn. I bite my lip, torn between wanting to support my sister and frankly agreeing with Roger. There's absolutely no way in hell that Cora should be going on this mission.

"What are you talking about?" Roger asks, frustrated. "I can help," she says, pointing at herself, "I'm a doctor. You guys are going to get all torn up out there – you need me!"

Have we had enough of this? Sinclair asks, speaking to me mind-to-mind as I lean back against him, tense as we watch our siblings argue. When do I interrupt?

Give them another second, I reply internally, wanting them to figure this out on their own if they can. But even if it did come to something as simple as a vote? It's three to one. Cora's staying home. "We're trained in field medicine."

Roger says, waving a dismissive hand. "It will be enough to hold us through it until we can get home –"

“People could die!” Cora counters, you could die! And how the hell would I feel, for the rest of my life – what would I tell our child – when I remembered that I could have been there and saved you?”

Roger’s face falls at this thought and I see him falter, no knowing how to reply. And frankly I’m torn by the idea as well if Sinclair died, and I could have done something...

I don’t know if I’d survive it myself. Now? Sinclair asks me, his own inner voice dark and sad. Let me, I reply, and I step forward, putting a hand on Cora’s arm.

“Cora,” I whisper and, after a second, my sister drags her eyes away from her mate to look at me. Slowly, I shake my head, “Cora, you can’t go.”

“Why not?” she growls, stern. “Because,” I reply, with a little shrug. “Your argument goes both ways. How the hell would Roger feel if you got killed and your baby with you – and he could have kept you safe?” a

Roger audibly groans at the idea and has to turn away from us, tortured by it, raising a hand to cover his face for a moment as he collects himself. Cora turns to look at him, surprised, I think, by the rare display of intense emotion. These Sinclair brothers – they’re so steady on the surface, but we always have to remember that still waters run deep.

Cora moves towards him, placing her hands on Roger’s shoulders, turning him back towards her and wrapping her arms around his waist. She lays her head on his chest when he puts his own arms around her. “I don’t like this,” she whispers against his shirt, “I hate it, Roger.”

“I know,” he murmurs, his lips against his hair. “I’m sorry. But Cora, I promise you it will be all right.”

“Is it always going to be like this?” she asks, looking up at him. “Is this what I’ve gotten myself into? Battle after battle, fight after fight? Constantly worried about whether or not you’re coming home to me, to...us?”

I feel my own stir of intense emotions at her question, looking up at Sinclair and meeting his eyes as he shakes his head steadily at me. No, he says, firm in my mind. We will have peace. I will bring you peace. Just...a little further.

“I promise, Cora,” Roger replies, tightening his arms around her. “I promise it will be all right.”

Sinclair turns me, then, and I nod, letting him shepherd me out of the room and giving the two of them a moment alone. My mate takes my hand as we pass through the door and head down the hall, both of us silent, me looking down at my baby and feeling, I'm sure, almost precisely the same feelings that Cora is at the moment.

"Is it different now?" Sinclair asks me as we head into our little room.

"Hmm?" I ask, brought out of my thoughts at his words. "Now that he's born," Sinclair says, nodding to the baby as I carry him over to his little makeshift crib. "This isn't the first time you've sent me off to battle. Does it feel different, now that he's a little person instead of part of you?"

"He was always a little person," I murmur with a little smile as I lay Rafe down, "since very early on, he was my little guy. But no," I reply, straightening and looking up at my mate, who stands close to me. "It's always horrible, Dominic. I'm never going to get used to it. That time we thought you died..."

Tears spring to my eyes at the memory. He shushes me a little, pressing a finger to my mouth, and I nod, understanding. It's not that he doesn't want me to engage with these feelings these memories – he just....

Well, we both know that I don't need to go there. Not really. He will come back to me today, as he did before. As he always does.

Slowly, seeing me pull myself together, Sinclair gives me a deep nod. "Brave little mate," he whispers, leaning down to press a kiss to my mouth. I wrap my arms around his neck, clinging close, never wanting to let him go.

The day passes quickly, with all of the preparation, and Cora and I watch mostly in silence. We do what we can to help, but Sinclair has built a very capable team. Frankly, they don't need much, which is worse for us. We're both helpers – it's our instinct to pitch in.

"I hate this," Cora growls next to me as we watch the men pack all of their supplies into the cars they'll be taking.

"It's for the best," I sigh, leaning my shoulder against hers as I bounce Rafe in my arms, trying to get him to stop crying. It's almost as if he knows his dad is going away. "No battlefields for baby," I say passively, smiling down at my boy.

Cora laughs darkly and I look over to see her rolling her eyes. "Honestly, Ella," she says, shaking her head. "You were in like, three battlefield situations when you were pregnant."

"True," I say, quirking my head to the side. "Sinclair probably should have locked me up in a bunker long ago."

"Truer words never spoken," Sinclair says as he walks over to us, smirking. "Is it time?" I ask, stepping close as Roger likewise comes near.

"It is," Sinclair replies, pulling me close and looking first into my face and then down at the baby. "Calm down, baby trouble," he murmurs, reaching out a hand to trace a large finger across Rafe's forehead. "I'll be home soon."

"You'd better be," I growl, glaring at my mate and tilting my head up for a kiss, which he gives me.

"Don't eat all the snacks," he whispers, giving me a wink and a smack on the ass as he begins to turn away. "We'll be hungry when we come home."

"No promises!" I call after him, grinning as I watch him walk away. I turn, then, and watch Cora let Roger go as well, my heart breaking for her a little bit.

"See you soon, gorgeous," Roger says with a wave as he moves towards the car. And I step closer to my sister, taking a deep breath, sending a quick prayer to the Goddess that this isn't the last time we see them alive.

Chapter 346 – The Lair

Sinclair

Things move quickly once we arrive at the point of entry. Everything has been planned to the letter so that even our arrival is quiet, covert, in the darkest hours of the night when we're least likely to be seen. Each of the cars filled with our men has parked at different points in the surrounding blocks of the city so that when we do converge on the sewer, we do it in near silence and darkness.

Roger and I are there first and, in preparation, we contact our father at home to let him know that we're in position. Once we're in the sewers, our ability to speak with him will be limited 1 it will just be us down there, along with whatever we find.

Dad replied readily, letting us know that all is well – if not a little tense – at the bunker. I smiled a little at the message, thinking of Ella and Rafe safe and worried. Of Cora pacing anxiously, waiting for Roger. It's not that I like thinking of them being upset but, well. It's nice to be missed. Nice to be able to think of someone at home loving you, wanting you to come back.

“Ready?” Roger asks, giving me a nudge and pointing down the road to where the first of our men are begin to approach. We meet each other's eyes, knowing that it's time. I give a slow, deep nod to my brother, and then he slides the manhole cover to the side so that I can slip in. I drop to the floor of the curving sewer below, all of my senses on high alert for anything odd, anything strange.

But as I look around, scenting the air, there's nothing off – and nothing fresh. No signs of anyone here now, or anyone around in the past few hours. When I'm sure, I look up at my brother, who peers through the entrance above me. Then I beckon with my hand.

Come, my gesture implies. It's clear. Or, it is at least for now.

Roger drops into the sewer with me and then we prowl forward, our hands free and our hackles raised. The wolf within me is on high alert, a growl already rumbling in his chest, his eyes sharp, his teeth sharper. As we move forward, I hear my men start to enter the sewer as well, tiny splashes letting me know as each one arrives.

We decided on a team of sixteen, with Roger and I at the head of it. Enough troops to arrive as a force, but not so large that we could truly lose track of them. Each of our men carries a weapon – some guns, some close- combat tools like knives and tasers. Roger and I, however, carry only ourselves. Our wolves are more powerful than anything we're likely to meet. We're each weapon enough.

Slowly, we move forward, the map of the sewer that I've memorized aligning perfectly with the reality. We turn to the left when we come to a junction, and I hold up a fist in the air, asking my team to stop. This, I know, is where the test really begins. Because the priest's lair is just up ahead.

Slowly, I turn to survey our forces and count twelve men behind us, which is good. Two, I know, are standing outside at the entrance as guards.

Slowly, so everyone can see, I move my hand to my shoulder and flip the switch on the radio that's there attached to the strap of my bullet-proof vest with velcro. Everyone else does the same, ensuring that we'll be able to stay in touch if anyone is separated.

As I turn back towards our target, I think that it's not so important if we're quiet anymore – Because there's no going back now.

I signal my forces to move forward now, walking more quickly now, my boots splashing through the water as I head directly for the door that I know is 100 feet forward and to the left. Roger snarls beside me, a wicked sound, as we approach –

50 feet now, and we're almost running -25, and it's a charge –

I roar as we turn the corner towards the lair, ready to rip to shreds anyone that I find inside – But as I turn towards the door, ready to throw it open, I find that it's already ajar dangling off its hinges. My heart pounds with unused adrenaline as I survey the scene before me and realize – “Shit,” Roger snaps, storming into the empty room and looking around. “We're too fucking late.” Another growl is my only reply as I signal my troops to stop the charge and set up a perimeter around the door, which they quickly do. Then, I step inside with my brother, looking around.

The room is not spotless – there are still scraps of paper around, beat up tables and chairs that the priest was clearly using to set up his potions or whatever it was he was doing down here.

“God damn it,” Roger curses, pounding a fist against the wall.

“It's not totally lost,” I say, turning around and surveying the room. “There are some things here that could be useful...”

“Dominic,” Roger says, exasperated, and I turn to see him rolling his eyes at me. “He took everything that could tell us anything.”

“No, brother,” I say, my mouth curling into a grin as I lift my nose and scent the air. “He left us one thing...”

And then, intrigued, Roger lifts his nose as well and takes a moment to detect it as well. "You're right," he says, bringing his eyes back to mine with a flash of pleasure.

"We have a scent," I growl, and then I look at him curiously. "What do you think?" I ask. "Is it...likely that he would have stuck around?"

"He had a lot of stuff, Dominic," Roger replies, considering. "If he wanted to keep it all, needed it close, is it possible that he didn't go far?"

Perhaps...another part of the sewer, hoping that we'll assume it's a lost cause?"

"It's worth following it up," I say, grinning a little at the idea that the case is still on. "Would you like to take the honor? Or should I?"

"Oh please," Roger growls, his voice low and eager. "Let me."

I nod and, with a flash, Roger transforms into his wolf, shaking his fur loose as soon as he does as if he's been eager to do this for hours, to become the animal that's been prowling within him, eager to protect his family, his mate, his new baby.

I step back and watch Roger work as he moves slowly around the room, sniffing everything, his intensified senses picking up more of the priest's scent than our human bodies are capable of doing. Then, when he's ready, Roger lifts his eyes to mine and nods his snout once.

"All right," I say, gesturing towards the door. "Lead the way."

Eagerly, Roger prowls out, his gigantic wolf so tall that his shoulders nearly coming even with my chest. Our troops move aside to make room for Roger as he turns into the sewer, looking left down the long aisle. I signal my troops for their attention, which they give me eagerly, and then point down the hall after Roger's retreating form, signaling that we will follow.

As one, the troops nod, and we start off with Roger in the lead and me close behind.

Chapter 347 – Underground

Sinclair

I give our troops outside of the sewer updates on our movements, letting them know when we take left and right turns, all the time following Roger, who steadily pads along, tracing the priest's scent. The troops outside relay the information back to my father, in the bunker, who is able to trace our movement on the maps so that he, at least, knows precisely where we are at all times.

About half an hour later, Roger looks over his shoulder at me, his eyes suddenly fierce and I nod, understanding his message. We're close very close now.

I raise a hand above my shoulder, making the signal that tells my troops to be on alert, ready for action. Behind me, I can almost feel their bodies tensing, becoming ready to react.

As a group, we continue to prowl through the sewers, making as little noise as we can. Roger turns a corner and I am just on his tail, looking around, when suddenly I see light again – bright golden light, a significant contrast to the grey mossy sewer around us. We pause for a moment and listen, hearing – god, what is that?

Some kind of clanging rings from an open door on the left almost exactly like the one we just left. Roger was right the priest needed to set up shop – again. A clanging comes from inside the room, hitting an unnatural pitch that hurts my ears – I see Roger visibly wince and move toward him, but suddenly quite suddenly –

A figure emerges from the room – And, as one, Roger and I act.

Roger is in the air almost instantly, a snarl ripping from his throat as he leaps for the priest. I shout a command for our troops to surround, to contain

The priest's face is shocked, stunned as he spins towards us, as Roger's body collides with his, Roger's paws slamming into his shoulders and knocking the priest hard to the floor, holding him down in the slushy grey water –

I'm moving towards them, a shout on my lips, seeking to get behind the Priest to block the obvious direction of his exit should he seek to run – and as I move past him I see the moment his face changes from surprise and fear to fury, to menace, to a gleeful kind of hate.

I successfully block his exit, my own body tensed for any action, as Roger lowers his snarling face to the priest's, warning him with body if not with words to stay still-

But the priest bares his own teeth and angles his hand up, pointed towards Roger's chest, and then he says some archaic word –

And there is a blast of light, of heat, of fire that blinds me, makes me turn my head away for a split second before I hear a yelp of fear and pain. And as I snap my face back towards the priest I see Roger soaring upwards through the air, his back and shoulders slamming into the low sewer ceiling before gravity pulls him back down –

But the priest is fast –

Before Roger's body can fall back down on top of him the priest has twisted to the side and turns, predictably, towards me – away from the troops he can see ranging in the direction from which we came.

The priest freezes when he sees me there, waiting for him, a slow and terrible grin spreading across my face as I focus my attention on him, resisting the horrible temptation to look towards my brother, who I can see struggling to find his feet behind the priest –

“Let's try this again,” I growl as I focus on the priest's face, recognizing him instantly as the man we captured before – the one who was in my house during the attack on my child –

The priest feints left but doesn't fool me – I'm bigger than he is, far bigger, and have no reason to shift my position before he tries to get past me, which he does next. But as the priest goes right, seeking to slip by me and make a run for it, I grab his left arm and twist it up behind his back as I grab his right shoulder, working to incapacitate him.

It works, for a moment – before the priest growls another one of those arcane words and I feel a pulse of burning heat coming from his left hand, his wrist suddenly becoming white hot- way too hot for me to hold, lest my skin begin to melt

I roar at the pain and the frustration but hold on long enough to spin him around, pushing him hard towards the door emitting the yellow light instead of the long corridor – if we can get him in there, we can trap him –

The priest yells as he stumbles a few steps and then stops himself by grabbing the door frame. He sends a frantic glance over his shoulder towards us and then throws himself into the room, reaching for something-

“MOVE!” I roar to my troops, who have been waiting, tense, for precisely that order. And they do – quickly, my men spread out around the door, ready to trap him in. As they get in order, as I watch the first two of my troops enter the room to attempt to incapacitate the Priest, I also turn to Rodger, desperate to assess his condition.

As I turn to him, though, I see that he's already standing by my side, growling at the door, likewise assessing the situation in a flash. I reach out towards him, sniffing, smelling something strange, and as I lay my hand on his fur he looks up at me and I see that under his chin – his chest – his belly as well, likely – his skin is a mess of seared flesh.

"Christ, Roger," I breathe, starting to bend to look at him, but he snaps his teeth at me – clearly communicating to leave it, that he's all right.

"Okay," I say, making the quick decision to allow him to decide his limits for himself. "Just go easy, all ri-

But before I can finish my sentence, screams erupt from inside the room and Roger and I barrel forward, our bodies instantly alert.

When we get inside we see that almost all of our troops are pressing the priest back against the far wall where he hurls spell after spell at them – some landing against the bodies of my men, some spells dying in the air

But where they do land – My eyes go wide as I see the magic slicing, burning, ripping, tearing –

And then, on more instinct than anything else, I roar and transform into my wolf as I throw myself across the room, heading directly for him. My eyes shift to my wolf vision in an instant and focus on the priest's face just as he sees me coming, just as his eyes go wide-

And he opens his mouth, taking a deep breath, winding back his arm to throw something at me something big-

But I'm faster than him, faster than he thought I was. And my body slams into his just as the start of the spell falls from his lips – searing my skin but not cutting me down –

His head hits the wall, hard, and he groans, collapsing to the ground beneath me. In another flash I transform back into my body, whipping a knife from my side and pressing it tight against his throat.

"Submit," I growl, glaring down at him. But he just grins – grins up at me through his pain – and I notice, too late, his hand clenching in a sack of powder that spilled conveniently open at his side.

"Not a chance in hell," he snarls, "the master will have his boy!"

And then he whips his hand up – scattering the dust and saying a single word that lights the entire room on fire. I scream in pain, but my voice is barely audible –

I feel my body and my mind crushed under the screams of all of my men, and my brother, crying out along with me.

Chapter 348 – Triage

Ella

“It’s been too long,” I mutter, twisting my fingers together with my eyes fixed on the hard iron door of the bunker. I have one hand on Rafe’s little carrier as he sleeps peacefully beside the two uncomfortable chairs that Cora and I dragged down the hall, wanting to be as close to the entrance as possible so that we get news as soon as it comes.

“Ella,” Cora seethes through her teeth. “You have got to stop saying that. You’re making me freak out.”

“It’s not me that’s making you flip out,” I retort, angry. “It’s our idiot mates, who insisted on leaving here four hours ago and haven’t called once to let us know that they’re all right -”

But then, as if my words are magic, the door bangs open and Cora and I instantly leap up from our seats.

I gasp, almost breaking into tears when I see that the first figure through the door is my mate. I hurl myself towards Sinclair, intent on wrapping him in my arms, but I come to a skidding stop as I realize that he’s carrying one of his men, unconscious and bloody and

“Oh my god,” I gasp, my hands flying to my mouth as I stop and actually look at my mate. I notice the burns that have ripped through his clothes, leaving red welts across his exposed skin

Notice the horrible burned flesh of the man in his arms –

Sinclair’s eyes linger on me for half a longing second before moving sharply to my sister. “Cora,” he gasps, “help – it’s bad -”

She rushes to him in a moment, assessing the soldier, but Sinclair jerks him away, shaking his head. “No, Cora,” he insists, making her look up at him. “We need – we need space them-” all of

I gasp again, horrified now as I understand what my mate means, as I see my sister’s face go pale. But she snaps immediately into her professional demeanor, looking to me.

“Ella?” she snaps. “You’re my nurse now, all right?”

“Y-yes,” I hurry to agree, eager to help and reaching down to grab Rafe’s carrier and sling it over my right arm.

“Your largest room,” she demands, turning her attention back to Sinclair. Then she turns, pointing down the hall. “Go, now.”

As Sinclair begins to move, more of the men begin to stumble through the door. The hall is immediately filled with the sound of pain – moans, and groans, cries –

But to her credit, Cora doesn’t look back, storming forward, ready to get things prepared. I can’t help myself from turning towards the injured men who stumble through the door, my attention immediately going to the red-haired young man the one who spoke in the meeting, who noticed that my attackers didn’t shift as he falls hard against the wall, gasping.

I move to him immediately, working to sling his arm around my shoulder, taking as much of his weight as I can. Lean on me,” I demand, beginning to move forward as I feel his body shift hard against mine. It’s heavy, struggling under his weight, trying to also balance Rafe’s carrier against my other arm, hoping to hell that he doesn’t collapse against me and squish the baby when we both fall –

But we make it – following the men who can walk by themselves through the door into what looks more like a barracks than the small private bedroom that Sinclair and I have to ourselves. I look around swiftly and see my mate settling the man who cannot walk into a single bed and, seeing other men taking seats on bed and chairs around the room, I move the young man on my shoulder to the closest bed, holding steady while he takes his weight off of me and collapses there.

“Are you all right?” I ask, leaning over him, worried

“I’ll be fine,” he groans, waving a hand at me. “It hurts but it’s nothing bad – thank you, Luna,” he murmurs, leaning his head back against the pillow and squeezing his eyes tight in pain.

I nod to him, making a mental note to come check again soon, but I can’t help myself from moving swiftly away, holding my baby’s carrier in two hands now as I hurry over to my mate who is standing now, talking briskly to Cora.

“Are you all right?” I gasp, unable to stop myself from pressing myself up against him and raising a hand to touch his scorched cheek.

“I’m fine, Ella,” Sinclair assures me, turning his intense gaze to me for one long, lingering second, clearly relishing the sight of me before he turns his eyes to Rafe, who cries a little in his carrier. Sinclair lingers, looking at his son, for just for a moment before looking over to the door. "I'm sorry," he says, rushed, "I have to go help -"

"Of course," I say, touching Sinclair lightly on the arm and urging him forward.

But, quick, urgent, Cora stops Sinclair by grabbing his hand. He turns to her, torn, wanting to go and help his men but –

"Roger," she breathes, her eyes worried.

"He's fine," Sinclair replies, brisk, looking steadily into her eyes for a split second. "He's out helping some of the worst hurt get out of the cars -"

"Okay," Cora says, her voice shaking as she exhales a deep breath and stands for a moment with her eyes closed, collecting herself. "Okay."

And then, the moment passed, Cora's eyes fly open again and she's all business. She nods her chin towards the door, urging Sinclair forward, and he moves quickly away. Then she turns to me. "I need you to start moving clockwise around the room," she says, a calm efficiency setting over her. "You call out to me if anyone looks like they need me desperately – otherwise, you ask each man his name and what's wrong. Take notes," she says, looking around and then grabbing a pen and pad of paper off a little bookshelf.

"Okay," I exhale, and as I take the writing materials from her I realize that my hands are shaking.

"Hold it together, sis," Cora says quietly, stepping close to me for a moment and taking my face in her hands, looking at me steadily. "You've got this. All right?"

I nod to her, anxious, and then we both move at once, her left and me right, to begin to help.

Time passes in a flash as I move from man to man, asking each what they need, getting it for them if it's in my power but otherwise writing down what each man says before moving to the next. The only thing that interrupts my attention is Cora's brief cry – just once as Roger comes into the room. He, too, is carrying a soldier who cannot walk and Cora is at his side in a second.

There's a brief moment, after Roger gets the man to a bed, where Cora kisses him, pressing her body flush against his, but then it's done –

My sister is the doctor again, ready to care, to help –

And I'm so grateful for her in that moment that I can barely breathe. And as I look at Roger's face as he takes a second to watch her, I know that he feels precisely the same.

As I turn to the next man in my rotation, I feel a little hope swell in me, so glad that Roger and Cora found each other. Because the four of us, as a team? We can do this. I have so much faith that we can.

Chapter 349 – Aftermath

Cora

It's hours, hours later when I finally have a moment to step back and breathe. And when I do, I feel my head spin and stumble back a step or two. Roger is there, instantly, his hand on my back.

"Cora," he says, pulling me closer to him, tilting up my face so that he can study me. "Are you all right? You're – "

"I'm fine," I mutter, frustrated, trying to push away and get back to work. I have a moment to breathe, but honestly there's so much more that – needs to be done for these men –

"No," Roger says, stubborn. "You're pushing yourself too far – you're pregnant, Cora -"

"Roger," I sigh, turning to glare at him in earnest now and putting a hand on his chest. "This cannot be the refrain that I hear for the next nine – or six or however many months, all right? I am not going to stop doing my job-stop healing people – just because I'm pregnant."

I hear Roger begin to growl in protest but I lock my teeth together, staring up at him, hard. And, slowly, I see him start to relent, to remember the person who he chose as his mate.

"This is my life, Roger," I whisper, " my identity. I'm a doctor – I made an oath! I'm going to help them."

"All right," he replies, taking a step back. "But Cora, please -"

"I know," I say, nodding and starting to look around the room. "I'll be careful – I'll stop before I'm totally exhausted. I won't put myself or the baby at risk."

"And how close are you to exhaustion now?" he asks, looking me over from top to bottom, his eyes pausing on my stomach.

I take a moment to pause, closing my eyes and checking in with myself. Honestly, I'm not far off – but there's still so much that these men need. Honestly the extent of the burns that they came in with some of them down to the bone – I cringe to even think of it.

"Can I..." I hear Roger ask, and then when I look up at him again I feel him place his hand against my stomach.

"Okay," I breathe, nodding a little as I agree to stay still so he can check in on the baby.

Roger closes his eyes and concentrates and I'm a little sorry as I see that it's hard for him. I remember the way that Sinclair communicated with Rafe while Ella was pregnant it seemed...simpler.

Roger has much more connection with the baby when he's touching me and when he concentrates, but...I do wish it was easier for him. I want him to have the full fatherhood experience, with all of its blessings. And it breaks my heart that my body – my humanness has taken a little of that away from him.

"Baby's okay," Roger murmurs, opening his eyes and leaning forward to press his lips against my forehead. "Just...let's not push, all right?"

"Okay," I agree, nodding. And then I turn to him fully, peering at some of the red skin on his face. "How is your healing going?"

"Slow," he murmurs, his voice not much more than a growl. "Much slower than usual. Like whatever that priest did to hurt us like this had its own curse attached."

I nod, listening, and then turn my attention to Roger's forearms, which were the worst blistered. Slowly, I unwrap the bandage on one and he hisses at the pain of it. I get a brief glimpse of the skin below before I wrap him back up. "You're healing," I say, looking up at him, "but yes, the pace is ...worse than what I would have hoped for a werewolf. Especially one of your abilities."

"It will be all right," he sighs, I think being brave for me. As Roger puts a sweet, concerned hand on the side of my face, Ella comes over. "Cora," she whispers, glancing around the room. "What can I do?"

I turn to her, my poor tired sister, and open my arms out, inviting her in for a hug which she happily accepts. "How is Sinclair?" I ask, looking to the corner of the room where her mate naps lightly, Rafe secure in his arms even as he sleeps. Sinclair's burns were worse than Rogers, but likewise superficial compared to some that their men faced. Only the two men who waited outside of the sewer came out unscathed.

"I think he's all right," Ella replies when she pulls away from me. "More his pride hurt than anything, and he's frustrated," she says, giving a chagrined little smile to Roger. "I know you guys are disappointed that the priest got away."

"Such a missed opportunity," Roger murmurs, shaking his head. "And he burned all of his supplies on his way out, along with us, so we don't have much information from the misadventure either." He sighs, full of regret.

"Your dad seems to be optimistic about the interviews," I point out, nodding towards where Henry is rolling between the beds, speaking kindly to any of the men who are conscious and willing to report what they heard and saw. "He's sure you'll get something good out of it."

"Not enough to compensate our losses," Roger murmurs, looking around. "We are so... so lucky that everyone came out alive."

Alive, I think, but certainly not unscathed. Roger and Sinclair, I suspect, came out of the situation relatively unharmed because of their genetics. As with the size of their wolves, their access to some of the other wolf powers – increased sense of smell, quick reflexes, the ability to heal – are likewise amplified. I wonder if, really, that ability to heal is what saved them their bodies burned out their magic working to protect their skin and, because they have what can best be described as more magic, they came out with minor burns while some of the others...

I go a little pale as I look around and realize, again, that some of these men will bear these scars for life, and at least three will require major reconstructive surgery. As soon as possible.

And, as much as Roger won't want to hear it...there's really only one person who is best going to be able to perform those surgeries. I'm still wondering how best to bring this up when Ella produces the perfect lead-in for me.

"Cora," she says, wiping a hand across her brow. "Are you all right? Are you tired?" I fight my instinct to point out that Ella, as a nursing mother, has just as much at stake in her exhaustion as me, but instead I take up the thread.

"I can keep going for a little bit," I say, holding her gaze. She has been such a good, stalwart little nurse today honestly, I think she missed a bit of her calling in not going into that field. "But I'm not going to be able to keep going all night. And some of these men they're going to need extended care."

Ella bites her lip and nods, understanding, glancing between me and Roger. "What should we do?" she turns to Sinclair. "Should we wake him? Ask him if he has ideas?"

"No," I say, reaching out to take Ella's hand as she impulsively begins to move towards her mate. "Honestly, Ella," I say, and then I turn to Roger, because my words are actually addressed to him. "We need...more help. We need more hands."

Roger instantly sees the direction that my thoughts are heading in and his eyes go dark, narrowing at me. "No way in hell," he snaps, starting to shake his head. "Roger," I plead, moving close to him. "Don't make this about jealousy – we need him – "

"Need who?" Ella asks, confused.

“Hank,” I say, turning towards her and sighing. “We need Hank.”

Chapter 350 – New Plans

Coral

Roger gives a rough, sarcastic little laugh. “Jealousy? Jealousy? Cora, this has nothing to do with jealousy-

“Then what is it?” I ask, confused.” Honestly, Roger – if it’s not jealousy, then what else is your reason for not wanting Hank here to take over for me, and treat these men when I need to rest?” And Roger goes still, at a loss for words, because...

Ella starts to laugh suddenly, and then slaps a hand over her mouth. Roger growls and glares at her, but she just shakes her head in apology, still unable to help it.

“He’s not jealous,” I say to Ella defensively, choosing allegiance over truth and working hard to keep a smile off my face as I stand close to my man and slip an arm around his waist. Because I’m little pleased, honestly, to see Roger want me all to himself, to be protective enough that he doesn’t want Hank anywhere near me. “He’s just...” and I hesitate, smiling up at Roger, shaking my head because I don’t know what to say.

“What I am is done with the two of you,” Roger growls, peeling his arm from around my waist and glaring at the two of us. “Sisters,” he scoffs, and then points a finger between us. “I’ll stay up treating these men all damn night myself, if that’s what it takes,” he continues. “But no Hank in the bunker. Are we clear?”

“Yes, baby,” I murmur, moving close to him again and laughing a little as I wrap my arms around him again.” Whatever you say.”

“Damn right, whatever I say,” Roger mutters, his feathers still a little ruffled. And then, after a minute, he whispers to me again. “We’ll send them out,” he says, “as soon as Sinclair wakes up. The ones you want to have further treatment? I won’t stop them from getting it, just because I...don’t want him here.”

“Okay,” I whisper, resting my head against my mate’s chest and smiling softly. “That’s a good plan.”

Ella

We worked for hours more, to the point where I think that Cora was falling asleep on her feet. But I couldn’t leave her didn’t want to let the entire burden of healing all of the men who went on the mission on her shoulders.

We did send three out – Sinclair contacted Hank and arranged for the worst hurt to be transferred to the hospital once Cora got them stable enough to go, but there was still an incredible amount of work to do after that changing bandages, checking vitals, ensuring that everyone was fed and had water. We're lucky, really, that Sinclair foresaw this as a possibility and had the bunker stocked and ready with a great deal of medical supplies.

Eventually, it was Roger and Sinclair who told us to stop. I was leaning over a sleeping patient, trying to see if he was healing, when suddenly I felt a warm hand on my hip. I didn't jump – either because I had no more energy for it or because I knew who it was. I don't know which.

"Enough, Ella," came Sinclair's rumbling voice, and I turned to look up into his face, and then peer down at our baby curled against his chest. Rafe was awake, blinking at me with his sweet eyes.

"Hey baby," I murmured, reaching for my boy, and my mate passed Rafe to me easily before guiding me towards the door of the room. "But – " I said, looking over my shoulder for Cora – not wanting to leave her – but I saw Roger having a small conversation with her, his hands on her shoulders, convincing her, too, that it's time for bed.

"It's all right," I heard a voice call, and I turned, surprised, to see Henry at the door. "I'll stay up."

"But you've been up all day," I murmured as Sinclair and I crossed to him.

"I'm an old man, Ella," Henry said, smiling up at me and quirking his fingers so that I understood that he wanted like me to bend down so that he can see the baby. As I obliged him, Henry continued. "What time I have left in this world, I'd like to spend awake anyway. I don't want to miss anything." He brushed Rafe's cheek softly before smiling at me again. "Go to sleep – I'll wake you if anything happens and we need you."

"All right," I said, standing up straight and heaving a huge yawn. We started to pass through the door but Henry called after us. "Sleep well," he said, "but in the morning...we have to talk."

I hesitate, wanting to go back, wanting to ask why, but Sinclair put a firm hand on my shoulder. "Talk tomorrow," he says, exhausted. "Tonight? Sleep."

And I put my head on my poor wounded mate's shoulder and let him lead me away to our room. Now, in the cold light of morning, I wake before Sinclair and take a moment to look him over while he's sleeping. The burns on his body were restricted mostly to the skin that wasn't covered by clothing, and I quickly look over his face, arms, and hands, pleased to see that while there are some tender pink spots, the skin shiny and taut, he looks much better than he did yesterday.

I heave a sigh of relief and swing my feet off the bed to turn to Rafe, who is just beginning to fuss in his makeshift crib.

“Hello, little boy,” I murmur, bending over his cradle. I lift Rafe up into my arms, joy blooming in me as I consider him. He really is a good baby – he still wakes up in the night when he needs me, of course, but in the mornings he has this remarkable tendency of waking up just moments after I do. ” Are you using your little wolf senses?” I whisper to him, carrying him over to the bed and adjusting my shirt a little so that I can feed him, “are you giving mommy a break?”

He doesn't reply, of course, but as I sit down I feel Sinclair move his hand over a little to rest against my thigh, letting me know that he's awake, but not yet up. I smile at him, pleased and understanding, letting him have his minute of silence, and then I feed my baby, savoring the slow start to the morning.

Because, I know, it is going to be a very busy day. And, considering Henry's warning the night before, one in which we are going to get some news that we really don't like.

The peace of the morning doesn't last long. As I'm still feeding Rafe a knock comes at the door and, groaning, Sinclair gets up to answer it. A few hurried words there has him closing the door and crossing the room to our small bathroom, seeking a shower.

“Is everything okay?” I ask.

“Fine for now,” he says, “but Hank sent some reports from the hospital regarding how our men made it through the night.”

“Are they okay?” I ask in a whisper, anxious.

“They're stable,” Sinclair responds as he ducks into the bathroom, but I can tell by the tightness of his voice that it's not all as good as it could be. And suddenly my heart plummets for him as I realize how difficult it must be, ordering men to go into situations where they put their lives on the line. I sigh and finish up with the baby, grabbing a burp cloth to toss over my shoulder before I lift Rafe to my chest and begin to pat him on the back while I move to the bathroom door to peer in after my mate.

I can't help the little thrill that runs through me when I see Sinclair in the little glass and metal shower, the water running over his powerful, naked form. I know that it's inappropriate to be turned on by my mate at this moment but...well, I can't help it.

He turns, perhaps intuiting something – or maybe smelling my desire on the air- and smirks at me while he quickly runs the bar of soap over his body.

“You like what you see?” he asks.

"A little too much," I respond, precisely at the same moment that Rafe gives a little burp and spits up on my shoulder. We both laugh at his timing. But then I turn my eyes seriously back to Sinclair. "You'll tell me?" I ask, my voice soft. "How I can help you?"

And my mate meets my eyes seriously as he says, "I will. Thank you, Ella. For being so selfless. For always wanting to hello."

I smile a little and give him a wink. "It's not completely selfless," I reply with a little shrug as I turn away. "I was promised six more babies, after all. Gotta keep you happy until I get the last one, and then I'll be done with you."

"Six!?" he calls after me as I saunter away, making me laugh. "I thought we agreed on four!"

"Now it's eight!" I shout back, laying Rafe on his little changing table and starting to get him ready for the day, listening to Sinclair's groan from the other room.

"Daddy doesn't mean it," I whisper to the baby as I begin to change his diaper. "If your siblings are all as cute as you, we'll have twelve."

Rafe coos and chuckles as we hear Sinclair's shout from the bathroom.

"I heard that!"

Chapter 351 – Keeping it in the Family

Ella

I'm the last one to the conference room – baby stuff but when I come through the door I'm very surprised to see that it's just family gathering today.

"Where is everyone?" I ask, holding Rafe close to my chest so that he peers over my shoulder. He's a very curious baby – he likes to look around, even though he can't see much yet. I move over to the table where Cora, Roger, Henry, and Sinclair sit, all clearly waiting for me, all with faces which are ...drawn. Concerned. And turned on me.

"What," I breathe, freezing before I can sit down. "What's wrong? What is it?" "Sit, Ella," Henry says, waving to the open chair between him and Sinclair.

"No," I say, shaking my head, the word falling out of my mouth before I can even think. "No way this looks... this looks like bad news.'

And some part of me knows that I'm being ridiculous – that it won't be good news miraculously if I don't hear it but still. Fear stripes through me – I really, really can't handle more bad news now, not after the few days we've had. And not if it, apparently, all focuses on me.

"Ella, please," Sinclair says, looking at me with gentle eyes and pulling the empty chair out. "I promise it's not as bad as you think."

"Do you all know?" I ask, going rigid.

"Henry told us before you came in," Cora replies, leaning forward towards me across the table, Roger's hand on her back. "He just wanted us to be prepared, so that the focus could be on you when we told you.'

"Oh my god," I whisper, slowly moving to the chair and sitting down." Is it me?" I ask. "Did I did I do something?"

"Not at all," Henry says, shaking his head at me. "I'm sorry, Ella – – I may have gone about this in the wrong way. I didn't mean to frighten you. I just – it was convenient that you were last, so I told them first so that the focus could be on you now, as I believe that this news will affect you most."

"And where " I ask, looking around again for the members of the team who went on the mission yesterday. Some of them, I know, would be well enough to attend now, if they were wanted. " Where are the other researchers?" I ask, knowing that Henry has been working all day and night with his own team.

“This is...” Henry continues, hesitating, “a family matter, Ella. Those who don’t know will be briefed soon. But I wanted to talk about this together, with the main parties involved.” Henry’s eyes drift, now, to Rafe in my arms, and I go tense.

“Okay,” I say, drawing my lips together in a thin line. “Let’s get on with it then. What’s wrong?”

Henry looks towards Rafe now, nodding to him, apparently giving him permission to talk in some kind of pre-arranged pattern. This, contrary to what they wanted, somehow makes me more nervous, that they’ve rehearsed how to tell me this news.

Is this some kind of intervention or something? What did I do? Feeling my tension, the baby starts to fuss, and Sinclair takes him from me tucking Rafe into the crook of one elbow before draping his other arm warmly over my shoulders. I feel at once calmer, and start to wonder – ridiculously if Sinclair isn’t just the baby whisperer, but the Ella whisperer as well.

“Ella,” Roger starts, and I turn my entire focus to him. “Yesterday, when we were fighting the priest, he said something...strange.”

I don’t say anything, just clench my teeth and stare at him, willing him to continue Fast.

“We had him pinned – he only got to whatever...I don’t know, whatever magical powder allowed him to really fire bomb us, by accident, and when he realized that he was going to be able to use it – I think he slipped.”

“Slipped?” I ask, confused. “Like on ice?”

“No,” Roger replies, sighing a little at his inability to be clear. “I mean, slipped on his words. Messed up. Because he said: ‘the master will have his boy.’”

“The master will have his boy,” I repeat, glancing down at Rafe sitting contentedly curled in the crook of Sinclair’s arm. He’s gotten a hand free of his swaddle and is clenching it and opening it, apparently fascinated by the movement of his fingers. “Do you are we assuming that the boy is Rafe?”

“We are,” Henry confirms, drawing my eyes towards him.

“But the master,” I say – and as I talk, I know I should just shut up and listen, but I can’t help myself. “Did he mean – did the priest mean the God of Darkness?”

“That’s where it gets complicated,” Henry says carefully, speaking slowly and calmly and watching my face to make sure I’m following along. I’m grateful for it because even though I’m not stupid, I’m panicked enough now that my mind feels like it’s in three different places at once.

“You see,” Henry continues, “I had my team working all night trying to parse this phrase, trying to figure it out. And we’ve done a great deal of research, so far, on this Monastic Cult of the God of Darkness. And never, in any of our materials both from centuries ago and today – have we ever seen any of the priests or acolytes ever refer to the God himself as ‘master.’ Instead, he is always God, Father, Dark Majesty things like that.”

“Oh,” I say, my eyes going wide. I understand but I mean, I don’t get it. Not yet. Not in the same way that the rest of them do, apparently, judging by the worried looks on their faces as I look around the table. “What what does that mean?”

“It means,” Sinclair says, picking up the thread, and I turn my head to look sharply up at him. “That...there is someone else ordering all of this to happen. That they haven’t done this merely to serve their god, or at his orders but that, instead, there seems – to be someone else, a mortal to whom they are responding.”

“What?” I breathe, and then I groan, closing my eyes and leaning my head back. It was so much simpler when I thought it was just a situation like that between the Goddess and my birth mother Reina, just a person-to-diety contract that really involved the two of them the God and his priests. But now finding out that there’s someone else involved, who a powerful priest is calling master? Someone who is directing all of this fighting, who planned the insemination?

My family gives me a moment to process this and they’re all waiting for me when I sigh and open my eyes, looking around at them again. “Well?” I ask. “Do we know who it is?”

“We have...a lead,” Henry says quietly, and I turn my attention back to him. I keep my mouth shut now, though, exhausted by this already – just wanting to hear the news. “I’ve had some of our more clever men working through the dark web, trying to find any trace of the members of the modern cult. And while they were unable to trace precisely who was doing the talking, they were able to discover a sort of...hub. For the communications. A location to and from which a great number of the messages were being transported.”

“Oh?” I ask, encouraged. “Where?”

“It went to...” Henry hesitates here, taking a deep breath, as if he doesn’t know how to say it.

“Just tell her, dad,” Sinclair snaps, his voice irritated, probably because he can feel my tension coming to its breaking point down the bond.

“It is difficult for me,” Henry says, irritated himself now and shooting his son a little glare.

“As I am not...

detached from this development.” But he shifts his eyes to me, then. “Ella,” he continues, “the team did a great deal of reconnaissance on this location and I have to admit that I was shocked when they told me what they discovered. That the man living in the residence... I had long assumed that he was dead. Or at least, so separate from the world of influence and politics that he may as well have been. It is my fault,” he sighs, hanging his head, “for overlooking him.”

“Who?” I breathe, my whole body locked with tension, my breath coming short. “Who lives there?”

“His name is Xander,” Henry tells me, his voice grim. “He was...a Duke, when his brother – your father, Xavier – was King on the throne.”

Chapter 352 – Duke

Ella

“D-duke?” I stutter out, completely overwhelmed by the information, my eyes going wide. “There are dukes? And I had I have an uncle!?”

“I’m sorry,” Henry says, and I can see the guilt written all over his face. “I overlooked this – honestly, no one has heard from him in years – and, considering what we think he was actually getting up to, it makes a great deal of sense that he wanted everyone to believe that.”

“Who,” I say, frantic now, looking between Henry, and Sinclair, and Roger – Cora, I see, looking at me with worried eyes, but I know she doesn’t have any answers – “who is he?”

“Relax, Ella,” Sinclair murmurs to me, leaning close. “It’s all right -”

“It is absolutely not all right -” I snap, not wanting to be mean but completely panicked right now. “My father is dead but I have an uncle? Seriously? And no one told me?”

Henry continues to hang his head, shaking a little, and I instantly feel guilty. It’s not his fault – it’s so complicated, the politics, and why would he tell me about an uncle if he hadn’t spoken to the man in 30 years had genuinely assumed he was dead –

“I’m sorry, Henry,” I say quickly, leaning forward to put a hand on his arm. “I’m so sorry – I’m behaving so poorly – ”

“No, Ella,” Henry says, moving his attention back up to me. “Your reaction is absolutely correct. I have failed you in this.” His eyes shift to Sinclair now. And you, son.”

“We have to stop this,” Sinclair says, shaking his head. “Honestly, the blame game does no one any good. No one blames you, dad and Ella, you don’t have anything to apologize for. We all know this is a lot. So, can we please?” he says, pausing now to look around the table. “Can we continue? There is... more...”

I groan a little and give Henry’s arm a little squeeze to let him know I don’t blame him for any of it, and that I love him dearly and am grateful for him every day. At least, I hope he gets all that from a squeeze, but the little smile he sends me suggests that he understood at least part of that. And I feel instant relief.

“Xander was your father’s older brother, Ella,” Sinclair informs me briskly, I think a little irritated at the disruption and wanting all of the information on the table now so that we can decide to do something, instead of just talking about it. I smile at him a little, loving my all-action Alpha mate who is ready to go even though he almost got burned to a crisp yesterday.

“He was much older,” Henry says, “and there were always...rumors about whether or not his father was his biological father. Either way, Xander was recognized, but he was never the favored son. That is why Xavier – stronger, faster, smarter, better-liked – took the throne instead of Xander.”

“A stance which I actually think is quite clever,” Roger quips, and I’m shocked to find a smile on my mouth as he delicately raises his brows, looking up at the ceiling. “I mean, some of us think that the better-looking brother should always take the throne – ”

And while Sinclair growls and Cora elbows Roger not-too-gently in the stomach to get him to stop, I grin at my brother-in-law, grateful for the laugh which has drained some of my tension away. He gives me a little wink in response.

“Anyway,” Sinclair continues, glaring at his brother, “Xander was never a popular figure in politics – he was always fringe, always very much the King’s sullen brother rather than a real player. When Xavier died, Xander...he wasn’t even considered for the throne. No one said his name, not even him, as a potential heir.”

“Which,” Henry adds, “was perhaps... the mistake. That started all of this.”

“Started what?” I ask, confused again.

“Ella,” Henry says, taking my hand. “Nothing is for sure. But our best guess, at this point, is that...well, that Xander put this in motion. That he knew he was never a contender for the throne when his brother died but he coveted it anyway 1 that Xander wanted it, perhaps his whole life, and certainly after his brother died, but when no one mentioned him as a potential heir he started to devise a new plan to get what he wanted.”

“A longer plan,” I whisper, sitting back against my chair. “To – to reclaim the throne. To keep it...in his family’s line.”

And my eyes drift back to Rafe now, cooing gently in his father’s arms. My baby, the grandson of a King. The nephew of a Duke that, perhaps, always wanted to be in charge.

“It makes sense,” Roger says softly. “Honestly, it makes so much sense that we were fools not to consider it before now. Who benefits from Rafe being born? The man who intends to kidnap him and put him on the throne as a puppet, acting as regent for eighteen years before Rafe is old enough to rule himself.”

“I don’t think we’re fools to have overlooked Xander,” Sinclair rumbles beside me. “I haven't heard Xander's name since I was a child – I, too, thought he died in quiet obscurity. He's taken great pains, I think, to ensure that everyone assumed that he did. He is playing the long game – we're not total idiots for falling into the traps he's taken twenty years to lay. We're simply outplayed."

"So," I interrupt, still wanting more details. "Can you – I mean -" I exhale quickly, closing my eyes and gathering my thoughts, "is the assumption that we're making here that Xander wanted Rafe to be born so that he would be a legitimate heir to Xavier's throne? Is that it?"

"Yes," Sinclair says, confirming what I've pieced together. "We know that Reina told Xavier about you on his deathbed he must have found a way, somehow, to communicate your existence to his brother before, or directly after, his death – I don't know. A note, a letter perhaps."

"So why didn't he come for me?" I ask, brisk. "To be the heir?"

Sinclair and Roger hesitate, looking at each other. "Well," Sinclair says carefully, "your mother did a very good job hiding you at the orphanage, which actually emphasizes the story. She could have had you raised by a well-known human family, but she chose an orphanage to disguise you."

"But no," I say, looking at Cora. "They knew they knew we were there. Yes? The dark priests – if they were the ones who are looking to Xander for some reason as their master – they knew that Cora and I were in the orphanage. They followed us our whole lives! So..."

I draw my brows together, trying to figure it out. If Xander wanted an heir... why didn't he just come to get me?

"Ella," Sinclair says, tightening his arm around my shoulders. "Xavier and Xander they were deeply old-school Alphas. They come from a world where ." he hesitates again, looking down at the floor. My eyes flash as I figure out what he's not saying.

"Seriously?" I breathe. "Seriously, my uncle my blood family – left me in the orphanage because I was a girl? Because he didn't see me as a legitimate heir to the throne?"

Sinclair looks up at me with sad eyes. "That's our best guess for Ella," he now, says softly, shaking his head slowly at me. "That he contracted the priests – or perhaps was always aligned with them, and called to them to watch over you. But that he had no real interest in you as a person. Merely in..." he hesitates, his eyes drifting to my stomach.

"Oh," I say, my heart sinking – though I don't know why. I just – just can't imagine someone being so callous to a child, especially their niece... "I was always just...a broodmare to him..." I murmur, looking over at my baby.

"Rafe, a male heir, was always the goal," Sinclair agrees. "We think Xander bided his time, and then – when all of his pieces were in place – he ...arranged it all."

"But why," I ask, suddenly confused. "Why did he pick you as the father?"

Chapter 353 – A Prince of Two Thrones

Ella

“Um, excuse me,” Roger says, and Sinclair and I – mutually surprised snap our attention to him. “Obviously,” he says, pointing a slow hand between the air between him and his brother, “the question of why the Sinclair blood was desired is the only one with the clear answer – ”

“Oh my god, Roger,” Sinclair murmurs, leaning back in his chair and raising a hand to cover his face, exhausted.

“The quality of these genetics,” Roger continues, grinning, “I mean, who wouldn’t want these babies -”

“Not me, anymore,” Cora quips, folding her arms over her chest and smirking at Roger with a raised brow. “Baby for sale! Highest bidder!”

“You’re worth millions,” Roger whispers towards Cora’s stomach, leaning his head low to pretend to speak to the baby. “Don’t let them undersell you -”

“Enough,” Sinclair snaps, though he does it half-heartedly. I can’t help but laugh a little, and honestly, when I consider it, I can’t disagree. I look at the proof still curled up in Sinclair’s arms.

“We did make a stone-cold cutie,” I say, leaning over to run a fond finger down my baby’s belly. “If mean Uncle Xandy was going for good looks, he certainly picked the right stud.”

Sinclair pulls his hand away from his face and shakes his head a little at me, as if he can’t believe that I, too, am making jokes at this time. But I smile up at him and shrug one shoulder. If we can’t laugh, what the hell are we doing in this life? And then I send a little pulse of love down the bond, letting Sinclair know that I appreciate him and am taking it seriously.

I just also need...well, a little bit of lightness, sometimes, to balance all of the horrible things that have happened on the way to bringing our wonderful baby into the world. Sinclair nods, understanding, and sends me his own pulse of love right back.

“Our best guess,” Henry says, softly bringing this conversation back on track, “is that Xander...he never meant for Dominic to ever know that you were pregnant, Ella. It was by chance that Dominic was in the clinic that day – that he sensed the child in you. A wonderful mistake for us, considering the result, but very bad luck for him.”

“God,” I breathe, looking over at my mate and my baby. “I can’t imagine...if I had just gone through this thinking I was a human, giving birth to a twelve- pound baby before six months had passed...and then, so soon after that, someone coming to steal him away..."

"I would have found you," Sinclair promises me, reaching out to brush his knuckles against my cheek. "There's no way I wouldn't have. This was meant to be. The Goddess had her hand in it as well."

"I know," I say, believing him. "But... if that was Xander's plan..."

"Yes," he agrees. "It would have been ...awful."

"But really," Cora says, sitting forward. "Beyond the desire for genetically blessed, gorgeous kids," she says, smirking at her mate, "what is the rationale for choosing a powerful werewolf like Sinclair?" she asks. "I mean, why not any other wolf? Why not," she hesitates, looking to the man at her side, "well, why not Roger? Same genetic package..."

"I think," Henry says, interrupting Roger, who opens his mouth to say something smart but closes it when his father sends a little look his way, "that Xander was working towards a dual claim to the throne. That Xander was betting that Dominic would beat Damon and take the throne next, and that if Xander were able to kidnap and raise a child who had not only Xavier's blood, but Dominic's as well..."

"It would be very hard to contest," I finish, fascinated by the depths to which my uncle had – apparently – thought this through. "A child of two thrones, uniting them..."

"Indeed," Henry agrees, nodding his head a little. He then looks at Sinclair, a little apologetic. "I wouldn't be surprised, Dominic, if he even had a hand in your inability to have children with Lydia. I don't know quite how he would have managed that, but clearly you are capable of fathering children..." he shrugs, sighing a little at the mystery of it. "It would have fallen quite neatly into his plans for you to take the throne without any biological heirs of your own."

"God," I say, slumping back in my chair, shaking my head in wonder. "He really thought of everything, didn't he?"

Around the table my family nods in confirmation, but Henry holds out a hesitant hand. "It is important," he says, moving his gaze to each of us in turn, "that we all realize that this is a theoretical explanation. We only have a very little bit of evidence that Xander is himself involved. And while I admit that the story that we can spin out from these details is compelling..."

"It's just a story," I finish for him, nodding, understanding. I look around. "Do you think we'll be able to get more evidence for it?"

"We'll try," Sinclair says with a little shrug. "Especially now that we know where Xander is located, we can refocus our attacks from his priests to him, under the theory that he is, indeed, the master that the priest spoke of."

My stomach twists a little at this. "I imagine," I say softly, "that the master would be...well guarded."

"Yes," Roger confirms, steadily holding my gaze. "We need to be better prepared. But unfortunately, we also need to move fast."

"Why?" I ask, suddenly tense. The last thing I want – in all of the world – is for Roger and Sinclair to go darting out of the bunker again, getting themselves killed.

"Not immediately, Ella," Sinclair says, working hard to put me at ease. We have a few days. But in order to find this information..." he shifts his eyes to his father now, letting him take over.

"In order to find traces of information on the dark web, Ella," Henry explains, "one must, unfortunately, leave their own traces. We were careful, our tracks were faint but," he shrugs, "there is every possibility that Xander could himself discover that we know where he is. And that he may be involved. And if he does..." Henry shrugs.

"We lose any advantage," Sinclair finishes. "He could disappear, and regroup elsewhere."

I sigh, turning my head and focusing on my child, letting Rafe center me and root me to the world. He, after all, is the most important thing here, in my whole life. "All right," I say softly, reaching out a hand to softly brush my son's dark hair. "Please, just tell me how I can help."

"We can't do anything," Cora says, her voice firm, "until we get your men back into shape. And that will take a few days. Ella," she says, and I turn to her, surprised. "I could use your help. You were a wonderful nurse yesterday. And Hank will be sending our soldiers back at some point – we'll need to be able to continue their care here."

"Of course," I say, agreeing without thinking. If Cora needs me by her side, then that's where I'll be. She nods firmly at me and I smile, glad that I can be of assistance.

"Good," Henry says, nodding and pressing his hands together, forming a triangle with his fingers. "While you're doing that, we will come up with a plan regarding our next steps."

I nod, starting to stand up, getting ready to move on when Henry puts out a hand to stop me. Confused, I settle back into my chair, looking towards him.

“Before we break up,” Henry says quietly, “there is one last issue which we must discuss.”

We're all silent before Cora, unable to help it, breaks the silence. “What is it?” she asks, worried and confused. Henry turns his gaze sternly, but not without apology, to her. “We have to discuss the problem...that is Dr. Hank.”

Chapter 354 – The Problem

Ella

Cora blinks rapidly in disbelief and my own mouth falls open. I see Roger go tense in his chair and feel Sinclair do the same beside me.

“Wha- what?” Cora asks, aghast, leaning forward to stare more closely at Henry. “The problem that is HankJ; FJA Hank? What the hell kind of problem is Hank?”

I grimace a little when I see her get defensive and dart my eyes to Roger, seeing him rankle at it, just a little bit. Roger, I know, is jealous of Hank – not very jealous, not in a bad way. Just...as much as he doesn't blame Cora for her previous hesitations, or hold them against her...

...well, he's not going to be thrilled about Cora's ex's continued presence in our lives, is he? Especially when he sees Cora defend Hank like that..

“Please, Cora,” Henry says, putting a peaceful hand out towards her. “Just... hear me out.”

“What is wrong with Hank,” she insists, continuing to be angry, which just upsets Roger more. I glance at Sinclair, worried. His face is a mirror of my own.

“Please” Henry says again, leaning forward and staring at Cora only at Cora intensely. “I mean no insult. I just want to...discuss.”

Slowly, not giving in yet, Cora leans back against her chair and crosses her arms over her chest again, not happy about it but willing to listen.

“I am just concerned,” Henry continues, “about this man's continued connection to this family.”

“Damn straight,” Roger mutters, his face turned down towards the table. Cora shoots Roger a dirty look he pretends he doesn't see.

“Why?” I ask, confused. “He's he's our doctor – he did such a good job caring for Rafe -”

“Yes,” Henry says, turning to me and holding my eyes. “He did a very good job taking care of Rafe. He was at your beck and call. He was very conveniently available when you were hurt after the temple and worked incredibly hard to keep you and Rafe alive beyond the point when other doctors would have given up.”

Henry stops there, staring at me, letting me figure it out. “No,” Cora says, breaking in and shaking her head vehemently. “Henry, you’re wrong-”

“Oh my god,” I whisper, a frightened hand going to my mouth. “Do you seriously think...”

“This is ridiculous!” Cora cries, but Henry speaks as if he didn’t hear her.

“We know that the Cult is incredibly good at infiltrating lives,” Henry says to me and to Sinclair. “We also know that they tend to place their people in high-powered positions – lawyers, bankers, doctors. We also know that Xander, if he is behind this, is very content to play the long game.”

“Christ,” Sinclair mutters, and I turn to see him again covering his face with his hand. “How did we not see this coming-”

“Because it didn’t happen!” Cora cries, standing up now. “Hank is not part of this – he – he’s my colleague! We work together!”

“At a clinic that we built, Cora,” Roger points out, clearly working hard to keep his temper even. “At a clinic that we pay for. This man is...very suddenly very involved in our lives. Dad has a good point

“You’re all ridiculous,” Cora growls, shaking her head around at all of us.” Hank is a good person who has only done wonderful things for this family. I know him. I know that he only has good things in his heart, and wants to help, and to bring wolf and human culture together.” She pauses, furious, glaring around at all of us. “And now you all owe him an apology for doubting him for a single second.”

I nod, understanding, and feeling sorry because Cora has a point. Henry does too we need to be careful, especially because we know that the Cult has a history of deploying sleeper agents. But Hank himself? He hasn’t given us a single reason to doubt him.

But Henry, Sinclair, and Roger don’t nod along with me. Instead, they just quietly look away from Cora, not saying the words that echo in the back of my mind as well.

That Cora...she might just not want to believe bad things about Hank because she got so close to him. That if he tricked all of us, then he tricked her the most. And that would be a horrible thing to realize.

“You’re all ridiculous,” Cora growls, and when I look up at her I see that she intuits what we’re all thinking. Without another word Cora seals her mouth shut and strides from the room, slamming the door shut behind her. Roger gets to his feet to follow but I hold up a hand.

“Let her go,” I advise, sighing. “Just... let her cool off. It’s...harder for her to hear than for us. All right?”

“Why does she even care,” he growls, and I can almost feel the jealousy radiating from him.

“He’s her ex, Roger,” I say softly, “but ...they didn’t have a bad breakup like I did with Mike. If anything, she’s the bad guy in this situation who cheated on him and got knocked up.” I slowly shake my head at my brother-in-law as I watch his jaw drop when he considers the situation from Hank’s side. “Cora doesn’t hate him,” I say softly. “And you can’t ask her to.”

I see Roger clench his jaw as he processes my words, and then turns away from us with a sigh, raising both hands to twist his fingers frustratedly in his hair.

“I’ll handle it,” Sinclair says softly to me, gently offering Rafe to me so that he can stand and go to his brother. I take the baby and watch my mate slowly walk over to Roger to say a few words, or talk it through, or just be there with him while Roger processes his emotions. And I’m suddenly very glad, again, for my steady mate who cares so deeply for those he loves.

“Are you all right, Ella?” Henry asks softly beside me.

“I am,” I say, turning to him and heaving a big sigh. “I...it was a lot of news, wasn’t it?” I ask and Henry raises his eyebrows as he nods, communicating that he thinks that’s a bit of an understatement. “But I’ll get through it,” I say, sure of it. “We all will, because we have each other.”

“That’s the spirit,” Henry says, reaching out to pat my hand. And then he leans forward further to look at little Rafe. “See the trouble you’ve caused, grandson?” he says to the baby, teasing him. Rafe lets out a little squeal that sounds like a protest, making us both laugh.

“He’s no trouble,” I coo, smiling at my baby and wrinkling my nose at him as well. “That’s everyone else’s job. Rafe is just here to be our perfect little prince,” I sigh.

“Truer words,” Henry says softly, shaking his head a little as he watches his grandchild. “A prince he is. And some day, a king.”

“Goddess willing,” I murmur, shaking my head at the idea. Rafe’s future – on days like this, it feels so far away, like there are so many obstacles ahead of him. But I steel myself, knowing that it’s my job to work through those for him.

Because my little boy deserves the world, and I will give it to him. And anyone who stands in my way had better watch the hell out.

Chapter 355 – Gone too Far

Ella

I find Cora, a little later, in the long room that we've turned into a hospital, working hard probably to distract herself. I grimace, a little, when I see that her bedside manner has certainly suffered in the wake of her frustration she's snapping at patients, glaring at them when they take too long to answer, and stalking from bed to bed. As I come into the room the men look towards me with desperate eyes.

I hold up my free hand – Rafe bundled in my other arm – to the men, letting them know that I'll handle it, and then I walk calmly over to my sister's side.

"Hey Cora," I say casually, looking down at the clipboard in her hand on which she's writing in her messy doctor's scrawl. Cora doesn't respond, just glares at me and turns her attention back to the clipboard.

I scoff a little at her and bump my shoulder against hers, a little pissed off now. "Why don't we try that again, Cora," I say, through my teeth a little. "Hello, Cora. How are you?"

"I'm not speaking to you, Ella," Cora snaps, shaking her head and continuing to write. "Or my stupid mate, or yours. Or their dad."

"What about Rafe," I ask, adjusting the baby so that she can see him more clearly.

Cora flicks her eyes to Rafe, who looks up at her with his big sweet eyes, and she hesitates a little. "Rafe is fine," she mutters, "he did not betray me. Unlike the rest of you."

"Plus he's cute," I say, grinning down at him. But Cora scoffs and turns away, angry that I am ignoring her point: that we betrayed her by accusing Hank.

"Cora!" I sigh, calling after her and then hurrying to keep up. "Listen, I'm sorry I really am! You know I like Hank I like him a lot! I was very team Hank for a minute there, and I was the only one! But we have to be vigilant about this, and you know that Henry had some good points!"

She whirls on me then. "You think that he could seriously fool me, Ella?" she asks, folding her arms across her chest, holding the clipboard close against her. "Do you seriously think I have such a bad taste in men that I would honestly sleep with someone who was trying to kidnap my nephew?"

Out of the corner of my eye I see the wounded man in the bed closest to use flinch, his eyes going wide with awkward surprise. But I do my best to ignore him and keep this between me and my sister.

“No, Cora,” I say, reaching out and putting a hand on her arm to assure her but also to keep her from running away from me again. “Seriously I don’t think that Hank did anything! I just think that Henry has a point – that we need to double-check everything before we trust people! I mean, they wouldn’t even let me call you when we first got the anonymous note that someone was going to try to take Rafe!

They’re just being vigilant!” Cora scowls, looking away from me but clearly seeing my point. “Well, that was bullshit too,” she murmurs.

“Which I told them!” I say, taking my hand away and beginning to bounce Rafe a little bit, who is getting agitated now, probably because of my frustration. “But they checked anyway! Honestly, Cora,” I say, taking a deep breath and trying to bring all of our energy back down to a reasonable level, “what’s the harm in letting them be careful, in letting them check? Hank is going to come out of it clean. So, what does it hurt?”

“It hurts me, Ella,” Cora says quietly, looking into my face for the first time. “I already hurt Hank – and he did nothing wrong. And now he has people hurling these accusations at him, which he totally doesn’t deserve! He’s my colleague, and my friend – and a good person! And I’m vouching for him, and nobody believes me!”

I step closer to my sister now, my heart hurting to see her feeling this way, to hear her voice get all squeaky with emotion.

“I’m sorry,” I whisper to her, putting my arm around my sister and pulling her close. “I’m sorry, Cora. I won’t doubt you again. Okay? Forgive me.”

“There’s nothing to forgive,” she sighs, giving me a squeeze and then pulling away as she wipes at her eyes. “You’re just – just trying to protect your baby.” And I see her unconsciously move the clipboard lower on her body, her hand moving to her stomach.

“That’s right,” I say, turning my head to look down at the baby. “He’s been very troublesome since he’s been born. Look what you’ve done now, baby!” I joke, trying to bring a little levity to the situation. “Your simple existence has inspired a war that has resulted in accusations that have hurt your auntie’s feelings! You apologize, now!” And then I hold Rafe up towards Cora, as if he could actually utter a formal apology.

Rafe, suddenly surprised at the change in his position, lets out a little squeak of surprise, which makes Cora laugh. She shakes her head, smiling now, and reaches for the baby, taking him from my hands. “Nooo, not my nephew,” she says, cradling him against her arm and smiling down at him. “Don’t listen to her, Rafe, it’s not your fault.”

And I grin as my baby wrinkles his little face and sighs, honestly as if a grave injustice has been done to him, and we both laugh again.

“Okay,” Cora says, sighing and looking up at me. “Thanks, Ella,” she whispers. “I think... I think you snapped me out of it a bit.”

“Good,” I say, reaching to take the baby back. “Roger will be glad to hear it. And so will all of your poor patients.” “What?” she asks, and then she looks around the room to see that all of them are staring at us and have been listening to every word we said. “Oh my god,” she mutters, putting her head in her hand and laughing.

“It’s okay,” I say, grinning and putting a hand on her back. “Now that they’re fairly sure you won’t murder them for taking too long reporting their symptoms, I think we’ll make good progress!”

Cora gives me a little glare but she moves on from it, lifting the clipboard again and looking over its contents. “I have so much to do,” she murmurs, flipping through some of the papers. They need a lot of care -”

“Can I help?” I ask, eager to pitch in. Cora looks up at me and blinks. “You want to play nurse again?”

“Sure!” I say, a little excited. “Just give me a minute to give Rafe to Sinclair, all right? Then you will have my full attention.”

Cora smiles at me then and nods. “It would be a big help, Ella,” she replies. “If you can spare the time.”

“For you, sister?” I say, giving her a wink as I turn away. “I’ll make the time.”

Chapter 356 – Long Days

Ella

Cora wasn't kidding when she said that there was a lot to do for the wounded men. Honestly, I underestimated her – or she's a much faster and better worker for me, because I fall into bed at the end of each day totally wiped, asleep before Sinclair can even say goodnight to me.

The boys are busy too and I feel a little sorry for Cora and Roger, honestly. They should be living in a newly-mated newly-pregnant love bubble right now, and instead she's spending all day healing while he's trapped in a boardroom with his brother and his father, trying to figure out how to defeat my estranged uncle.

"How can you feel sorry for them," Sinclair says to me when I take a break to feed Rafe. He comes to spend these little stolen moments with me, knowing that they're some of the only moments I'll be able to sit and concentrate on something else for a few minutes. "It's not like you and I got to enjoy any kind of love bubble."

"Yes we did," I say, frowning at him. " Dominic, we had so much sex in those first few months when we discovered I was pregnant -"

"Sure," he says, a little sarcastic as he draws his brows together. "Between me accusing you of stealing my sperm, and then the constant attacks, and then having to flee the country – yeah, totally had a peaceful little love bubble somewhere in there."

I laugh as I consider it, shaking my head and looking down at my sweet hungry baby. "I don't know," I say, giving a little shrug. "It was all wonderful to me. But maybe I just forget all the horrible parts as some side effect of pregnancy – like how mothers have to forget the pain of birth, or else they'd never do it again."

Sinclair moves closer to me, putting an arm around me to let me and Rafe lean close against his broad, muscled chest. "Or," he murmurs, "it could be that the pleasure was just so good that it completely overshadowed the pain

"Oh yes," I murmur back, smirking a little. "Clearly, Dominic, the sex is so good that I barely remember my nearly -fatal injuries

He laughs now, shaking his head, and we both shrug it off, knowing that it doesn't matter. That we wouldn't trade any of what we went through for something different. Because it's worth it all of it is worth it.

And I keep that idea in my heart as I spend hour after hour trailing behind Cora, tending to the poor men who were willing to sacrifice their health in the effort to save my little boy. The hours feel endless – changing bandages, administering medicine, checking in with the men to see how they're recovering –

Honestly, I'm shocked by it, a little bit – especially the idea that Cora deemed three men too far beyond her ability to care for and sent them away. Because, honestly, some of these men seem to be doing pretty poorly – it baffles me to consider that there are some who were even worse.

“Should we send some of these men to Hank, Cora?” I ask late one afternoon, wiping the sweat from my brow. “Can we – can we really handle this?”

“We should keep them here, Ella,” Cora says quietly, “unless they need critical care. Hank – and all the other hospitals – they're totally overwhelmed as it is with the aftermath of the war. These men- they're on the mend, if not slowly. And Roger and Sinclair brought in enough medicine to keep us going. I know it looks bad but,” she sighs, looking around the room at all the men we're helping. “They'll get through it.”

“Should it be taking this long?” I whisper, concerned. “Roger and Sinclair...”

She nods, biting her lip, understanding me. “I don't know. I'm used to our mates' fast healing too but Ella, they're both pretty remarkable, powerful specimens.”

“I heal fast too, though,” I murmur.

“Yah,” she says, rolling her eyes at me a little. “Probably the goddess blood in you,” “Your blood too,” I murmur, poking her in the shoulder.

She nods, letting it pass, but she does look over the men with some concern. It does seem to be taking longer than I'd expect it to as well...” she sighs, looking down at her battered clipboard as if it holds the answers. “Maybe there was something in the spell designed to inhibit the healing...”

“If only we all had a little bit of the goddess blood,” I murmur, looking around. “It seems unfair.” Cora looks up suddenly and blinks, turning to me.

“What?” I ask, turning to her as well.

“Actually,” she says, cocking her head a bit. “Well, can you, Ella?”

“Huh?” I ask again, totally confused.

“It goes back to something Hank said once,” Cora says, suddenly excited. “On the night when he came over to my -” she hesitates for a moment, place – and blushes a little, and I suddenly know precisely the night she means. I grin at her and she swats a hand at me, moving on.

“Seriously – he asked me if I thought that you might want to go into the medical field. So that you could, maybe, use our mom’s gift to heal people – ”

“Oh,” I say, my eyebrows raising in surprise. And then I look down at myself, a little ridiculously, as if I could see the gift floating around in my chest or something. Then I frown, wondering.

“Do you think you could do it?” Cora asks, excited and a little breathless. “I don’t know,” I say, snapping my head up to look at her. “I mean, I’ve only used it to heal myself. Do you think it can go...outward?”

“Well, we know it can go outward- you gave it to me, and then I used it to to do whatever I did. I don’t know. communicate to everyone.”

“Yeah,” I say, frowning a little, “but was that a healing?” Cora just shrugs, staring at me, and then we both laugh because we both feel a little stupid trying to figure this out.

“Honestly,” I murmur, “mom could have given us like, a little instructions pamphlet, couldn’t she?”

“Not her style,” Cora sighs, shaking her head. “But Ella...what do you think? Does it feel like you could?”

“I don’t know,” I wonder, my hands pressing to my chest where I can feel the constant, steady, warm glow of it – so familiar that I frequently forget it’s there. “But maybe we should try?”

“Okay!” Cora says, excited, and then she starts flipping through her paperwork, trying to think through which of the injured men might be the best candidate to get to work on. But as Cora begins to narrow down our selection, I feel my wolf nudge me a little with her nose, trying to get my attention.

What? I ask, curious, but feeling a little of her anxiety and suspicion start to bleed through into my own feelings. What’s wrong?

Not right, not right, she says, narrowing her eyes a little and turning in a tight circle around the gift, protective and wary. Why is that man asking questions about our gift? It’s our gift. It’s not his gift. He can’t have it.

I blink in surprise at the thought, but suddenly I’m wondering it myself. What was Hank doing asking Cora questions about my gift when they were on a date?

Was he just being a good medical health professional and identifying an incredible power that could be harnessed for the good of many, instead of being hogged by me?

Or was he asking for...other reasons? And is my wolf only suspicious now because Henry put the idea in our heads that we should be wary of Hank? Or is the act of asking suspicious in itself?

Cora whips her head up then, grinning at me with excitement as she points towards one of the men across the room. "This one is perfect," she breathes, and then hurries off towards his bed, signaling me to follow.

I hurry after her, eager to help – and suddenly a wave of guilt runs through me. Didn't I just promise Cora that I'd trust her instincts about Hank?

But still, my little wolf continues to prowl, and I honestly don't know where this suspicion comes from. Is it just me being paranoid, and turning that paranoia on a good man?

Or is Hank asking weird questions to the woman he knew was least likely to suspect him of getting up to anything strange?

Chapter 357 – Healing

Ella

I push my suspicions aside as I come to Cora's side as she explains to Conner – the bright, red-haired young man who noticed that the men who attacked me didn't transform into their wolves – our plan.

"Sure," he says, blinking up at both of us when Cora asks if he'd be willing to let me try to heal him with the Goddess power. "Um," he says next, hesitating a little, "does it hurt?"

"Um," I reply, rubbing an anxious hand up and down my arm, "I don't think so? But then again, I've only tried it on myself?" I look over at Cora to see if she has any ideas, but she just shrugs.

"Consider it a very experimental treatment," Cora says, turning back to Conner. "But I think Ella is right – it never seemed to hurt her before, when she used it. Or that one time I used it. But if it works!" she gives him a big smile now, "I think you will be a very happy little guinea pig!"

"Guinea pig?" he asks, confused. "Will I is this going to transform me into a guinea pig?"

"No," I say, laughing and sitting down on the edge of his bed, reaching for his arm, which he pulls away from me in sudden anxiety. "Seriously!" I say, laughing still. "That's just a common phrase – you don't know it? Maybe it's a human phrase. For like, a creature who gets experimented on first."

"Oh," Conner says, relaxing a little but still looking at us warily. But then he nods, letting us know that he's on board. "Just a lot of strange...magic, I guess, these days. Magic that I don't think we've had a lot of exposure to before."

"You're telling me," Cora murmurs, checking some final details as she runs a hand over her stomach, which is hosting what we can best describe as the first human-wolf hybrid pup ever conceived.

Conner doesn't get it, but I do, and I give her a bright grin, which she returns. "Okay!" she says. "Conner, can we try it on the burn on your arm?" she asks, pointing to the gauze on his right forearm. "I think that's a minor enough wound that it could be a good place to experiment."

"Okay," he says, moving to unwrap it. I lean eagerly forward, but regret it immediately when he pulls the gauze away, wincing as he reveals an angry, wet red wound. I sit back again, grimacing at it, reminded again of why I didn't become a nurse. But then I steel myself and sit closer, looking up at Cora. "How do I start?"

She just shrugs at me, as lost as I am. "I don't know, Ella," she says, waving a vague hand at me. "Do your... meditation thing. Access the gift. Or whatever."

"Okay," I agree with a little shrug. And then because it feels strange not to be doing anything to engage with the wound, I reach out and hover my hands over Conner's arm as I close my eyes.

It's easier to fall into the state than it has been before – maybe because I'm not wounded, or growing a child, or stressed in any real way. This time, the relaxation comes almost immediately and I find myself sinking quite deeply into that space where the light behind my eyes turns a light lavender.

"You've got it, Ella," Cora whispers next to me, and I can tell that she's excited but working hard not to distract me too much. "You're glowing. Now, do you feel like you can direct it?"

I take another deep breath and, when I exhale, I begin to seek for pain. I feel the gift move then, as it's done before – it sweeps through me first, seeking to heal anything, but when it doesn't find anything it...pulses a little, curious, almost wondering why I've called on it.

And so I give it a little push, asking it to look...further than me. To go outside. And it feels, a very little bit, like the time that I passed it to Cora – though it's hard to compare, because I had been so weak at that time.

But now, when I'm strong, I feel like I have so much more control – like I don't have to shove the entire gift into someone's hands before I collapse under the weight of it. But instead, like I can just take a piece of it, and move it forward to where –

To where I can begin to feel a very real pain in front of me, radiating up towards my hands. And so I give it a little nudge, and push the gift towards it, and I feel it flowing from my hands.

Next to me, I hear Cora gasp, and Conner inhale sharply, but I do my very best to not let myself be drawn away, to continue with my steady little push until I feel...

Until I feel the pain beneath my hands cool, and ebb, and steady. Until I can't feel it at all. And then I pull my hands back, and lay them in my lap, and take a few deep breaths as I allow the lavender light to fade behind my eyes. And then I open my eyes and look around.

And Cora and Conner are staring at me, their jaws wide open. "Did it work?" I breathe, curious. And neither say a word, so I dart my eyes downward at Conner's arm-

And my own mouth falls open.

His wound it's...

It's gone. I blink, shocked, and lean forward, grabbing his arm – which makes poor Conner jump – so that I can bring it closer to my eyes. And as I study it I realize that the wound is not gone it's just...fixed. The skin has closed over what was a few moments before a pussy, bloody burn. And it's not as if the magic has unmade the wound and returned the arm to its former state –

It really, honestly looks as if it just healed it. On Conner's arm is a new patch of flesh, still tender and pink and hairless, without any of the freckles that cover the rest of his arm.

"Oh my god," I breathe, staring at it, and then up at Cora, and then over at Conner.

And when I see the bright smile on his face, the tears in his eyes, I burst into joyful laughter myself, hardly able to believe it. And then Cora lets out a shriek of joy and throws herself on top of me in a crazy hug, knocking me back against the bed and poor Conner's legs as she, too, laughs with joy.

"It's a miracle!" she shouts, so excited she stumbles over the words. "It's incredible! Ella! Think of what you could do!"

"I know!" I yell, giddy with excitement for it and hugging my sister close to me. Then men in the room are all turned towards us now, even those at the far side of the room who probably had no idea what we were trying –

And, as they figure it out- that they could start feeling better so soon if I'm able to keep doing this smiles spread across their own faces.

"Are you okay?" I ask Conner when Cora lets me sit up straighter, our arms still wrapped excitedly around each other. "Did it hurt – does it hurt?"

"It's fine," he says, holding his arm up in front of his face and marveling at it. "It didn't hurt at all – I mean, it was tingly – and a little cold – but it's amazing – it's totally fixed!"

"Ahh!" I yell, excited, and I squeeze Cora closer in my excitement.

"Thank you," Conner breathes, and my heart squeezes when I see tears start to streak down his face. "Thank you so much, Luna," he says, shaking his head. at me in wonder.

"I'm so glad," I say, reaching out and squeezing his hand. "So glad, Conner."

And I bite my lip and smile at him, and he smiles back, and then suddenly I'm jumping to my feet almost spilling 1 Cora to the floor –

“What!” Cora shouts, laughing. “Ella, what are you -”

“I'm going to tell Sinclair!” I shout, dashing towards the door. “I'll be back!” I call over my shoulder to her, to all of them. “I'll be right back!”

And I can barely contain my excitement as I sprint down the hall towards the conference room, where I know the boys are working hard, trying to come up with a plan.

Chapter 358 – Careful, Trouble

Sinclair

Everyone's head snaps up and towards the door as we hear the footsteps pounding down the hall towards the closed door of the conference room. I can feel the aggression fill the air – almost smell it, even as all around me hackles raise and teeth are bared at the sudden noise at what sounds like an assailant –

Next to me, Roger begins to raise from his seat, his eyes fixed on the door, ready to attack whatever comes through –

But instantly I grab his collar, shoving him back down into his seat. “Down!” I order, my voice ringing out with Alpha command, and heads instantly turn to me, obedient but confused-

But I just shake my head a little bit, my eyes fixed on the door. Because I know those footsteps, know their cadence. Only Ella would barrel heedlessly towards a room of wary male wolves who can't see or smell their attacker –

But I barely have time to heave half a sigh before she bursts through the door, shouting “Dominic!”

Everyone in the room jumps to the feet, but I'm already halfway across the room to her, grabbing her out of the air as she leaps up at me, catching her in my arms and turning to snarl at my men, warning them to contain themselves –

But Ella, true to form, doesn't even notice the fact that she scared the hell out of all of us that she almost got herself torn to ribbons –

Instead, she barrels heedlessly forth in her excitement. “Dominic!” she says again, laughing, grabbing my face in her hands and turning it towards her. “It's a miracle! I did it! You have to come and see! I'm going to do it again! I'm going to fix them all!”

“Ella,” I growl, patting down my own Alpha instincts and trying, simultaneously, to listen to her and look towards my men to ensure that no one is doing anything stupid in their panic –

“Come on!” she says, wiggling wildly in her struggle to get out of my arms. You have to come and see! Bring the baby! We'll show him too!”

“What?” I ask, turning my attention back to her once I've assessed that my men are not on the edge of an attack, despite her heedless burst into the room. “What are you talking about?”

“Put me down!” she orders, laughing and still struggling in my arms. I blink, trying to process what’s happening, but I obey, putting her back down on her feet. She instantly dashes away to where Rafe is sleeping in his carrier on the floor, grabbing it by the handle and then running back to me, snatching up my hand and working to pull me along with her.

“Come on!” she calls again, her glee and energy infectious despite the fact that she hadn’t even looked around the room to see if she’s disturbed us, let alone figured out how much –

I glance at Roger and my dad to see them laughing a little and shaking their heads, and then I sigh and let Ella pull me from the room, figuring that the risk is gone and she is clearly not going to let whatever this is rest until she tells me what she’s discovered-

“Ella,” I say as she pulls me out of the room, leaning back a little to put my weight in my heels to slow her. “Where are we going what happened?”

“I did it!” she says, looking over her shoulder at me gleefully and pulling harder at my hand. “You have to come and see! It’s amazing!”

“Ella!” I say again, harsher now, stopping completely but not letting go of her hand so that she’s obliged, against her will, to turn back and frown at me. “Slow down for a second! Just explain! Please!”

And, seeing my real confusion, Ella shakes her head, laughs again, and then turns fully to me to explain. “Cora had an idea!” she says. “Actually, Hank did! But that’s not important!”

I frown, suddenly, at the mention of his name. But she barrels onward and I let her. “I used my mother’s gift and I healed someone, Dominic!” she says, beaming up at me. “It was so easy! I just ...accessed the gift! And nudged it towards his wound! And he’s fixed! And I can do it again, and again, and I can fix all of them!”

My mouth drops open as I listen and I figure out what she’s saying. “What?” I gasp, my eyes going wide. “Are you are you serious, Ella?” I ask, looking sharply down the hall towards the little makeshift medical center we set up. If she’s serious – if she can use the Goddess’ gift to heal the men – it could change everything –

“Yes!” she says, laughing again and coming close to me, pressing herself against me and looking up warmly into my face. “I did it!”

“Miracle,” I murmur, shaking my head as I look down at her, marveling at my little mate. “You’re a miracle, trouble.”

"I know," she says, wrinkling her nose at me and then laughing. But suddenly she's moving again, tugging me down the hall. "Come on! I want you to see it!"

The next few minutes are as amazing as she suggested that they would be. Some of what Ella does is familiar – I've seen her access the gift before, after all, and heal herself. But seeing the glow spread from her body to another's? Seeing a terrible, disfiguring wound knit itself together before my eyes in mere moments?

I'm breathless with amazement by the time she opens her eyes again and grins at me.

"See?" she whispers up at me. "Isn't it cool?" I stare at her a little, amazed again by her powers of understatement, but all I can do is shake my head in wonder.

"The possibilities," Cora says, eagerly flipping through her papers and looking around at the men to decide who should be next. "They're remarkable – I mean, clearly you can do this with fresh wounds, Ella, but can you do it with disease? Could you seek and destroy cancerous cells? Could you

Ella gasps with excitement and anticipation at the possibilities, jumping up to talk more with her sister, but I go pale when I consider the extent of this.

Because if Ella's access to her mother's gift makes her able to heal not only wounds, but other things as well? And people find out about it?

I grit my teeth and narrow my eyes at all of the people who I know, already, would see her as a valuable target.

While my sweet, generous mate can only see this newly-discovered power for the possibilities it offers to bring life and happiness to suffering people....

I know that the world is filled with people far worse than she. Who will see to take her, and keep her, and use her for their own ends.

And as I consider this consider how I'd rip them all to shreds – my eyes drift to my baby boy, still sleeping in his carrier despite the racket his mother is making. I can't help but smirk a little at him, realizing that he has perhaps already learned to simply cope with some of his mother's extremes rather than objecting to them.

But beyond that joy my child gives me, beyond the love I feel for him, the worry of what his life holds twists in me. Because the Goddess's blood runs through his veins as well. What if he has access to this kind of power? To even half of it?

If he does, people are going to come for him too. They've already started – but more will come. And I will protect them both until the end of me – but will it be enough?

Chapter 359 – Necessary Rest

Ella

I heal for hours that afternoon, long into the night. I stop and take breaks of course for dinner, to feed and spend a little time with Rafe, to consult with Cora about our next steps – but then I'm back to it. Talking to the men to see what hurts worst, accessing the gift, holding out my hands to fix them.

It's incredible how much I get done, how much healing I perform as the day passes. By the time Sinclair puts his hands on my shoulders, proud but stern, I feel as if half of the room of terribly wounded men has been healed completely and the others are well on their way.

"Enough, trouble," Sinclair murmurs to me and I gasp and twist to look up at him. "What?" I ask, confused. "But there's so much more "

"Enough," he says, shaking his head at me. "It's ten o'clock – "

"What?" I gasp, truly surprised. I had no idea that the time had passed so quickly. I honestly thought it was earlier –

"Please," he says softly, low enough so that only I can hear. "Stop now, Ella. They'll all survive the night. They'll make it till morning, when you can start again."

I stop, trying to listen to him, but as I look around the room I feel so guilty. How can I let these men to go sleep in pain? How can I possibly curl up in my own bed, comfortable with my mate and my baby, knowing they won't be able to sleep because they got hurt trying to protect my son? When if I just pushed a little further I could heal them –

"That's it," Sinclair snaps, perhaps sensing my guilt and anxiety, and before I can protest further he scoops me up in his arms, shaking his head down at me.

"Dominic!" I protest, frowning up at him. "Put me down! I'm not even tired yet! I can-

"Ella," he says, his voice still stern, you have done enough for one day. And you don't know what toll this gift takes on your body or if it takes a toll on = itself. Does it need to regenerate? Do you need to sleep for three days to build back your strength?"

I hesitate now, realizing that he has a point. We have no idea how this works, if there will be a cost to me. Honestly, considering that, I'm surprised he let me work as long as I did.

"Moderation, little mate," he murmurs to me, turning me towards the door where Cora waits with little Rafe curled up in her arms.

“We’ll start again tomorrow,” Cora says, smiling at me and handing me my baby even though I’m still held lightly in Sinclair’s arms. “You did amazing today, Ella!” And I grin at her, happy to see that her own face reflects my excitement. The things we could do with this power

But Sinclair just nods to Cora and carries me from the room, even as I call goodbyes and goodnights to the men still laying in their beds. He doesn’t put me down, in fact, until we get to our little metal bedroom door – and then I think he only does so because neither of us have a free hand to turn the doorknob.

“In,” he urges once the door is open, pressing a hand to the small of my back and ushering me inside. I do as he says, cooing down to Rafe, who burbles sleepily in my arms. As soon as I get the baby ready for bed and down in his cradle, Sinclair takes my hand and directs me again, this time towards the bathroom.

“So bossy tonight,” I laugh, letting him guide me, and he shoots me a little glaring smile over his shoulder as he brings me into the bathroom. He doesn’t turn the lights on and I’m glad he doesn’t the bathroom only has horrible florescent light bulbs. Instead, Sinclair just turns on the shower in the dark and begins to strip himself down. And then, once he’s finished, he peels off my clothes piece by piece and nudges me towards the shower.

I take his suggestion silently, stepping into the steaming water and taking a deep breath. Sinclair follows, wrapping his arms around me and letting me rest against him as I let the hot water do its work, letting it relax me, letting me realize how tired I really am.

“How do you feel?” Sinclair murmurs, his voice barely audible above the pounding of the water.

“Tired,” I sigh in reply, winding my arms around him, enjoying the press of his wet skin against mine. “You were right. I – I’m more tired than I thought I was.”

“Is it bad?” he asks, going a little tense beside me. “Do we need to -”

“No,” I interrupt, shaking my head. “It’s a good tired – like after a busy day. But you’re right – my adrenaline was running me. It’s it’s good. To take a minute.”

Sinclair murmurs his affirmation, which rumbles warm in his chest, and then moves away from me for a minute to get some supplies. And then, to my delight and surprise, my mate begins to soap my body down, his movements soft but efficient.

“It’s incredible what you can do, Ella,” Sinclair says as he works the soap over my back. “But we have to be careful with it. Both for any tolls it takes on your body and...”

I open my eyes now, turning towards him. “And?” I ask, confused. “And what?”

“Ella,” he sighs, looking down at me. I’m worried that...well, that if people find out what you can do...”

“Oh,” I say, my eyes going wide. And I look towards the door, to where our baby is asleep in the next room. I want, quite suddenly, to have my eyes on him again. “You think that...”

“I think that if everyone knew what you could do,” Sinclair confirms gently, that people would want to direct you to use the gift how they see fit. By force, if necessary.”

My face falls, then, as I realize that he’s right. At the disappointment that I feel, that some would see this gift as a point of control instead of for the ways that it could help. My heart sinks, suddenly – with exhaustion, with disappointment, with wanting, terribly, for things to just be better – for things to be right –

“It’s all right,” Sinclair whispers, pulling me against him again, and I close my eyes and take a deep breath, trying to believe him. “It will be all right.”

“So, we’ll keep it a secret,” I say quietly after a few moments. “Not forever, though, yes?” I ask, looking up at him. “Sinclair – I can’t I can’t keep this to – myself forever, not if it can help people. I can’t live like that.”

“I know, love,” he murmurs to me, looking down into my face in the dim light. “But until we have more control...”

I nod, agreeing. “Until we have more control.” Sinclair watches me carefully when we get up the next morning, as I change and feed Rafe and get the day started.

“I feel fine!” I say to him, smiling and laughing, knowing that he’s waiting for me to collapse or something.

“And the gift?” he asks as he stands from the bed, still wary. “Does it feel...I don’t know. Intact?”

I take a moment to pause, closing my eyes and checking in on myself. “It feels,” I say, considering, truly trying to assess. Then I open my eyes and shrug at him. “Honestly, Dominic, it feels like it always has. I don’t feel like any of it has been lost in the effort to heal the men, if that’s what you’re asking. I don’t think it works like that.”

“How do you think it works?” Sinclair asks, moving to the little table that holds our clothes and starting to get dressed for the day.

"I think the gift is an expression of the Goddess' love," I say, picking Rafe up from the little table we've designated as his changing table once he's ready to go. "I think it's limitless."

"Interesting," Sinclair murmurs, pulling a shirt over his head. He opens his mouth to say more, but suddenly there's a knock at the door. Frowning a little, Sinclair moves over to it and pulls it open, revealing Henry there, his face serious.

"Hello, Henry," I call, moving over and turning Rafe in my arms so that grandfather and grandson can say good morning. Henry can't help the smile that comes to his face when he sees Rafe, but it's short lived.

"Good morning, Ella, Dominic," he says. "Would you be so kind as to come to the conference room? We have much to discuss."

"Oh," I say, looking up at Sinclair. "I was going to go to the medical room – "

"I understand that you are doing important work there, Ella," Henry says, leaning forward to catch my attention again. "I won't keep you for long. But please – it is important. Roger and Cora are already there."

"We'll be there," Sinclair says, nodding quickly to his dad. "Just a minute, to finish getting dressed. All right?"

Henry nods and rolls his chair away, heading back to the conference room, as I look up at Sinclair in wonder.

What on earth could be happening now?

Chapter 360 – Conference

Ella

When Sinclair and I come into the conference room hand-in-hand, the baby wrapped up and held in my other arm, my eyes go wide to see everyone waiting there. I want, immediately, to ask if this is a confrontation again – like the last time, when they all gathered first to decide how to tell me that I have an evil uncle who is trying to steal my kid.

But as Sinclair closes the door behind us, Henry sees the anxiety on my face. “It is just chance, Ella,” Henry tells me evenly, “that you are last here. I promise you that. Blame the baby – you need more time in the mornings than the rest of us.”

I exhale quickly in relief and then mockingly glare down at the baby, earning a few laughs from the assembled company. I smile around at everyone and realize that it looks like the entire team has been assembled. I’m particularly pleased to see that a few of the men I healed yesterday are here. It makes my heart soar to think that they’re well enough to join in, rather than being restricted their beds.

Before I can say anything, though, Sinclair tugs at my hand, leading me around to the empty chair next to Cora who gives me a bright smile and leans over to say good morning to Rafe – before he moves to his own spot at the center of the table, next to his father and his brother.

“Thank you,” Henry says when Sinclair nods to him to let him know that he’s ready. Then, he looks around at our assembled group, who all look to him with curious eyes.

“There have been some developments,” Henry begins, “both internally and externally. To begin, Ella and Cora have found a way to speed the healing of our men who were injured during our first mission.” He nods to us here, and I’m curious about his language. Henry came to see me work yesterday, and was as impressed as the rest of us. But I note that his language is vague enough now to suggest that the healing is moving faster, but not how.

Obviously some of the men in the room know how I did it – they were there – but it appears as if Henry is keeping the news of my gift as secret as he can, even amongst our own people. I don’t know how I feel about that – but there’s no time to truly consider it as he moves on.

“This is lucky news,” Henry continues, “as it means that we may be able to launch another assault faster than we thought possible, with our men again fully able. And unfortunately, it seems as if this must be necessary.”

I feel the anxiety rise in me at this news and I look sideways at Cora to see that her expression is the same as mine – a little pale, worried. Neither of us want our mates out there again anytime soon not after we saw that one single priest could do.

I turn my attention back to the men and see Sinclair looking steadily at his father, nodding to him, encouraging him to explain his analysis.

“We have more evidence now than we did before,” Henry continues, “that Xander, brother to the dead king Xavier, is indeed the main force behind the kidnapping attempts on my grandson. This comes especially from our discovery that the doctor whom Ella had been seeing for fertility treatments previous to her switch to Cora’s sperm bank, was, indeed, connected to Xander. Ella’s previous physician is in fact the child of the man who had long served Xander and Xavier’s family as personal physician.”

“Oh,” I can’t help myself from saying, and then I raise my hand to my lips, sorry to have interrupted. But I’m surprised – I mean, I knew that that doctor had pointed me in the wrong direction but to hear that I had an uncle who set it all up...

I shake my head, considering that this betrayal has been in the works for such a long time.

Beside me, my sister reaches out to take my hand, giving me a little squeeze of support. I turn to her and smile a little, grateful for her, before turning to look down at my little baby. I mean, no one wanted him to be born as much as me, but to think that my uncle had been planning it for so long...

“Yes,” Henry says, watching me from his spot down the table. “I apologize, Ella, if the news comes as a shock. But the connection is too stark for it to be a coincidence. My advice, now that we know and now that we are closer to having a full force of men – is to move as swiftly as we can, while we can still have some advantage in the situation. To the best of our intel, Xander does not yet know that we know he was involved – that he is the “master” to which this priest referred. It would be to our benefit to attack while we still have this advantage.”

Apparently finished, Henry sits back in his seat. Debate breaks out here, but I only turn half an ear to it, spending my time instead staring down at my little boy. I hear Roger ask some important questions like where Xander is now, and how well defended.

Sinclair counters Henry’s plan by suggesting that we may be better off waiting until Xander knows that we know it is him – rattling him, as Xander has never been a notoriously brave character, especially considering that he’s played all of his cards from the safety of his own home rather than boldly going out to take control of the situation himself.

“So much depends on you, little baby,” I murmur to Rafe as the conversation continues. And I sigh a little anxious sigh as I watch my baby look around the busy room, his eyes – I know – not really understanding anything, but alert and interested anyway. I clench my teeth then, hating it. Hating that this man I’ve never met is putting such pressure on my little child.

Rafe is just a baby – a perfect, innocent little soul. And yet he is already being figured as a figurehead behind which my uncle can hide, as a political pawn that someone else can use to gain power. It horrifies me to consider that Rafe was created as a reaction, in some ways, to my mate’s powerful ascension to the throne: as a way to combine royal blood with powerful blood, to create a ruler to whom no one could reasonably object.

But really, really?

This is my child, created by me, carried by me, loved by me. And it fills me with a very real rage that there are people in this world who view him as a bargaining chip rather than the wonderful, loved miracle he is.

That rage is burning deep within me as I raise my head and realize that the room has gone silent and everyone has turned to me. I don’t have it in me to apologize for not listening, though. Instead, I just look at Sinclair, knowing that he will understand.

“It is your uncle, Ella,” Sinclair says quietly. “Your blood. We will take him out fast tonight, if we can. We think it is best. But we won’t do it without your assent.”

It barely takes a moment – a single blink for me to decide.

“Do it,” I say, my voice cold. “Tear his throat out. But before you do, tell him that I wanted him dead. That I ordered it done. Please.” And then I stand up and look down to Cora. “We have work to do, yes?”

Cora grins at me, proud and a little vicious herself, as she stands up and takes my hand.

I then look towards Sinclair, who gives me a deep nod, agreeing. And then, as one, Cora and I leave the room, heading towards our makeshift little medical suite to continue healing the men, to get them ready for the fight which I know is coming soon.

As the door begins to close behind us, I hear Henry’s words.

“All right. Let’s get started on a plan of attack.”

Chapter 361 – Secret Hours

Coral

Ella and I work the rest of the morning, me making the big decisions about who needs the most medical care next and taking Rafe from her when she's working. I watch every time she heals someone, unable to tear my eyes away from it. And while I thought I would be jealous – honestly, my sister is doing better work than I ever have as a doctor – I can only feel thrilled that we have this incredible tool in our hands.

Especially, especially considering that Roger came to tell me a few hours ago that they plan to attack tonight. That he and Sinclair are, again, going to put their lives on the line to stop this horrible man who wants to hurt our family.

Just the bare idea that Ella can help if they come home in pieces....

I close my eyes for a moment – Rafe sleeping in my arms while Ella settles down and starts talking with her next patient – dismissing the thought. Because if I start to think about what could happen tonight...

I'll never be able to let him go. I feel a warm presence beside me as my eyes are closed and smile a little, because I know immediately who it is. And I'm gratified to find that I was right when I open my eyes and see my beautiful mate standing there next to me, smiling down into my face.

"Hello, gorgeous," Roger says softly.

"Are you talking to me?" I ask, "or the baby?"

"Well," Roger says, looking down and pretending to consider little sleeping Rafe, "I mean he's cute, but I'm not sure I'd go so far as to say gorgeous.

I laugh a little, shaking my head, but Roger just smiles at me again and raises a hand to my cheek. "How are you holding up?"

"Oh it's all easy for me," I say, turning towards him with a grin and nodding towards Ella. "She does all the work."

He laughs a little and we both turn towards her then, watching the miracle get started. "Can you take a break?" he whispers, not wanting to disturb. "When this one is done?"

"Why?" I whisper back, confused, but not taking my eyes away. "Do you need something?"

"No," he replies with a little shrug. Just...a lull. I wanted a moment to check in with you before we start getting ready to go.”

My stomach twists a little at his words but I nod, reaching out to take his hand. A break will be good.

When Ella finishes with her current patient we quickly consult about the plan to take a short break to talk to our mates and she agrees eagerly, taking the baby and hurrying out of the room to find Sinclair. Roger takes my hand and we follow after her, heading towards our own shabby little barracks room to take a minute to ourselves.

He doesn't bother to turn the light on when we enter our room, instead just closing the door and leading me over to the bed. I'm pleased by this – pleased that I want what he wants in this moment, which is just a quiet minute alone with him. Roger lays down first and then I lay my body close next to his, putting my head on his chest and letting my arm trail over his body, holding him close.

“How's the baby?” I murmur, wanting to know. Roger takes a deep breath and, even though I can't see him, I know that he's closing his eyes, concentrating on his bond with the baby and assessing how the little bean is doing.

“Baby's doing good,” he sighs happily, pulling me close to him. Then, with a little chagrin that makes me laugh, he continues. “I think this baby is going to be a workhorse like you. It's getting all sorts of messages from you that busy means happy. You're a bad influence.”

I laugh and this, giving him a little smack on the chest. “What,” I ask, “do you want the baby to be lazy like you?”

“To begin,” he counters, and I can almost feel him shoot me a little glare, “I am not lazy. I merely...prioritize and enjoy my down time. You could benefit from some lazy in your life, Cora.” He begins to run a hand slowly across my shoulders now. “I could make it worth your while,” he murmurs suggestively.

I laugh a little and snuggle closer to him, feeling my spirit renew after even a few quiet moments alone with him. “I think you might be right, Roger,” I start – but my words are cut off when he gasps.

“What?” he asks dramatically, “one of the Reina sisters, admitting that a Sinclair is right?!”

I laugh again and snuggle closer. Don't tease me,” I murmur, “or I won't do it again.” He laughs and relents, letting me continue. “But yes,” I sigh. ” I think that I have in my life thrown myself into my work as a way to feel like I was...doing something. Being productive. Being useful. But I think...” I hesitate now, trying to put my thoughts together.

"I think this little baby is going to have enough of that as it is," I sigh.

"What do you mean?" Roger asks worried but interested.

"Well," I consider. "I mean – Rafe was conceived because a man wanted him to be born – because he has royal blood, and goddess blood, and Sinclair blood. And while our baby was...more spontaneous," I say, smirking a little at the memory of how our child was conceived, "I can't help but think, Roger, that..."

"That something was conspiring to get us together," he sighs, nodding. "That we were kind of forced off the road by an insane storm the day you were ovulating."

"Yeah," I sigh, hugging him tighter now, a little afraid. "And..."

"What?" he asks, encouraging.

"Well," I whisper, "I was thinking about...Ella, today. Watching her access our mother's gift. And then I was holding Rafe the whole time. And Roger ...I think that Xander wanted Rafe to be conceived mostly because of his royal blood – but I think what has been underestimated here is the fact that Rafe is the grandson of a goddess. And our child will be too. What if these children have access to the same kind of gift that Ella has..."

"Do you have the gift?" Roger asks, curious.

"I can wield it," I point out, "when Ella passes it to me."

"Why didn't you guys get two?" he asks. "I don't know," I say, frowning. "Maybe one was enough. Or...maybe because Ella asked for it when we were out in the desert."

"Do you want it?" he asks, quiet. "If you were to ask your mother for your own gift... would you want that?"

"I don't know," I whisper, truly trying to weigh the question. "Because on one hand it would be wonderful to do what Ella does with the gift – to save live likes that? But also... if it means that the baby would inherit such a thing..."

"That kind of pressure," he murmurs.

"And that kind of target," I add, shaking my head. "I don't know. I just don't know, Roger."

"Well," he says quietly, and I can feel him turn towards me, scootching down on the bed so that our faces are close together now. "Why don't we go to your mom and ask?"

Chapter 362 – Farewell

Cora

“What?” I ask, laughing a little, thinking that he’s kidding. “What are you talking about?”

“Go see your mom,” Roger continues, giving a little shrug. “Like we did with Ella, in the desert. Honestly, I think it was kind of rude of your mom at that moment to focus all on Ella and pretend that she wasn’t your mom too

“Roger,” I sigh, shaking my head. “You can’t call a goddess rude. We were on a mission and honestly, Ella went there to speak with her mother. I didn’t know – and I wasn’t ready. She’s a goddess you have to assume that she does things on her own time. For her own reasons.”

“I don’t know why you’re being so nice about it,” Roger growls, a little perturbed. “If I were you I’d be mad.”

“Yes, baby,” I murmur, “but you’re always mad.” This earns a little laugh from him, but I continue after a moment. “It’s hard to explain it,” I say quietly. “But when I held the gift – when I gave it to the world...Roger, I felt her love for me then. It was very rich and very real. She doesn’t love Ella more than she loves me. She’s just waiting for me to be ready.”

“Well?” he asks, nudging me with his nose. “Are you ready?”

I laugh a little, again thinking that he’s not serious.

“Really, Cora,” Roger urges, pulling back a little. “I think we should do it. We have all of these questions – about you, about the baby, about her and her plans for you. Why not? When this is all cleaned up when we have a minute to spare, let’s go on a little pilgrimage to one of your mother’s temples, like we did when we went to go find Reina. Let’s go...have a chat.”

I stop laughing when I consider it – consider if I want it.

“Plus,” he adds, tracing a finger over the soft skin between my shoulder and neck. “We can ask what will happen if I give you my mark. Because my damn wolf won’t shut up about it.”

I laugh, pleased. “What does he say?”

“He says, ‘bite her! Now!’” Roger murmurs, frustrated, and I laugh harder now to hear it, considering that it must be difficult having a wolf interrupting your thoughts all the time.

“And he says it at the most frustrating times,” Roger continues. “Like when we’re just having dinner – like I’m going to jump across the table and grab you or something. Or when you’re just walking down the hall and I happen to glance at your ass. Or when you’re asleep –

“When I’m asleep!?” I gasp, laughing. Roger do not bite me in my sleep-

“I won’t,” he growls, shaking his head. “But it’s seriously annoying – he wants you to have it.” And then his voice shifts a little in tone. “I want you to have it, Cora. I want the baby to feel it too.”

“I want it,” I sigh, reaching out to stroke his face. “I do.” And then I nod, decided, as my hand goes to my stomach and I think about the baby and all the things we need to know. “All right,” I whisper. “We’ll do it. When we’re able to get back to a more normal life, when this is all fixed? We’ll go see my mom.”

“Really put the screws to her,” Roger murmurs, and I can feel his smirk. “Ask her what the hell is going on with this mark, and this crazy hybrid baby. And why those priests were following you as well as Ella your whole life.”

“Okay, well, let’s not go that far,” I laugh, shaking my head. “Honestly, Roger only you would have the idea to ‘put the screws’ to a Goddess.”

“Anyone who messes with my mate,” he growls, a little territorial but also a little kidding, “has to go through me.’

“Okay, puppy,” I murmur, patting him on the head and smiling. “Calm down.”

Roger snarls and shakes my hand away. “Call me puppy again,” he warns, shifting his body again so that he looms over me. “And I’ll put the screws to you, little mate.”

“Awwww,” I say, cooing mockingly. “Lil puppy get mad? Not like his new name?”

Roger growls again, snapping his teeth at me, and then he presses his lips to mine in a fierce kiss, determined to teach me a lesson.

Ella

After Sinclair and I take an hour or two alone with Rafe, we part ways so that he can get himself and his troops ready and I can go back to the medical room to continue healing. I’m on my way there, Rafe’s little carrier in my hands, when I spy Cora in the kitchen making a cup of tea. And suddenly, that’s precisely what I want.

“Hey,” I say, breezing into the room and lifting Rafe’s carrier up onto the counter. “Can you make me a cup as well?"

"Sure, sis," Cora says, giving me a little smile. And, sensing something, I lean closer to her, sniffing the air around her.

"Ohhhh," I say, my face breaking into a wide grin. "Someone had a nice afternoon with their mate."

Cora snaps her head to me, shocked, and then she bursts out laughing before giving me a little push. "Ew, Ella! If you can smell that on me, please do us all the favor of pretending you don't."

"Why?" I say, leaning on the counter and rocking Rafe's carrier a little in an attempt to lull him to sleep – it's time for him to take a nap, and he's almost there, I can tell. "I'm glad you and Roger are finding such a good connection. I'm not embarrassed by it."

"Well," she sighs, but I can still see a smile on her face, "please remember that your sister is human and not as crass as you wolf folks."

"You mean more of a prude," I say, laughing at her but letting it drop. She laughs along with me, shaking her head as she pours boiling water into two mugs. Then she stirs a tea bag into each and turns to me while they steep.

"How are you feeling?" she asks, looking me up and down. "Nervous about tonight?"

"Obviously," I murmur. And then, my eyes flicking to the side to ensure we're alone, I take a step closer. "Honestly, Cora, I was thinking about going along

"What?!" she gasps.

"I could do it!" I say, grabbing her hand. "I could just like, sneak into a trunk as they're pulling away! And you know I would be useful – I could be on hand to heal them as they went! I could save lives – "

"Don't be ridiculous, Ella," Cora scoffs, frowning at me and pulling her hand away. "Sinclair would kill you and even if he didn't, someone else would! You would ruin it, because there's no way he'd let you stay – he'd make everyone turn around to drive you home!"

"He would not!" I protest. "He wouldn't give up the element of surprise! He'd be forced to _"

"Really, Ella?" Cora says, leaning against the counter and raising an eyebrow at me. "That's your plan? To make your mate choose between your safety and having the element of surprise on your enemy?"

I scowl, realizing that she's right – that all I'd be doing horrible position. putting him in a

Then I sigh, giving up the plan for good. "I just hate feeling helpless," I say, looking down at the floor and shaking my head. "Especially as we know now that I can be such a big help."

"I get it, Ellie," Cora says, taking a step towards me to wrap me in a hug. "I really do. That's why I wanted to go last time – for the same reasons."

We both look at each other for a long moment then, and I'm so selfishly pleased, suddenly, that my sister and Roger found each other. Because now we each have someone who truly understands the other.

Because certainly no one else in the world right now knows the pain of sending your mate off on what could realistically be a mission with a death sentence.

But what's the alternative?

In so many ways, I feel continually backed into a corner by this whole process. Like as every day passes I am being forced closer and closer to having to make a choice between the two people I love most.

Who do you choose to survive? The universe seems to be asking me. Your mate or your child?

Chapter 363 – Trouble, Trouble, Trouble

Ella

Cora and I stand silently in the garage of the bunker, watching our mates pack their cars in preparation for their assault. Rafe is in my arms, fussing unhappily, and Henry has rolled his chair up on Cora's other side, likewise watching tensely.

"It will be finished tonight," Henry says, nodding confidently. "I know it. The boys will finish this."

"I hope you are right, Henry," I sigh. "I don't know how much longer I can keep sending him off like this."

Henry looks up at me, sympathy in his eyes, but I can't return his gaze – I'm too overwhelmed. Instead, I look down at my little red baby, who is now crying unhappily in my arms.

Minutes – I know we've got minutes left until Roger and Sinclair leave. And I can barely take it.

"Come here, mini trouble," Sinclair murmurs, and I jump a little as I realize that he's close to me now, reaching out for the baby. I was too lost in my thoughts. I look up at my mate, my eyes filled with tears, and silently hand over the baby in to his waiting arms.

He doesn't turn his attention to Rafe, though, instead putting out his other arm to wrap around me. I rest my head against his chest, looking away from him. But my eyes just fall on Cora and Roger, saying their own goodbyes next to me, and I can't take that either.

So I turn my head in the other direction, pressing my eyes shut.

"It will be okay, Ella," Sinclair whispers to me, the baby going quiet in his arms, as he always does, "I promise you, it will be okay."

"I know you'll do everything you can, Dominic," I whisper. "I trust you – it's just the rest of the world, and what it has in store, that I can't trust."

He nods, understanding, and then presses a kiss to my hair, pulling away too soon.

"No," I gasp, wrapping my hand around the strap of his bullet-proof vest and keeping him close.

"Ella," he murmurs, turning my face up to him with a touch of his fingers beneath my chin. And I stare up at him, my beautiful, tender, ferocious mate. I'm coming back to you.

Tonight. And then we'll have peace."

"You'd better," I growl, narrowing my eyes at him. "Or I am going to be very mean to your ghost."

Sinclair laughs at this, shaking his head and passing the baby back to me. Then he presses a kiss to my mouth, tells me he loves me, and turns towards his car. Cora moves close to me next, slipping her hand around my elbow with a big sigh.

"This is it, Ella," she says. "The big push. After this, we'll have peace."

"I feel like I've been hearing that a lot, Cora," I say as I turn to look at her, my bad spirits getting the best of me for just a moment.

"Well," she says, her lips twitching a little towards a smile as she holds the hope for both of us. "At some point, it's got to be right."

And together, we watch our mates and their team pull out of the garage and drive away. Predictably, things are simultaneously boring and tense once the boys are gone.

"What should we do?" Cora asks as the three of us file into the little kitchen and sink down around the table. The bunker isn't totally quiet – there's still a good number of people left here.

Mostly those persons who are still too ill to join the assault team, or those members whose skills lie more in research than in war.

It's good to have more people around, but still, I know that the three of us feel like we're the only people in the world right now, so united are we in our misery. Or, well, four people, if we're including Rafe. But I sigh as I look down at the little baby, who is falling asleep now. "You don't even know what's going on, baby," I murmur, a little jealous.

"I think," Henry says, dipping a hand into the pocket of his wheelchair and coming out with a deck of cards. "That this is a moment that calls for a distraction."

Cora perks up a little. "Nothing says distraction like a couple hands of high-stakes poker," she quips. I smile at her, knowing that Cora loves cards. She's clever and precise enough with them to be a bit of a card sharp. That's how she kept us supplied with pocket money and candy in the orphanage, after all.

"Yes," I say, leaning forward a little eagerly. "Now that the boys are gone, let's gamble away all their money," I say, perking up myself at the idea. "Show them what they get for going off to war without us."

“Only fair,” Henry murmurs as he shuffles and we sit, a little smile playing at his lips. “What shall the buy in be, ladies? Half a million? Each of my sons’ first-born child?”

“Why not both?” I ask, grinning.

Two hours later, Henry has put us both to shame and earned not only a million dollars but also apparent ownership of his two grandchildren.

“Here you go,” I sigh, pretending to hand the sleeping baby off to him. “He’s all yours now.”

Henry laughs and puts up a hand. “I’ll let you maintain ownership for now,” he laughs, pulling the cards towards him to put them neatly back in their box. “I know you’re fond of him, after all. I’ll call for him when I am ready to put him to work.”

“What about this one,” Cora says, looking down at her still-flat tummy. She cocks her head to the side and smirks at Henry. “Should we agree on a lay-away plan for this one as well?”

Henry laughs again and shakes his head, opening his mouth to reply, but suddenly there’s a huge bang from down the hall from the entrance to the bunker.

The three of us go silent, tensely turning towards the door, waiting to see

BOOM.

It comes again, followed by the creaking of metal.

“Shit,” Henry curses – something that makes me turn to him with wide eyes. Never, ever have I heard him utter a curse before.

This, more than the banging, lets me know that something is truly wrong.

Quick as a whip, Henry grabs his phone from its place on the table, glancing at it. “Nothing else from the boys,” he murmurs, slipping the phone into the pocket of his chair and starting to roll towards the door. “Come,” he snaps at us. “Now, Ella, Cora. Come now.”

We both jump to our feet, our hands shaking again as BOOM –

Rafe is still in my arms but some piece of me thinks to grab his carrier as Cora and I follow Henry. As I leave the kitchen I turn towards the bunker entrance towards the huge metal door that seals us in here. And to my horror, I can see it beginning to peel back at the corner. I go pale realizing – Realizing that someone is trying to get in

“Oh my god,” Cora gasps, raising trembling hands to her mouth. “Henry

“COME!” he commands, wheeling fast down the hall against a wave of our own men who all come out of their rooms, heading towards the door.

My sister and I are in action as the hall fills with more noise – more pounding from the door, the shouts of our men – Henry’s own insistent calls to follow him –

We catch up with him as Henry wheels fast into the conference room, and we look around at the worried faces of the few men who are still in here, working on some new plans –

“GO!” Henry barks at them. “Can’t you see we’re under attack!? Go! Defend your Luna!”

Chapter 364 – Assault

Ella

As the startled men hurry out of the conference room, Henry turns to Cora and I, looking at us with a grim expression as we stare at him in terror.

“I have made a grave miscalculation,” he informs us with a steady, regretful nod. “I am sorry, girls – I have failed you – ”

“Wha- what?” I gasp, holding my baby tight. “Henry – what are you talking about?”

“It was a trap,” he says, looking towards the door, where we can still hear the banging – increased in pace now – as well as shouts, the beginning of screams –

“A trap?” Cora asks, turning towards the door herself.

“They knew,” he says, and I’m still staring at Henry as he shakes his head. “They must followed us back here after the sewer and then bided their time, waiting for the bulk of our forces – and our most powerful wolves – to leave before they attacked. Damn it!” he shouts, slamming a frustrated hand against the arm of his chair. “I was a fool, to leave you and the child unguarded!”

“Oh my god,” I whisper, my voice trembling as I try to wrack my brain for something – anything to do next –

“Come,” Henry says, pulling himself together and rolling quickly to the corner of the room. There, he points to the edge of the carpet. “Cora,” he orders. “Pull that up.”

Cora does as he says, instantly falling to her knees and digging her hands into the corner of the carpet, getting her fingers beneath and pulling as hard as she can. I can’t help my surprise when I see what is revealed when she pulls enough of it back.

A trap door.

“Open it,” Henry snaps, and Cora does so, lifting the little latch and swinging the door up to reveal a very thin winding staircase that leads down, down, down.

“Go,” Henry orders, not looking to us and nodding towards it.

“Henry,” I protest, shaking my head. “ We can’t leave you.”

Sudden screams start to burst out from the hallway, making me jump. And then my face drops in horror as I hear gunfire as well.

“You will go, Ella,” Henry growls, wrapping his hand around my arm and shoving me towards the passage. “Go down. Keep going. At the bottom is a tunnel, and at the end of it, a car. God willing it is in good repair. You must run as far and as fast as you can.”

Then he takes his phone out of the pocket of his chair and presses it into my hand. “Tell them what happened as soon as you are out. But don’t tell them where you are until you get to a different phone. Who knows – ”

He sighs, and puts his head in his hands, and I can see his shoulders shaking. “There’s not enough time.”

The noise in the hall grows louder and my breath comes faster as I realize what we have to do.

“All right,” I say, nodding to Cora and then swooping down to kiss Henry on the cheek. “Henry, we love you. We’ll – we’ll come back for you.”

“Don’t,” he says, his eyes only on Rafe now, who squalls unhappily in my arms at all the noise. “Take the baby – take yourselves. Get safe girls. I love you too.”

And then Cora and I are moving, my heart wrenching to leave him – to leave him like this –

Cora goes down the twisting stair first and I follow quickly after, reaching out to hand her the phone so that she can light our way and the baby carrier so I can balance Rafe more safely in my arms. After Cora takes these supplies, I turn my face upwards to say a last word to Henry –

But the door snaps shut above me, leaving me in darkness.

“Ella,” Cora cries, “Ella please – come we have to go -”

“I’m coming, Cora,” I say, swallowing my horrible fear and steeling myself for all we have to do next. We have to survive. We have to get out of here – for the babies to warn our mates –

I open my eyes and look determinedly down at her. “Let’s go.”

Cora nods to me once, and then she starts again down the stairs.

Sinclair

“Any word?” Roger asks me as our men begin to unload themselves from the cars. We’ve arrived at our place of entrance, which I grimace again to see is a sewer.

I'm aware that this is the best way in – that through this public sewer we can begin to access unseen the roads closest to Xavier's stronghold. But still, if I never went in another sewer for the rest of my life, that would be fine by me.

"Nothing new," I say, glancing at my phone, where I've been keeping in touch with my father. "Apparently they're playing poker."

"Oh," Roger says, his eyebrows raising in pleasure. "Well, good. Cora will clean up at that."

"Yeah," I mutter, tucking my phone away. "I have a feeling that Ella bet the house."

"Good," Roger says again, grinning at me. "I always liked your house. Do you think you can be out by the end of the week?"

I don't say anything, just shooting him a little glare, but I can't help but smile a little bit. Roger's certainly in a good mood, which makes me feel better.

But still I have to admit that there's... something roiling in my gut. Something tugging at my instincts that just says wrong wrong.

But I push it aside, even though my wolf howls to see me do it. We're on a mission, after all, and we're short on time. I'm not going to call this off just because it doesn't feel perfect.

I look around at the men ranged around me. "Ready?" I ask, and I get a series of nods all around. "Forward, then," I say, nodding to them and pointing towards the sewer entrance.

The men go first this time, taking the lead so that Roger and I can bring up the tail. We'll switch when we get closer to the assault itself, which should bring us, interestingly, right up into Xavier's property, if not up into his house itself.

It's good luck that the sewer connects so close there, but my wolf still prowls within me, snarling too good too easy – not right –

But I shake my head, watching my men disappear in the tunnel, dismissing my wolf's nerves. After all, where were these hesitations when we planned the assault? Nothing has changed. We're pressing forward, and that's the end of it.

When each of our thirty men has disappeared into the sewer, Roger steps forward to go next. "All right, brother?" he asks, looking at me before he disappears into the dark. "You're not quite yourself."

"I'm fine," I snap, tucking my phone into the pocket of my pants. "Prepare yourself. We've got about forty-five minutes of darkness and radio silence down there," I inform him, slipping into the sewer after him. "We're not going to get any cell signal down there."

"No worries, bro," Roger says, grinning at me in the darkness as I re-seal the entrance. "I know enough showtunes to whistle along the way. I'll keep you entertained."

And then, shaking my head at my brother but grateful to have him by my side, I begin the assault.

Chapter 365 – Assault

Sinclair

We move quickly through the sewers, getting to our launching point in less time than I had estimated it would take. I glance at my phone, not anticipating that we'd have been able to receive any messages from our home base, but disappointed regardless.

As our men range themselves on either side of the exit to the sewer, which will open directly onto Xander's property, Roger turns to me.

"Ready for this?" he asks, his face tight.

I simply nod to him, doing my best to ignore my wolf prowling anxiously inside my chest. Then, as one, my brother and I move forward to the front of the line. If there's any unexpected fire, I want us to take it – not our men.

Our men stand tense behind us in two lines as Roger slowly, silently, pushes open the door. And then, with one final glance at him, I'm through.

I pull myself out of the sewer and find myself in a garden with significant cover, which is good. We sent a drone to scope out the landscape, of course, but we hadn't quite been able to discern the height of the plants. I crouch down immediately, looking around for anything suspicious, but am greeted only by silence – just the cool sounds of a large suburban garden at night.

I turn towards the Tudor house to my left – Xander's home, where he's been living since his brother left the throne. It looks...almost too innocent, too nice, to be housing such a maniacal man – who plots to get unsuspecting women pregnant and steal their babies. I shake my head, hating him anew, and then I turn back to the sewer to gesture my brother and our men forward.

As they filter out of the sewer behind me, I move forward towards the house.

Our father did good work in the past days – we have plans of the house from the city that were updated only ten years ago when Xander, apparently needing more space for his schemes, added a small extension. Those plans allowed us to identify an entrance to the house's basement through the garden which serves our needs well.

As I slink towards the house, I'm relieved to see that the entrance is precisely where we thought it would be. Nodding to Roger, asking him to wait, I skirt across a garden path and inspect the double doors that will lead to a set of steep stairs that head down into the basement. My eyes flit over the wooden doors, their rusty hinges and chipped paint. When I turn to the handles, I'm surprised to see that they're held shut with only a rusty old chain.

Frowning a little, I reach out and take the chain in my hand, giving it a hard, sharp yank. It falls to pieces.

I turn back to my brother, knowing that he's watching my every move. He frowns at the chain in my hand, and I know that his thoughts are echoing my own. Is this all...

Too easy! My wolf howls, pacing inside of me, his tongue hanging out of his mouth slathered in his stress. Can't be – too easy no-no- – turn around – try again –

I take a deep breath, shaking my head as I study the door. Honestly, it does feel too easy...

But are we going to turn this down? Walk away from the opportunity to infiltrate this man's house with a full stock of healthy men just because it's too easy? Isn't it also very possible that, after twenty-some years of going unnoticed, that Xander has just begun to think of himself as untouchable and dropped his guard?

I sigh, signaling Roger forward. He's at my side almost instantly.

"What do you think?" I murmur, looking between him and the doors.

"I'm suspicious," he says with a sigh, but then he just shakes his head. "But Dominic, I don't know when we're going to have a better chance to do this. If we can get inside... shouldn't we take the chance?"

I nod, agreeing, though my wolf snarls and snaps. I run a mental hand down his ruff, asking him to steady, but he shakes me off. I frown and shake my own head, determined regardless.

"Okay," I say, yanking one of the doors open and peering down into the basement. "Let's go."

Then I haul the other door up and slip down the narrow stone stairs, peering into the darkness with my keen vision and working hard to determine if there is anything waiting for us down here. When I see nothing, I signal Roger forward with me.

We both enter the basement, which is dusty and filled with a bunch of junk, but otherwise largely unremarkable. We sweep the room as quickly as we can, using our hearing and our senses of smell to determine if anything is down here but...

"I don't think anyone's been down here for months," Roger murmurs to me when we come back together. "I think...we keep going."

I nod, agreeing, and signal our men to follow, which they do..

When half are in the room, Roger and I move up the basement steps towards the first floor, listening closely for any noises from the house. But from our position behind the door, we can't hear anything.

I look down the stairs towards my men. The man in the lead nods to me, letting me know that we're all in, except for the two who we've left guard in the garden. Understanding, I flip on the radio on my shoulder so that we can stay in contact, knowing that once we go through this final door...

There's not going to be any need for secrecy. Then, glancing once more at Roger for any reason to stop – he just holds my gaze steadily I press open the door to the main house and slip through.

The house is quiet as if...well, as if it's the middle of the night, and everyone is upstairs sleeping. Or...I hesitate to think it but the thought pops into my mind...as if nobody's here at all.

Roger comes to stand next to me, surveying the kitchen for any threats, any reason to hesitate or attack....

But there's nothing. No one's here.

Our men start to come up the stairs behind us so Roger and I move through the kitchen towards the living room, looking for the stairway upstairs to the bedroom levels that I know starts there. But as we move – as our men continue to follow with us – I start to hesitate more.

Because because Xander is not an uncaredful man. He might be a recluse, and someone attuned to anonymity, but he's also someone who has contracted with priests of a dark god for decades, who had them following my mate and her sister for their entire lives...

So why doesn't he have any guards?

Not even one?

My head snaps back towards the kitchen as I hear a door slam. I see one of my soldiers flinch, looking back at the basement door in surprise, his eyes wide.

The door is shut but I can tell, when he looks at me, that he did not shut it. That the door, for all he can tell, shut itself.

My eyes fly back to Roger's at my side and we both instantly fall into defensive crouches. "Shit," Roger says, looking all around. "I think -"

But before he can tell me what, light flares through the room. And around us, priests materialize from thin air, their hands glowing with spells, their faces lit with wicked grins.

Chapter 366 – Flee

Ella

Cora and I pound down the stairs, gasping for breath by the time we reach the bottom. She starts down the dark hall, holding Henry's phone out in front of her, its flashlight blaring through the darkness, but I cry out a little and grab her hand.

She turns to me, frantic, desperate to get away, but I beg her to wait just a moment. "The carrier," I say, reaching for it, "for the baby."

Understanding, she hands me Rafe's carrier and I quickly bend down to strap him into it, wanting to ensure that he's ready to get in the car as soon as we get there. As I work, Cora glances around the passage.

"A lot of spiderwebs down here," she murmurs, "I don't think anyone's been down here for a long time to do maintenance. I hope the car..." her words fade out as I stand up straight but I grimace at her, intuiting her thoughts and hoping that she's wrong.

That when we get to the car, it starts without a hitch. I nod to her that I'm ready and together my sister and I start to hurry down the hall, going as fast as we can without breaking into a run. The tunnel is long – longer than I thought it would be – and I'm starting to panic a little when we finally reach a door. Cora yanks it open.

The door leads to a very, very small space, with only a nondescript blue sedan tucked away in it. Cora dashes to the driver's seat as I open the back seat to the car, lifting Rafe's little carrier inside and buckling him in. Rafe is crying a little and I do my best to shush him, to tell him that it's okay, but I don't think it helps that my own voice and hands are shaking. If my baby does intuit my moods, as Sinclair thinks he does, then there's not a big chance that he's going to stop crying anytime soon.

As I buckle Rafe in Cora finds the car's keys tucked into the visor and quickly turns them in the ignition. We both breathe out in relief when the car starts and she flashes a smile over her shoulder at me. I pull myself out of the back seat after Rafe is buckled and close the door behind me. Then, seeing a switch on the wall in front of the car, I quickly move to it and press it once. A mechanism starts to grind somewhere in the room but I don't bother to look for it, instead pulling the passenger door open and quickly slipping into my seat.

"Ready?" I ask Cora as I buckle my seatbelt.

"I have no idea, Ella," she murmurs, but she puts the car in drive and, when the wall before us folds upwards enough to reveal a steep driveway, she guns the engine so that we quickly climb the rise and find ourselves, to my surprise, deep in the woods.

When we get on flat ground, Cora pauses, looking around. "Where..." she murmurs, "where the hell is the road..."

"There is none," I say, glancing back at Rafe. "Just drive Cora – "

"There are trees everywhere!" she protests, waving a hand at all of them.

"There's got to be a way through," I say, shaking my head at her. "He – they wouldn't have put this car here if there wasn't a way to escape. Just go!"

Sighing with anxiety and frustration, Cora does as I say, starting to wind the car through the trees. And, to my surprise, I start to see a road. There's nothing marking it nothing mystical or magical about it but...it's almost as if someone really did clear a path here so that a car just this size could squeeze through...

"Okay," Cora says, laughing a little hysterically. "I think I get it now..."

"Look!" I shout, pointing forward to where, after a few minutes of driving, I start to see... asphalt? Something black stretching out before us. "Cora, is that a road?"

"I think so," she says, hope blooming in her voice. But just as the little road is starting to become clear before us, something slams into the car, making us scream in shock and surprise as we fishtail sideways and the back corner of the car slams into a tree.

I look around, frantic, and – there –

I gasp and go pale when I see, through the back window of the car, a priest in a dark robe standing, glaring at us, with two men at his side. The priest holds one hand tensed fiercely in a claw at his side, his fingers wreathed in shadow.

Cora looks back as well when she sees the direction of my gaze and she gasps too. "Shit! Ella! Shit!" And then, in complete panic, she slams her foot down on the gas in an attempt to get away.

But the wheels just spin beneath the car, finding no traction. And, as I watch, the two men and the priest start to move forward towards us.

Sinclair

"Go!" I scream at my brother as I move forward myself towards the priests, who are already beginning to hurl spells at me, at Roger, at my men Get out of here!"

Roger just roars and moves forward next to me, advancing on the priests at my side. His answer is a clear and absolute no.

We take on a set of three priests together, transforming into our wolves and working in a pattern of attack and defense drilled into us since we were children – one of us advancing while the other holds the back, so our enemies who outnumber us – cannot slip by and attack our men. Still, even as we concentrate, even as we take on the brunt of the punishing spells that these priests hurl at us –

I can hear my men's screams behind me. I know that they're going down.

Roger and I work fast, both desperate to get back to the men, to help them. I take one priest by the throat and end him quickly, his blood dripping from my fangs as I turn to the other two. Their faces are afraid when they see how quickly their comrade goes down, but they are by no means unprepared. One stands behind the other, taking much the position that Roger and I are using, hurling spells at me while his comrade defends.

The spells alternately cut, burn, and freeze my flesh – but in the end, I work too fast for them, rearing up to my full height to pound the substantial weight of my body into the first man's shoulders, knocking him down and trapping the second man beneath him as well.

Roger comes in for the kill then, ending both with a snarl and tear at each of their throats. They leave this world gasping for air, their dying breaths bubbling the blood at the holes in their neck. As one, Roger and I turn back to the men, hurling ourselves back into the fray.

Only two more priests here – our men have taken down one more with their weapons, and with our aid we quickly take down the other two. As I survey the priests dead and dying forms I note, passively, that none of them is the priest we met before. The priest who was, comparatively, much more powerful than these men.

Sudden quiet reigns in the room beyond the shrieks and moans of our injured men as Roger and I transform back into our human bodies, looking all around us for the next threat –

But none comes.

Not yet.

“Roger,” I say, reaching for him, grabbing his arm.

“I know,” he says, shaking his head.

We turn to the men to issue the command, to retreat, but Conor is already at the door to the basement – or, at least, the space where it used to be. He looks up at us and shakes his head. "It's gone, sir," he says, true fear in his eyes. "The door is just...gone."

"Fuck," I curse, running an anxious hand through my hair. "Dominic," Roger says, making me turn to him. Then he shakes his head at me, slow. "It's a trap."

"What?" I say, not understanding.

"They've covered the retreat," he says, gesturing towards the back door. "

They've sent enough men to stop us, but not to kill us," he shakes his head at me. "It's a trap, Dominic. They don't want us to move forward. They don't want us to move back." "They want us to stay here..." I murmur, trying to piece it together. " Why..."

But then, my eyes snap to Roger's just as his move to mine. "The girls," he says, shaking his head slowly, his voice low, desperate.

"They're keeping us here so they can get the girls..."

And then I tilt my head back and roar.

Chapter 367 – Trap

Ella

“Ella!” Cora screams as one of the men comes around her side of the car and starts to bash at her window with a crowbar, the glass cracking and then beginning to fall inside the car. But I have no time to respond I’m already – unbuckling my belt and throwing myself into the back seat towards my child, who screams bloody murder.

My eyes flash to the other side of the car, where another man is approaching, raising his own crowbar to begin bashing the windows. I panic now- we’re trapped, utterly trapped, no way to get out of the car –

He starts to smash at the back window, working to get in towards Rafe and I, and I make a snap decision, instantly transforming into my wolf and, as the crowbar breaks through the window, grabbing it between my teeth and yanking as hard as I can –

The man shouts, pulled off balance so that his arm is fully in the back of the car now, and I drop the crowbar – ignoring the ringing in my jaw and teeth- and snap again, higher this time, my teeth sinking into the flesh of his elbow and upper arm. He screams, trying to yank back, but I sink back into my haunches, snarling, letting him rip his arm to shreds as he tries to pull away from me –

He leaves quite a bit of blood behind as he withdraws his hand and arm from the car, dropping the crowbar as he goes – and I transform back into my body, turning towards my screaming son but distracted again as I hear Cora scream-

I gasp, spinning towards her, and see the man who broke into her window almost fully in the car now – grabbing her a knife in his hands-

And in horror I watch as he raises that knife high into the air and then sinks it, viciously, into the flesh of her back – and then wrenches his hand to the side to drag it through her flesh –

But before he can get far I am flying for him, my nails turning to talons at the edge of my fingers that I sink first deep into his arm –

As he shrieks and drops his knife, I rip my claws again over his face, his neck, his shoulders – anywhere I can reach

Screaming in fear, the man withdraws from the window to the left side of the car and I hurl myself out after him, shifting again into my wolf before leaping for him – savaging him in any way I can –

I don’t stop until he stops crying out, stops making noise, and then I turn to see the man with the shredded arm leaning back into the car-reaching for my son and I leap for him next.

His death is quick, his life's blood running off my chin as I transform back into a woman, as I turn to look for the priest.

I turn to see him standing in front of the car, his dark magic still whirling around his hands and extending outwards towards the car, working to keep us in place.

"If you leave now," I growl, striding forward towards him, "I will let you live. But you have seconds to decide."

"Come for me, little girl," he laughs, beckoning me forward.

And so I do.

With a feral roar, I let my nails again extend into their talons, let my teeth sharpen into fangs, and then leap for him, ready to tear his flesh to shreds –

But before I can reach him, he moves his magic away from the car to wrap around me. I gasp, clawing at my throat as the dark shadows wrap around my neck, my feet kicking wildly as he lifts me into the air. And then, as I watch, he begins to murmur – begins to say some kind of spell –

And I feel my fangs shrink back – feel my claws retract back into my hands

And then he laughs at me again before lowering me, panting, back to the forest floor.

I stare at him in confusion, in wonder, for a second while he shakes his head at me. "What now, little girl?" he murmurs, cocking his head at me with a filthy smirk. "What do you have to fight with now that your wolf is gone?"

And I snarl – and try to transform but-Nothing happens. I gasp, stumbling backwards a step as I try again

But – nothing –

And then I'm backing away from him, desperate, knowing that I – I can't fight him if I don't have my wolf –

And he takes one wicked step towards me when both of us snap our heads to the side at the sound of the car's tires squealing, the engine revving hard

And I gasp as the car slams into the priest, making him bend in half before sending him sailing to the forest floor where he hits his head, hard, against a long grey rock.

“Ella!” Cora gasps from the car and I’m instantly in motion, dashing for her –

I haul the driver’s-side door open and am almost sobbing by the time I set my eyes on her – – blood – so much blood and my sister covered in it-

“Cora!” I cry, reaching for her – but she’s moving away from me – and as I watch I realize that she’s moving into the passenger seat so that I can get into the driver’s seat so that I can drive.

“Ella,” she moans, looking around frantically, trying to assess the damage.

“Let’s go,” I growl, throwing myself into her abandoned seat, glancing quickly into the back seat at my screaming child, making sure that he’s still strapped in. Then, as soon as I slam the driver’s door behind me, we move.

I back up the car a few steps, staring at the priest who suddenly comes into view but who is not moving, a wide red puddle starting to form on the rock on which he landed. But then I move my eyes back to the road before us, hitting the gas hard and heading towards it.

We’re out of the forest in the flash, leaving the horrible scene behind. My breath is coming fast, my heart racing, my hands shaking as I try to at once concentrate on the road and assess my sister.

“Cora!” I yell, looking over at her, seeing her eyes closed. “Cora, talk to me!”

“I’m I’m okay,” she murmurs to me, – a heavy moan next on her lips.

“Tell me for real, Cora! Tell me what’s happening! Don’t try to save me from it!”

I press the car harder, flying down the roads at what is probably a reckless speed, praying to the depths of me that we don’t meet any more priests – any more barreirs –

Cora’s eyes flash open and I glance at her. “I’m serious, Ella,” she pants, pressing a hand to her back where she’s bleeding. “It was a – a glancing stab. I don’t think he hit anything too important – It would” she gasps when I hit a bump and I grimace when I see the pain flash across her face, see her go white with it.

“Keep going, Cora!” I encourage, my eyes moving fast between her and the road. “Tell me!”

“I’d be in more pain,” she gasps, “if he’d hit a kidney. I think I think it will be okay, Ella – but I have to get to a hospital, now -”

“No we don’t,” I growl, whipping the car to the side and making Cora gasp as we pull to the road’s shoulder.

“Ella, we have to go!” she screams, there could be more of them!”

“No!” I shout, slamming the car into park and then taking panting breaths as I close my eyes. Cora goes quiet as she realizes what I’m doing, but even though I can reach that lavender state – even though I can sense my gift when I reach for it, it...

It slips out of my hands.

“Cora,” I cry in agony, my eyes flying open. “The Priest 1 he did something to me – he bound my wolf, I can’t reach the gift.”

“It’s okay,” she says, leaning forward to grasp my shoulder and gasping with the pain it causes her. I shake my head at my sister, fear and apology all over my face. “Seriously, Ella,” she says, panting a little, “it’s fine. Just – let’s get back on the road, okay? I need medical attention. And if you can’t get it, we have to go somewhere else.”

“Okay,” I say, gritting my teeth, determined. And then I get us back on the road as fast as I can. Soon, the wind whipping through the broken windows begins to howl around us. “Okay, Cora. I’ll get you there. I’ll take you to the hospital as fast as I can.”

“No,” she gasps, gritting her teeth and closing her eyes. “Take me to Hank – he will know what to do. We have to go see Hank.”

“Okay,” I say, nodding anxiously. We’ll go to Hank. Right now. He will fix you up.”

I turn towards the road with renewed conviction as my sister gasps beside me, as my baby cries in the back seat. And then, before I lose myself to the road, I reach beneath me to grab Henry’s phone, which must have fallen out of Cora’s pocket.

“Here,” I say as it bounces in her lap, making her open her eyes. “If you can, Cora – text Sinclair. Tell him what happened.”

And as I concentrate on the road, Cora reaches for the phone.

Chapter 368 – Deeper In

Sinclair

“We have to get to them,” Roger snarls, moving towards a window intending to bash it to pieces, I know – but I grab his arm as he goes, pulling him back.

“The priests are not that stupid,

Roger,” I say through clenched teeth. ” If they can make the door disappear, they can make the windows solid – ”

“So what do we do,” Roger growls, frantic, as our remaining healthy men take advantage of the momentary reprieve to attend to the men who are wounded. I glance around, doing a quick survey and finding that about eight of our men are down. I grimace when I realize that two are not moving at all, or making any noise. But I look away from them fast, not needing the distraction.

“We retreat, I say, holding Roger’s eye, “or we move further in. But there’s a reason why they’re not attacking here – they’re letting us stay in relative peace because they want us to stay here. Which means they don’t want us to leave, and they don’t want us to go further.”

“What?” Roger asks, frantic and a little baffled, looking around. “Why don’t they just kill us? Why don’t they just -”

“Because they can’t,” I say, nodding as I figure it out. If they had more priests to send – enough to take us out – they would do it. But the fact that they’re not sending them...

It means that we’ve got enough force on us that they can’t risk it. That we, somehow, outnumber or outmatch them. My wolf bares his fangs within me, eager now, on more secure ground now that we know more about what we’re facing.

“What?” Roger asks, his brows knitting together, still looking frantically for a way to get out, to get to her to his mate-

“Roger!” I shout, shaking his arm, making him turn to me. “If you think I have any less concern for Ella than you do Cora, then you need to check yourself,” I hiss, bringing my face close to his so that only he hears me. “But you need to pull it together. You’re not going to help them by acting on impulse, all right? We need a plan.”

Roger glances away again for just a second, his jaw clenched, but then he turns back to me and nods so I release his arm.

“Which way?” I ask, crossing my arms and glancing up towards the staircase and the second level where I suspect more are waiting for us, guarding.... something. Perhaps their Master?

Perhaps...something else? “They want us to stay here, but they can’t hold us forever. So the only question is – do we fight to leave? Or to go further in?”

I see the word “leave” on Roger’s tongue, can see Cora on his mind. And frankly, I’m tempted too. The idea that – well, that they want us to stay here means that they knew we were coming. And if they knew that we were coming...

It means that they know far more about us than we thought they did. That they know that the girls are alone now. Even

Even the location of the bunker. I groan inwardly at the possibility, but I force myself to turn away from it, to focus again on my brother.

Roger, to my surprise, hesitates, glancing up the stairs with me, putting the pieces together. “If they aren’t sending more,” he murmurs, meeting my eyes, “it means we’re close.”

“Push?” I ask, steeling myself for his answer.

Slowly, Roger nods his head. “We push.”

I turn to my men, giving a loud order to assemble where possible. Those who are able again line up before us, two of our healthy men falling back – as is part of their protocol – to continue tending to our wounded. I give brisk orders for the men to press forward no matter what. The men nod, steeled for what’s going to come next.

Then, as one, Roger and I turn towards the stairs, determined to continue the attack.

The problem presents itself immediately as we start to climb, considering that there is a blank wall at the top of the stairs instead of a hallway or a door through which we can pass. When I get to the top, I press a hand against the barrier, which feels as real as any other wall I’ve ever touched.

Roger brings his face close, sniffing it. “It’s off,” he murmurs. “Something... wrong here.”

“Magic,” I say, crossing my arms over my chest and looking it up and down. “Conjured.”

Roger leans back and thinks for a moment before he speaks again, his voice low and considering. “We know, from our research, that the priest’s power comes from binding their wolves. Which means that...whatever they've accessed to create this kind of illusion...we have access to it too, Dominic."

"What do you mean?" I ask, turning to him, confused.

"I mean," he says, looking at me askance. "That...I mean, we forget it – or we think that only Cora and Ella have it, but our wolves too are gifts from the goddess. They're magic, as much as we don't generally describe them that way. That the priests are able to do this because they've denied that gift, darkened it."

I nod, turning back to the wall, considering it. "So," I say slowly, "we can conclude that... we have the tools we need to fight this."

"I think so," Roger says, turning his head and considering again. And then he reaches out and takes my hand.

"What?" I snap, jerking my hand away from his.

"Don't be an idiot Dominic," Roger grumbles, rolling his eyes at me and then grabbing my hand again. "I'm trying to...do something here."

And then, as I watch, I see Roger begin to...well, meditate. Or, at least that's the closest thing I can think of to describe it it's certainly looks like what Ella does when she begins to access her gift. And then as I watch him, I feel a little...tug. Inside of me, where my wolf lives. And my wolf cocks his head to the side as if he has heard a strange noise. Curious, he moves towards it, and I urge him to go further.

And then, quite suddenly, I...feel Roger's wolf, there beside mine. And, acting on some impulse, I close my eyes too, willing myself to calm, to relax. And though I can't see it – can only feel it – I know that our wolves, together, their magic joined together...they press forward.

And as they do, I raise my hand to touch my fingers against the wall, and I too press.

At first my fingers simply push against the solid wall, but as our wolves move together, the wall beneath my fingers seems to give – not crumble, or bend, as a wall might, but instead to move inward until.

I almost stumble forward, catching myself at the last minute as there's suddenly nothing beneath my hand. My eyes fall open to see nothing there before us – and I turn my eyes to Roger in shock –

But I snap my face back forward when I see the snarl on his lips – as I realize that the priest – the priest –

He's standing right before us, his fists wrapped in flames.

"Clever wolves," he murmurs, his mouth lifting in a sneer. "Calling my bluff."

Roger doesn't bother to reply, instead transforming instantly into his wolf and leaping forward, his fangs ready for blood. I roar and signal my men forward for a charge before we all move directly for the priest who stands alone before us.

Chapter 369 – Dr. Hank

Ella

I stumble through the doors of the clinic with immense difficulty, Cora leaning heavily and moaning on my one side, Rafe's carrier bouncing against my other.

People's eyes go wide when they see us, but they quickly scatter out of our way to make room, shouting for nurses and doctors to come and help. I hold my breath, my eyes fastened on the clinic's familiar front counter as I pray to heaven and back that Hank is here, that he's on duty tonight.

I exhale a that huge breath in a sob of relief when I see him come, wide-eyed, around the corner, trying to figure out what the big fuss is about. Hank gasps when he sees us, dropping his clipboard and dashing into the waiting room to get to our side.

To my immense relief, Hank recovers quickly from his surprise and is, quite suddenly, the calm and efficient surgeon I've come to know and trust.

"What's wrong," he snaps as he gets his shoulder under Cora's other arm. Where is she hurt?"

"Her lower back," I say, my words coming slowly as I try to get my frantic mind in order. "She was stabbed – we were attacked, Hank – I'm so sorry –"

"Enough," he says harshly, dismissing my apology with a glare as he helps me basically carry Cora into the back, to where we can help her. "A stab wound?! Why the fuck didn't you get her to a hospital, Ella!"

"It's not bad," Cora mumbles, and Hank's head snaps up, as if he didn't really realize that she's conscious enough to talk.

"Tell me." he says, guiding us all into the first room. Then, as Cora talks to him in some kind of medical jargon I don't understand, Hank and I help her up onto an examination table where she lays on her belly. Hank hisses when he sees the amount of blood soaking her shirt and her pants.

I take a step back, holding on to Rafe's carrier tightly in both of my hands, finally taking a moment to glance down at my son. He's fussing unhappily, wanting to be held and comforted, but I'm so, so grateful to see that he's essentially unharmed. My whole heart breaks as I watch him cry – but I resist, knowing that – that Hank might need me to help that Rafe just has to wait –

I turn my eyes back to Cora then, watching as Hank pulls on latex gloves and then begins to peel back her clothing so that he can see the wound. I see him take a deep breath at first and then slowly breathe it out as he quickly begins to work.

My eyes flick to Cora as nurses come into the room, ready to spring into action. Hank gives them quick demands before glancing to me.

“She was right,” Hank calmly informs me. “It’s not it’s not fatal, Ella,” he says, turning back to his work. “I mean, it’s critical – we have to do some work but it’s a relatively shallow stab, and the knife missed her major organs – ”

“Hank,” I say, breathless with worry as I glance between my sister – her eyes closed as she lays on the table, faintly breathing – and the doctor I know can save her life. The doctor whose heart she broke so little time ago. “Hank,” I continue, shaking my head, “she’s – she’s pregnant.”

Hank goes perfectly still and pale as he takes in my words, and I can almost see the thoughts passing through his head Cora, pregnant Roger she left him for she’s human humans can’t get pregnant by a wolf –

His eyes dart back to her as I see him come to the logical conclusion, the same one Cora did –

But I’m at his side at an instant, my hand on his arm. “Hank,” I say again, drawing his attention back to me as I shake my head, “Roger father.” Roger is the

He frowns at me, confused – “That’s impossible, Ella —“

Slowly I shake my head, willing him to believe me. “We have no explanation,” I say, holding his gaze. “But Roger sensed it the baby, it’s his blood – ” –

Hank takes another deep breath and roughly scrapes his palm down over his face, putting the thoughts together. Then he turns away from me, barking something out to the nurses about getting an ultrasound machine in here right away.

He turns back to me. “Do you know how far along she is?” he asks, stern, and I see him tucking his emotions about the news away, hiding behind his professional identity alone.

“No,” I say, shaking my head, “um, not long? Maybe – maybe a week after her missed period?” I shrug, confused, “I don’t know?”

He nods, satisfied. “With a wolf pregnancy...” but then he turns to me again, confused, “wait, is it even a wolf pregnancy?”

I just shrug and shake my head – honestly, we don’t know. Hank sighs and stares at her, at my sister who I think maybe has slipped into a daze as the nurses continue to prep her.

“If it was a wolf pregnancy,” Hank says, folding his arms, “then it would be long enough, now, to detect a heartbeat. But if the baby is...human? I don’t know, Ella.” Then he turns to me. “Either way,” he says, “the knife wouldn’t have itself harmed the child. But her blood loss...”

He sighs again, shaking his head. “I’ll do everything I can.”

“Thank you,” I breathe, taking one hand from Rafe’s carrier to quickly wrap an arm around Hank’s shoulders, giving him a little squeeze. Then, knowing Hank’s not a very huggy kind of guy, I step away, moving to a chair against the wall so that he can get to work.

Hank nods to me, understanding, and then ignores me for a long time. I watch everything as Hank and his nurses work quickly but methodically to do what they can for Cora. I only take my eyes away to lift poor Rafe out of his carrier, to begin to feed him a little, hoping that the warmth of me and the comfort of nourishment will calm him down. And, frankly, because the familiarity of the routine will calm me as well.

When he’s finished, Rafe burps a little and then falls calmly asleep in my arms, which I’m grateful for. Because as much as I love my baby, I can’t...I can’t truly attend to him with all of the love I want to give while I’m so worried about my sister.

At some point, a very kind nurse comes to me and asks me if I need anything. Remembering Henry’s instructions not to use his phone to tell the boys where we are – and suddenly very, very struck with worry about Henry, and feeling terribly guilty that I haven’t remembered him until now – I ask her for a phone – any phone.

Grateful to be able to help, the nurse slips her own phone out of her back pocket and hands it to me. Quickly, I type Sinclair’s number into the message box and send a quick text.

It’s Ella. Cora’s hurt, but she’ll be okay. Rafe is okay. We’re at the Clinic – I couldn’t help her. They bound my wolf and my gift when we tried to leave. Hank is working. Come when you can – go to your father first. I have no idea if he is okay. Love you.

“Thank you,” I say, handing the phone back to the nurse, smiling at her as much as I can. “Do you need me to tell you if there’s a reply?” she asks, still eager to do something, anything.

“There won’t be,” I murmur, turning my eyes back to my sister. The nurse nods and goes away. She comes back a little later with some wet wipes and a blanket, and I just blink at the wipes for a second before laughing as I realize –

As I realize that I'm covered in blood. I laugh a little at the absurdity of it before thanking her and taking a moment to wipe off the blood that I can from my face and arms. Then, I wrap the blanket around my baby and myself, settling back in my chair to wait.

Because that's all I can do now. Wait. While Hank does what he can to save my sister's life, as well as her child's.

Chapter 370 – Unleashing the Flame

Ella

I fall into a little daze as I watch Hank work, as I hold my sleeping baby in my arms. It's not that I'm not paying attention – it's just that...I don't really understand what they're doing or saying, so to me it's all just quiet repetitive work.

I do pay attention, of course, when Hank deems Cora patched up enough to roll her over onto her side so that they can perform an ultrasound. Cora gives a low moan when the nurses move her, a sound which at once pains me and gives me a little thrill of hope. Because as much as I hate to hear my sister in pain –

Damn it, at least it means she's alive. I watch carefully as the nurses hold her still, as Hank expertly spreads some clear jelly on her stomach and then begins to search for a heartbeat. Then I bury my head in my hand a few moments later when he finds it – a fast, faint fluttering of noise. My little niece or nephew, still fighting for life.

I drag my hand away from my face a moment later to see Hank nodding to his nurses and Cora lowered back on her belly. Then, Hank turns to me, pulling off his gloves as he crosses the room and falls into a crouch so that we can be almost face-to-face while I stay seated.

"You saw?" he asks, looking up at me a little from his lowered place on the floor. "Yes," I reply, nodding sharply. "The baby is alive, but – "

"Right," he says, glancing back towards Cora. "It's – it's not preferable, obviously, for a mother to be so gravely wounded so early in a pregnancy. Frequently the body will decide..." he sighs and shakes his head, trying to come up with the right words. He looks up at me as he finishes his thought, "the body will sometimes decide, Ella, to prioritize the mother."

"So miscarriage..." I say, looking over at my sister.

"There's a higher risk of it right now, yes. Ella," he says again, his voice curious now, drawing my eyes back to him. "Did Cora ever mention to you the possibility..."

"Yes," I say, nodding, knowing where he's going with this. "I can do it, Hank but, the people who hurt us in the woods – "I shake my head, realizing that he's not going to understand what I'm talking about if I start babbling on about priests in dark robes and the God of Darkness. "As we were getting away they they bound my gift and my wolf," I say, giving a little shrug. "T tried to heal her in the car, but I couldn't access the gift."

"Really," Hank says, his eyebrows going up in surprise. "So you can – you can actually like, use it to heal people – to heal wounds like that -"

I narrow my eyes at Hank suddenly, a little disturbed by his curiosity about the gift when we should be concentrating on helping my sister. What, really, is he asking me here?

“Sorry,” Hank says, putting his hands up in a little plea for forgiveness. “I’m I’m just a doctor, Ella. It’s all I really do, try to fix bodies. The idea of being able to wield medicine like that – it’s a dream. But please forgive my professional distraction.”

I let out a little sigh and nod, my eyes moving back to Cora, wanting to move on from it.

“Well,” Hank says, standing up to his feet and looking at Cora himself. “It would help Cora, and the baby, a lot, if you were able to...I don’t know, Ella, unbind the gift? I know a lot about wolf biology, but not a lot about the religion or the magic of it all. Is there anyway to get around this? Perhaps one of the priestesses of the Goddess, your mother? Could they help you get...in touch with her? Ask for her aid or something?”

My eyes flash to him suddenly as I realize that – that Hank may have stumbled on something here.

“That’s...a really good idea, Hank,” I say, getting quickly to my feet and looking around the room. “Can I use a phone, please?”

He nods to the computer and the phone in the corner of the room. “Of course, Ella,” he says. “The entire facility is at your disposal.” He glances back towards Cora now. “I’m going to run some tests,” he murmurs, taking a deep breath and steeling himself. “Let’s update each other, if we have news?”

I nod eagerly to Hank and then carry Rafe over to the little computer in the corner, where I open a web browser and begin to search for the contact information of the temple in the center of our city, hoping to hell the priestesses there can do something to help.

Sinclair

The priest before us sweeps a fist out in front of him, his teeth bared in determination as he sends a sheet of flame racing towards us. Roger, in mid-leap, takes the hit first, yelping and turning away as the fire burns him, singeing the edges of his fur but burning out before it gets deep enough to actually hurt his flesh.

I crouch defensively, my roar of attack turning into one of pain as I turn my back to the fire but feel it curling at my clothes, my skin, the back of my neck – a deep and searing touch that’s gone after an instant as the wave passes me.

Then, cringing at the sound of my men behind me likewise taking the brunt of the flame, I turn back to the priest and stand again, coming back to Roger’s side.

"I'll do it again," the priest says, his teeth gritted as he glares at us. "I will burn you until your charred skeletons are all that are left -"

"You won't," I snap, taking another step towards him. "Or else you'd have done it by now."

Something flashes in the Priest's eye – frustration, I think, in being caught out. Roger, understanding my point, bares his teeth and begins to prowl forward now.

"You're weakening," I say, considering the priest carefully as we advance and he takes slow steps backwards away from us. "I don't know why," I continue, my shoulders hunching now as I prepare my attack. "Maybe you burned out your energy on that illusion below – maybe your magic was amplified by your connection to the other priests. They're all dead, by the way."

I watch carefully when I see the priest flinch at this information, wondering at the effect. "It doesn't matter," the priest snarls. "I will take you out, and your men will fall without their leader -"

Slowly, I just shake my head. "No. They fight for more than me," I say, my hands itching to turn into claws now, my teeth aching to be fangs. But I hold back, wanting to keep him talking wanting to get whatever information I can. "Even if I died, they'd take you to defend their Luna. To defend their future King."

The priest begins to laugh now, a dirty, hysterical thing. "Wasted," he says, the words ripping victoriously from his teeth. "Your Luna is dead now, Alpha," he says, "as is yours, and your pathetic little mutt with her," he laughs, turning to Roger now.

Roger loses it then, crouching to leap, but I grab him by the scruff before he can. Because, while the priest's words make me want to tear him to pieces as well, we still need more. We need to know about his master.

"And what will happen to you," I say slowly as Roger winds himself back in. "When you are dead. Who will mourn you? This master to whom you've sold your life?"

"The Master is nothing anymore," the Priest says, his back almost literally against a wall now, and realizing that he's out of space, he crouches and begins to prepare again, the fires that have never left his hands burning harder, hotter now. "The Master is gone now = he has his boy, and so our service to him is done. If I die today, it is the will of the Dark God. And I," he says slowly now, his face lit from beneath by the light of his flames, "I will relish his gift of death."

And then, with a scream that tears through the hall and makes all of us flinch, the priest unleashes his flames, burning himself out and willing himself to take all of us with him.

Roger roars, leaping directly for the fire that threatens to consume us all – But I beat him to it, my wolf taking over my body and surging in front of him in front of all my men brunt of the flame.

Chapter 371 – Holy Water

Ella

Rafe and I are standing behind the counter, staring at the front door of the clinic, waiting for the Priestess to arrive. I shift anxiously from foot to foot and Rafe grumbles and cries anxiously in my arms, probably picking up on my emotions.

"It's okay, little baby," I murmur, tearing my eyes away for a second to glance down at him. I smile a little at his unhappy little face, unable to help the little surge of love that pulses through me. "We're going to get you home real soon," I promise in a whisper, "wrap you up in a nice warm blanket. Sing you to sleep. And everything will be...fine."

Rafe calms a little as I do and I let out a deep breath, looking back at the door, hoping to hell that I didn't just lie to him.

Because all I want, in the whole world, is for this all to be over- I hear the door click and then I stop breathing as it pushes open. Then, I can't help my little happy cry as the priestess comes in the door, a little basket slung over the crook of her arm.

"Oh thank god!" I shout, running for her and throwing my arm around her, careful to hold Rafe to the side even as I pull her tight.

"Oh!" she says, clearly surprised by my tiny assault. Then, she laughs a little. "Well, perhaps thank Goddess might be more accurate in this situation," she says neatly, pulling away from me.

I smile at her so, so grateful that – she's here. "Yes, sorry about that – I don't mean to be rude. I'm just so happy you came!"

"Of course, Luna!" she says, lifting a gentle hand to my cheek and smiling warmly at me. "We are always happy to help." Then she pauses, looking anxiously around the room at all of the people staring at us. "Is there... somewhere we could go? For greater privacy?"

And I realize that – especially to the humans in the room – that we might be making a bit of a spectacle. After all, it's not every day that you see a woman with dried blood flaking off her clothes hugging a robed priestess.

"Oh, sure!" I say, grabbing her by the hand and tugging her with me to the exam rooms in the back. Luckily, we run almost immediately into Hank, who is coming out of Cora's room.

"Hank!" I say, giving him an excited smile. "This is one of my mother's priestesses – she performed Rafe's baptism." I wait impatiently while Hank nods to the priestess and mumbles a greeting. She says something polite back before I can continue. "Is there somewhere we can go?" I ask him. "Where she can help me unbind the gift?"

"Sure," Hank says, his eyebrows going up in interest. Then he pushes the door to the room next to Cora's open. "Do you...need anything?" he asks, looking the priestess up and down with wary eyes.

I think that's a little strange, frankly, but I ignore it in my eagerness to get this done. The priestess sounded pretty eager on the phone – like she really thought she could help. If this works, I could actually help Cora – get her patched up soon, make sure the baby is safe-

"I think we'll be all right," the priestess says smoothly in response. Privacy," she adds with a little shrug, might actually be best.

"Of course," Hank murmurs, taking a step back and watching us carefully as we go into the room. The priestess gives him a kind smile before shutting the door behind her. Then, she locks it.

"So, do you really think you can help?" I ask eagerly, bouncing Rafe a little in my arms in my excitement.

"Well," she says, turning to the little steel exam table and placing her basket on it. "It's obviously not something we do every day," she says, giving a little laugh. "But we've worked, before, with people whose wolves are tangled. The Goddess finds a way to..." she hesitates, searching for a way to describe it.

"Unbind? Or, maybe unwind?" She laughs a little again in a self-deprecating sort of way. "Apologies, Luna, I don't have the right words for it. But, the Goddess' powers are a mystery to us all."

"I'll say," I murmur, looking closely at the supplies that she has brought, which mostly look like clear jugs of water. "What's what's all this?"

"It's holy water," she says, taking the last sealed jug out and placing it on the table before tucking the basket away below. "From the spring where we baptized your child. It provides a greater connection to the Goddess."

"Oh," I say, my eyes going wide. Then, I nod, not really getting it but willing to play along. "Okay. What...what do we do?"

"Well," she says, turning to me. "It would be better if we had...a kind of tub? Or a pool, or a spring?"

I grimace a little and shake my head. "I don't think we have anything like that here, or at least not easily." On the phone the Priestess had asked if I could come to the temple, but I had been unwilling to leave Cora if at all possible. So the Priestess had said it was all right, we could probably make do here.

Luckily, she keeps the same sort of spirit even now, when I again tell her we can't accommodate what she needs.

"That's all right," she says, taking up one of the jars and smiling at me. We'll just have to get a little messy, yes?" She glances over her shoulder at the door. "You don't think your doctor friend will mind, do you? Or... interrupt?"

"No," I say, speaking honestly. "Hank will understand."

"Okay," she says, taking a deep breath. "We need to saturate you, Luna, as best we can in the water. And then, once that is done, we will evoke the Goddess and do our best to ask her to unbind you."

"Okay," I say. "Um...should I sit on the floor?"

"Probably," she says with a shrug. "That way you can...well, be soaked, and perhaps sit in a little pool of the water

." she laughs again then, shaking her head at me. "I'm sorry, Luna – it's all much more dignified when we do this sort of work in the temple and we can ask our patients to submerge themselves in a sacred pool. But I promise, it has a very high rate of effectiveness.'

"It's okay," I say, feeling more cheerful and laughing at myself a little bit too. I begin to settle myself down on the floor, but the priestess hesitates a little.

"Actually," she says, "it would probably be best if you did not have the child in your arms. He, I believe, is... unbound? As far as we know?"

"Oh!" I say, surprised and hesitant now. Yes, Rafe is unharmed but...well, I haven't taken my hands or my eyes off of him since we got to the clinic. And frankly, I'd prefer not to now. But...I also see where the priestess's point.

If this ceremony is about unbinding me, perhaps his energy will interfere. I bite my lip a little, looking down at my baby boy.

"Give him to me," the priestess says quietly. "I'll take good care of him, Luna. As I did at his baptism. As I have promised to do all of his life."

"O-okay," I say, sighing a little and shifting my little baby over to the priestess' arms before sighing and settling myself unhappily on the floor. I wish, quite suddenly and quite desperately, that Sinclair were here. Not only because that would mean I had him safe by my side, but also so that...well, so that Rafe would have his father to hold him while I do this.

Rafe cries a little in the Priestess' unfamiliar arms as she takes the lids off of each of the jars of water and then begins to move around me in a circle, chanting softly as she pours the water on each of my sides and then over my body and head until I am, indeed, soaked in it. I gasp a little as the last drop flows down my face. By this time, Rafe is crying quite hard and I frown as I look towards him, wanting him back. Wanting to comfort him.

I shiver a little as I deny myself the desire to hold my baby again. Sacred pool or not, the result of being drenched is indeed that I am sitting in a rather large puddle of holy water. And even if it is holy...well, it's cold. The Priestess comes to stand in front of me now, lifting her free hand and beginning to chant again.

But before she can really begin, both of us turn towards the door when we hear the handle shake, and then, a moment later, we hear the lock turn. We're both quiet as the door slowly opens and Hank quietly enters the room, leaving the door open behind him.

"Everything okay in here?" he asks, frowning at me when he sees me soaked on the floor. "Ella, what are you doing?"

"It's part of a ceremony, Hank," I sigh, a little exasperated. "Yes," the priestess snaps, frowning at him. "It would be better if we were left alone."

"Oh," he says, quietly looking her up and down, an odd look on his face." Actually," he says, cocking his head to the side as he takes in Rafe's loud cries. "I wonder if I can help. Here," he continues, taking a slow step towards here. "Clearly, your hands are full. Let me...hold the baby."

And the priestess frowns and narrows her eyes at Hank as he holds out his hands, beckoning, reaching for Rafe." Give the child to me."

Chapter 372 – Burn Out

Roger

Less time probably passes than it feels like. Because it feels like hours of being seared by fire, of the Priest hurling spells at us.

And it's not fire alone – it's flames first, and then slicing spells that cut at us, and then wind – and ice – and something that feels like acid in the air that creeps into our lungs and makes us hack –

But slowly, slowly he burns himself out. And our men fall, screaming. But in the end, it's me who prowls towards him in my wolf's body, ignoring the aches and pains that come with every step. It's me.

I step over my brother's limp form, doing my best to ignore the fact that what breaths pulse from Dominic's lips are short and shallow. That his eyes are shut, that whole swathes of his skin are burned away.

I only have eyes for him, this cornered Priest, at the end of this. Because it is the end. And I have him trapped.

Then, because I want him to see me in a form he can understand, I shift back into my human body, wincing as I do so, as the pains of my flesh reform themselves on hands instead of paws, on my legs instead of my haunches.

"Tell me" I command, as I stand before him, cowered in his corner.

"I will tell you noth-"

But I roar, allowing my nails to arc into claws that I slash across his face, opening four deep wounds across his cheeks, his nose, his lips. He shrieks in pain and covers his face before looking up at me.

"You will tell me," I continue, crouching down in front of him, unblinking in my determination and my fury. "Because while you may be prepared to die for your god," I say, holding up my hands so he can see my weapons there, "I don't think that your little order prepared you for days, weeks, or months of torture. Little priest."

And his eyes shift then to focus on my claws as the blood drips down his face. As he realizes what I'm saying. That he is going to die But when?

That's up to me.

"Tell me," I say again, gentler this time.

“I already did,” the priest grinds out, finding a little more courage and hate in himself as he snarls the words at me, as he winces at the feel of his face shifting when he speaks, at the new pain there. “I told you the master is gone-”

Quickly, before he can see me move, I rip my claws again over his face – raking some in the fresh wounds I just placed there, but also opening some new ones for good measure.

He screams, then, at the pain of it, his hands flying to cover his wounds. But I slash at those next, letting my claws cut deep, severing several fingers and slicing deep into the tendons of his hand so that they are useless to him now – for the rest of his short life.

The Priest screams again, falling flat to the floor next to the curled forms of his sliced fingers, staring up at his mangled hands.

“TELL ME!” I roar, leaning over him now, “Or by your God’s own name I will do it AGAIN! And I will keep doing it until you are nothing but SHREDS OF WHAT YOU ONCE WERE!”

The priest trembles as he looks up at me, in so much pain now that I don’t know if his words are shaking in shock or fear or...something else. But I have every reason to believe they’re honest. He no longer has any reason to lie.

“He’s gone, he has the child – ”

“Where,” I command, but the priest cries out in fear now, working to cover his face again but only succeeding in leaking blood all over himself.

“I don’t know!” he cries. “He didn’t tell us!”

“What does he have!?” I command, shoving the priest’s hands away from his face so that I can look down on him again. “More priests? More defenses!?”

“Nothing,” he moans, shaking his head. “We were – we were the last we were supposed to hold you here – “he grits his teeth now, finding some level of frustration in this, almost not believing that we found a way to defy his spells. “I don’t know how you got through it -”

But I don’t let him finish – because frankly, I don’t care. Instead, I raise a fist to shoulder height and then smash it, again and again, into the Priest’s clenched teeth, reducing his face to a bloody, gurling pulp.

And then, to make sure the job is done, I use my claws to cut his throat, watching as the blood flows quick. And then, as his hands fall limp at his side, I open the veins at his wrists to hasten his death.

I want to spend no more time with this wretch of a man, who dedicated his life to darkness. For what? For the chance to wield some spells? To feel, for a moment, that he was powerful in stealing a helpless child?

Disgusted, I turn back to the hall filled with our men. And I can tell the moment that the priest dies. Because there is an almost audible click as the magic leaves the house. I don't know what it was – wards to tell him where we were? Further protections? It doesn't matter. But I know, instantly, that everything is gone. That it is now, again...just a house.

At the end of the hall, a form staggers to his feet and I recognize Conor as he moves towards me.

“Sir,” he says, limping a little and holding his left arm close to his body. “Orders?”

I nod to him, a surge of gratitude pulsing through me for such a dedicated soldier, who wants to complete the mission even while he's hurt. “Sweep the rooms,” I command, my eyes already moving to Dominic, my true priority here. “The priest claimed his master was gone. We need to ensure that it's true. Take...whoever you can,” I say, moving to Dominic as I finish giving the order.

“Yes, Sir,” Conor replies, doing his best to salute and then moving towards the handful of men who I can see getting to their feet. I notice, passively, that it's... a much smaller number than I would have hoped.

But I don't have time for that now. Instead, I kneel over Dominic, who is laying on his side. When I push at his shoulder and turn him onto his back, Dominic gives a heavy groan. I grimace to see that his face has been sliced and burned – so badly that...god, it hurts even to look at him.

“Dominic,” I murmur, leaning close, wanting – desperately – for him to respond. “Dominic – come on -”

And, to my immense relief, his eyes flutter open.

“Ella,” he mutters, working to sit up, and I roll my eyes a little because – I mean, honestly, all I'm thinking about right now is Cora too, but obviously I can't get Dominic to Ella until we assess how badly he's hurt. I make a soothing noise and press against his shoulder, obliging him to lay back against the floor.

“Easy,” I murmur. “Let me check you out, all right?”

Dominic, coming back to himself a little, nods, and then groans as it hurts him somehow. I begin my routine survey of his wounds, checking for the worst, the battlefield medic training we all go through kicking in.

But even with my limited training, I can tell that...it's bad.

It's really, really bad.

Chapter 373 – Betrayer

Roger

“My phone,” Dominic murmurs as I look over his wounds. “Fuck your phone,” I murmur, shaking my head and leaning closer to a deep slice on his stomach that makes me hiss with anxiety.

“Roger,” Dominic snaps, and I look up at him with a frown. “The priest – he said the master had Rafe. Check my fucking phone – Ella will...” his head. I falls back, exhausted. But I interpret his meaning. So, I reach for his back pocket. Dominic moans loudly as I turn him a little so that I can get behind him, but eventually I get the phone and flick through it, my face going pale at what I see.

“Shit,” I murmur, flipping through the messages first from our father’s phone and then an unfamiliar number.

“What?” he asks.

“They don’t have Rafe,” I sigh, tucking the phone into my own back pocket. “The priest was wrong about that. The baby’s still with Ella and Cora. But...” I sigh, and Dominic opens his eyes to look at me, bidding me silently to tell him everything I know. “They attacked the bunker when we left. The girls got out through the passage – they had to leave dad behind. And...Cora’s hurt,” I say, working hard to get the words out steadily. “They went to Hank, to try to patch them up.”

Dominic’s eyes go wide now. “Ella’s gift?”

“Bound,” I say, shaking my head. “I don’t know how-”

“Doesn’t matter,” my brother murmurs, and then to my shock – he curls his body to sit up, almost screaming at the pain it causes him.

“Dominic!” I shout, putting my hands on his shoulders, but he works to swat me away, so I back off.

“We have to get to them,” Dominic says, panting and holding my eyes. We can’t – we can’t trust Hank...”

Slowly, I hold his eyes and shake my head. “Let me go, Dominic,” I say, shaking my head. “You’re in,” I hesitate, but when I look at the blood seeping from his wounds I know that I’m right. “You’re in bad shape.”

He just glares at me and I sigh, knowing it’s a lost cause.

“Fine,” I say, giving a little shrug and working to put my arm beneath my brother’s shoulder to help him up. “But if you fall to pieces on the way, don’t blame me.”

Dominic mutters something in response as we get him panting to his feet, but I ignore it, seeing Conor coming close.

“Nothing, Sir,” Conor reports, looking anxiously towards my brother. “No one else here. If the man – Xander if he was here, he’s not anymore. What can I

“Nothing,” I snap. But then I rethink the command. “Actually – get the cars close. We need transport, now. You take all the men – injured and healthy – back to the bunker. They were attacked when we were gone – they’ll need reinforcements. Dominic and I...”

“The Lunas,” Conor says, giving us a quick salute. “I understand.”

And then, his face serious, Conor turns and starts to give commands to the men. “That one needs a promotion,” I murmur to my brother.

“Later,” Dominic sighs, his eyes on the stairs. “Right now, let’s just figure out how the hell we’re getting me out of this house.”

Ella

My eyes dart to Hank, going immediately wide. And suddenly, Henry’s ideas echo in my mind. That we can’t trust Hank. That he’s gotten too close to our family too quickly. That he’s an ambitious, eager man who has worked suspiciously hard to work to a place of trust with our inner circle.

And then, today – why was he asking so much about my gift and how I could use it? Did he really really want to help Cora and her baby? Or was there something else...

“Don’t!” I gasp, throwing a hand out towards the Priestess, Rafe still crying loudly in one of her arms while she holds one of the empty jugs of holy water with her other hand.

“Don’t give him the baby!”

Hank turns to me then, shocked and confused. “What?” he asks.

“Don’t do it!” I say, ignoring him, my eyes completely focused on the Priestess before me. “Don’t trust him – please! Just – ”

But then, I go pale as Rafe begins to scream in her arms – a noise beyond the normal cries of a disgruntled baby who wants his mother. A very true, very desperate scream –

As if –

As if Rafe himself intuits something about her –

That's something is wrong –

My face goes slack with horror as I shift my eyes away from my baby and back to the Priestess who holds him, as I see now the vicious sneer on her face as she whips up the hand which is not holding Rafe and cracks the jug still held in her fingers hard across Hank's skull.

Hank gives a horrible cry of pain and then falls to the ground, his hands immediately going to his head –

I begin to leap to my feet, heading immediately for the priestess, but she whirls on me next, throwing out a hand towards me and growling some words that have no meaning to me –

But even if I don't understand them, their effects are immediately clear as the water that surrounds me instantly freezes.

I scream, the cold of the ice burning my skin where it touches, pinning me in place, binding me to the floor. I shove my arms against it but – somehow – it's not natural ice. Instead, every time I break it, it re-freezes, holding me ever steady in my place in the center of the room as the Priestess lets out a dark laugh.

"No!" I scream, trying to reach for my baby, but my arms can't move at all. Hank moans on the ground beside me, but I see his feet move- working to get up – see him

The Priestess turns to him, her face turning wicked now, and she delivers a sharp kick first to his ribs – taking his breath and then to my horror to his head making his moan deepen and 1 his body go slack –

"Thank you," the Priestess says, turning back to me with a nasty smile. "

For making this so easy for me. For bidding me come help you once you were separated from that idiot Alpha you call your mate. For telling me precisely where you are, instead of having to hunt you down. The Master will be...quite pleased with me, that I was able to complete the job even when you weaseled out of his first and second traps."

I'm still screaming at her to let me go, to give me back my child, telling her that I'll kill her – and then, desperate, that I'll give her whatever she wants.

She ignores me though. And, as I watch, the Priestess raises one hand over her head and snaps her fingers. A darkness descends over her then as her robes shift in color from dove to a dark and turbulent grey. And I know, instantly, that she's one of them.

One of his.

"So good to be back in my true form," she murmurs, shaking herself a little in relief. Then she smirks at me. "And so good to finally be able to get away from those goody-goods who worship your idiot mother."

Then, taunting me, she comes close to grin down into my face, my baby screaming in her arms. "So good to again serve a real God. He will reward me much when he sees that it is me who has brought the Master his boy. The Master," she says, her voice hardly more than a whisper now – hardly audible over Rafe's screams, "always gets what he wants,"

And then she laughs, turning away from me, as I scream after her completely desperate, but totally unable to move. And she takes my baby away.

Chapter 374 – Frozen

Ella

I scream at the top of my lungs – no words, just senseless agony – the moment the woman turns the corner and I lose sight of my child. The sound is horrible even to my own ears, but I can't stop myself as I hurl myself against the ice that holds me, against which I ceaselessly fight.

A nurse stumbles into view, blood running down the length of her face, and she glances into the room where Hank is crumpled on the floor – where I'm frozen to the ground and gives a little sob before continuing to run away

Away from the priestess, who must be hurting people in her hurry to get out I stop screaming quiet suddenly when I see Hank twitch once again on the floor, see him begin to push to his feet-

"Hank!" I shout, desperate. "Please, Hank!"

He moans a little and turns to me, blinking hard, but then he gasps as he seems to put it all back together. Ella!" he shouts, frantic, turning to me, looking all around –

"No!" I gasp, looking hard towards the door, hoping to hell he takes my meaning. "Go! She she took him! She took Rafe! Go and get the baby!"

Hank nods once and forces himself to unsteady feet and then rushes to the door, pushing himself out of it. And then I lose sight of him and let out a little desperate wail of horror. Because there's – there's nothing I can do-

And the ice that surrounds me, it's burning me in its cold – and I'm shivering so hard here beneath it but held so completely still that I can't even feel myself shake-

Desperate, wailing, in complete panic, I press my eyes shut and try to think of something of anything that I can do

But there's nothing. I'm held still – my son has been stolen 1 my sister is wounded in the next room – mate is out on some mission that I know, in my heart, can't be going well if Xander was this many steps ahead of us

There's nothing nothing I can do – And so, sobbing, I do the only thing I can think of.

I close my eyes, and force myself into that state, and scream inwardly for my mother.

Sinclair

I clench my jaw against the moans and groans that want to crawl out of my throat as we drive. I refuse to allow them the dignity of utterance. After all they won't serve any good. Roger knows precisely how bad off I am now, and he's the only one here to hear me.

But still, the idea of Ella in danger somewhere, with Rafe –

I can't stand it. I have – I have to be by their side. Even if I don't have any idea how I'll be of any use to them when I get here. And I know that Roger feels precisely the same.

We're drawing close now – back to the city, back to the clinic – and I force myself to watch the scenery pass as Roger makes turn after turn, driving as quickly as he can.

It was a terrible decision to make, when we got in the car. Roger hesitated only for a moment, noting that Ella told us in her text to go to our dad – that there was some kind of attack there.

But in our hearts, we both knew we had to get to them – to Cora, to Ella. To our children. It's what our father would want us to do. But still, even beyond my bodily pain, the fear gnaws at me. Was our father even alive?

I press my eyes shut only for a moment as we draw close to the clinic, sending a little prayer out for our dad. I'm grateful, of course, that he got Ella, and Cora, and Rafe out through the trap door – but damn it, why had I been so short sighted in my design? Why hadn't I made some sort of accessible second entrance so that he could get out as well?

"Steady," Roger says, and I feel the car slow down now. My eyes open as I see that we're approaching the clinic. "Dominic, what's the plan here? Are we just going to burst in here? Or -"

But as Roger pulls the car towards the front of the building, our plan presents itself for us. Because out of the front of the building dashes a robed figure, her long hair streaming out behind her. I go tense as I recognize her instantly as one of the Goddess's priestesses – the one who performed Rafe's baptism.

My eyes sharpen as I realize that she has a baby in her arms, that she's running with him. And as Roger pulls the car to a short stop and throws it in park, I push my door instantly open.

As soon as the baby's cries reach my ears, I know that it's Rafe.

And as I watch – before I can do anything at all – a second figure dashes out after the Priestess, chasing after her, demanding that she give him the child-

And my eyes go red when I see who it is.

Hank.

I roar, pushing myself out of the door, but falling instantly to my knees as my body gives out on me – as my wounds protest and the pain takes over, shattering through me –

I put my hands down on the asphalt, willing myself to concentrate, to pull myself together –

But as I do, I hear Roger already on the move. With pain and effort, I raise my head. It's all I can do to watch as a snarl rips from Roger, as he dashes towards the Priestess and Hank, who has caught up with her now. I feel my wolf go wild when I see Hank punch the Priestess squarely across the face, as he reaches for the baby, who she drops in her pain and her fear –

But Hank grabs him from the air, pulling Rafe soundly to his chest –

But just as he does, just as Hank gets Rafe secure in his arms – Hank looks up, his eyes going wide as Roger's fist slams into his jaw.

Hank shouts, moans, and stumbles back two steps as I force myself to my feet, watching carefully. Because something – something is not right here –

Hank puts out his hand towards Roger, holding Rafe protectively against his chest, as Roger advances on him again, pulling his fist back and again punching Hank, hard. Hank goes to his knees, but even as Roger reaches down for the baby, tries to pull my son from his arms, Hank begs him not to –

I take a few shambling steps closer, the best I can manage and I can hear him, then, hear Hank begging Roger not to do it –

"Please!" Hank shouts. "You don't understand, Roger – she's trapped EI!"

But Roger isn't listening, blinded by his rage and his fear for my son, blinded by what is frankly probably his desire to kill Hank, for more reasons than one –

And finally, Roger rips Rafe still screeching from Hank's arms.

And that's when I put it all together.

That Hank he's not trying to take the baby –

He's trying to save –

I gasp in a deep breath, but before I can shout, I watch in horror as my brother hands the child back to the waiting Priestess. "Here," he growls. "Please, hold the baby while I finish this –"

"Roger!" I scream as the Priestess with a too-soft smile takes the baby from my brother's arms. "Roger, no!"

Roger spins to me, confused, as Hank lets out a frustrated shout and points to the priestess.

But Roger is the last to put it all together when he spins again to see her already running, already halfway gone. My baby in her arms.

Chapter 375 – The Cost

My internal screaming continues, echoing through me as I grab whatever bond I have to my Goddess mother and pull on it as hard as I can –

And I'm still screaming, there, in my mind and honestly maybe from my throat as well, I'm too far beyond myself now to know – when suddenly...

...She's here.

My mother's presence materializes first in my mind as she reaches for me, worried.

"Ella!" I hear her say, her voice chiming against my own frantic screams, "Ella, I am here!"

Shocked shocked to feel her, shocked that it worked – I find myself thrown out of my meditative state and into my own body, which is still freezing cold. But when my eyes fly open I gasp to see that she's-

She's actually here. Not just present in my mind – but standing before me. And as I blink frantically, letting my eyes adjust, I realize that she's not... physically here. Not in the way she was when we met her in the desert. But she's here in her spirit – she presents herself before me in an echo of her true form, a glowing, beautiful specter that reaches her hands out towards me.

"Mother!" I gasp. "Mom please – I need my baby – please release me -"

"Ella," she says, coming forward and reaching for me, though her hands can't quite touch my face. I feel her, though something about her touch tingles against my cheeks as she tries and fails to take my face in her hands. "I don't understand, child – I don't know what's happening -"

And then I'm sobbing, looking up at her, desperate for her to know but so cold now so incredibly cold – and unable to find the words to express it all-

"Close your eyes, darling," she murmurs, looking down at me with her beautiful, glowing face. "Show me."

And I do. I press my eyes shut and, sobbing, I press my thoughts – my memories – my fears – my ideas everything forward towards her. And I hear her gasp at first in shock, and then coo with understanding. –

"All right, Ella," she says softly, and I open my eyes again to see her shaking her head at me. "Your gift is bound, my love and I cannot –"

“Please, mother!” I sob, looking up at her in desperation. “Do something melt this ice, unbind my gift – go out go out and kill her just something my baby!”

I see her grief on the goddess’s face, her desire to help as well as her hesitation. We are from different realms – I know she is bound by rules different than me – but I can’t believe that there’s not something she can do.

Suddenly, her face goes grim. “Once, Ella,” she says, her face hard. “There is a way that I can interfere physically in your world once in your life. And I will never, ever be able to do it again. Are you sure that you want it to be now?”

“Yes!” I gasp, desperate. There is nothing else – – no other situation that I could imagine that could be worse – ” Please, mother, please.”

“There is a price,” she says, looking clearly into my eyes. “You will...not be able to call upon me again. Ever, Ella. It is the last time we will speak outside of one of my temples.”

And I gasp as I look up at her, as I realize that the price for this magic is.... our bond. She looks steadily down into my eyes as she nods, realizing that I understand.

“It is worth it, child,” she says softly to me. “I just wanted you to know what the cost was, so you could save your son.”

I stare at her, knowing I should think about it more – that I should hesitate a little-

But no part of me does. Sharply, I nod. I let her know that I know the price, and though it breaks my heart – I accept it.

“All right, darling,” she murmurs and then she leans forward and presses her lips against my forehead. “It will be all right.” And for a moment the press of her kiss against my forehead feels the same as her hands against my face – just a slight tingle until, slowly, her lips grow warm and corporeal against my skin.

I gasp as I feel my wolf come howling back to me, her teeth ripping and gnashing inside me at the injustice done to her, in her eagerness to get out of here, to help our baby –

I look up at my mother, then – knowing it is done – knowing that she has used the magic of our bond to unbind my wolf and her gift. And in its unbinding, our connection has been... used up.

“I love you, Ella,” she says as she begins to fade from my sight. “You will always have a piece of me,” she says, reaching out hand to point towards my chest, where her gift grows warm. “Use it well.”

And then, quite suddenly, she is gone.

And I blink back to myself realizing that-

That even though that felt like a few long minutes with my mother, only seconds have passed –

And that I have to get to my son. Now. So I reach within myself, accessing the gift burning now, hot within me. And I hold onto it, and access its strength, and let it burn through me – through my mind, my heart, my skin And all around me the ice begins to melt.

Sinclair

My brother lets out a roar of rage, dashing away from Hank who sits limp on the ground outside the clinic, holding his head in agony.

But I'm already on the move, shifting into my wolf and bellowing in pain as I do so, as the wounds on my skin stretch horribly, as I feel my inner organs shift into my wolf form and the injuries in them scream in protest against it. But I'm in full panic now, running on fear and adrenaline, pushing myself to go after my son even though my body screams in my mind to stop –

That it can't-

But I ignore it, forcing myself forward beyond the pain, sprinting towards the priestess who carries my son. She's locked in my sight now, her form growing continually larger as I stream towards her, as I ignore my pain and hurl my body into the chase.

I see the moment that she hears me – she her hesitate in her steps, turn-

Her eyes go wide with horror as I pull together my last bit of will and leap for her. I can see the knowledge of her death on her face as she turns towards me, clutching the baby to her in fear as I slam my paws into her shoulders, hurling her backwards-

Her scream rips through the air as she falls, but the instant she loses her balance I reach with my teeth for the little bundle held in her arms, desperate to reach him –

And as she careens for the ground under the weight of my paws my incisors clench in the fabric of Rafe's pajama set – the clothes I dressed him in this morning with my own hands pulling him from her arms as she slams into the ground. My body crashes, hard, on top of the priestess, but I hold Rafe up by arching my neck as far as it will go –

And he doesn't touch her, or the ground he just dangles, screaming, held up by the safety of my teeth. I transform in an instant, reaching for him as I roll away from the priestess, groaning with pain but clutching my little boy safe against my chest –

I can't see, for the pain – I'm gasping, wincing with every passing breath –

Some part of me is aware that Roger is here now – that he chased after me in his wolf's body, that he was only a step behind –

And I hear him in action now as he tears at the priestess, as he rips at her throat and her face, ensuring that she's dead – beyond dead, if he can – sent straight to hell –

But I don't watch can't. All of my energy goes to staying conscious, to holding my little boy tight against me so that he's safe while I struggle for breath.

"Dominic!" I hear Roger panting beside me and then I feel his hands on my shoulders, on my skin – but I can barely register it, feeling myself slip away from the world. "Dominic!" he shouts now, shaking me, cursing frantically.

"Baby," I murmur, trying to hold Rafe out to his uncle. "Take...the baby." But even I know that my words don't make any sense, that I can't get them out.

Still, he understands. I feel Rafe lifted from me and I open my eyes just a little to see Roger standing up with him, tucking him safe against his arm. "I'll be right back, Dominic," he snarls, fierce in his determination to save me. But can I even be saved?

Everything feels...so far.

"I'll be right back!"

Then he's gone, and my son with him, and I'm alone here, staring up at the dark sky. And as I watch, the stars slowly start to blink out.

And everything fades to black.

Chapter 376 – Rolls Reversed

The gift burns through me and the ice strips away from my body faster than I thought possible, water sliding to the floor as I push myself out, as I free my legs and start to run.

I have to grab the door frame as I fly into the hall, using it to pivot around the corner and keep running towards the lobby where scared humans and wolves are pressed against the walls, staring around in hushed voices as nurses begin to treat those who were worst wounded by the rogue priestess who came through apparently willing to hurt anyone in her path –

I ignore them though I can't give them any of my attention right now. I'm focused, instead, on finding my son. I tear through the lobby, hurling the door open at the front of the clinic and bolting through it. I'm already running, my head swiveling, looking for any sign of the Priestess when I hear my name.

"Ella!" I spin, looking everywhere, and finally see Hank on the ground, his hand pressed against his head, his jaw looking painfully swollen. Before I can say anything though, he shoots a hand to his right, pointing off into the distance.

"That way!" Hank shouts. "Roger – Sinclair –"

I gasp in relief – but then fear chases it as I realize that I have no real idea what Hank means when he indicates that they're here –

I start off at a sprint, using all of my senses, needing to find them –

It's not long, though, before I see Roger stumbling towards me, covered in blood a little blue bundle in his arms-

A cry rips from my throat as I put on an extra spurt of speed to get to his side, reaching for my baby boy, tears bursting from my eyes and streaming from my face as Roger comes stumbling to a halt, holding him out to me.

"Is he" I gasp, grabbing my baby, simultaneously trying to hold him close and look him over –

"He's fine, Ella -" Roger says, taking me by the shoulders. But I don't look up at him, instead sobbing down at my little boy, who wails like a banshee in unhappiness and fright. I scan him through my tears but it looks like – I can't see anything wrong-

I close my eyes, seeking my bond with my child – hoping it can tell me more But I can't reach it, because Roger shakes me again.

"Ella!" Roger shouts, his hands still hard on my shoulders. "I'm serious, Ella! Rafe, I think, is okay but... Dominic” He looks back over his shoulder and back towards the clearing behind the clinic.

I snap my head up to look at Roger’s face when he says my mate’s name. And when I see how grave his expression is...how worried...

The blood feels like it drains from me. Like I’m frozen, again, in the ice.

And I turn to look, to follow his gaze, and I see two dark forms laying there, so close to each other in the darkness. One covered in the folds of a priestess’ robes, the other...

I set off again in an instant, as fast as I can go – but I can’t run now – I can’t, with the baby in my arms

I feel someone tug at Rafe and my instincts kick in, making me snap towards whoever it is with a terrible snarl, my teeth fully bared, already elongating in my mouth

Roger opens his eyes wide in shock and puts up his hands, showing me that he means no harm. But he speaks fast. “Ella, the gift – you have to get to him now – please, give me the baby -”

And it breaks every part of my poor motherly heart to hand Rafe over to his uncle, every molecule within me screaming to hold him close, to never let him go again...

But one more glance towards those forms in the darkness has me decided, and I hastily hand my crying child to his godfather. Roger will take care of him, I know. And without a word I take off, sprinting towards my fallen mate.

Sinclair

I blink my eyes open in the forest and wince as the bright white light stings my eyes. Fuck, I think, covering the top half of my face with my hands. Is it already morning?

But then I realize, quite suddenly....

That I don’t remember going to bed.

I sit up, wary, trying to understand...

But I’m not even in my bed. Or...

Inside at all...

Confused, I look all around the bright forest and down at the soft bed on which I sit, running my hands over the crisp white linens. Where the hell am I?

“Hey, handsome,” a soft voice says, and I whip my head up to look at her the beautiful woman standing in front of me. I blink, trying to clear my wide eyes

Because she’s so beautiful. She’s got to be she can’t be anything but...

“Are you an angel?” I ask, my voice low with awe. But she doesn’t answer my question with the soft smile I expect, instead bursting into laughter.

“No, Dominic,” she says, shaking her head and coming close to me, taking my face in her hands and smiling down into my face. “You’ve been asleep for a while. You’re confused. Think about it – you know me.”

“Am I...am I dead?”

She smiles down at me, slowly shaking her head. “No, baby,” she murmurs. “And I’d be worried about these questions, except Dr. Hank says your brain scan is fine. You’re just really, really exhausted.”

“What?” I ask, frowning up at her. But she just smiles at me again and steps closer before sitting herself in my lap. My arms wrap around her instinctually, as if that’s where they belong. As if I’ve done it a thousand times before.

“I’ve been trying for a long time,” she says, ignoring my question, “to get you to meet me here.”

I laugh a little myself. “I can’t come up with a reason why I would protest,” I murmur, looking down at her as she rests her head against my chest and starts to idly drag her fingers up and down the fabric of my shirt. She’s just... so beautiful...

“You weren’t ready,” she sighs. “We were really worried about you, Dominic. The baby especially.”

“The baby?” I ask, confused, and she lifts her head to frown up at me.

“Rafe,” she replies.

I just stare at her, confused, and she starts to shake her head at me, raising her hand to my cheek again. “You need to come back to me, Dominic,” she murmurs. “To both of us.”

“I – I’m not...trying not to...” I protest, horrified to disappoint her – but I don’t know what to do –

"It's okay," she sighs, cocking her head a little as she considers me. Maybe you just need more...time."

"More time?" I ask, starting to get frustrated. I look around the space where we're sitting, starting to get worried. Where the hell am I? Am I...am I dead? Imprisoned? What on earth is happening –

"Calm down, Dominic," she murmurs, sitting up and adjusting herself in my lap so that her legs are straddled wide across my own, so that her hands are linked behind my neck. When I turn to look her way – to protest that I can't calm down – I don't have any idea what's going on – I find her face close to mine, her eyes warm and kind.

"It's okay, baby," she murmurs, nudging me a little with her nose. "You just need to... remember who you are. So that you can come back to me."

And then she leans closer, and presses her mouth to mine, and I feel everything I am collapse at the touch of her mouth against my own. And then, as her lips part, and my arms tighten around her, holding her tight...

I feel myself begin to reform.

And my identity snaps into place.

Chapter 377 – Rebuild

“Hey, handsome,” I say again, in the real world this time. A little smirk pulls on my lips as Sinclair’s eyes flutter open. We’re laying pressed quite close together in the little hospital bed, so I can see every twitch of his eyelash as he begins to focus on me.

He doesn’t say anything at first, just stares at me while he takes a couple of deep breaths. And then, quite slowly, he lifts a hand close to my face, sliding the knuckle of his index finger slowly down the length of my cheek. “Hey, trouble,” he murmurs, his voice scratchy after so many days of disuse.

I burst into a happy grin, so thrilled to see him awake and aware that I can barely contain myself. But I force myself to stay still, to not grab him, to.... let him get used to consciousness again in his battered body..

“Rafe?” he asks, his eyes worried as his memories of his last conscious moments come back to him.

“He’s fine,” I say softly, gesturing with my chin behind my mate, hoping that he understands that the baby is here in the room with us, asleep. “He missed you,” I whisper. “He doesn’t like it when he doesn’t have his dad around to hold him.” I wrinkle my nose and playfully glare at my mate. “He likes you better.”

A little laugh shudders from Sinclair’s mouth. “Does not,” he murmurs, staring at me steadily, as if he can’t get enough of the sight of my face. “You feed him, and sing to him. When you leave the room, he looks for you.”

“Really?” I ask, surprised and pleased. I hadn’t known this before.

“Well, he’s not alone,” Sinclair smirks, shifting forward to press his forehead against mine, a gesture that makes me grin with pleasure, joy pulsing through me at a ridiculous rate to have him back. “You’re the center of the world, Ella. We all turn to you.”

“Good,” I sigh, content. “I like all my boys obsessed with me. Makes it easier to boss you around.”

Sinclair chuckles a little and then pulls back a bit, frowning. I sigh again, but in resignation this time because I know our little stolen moment of peace is over that he needs to know about the world and what’s happened since he’s been gone from it.

“The priestess?” he asks.

“Dead,” I say solemnly. “Roger killed her the moment after you knocked her down.”

“And Rafe is...”

“He’s totally fine,” I say, unable to keep the little smile from my mouth. ” Though I want to hear more about how you caught him in the air with your teeth and didn’t leave a mark on him, Dominic – ”

“Dad skills,” he says with a smug shrug that makes me laugh again. little

But then he continues. “Cora? Dad?”

“They’re both okay,” I say, raising my eyebrows with the pleased memory of using the gift on Cora, patching her up, and then the slightly worse memory of Henry arriving at the clinic, terribly battered needing quite a bite of care.

“It’s a long story,” I say with a sigh, but they’re both fine now. And so are you, by the way,” I add, giving him a little push on the shoulder, wondering why his own health is the last that he asked about. “Seriously? Not curious at all about what’s going on with you?”

“Well, I think I knew that,” he murmurs, rolling his shoulders a little experimentally and glancing down at himself, or at least as much as he can see tucked into the tiny bed with me. I’m not in pain anymore...”

“But you were asleep for three whole days, Dominic.”

“Really?” he asks, raising his eyebrows in surprise. “But you...healed me? With the gift?”

“Yeah,” I say quietly, watching him carefully. “I patched you up almost immediately when we got to you, and then Hank and Roger helped me get you inside – you’re very heavy -“I inform him, giving him a little glare that makes him laugh.

“So why was I asleep?” my mate asks me, smiling a little now.

“Apparently I can fix you up,” I say, ” but I can’t make new blood, or restore lost energy.” I pause here, letting the worry of the past three days creep my face a little. “It was really bad, Dominic. If I hadn’t been there, if I had ...if my gift had still been bound...” into

He shakes his head then and pulls me close so that my body is as flush against his as it can be, my head tucked neatly under his chin. “You saved me, Ella,” he sighs into my hair. “I can...never thank you. I’m so grateful. You’re a miracle.”

“I can’t lose you, Dominic,” I say quietly, my voice shaking a little as I hold him tight. “It was so...so scary. We can’t keep doing this – living like this. We have Rafe now – and the rest of our lives – I don’t want to do this anymore

“I know,” he replies, and I can feel him nodding, agreeing with me. “I’m so sorry, Ella.

Never again. You're right it's not worth it. I can't keep putting my body on the line like this. Peace, now. Peace."

"Do you promise?" I sigh, hoping to hell that he means it – because that's. all I want in the world. My mate, my baby, and peace.

"I promise," he says. "I swear it, Ella."

"Okay." I say, clenching my jaw shut against the hope that blooms in me. Because I want to believe him so bad...

But I also know that this isn't finished. That there are still loose ends that need to be tied up.

Sinclair is still holding me tight when we hear the soft creak of the door opening behind us. I lift my head a little, peering over Sinclair's arm. I smile when I see Hank peering through. the dim light of the room at us. It's late in the evening, but I've drawn the blinds closed anyway.

"Hey, Hank," I say, working to sit up.

He smiles at me and then blinks in surprise at Sinclair. "Is he up?" Hank asks. "Did calling for him in the dream finally work?"

"Yeah," I say, nodding happily as I lean forward and smile at my while Sinclair too works to sit up behind me. friend

"Hey, Hank," my mate murmurs, looking a little ruefully at him, which makes me laugh. "How's your jaw?"

"It's fine," Hank says, shooting my mate a smirking little glare as he comes to take the chart off of the end of the bed, flipping through it. "Roger has apologized, though I...don't think he liked it very much. How are you feeling?"

Sinclair lets the awkwardness pass and takes a deep breath, stretching his arms high over his head. "Rested," he answers, quite simply.

"Good," Hank says, tucking the chart away and looking Sinclair up and down. "Well, there's not much for me to do," he says a little ruefully as he crosses his arms. "Your mate has made my job obsolete, after all."

"Has she?" Sinclair asks, grinning proudly at me.

"Yes," Hank replies as I swing my legs off of the bed and begin to move towards Rafe, who is still napping in his little basinet in the corner. "She healed you with a goddess' gift, and then you slept, and then she went to fetch you from your unconscious state in a dream state. None of which is... standard medical procedure," he continues with a casual shrug, "but... I'm starting to get used to this family's bizarre healing methods."

Sinclair laughs a little at this and leans back against the pillows, looking seriously at Hank as I pick up my sleeping baby, holding him close in my arms and letting him continue his little nap.

"I owe you an apology, Hank," Sinclair says quietly. "We all do. Well, not Cora," he says, tilting his head. "To be fair – she never suspected you had joined the cult of a dark god."

"And me!" I interrupt. "I only suspected for like, thirty seconds! And then again was team Hank!"

Hank laughs quietly, shaking his head and holding up a hand. "No, I get it. I mean, I was offended at first but once Ella and Cora explained it to me, and I got to see Roger grovel a little bit," he smirks here, "which was...quite satisfying in its own way. Well, after all of it, I understand."

Hank tilts his head a little and looks seriously into my mate's eyes before continuing. "I do hope, though," he says quietly, significantly, "that any doubts that you had are now gone."

"I saw the way you chased the woman who kidnapped my son, Hank, how you tried to get him back," Sinclair says seriously, holding Hank's gaze. "I saw what you did for us, and I know what you've done. You have this family's faith forever, along with its gratitude."

Hank nods his head a little, accepting. "Friendship," he says quietly. "Would be enough."

"Well that you have," I assure him, giving him a big smile. "Also forever."

"Good," Hank says, smiling at both of us. "Because there's still a lot of work to do, healing this nation. And together, I think we could do a lot of good."

And as I step to Sinclair's side, smiling at our friend, I'm newly excited about getting started on that work.

Chapter 378 – Family Planning

We're an almost ridiculously cheerful group about an hour later when Roger and Cora come to join me and Sinclair in his little clinic room.

Roger is first through the door, his face stark with worry as he storms into the room after getting word – probably from Hank – that Sinclair is awake.

"Dominic -" he says, all anxiety as Cora follows him in, closing the door quietly behind them. But Roger stops in his tracks when he sees Dominic sitting up happily in bed, smiling down at Rafe who has just woken up from his nap and finished eating. I'm sitting happily on Sinclair's side, so I have a front-row seat.

"Hey, Rog," Sinclair says, looking up and giving his brother a warm smile.

"Seriously?" Roger asks, staring a little dumbfounded at his brother. "You – you sleep for three days after being miraculously healed and all I get is 'Hey Rog'?"

"What else do you want?" Sinclair asks, frowning confusedly at his brother.

"I don't know," Roger says, throwing out an exasperated hand. "Something more significant I guess – maybe some kind of address to the fact that you had us worried sick when you wouldn't wake up

"Ignore him," Cora says happily, crossing the room to Sinclair's side and dropping a happy little kiss on his cheek. "He's just had a hard couple of days groveling to Hank after punching him in the face and handing Rafe back to his kidnapper."

Roger scowls, sinking his hands into his pockets and glaring around at the three of us. "Seriously? Three days later, and I can't get a break about that?"

"We've forgiven you," I say, raising my eyebrows and gesturing between me and Cora – and, I admit, enjoying his awkwardness a little bit. "But Dominic," I say, pointing at my mate now, "hasn't even had a chance to be mad. Not to mention Rafe, when we tell him in ten years. He's gonna be pissed."

Roger clenches his hands into fists and glares around at all of us, starting to get pissed again, and Sinclair – to my glee – feeds into it.

"You're demoted," he says with a deep Alpha's command, glaring back at his brother. "No longer my Beta, Roger. I'll see what I can do about getting you some menial command, see if you can earn my trust back-

"Dom-" Roger gasps, his face falling, but the slow smile that spreads across Sinclair's face has me and Cora cackling. Roger quickly figures out the joke.

“Jackass,” Roger growls, taking a few steps forward to smack his brother on the calf.

“Ow!” Sinclair gasps, pretending to be hurt and flinching his leg away.” Roger, I’m healing -”

Roger’s face goes slack, but when we all burst again into laughter he just crosses his arms and glares at us. “I reject all of you,” he murmurs, staring at each of us in turn. “I break the bonds of mate, of family, of...sister-in-law,” he continues, though I can see him fighting his smile. “Because I refuse to spend my life bonded to jerks who take joy in my guilt and pain – ”

“Oh, get over it, Roger,” Sinclair interrupts, laughing and looking down at Rafe now, who coos and smiles, apparently picking up on the good mood in the room. “It’s fine. No one blames you for anything. Except maybe Hank.”

Roger groans a little, sitting down on the edge of the bed as Cora comes to his side, wrapping an arm around his shoulders. “I almost wish it was Hank who betrayed us and tried to kidnap Rafe,” he murmurs, looking up at his mate. “Then I wouldn’t have to be nice to him.”

“Poor baby,” Cora murmurs, frowning insincerely down at him. “You’ll just have to get over it. And, of course, admit I was right.”

“Never,” Roger growls, pulling her close and making her laugh.

“How’s the baby, Cora?” Sinclair asks, shifting Rafe who he hasn’t put down for a moment since he got the baby in his hands so that he can look all around at us. I bite my lip a little as I watch my mate with his baby boy, pleased to see the obvious love that runs between the two of them.

“Baby is okay,” Cora says, smiling down at herself and putting a hand over her stomach. “We were worried for a little bit – I also lost a lot of blood 1 but after Ella healed me,” she gives a little shrug and meets Sinclair’s eyes again. “We were anxious for a day or two but Roger says that the connection is still strong. I don’t think there’s any reason to be worried anymore.”

“Good,” Sinclair says, raising his eyebrows. “Rafe needs his buddy.”

“Oh yes,” Cora says, raising her eyebrows a little sarcastically, “As long as Rafe gets his buddy, I’m glad my pregnancy can continue.”

“Precisely the right attitude, sis,” I sigh, leaning against my mate.

“Where is dad?” Sinclair asks, leaning back into me.

Roger tilts his head back towards the door. “In another room. He’s okay too but he’s... tired. And I think he feels a lot of guilt.” He grimaces a little and I do as well. Henry and the rest of the men took a hard beating at the bunker. They ultimately came out victorious, but... not everyone made it. I know that Henry feels a lot of guilt for what everyone went through – and especially for putting his grandkids at risk.

All of us – Sinclair aside, of course – have spent a lot of time trying to convince Henry that we all agreed to the plan, we all thought it was best. But he hasn’t let it go.

“You should talk to him,” Roger says quietly, shaking his head at his brother. “He...he might listen to you.”

“I will,” Sinclair says seriously, his eyes on his own son. And I intuit, perhaps through our own bond, that he’s hoping to hell he never puts Rafe in a similar situation, or that he never, ever feels like he’s failed Rafe in the same way his father feels he’s failed his children now. “Of course I will.”

I press myself tighter against my mate’s side, sending a little pulse of love and reassurance down our bond. I want him to know that it’s never going to be like that. Sinclair turns to me, grateful, and presses a little kiss to my forehead.

I nudge him with my nose as he turns back his brother and I look that way too, but instead of Roger, I find my eyes falling on Cora who looks at me with something a little strange in her eyes. And as I tilt my head at her, curious, I see her blush and look away.

And I realize, quite suddenly, that it’s jealousy. Because while she and Roger are incredibly close, and growing closer every day...she doesn’t have the wolf’s bond with Roger that I have with Sinclair. And I know, in my heart, that she wants it. Maybe even feels a little bit guilty that she can’t give that to him.

My face falls when I realize this and I call her name softly as Roger and Sinclair chat about more details of the raid on the bunker, but she looks sharply at me and shakes her head. I slowly close my mouth, glancing at Roger and realizing that she doesn’t want him to know that she feels like she ...I don’t know. Has failed him in some small way? That his choice in her as his mate means he gives up some of the things he always thought he’d have in his relationship?

My heart breaks to think that she thinks that because I know that’s not how Roger feels.

But I nod to my sister, letting her know that I won't say anything. And she gives me my own little nod in response, letting me know she's grateful for my secrecy.

I smile at Cora but then Sinclair's words draw my attention.

"We have to decide," he says, looking between us as Rafe wraps a hand around his dad's gigantic finger, "what our next step is. What we want to...do next. As a family."

"Really?" I ask, surprised. "No more reconnaissance meetings? No more board room councils? Just...us deciding?"

"Well, those didn't work, did they?" Sinclair asks quietly, glancing down at Rafe who gives a happy little noise that makes us all smile. "Dad will be involved, of course, but I think that moving forward..."

My mate glances around at the rest of us, trying to gauge how we feel. "I promised Ella peace," he says quietly, and I meant it. But I think that the best way forward with that is to...stick together. Us four. No more splitting up, no more dividing our forces. Because we have work to do."

"Well, I, for one, like it," Cora says, raising her eyebrows and looking around at all of us. "We've got a doctor, two gigantic wolves, a goddess-gifted healer... I think we're quite a force to be reckoned with."

"Hey," I say, frowning at my sister. "I'm a wolf too."

"Fine," she says loftily, "two and a half gigantic wolves."

"And one and a half tiny babies!" I point out, leaning in to tickle Rafe's stomach and making him laugh. "Who are very cute, if helpless!"

"They're here for morale," Sinclair rumbles beside me, making me grin. "All right," Roger says. "So, we stick together from here on out. But what do we want to do next?"

And as the four of us look around at each other, I realize that...none of us has a plan.

What on earth are we going to do next?

Chapter 379 – Battered

The four of us spent the next few hours talking, eventually ordering quite a bit of takeout and making some complicated plans while Sinclair ate his weight in Chinese food. The sight of him eating pleased me to no end, but eventually I could see him running out of steam.

“All right,” I say quietly, looking significantly at Cora and Roger. “I thinkwe have enough to go on for now. We can pick up again tomorrow.”

“What?” Sinclair asks, frowning around at us though I can see him stifling a yawn. “We have so much to do-”

“Enough,” I say significantly, placing my little hand over his larger one.” You’re still exhausted, Dominic.”

He frowns at me and opens his mouth, ready to fight, but I shake my head once. “Tomorrow,” I say, my voice a command. He narrows his eyes at me but I stand strong. “I understand, Dominic. I know it’s in your nature to tear the world apart in the effort to make it all better as fast as you can. But please, for me, can you start tomorrow?”

He hesitates but sees the sorrow and worry in my face and, slowly, nods. This is the last day you get to boss me around, trouble,” he growls, not happy about it. “Tomorrow, I’m in charge again.”

“I’ll take it,” I say, leaning forward to give him a kiss on the cheek, Rafe curled happily in my arms.

“I think it’s a good plan,” Roger says, yawning himself and stretching his arms. He and Cora stand up and he wraps an arm around her waist, smiling down at her. “Ready for bed, little mate?”

“Sure, little mate,” Cora replies, grinning up at him, knowing precisely what she’s doing. “What?” Roger says with a start, frowning down at her. “That doesn’t work, Cora – you’re the little one – ”

“But it’s sweet!” she says, pretending to be innocent and making me grin. I’m little mate, you’re little mate – ”

“I’m not little,” he growls.

“Awww,” she says, patting his cheek fondly. “Sure you’re not, baby.” And as she turns to head out of the room Roger growls, storming after her, and I laugh a little to see how well she knows him.

“They really do work,” Sinclair says to me after they close the door. “She knows just how to push his buttons. And Roger needs a good teasing to keep him in line.”

“And you?” I ask, perching on the side of the bed. “Do you need to be kept in line?”

“No,” he says, letting his voice drop into that deep, dominant register I like so much. “I am always in charge, Ella. And you wouldn’t want me any other way.”

“Damn right,” I murmur, leaning forward to kiss my mate, letting him feel just how much I like it down the bond. The hum in Sinclair’s chest deepens as he pulls me a little closer, letting one of his hands drift suggestively down my back.

But I sigh and pull away. “Baby’s still up,” I say, nodding down at him. “And you need your rest. I’m going to take him for a little walk around the clinic, okay? While you try to get some sleep?”

“I’ll come with you,” Sinclair says, starting to stand up, but I put a hand out to his shoulder, asking him to stop.

“Please, Dominic,” I beg, letting him see my sincerity in my eyes. “I promise, tomorrow you can go full steam and I won’t say anything. Just...please just get one more good night’s sleep, okay? For me? So I can...I can know you’re all right?”

And he sighs as he sits back against the pillows, but I can see the tired lines settle onto his face as he does. “All right, Ella,” he says.

I kiss him on the cheek, moving the TV remote closer to him so that he can put something mindless on to distract himself so that his mind doesn’t spin while he rests.

“You’ll come back soon?” he asks quietly.

“As soon as the baby’s asleep,” I promise, nodding. Although I cross my fingers just a little bit, because I intend to stay out until I know Sinclair is able to fall into a true, restful sleep whether Rafe is asleep or not.

And then I kiss my mate again and, with a final squeeze of his hand, slip out the door. When I pull the door shut behind me, I turn to find Hank leaning against the wall outside of the door, as I knew he would be.

“Ready to get to work?” he asks, quirking an eyebrow at me.

“You betcha,” I say with a sigh, squaring my shoulders. Then Hank passes me a cloth baby carrier and I let him hold Rafe while I strap it to my chest. Once we get the baby strapped in and settled, I look up at him again.

“Okay,” I say, nodding to my friend. ” Let’s get started.”

Hank and I work side-by-side long into the night tending to the men who were hurt either in the bunker or on the expedition to Xander’s house. I’ve been at Hank’s side every moment that I haven’t been pinned to my mate’s side for the past three days.

It was terrible to continually have to choose between my responsibilities. Every part of my body wanted to be constantly next to Sinclair, holding his hand, being there for him while his body and mind healed from his horrible experience.

But I also have responsibilities as the Luna of this pack, as the bearer of the Goddess’s gift, to use it to heal the men who made such terrible sacrifices for us.

The first night was the worst. Shortly after we got Sinclair inside the clinic was flooded with the men coming in from the bunker 1 some with horrible wounds that needed immediate care. I had to make a horrible decision, then, to prioritize my mate and my sister – to heal them first – while I could hear the men’s screams from the other room.

Tears had poured from my eyes as I did it, as Hank guided me towards the worst of Sinclair’s and Cora’s wounds, making sure they would each survive before I fled to the other rooms and went to work on the men there.

We couldn’t...we didn’t save everyone. I couldn’t get to them fast enough.

And it was horrible – achingly horrible – to hear their cries fade to nothing as worked on one of their comrades across the room. Hank forced me to turn away from the men in the early hours of the morning, when I could barely keep my eyes open.

I had wanted to keep going, but he had been firm. “Enough, Ella,” he had snapped when I had insisted I wanted to do more. “They’ll survive – everyone who is alive tonight will be alive tomorrow. You need to sleep.”

And so I did. I tended to my child, and I slept, and I called to my mate in the dream state for as long as I could, and then I woke up and started again.

But we’ve made good progress in three days. Even if...well, there’s still an incredible amount to do. And every moment that I’m away from them, it tortures me to think of them sitting in here, in pain, waiting.

I follow Hank from bed to bed, where he informs me about the next wound he thinks I should concentrate on with the gift. The list is growing less and less severe as we go. At first it was terrible wounds leaking blood around torn muscles and shattered bones. But now I spend a great deal of my time reknitting sliced muscles, regrowing skin, setting fractures. I admit, I'm glad that it's getting less gory.

"Ready?" Hank asks as we move on to the next case.

"Yup," I say, nodding once and steeling myself, running a hand over Rafe's sweet head as a way to calm my troubled spirit. "Let's go."

"Thank you, Luna," the man I just worked on calls after me, and I send a smile to him over my shoulder.

"Any time, soldier," I say, meaning every word of it. "It's the Luna's job to take care of her pack."

Chapter 380 – Persistence

Sinclair

I wake up frowning, knowing immediately that something is...well, not wrong, but certainly off. I reach out an arm, seeking Ella, but my hand passes over cold sheets. My frown deepens as I sit up and realize that she's not here. A glance at Rafes bassinet makes it clear that he's not here either.

Where the hell is my family?

I sigh, swinging my legs out of the bed, wondering how much time has passed. As I scrub a hand down my face I consider that it can't have been much – there's still no daylight peeking around the blinds. So, a few hours at most. But why the hell hasn't she come to bed?

I stand and head for the door, wondering what the hell trouble is getting up to now. I smirk a little to consider it. Ella...well, it's part of her appeal, isn't it? She's always up to something. I'll certainly never be bored by her side.

The hallway outside my room is empty but I head down it towards where I hear a few murmuring voices. But when I turn into the room, I'm surprised because the first person I see is my father, sitting quietly in his chair by the door, staring into the room.

We don't say anything to each other as I lean against the doorway by his side, because we're both aware that I didn't come here seeking him. I give him a nod and place a hand on his shoulder as my eyes turn to her – Ella, across the room, my infant son sleeping pressed against her chest while she holds her hands out over one of my wounded men, healing him.

"She's going to wear herself out," my father says quietly.

"How long has she been at it?"

"Hours," he says, shaking his head. "She's been burning her candle at both ends for days, Dominic. She's...very dedicated, she wants to do good. But she gives too much."

I nod, understanding, agreeing silently. My kind mate with her big heart she can't stop giving, even if it means giving all of herself. But that's where I come in. It's my job to take care of her, when she'd burn herself out taking care of the whole world if I let her.

I stand for a few long moments with my father, watching her work, knowing it won't do any good to interrupt her in the middle of her task. I'm content to wait in silence, but my father surprises me with his next words.

"I'm so sorry, Dominic," he says, his voice thick with grief.

Shocked, I look down at him. "What?"

He just shakes his head slowly, looking up at me with such regret –

"I almost cost you – cost us everything. I played right into the enemy's hands and risked your mate, your child -" He covers his face with his hand, unable to look at me. "I failed you, Dominic -"

"Stop that," I snap, tightening my hand on his shoulder.

"It was so stupid, to send you away and leave Cora and Ella unprotected – I should have seen it coming, that of course they would follow us back to the bunker after the first attack in the sewer that of course they were just biding their time – Xander has nothing but time -"

"Enough," I growl, starting to get angry with him. "This was not your fault, dad -"

"It was my plan – "

"It was our plan!" My voice comes out louder, harsher than I meant it to. But my dad just looks up at me, more helpless than I've seen him...maybe ever.

"We all agreed to this, dad," I continue, working hard to bring my voice back down to a calmer register. "Me, Roger, Ella, Cora – all of our men, the whole team. We all fell for it, we were all..." I sigh, shutting my eyes and reliving the shame that flooded me the moment I realized that Xander was working to trap us in that house, that he was going after the girls and the baby. "We all messed up, almost cost ourselves everything. You are not alone."

Dad opens his mouth to protest, to continue, but his voice fails him. And he just hangs his head, breaking my heart.

"What's all this?" I hear Ella ask, and I look up from my father to see her standing before us, her eyes wide with worry as she absently drifts a hand over the soft black fuzz of Rafe's hair.

I'm silent for a beat as I try to figure out what to say, but then I just shake my head. "It's nothing, Ella," I respond, not wanting to add to her plate. I can see by the darkness under her eyes that she's exhausted too. "Just ...the fallout."

She nods, accepting my incomplete explanation, and focuses her eyes on my father. "Haven't we been through this already?" she asks quietly. "No one blames you." I nod, agreeing with her, looking down at my father for a response.

But he just waves his hands at us. "Let an old man have his guilt," he sighs, working hard to give us a tired smile. "It gives us something to dwell on to fill these long days. But you two -" he shifts his eyes to Rafe now, dozing against Ella's chest. "You have better things to worry about. You should get that child to bed."

"Yes," Ella agrees, a little guilty, starting to unstrap the baby carrier. "Will you take him, Dominic? I wouldn't have kept him out here so long - I just didn't want to risk him waking you if he got up in the middle of the night -"

"Ella," I interrupt, stern, and she looks up at me with surprise. "You're going to bed with the baby. Come on." I step forward and hold out a hand.

"Oh no," she says, shaking her head and backing up a step. "I have too much to do there's - there are more -" wounded men who I need to -"

"Ella," I repeat, closing the distance between us and putting a hand on her elbow. "You've done enough." I lower my voice so that just she can hear me, so that it's barely more than a rumble in my chest. "You need to rest, trouble. They want you to rest too."

Ella looks over her shoulder then at the room full of half-healed men. Most of them are asleep but those who are not look up at her with grateful eyes - not a single one of them looking at her with need, or anger, or desperation. They're incredibly grateful for what she's doing for them - I know they are because I feel the same way. She's earned their loyalty through and through and each and every one of them would choose to let her rest, now, rather than wearing her out trying to fix them. Especially not now, when they've only got relatively minor wounds left.

Still, Ella bites her lip and hesitates. "There's just...so much more to do..."

I step behind her then, wrapping my arms around her and letting her lean back against me. I give her a moment to collect her thoughts, but my embrace communicates in no uncertain terms that she's in my care now. So, she'd better wrap it up.

As she looks around the room I follow her eyes. "Where's Hank? Or Cora?" I ask quietly, looking for a doctor.

"Cora's asleep," she answers. "And Hank...well, he went to bed a while ago too. And I... kind of snuck back in. And kept working."

"We told her not to, sir!" One of my closest soldiers calls to me. "She wouldn't be" budged.”

I smirk a little and nod to the soldier before resting my chin on top of Ella’s head. “Trouble, through and through,” I say, and she laughs a little, stroking Rafe’s sleeping head again. “Come on,” I say, giving her a little tug towards the door.

“It doesn’t feel right, Dominic,” she sighs. “To leave them here in pain.”

“You can start again when you’re rested,” I say quietly, leading her away. “I’ll help.”

“Are you coming?” she asks my dad when we get to the door. “It’s late.”

“You go,” he replies, waving a tired hand at us. “I’m not tired yet.” “But,” she starts, all concern, but he looks up at her with worried make her fall silent. eyes that “I couldn’t sleep if I tried, my dear,” he says quietly. “Go rest – leave an old man to his thoughts.”

Ella and I leave then, but I know that both of our thoughts are on him worried for him. Neither of us say a word as we return to our little hospital room and turn in for bed.

Chapter 381 – Future Plans

It takes days to finish healing all of the men – long days with Cora and Hank by my side, explaining the intricate details of the wounds. We've found that it helps me concentrate the gift more completely when I know what is wrong that it helps me to stitch all of the flesh together neatly instead of just throwing a bunch of power at it and hoping that it sticks.

The gift itself does not deplete – I feel no lessening of it as I continue to use it for hours on end, day after day – but I certainly feel the toll on my own body as the days pass. It's good work and I don't mind doing it, but healing men, being the mother to a newborn, and mate to a man who will soon be crowned King of our little war-torn country? It's...a lot.

Sinclair tried to help at first, standing with me while I performed my work, but eventually I shooed him off with the baby because I knew his energies would be better put elsewhere and that he could concentrate on Rafe better than I can when I spend half the day in a meditative state. And I also knew that it was driving Sinclair a little crazy, just standing there watching me, trying to be supportive.

But now, as I finish up turning the final patch of burned skin on the final soldier smooth and clear, I stand up with a smile, brushing my hands against my leggings and wondering where he is.

"Thank you, Luna," the soldier says, and I beam down at him happily.

"Glad to do it. Hopefully you get some lighter service, though," I say, cocking my head as I smile at him. "Fancy being a secretary at all?"

He laughs and shakes his head, running a hand over the freshly-healed skin and marveling at it. "Not a chance, Luna," he says. "I'm a fighter, through and through. I'll go back on the field for you and the Alpha any day."

"Well, hopefully not anytime soon," I sigh, patting him on the shoulder and turning away to go look for my mate.

I feel quite light, suddenly, at the realization that it's done. Hank gives me a wave from across the room where he's consulting with some of the men who are going to need physical therapy after their wounds the healing does great things, but it doesn't do everything – and I happily wave back as I pass out of the room, heading to the back of the clinic where Roger and Sinclair have tended to meet.

I sigh a little as I look around the clinic as I pass through it. We haven't left in days, instead turning it into a little barrack in itself. And honestly, part of me is very pleased to be done with this so that we can get out of here. I'm incredibly grateful for this place, for letting it be a place of healing but...well, I want to go home. I want to sleep in my big bed and tuck my little baby into his bassinet. I want a normal night's sleep.

But then I remember that...well, that the last time we left that bedroom there were corpses all over it. And I honestly have no idea what state it's in now – did Sinclair like... send someone to clean it up? Or are they just... rotting...

I stick out my tongue a little in disgust and turn my mind away from the question as I arrive at the door in the back. But still the sentiment is there. I'm dying to get home. I miss my normal life.

But what even was my normal life anymore? Did it exist? Or did Xander wipe it all out when he came for my son?

I sigh, giving a little knock on the door as I push it open.

Four dark heads look up at me and smile as I come into the room, and I laugh a little again at the sight of my tiny baby strapped in his carrier across my gigantic mate's chest. He just looks so small against the wide expanse of Sinclair's body.

"There he is," I say, giving everyone a nod but fixing my eyes on my son as I move over to him. "And how is my baby doing?"

"I'm great," Sinclair says, grabbing my hand before I can touch the baby and pulling me to his warm side, pretending a jealousy that makes me laugh.

"Well, I'm glad to hear that," I say, standing on my tiptoes to kiss him on the cheek before starting to unstrap Rafe from Sinclair's body, wanting him in my arms.

"Are you all finished, Ella?" Henry asks. Roger stands up straight and tucks his hands into his pockets, listening curiously.

"Yes!" I say with a cheerful sigh, bouncing my happy baby a little in my arms. "Everyone is finally all patched up."

"Incredible," Henry says with a marvelous smile that warms me from the inside out. He's been so dour lately – it's good to see him smile. "That kind of turnaround after that level of wounds – it's quite miraculous."

"Powerful," Roger adds, his brow lifting. "Imagine what you could do if you were actually on a battlefield, turning soldiers around..."

I frown at him a little. "I'm not sure I want to think of my mother's gift as a weapon in war," I say, thinking aloud. "True," he concedes with a shrug. That does seem...a little anti-goddess, doesn't it?"

"What are you all up to?" I ask, looking at the table before them which is predictably scattered with paper. "And where is Cora?"

"We're making plans," Sinclair informs me, putting a steady hand on my back. "For our next steps. We'll want to know what you think."

"And Cora is in with a lady doctor she called to come and check her out," ((Roger says with a little shrug. "Although I don't see why that's necessary," he adds with a tiny scowl. "Considering she is a lady doctor."

"You can say OBGYN, Roger," I say, laughing.

"He's just mad," Sinclair says to me in a false whisper that he knows is loud enough for Roger to hear, "because the lady doctor wouldn't let him come in to the checkup so she and Cora could talk privately."

"It's ridiculous," Roger grumbles, leaning over the table and pretending to stare down at the papers. "My baby too – don't see why I can't be there."

I just laugh at my sister's protective new mate who wants to be at her side at all times and take a step closer to my own mate. Honestly, I understand the feeling.

"So, what are the new plans?" I ask, nudging Sinclair with my elbow and looking up at him. "Do we know what we're going to do next?"

"We have...options," Sinclair says contemplatively, staring into space a little. "Honestly, a lot of it hinges on what you and Cora think is best-

Before he can explain why, though, the door opens again and Cora's bright face peeks through. "Did I hear my name?"

Roger crosses the room to her in a flash, taking her hand and looking her over as if the other doctor might have done her some kind of harm. But Cora just laughs at him and swats her hands at him a little bit, pushing the door closed.

"I'm fine, I'm fine!" she says before he gives a little growl and pulls her tight against his side.

"What did she say?" he asks.

"I'll tell you later," she says with a happy grin, and while I definitely want to know as well, I accept that there are some things that Cora wants to keep private between herself and her mate." But everything is fine," she adds, running an absent hand over her stomach. "Nothing to worry about."

"Good," he says, all in a rush, and I can see the real relief on his face.

"But I heard my name?" Cora says, turning to the rest of us curiously.

"Apparently we have decisions to make," I tell her, hoisting Rafe in my arms a little so that I can press a kiss to the top of his head. He's starting to get a little fussy now – I know he's hungry.

"Yes," Henry says. "We've had news of Xander's whereabouts," he continues, which surprises me so much that I feel my blood go a bit cold. "And in light of them, we've got some...big decisions to make."

"Yes," Sinclair adds, and I look up at him, surprised again to see that his eyes are fixed on Cora. "And much of what we do next really depends...well, Cora? It depends on what you want to do."

"Me?" she asks, baffled.

And I feel the same emotion run through me. How did Cora get placed at the center of all of this? I mean – it's not that I begrudge her the spot, I'm happy to let Cora take the lead. But as the single human involved in wolf affairs –

What is it that they want her to decide?

Chapter 382 – Cora’s Decision

“What?” Cora asks, laughing a little as if it’s a ridiculous notion. “What on earth could I have to pick and choose from?”

“Let’s back up a little,” Roger says, tugging her into the room and gesturing towards one of the chairs around the table. As she settles herself into a seat Sinclair pulls over the little armchair that I’ve been using when I feed Rafe, and I murmur my thanks to him as I settle down in it. As Roger begins, Sinclair swiftly hands me all of the things I need to feed Rafe – a burp cloth, a little blanket to throw over my shoulder, etc. – and I smile to myself at his consideration in anticipating my needs without me having to ask.

My Alpha is a warrior, but he’s also a sweetheart. And I’m grateful for him every day. Everyone waits for me to get settled, but then once Rafe is happily eating Henry begins.

“We discovered,” Henry begins, his eyes moving between me and Cora, that Xander has fled east to Adalaxia.”

“Shit,” Cora sighs, slumping down in her chair. My emotions match hers. We knew that Xander was on the run we’d largely decimated any of his that martial forces in taking out his priests. But our great fear was that in the time it took us to regroup, that he’d leave the country and find allies who might help him.

And it looks, now, like he did precisely that.

“Is Adalaxia...a good place for him to go?” I don’t know a lot about the neighboring kingdom, especially as I was raised as a human and hadn’t known that overlying the map of the human world there was a hidden world of wolf kingdoms with its own wars and politics. Of course, ever since Damon broke the secret of the of the wolves to the human world those maps have increasingly combined to become one, but still – what I don’t know about wolf politics could probably fill its own book.

Which, considering that I’ll likely soon be Queen, is...unfortunate. But I force myself to pay attention to Henry’s answer.

“Adalaxia is a notoriously ruthless wolf nation,” he sighs. “They stick even more strictly to what they perceive as the traditions of wolf kind even more than we do. In comparison to them we are...ridiculously liberal.”

“What does that mean?” Cora asks, crossing her arms over her chest, her face worried and confused.

“It means,” Roger explains, “that Xander has likely found allies with a group who would not be on board with our own nation’s current policy, which is that wolves and humans are equal and deserve to be treated with the same respect. They would also," he continues, hesitating now and looking between me and Cora, "really not like the fact that we're having this conversation with our mates. For Adalaxians, women are..."

"Second-class citizens, at best," Sinclair finishes for him. "And at worst, property."

"What?" I gasp, my eyes going wide. "Seriously? Are they also a nation that's been frozen in time for five hundred years?"

"I mean, it's not a bad way to think of it," Roger says, tilting his head to the side. "Women there are not taught to read or write, they have almost a completely separate culture and stay strictly within their homes. It is...not great, in terms of rights."

"Gross," Cora says, her face clearly displaying her disgust. "Though, it makes sense why Xander would go there, considering how he tried to use Ella as his broodmare."

"Precisely," Sinclair says, nodding along with her. "And they're staunch nationalists and monarchists as well. They're likely to respect Rafe's claim to our future throne as Xavier's grandson, not as my son. And, as such, would see Xander's claim to the role of regent as... legitimate."

"That's all so ridiculous," I say, sighing as I look down at my baby, this innocent little person around whom so much revolves.

"Agreed," Sinclair says, reaching out to place a comforting hand on my shoulder. "It's unfortunate that he was able to get there so fast. This would all be much easier if we had caught him at the border, had been able to prosecute him here without having to go through a foreign government to do it."

"Why?" I ask. "Can't we just...demand that they give him back? Extradition, or whatever?"

"We could," Sinclair replies, looking seriously down at me. "If I was King. Which, currently, I am not."

I blink up at him for a second, confused, and then put all of the pieces together. "Ohhhh," I say, my eyes going wide. Because while all of the other claims to the throne within our country have been disposed of, and it's rather a foregone conclusion that my mate will take the throne....

He hasn't done it yet. Which means, technically, that he doesn't yet have access to any of the powers which would allow him to make any of these demands.

"Well, how fast can you do it?" Cora says, sitting up straight and looking easily at Sinclair. "Can we do like... some kind of quick and dirty coronation? Slap a crown on you and get you on a throne by morning?"

We all laugh a little at the idea of this, but there's no real cheer in it, because I think we all know the answer. "It's more complicated than that," Sinclair says, running a hand through his hair. "First, I have to claim it, and then my claim has to be ratified by the governors. It's...all a bunch of bureaucratic nonsense. Interestingly the kind of bureaucratic nonsense that the Atalaxians don't care about. In their country, I'd have been king the moment I killed Damon. But," he shrugs a little, rueful. "That's what we get for wanting to live in a nation in which the people have a say in their lives. It's a better process – but it takes longer."

"Well," I say, looking up at him. "Can we get it started?"

"We can," Sinclair says, nodding down at me. "But this is where your choice comes in, Cora," he says, shifting his gaze to her.

"Seriously," Cora says, spreading out her hands on the table. "I can't with the suspense anymore. Can one of you please just tell me what's going on?"

"Until Dominic is King and we have access to the state military and protection," Roger says quickly, "we don't think it's a good decision to split up anymore. Which we all agreed to."

"It has been a disaster, hasn't it?" Sinclair says, looking down at me again. "Every time we try to leave you two home for safety, we either get torn up or you do. Or both."

"So we're staying together from here on out," Roger says, gesturing around the room. "The six of us. Or, well," he glances at Cora's stomach. "Six and a half."

"I would like to point out," Cora says, "that this was my plan from the start – but noooo, I wasn't allowed to go to the sewer, was I?"

"Yes, you're very clever," Roger says placatingly, rolling his eyes a little before moving on, which makes me laugh lightly. "But, Cora, if we get everything started with Dominic's coronation, that means that..."

He hesitates now, as if he knows what he says will hurt her.

"What?" she pushes, dying to know and getting a little frustrated.

"It means that you wouldn't be able to go to the temple any time soon," Sinclair finishes. "To ask your mother for answers to the big questions you have. About your baby, and about your mating."

“Oh,” she says, sitting up straight in her chair and thinking it through. “Oh, I see.”

I nod along with her, seeing the point now. Because after we discovered that the priestesses of my mother’s temple in the city had been infiltrated by the Cult, it has been shut down for the moment. Besides, that temple was more of a place of worship than a true conduit for my mother – the closest of those temples, where priestesses live in dedication to her and are able to truly call on her presence, is hundreds of miles away.

And if Cora wants to go and ask her questions?

We either have to do it now, before the coronation begins? Or she has to wait and that waiting could take quite a long time.

I purse my lips, wondering what the right choice is. Because what matters more now – answering my sister’s big questions? Or chasing down the man who tried to kidnap my son?

Chapter 383 – Road Trip

Ella

I watch Cora struggle with her choice, biting her lip and trying to figure out how she feels. My heart goes out to her now, because I know that she thinks it is an impossible ask to tell us that she wants to put a coronation on hold so that she can visit a temple.

But suddenly, quite suddenly, it's all I want for her. Because Cora has been here for us through all of this – and she deserves answers to these questions. And I open my mouth to say this, but Sinclair beats me to it.

"I think we should go," he says, and I whip my eyes up to see him giving a casual shrug. "It will only take a few days," he adds, looking down at me to see how I feel. "And, quite frankly, we could...use a break before the madness begins again."

A little smile creeps over my mouth. "Would it," Cora begins, and then hesitates again. But we all wait, letting her find her voice. "Would it be safe?" she asks.

"We think it would," Roger says steadily at her side. "Xander's on the run, which means he's scrambling. He's an old man and we took out the forces that he was using to physically attack us. Even if he's working to get more, we think that we have...at least a small window of time."

"We would have to move quickly and quietly," Henry adds, more cautious now than he's been in the past – I think spooked, still, by the disastrous results of our last plan. "No planes or anything flashy – just...a small, anonymous family trip."

I turn my attention back to Cora, wanting to know what she thinks. But she's still sitting perfectly still and quiet, clearly putting her thoughts together.

"I can't ask you to do this," she says after a long, quiet minute. "I – we need to get the coronation going, to keep us all safe."

"You don't have to ask us to do it, Cora," Sinclair answers quietly, and I turn my eyes up at my mate. "We're telling you we want to do it. Right?" he looks at me now and I nod eagerly.

"Honestly, Cora," I say, leaning forwards her. "It's what I was thinking. I think it's right – I think we should go."

Roger says nothing, simply staying steady at Cora's side, letting her make up her own mind. But she just continues to shake her head. "But there's already so much to do here." She sighs, putting her head down in her hands for a moment as she collects her thoughts.

“The Cult, and the priests, and Xander – it was already a distraction from the aftermath of a war with the humans that has been terribly complicated. There is still so much work to do here, and Ella,” she looks up at me now, “we could be spending this time going to the refugee camps, actually helping people, now that we have the gift -“

My face falls when I realize that she’s right. That there is so much to do here, that it’s perhaps selfish to consider this possibility –

“Two days, Cora,” Roger says quietly next to her, taking her hand. “Two days, and then you can come back and save the world, and take on those problems and surely everything else that’s going to come along with them. But,” he gives her hand a little squeeze, “it would be okay to take two days. You deserve that. You’ve earned that.”

And I find myself nodding, agreeing. Because as I consider what the rest of our lives are going to look like...it’s going to be a lot of dedication to the people of this nation, of this world. And it will make me so happy to do that work – to help people.

But Cora is one of the people I want to help. She deserves it as much as anyone else. Plus, she’s my sister. And that has to count for something.

“Let’s go, Cora,” I say, leaning forward and giving her an encouraging smile. “Two days.”

She bites her lip and I can see that she’s tempted, even if she hasn’t given in yet.

“Would it help,” Sinclair continues, cocking his head to the side, “if I told you that we’d be going in a very fancy RV? With a real bed that you and Roger could sleep in, and not be wedged together in a hospital bed?”

Cora sits up straight at the idea. “You should have started with that,” she says, her eyebrows going up almost to her hairline. “I was sold at ‘real bed.’ Let’s do it.” And then a little smile creeps onto her face.

I let out a little cry of joy, throwing up the hand that’s not holding my baby to my chest. “Yes!” I shout, laughing now. “Road trip! This is so exciting! I’ve never been on a road trip in my life!”

“Really?” Sinclair asks, smirking down at me, pleased to see me so excited.

“Really!” I cry, looking excitedly between him and Cora. “This will be so cool! I’ve always wanted to go on a road trip! This will be the best vacation ever!”

“Well,” Henry says, laughing a little along with me. “It’s not precisely a vacation -”

“Nope!” I say, getting to my feet, carried away a little by my excitement. “We get two days,” I say, holding up two fingers to everyone in the room. “Two days before we dedicate our lives to helping the people of this world, and destroying our enemies, and running a nation. So if I get two days respite from all of the awful things that have been happening to us lately? They’re going to be the best two vacation days we’ve ever had!”

And then I’m laughing and dancing around the room, holding Rafe up in the air and asking him if he’s excited for his first vacation. I think my joy is infectious, though, because when I turn back to my family everyone is smiling, laughing a little, and chatting as we start to make plans.

Cora bites her lip again, but I can tell it’s with excitement this time as I move to her side, swooping down to give her a kiss on the cheek. “I’m so excited,” I say, grinning down at her. “You’re going to get to talk to mom! And get all of the answers to your questions!”

“I know,” she says, a hesitant excitement building in her now. “I just hope...well, I hope that she tells me what I want to hear, you know?”

“She will,” I say, smiling and placing a hand on her cheek. “Things are going to start looking up for us, sis. I can feel it. Now let’s get packed! Because we’re going on a road trip!”

And then I whoop again and throw my hand up in the air. Sinclair laughs as he comes to my side, his phone already in his hand as he starts putting the plan into action. ”

Come on, trouble,” he says, glancing at me. “Let’s go get packed – we’re going to have to move fast now if we want to make this work.”

“Okay,” I say, and then I glance back at Cora, wanting to make sure she’s all right before I go. But she waves me off, standing up to start making her own plans with Roger. Henry, likewise ready to get started, starts to roll for the door to make his own plans. Excited, I take Sinclair’s hand. “So, where do we get an RV?” I ask, pleased.

“You leave it to me,” he says as we head out of the room and start to walk down the hall. “You go pack our things and I’ll get our ride.”

“Okay,” I say, heading for our little room. But before we part ways, I turn sharply and tug at his hand, making him pay attention to me for just one more moment. “That offer of the big bed,” I say, looking up at him with a frown. “That had better be on offer for me as well. Because if I have to squeeze into another single bed with your gigantic self for one more night,” I add, pointing a finger into his face, “I am out.”

He laughs and grabs my accusing finger, placing a kiss on the tip of it before turning away from me and heading down the hall. “Your wish!” he calls over his shoulder. “My command!"

"Damn straight," I mutter, smirking and watching him as he walks away from me. And then I sigh a little in excited content. Because my mate has stolen me two days away from this crazy world and I couldn't be more excited for this trip.

Chapter 384 – Long Miles

I gasp a few hours later when I see the gigantic RV that rolls up out front of the clinic.

“Seriously?” Hanks says, crossing his arms over his chest and staring at it, somewhere between impressed and revolted by the extravagance. “The gas mileage on that thing must be horrible

“Ohhh,” I say, laughing and swatting him on the arm with one hand, the other holding Rafe’s carrier where he’s already bundled and ready. “Don’t spoil my fun, Hank – you’re just jealous because you’re not coming.”

“Yes,” Hank murmurs, giving me a good-natured side eye. “Yes, there’s absolutely nothing I want more in the world than to be cooped up in a tin can with Roger and Cora for forty-eight hours. You’re right.”

I laugh when I consider this point, stepping closer to Hank and wrapping him in a one-armed hug that he’d probably rather avoid. But we’ve grown a lot closer in the past few days, working together, and well? If he’s going to be my friend, then he’s going to have to get used to a great deal of affection.

“You’ll be all right here when we’re gone?” I ask, pulling away.

“Ah, don’t worry about me,” Hank says with a little smirk and a shrug. You guys have bigger things on your plate.”

“When I come back,” I say, looking at him seriously now, hoping he understands how much he means to me – to all of us. “We’re going to do big things, okay? Help a lot of people. With the gift, and with your skills.”

“That’s all I want, Ella,” Hank says seriously, giving me a nod and a little smile that’s likely the most emotion I’m going to see from him anytime soon. But then his eyes drift to Cora and Roger who come through the door of the clinic and I know...well, I know that what Hank says about this being all he wants is a little bit of a lie. And my heart aches for him because I know now, for sure, that he’ll never get it.

I purse my lips a little, trying not to let him see me pity him. But he catches me in the act.

“Don’t,” Hank sighs, shaking his head at me. “I’m good, Ella. I really am.”

“I know,” I say, putting a hand out to his shoulder. He gives me a sad little smirk before turning back into the clinic – intent, clearly, on busying his mind so that he doesn’t have to think about her. Cora and Roger call brief goodbyes to Hank before coming to my side to admire the RV.

"It's huge," Cora says, her eyes wide.

"It's not so big," Roger says with a shrug. But Cora and I both roll our eyes at him as Sinclair parks the vehicle and climbs out of the driver's seat. Cora and I didn't grow up with much as kids, and we've certainly never been on a vacation like this – with a whole fancy vehicle reserved just for us.

I'm so incredibly excited I can barely contain it.

"Ready?" Sinclair asks, opening the door to the living compartment of the RV and pushing a button that activates a little metal platform that lowers itself to the ground so that Henry can wheel onto it.

"Yes!" I say, taking Cora's hand and pulling her with me to Sinclair's side. "Is it nice? Are there enough beds? Is there a kitchen? How do you -"

Sinclair just laughs at me, shaking his head as Henry maneuvers himself onto the lift. "Just go in, Ella," he says, nodding towards the door with the short flight of stairs. "Explore. Let yourself be surprised."

I eagerly do as my mate suggests, hurrying up the steps and gasping with excitement again as I look around. It's absolutely gorgeous inside, and everything is so shiny –

"Oh, wow," Cora says, her eyes as wide as mine as she climbs in after me. "This is... amazing."

My sister comes with me as we wander around the space, admiring the gorgeous kitchenette with its white leather table space, the little living area that comes after that, the adorable, cleverly designed bathroom that makes the most of the minimal space allotted to it. But I really gasp when I see the bedroom tucked away in the back – with its king-sized bed, and plush downy linens.

"Oh my god," I say, quickly unbuckling Rafe from his carrier and groaning as I sit down with him on the bed which is as comfortable as it looks. "Oh, I missed big beds –"

"Um, Ella," Cora says, smirking at me from the doorway. "What do you think you're doing?"

"Huh?" I ask, confused.

"That's my bed," she says, her wicked smirk growing.

"What!?" I gasp, and then I groan as I remember Sinclair's promise to her – a big bed for her and Roger. “Well then where do I sleep?!”

“Out there,” Sinclair says, appearing in the doorway behind Cora. “The couches transform – one into a queen for me and you, and the other into a twin, which my dad will take – ”

“Noooo,” I moan, tossing my head back and settling deeper into the pillows. “Can I sleep in here with Cora and Roger? I won’t take up much space – you can take the baby and -”

“No chance in hell,” Roger declares, pushing past Sinclair into the room with little travel bags filled with his and Cora’s stuff which isn’t much, considering we haven’t had access to any of our possession since we left the bunker. Roger places the bags on the ground and snaps his fingers at me when he straightens up. “Up, Ella. That’s my bed.”

“No, I need it,” I whine, pouting at him.

“Ella,” Cora says, unable to keep the mischief out of her eyes even though she pretends she’s serious. “I’m pregnant. I need my rest.”

I sigh then, glaring at her for playing the pregnancy card.

“Fine,” I growl, making them all laugh as I huff my way back to the living room. “But this queen-sized bed better be comfortable,” I say to my mate as I pass him.

“Fit for a Queen,” he says, following me back into the main living area of the RV and giving Roger and Cora a moment alone.

To my surprise, Henry has already settled himself at the front of the RV, locking his chair into a space where the passenger seat should be. He gives me a little wave before turning back to a set of maps. I take a moment to admire the ingenuity of the vehicle and how cleverly it’s been made accessible for someone in a wheelchair.

“You two ready?” Sinclair says, wrapping an arm around my shoulder and looking down at Rafe, still in my arms and looking happily around at all of the bright lights.

“Yes,” I say, meaning it as I give him a big smile. “How long do you think it will take to get there? To the temple?”

“We’ll probably get there sometime tomorrow,” Henry calls over his shoulder and Sinclair nods in agreement. “Oh,” I say with surprise. “So where will we sleep tonight?”

“A campground somewhere,” Sinclair says with a shrug. “We have to see how far we get. It’s part of the adventure, and part of staying anonymous. No reservations for people to know where we’ll be staying.”

“Do you think,” I say, glancing out the windows. “That we’ll be followed?”

“I don’t,” he says, placing a finger beneath my chin and turning my face back to him. “It’s all right, Ella,” he says softly. “You can relax. Enjoy it. You’ve worked so hard lately – let me... let me give this to you, as well as to Cora.”

And a soft smile finds my face as I realize that Sinclair’s willingness to take this trip was about ensuring that Cora and Roger get the answers that they need, but that it’s also about me. About us. About giving us a minute as well to just...breathe. To have a nice couple of days.

I nod to him, letting him know that I understand.

Roger comes out of the bedroom area, Cora close behind, and he claps his hands, asking if it’s time to get started. I settle myself down on one of the little grey couches, eager to see what happens next, and Cora sits next to me, likewise buzzing with excitement.

Then, as one, our mates turn towards the front of the RV and take a step towards the driver’s seat.

“Um,” Sinclair says, putting out a hand and settling it on Roger’s chest, stopping him. “Where do you think you’re going?”

“To...drive,” Roger says, as if it’s obvious. Sinclair lets out a sarcastic little laugh. “Funny,” he says, gesturing towards where Cora and I sit with his other hand. “Go play checkers with your mate, Roger.”

“How can I do that, Dominic,” Roger says, his voice deadpan, “it will be very distracting to be playing a game while I’m driving.”

And then the two of them start to bicker about who is going to drive, making Cora and I dissolve into laughter.

“Do you think there’s really checkers?” I ask her, looking around at all the clever little compartments around me.

“I hope so,” she says, starting to open a drawer which I gasp to see is indeed stacked with a bunch of games – most of them magnetic so that we can indeed play them while we’re driving.”

Because I’m going to need a distraction if we’re going to listen to that all day,” she says, nodding towards the brothers who still continue to fight.

It takes them about fifteen minutes to come up with a driving plan that they both find equitable and Roger sits down next to Cora in a huff, letting Sinclair take the first shift.

“Red or black?” Cora asks him with a smirk, unfolding the board and placing it between them. “Black,” he sighs, scowling a little and looking jealously at his brother in the front of the RV.

“Poor baby,” Cora coos, running a hand through Roger’s hair. “Don’t worry – you can have your turn soon.”

His scowl deepens, making me laugh, and then – with a lurch – we’re on our way. My stomach twists with excitement. A road trip! I can’t even begin to think of anything I want to do more with my family right now.

“I get winner,” I declare, leaning back against the cushions with Rafe sitting happily in my lap as Roger and Cora begin to play. I’m looking forward to this relaxing little vacation, but deep down?

I’m most excited about Cora getting answers to her questions. Soon, I think, my stomach giving an excited little twist. Soon we’ll know the answers to so many mysteries about this baby.

Mysteries I’m absolutely dying to have solved.

Chapter 385 – The Long...Long Road

Ella

It takes me just a little over an hour to realize that...I hate road trips.

“Oh my god,” I murmur to Cora as the vibrations of the gigantic RV continue to shake through us, making poor Rafe grumble uncomfortably. “Is it night yet? Can we stop?”

“You’re being a baby, Ella,” my sister replies, looking up at me with a smirk, jumping her red king over three of Roger’s black checkers and capturing them. “It’s fun!”

“You’re only having fun because you’re kicking Roger’s ass for the third time at that game,” I murmur, sighing as I glance out the window.

“Seriously,” Roger sighs, leaning back against the white leather of the kitchenette’s booth. “You should quit that, Cora. For Ella’s sake – she’s trying to enjoy herself.” He runs a frustrated hand through his hair, staring at the board.

“Yes,” Cora replies, laughing. “For Ella’s sake, I’ll go easy on you.”

“I just thought it would be prettier,” I sigh, looking out the window at the endless highway miles. “Like, purple mountains majesty. Fruited plains. Etcetera.” Instead, it’s just hour after hour of looking at cars, and asphalt, and the sad little pine scrub that borders the highways.

“Maybe when we get further out,” Cora offers, hopeful. “Nah,” Roger replies, making his next move on the checker’s board. “After the forest it’s all corn for days.”

I groan, leaning my head back. “I hate corn.”

“No, you don’t,” Cora chides, instantly making her next move on the board and capturing two more of Roger’s pieces. He gasps in protest and then slumps back again.

“How are you doing this,” he murmurs, studying the board. “Are you a witch?”

“Maybe,” she says with a shrug. “Guess we have to ask mom.”

I smile at her then, bouncing my fussy baby in my arms. And I inhale a deep breath, silently ordering myself to cheer up because even if I decidedly do not like riding in the RV, I’m still excited to take this trip for my sister, to get her the answers she so desperately wants.

Eventually Cora and I retire with the baby to the bedroom where Sinclair suggests I might not feel the movement of the RV as much. The boys all stay together up front, studying maps and discussing ridiculous things like terrain and gas mileage things. they find endlessly fascinating for some weird boy reason. But I shrug and leave them to it. Cora and I curl up in the incredibly comfortable bed and spend our time chatting, watching movies, and napping lightly with the baby between us.

It ends up being a wonderful day in the little sun-soaked room at the back of the RV, laughing and talking with my sister, reconnecting with her and with the peace that I've been missing from my life since that terrible day when those men broke through my window.

"Do you think it's all really over?" I ask her in a quiet moment as the sun starts to sink to the horizon.

Cora doesn't bother to ask me what I'm talking about – she already knows. "I don't," she sighs, telling me honestly. "I think...well, Ella, I think we picked mates with big lives. I think we're going to have to snatch at moments of peace whenever we have them because the next challenge is always coming. And that we're going to have to fight to make that peace in our lives, because...something is always going to try to steal it away."

I sigh, looking down at my napping baby, trailing a little finger down his belly. "Are we dumb?" I ask quietly. "Did we choose wrong? I mean – neither of them are our fated mates. We picked this...should we have chosen simpler lives?"

"You don't want a simpler life," Cora laughs, and I look up at her in surprise to see her smiling and shaking her head at me.

"What?" I ask, sitting up straight, "Cora, I was a nanny – I was ready to be a broke single mom, to live quietly alone with my baby.

"Nah," she says, waving a hand at me in dismissal. "That was just the start of your story, Ella, always. Yes, you were always going to be a mom," she says, cocking her head to the side, "but...you were never going to stop helping people. I think it kind of makes sense that you ended up being such a good pair for Dominic. He opens a door for you to help thousands when he is king, and I think that was always your fate."

"Huh," I say, considering what she's saying. And I guess...well, I guess I think she's right. That this was perhaps always the life I wanted, even if I want to pretend sometimes that I wanted a simple life.

"And also," she adds, her voice dropping lower. "I'm actually...I'm not sure if Roger isn't my fated mate," she says, considering.

"Really?" I ask, my eyes going wide. "But you're a human -"

"I know," she says, frowning. "But... Ella, this thing between us," she says, shaking her head. "It feels really big. I don't...know how to explain it except like that."

"Did you feel a mating bond snap into place?" I ask, curious.

"I don't know," she says, turning back to me. "But Roger said it first, when we were out in that rainstorm – that day when we had to stop at the roadside motel."

I grin at her, knowing what happened that day, and she blushes a little and rolls her eyes. But I lean forward eagerly, wanting to know. "What did he say?"

"That I was his mate," Cora replies, giving a little shrug. "But the way he said it so definitive. Not I choose you as my mate. Just...that I was."

"Wow," I say, impressed, a little jealous. I have no hesitations about Sinclair as my chosen mate, and I know that what's between us is far beyond anything he had with his own fated mate. But still – it's an experience I'll never have. "Well," I continue, "did you ask him about it?"

"No," she says, shrugging again.

"Why not?"

"Because," she sighs. "I...like the idea. I don't want him to tell me that I'm not." "Well, I'll go ask -" I say simply, scooching forward on the bed, ready to jump off.

"Ella!" she gasps, grabbing my arm.

"What?" I reply, looking at her wide-eyed.

"Stop meddling!" she laughs, tugging me back down. "That's between me and him!"

"And me now! Since you told me!"

Cora laughs, throwing a pillow at me. "Lay down, trouble," she growls, doing her best impression of Sinclair. I laugh and snatch the pillow out of the air. Then I do as she says, sighing as I lay down and reaching out to gently pull my little baby closer to me.

"Okay, I won't," I murmur, smiling up at my sister. "But you have to tell me as soon as you know. Do you think you'll ask mom?"

"Probably," she says, smiling contentedly. Then her face falls a little as she cocks her head at me. "Do you think you have a fated mate somewhere out there, Ella? Looking for you?"

"Nah," I say, smiling down at my baby. "Not everyone gets one, they're pretty rare. So," I shrug, smiling down at my baby and leaning over to give him a little kiss on the head. "I think the Goddess gave me Sinclair, and he's more than I could ever ask for."

"Damn right I am," my mate says, coming into the room and leaning against the wall, smiling down at us. He and Roger switched driving positions about an hour ago at a rest stop where Cora and I picked up some more snacks. "What are you two talking about?"

Cora opens her mouth to bring up the fated mate question, but I interrupt, not wanting Sinclair to even have to consider it. "Who loves their Sinclair brother more," I say simperingly, smirking at him. "Me or Cora. We just can't decide, we're both so obsessed with you two -"

Sinclair growls playfully, coming swiftly to the side of the bed and laying himself down on it, fitting his body close to mine. "You'd better be winning, little mate," he murmurs, nuzzling me as he slips an arm around my waist and pulls me close. "I can't let Roger have this one." I laugh and assure him that I am indeed winning as his stubble rushes against my skin, tickling me and making me laugh.

Cora pretends to gag and stands up from the bed, snatching a bag of pretzels and heading for the door. "I'll be out here!" she says, waving to us over her shoulder. "Don't do anything weird in my bed!"

Then, as she disappears from the room, I half turn to my mate and wrinkle my nose at him mischievously. "Want to do weird stuff in her bed?" I whisper, trailing a finger down the length of his chest.

"Absolutely I do," my mate murmurs back.

Chapter 386 – By the Fire

The trip improves by leaps and bounds the moment we stop at the campground for the night.

“Finally,” I sigh, taking a deep breath of the fresh air as I climb down the steps of the RV, my baby curled in my arm and looking around him with bright and interested eyes. “It’s good to be on steady ground again.”

“Remind me never to take you on a boat,” Sinclair murmurs, coming down the stairs behind me. “If you didn’t like this...you won’t respond well to that.”

“Yes sir,” I say passively, smiling down at the baby, who frees one of his arms and reaches out into the cool evening air, clasping his fingers at a firefly who passes close by. I don’t mention that I liked the sea voyage to the desert much more than I liked this, even though the accommodations weren’t as nice.

“What about this?” Sinclair murmurs as he steps down the final step and comes to stand behind me, wrapping his arms around my shoulders. I smile as I lean back against his chest. “Is the forest an improvement?”

I look around our isolated campsite, lit with grey and blue tones in the dying light of the day. I smile at what I see, appreciating the cool air and the blinking light of the fireflies that float lazily through the space.

“Yes,” I say with a decisive nod. “This will do quite well.”

“Good,” Sinclair replies, giving me a quick kiss on the cheek before releasing me and moving to a luggage compartment low on the RV, I watch as he opens it and begins pulling out camping gear chairs, a cooler, some bags with extra snacks and bug spray.

“Oh!” I say, surprised by it all as my mate begins to set it all up around a burned-out ring where a fire goes. “Oh, we’re very prepared.”

“Of course we are,” Roger says, climbing out of the RV with Cora behind him. When he reaches the ground, Roger flicks the switch that prepares Henry’s little elevator. “We’re always ready to go glamping in this family.”

I laugh at the term, settling into a chair that Sinclair waves me towards, smiling down at the baby. “What do you think, Rafe?” I whisper to him. “Do you like glamping?” He gives a happy little coo in response and I laugh, grinning up at his father. “I think that’s a yes.”

“Kid has taste,” Sinclair says, winking at me as he continues his work. We’re all settled around a fire much faster than I thought was possible and I smile as I watch Sinclair and Roger set a little grill across it, apparently preparing to make us our dinner as well.

“They only cook,” Henry whispers, leaning over to Cora and I and giving us a smile, “when it’s outdoors. Otherwise, they’re not interested.”

“Not true!” Sinclair protests, his eyes still on the fire.

“Absolutely true!” Roger chimes in, making us laugh. “If I’m making food, it’s grilled. Otherwise I’m getting takeout.”

“Guess your baby is gonna eat a lot of hotdogs,” I murmur to Cora.

“And eggrolls,” she adds, sighing. Then she looks over at me from her chair next to mine. “You know I can’t cook either.”

I shrug. “Maybe we can make them hire us chefs,” I consider. She raises her eyebrows, pleased at the idea, and we both grin.

It continues like this long into the night the family gathered happily around the fire, talking about nothing and everything, chatting lightly about what we’ll be doing in our mutual future but not touching on any of the big, scary subjects that lurk behind the conversation. We all know that they’re there, after all – and we all simultaneously decide to leave them untouched for the moment.

Instead, tonight is just about laughter, and fun, and spending time together.

I moan a little as I bite into a smore that Sinclair hands me, the marshmallow burned to a crisp just the way I like it. “Oh my god,” I murmur, closing my eyes as I chew. “This is so good, I can barely stand it.”

“You’re dripping,” Sinclair laughs, you’re going to get marshmallow all over the baby – ”

“I don’t care,” I murmur, shaking my head and refusing to open my eyes as I take another bite. “He won’t mind -=”

Sinclair laughs again as he comes and lifts Rafe from my arms. I let him, wanting to be alone with my s’more anyway. Cora, Roger, and Henry laugh as well as Sinclair walks Rafe away from me, apologizing in a loud murmur for how messy and inconsiderate his mother is. I wave a hand at him, dismissing him and his words, knowing that he’s kidding anyway.

Regretfully, I finish my s’more and look around at my family, watching them quietly. Henry watches Sinclair and his grandchild while Cora and Roger sit close to each other, not talking but clearly connected in this peaceful moment.

"It's nice out here," Cora says, wrapping her arms around herself and smiling around at our dark camp. "I didn't think I'd like sitting outside in the dark by a fire as much as this."

"Something primal about it, isn't there?" Roger murmurs, raising a hand to play with Cora's hair as he smiles at her.

"Yeah," she says, looking up at the stars and then turning her head to look at Roger, beaming at him.

I can't help my own smile from crossing my face as I watch them. And then, as they stare at each other, I decide that that's my cue.

As quiet as I can, I stand up from my little camping chair and send a pulse down my bond with Sinclair. He looks up at me, curious and I nod my head first towards the RV and then towards Roger and Cora, who begin talking quietly. My mate follows my gaze and then nods his understanding. He walks to his father and puts a hand on his back, leaning down to speak a whispered word.

Then, one by one, as stealthily as we can – which is not very stealthy, considering Henry has to be lifted into the RV with a noisy platform – the three of us and the baby make our way back into the little mobile house, leaving Cora and Roger alone by the fire to have a moment to themselves.

"What do you think they're talking about," I say to Sinclair as he climbs last into the RV, pulling the door shut behind him, the baby still curled in his arms. I'm sitting in the little kitchen nook, peering out the window at Roger and Cora through the tinted window.

"Isn't that their business, little spy?" he says, coming to sit with me on the plush leather. Henry, perhaps wanting to give us our own moment, rolls his way back to the bedroom, making some excuse about wanting to watch some television, though we both know he doesn't watch TV.

"Yes," I sigh, looking up at my mate and reaching for my baby, who Sinclair passes into my arms. "But you know I always want to know."

Sinclair laughs. "Do you know," he murmurs, slipping his arms low around me and pulling the baby and I warmly against him, resting his chin on my shoulder so that he too can look out at Cora and Roger, "I never cared as much about the details of my brother's love life until you came along."

"Why not, I say, still peering out at them. "Roger's hot. He probably has had lots of interesting girlfriend drama

"Roger's hot?" Sinclair asks, his body going stiff behind me, just a little bit.

“What?” I ask, turning to him, confused now.

“You think my brother’s hot?”

I burst out laughing, lifting a hand to my mate’s face. “Dominic,” I say, shaking my head at him. “Your brother is hot. It’s an ostensible fact – not my opinion.”

“Still,” he growls, pulling me tighter. “I don’t like to hear you say it.”

“Oh?” I inquire with a smirk. “And what would you have me say instead?”

“That all men, beside me, are nonexistent. Or disgusting swamp creatures – ”

I burst out laughing again at this, tilting my head back.

Sinclair laughs along with me and I tuck myself even closer to him, grinning up into his face. “I promise,” I murmur, pressing a kiss to his mouth, all men, next to you, actually are disgusting swamp creatures. But, for Cora’s sake, I’m glad Roger’s hot.”

Sinclair’s chest hums for a moment as he considers my point but then he nods sharply, finding this acceptable. I quirk my head to the side, a question coming to me quite suddenly. “Do you think Cora’s pretty?”

“What?” he asks, pulling back a little, aghast.

I grin. “It’s just a question.”

“Ella,” he says, looking at me as if I’m strange and shaking his head. “I’ve – never even thought about it. I don’t look at her that way.”

“Really?” I ask, curious. “You don’t look at other women?”

“No,” he says, shaking his head seriously. “It’s not it doesn’t even cross my mind anymore. All of those parts of my focus are directed solely at you. It doesn’t even enter my mind to think if I’m attracted to anyone else – it doesn’t matter.”

“Oh,” I say, raising my eyebrows, surprised and pleased. Then I smile at him. “Well, that’s very nice to hear.”

“You’re it for me, Ella,” Sinclair murmurs, putting a hand on my cheek and turning my face up to him. Then, quite softly, he presses a kiss to my mouth. “You’re the only one who matters, who will matter, ever.”

“Same for me, my love,” I whisper back to him, and then I kiss him again, for real. The kiss sweeps through me – fast, hot. My heart rate increases and I find myself panting much sooner than I thought I’d be.

“Shit,” Sinclair sighs, glancing around the very public room in which we’re sitting.

“Dream state?” I suggest, grimacing a little. Because I think we both know that we’d rather...

“Yes,” he sighs, standing up to rearrange the furniture in the living area and turn it into a little bedroom, though he glances with a grimace at the little twin bed where we know his father will sleep. “Though next vacation,” he says, sending me a frustrated glance, “we’re going alone. And there will be doors.”

“Agreed,” I say with a sigh. And then I spend the new few minutes getting the baby ready for bed while my mate works, every second regretting the promise we made to let Cora and Roger take the bedroom.

Chapter 387 – What Kind of Mate?

Cora

“They think they’re being subtle,” I whisper, smiling as Sinclair closes the RV’s door behind him, the last to “disappear” from our little circle around the fire.

“I’m not complaining,” Roger murmurs, slipping an arm around my shoulder. “Are you, little mate?”

I laugh lightly at the nickname, shaking my head at him. “It still doesn’t work, Roger,” I say, leaning closer to him, though the camping chairs make it hard to get as close as I’d like to be. “I’ve told you before – I’m not little.”

“Sure you are,” he replies, grinning at me.

“I’m not!” I say, laughing. “Ella’s the little one,” I continue, “I’m tall – I’m not -”

“You’re little to me,” he interrupts, moving his chair closer so that he can tuck his face between my neck and my shoulder, breathing deeply in – I think savoring the way that I smell, which sends a little thrill through me. I lower my own head and breathe in Roger’s own unique scent, letting it flood my senses.

God, does he even know how good he smells? Though he probably does – his sense of smell far outstrips mine.

“What do you mean?” I ask. “Little to you?”

He lifts his head so he can look into my face, only inches from me now. “You’re little to me, Cora,” he replies, in that you’re...I don’t know. Quite precious. The way I think of you – I don’t know, I don’t want you to be insulted, but I think of you as...very small,”

“What?” I ask, confused, “why?”

“Because,” he says seriously, shrugging a little, “you’d have to be very tiny, to make a home out of my heart,” he says, tapping lightly at his chest. “As you have done.”

A broad smile stretches across my face and I laugh a little, even though I’m deeply touched at what he’s said. “Really?” I ask. “That’s what you think of me?”

“Mmhhh,” he says, turning his head a little and considering me from different angles. “My little mate, who I carry around all day in my heart. Even when you’re not physically around I keep you in here. I talk to you, send all kinds of messages. Tell you little jokes.” you I grin. “Do I think they’re funny?”

He nods, smiling at me. "Always."

Slowly, I shake my head. "Then it must be a tiny imposter," I joke, starting to laugh. "Because if it was me, she'd be telling you to get some new material –"

He laughs, growling a little and grabbing my arm, tugging me closer. "Get your ass over here, little mate," he snarls playfully.

"No!" I laugh, resisting and eyeing the flimsy camping chair he's sitting in. It barely looks like it can hold his huge werewolf form, let alone both of us. We'll break the chair!"

"Break it," he murmurs, still pulling me closer and making me laugh. "Sinclair's rich – he'll buy another."

"No," I say, standing up and tugging myself out of his grasp a little. "I have a better idea," Roger scowls, but he lets me go – watching me as I move to the camping supplies and pull out a couple of blankets. He continues to watch as I spread two out before the fire and then gesture towards them, another blanket tucked under my arm. "Better," he concedes, standing up for a moment and then sitting gracefully down in the middle of the blankets, pulling me down into his lap as he does so. "Much better, clever little doctor mate."

I take a moment to place my hands on Roger's face for a second, looking seriously at him before bringing my mouth to his and kissing him, letting myself sink into it, hoping – quite desperately that he knows just how – much I love him.

Because we fight, and we tease – But god, god how I love this man. All of him every arrogant, swaggering, adorable, sweet bit of him –

Roger's arms tighten around me as he kisses me back, taking deep breaths as he does so like he's finally home, like he's been waiting to do this all day. And I smile, thinking that...perhaps he knows, a little bit. Even if we don't have a mating bond that we can both feel, that we can pass messages along, like Ella and Sinclair do.

I break the kiss after a few moments, resting my head against his chest as he keeps his arms wrapped tight around me. And we're quiet for a little bit, staring at the fire, just... happy to be here with each other. Happy to have this quiet moment.

"Roger," I say quietly, thinking back on Ella's conversation we had earlier.

"Hmm?" he says, inviting me to ask whatever question is floating through my mind.

“Do you think I’m your mate?”

“Um,” he says, laughing a little, “ Yeah, Cora,” he says, as if it’s a stupid question, “I think we’ve made that pretty clear – ”

“No,” I say, turning to look up at him a little, to let him know that I’m serious. “Do you think I’m your...your mate mate. Like...fated mate. Instead of chosen.”

“Oh,” he says, his eyebrows raising a little. Then he grins at me and laughs. “ Wait, you seriously don’t know?”

I frown at him, confused – I hadn’t known there was something to know.” What are you talking about?”

“You didn’t feel it?” he says, turning his head and watching me curiously.” That day out in the forest, in the rain, outside the motel?”

My frown deepens as I start to get frustrated. “Feel what?” I ask.

He laughs then, a real laugh, a big one that shakes his whole frame. “Cora,” he says, looking back at me with a gentle smile. “You’re my mate. Truly. Fated, done deal. I’ve suspected it for a while for a long time, even though... well, I also denied it for a long time, because I didn’t think my mate could be a human. But I knew for absolute sure that day when you ran like an idiot out of the motel – ”

“Hey!” I protest, slapping his chest, “I was really upset!”

“I know,” he murmurs, nudging me with his nose. “But you were also being really dumb. Anyway I knew for sure, because that’s when it snapped into place. You and me, Cora? We’re end game. At least, on my side. But,” he considers me again, putting his thoughts together. “It should have snapped in for you at the same moment. You didn’t feel it?”

“No,” I sigh, disappointed. “I didn’t feel...anything ‘snap.’”

“Well, then mine will have to be enough for both of us,” he says easily, drawing me close and starting to lay kisses across my cheek, my jaw, down my neck.

But I’m still disappointed and jealous. It just feels unfair sometimes – the rest of my family gets to feel these intense emotions and I’m missing out on them.

“I almost laid you down and fucked you right there in the forest, Cora” Roger growls softly in my ear, distracting me. “It was very...intense. It was a nightmare, having to carry you all the way back to bed -”

“We would have drowned,” I laugh, pulling back a little so I can see his beautiful face, wrinkling my nose at him.

“I probably would have died happy and said it was worth it,” he murmurs, shrugging.

“Well, that would have been disappointing,” I scold. “Trading decades of sex for one very damp experience? I’m starting to doubt your judgment here, Roger.”

“Hmm,” he considers, tightening his arms and pulling me close against him, one of his hands tracing down the length of my spine. “Maybe we need to experiment. Maybe the rain really was the problem, but the experience in the forest...”

I glance around at our whereabouts and start to laugh, seeing where he’s going with this as Roger leans me back, trying to lay me out before the fire.

“Roger!” I hiss, glancing towards the RV. “Seriously, they’re right in there! They’ll see!”

“Oh come on,” he growls, pulling the third blanket over us to give us a little privacy. “No one’s watching -”

“Have you met Ella!? Of course she is!”

Roger laughs, shaking his head as he lowers me to the ground and lays the length of his body next to me, curving his shoulders over top of my chest so that he can lower his face until his lips are so close to mine I can feel his breath against me.

“I’m not thinking about Ella right now,” Roger says, nudging me with his nose. And then he slides a hand under my shirt, across the skin of my stomach, moving upwards. “And I’d prefer it if you weren’t either...”

I laugh, leaning my head back and giving in to him as Roger kisses my neck. “Let me show you,” he murmurs, “some of the things I wanted to do that day...”

And, taking a deep breath and covering my eyes with one hand – hoping to hell that Ella and Sinclair and Henry have gone to bed – I let him.

Chapter 388 – Good morning, Cora!

Ella

“Really, Cora?” I say, nudging my sister with my toe. I shake my head at my sister’s naked sleeping form, pressed against her mate under the single little throw blanket that’s tossed over both of them. Seriously, how are they not freezing?

“Auntie Cora is going to be so embarrassed,” I whisper to Rafe in my arms, who smiles at me and makes me laugh. “We are never going to let her live this down, are we, little baby!?”

Cora blinks awake then, looking blearily around her as she lifts her head. Roger is still senseless to the world, fully asleep beside her.

“What?” Cora murmurs, still looking around for a moment before glancing up at me and the baby. Then, as reality snaps back to her, she gasps and clutches the blanket tight to her chest.

“Morning, sister,” I say, smiling wickedly down at her. “Missing something?” And then I pull her bra out from behind my back.

“Ella!” she gasps, reaching for it, though I pull it away from her.

“What!” I laugh, enjoying every second of this. “It’s not like you were keeping it safe – I found this ten feet away, tossed at the foot of the RV! It’s the first thing I saw at the bottom of the steps!”

“No, you didn’t!” she growls in response, reaching for it again.

“Did too!” I laugh, tossing it to her now and shaking my head with glee. “Soooo,” I tease, “did you guys have a good nighttttt?”

Cora just glares up at me as she struggles to get her bra back on without dropping the blanket. After she closes the clasp behind her back she smacks Roger on the ribs; he wakes with a gasp as she glances anxiously towards the RV.

“Wake up,” Cora hisses. “Put your damn pants on before everyone sees -”

“Oh,” I say, still grinning gleefully at him. “Everyone’s already seen, sis. No reason to be ashamed now.”

Cora glares up at me, blushing hard. “Hey, Ella,” Roger says, sitting up and giving me a wide grin, completely unabashed to have been found naked and in a compromised position with my sister. “Is there any coffee?”

“There is!” I say, giving him a wide false grin. But then I let it fall instantly from my face, shifting into a glare.”

But none for you.”

“What!?” he asks, frowning. “Why?” Cora ignores the conversation, reaching for the scattered pieces of her clothing and pulling them on as discreetly as she can.

“Because!” I exclaim. “If you two were going to go all Survivor on us and sleep out here, you could have at least told us so that we could have taken the big bed!”

“No way,” Cora says, standing now in her bra and underwear and tossing the blanket over Roger to cover him up. She points a finger at me before walking a few feet away to grab her jeans. “I told you I don’t want you and Sinclair doing weird things in my bed.”

“You abandoned the bed!” I exclaim. ” The bed is up for grabs! I now claim the bed!”

“Nope!” she shouts over her shoulder, stumbling a little as she steps into her pants and starts to pull them up. “We have dibs forever dibs on the bed, whether we want to use it or not.”

I gasp at her, appalled at her selfishness, as Roger gets to his feet and wraps the blanket around his hips, tucking it in like a towel. “I’m getting coffee,” he murmurs, flashing Cora a grin before striding for the RV’s door, ignoring the pieces of his own clothing scattered around the fire. “It’s way too early for sister wars.”

I laugh at him and walk to Cora’s side, bending on my way to grab her tshirt and hand it to her. “So,” I say, smiling widely at her as she scowls at me and pulls her shirt over her head. “You never answered my question. Did you have funnnn last night?”

“Let’s just go,” she says, turning towards the RV and ignoring me even though she can’t hide the happy smile I see on her face. “The sooner we get to the temple, the sooner we get you off this line of questioning.”

“You did!” I laugh, gleeful, chasing my sister to the RV’s door. “You totally did! Come on, Cora! Tell me everything!”

We have a very cheerful morning after that, with everyone teasing Roger and Cora, and Cora blushing and covering her face with her hands a lot, and Roger refusing to be ashamed and happily drinking his coffee while still dressed in nothing but the blanket wrapped around his hips.

Even Henry gets in on it, making Cora's blush deepen by patting her on the shoulder and telling her that it's okay that no woman can resist the sight of a Sinclair man in the moonlight –

Cora just groans deeply at that and stands up, stalking away to the bathroom and slamming the door shut behind her as we all laugh, perhaps a little too hard.

"All right, Roger," I say, still laughing and moving to take Rafe to the bedroom to change his diaper. "Joke's over – put on some damn clothes."

"No way," he says, lounging back against the white booth of the kitchenette and grinning at me, his coffee still in his hand. "Have you felt this leather against your skin? It's amazing-"

I just groan and roll my eyes, taking my baby away as Sinclair and Henry laugh, heading for the front of the RV so that we can get started.

As we drive, though, the mood in the RV gets noticeably darker. We all know, of course, that as the minute pass we're getting close and closer to the temple. And even though we're here for a good reason to visit our mother, to get some very necessary information – well? It's...tense. Because we don't know what that information is.

Cora grows the quietest, not even wanting to play any board games or cards as noon slips by. So I just take her hand, the baby curled in my other arm, and sit quietly with her. Waiting.

Sinclair starts to slow the RV at around two o'clock, glancing back over his shoulder. "We're close now," he informs us, his face impassive. I know that he's aware of the tension, but he lets Cora have her space to process her emotions.

Cora simply nods and we all sit quietly as Sinclair gets the RV as close as he can. But, unfortunately, the temple was designed to only be approached on foot something about a sacrifice to the Goddess? I don't know.

But either way, as we all step out of the RV at the base of a series of stone steps that winds slowly upwards and out of our sight through the forest. I know that each of us feels the tension.

"Will you be all right here, dad?" Sinclair asks quietly, putting a hand on his father's shoulder once Henry uses the lift to lower himself to the ground so that he can see us off.

"I'll be fine," he says with a small smile. Then he reaches out to touch Rafe's little foot, hanging free from the baby carrier that's strapped to my chest. "Are you sure you don't want to leave the little one?"

"I don't think I'm ever letting him out. of my sight again, Henry," I say quietly, dipping my head to plant a little kiss on Rafe's head. Rafe gurgles pleasantly, blowing bubbles between his tiny pink lips. I can't help but smile when I look at him.

"Well," Henry says, folding his hands in his lap. "That, I understand. Good luck. I'll see you in a few hours."

We each bend to give Henry a kiss before we all turn towards the steps. I take Cora's hand as Roger starts to climb, taking the lead. Sinclair, on some Alpha instinct to protect the most vulnerable members of his pack, falls behind.

"You ready for this?" I ask.

"As much as I'm gonna be," Cora sighs, glancing at me with a little smile. And then, after she takes a deep breath, we start to climb the stairs on what promises to be a long, long hike.

Chapter 389 – The Temple

It is, indeed, a long climb. Cora and I are panting by the time we get to the top, and even though Sinclair took Rafe from me halfway through the hike I have to take a moment to catch my break when we pull ourselves up to the final level.

Roger has the indecency to look a little smug about the fact that he barely looks winded and Cora gives him a little shove on the shoulder as she works to take a few deep breaths and wipe the sweat from her brow.

Even as I work to bring my heartrate back down, I absolutely marvel at the sight before me.

The Goddess' temple, like the one in the city, is built completely with white marble. But unlike the one in the city, this one looks...ancient. Vines grow in ropes all over it, looking almost as if the structure is part of the forest itself, having grown up organically from it. The temple is tall and wide, the pillars in front drawing my eyes upward to the slanted roof which curls into a dome. At the very peak of the dome is a golden crescent moon, reaching up towards the sky, glinting in the bright sunlight.

"Wow," Cora says, standing straight next to me and likewise marveling at the temple. "Mom has some... impressive property."

"I know, right?" I mutter back, crossing my arms and shaking my head. If someone had told me, when I was a little girl sleeping in my creaky little orphan bed, that my mom lived here...

Well. I probably would have believed them.

But I was a very imaginative child.

"Um," Roger says, looking anxiously at Cora. "Shall we?"

I smile at him, seeing that he's eager to move on but also that he wants to give her room to process this experience. It's more intense for her than it is for him, and I think that it's very sweet that he realizes this. Roger really has come leaps and bounds as a person from when I first met him.

Sinclair comes to stand next to me and I grin at him and then turn to my baby, taking his hands and speaking to him quietly, asking him how he likes it here and if he's ready to meet his granny for real this time. Rafe claps and gurgles like he really is excited.

"It's like he understands sometimes," I say quietly, smiling up at Sinclair.

"Well," Sinclair says, grinning proudly down at his son. "He's very clever."

“Yes,” I say, leaning closer to kiss my baby’s forehead. “Yes, he is. The most clever baby the world will ever see -”

“He can keep that title for about...five more months,” Roger calls to us, crossing his arms over his chest with a smirk. Sinclair just laughs and shakes his head, letting it pass.

“Are you ready, Cora?” I ask, moving again to her side.

“I think so,” she says, giving me a nod and reaching for my hand. I give it, and, with another deep breath, the five of us begin to walk towards the temple. As we approach, a woman in dove-colored robes comes out of the front.

I hesitate for a moment, going still at the sight of those robes –

Because the last time I saw them-

But I feel Sinclair behind me, his hand warm against my back, and then a little pulse of comfort comes down the bond and I exhale, skipping forward a little to stay at Cora’s side.

Because he’s right. This is...this is not the same situation we were in before. This is different, and not every priestess we meet is going to try to take my baby away. Some of them, surely, actually serve my mother.

“Welcome,” the woman says, bowing a little and giving us a deep smile as we approach. “Daughters of the Goddess – you are welcome here. And you are right on time.”

Cora and I smile at each other and then look back to the woman. “Is she here?” I ask. The priestess smiles warmly at me but Cora turns to me with a frown. “Can’t you feel her?”

I blink at Cora for a second and then, as I realize what she means that she can feel our mother here already – I bite my lip, feeling a very deep grief.

Because I cannot feel her. I used up’ our bond – used the magic of it to unbind my wolf and my gift so that I could save my child, and Cora, and my mate. Cora realizes this very suddenly, her mouth making a startled “o” of concern, but I just shake my head and work hard to give her a smile.

“It’s okay,” I say, squeezing her hand. “I’m glad you can feel her for both of us.”

She nods to me, sympathetic, and then we both turn back to the priestess.

“Please,” the priestess says, smiling around at our whole party and taking a moment to let her gaze linger on the baby, admiring him. “Please, do come inside.”

And so, as a group, we follow the priestess into my mother’s temple. And as we go, I wonder if everyone’s heart is pounding as much as mine.

The temple, inside, is different than the ones that we’ve been in before.

While the desert temple was elegantly sparse, and the city temple was sweeping and impressive, this one is... cozy. The architecture is still bright and wide, but you can tell that women live here and treat it as a home. As I look around at the padded benches by the windows, at the well-loved books neatly tucked into alcoves and the little worn stick broom tucked into a corner, I decide quite suddenly that this is my favorite temple of all – and that I quite like it here.

The priestess does not pause in the middle of the large central room of the temple, the space beneath the dome, but instead leads us across it to a door at the back. Before she opens it, she turns to us with a warm smile. “Are you ready?” she asks, giving us a moment. to prepare.

Cora tucks her hair behind her ears and Roger comes to stand behind her, straightening his shoulders, his face very serious. He is, after all, about to be introduced to his mate’s mother as such for the first time. I smile at both of them as I reach for the baby, who Sinclair helps me unbuckle from the carrier. I don’t know why I do it, but somehow I want Rafe quite close to me as we go to see his grandmother. It feels ...right.

Then, once we’re all ready – and Sinclair has placed a warm hand on my shoulder – Cora nods to the priestess who opens the door and leads us inside.

We see her immediately, we all do-

The beautiful Goddess, standing at the far end of the room, glowing with the faint luminescence of moonlight. Her face breaks into a smile as we cross the room, her eyes flashing over all of us but focusing on Cora. I can’t help the tears that well in my eyes when I see her, as I study her form. And this time, as I look at her –

I see Cora all over her, in her face, in her expression, in the way she holds herself. Her hair is still like mine, but it seems like everything – everything else is my sister. How did I not see it before? Was I such a fool?

But as I think the thought, I dismiss it. Because she’s a Goddess, she’s divine. I think... she lets us see what we want or need to see in her.

As I think that my mother’s eyes move to me, and she smiles. And a few tears slip down my cheeks as I smile back.

Then, as she should, she refocuses on Cora, moving forward to take her hands. "I'm so glad that you've come to see me, daughter. Finally."

"Hey," Cora says, tears slipping down her own cheeks, and then she laughs a little at her awkward start. "Hello, mom."

The Goddess reaches a hand to Cora's cheek, smiling at her.

"Um," Cora says, half turning to her mate. "You remember Roger, right?"

"I do," the Goddess says, laughing a little, the sound ringing in my ears like tinkling bells. "I'm glad, Roger, that you finally figured out what I meant in my message to you. By the desert."

"Yeah," he says, smiling and grimacing awkwardly at once as he runs a hand through his hair. "I'm sorry about that I...overthought it."

The Goddess' smile grows then and she reaches a hand out to him as well. "You will come with me," she says, turning towards another door, to an even more private room. "So that we may speak."

I step back then, towards my mate, but before she goes my mother turns to me and gives me a special smile. "Ella," she says warmly, and then her eyes shift to Rafe in my arms. "Thank you," she says, "for bringing my first grandchild to meet me. I had a glimpse of him before, of course, when you had him dedicated to me. But to see him now – in the flesh? It is...a gift."

"He's a gift," I whisper, holding my baby tight, tugging at the little bond I have with him and passing a great deal of love down it, so much that my baby looks up at me curiously and squeaks a little with his happy joy. I laugh and look down at him.

"As you are to me," my mother says, and I look back up at her, tears still dripping down my face. And I nod, understanding – finally – exactly what she means.

The goddess turns then, taking Cora and Roger's hands, leading them away. As the door closes behind them, I take a step backwards into Sinclair's arms, which I know were waiting to wrap around me.

"You okay, gorgeous?" he murmurs, bringing his lips down close to my ear to whisper the words.

"Yeah," I say, snuggling against him and dipping my head to kiss Rafe's. "I really, really am, Dominic. I'm perfect."

"Yes," he sighs, kissing my own head now, just as I did Rafe's. "Yes, you are."

Chapter 390 – Conversations with the Goddess

Cora

My heart is pounding as I follow my mother into the chamber beyond, as Roger shuts the door behind us. My mother crosses the room with ease almost seeming to float. And then I blink in surprise as I realize that...she probably is floating. I mean, she's here – she's corporeal – but it's all a show, isn't it? She doesn't need to walk on her feet if she doesn't want to.

And something about that idea makes me laugh a little, easing my tension. My mother turns when she hears the sound of my laughter and smiles at me, at both of us, before sitting down before a tiny table with a tray of tea on it.

Roger and I cross the short room together, sitting down across from her. Thoughtfully, Roger pours two cups of tea, which is hot and smells minty and fresh. Then, hesitating at the sight of the third cup, he raises an eyebrow at my mother. She laughs a little too, and I'm shocked to hear that her laugh sounds just like my own – the same rhythm, the same cadence. Something about that makes me smile.

"Yes, Roger," she says, nodding towards it. "I can't drink the tea – but it is nice to have an offering of it."

Nodding, Roger pours the cup of tea for the Goddess and slides it across the table towards her. Then he places a sugar cube in my teacup – knowing I'll want it and sits back in his chair, folding his hands in his lap.

"You've had a long journey, Cora," my mother says, looking at me warmly. "In more ways than one."

"Yes," I reply, smiling at the understatement in her words. And then I look down at my stomach and place my hands on it, shaking my head. "A journey that has raised...a lot of questions for us."

"I understand," she says. "It will bring me a great deal of joy to help you answer those questions, if I can."

"How much do you know?" I ask, looking back up at her, wondering if I need...like, do I need to tell her that I'm pregnant? Or...

"I know everything," she says, smiling at us. "Your lives are...open to me. As well as your hearts. I'm very pleased that you have found each other, little mates," she says, and I grin to hear her use Roger's pet term for me as if she's heard it before. Then she turns to smile at Roger, “though I’d have preferred to see it happen sooner. I believe it would have saved you both a great deal of pain.”

Roger, to his credit, blushes and looks down. “Cora’s the smart one,” he sighs, glancing at me. “You should have sent her the vision.”

“She had other things to worry about,” the Goddess says easily. “You can’t leave everything to your mate.”

I laugh at this and Roger’s blush deepens, but he looks up at both of us with a determined look on his face, and we both know that he doesn’t mean to.

My mother turns to me then. “You wish to know?” she asks gently. “About the child?”

“Yes,” I breathe, leaning forward, eager. “Do you know? Is it...um...”

“Your child is perfectly healthy, Cora,” my mother says, looking down at my stomach. “I can hear the heartbeat now. Your child is strong.”

Roger and I both exhale in relief. I mean – we suspected that, but to hear it from a Goddess’ lips... Roger beams a wide smile at me and reaches out to take my hand. I slide my hand into his, palm to palm.

“Is – is my baby a wolf?” I ask, turning back to my mother, clutching Roger’s hand hard. “Your baby is like you,” my mother says, turning her head to watch me, curious.

And I bite my lip, glancing at Roger, who is unable to keep the crestfallen expression from his face. And in my disappointment I realize that we were both hoping very much that our child would be a wolf. Not that I would mind raising a normal human baby- but for him, for the child’s place in our family....

My mother laughs again, snapping our attention back to her.

“No, my daughter,” she says, smiling and shaking her head. “You misunderstand me. What I mean to say here is that...hmm,” she looks up at the ceiling as if thinking it through. “It is difficult to put into words...I do not use them often.”

My heart starts to pound again as she sorts through her thoughts.

“I believe the word that you would use for it,” she continues, still looking up, might be hybrid? Your baby is...both human and wolf?”

I gasp a little and Roger looks between us both, confused. “Really?” I ask, dropping Roger’s hand as I lean forward in my curiosity. “But you said – like me...”

The Goddess draws her eyes back down again and focuses on my face. ”

Lovely Cora,” she says, a smile spreading across her face, “your child is a cross between a human and a wolf, but it is not the first. You are.”

My mouth drops open suddenly as I stare at her, trying...trying to comprehend. And something about my confusion makes her laugh – not in a cruel way, but in the delighted way of a mother who watches her child discover a great new truth about the world.

“Wha- what do you mean?” I ask, my voice hardly louder than a whisper in my shock.

“You are human, Cora,” my mother says, leaning forward to make sure I understand. “Your body is human – your father was a human. But your mother I am the Goddess of the moon, , and of wolves, among other things.” She smiles at me as I begin to understand. “Your soul is that of a wolf, Cora,” she says quietly. “Can you not feel it?”

And I stare at her, shocked.

We’re all silent for a long moment before I stumble out my answer. “N-no,” I say, looking down at myself, and then closing my eyes and searching....searching –

But it’s nowhere.

“No,” I say again, devastated as I open my eyes and looking at my mother again. “Are you – are you sure? Is there some mistake?”

“I am sure,” she says gently, studying me. Then, she holds out one hand. ” Come to me, Cora,” she says, and I stand, going to her, taking her hand, gasping at the tickling, starlight feeling of her skin.

“Close your eyes,” she says softly, “let us see if we can coax your little wolf to show her face.”

And – unbidden, but knowing it’s right – I close my eyes, and let my mother’s energy rush gently through me, like a trickling stream, the sound of it in my mind like a calling... a summoning, a welcoming...

And suddenly, to my complete shock, I feel a dark corner of my soul shyly uncurl itself, opening one eye and looking hesitantly around, almost afraid to do so.

A little cry falls from my mouth as I recognize her instantly my sweet, quiet wolf, who has been here all along – but who has hidden herself away, confused, not knowing if she belongs, or where she belongs...

And I recognize her instantly, instantly as me as my own.

My little wolf raises her dark snout to the air at the continued sound of my mother's call, and then slowly, half- eager, half-scared, she starts to get to her feet.

Hey, I say within my mind, calling to her, reaching out a mental hand for her, eager for her touch.

She quirks her ears at the sound of my voice, but I see an eagerness slowly come into her expression. Hi, she says to me, awkward but...but wanting it. Wanting me. And slowly, I reach my mental hand closer to her, and run it slowly over the length of her soft brown fur.

I know you, she says, giving me a wolfish little smile. I like you. Can we run? She lifts her head and presses into the touch of my hand, letting her mouth fall open in eager joy.

Yes, I whisper back, laughing a little with my own joy. Yes, we can.

Chapter 391 – Questions Answered

Cora

My eyes flash open as I gasp, fascinated and thrilled at the having finally, finally met my wolf – who has been here all along –

My mother smiles warmly at me, but when I turn to Roger I only see shock on his face as he stares at me with wide eyes.

“Can you – can you sense her?” I ask, thrilled and curious.

“Um, yeah, Cora,” he says, looking me up and down in fascinated shock. “Can’t you feel mine?”

And I feel my wolf turn then, looking for him, and suddenly – frankly, like a slap in the face I feel Roger’s wolf standing right there on the other side of our bond, which snaps instantly into place –

I gasp, and my knees go literally weak at the sudden intensity of it –

Roger’s up in an instant, catching me in his arms before I can fall to the ground because... Because it feel like gravity shifts, suddenly, and what used to be down is now sideways, and at the center of everything now....

...is Roger.

“Hey,” Roger says, anxious, looking down at me as I stare up into his face, as my shy wolf comes forward to tap her nose hesitantly against his across our mating bond.

Roger’s wolf gives a great bay of joy and leaps forward, making my wolf skitter back a step. But he doesn’t stop, closing the distance instantly and nuzzling his body against her, nipping playfully at her shoulder, burying his nose deep in her fur –

My poor new wolf shies again for a moment – not from fear just...just because it’s all so new – and I feel Roger’s wolf respond, prancing around her with joy and letting her know with his body language that he’s thrilled she’s here –

And that he’s ready, whenever she is, to play. I can’t help the tears that pour from my eyes at this, as Roger laughs and hugs me close, as I...adjust myself, as best I can, to everything.

I give myself a few moments to cling to my mate my mate, my fated mate, because I know it to be true now in a deep, physical way – before I remember, of course, that my mother is here.

And that we're being incredibly rude. Slowly, even though I don't want to at all I push Roger away from me just slightly and turn back from her.

"I'm sorry," I say, wiping the tears from my face with the back of my hand. "I'm just -"

"It's all right, daughter," she says, smiling up at me from her place in her chair. "It does me good to see you so happy."

And then, holding Roger's hand tightly as we move back to our chairs, I do my very best to pull myself together.

"So," I say, hesitating, "um, does this mean that I'll be able to take Roger's mark?"

"Yes," the Goddess says, nodding. "It may take your human body longer to heal from it," she adds, giving a little shrug, "but your sister can help with that. And it will do you no harm."

"Will other humans?" I ask curiously, thinking suddenly of the vision we had of little baby Rafe, all grown up and finding his true love in a human girl. "Could they take a mark, if they wanted one?"

"They could," my mother says with a smile, "though...they might not find the joy in it, as wolves do. Your wolf, though, Cora, will crave it. She probably already does."

And inside me I feel the truth of it as wwolf steps closer to Roger's tall my wolf's side, pressing herself against him and looking up into his face. I grin, knowing that my mother is right, not needing to confirm.

Oh geeze, I think to myself, a little chagrined but unable to stop smiling. It is going to be...quite a struggle, trying to convince Roger not to give me his mark the moment we step out of this temple But, as much as I want it, I also want it to be special. Knowing my mate, he'll want to sink his teeth into me in the back of that RV – if not before but.... no. I want something more than that.

Quite suddenly, though, another question crops up in my mind. "Does this mean...um," I hesitate, also trying to find the words. "Will I be able to shift? Into my wolf?"

"I'm sorry, my darling," my mother says quietly, shaking her head. "Your spirit is that of a wolf, but your body is still human. It is incapable of the shift."

A little shudder of disappointment runs through me, but it's short lived. I've already received so, so much more than I had hoped from this visit.

“What about the baby?” Roger asks, interrupting my train of thought with a very important question. I perk up, curious, and am tickled to find that my wolf perks up too, her emotions reflecting my own. “Will the baby be able to shift?”

Roger does his best to hide his anxiety on this point, but I can see it in him as I look at his tense face. Roger wants, very badly, to be able to bond with his child on this point – as he did with his own parents.

“As you are the father of Cora’s child, Roger,” my mother says, a phrasing which I’m thrilled actually also answers questions for me that this is my child, and that no dark god was involved in some kind of strange impregnation scenario, as I had once feared “the child’s body is not entirely human, as Cora’s is. Your children’s experiences with their bodies and their wolves may be unique, but yes,” she says, beginning to smile, they will be able to transform, as you can.”

A huge sigh – almost a groan – of relief falls from Roger’s mouth as he hangs his head, his shoulders shaking with the intensity of it. I smile widely at my mate as he looks down at the floor with his eyes squeezed shut, trying to pull himself together – I’m just so pleased that he’ll be able to have this connection with his children, a connection he so deeply wants.

He looks up at me then, apology all over his face – “Cora,” he whispers, and I can see that he feels guilty, “I know it seems – I mean, I will love our children no matter what – but I just – ”

“It’s all right,” I say, reaching for his hand, which he gives me. “I get it,” I say, nodding and smiling. My wolf nudges his with her nose playfully, happy. “I really do.”

My mate exhales a sigh of relief and then we turn our attention back to my mother, though...honestly, I’m so happy that I feel guilty asking her for more.

“You two have a beautiful future ahead of you,” she says quietly. “It will bring me much joy to see it unfold.” And then, to my great sadness, she stands up. “My time runs short. Is there anything else I can answer for you, before I go?”

“Please,” I say, leaning forward on my chair and hesitating because...well, because it feels selfish. She smiles at me, though, inviting me to ask.

Still, I bite my lip. “Ella’s gift,” I say, the words coming out in a rush. “It can ...it can do such wonderful things in this world. I want to do more of that, to heal people, as she does. I know that she’s passed the gift to me before but – could you possibly – could I...”

And then I run out of words because... it feels just so, so terrible to ask for such an incredible gift, which should be freely given. I hang my head, ashamed.

But to my shock, my mother laughs, and suddenly I feel her fingertips under my chin, turning my face up to hers." You have your own gift, Cora," she says quietly, "already within you."

Chapter 392 – Do You Know what I Know?

Cora

“What?” I ask, confused. I – I have a gift? I quickly search for it within myself but...it's not there. I mean, I know how Ella's feels – she passed it to me before, I carried it – but there is nothing in me now that feels anything like that...

“Yours is different from your sisters,” the Goddess explains. “Ella's soul is that of a healer, and so that is her gift. Yours,” she smiles lightly, “reflects you. You've used it before,” she says, turning her head to glance at Roger with a little laugh. “I'm surprised you did not notice it then.”

“What?” I ask again, still baffled. But she turns to go and I grab for her hand. “Please,” I say, shaking my hand, “I don't understand -”

“Perhaps you should ask your sister for help,” the Goddess says with a shrug. “She can guide you to it, I think, as hers is already unlocked. But you already have your gift, Cora.” She assures me. She hesitates then before laughing a little, “as does your child.”

“What!?” I say for the third time, my mouth falling open now as I stare at her and then glance down at my stomach before looking back up into her face. “My child -”

“All your children,” she says simply, as if it's obvious, “will be gifted, as you are, as Ella is. As you, my daughters, are gifts to me – it is my gift to you, and to all of your children.”

“Whoa,” Roger says, sitting back in his chair and raising a hand to his head in shock. “All...all are kids are going to be magic?”

The Goddess laughs a little. “Each will be gifted,” she says simply, turning back to me. “And each gift will be unique, and will reflect each child's unique spirit. As yours does, as Ella's does. They'll all have pieces in common but -” she sighs happily now, shaking her head as if it's too complicated to explain. “You will see, Cora. I need not explain it all. Your children will show you.”

“Thank you,” I whisper.

“I love you,” the Goddess says, raising her hand and brushing my cheek with her fingertips. “Carry that knowledge your whole life. I will see you again,” she promises, and I cling to that prophecy just a little, “but until then carry my love.”

And then, as Roger and I watch, my mother passes through a door in the back of the room – a door that I swear was not there a moment ago –

And she's gone. Roger and I both stare at the door and then turn, slowly, to stare at each other. And then, as I continue to stare at him, he starts to laugh – a low, delighted sound – as he gets up and crosses the small room to me, wrapping me tight in his arms and rocking me back and forth as he buries his head against my neck.

“I knew it,” he murmurs, still holding me tight. “I knew it was all going to be good news-”

“You did not,” I laugh, and finally as the shock leaves my system I feel myself filling with a deep and resounding joy in its place. “You were as anxious as I was!”

“Yeah,” he admits, his voice muffled against my skin, “but like... deep down. I knew it was going to be all right. You know?”

“Sure, baby,” I say, patting his back, letting him think it. But despite all of it, I can’t stop smiling. Inside me my wolf turns in a happy little circle, prancing around and shaking out her fur, getting used to the feel of her body moving freely.

Roger stands up a little straighter and grins down into my face. “This is so cool,” he murmurs. “The baby is going to be a wolf, and you have a wolf, and we have a mating bond -” he shakes his head, laughing, thrilled at it all.

“I know,” I murmur, smiling up at him and raising my hands to bury my fingers in his hair. “I feel – I feel crazy different, like expanded – ” my whole body has-

“Should we do it now?” he asks, interrupting me and looking down at my neck, raising his hand to start to tug at the collar of my shirt.

“Huh?” and then as I see him eyeing that soft place between my shoulder and my neck I burst into laughter and swat him away. “Ew, Roger! No!”

“EW?!” He says, his mouth dropping open a little bit – but we’re both too happy for him to actually be offended. We’re we’re just...so connected now 1- that the mating bond has snapped together on both ends. It’s like he can intuit my emotions and my meaning without even having to look at me, even listen to me.

“Why not?” He asks, and I can sense his mild disappointment.

“Because!” I say, slapping his shoulder playfully. “We’re in my mom’s house – there are people that live here! We’re not just going to like, throw down here in the back of the temple-

“Why the hell not?” he asks, looking at me like I’m crazy.

“Roger!” I gasp, “Absolutely not! I may be a wolf in spirit, but I was raised human. I have a little more decency than that.” And then as he wraps his arms around my waist and pulls me closer, looking hungrily down at me, I start to laugh so hard that my whole body shakes. It takes him a moment but then he's laughing with me, and we pass our joy between ourselves down that bond, a cycle of it that makes me so happy I can barely breathe.

"Fine," he murmurs when we both calm down a little bit, after he presses his lips warmly to my mouth and kisses me, soundly, warmly, so that the love sweeps through me and makes me feel absolutely complete. "But as soon as we're alone – really alone, Cora..." he snaps his teeth at me, letting me know his precise intentions.

And I nudge him with my nose, just as my wolf does to his in the precise same moment. "You'd better," I whisper, feeling an intense hunger for his mark that I didn't feel before.

Slowly, Roger exhales and loosens his arms, his eyes drifting down my body to my stomach as he makes space between us. "So cool that the baby's going to have powers," he murmurs. And Sinclair and Ella are going to flip when we tell them that Rafe _."

But he freezes, suddenly, unable to finish his sentence. I feel his shock and awe down the bond before he looks up and whispers my name. into my face-

"What?" I ask my eyes going wide. It's not fear – nothing in his reaction tells me I should be afraid. But still...what.

And then, as he looks down at my stomach again, he passes me something down the bond – something I don't understand, something that doesn't have words...

And suddenly, quite suddenly, I become aware of...a new little connection inside of me. A link that has been there, but which I hadn't been aware of before...

My wolf quirks her head, turning towards it, curious. And then, as we both realize what it is, I gasp and she gambols forward in excitement. Our pup! She shouts in my mind, her heart and my heart both leaping with joy to feel it.

"The baby," I gasp – because now that my wolf is awake, I can feel the bond – feel it in the same way Roger could. "Is it... is it more for you now?"

"Yes," he murmurs, awestruck, looking back up in my face with wide eyes. "Yes, I can feel it so much more now – I think...I think as much as Dominic did, with Rafe..."

And I flush suddenly with joy to be able to give this to Roger, to be able to feel it myself, this wonderful, miraculous new connection...

I bite my lip with happiness suddenly as I explore the bod, prod it, connecting with my little baby and saying hello, and realizing...

"Do you know what I know?" I whisper, my face alight again with joy. A thrilled grin bursts on Roger's face." Yes," he says quietly, his voice almost shaking with the joy of it. "I think I do."

"A boy!" I shout, laughing, throwing my arms around his neck as Roger catches me, and picks me up, and spins me around laughing and shouting with happiness.

"A little boy," he murmurs against my neck as I wrap my legs around his waist.

And then I take my mate's face in my hands, and I beam down at him, and I kiss his mouth for the joy of it. We stay like that for a long time, absolutely thrilled and more connected to each other and to our child – than we've ever been.

"Are you happy?" I ask him when I pull away, just an inch. But I smile, already knowing the answer.

"How could I not be, Cora?" he sighs in reply, looking up at me with such love in his eyes that I can hardly bear it. "This is everything. Absolutely everything."

And then he kisses me again, and I kiss him back, and with every passing moment I send a message down the bond to him with every beat of my heart:

I love you, I love you, I love you.

And he sends it right back.

Chapter 393 – Family Reunited

I get tenser and tenser as the minutes pass, and I can feel Sinclair behind me likewise desperate to know what's going on behind that closed door. A priestess comes by after a little while, offering us tea or seats, but we decline both because we're very aware that we're definitely not going to be able to relax until that door opens. Which it doesn't do for a very, very long time.

"What are they even doing in there?" I ask, especially when I hear a little muffled shout come through that makes me go quite still. Sinclair chuckles a little and I spin to look up at him, not understanding what he means –

But then, when I see his raised eyebrow and the smirk on his face, I realize...

"Oh, EW!" I say, swatting at him with my free hand, the one that's not holding the sleeping baby. "They are so not-"

"Roger would," he murmurs, smiling at me and still laughing lightly.

"Cora would not," I say, vehement. "This is mom's house."

"She didn't seem to mind about such activities outside the RV, where dad could have seen, were he to glance out the window."

"Yeah, but that's your dad," I say, rolling my eyes and returning my focus to the door. "It's different."

"The Goddess is all-seeing," Sinclair says, and I can feel him shrug. "She'll spy if she wants to – what's the difference between having s3x in her temple as opposed to anywhere else -"

But I hiss at him to shut up, looking around anxiously to make sure he wasn't overhead. Chuckling, wrapping his arms around my waist again, Sinclair pulls me back against him. "If the baby weren't here," he murmurs low into my ear, pulling my hips back against him...

"Enough out of you," I chide, though I can't help the smile that tugs at my lips. Because...well, my mate is very difficult to resist. Even in an inappropriate religious space dedicated to my mom.

Luckily, the door opens then, and Cora and Roger come striding out, wide smiles stretching over both of their faces as they speak softly to each other, holding hands, completely oblivious to our tense waiting.

"Cora!" I cry, thrilled and excited. Her head spins to me and her smile widens as I dash over to her. But as I get within three feet of her I sense –

What is that? I stop dead in my tracks, raising my nose to sniff the air – but I can't –

Sinclair, coming up behind me, likewise goes stiff and then starts to laugh. "Well, congratulations, sister-in-law," he says, and I glance back to see a wide grin on his face. "Looks like you're a wolf after all."

"WHAT!" I shout, completely shocked and throwing an arm around my sister, tugging her to me and holding the baby to my side so that he doesn't get smushed. "Are you serious?! Are you?" And then I back off a little again, sniffing around her and sensing –

Yes – yes –

I may not have been able to smell it months ago, before I was immersed in this world – but my sister has a wolf, and it's awake in her, and prowling around.

Cora laughs, thrilled. "Yes, Ella," she says, nodding and stepping away from me but holding my hand. "I have a wolf. Um, I'm still human, so I can't shift? But apparently," she shrugs, shaking her head still in disbelief, "I have always had a wolf soul, inherited from mom. I just...never knew. She helped me find it."

"Wow," I say, squeezing her hand and staring at her, baffled and thrilled. "Cora, that's amazing – I mean, I think it's amazing. Do you?"

Thrilled, my sister nods and then takes her hand from mine, stepping back with her mate. "I do. We both do." And then she puts a hand on her stomach, still smiling at me. "The baby does too."

"WHAT!" I shout again, laughing and stumbling forward, putting my hand on her stomach as if I could feel the baby too. "You can feel the baby now?!"

"Yes," she says, happy. "I can feel him through the bond."

And then my eyes snap up to her and I feel my eyes instantly fill with tears as her words echo in my mind. "Feel...feel him?"

Slowly, grinning, Cora begins to nod. "Him."

"A baby boy!" I shout, ecstatic, and my mate wisely slips my own baby boy from my arms before I hurl myself at my sister, wrapping her up as tight as I can as I cry against her, so happy – so incredibly excited for her, and for me to have a nephew, and for Rafe to have a best friend-

Because it's not optional anymore Rafe and the baby are going to be best friends –

“Ella!” Cora laughs, holding me tight and shaking her head. “It’s all right! You’re choking me!”

But I have a hard time letting her go, so my sister just laughs and holds me as we rock back and forth, united in our joy.

When I am able to pull back a little and wipe my tears from my face, I see my own mate with his arm around his brother’s shoulder, beaming at him as Roger looks down at Rafe in Sinclair’s arms, probably considering that he’s going to have his own baby just like that in such a short amount of time.

“Do you know?” I ask, turning back to Cora. “How long the pregnancy will be?”

She pauses and then lets out a frustrated little groan, turning to Roger. “Roger, we forgot to ask!”

“Ask what?” he asks, looking up at her. “How long the pregnancy will be for a hybrid baby,” she answers, sighing, and I see Sinclair perk up at this, interested in the confirmation that the baby will indeed be part wolf and part human.

“Well, whatever,” Roger says with a shrug. “The baby will tell us when he’s ready, or whatever.”

“Or whatever,” Cora repeats, crossing her arms and glaring at him. “Easy for you to say.”

“Yes,” Roger says, grinning smugly at her but also with a great deal of love. I “Yes, it is.”

And then I laugh and loop my arm in my sister’s, tugging her with me as I head for the temple’s door. “Come on, let’s go tell Henry,” I say, smiling at her.

“Okay,” Cora says, sighing with happiness as if she hasn’t got a care in the world and I suppose she doesn’t 1 anymore, not after our mother answered so many of her questions. We give our thanks and goodbyes at the door to the priestess who let us in, who looks incredibly happy for us all, and then we start down the long stone steps just as the sky starts to turn pink with dusk.

“We still have so much to tell you,” Cora says, holding my hand as we trot excitedly down the steps.

“Really?” I ask, fascinated. What else is there to know?

“Yeah,” Roger says, smirking at his brother.

“Like what?” Sinclair says casually, clearly not really believing that there could be much else beyond the amazing news we’ve all just received.

“Like, that Rafe’s got magic powers,” Roger says with a wide grin. Sinclair and I both go dead still in our tracks, turning to our siblings. Then, as one, we both say the same thing: “Wait, what?”

And Roger and Cora burst into laughter.

Chapter 394 – By the Light of the Fire

Ella

That night, again around the fire, Henry leans forward in his chair and rests his elbows on his knees, smiling around at us.

“So, tell me if I’ve got this right,” he says, clearly tickled by it. “My two sons are mated to two sisters, who each have the Goddess’ blood in their veins, which means...” .” he pauses here, putting his thoughts together, “that all of my grandchildren are going to have mystical powers?”

Cora shrugs, grinning at him. “That’s what she told us,” she says, laughing a little bit.

“Well,” Henry says, pleased, leaning back in his chair and shaking his head in disbelief. “This saves me a great deal of worry.”

Sinclair turns to him confused. “What? Why?”

“Because,” Henry says, shrugging, trying to hold back his grin. “Imagine if just one of you were mated to a Goddess -born wolf, and only half of my grandchildren had magical powers. At least this way, I don’t have to pretend that I like the non-magical ones as much as the others.”

We all laugh at this, but I shake my head at Henry’s streak of dark humor. Because, beneath it, we all know that it’s not true. He was always going to love all of the grandchildren equally, no matter what.

“I wonder what your gift will be, little baby,” I say to Rafe, who is awake and sitting up in my lap, holding my fingers in his little fists and looking interestedly around at our group. I was very intrigued when Cora told me that all of their gifts would vary according to their personalities – I, like her, had assumed that they would be the same. We still haven’t figured out Cora’s gift yet, though we’ve all be thinking.

“Rafe’s will probably be shooting lasers from his eyes,” Roger murmurs, leaning forward to study my son. I shoot a little glare at Roger and he grins at me.

“No, he’s going to be a healer, like mommy,” I say, kissing Rafe’s head and making him look up at me with a little baby smile. I smile back at him, unable to help it.

“Nah, Rafe’s got a warrior’s soul,” Sinclair says at my side, leaning back in his chair and proudly considering son. It will be something to do with that.”

“Nooo,” I say in denial, glaring at my mate now. “Rafe is gentle. His powers will be for peace.”

“What about ours?” Roger asks, turning to Cora. “Are you getting any hints down the bond?”

“No,” she replies, sighing a little. “I can’t even figure out what mine is, let alone the baby.” She frowns a little in frustration, even though we’re all aware that nothing is going to wipe out her joy today. Everything for her – for all of us – is coming up roses.

“That’s all right Cora,” I say with my own contented sigh, leaning back in my chair. “We’ll figure it out.”

“It would be convenient,” she says, putting her chin in her hand and scowling at me a bit, “if my gift had been healing too. Considering that I’m a doctor.”

“Yes,” I say with a mock haughtiness, grinning at her, “that would be convenient, but not everyone can be as gentle, and loving, and restorative as me, Cora – it’s in my personality -”

And even as she gives me a little false glare, and I laugh, Sinclair nods as if it’s a fair point. But then Cora cocks her head to the side, clearly considering something.

Then, she sits up straight and looks around. “Actually,” she says to the men, “would you mind if Ella and I had a minute out here alone?”

Henry and Sinclair immediately agree and start to stand up but Roger frowns just a little. “Why?” he asks.

“Something mom said,” Cora says, turning to him, “about Ella...being able to help. Do you mind? A little sister time, to see if we can sort through it?”

Roger twists his mouth a little and I laugh a little when I see that he does mind, just a bit – but I forgive him, because I know he doesn’t want to be separated from her for a single moment right now not with everything they’ve just discovered. But still, when she gives him a little shove, he sighs and stands up

“Come on, new papa,” Sinclair says, wrapping an arm around Roger’s shoulders after taking Rafe from my arms so that Cora and I can concentrate on each other. “I’ll teach you how to change a diaper.”

Roger groans but Cora and I laugh as the men help Henry onto the platform lift and then head inside the RV.

“So, what are you thinking?” I ask eagerly, moving my chair closer to my sister’s so that we can better see each other in the dim light of the fire.

“Something mom said,” Cora sighs, looking down at her hands and clearly thinking it through as she goes. “She said that you could help me figure it out.” Cora looks up at me now, her mouth twisted to the side as she tries to work through it. “Do you think I’m like broken, or something?”

I immediately open my mouth to deny that, but she puts up a hand to stop me. “No, I mean like, do I need to be healed? With your powers? So that I can access the gift?”

“Oh,” I say, curious and sitting up straight. “I mean, that would make sense – I had to go out into the desert to get the gift from mom – or at least to access it. Maybe...maybe we need to like, do something to get it going. Some sort of ceremony like that.”

“Worth a try,” she says, shrugging. “Do you want to...give it a shot?”

“Sure,” I say, reaching for her hands. And then, quite quickly, I run my power through and over her body. Her wolf raises her nose to the gift as it passes her, giving it a warm little nudge, and I smile as I sense her. Such a pretty wolf – her fur a thousand shades of brown, from the lightest tawny to nearly black..

But as I scan Cora, seeking any places that she’s hurt or tied up or anything...I come up with nothing.

“Sorry, Cora,” I sigh, dropping her hands and sinking back onto the chair. “You’re totally fine, as far as my gift can sense.”

“Boo,” she says, likewise sinking back in the chair and gnawing at her lip. I watch her as she moves on to the next option. “Um,” she says, “do you think I could try healing you?”

“What?” I ask, my face twisting with confusion.

“Well, mom also said all the gifts were linked. Maybe I can...heal a little? And maybe doing that will allow me to like, access my full ability?”

“Okay,” I say, and I hold my hand out to her. “I cut my finger this morning on a bottle cap, T say with a sigh, realizing that I’ve been meaning to heal it all day and just got distracted. ” My gift could fix this up in a cinch can you do it?”

Cora shrugs and takes my hand in hers, closing her eyes and pushing herself to fall into the meditative state I use when I access my gift. I do my very best to stay very still and, importantly, not to fall into that same meditative state and heal it myself.

After a few minutes, I gasp a little when I do feel a very slight tingling at my fingertip where the cut is. I see Cora push and concentrate, but then, five minutes later, when she opens her eyes and peers down at it, she scowls and pushes my hand away.

“Still there,” she says, scowling.

“I know,” I sigh, holding it up to look at my hand. “I did feel a little tingling though. And it does feel better.”

“Really?” she asks, interested. “Yeah,” I say, smiling at her. “It’s interesting that they’re linked. Maybe we can all do like, a little bit of each other’s stuff. But I do think that it’s fair to say that healing is not your gift.”

“Well then what is it -” she sighs, scowling and starting to get frustrated. I tuck my feet beneath me and smile at my sister, who has always been a little more hot-headed than me.

“Do you think it makes sense that I’m a healer?” I ask quietly. “Mom said that our gifts match our personalities.”

“Well duh, Ella,” Cora says, rolling her eyes at me a little bit. “You’re the most maternal person I’ve ever met – all you want to do is take care of everyone, especially babies, and fix things-

“True,” I say, cocking my head to the side, pleased at the idea. “I’d heal the whole world if I could.”

“But that doesn’t help me,” Cora says, starting to lose her temper a little bit. I look up at the sky, where in the distance I hear a tiny bit of thunder roll. I wonder, passively, if we’re going to move our little think tank inside.

“Well, what’s your key personality trait?” I ask, curious. Cora glares at me a little. “I don’t know,” she answers in a huff. “Being frustrated? Stubborn? Closed off to everything? I mean, I didn’t let Roger even get close to me for months – and he’s my mate -”

“That’s not true, Cora,” I say, leaning forward and frowning at her. “You’re... well, you’re stubborn, but you close yourself off because you feel things so intensely -”

“Well, what the hell is the good of that,” she snaps, glaring at me a little, even though I can tell she doesn’t mean it and instantly feels bad about it.

I glance upwards at the sky as the breeze picks up, blowing in storm clouds faster than I thought they could move. And my lips part, just a little bit...

“Cora...” I whisper.

“No seriously, Ella!” She says, throwing a hand up and heaving a big sigh as she glares into the fire. “What kind of stupid gift matches someone like me – what, can I like, turn things to rock? Can I halt trains in their tracks with sheer will? Can I...can I like freeze people in place, just by glaring at them?” She scowls as she crosses her arms across her chest, “that’s what my previous dating history would suggest, at least,” she grumbles.

And, precisely in time with that grumble, thunder rumbles through the sky. But Cora doesn’t notice.

“Cora,” I say again, a grin spreading over my face.

“Seriously, Ella,” she says, snapping her gaze to me. “What kind of gift matches up with someone who is so headstrong, so constantly agitated, so-

But put out a hand towards her, interrupting her. “So...tempestuous?” I say, a smile spreading wide across my face. Cora goes still when she sees my expression. “What?” she says, frowning at me. “What is it? What did you figure out?”

But I say nothing, just laughing and holding up my hands as the rain starts to patter all around us. And Cora’s jaw drops open.

Chapter 395 – Stormy Secrets

Cora glares at Roger, her arms crossed, as he almost literally rolls with laughter inside of the RV, doubling over so hard he has to lay back on the white leather cushions of the kitchenette. “I still don’t see what’s so funny about this,” Cora snaps. I wrap my arm around Sinclair’s waist, grinning widely and listening to the furious sound of the rain pouring on the RV.

I can feel my mate chuckle a little, likewise enjoying the scene. “It’s just too good, Cora!” Roger says between laughs as his father shakes his head, also smiling, and rolls away into the living area with Rafe in his lap, clearly not wanting his daughter-in-law to see the amusement on his face. “What!” Cora snaps, and I have to cover my mouth to hide my own laughter when I see how pissed she’s getting. The rain hits harder, now including little bits of hail.

“It’s just,” Roger says, working hard to sit up and wiping a tear of mirth from his eye, “we had no idea you could control the weather -” another burst of laughter“- but you wanted meso bad that you created a hurricane-” he roars with it again “-just to trap me in a motel, so you could get me in bed

“Oh my god!” Cora snaps, blushing beet red and striding forward a few steps to smack him on the arm, which just makes him laugh harder.

I have to turn my face in Sinclair’s shoulder now – because as much as I want to support my sister, Roger is totally right. And it’s hilarious. Sinclair wraps an arm around me, holding me tight, openly laughing himself and watching with glee as the scene unfolds before us.

“It’s true!” Roger continues as the wind howls around us, shaking the RV a little bit with Cora’s embarrassed rage. “For heaven’s sake, Cora – you didn’t have to nearly drown us to get me in bed, a little light rain would have done it – you could have just given us a flat tire – ”

Growling a little and still blushing hard, Cora climbs onto the little kitchen bench seat, reaching out to smack Roger again, though he scoots away from her. “Shut up!” she mutters, “or I’ll strike you with lightning next!”

“Do we even need that kind of foreplay, Cora? You’re already knocked up -”

Cora emits an enraged, embarrassed little shriek and begins to swat at Roger, which has us all howling with laughter. My whole body shakes against Sinclair’s as I give up pretending and laugh so hard that my sides hurt. Because, as much as Cora hates it, Roger’s reading of her is perfectly accurate – she was so pent up emotionally, and loved him so much, that something about it must have activated her gift that day. The storm wasn’t sent by some dark force – it was just Cora’s own dramatic way of creating a space where she and Roger could be alone together, where they had to face their truth.

The wind and the rain abates a little as Roger pulls Cora into his lap and holds her tight, pinning her arms to her side so she can't hit him anymore, even though I'm sure he didn't feel any pain. He talks to her softly, still laughing and teasing her in the way she needs to be teased but likewise letting her know that he thinks she's amazing, and marvelous, and that if he'd had the same power he'd have done the exact same thing weeks before.

"Precisely right," Cora growls, pressing herself close to him and nudging his cheek with her nose in a particularly wolfish way. "You're just jealous of my powers." "Yes, little demigoddess," he murmurs, kissing her forehead but still grinning with his glee. "I'd have frozen you away in a little igloo jail made entirely of ice until you gave into me – ""Do you think I can do that?" she asks suddenly, lifting her head and looking at him eagerly.

"I mean, rain I can obviously do but do you think I can do ice as well?" "Well you just made it hail," he says with a shrug. "I did?" she gasps, eager, looking up at the ceiling. "I, for one," I say, pitching my voice a bit loud to remind them that they're not the only ones in the room, especially as I see Roger's hand slipping a bit lower on Cora's waist than he'd usually venture in mixed company.

Cora and Roger turn to me, curious, and I smile widely at them, still excited that my sister has figured out her gift. "Well?" Cora asks, grinning at me.

"I think that you probably can do ice," I continue, cocking my head. "Do you remember when, that awful night, the faux priestess froze me to the floor? Well, when mom unlocked my gift, I was able to melt the ice. And that has nothing to do with healing powers, so," I give a little shrug, looking up at Sinclair, seeing what he thinks. " Maybe it's... the crossover that mom was talking about? How all of our gifts are connected, but we can only do a little of what each other can do?"

"Interesting," Cora murmurs, looking down at her hands as if she can read the magic there. Then she holds her hands out towards Roger, her fingers splayed wide. "What are you doing?" he asks quietly. "Trying to freeze you," she murmurs, concentrating. "What!" he gasps, smacking her hands away, which just makes her laugh. "Well, I would have stopped," she says, rolling her eyes, "before I gave you frostbite. Or killed you or whatever."

"Let's...not experiment," he murmurs, looking at her like she's a little crazy, "with that too much." "Don't laugh at me so much," she says, leaning closer and giving him a wicked grin. "And I won't be tempted to." Roger snarls a little and grabs her by the chin, planting a solid kiss on her mouth, and Sinclair sighs and turns me away. "Do you think," my mate murmurs in my ear, "that we can sneak in and steal the bedroom while they're distract-"

"Not a chance!" Roger shouts from behind us. I laugh and then groan as Roger scoops Cora up in his arms and carries her to the back of the RV, both of them cackling victoriously the whole way. Sighing, I lean back against my mate and glare at little at the couch which shifts into a queen-sized bed which is neither big enough for both of us nor very comfortable. "Guess you're stuck out here with me," Henry says, wheeling over and grinning up at us.

"Oh, we don't mind that," I say, smiling warmly at him and hoping he didn't take it that way. "After all, you can wake up with little Mr. Fuss," I coo, leaning down to smile at my baby, "when he gets up at 2 am! For absolutely no reason!"

"More than happy to," Henry agrees with a smile, tickling Rafe's belly with his fingertips and making our little boy laugh. "Any time." And I bite my lip a little as I take Sinclair's hand, loving how much Henry and Rafe are already connected. Family, after all, is everything to me now that I've got it. I'm so, so incredibly grateful that Cora and I have been so embraced by people who love us so much. "Come on, trouble," Sinclair sighs, starting to turn out the beds. The wind picks up outside the RV and lightning strikes close by. We all ignore it, not allowing ourselves to consider, really, what it means. "We've got a long road tomorrow."

And I sigh as I help him, because I know it's true. And I am not looking forward to the return of the highway and everything that awaits us at home.

Chapter 396 – The Long Road Home

Ella

“No more road trips,” I grumble under my breath, trying to rock my little baby in my arms and distract him from the rumbling of the road, “ever again.”” Don’t be so sore about it,” Cora says, moving one of her checkers forward a space. “At least we got the information we were coming for.”

“Well that I will never begrudge,” I say, turning my head and smiling at her.” But next time?”

She grins, anticipating what I’m going to say next. “We’re taking a private jet.” Cora laughs, shaking her head at me and sitting back against the backrest of her seat in the kitchenette.” That would be a waste of resources, and it’s probably too short of a flight or something to mom’s temple,” she sighs.

“Well then one of our children,” I huff, leaning forward to study the board, “is going to have to learn to bend time and space, because I am not suffering through this again-”

But before I can even finish my sentence, Roger at the driver’s seat hits a huge bump and the game board goes flying in the air, pieces scattering despite their magnetic bond. I groan and sit back against my own seat as Cora sighs and picks up the pieces, putting them back in the box. We both know that particular distraction is over. “Sorry!” Roger calls over his shoulder. “Won’t happen again!” “He just knew I was beathing you,” I grumble as Sinclair comes and sits next to me.” Why did you let him drive, anyway? You’re better at it than he is.” “Oh, no he’s not,” Cora murmurs, defending her mate, but Sinclair and I ignore her.

“He insisted,” Sinclair tells me with a shrug, reaching for the baby. “And you know how he gets when he feels like he’s not getting his turn with the toy.”

I laugh a little, handing the baby over to my mate who smiles down at his grumpy son. “I agree though,” Sinclair says, smiling at me now and reaching out to tuck a strand of my hair behind my ear. “Next time? All luxury. We’ll get you all drunk at the airport so you don’t even remember the flight, and then we’ll spend the rest of our time luxuriating.” “This had better be a promise,” I murmur, leaning against him and closing my eyes. “You got it, baby,” he whispers, kissing the top of my head. “Hey, so,” Cora says, and I open my eyes to see her leaning across the table, her attention focused mostly on Sinclair. “Where are we going, anyway?” “Um, home?” he says, frowning at her. “Yeah,” she says, cocking her head to the side, “but...like, bunker home? Horribly uncomfortable clinic home? Your home, the house of a thousand corpses?” Sinclair laughs a little. “Those are gone now,” he says, waving a hand and smiling. “We have a very...particular service which helps us with those kinds of needs.”

"Ohweird," I say, sitting up and looking at him with curiosity. "What isthatjob interview like?"

"Information above your pay grade," he says, smiling and patting my knee. " So, we're going to the house?" Cora asks, interested. "Is that...safe?" " Well," Sinclair considers seriously, "we're pretty damn sure that the Cult itself doesn't have any particular problem with us – that they were merely serving Xander, probably because he supplied them with a great deal of money and resources. But now that we've put a serious dent in the Cult's resources and manpower, and Xander has fled," he shrugs, "we don't see any reason not to go back to the city."

"We're keeping a close eye on it, but I think it's time to start our lives again." "It has to be more complicated than that," I say, shaking my head and frowning at him. "Xander isn't going to rest -" "No, he's not," Sinclair agrees, looking at me seriously. "But we aren't without resources, love. We only went to the bunker because we didn't know what we were up against."

But now that our enemy is on the run, it is a good a time as any to regroup and focus on the interrupted task: ensuring this country is united under a single King. "And that's you, right?" Cora asks, looking at him curiously. "Well, we hope so," he says, grinning at her. "Do you have any objections?"

"Are the people of this nation aware," she says, "that theirKingeatsallthe chips? And does not bother to consider whether his sister-in-law wanted any?"

Sinclair grins and leans forward. "Are they likewise aware, that said sister-in- law ateallof the chocolate chip cookies

Cora gasps, appalled. "Unfair!" she says. "This sister-in-law is pregnant!" "Enough!" I groan, especially as Rafe starts to fuss more in Sinclair's arms. I raise my hands to my temples and rub them gently as my mate and my sister fall silent, grinning at each other. "I cannot take argument on top of traveling in a sardine can. Also, it is smelly in here." "Truce, then," Cora sighs. "So, house?" I say, likewise curious as I look up at my mate. " House," he says with a nod. "...for now."

I frown at him, intrigued, but he sends a little pulse down the bond which shushes me, letting me know he wants to have a private conversation instead of one with Cora. I nod and give him a little kiss on the shoulder before resting my head in the same spot. "So, what do you think," Cora asks, looking down at her hands again and opening and closing them as if she can see her gift sparking there. "Am I going to be able to shoot lightening bolts at people? Or not?"

"You can do anything you put your mind to," I say placatingly to my sister, grinning, imagining how very much she'd like to zap everyone who got on her nerves. "I've actually been meaning to talk to you about that," Sinclair says. "Really?"

she asks, her eyes going wide with curiosity." Sure," he says, giving a little shrug and leaning forward to engage her more completely. "Considering that I'm likely to become the King of a nation that's going to have a lot of military concerns, I wonder if you'd be willing to consider experimenting with your gift and seeing how it could be used... well, as a kind of weapon."

"Really!?" she says again, more eager now. "I never thought of it like that -"

"Cora!" I scold, sitting up straight and frowning between my mate and my sister. "You're a doctor! You shouldn't be thinking about hurting people with your gift!"

"Chill out, Ella," she murmurs, leaning back in her seat and frowning at me. "I'm not actually going to strike people down with lightning bolts, but Sinclair is right – this could be strategically useful."

"Creating a hurricane in the face of an advancing Navy," Sinclair offers, turning to me with a shrug. "Or even, on the day of a battle, ensuring that the other troops are rained on while ours stay dry this could turn the tide in any war." I go a little pale thinking about it, looking down at my baby. I've had enough of war, and I certainly don't want him raised in a world filled with it. "Do you really think we're headed for situations like that?" I ask, my voice soft. Sinclair lifts a hand and softly strokes my hair, sympathy clear on his face. "I'm sorry to say it, love," he gently replies, "but I think so."

We're not coming to power in a time of peace. We can fight for that but...we have to fight." I sigh, looking down at the table, worried all over again. "But at least they've got us," Cora says, leaning over the table and offering her hand. I look up at her, not really understanding what she means. She shrugs. "You and I want peace. So do these three," she says, nodding her head to indicate the Sinclair men. "Put together, we're...kind of a force to be reckoned with. I'd rather be fighting for peace than letting others decide for us." "I get it," I mumble, sinking back in my chair with another sigh. "I just... want more for our children than that."

"We'll give it to them," Sinclair promises, and I look up into his eyes, wanting to believe him very much. "Together, we'll make this world what it should be for their sake, as well as everyone else's." Slowly, I nod, agreeing to the plan. I take my sister's offered hand and give it a squeeze. And the RV continues to rumble down the road, driving us back to the city where this all started. The city, and that nation, and the world that is ours to shape if we're willing to fight for it.

Chapter 397 – A New Home

A few days later, after Sinclair and I have had some time to dwell and consult and decide, we invite Roger and Cora over to our little house early one morning. We're both standing out front waiting for them, Rafe all dressed up in blue and white in my arms.

I grin down at my baby, so pleased to finally be back home, to be able to dress him in all of the clothes I ordered for him during my long weeks of bedrest. This kid has an amazing wardrobe already, but of course he wasn't able to wear it – and heartbreakingly grew out of some of it during our time away in the bunker.

"He's getting really big," I murmur to Sinclair, shifting my baby higher in my arm. "The you in him is starting to come out."

Sinclair grins and looks down at the baby. "He'll be six feet in no time. My little linebacker." "Better not be," I grumble, but I'm unable to help from smiling down at my little cutie. "He needs to stay my little beachball baby for awhile yet. At least another sixteen years." "Don't count on it," Sinclair sighs. "I got my growth spurt early. He'll be taller than you by fourth grade." "No," I gasp, spinning to look up at him in horror. My mate just shrugs, laughing at me and implying that it's inevitable, but then he lifts his chin towards the driveway where Roger's car is pulling in. I take a deep breath as I turn to watch them, and then I consider something out loud. "Do you know," I say, "I've never actually seen Roger's apartment."

They've been staying there for the past few days, Cora happy to abandon her own rather bland apartment. "You're better off," Sinclair replies, raising his eyebrows. "Bachelor city." "Neon signs?" I ask, wrinkling my nose. (Collection of commemorative beer glasses?" "Everything you're imagining," Sinclair sighs, sinking his hands into his pockets as Cora and Roger park and climb out of their car, and worse." "Barf," I murmur, and then I look back down at my baby again.

"Don't worry, Rafey. We'll never let you live like that." "Hi!" Cora says cheerfully, coming over to us and kissing me on the cheek before snatching Rafe out of my arms, cooing to her godson and saying hello. "What, nothing for me?" Sinclair says, grinning – while he's clearly pleased that she, like us, loves the baby so much, he's not turning away the opportunity to tease her. Cora just waves a dismissive hand at Sinclair while Roger likewise kisses me on the cheek and gives his brother a hug. "Is there breakfast?" Roger asks. "Cora can't cook. I'm starving – haven't eaten for days."

"My skills lay elsewhere!" Cora calls over her shoulder, dancing away a little to show Rafe some of the little flowers that are starting to sprout up in the garden. "Sure," Sinclair says, laughing and nodding towards the open door behind us. "Come on in. We made some changes we're curious to see what you think." "Really?" Roger asks as the three of us troupe in together, Cora following behind with the baby. "You weren't satisfied with the blood-and-horror theme that you'd gone with in your bedroom?"

But his mouth falls open, his saucy attitude leaving him as he looks around the living room at the entrance of our house, which has been completely redecorated in shades of blue and grey with luxurious brown leather furniture. "Wow," he says, his eyes going wide. "You guys you really worked fast with some changes," "Do you like them?" I ask eagerly, winding my arm tightly around Sinclair's as Cora comes to my side.

"I love it," she says, looking around at the antique Audubon bird prints that we've used to decorate the walls. "It's so...simple, and chic. But also warm." She looks at me with both love and jealousy in her eyes. "You're so good at this stuff, Ella," she sighs. "I wish I could do this."

"It's a gift," I say, laughing as I throw my hair over my shoulder. "Come look upstairs!" And then I grab her hand and pull her and the baby after me. I can hear Roger and Sinclair following behind us. "I see that you've kept the stair lift," Cora murmurs, laughing a little. "Well, that's useful for Henry," I say as we reach the top of the steps, tossing a grin over my shoulder. "Plus, very fun." Then I pull her into the bedroom, which has likewise been totally redone in a thousand shades of white, beige, and blush. Cora gasps when she sees the gigantic bed with its too-plush comforter, the cozy white fur rug, even the electric fireplace that we've had installed on one wall. "Oh my god," she sighs, stepping into the room and turning around. Then, she sees the closet, which we've had completely refitted to better accommodate two people's clothing.

"This is incredible," Roger agrees, stepping into the room and looking around with what I can only think of as jealousy in his own eyes. I clap a little, jumping up and down as I see them admire the space. "Though I have to admit," he says, turning back to his brother. "This doesn't feel as you as the last room did."

Sinclair just shrugs, a little smirk on his lips. "We decided it was time for a change." "Ella," Cora says, frowning as she peeks into the closet – which now has a chandelier, a station for jewelry, and a full-length mirror...but no clothing in it, not a single piece. "Why... why is this empty?" She turns back to the room as well. "And where is all of Rafe's stuff? His changing table – his bassinet -" And I squeal a little bit as I see her figuring out our surprise.

"We decided," Sinclair repeats, "that it was time for a rather big change."

Cora stares at us confused. But Roger gasps, putting it all together faster than his mate. "Oh, my god," he moans, stumbling back a step and looking around at the room again. He focuses, in particular, on the painting that we placed above the fireplace. It's subtle still in light colors to match the rest of the room – but clearly portrays a summer storm above a forest. "No, guys – you didn't -" "

What?" Cora asks again, coming to my side, and I take her hand. "We're moving into the palace, Cora," I say softly, beaming at her. "We want...we did all of this for you."

"What!?" she gasps, apparently unable to think of any other words as she raises a shaky hand to her mouth. "What are you what do you..." And then she turns in the room, looking around at everything – all of the things I picked out just for her. And I feel a thrill of joy radiate out from my heart as I watch my sister's eyes fill with tears.

"We'll get you all the baby stuff," I say quietly, "a little later. But we thought...for now, you might want to just settle in the two of you..." "It's too much," Roger says, sitting down hard on the bed as he continues to stare around the room, shaking his head. "Dominic – we can't -" "You have to," Sinclair says with a shrug. "Paperwork's all finished. It's out of my hands now – your problem."

He smacks his hands together as if dusting them off, proving his point as he smiles at his brother. "Ella," Cora says, a little sob hitching in her throat as she steps close to me and lets me wrap my arms around her.

"I'm so happy to be able to give you a home, Cora," I whisper to her. "What we always wanted as kids. What we both have now."

At that, she really does burst into sobbing tears, and I laugh and hold her close, feeling a couple slip down my cheeks as well. I look over at Roger, feeling a little undone to see him wiping at his own eyes. "Thanks, Dominic," he says, and I grin at the fact that the brother we usually can't get to shut up has nothing left to say. "This was...this was so nice." "We love you, brother," Dominic says, patting his back and looking down at him. "You do have to name the kid after me, though." "No way!" Cora protests through her sobs, not letting that slide. "Middle name," Roger murmurs, smiling up at his brother. "For sure." And Dominic laughs, and so do I.

Our eyes meet and I don't even need to pass an emotion down the bond to know that he feels exactly the same as me: so grateful for our siblings, so excited for them, and so, so happy to be able to give them their first home in which to raise their child.

"Thanks for getting me out of that apartment," Cora murmurs into my neck, making me laugh. "It was so bad." "Which one?" I ask, grinning. "Yours or his?" "Both," she sighs. "Does this mean you two are moving into the palace?" Roger asks, finding his feet again and taking a steadying breath. "Yup," Sinclair replies, wrapping an arm around his brother's shoulders, "Right after breakfast."

"Oh, so there really is food," Cora says, lifting her head and looking a little eagerly towards the door. "You two," I say, shaking my head and walking with her over to it. "You're going to have to learn how to feed yourselves. And the baby." "We'll play it by ear," she concedes, grinning, and then we all head down the steps for our final meal in our house.

Or, I think, smiling to myself, the first of many in Roger and Cora's.

Chapter 398 – King and Queen

Ella

“I’m glad we did that,” I say later that afternoon as Sinclair pulls our car around to the front entrance of the palace. “I couldn’t stand to say goodbye to that house if it was to a stranger. Too many memories there.” “I agree,” Sinclair says, parking directly out front in what feels...well, feels too informal for the future King’s first entrance to the palace, his new home. “Doesn’t this place have like, a garage?”

I murmur, looking into the back seat to check on little Rafe, who is happily chewing on the sleeve of his little baby hoodie and staring at himself in a mirror attached to his car seat. “I... think so...” Sinclair says, and I look up in surprise to see him grimacing at me a little. “I’ve only really been here for state occasions,” he says, shrugging.”

And the birth of our child,” I point out.

“Well for that,” he says, “wealsojust parked out front.”

“True true,” I say, turning away to my door. “I guess we’ll figure it all out. Yes, we will,” he murmurs, getting out of the car and opening the back seat to lift out Rafe’s carrier. While I wait for them to come around to my side, I stare up at the gorgeous palace in front of me. “I can’t believe this is going to be my home,” I murmur. “I can’t believe I’m going to be a King,” he sighs. I look up at him, studying the lines of his handsome face. “Yeah,” I agree. “Me neither.”

Sinclair laughs and shakes his head down at me. “Well, I would hope thatyouwould try to chuff me up a little bit there.”

I laugh and take his arm, squeezing it. “Well, you know I think you cando it,” I say, grinning, “and that I don’t think anyone else could do it any better. I just,” I consider it for a moment, shaking my head. “I don’t know. I’m not going to be able to get used to people calling you King.”

“Will you be able to get used to people calling you Queen?” he asks, brow arched. I laugh up into his face at the ridiculousness of it. “Absolutely not,” I reply. “They’ll all just have to call me Ella, or I’ll walk right past them without realizing that they’re talking to me.” “You don’t do so poorly responding to Luna,” he says, pulling his arm from my grip and wrapping it around my shoulder to pull me close. Yes, but that feels more real,” I say quietly. “I...know what a Luna’s supposed to do. I want to protect my pack, help them in all things.” “I imagine Queen is much the same,” he says softly. “You’ll get used to it. And you’ll be great.” “Do I get a crown?” I ask grinning up at him, but then my face falls slack with shock when he slowly begins to nod.

“Wait, seriously?” I say, my eyes going wide. “I get acrown?”

"It's technically not yours," he replies, laughing. "It belongs to the nation to be passed from Queen to Queen. But, for as long as you're alive and we're on the throne," he grins widely at me, seeing the excitement on my face, "you get a crown." "Well then let's go!" I shout, bursting forward and heading up the steps. "What the hell are we waiting for!"

To my extreme disappointment, Sinclair does not take me immediately to the vault with the crown jewels and let me wear my tiara while I unpack all of our moving boxes. "Not until the official coronation, my ass," I murmur angrily as I use a box cutter to cut the tape on probably my fortieth box and start to unload all of Rafe's baby clothes. A few feet away from me in his little playpen, Rafe lets out a little squeal that I choose to interpret as support. "Thank you, Prince Rafe," I call to him. "I agree. He's being cruel."

"I am not," Sinclair laughs, coming into the room with a little tray of food for our lunch. "I'm just following the rules. It's not really a Kingdom anymore the jewels belong to everyone. It's not right to wear them until the people have officially given them to us. And then," he says, putting the tray down on the bed, "only on state occasions."

"Again," I sigh, pausing to look up at him, "this is a rule that I will choose, in my wisdom as Queen, not to follow." And then I send him a mental image down the bond of when, precisely, I plan to be wearing that crown. And just how good I'll look wearing that crown, and only that crown. Sinclair blinks and then huffs a laugh, grinning at me. "Fine," he says. "One exception can be made. One."

"One to start," I say primly, turning back to my task at hand. "Come and eat," he says, taking the fancy lids off of our plates of sandwiches, like we're in some kind of hotel. I was pleased to hear that Sinclair, in starting to hire people to refill the palace with workers and get it back to fully functioning, hired a head chef. Still, I don't even know where the kitchens are and it feels strange already to be waited on like this. What am I going to do when I'm pregnant again? Just...wander the halls, starving, searching for the kitchens? "I'm not hungry yet," I say to Sinclair, laying out Rafe's clothes on the floor in neat piles and then disassembling the box. "I want to get us moved in." I do take a moment, though, to look around the main bedchamber. "Remember the last time we were here?"

I ask quietly, taking in the tall windows, the gorgeous floors. We've had much of the furniture replaced with that which suits our taste a bit better, but still...I'll never forget the day we brought our baby into the world. "Vividly," Sinclair murmurs, biting into his sandwich and watching me. "Are you sure you still want us to be our bedroom?"

"We have options." "Yes," I say with a little sigh, looking around. "I'm sure. It's... fitting." I smile at him. "This is a King's bedroom for sure – and you are a King!" "Not yet, he says, shaking his head. "You keep saying that," I reply, frowning at him. "Is there something wrong? Are you... doubting the fact that the coronation will go through or something?"

"No," he replies, cocking his head to the side. "I just...want everything to be right. Damon and his father..." he shakes his head, a little angry, "they took liberties with the privileges of this position that they shouldn't have. It wasn't right."

"I know," I say quietly, watching my whole-hearted mate struggle with his new responsibilities. "But you'll be better." "I hope I can be," he sighs. And then he looks over at the baby. And I hope I can convince him to be as well, when his turn comes." "Rafe?" I say, turning to my baby in surprise. But then my face bursts into a smile. "No, he'll be a great Prince! And a wonderful King!"

And then I laugh, crawling over to his little playpen and peeking over the edge, grinning at my little boy. "How could he not be, he's so sweet!" Sinclair smiles at me but then shrugs. "Every tyrant was once a well-loved little baby whose mother thought they were too cute to do anything wrong." Yes," I sigh, standing and reaching down to pick up my baby and carry him over to his poor worried father. "But we'll raise him right." I kiss my baby on his head, sending a little love down the bond to him that makes him smile and wiggle with happiness. "We'll do our very best, Rafe," Sinclair says to our boy, smiling at him. "We can promise you that." "So," I say, after a moment as I raise my baby to my shoulder and hold him close. "What's next for us? We're in the palace. We're awaiting some kind of coronation. What do we have to...do?" "Well," my mate says, looking up at me with serious eyes. "I've got a bunch of politics and meetings to attend, as well as a palace and a nation to get going. But you...well, Ella, I want you to do what you please." "What do you mean?" I ask, confused. "I don't just want to sit around relaxing and watching movies all day – I had enough of that during bed rest, it was terrible. I want to help you -"

"I know," he says, laughing and reaching for my hand, which I give him. "But I don't want to...giveyou tasks, or tell me how to help me. I want you to pick your own projects. Your instincts are excellent, Ella. I have my own ideas about how to help the people of this nation, both human and wolf alike. But I know you do too."

I bite my lip. "I'm not sure I do just. yet." Honestly, it probably makes me a bad Queen but...I haven't given it as much thought as I should. "Well, you will," he says, nodding to me. "And when you do, I want you to follow them. But in the meantime, if you'd like a suggestion..." I nod eagerly, excited for a project and curious about what he has in mind. "What do you think about planning a wedding? A big one, very public."

I wrinkle my nose at him, confused. Then I lean forward. "Sinclair," I say, shaking my head a little. "We alreadydidthat. I mean I know a mating ceremony is a little different but we –"

"No," he says, laughing up at me, and I can't help but smile down into my mate's handsome face. Sometimes he's still so beautiful when he laughs that it takes my breath away. "I'm not talking about us." "Then who?" I ask.

“Roger and Cora,” he says quietly. “I think it could be good for the nation to see a wolf marry a human. Even if she’s ...notpreciselyas human as we thought she was. What do you think?”

And a huge smile breaks out on my face that, by his laugh, tells himpreciselywhat I think.

“I love it,” I whisper. And then I squeal in excitement, spinning fast in a circle and laughing with joy. “A wedding! A wedding for Roger and Cora!” I absolutely cannot wait.

Chapter 399 – Bringing Aid

Our first night in the palace is so strange for me. My two boys are sleeping soundly on either side of me – Sinclair sprawled out over our supersized bed (it's much bigger than a King – I don't even know if they have a name for it anymore; we had to make a custom order) and Rafe's bassinet is pulled up close on my other side. I look first at my mate and then at my little baby, smiling at each of them, marveling at how much they already resemble each other with their dark hair and their wide-set eyes, each framed with dark lashes.

My smile deepens as I look between them. I mean, Sinclair is of course lacking Rafe's pudgy cheeks, but the resemblance is still uncanny. It's very, very clear who this baby's daddy is.

"Rude of you, little baby," I whisper, rolling over on my side and peeking into the bassinet, "to not bother looking like me at all." He sighs a little in his sleep and wiggles, getting more comfortable. It's so cute that I think my heart might burst at the sight of it. But the sight of my super-cute little baby can only do so much to distract me from all of the thoughts racing through my mind right now. I roll onto my back and stare at the distant ceiling, turning them over one-by-one.

Half of them pertain to the wedding, which I really am excited about. And I do think it's a good idea – half of the trouble of bringing this nation together is suggesting to humans and wolves alike that this nation respects both kinds of persons – and that we're allequal. A marriage between them – especially as publicized as Sinclair thinks it should be will go far with both populations in suggesting that the Royal family, at least, truly embraces this idea.

I wrinkle my nose and laugh a little at the thought of myself as part of a royal family- I'm nowhere near fancy enough for such a title – but then I sigh again, distracted.

Because Sinclair's other point is still valid – I know, in my heart, that I want to help our citizens, help everyone. And I have this incredible healing power that I could use in our nation's hospitals to actually physically help people...

But is that what I really want to do? Is that the best use of my gifts? Then, quite suddenly, I remember someone who might be able to help. As quietly as I can, I turn over and slide open the drawer by my bedside table, pulling out the cellphone that I haven't had for weeks since we've been away in the bunker. I flick it on and then quickly pull up a familiar name in my contacts and send off a text:

Isabel! I've been a bad friend – but we're back now, from where we had to go. Do you have a minute tomorrow? To talk?

Biting my lip – because I really do feel bad about neglecting my friendship, especially after I asked her to stay here instead of going home – I send off my message and hope that my friend can forgive me.

But, considering how good and kind she is if not a bit sharp-edged at times, I think, smiling – I think, and hope, that she'll forgive me.

Then, feeling a little better at having gotten started on a plan, I finally drift off to sleep.

When Sinclair's alarm rings the next morning, he groans as he rolls over to turn it off, and then he flops back in his spot and reaches out an arm for me. But he opens his eyes in surprise when his hand meets...nothing. Because as soon as I heard the alarm, I gasped and rolled away, reaching for my phone, desperate to see if Isabel replied. Yesss," I whisper, excited to see that I have a message waiting. "What?" Sinclair asks, groggy. "What's happening?" "Nothing," I murmur, quickly flicking my messages open. Go back to sleep." Ignoring him, I eagerly click open Isabel's reply.

Ella! Where the hell have you been!? We've all been so worried! Please come and see me – I want to hug you myself and assure myself that you're all right. I'm at the Refugee Center – come by any time after 8, someone will lead you to me.

I eagerly start to type out my reply but, before I get far, I hear a snarl behind me and feel a gigantic arm wrap tight around my waist. I gasp and then shriek in shock as Sinclair pulls me, laughing, across the bed to settle tightly against his chest.

"What the hell is this," he growls in my ear, pretending to be angry." Mymate? Neglectingme in the morning?"

"Ohh, poor big scary Alpha," I tease, turning in his arms so that my stomach is pressed against his, pouting mockingly up into his face. "Did you need your morning kiss and snuggle, or else you can't start your day?"

"Damn right I can't," he growls, baring his teeth at me – an act that would probably make some men quail but which only makes me laugh." We're going to have to introduce some discipline in this house – you haveduties, little Queen -"

"Ohhhh, little Queen," I say, pressing myself tighter against him and wrapping my arms around his neck so that my whole body is flush against his.

"I like this new nickname. Very elegant." "Do you," he murmurs, dropping his head to drag kisses along my neck and down across his shoulder, the tickly stubble of his beard making me shiver. "I could think of a few other things to call you." "Oh really," I sigh, rolling one shoulder back so that Sinclair can continue his path down across my collar bone and lower, until his lips press against the skin just above my breasts. "Like what?"

“Bad girl,” he offers, glaring up at me.

“For snatching up your phone first thing in the morning. Making me jealous of whoever it is you’re talking to.” And then he drops his gaze, continuing his path. I shudder a little at the feel of his lips against my skin, burying my fingers in his silky black hair and letting my head tilt back a little at the pleasure of it.

“No reason to be jealous,” I murmur. “It’s just Isabel. I’m going to visit her at the Refugee Center today.” “What?” he asks, snapping his head up, all the play gone from his voice. I go still, frowning at him, wondering what went wrong. What is it?” “You’re going to the Refugee Center?” I turn my head to the side. “Is that...bad?”

“It’s very dangerous, Ella,” Sinclair says, staring hard at me. “Those people are desperate – they will do anything to better their situations, they could seek to take advantage of you -”

“Baby,” I murmur, putting a hand on his cheek and frowning deeper while I search his face. “That’s precisely why I should go. They need help – I can help them -” He sighs and hangs his head for a moment, thinking it through. I wait, trying to be patient but unable to help feeling a little frustrated. Just yesterday he told me to find my own path, and today he’s trying to tell me that my chosen path is too dangerous?

“I just...want you to be safe,” he says, lifting his head and looking me in the eyes. My frustration flees instantly because I understand – I really do.” “We’ll be safe,” I whisper, running a hand over the stubble of his cheek. ” Isabel goes every day – and she wouldn’t put me in a situation if she thought that I -” “Wait, we?” Sinclair says, sitting up fully now and looking at me sternly. “Who is ‘we’?” “Rafe and I,” I say, sitting up on my elbows and looking up at my gigantic mate towering above me.

He laughs, derisive, and looks away. “You aren’t bringing the baby.”

I laugh right back. “Just try to stop me!”

Chapter 400 – The Refugee Center

“Ella,” Sinclair says, snapping his face back to mine, still pissed as hell at my suggestion that I’m bringing Rafe with me to the Refugee Center. “It is too dangerous – I will not let you put both of you in harm’s way like that.”

“What are you going to do, Dominic,” I say, turning my head to the side sarcastically, “strap the baby to your chest all day? Bring him to all of your meetings of state?” He looks away from me then, clenching his jaw, saying nothing because he knows I have a point. The baby has to stay with me – I’m still breastfeeding. “Exactly,” I say, heaving a little sigh and pulling myself back to my side of the bed, where I can hear Rafe starting to fuss.” We’ll be fine!”

I’m already out of the bed and lifting Rafe up, asking him about his morning and changing his diaper before Sinclair speaks again. “Can you at least take Cora with you?” he says quietly. “And Roger, if he’s free?” I turn and smile at him then, pleased that he’s not fighting me on this more than he is. “That’s actually a really good idea,” I say, smiling. “Cora will be really helpful.”

“Yes,” he sighs, turning to look at me finally. “Plus, she can zap anyone who tries to touch you.” I laugh, shaking my head and turning back to continue changing the baby. When I finish up, I feel Sinclair come close and wrap his arms around my waist. “I just want you safe, trouble,” he murmurs in apology, kissing my hair and then dipping his head to press his cheek to mine.

“I know,” I sigh. “I promise,” I say, turning in his arms and taking his cheeks in my palms, “the moment I feel anything strange, I’ll leave. Absolutely promise. All right?”

“All right,” he murmurs, nudging my nose with his. “But I’m putting a tracker somewhere in your clothes so that I can come find you if I need to. And I’m not telling you which piece of clothing so that you can’t get rid of it.” “Well then,” I murmur, pitching my voice lower. “I’ll just have to go naked.” My mate growls and bends his knees so that he can grip the back of my thighs, and then in one swift movement he stands up, yanking me with him so that my legs are wrapped around his waist. I laugh, looping my arms around his neck and moving forward for a kiss.

“Over my dead body,” he murmurs, will I let you go any where naked. Except back to bed.”

And then my sweet, overprotective Alpha mate leans in and seals his promise with a kiss.

“I’m glad you asked me to come, Ella,” Cora says as we both climb out of the SUV driven by Conner, the red- haired young man who I healed first with my powers. I was pleased to see Sinclair arranged for him to be our combination chauffer/bodyguard today

– he’s always been a bit of a favorite. ” Sorry Roger couldn’t make it,” Cora continues, leaning over to help me tighten the straps on Rafe’s little carrier. Rafe gurgles happily to see his auntie, which makes me smile. “Yeah, what’s Roger up to that he couldn’t come?” I ask, adjusting Rafe so that his weight rests comfortably on my shoulders. When we’re all ready, Conner nods to us and we start towards the Refugee Center, a squat building on the edge of the city that looks like it could do with both some repairs and some resources. “He’s all wrapped up in Sinclair’s stuff,” she sighs, “I’m surprised Sinclair didn’t realize it.

But when he steps up as King, Roger – as his Beta is going to step forward to manage the affairs of the pack that Sinclair was mostly focusing on.” ” Does he...want to do that?” I ask, hesitating. I mean, Roger’s clever and a hard worker, but Sinclair has always enjoyed the bureaucratic work more than Roger. “I don’t think so,” Cora sighs to me, shaking her head a little.

” He’s still figuring out his place. It’s something we talk about a lot.” “Well, I hope he’s not unhappy,” I murmur, suddenly worried for my brother-in-law. Roger’s a tough nut to crack, but I know he’s got a big heart beneath all his bravado. And I also know he’s so dedicated to his brother that he’ll do whatever Sinclair asks of him, even if it doesn’t make him happy.

“Oh, don’t worry too much about him,” Cora says with a little laugh as we approach the Center’s doors. “He’s got a new mate, a new baby coming along, and new bonds with both – he’s all set.”

“That’s so sweet,” I murmur, truly meaning it as I pull open the doors. But any warm and fuzzy feelings that Cora just gave me are wiped away at what I see before me. The office is...a mess. Cora, Conner, and I slowly look around, taking everything in before us. Phones are ringing off the hook, paperwork is stacked a mile high, and a long line of people winds around the room, waiting for two harried people at the desk to attend to them.

Unfortunately, those people are also working the phones. As I glance around, I also see that the room could use a nice cleaning. I’m not precisely a neat-freak...so if even I’m noticing? It’s dirty. I grimace, guilt roiling in my stomach. These people deserve better. “Follow me,” Conner murmurs, taking lead. Cora and I fall into step behind him. “Hey!” someone in the line shouts, thinking we’re cutting. “Line starts back there!” ” Apologies!” Conner calls to whoever it was, putting on his charming smile.

” We’re not cutting in line – official business.” “They should still see us first!” Someone else calls out, a man this time. But Conner just grimaces a little and ignores him, leading Cora, Rafe, and I behind the desk. A girl working the desk – dark-haired with pretty brown eyes – stands up straight in shock and surprise to see us come around.

“You can’t be back here,” she murmurs, putting a hand over the receiver of the phone so whoever she’s talking to can’t hear. “You have to wait in line” “This is Ella Sinclair,” Conner replies, stepping aside a little so that she can see me more clearly.” And her sister, Cora...Sinclair?” He says it as half a question since Cora and Roger haven’t technically been mated yet. Cora just rolls her eyes and waves a hand, as if she doesn’t know and cares even less. I give an awkward little wave to the girl, whose eyes go wide, moving between me and the baby.

I feel a sudden shyness come over me as I realizes that...well that she recognizes me. Of course I’ve long been aware that Sinclair is a public person and that as his mate people probably know who I am. But so far Sinclair has done such a good job of keeping us away from the world and the media that this is the first time I’m really aware of being publicly recognized. “Oh my god,” the girl murmurs, hanging up the phone without saying goodbye.

“Apologies, my Queen – Luna um...” she folds into a little bow, simultaneously smacking the arm of the slim blonde man next to her, who gives her a dirty look before his own eyes go wide. A whisper travels through the room and I anxiously play with Rafe’s little foot as a thrill of anxiety rolls through me. I hadn’t...realized it would be quite like this. But then Rafe gives a happy squeal, looking around cheerfully at everyone, and I smile at him realizing that he’s right. Well, he didn’t mean to be right.

But he still is. And I feel my own smile come to my face as I look around at everyone and tuck away my own shyness and anxiety, trying instead to be kind and warm and welcoming. That’s what these people need right now, instead of me cowering away in my anxiety. “Hello,” I say, directing my attention to the girl behind the counter. “Please don’t worry about any of that.

We came to help. But we’re looking for Isabel?” “ Oh,” the young blonde man says, his eyebrows going up. “Yeah, she’s out at the camps. She left early this morning.” “Where are those?” I ask. “ Not far,” he replies, but then he hesitates. “But I...they’re not nice, Luna,” he says, letting his words drift off at the end. “I’m not sure you want to ““Not nice we can handle,” Cora says breezily, flashing him a smile and then looking back to the dark-haired girl.

” Can you give us directions? I’m sure we can make it.” “Of course,” the girl says, her hands shaking a little as she sorts through the paperwork on her desk, looking for a map. As she does, I look around the room at all of the silent people who I realize are looking right at me. And I’m a little intimidated to see the variety of expressions on their faces. Some are interested, some look happy but still others look really, really mad.

Or worse, sad and betrayed. I do my best to keep my own feelings in and present a sunny demeanor to them, hoping that it’s right. It’s not that I want to smile in the face of their pain but...if I can let them see that I’m working? That I’m trying, and that good things are coming? Isn't hope as good a medicine as any Goddess' gift? I turn back to the desk when I hear a rustle of paper and see Conner reaching forward to take a map from the girl. "Can I do anything else to help you?" she asks, directing her words to me with a still-shy but now slightly eager smile..

"No," I say, giving her a big grin and shaking my head. "But I'd like you to please make a list of improvements you'd make to this place. Abiglist – don't hold back, okay?"

The girl glances at her colleague and both of their faces brighten, which starts a warm little spot in my belly burning. "Okay," she agrees. "Someone will come get it this afternoon," I say, nodding to them, letting them see it's a promise. "And then we'll get started making this place better." They're both smiling widely at me now as I say my goodbyes and then head back out of the door with my sister, my baby, and my bodyguard.

Some people wave to us as we go and I wave back, but as we pass through the doors the only thing that settles in me is resolve. "We have to do something to help these people," I say to Cora as we move to the car. She nods stoically at my side, agreeing. "But Ella," she says, hesitating a little, "I think that in there? It's just scratching the surface." And as we get into the car and start to drive away, I find that I agree. And that I'm a little afraid of what we're going to see next.

Chapter 401 – The Camps

Ella

Someone must have called ahead because when we pull up to the refugee camp I see Isabel standing outside the gates, her arms crossed over her chest and a big smile on her face. I give a little squeal of excitement when I see her, my hand immediately going to the lever on the car door. “Seriously, Ella,” Cora murmurs, grabbing my other wrist. “Let’s not leap out of the moving vehicle just because we see our friends.” “Ohhh,” I say, tossing her a little glare over my shoulder.

“I’m not that dumb, Cora -” “You’ve done it before,” she sighs. “Once!” I snap, giving her a real glare and then quickly moving to unbuckle myself and then Rafe, getting him strapped to my chest as fast as I can when the car stops. The result of the delay is that Isabel pulls open my door the moment I turn around, ready to grab the handle again. “Ella!” she shouts, laughing already, and I burst out of the car, wrapping my friend in a one-armed hug, kind of regretting that I already strapped Rafe to me so that I can’t hold her properly.

“Isabel!” I gasp, giving her a big kiss on the cheek. “It issogood to see you!”

“And you, friend,” she says, sighing a little in relief that looks like it was a long time coming. “We were all going crazy when we didn’t hear from you for so long and we got some of the details, but no one really knows what happened? Some kind of...attack?” “It’s an insane story,” I say, rolling my eyes as Cora and Conner come around the car. “I’ll tell you all about it, but it needs a long telling, so maybe...not now,” I say, glancing over at the refugee camp. “All right,” she nods, still looking at me.

“But you’re okay? Things are...steady?” “We’re fine, everyone’s fine,” I say, running a hand over my baby’s hair. “Things are steady for now.” I give a little shrug, letting her know that that’s all we’ve got. She smiles at me and nods, understanding, and then takes a moment to fuss over Rafe, telling him how big he got, and then giving Cora a kiss on the cheek as well. As Isabel hugs Cora, she pauses and steps back, looking down at her- belly. “Are you...”

“Yes, yes,” Cora says, laughing, “though I’m not sure I’m used to people being able to smell it on me.”

“But,” Isabel’s eyes go wide as she looks sup into Cora’s face. “This baby...is a pup?” Cora laughs and shrugs a little. “Listen, it’s complicated. But yeah.... I’m a human with a wolf soul and I’m pregnant with a hybrid mostly-wolf baby.” Isabel blinks in surprise and then laughs, narrowing her eyes at her. “It’s Roger’s isn’t it?” she asks, grinning.

Cora laughs again, harder now and blushing to be called out. “God,” she says, running a hand through her hair, “were wethatobvious in Vanara?”

“To everyone but yourselves, apparently,” Isabel says, smirking at her. And then she turns her attention to Conner. “And who are you?” “A bit of a new addition,” he says, rubbing his hair awkwardly but giving her a smile anyway. “My name is Conner, I’m a sergeant in the pack,” he says, nodding to us to let her know which one. “And are you single?”

Isabel asks, looking him up and down as she folds her arms over her chest. Conner, bless him, blushes bright red as I burst into laughter and shove my friend on her shoulder. “Isabel!” I laugh, shaking my head at her. “You’d have bitten my head off if I asked that of you the moment I met you.” “Well, I’m different now,” she says, grinning at me. “More romantic, now that I see how much it turned my life around. after tragedy. I’m a meddler by nature,” she says, giving me a wink before turning back to him. “So?”

she prods. “Yes, ma’am,” he murmurs down towards his feet, smiling a little.” I am single.” “Good,” she says, reaching out to pat him on the shoulder and then turning with all of us towards the gates. “We’ll see what we can do about that.” And then, together, Isabel walks us towards the gates. As we pass through them, I see her mood change just a little bit as she looks at my sister and I warily.

“I know you’ve seen some tough things, Ella, Cora,” she says, but I do want you to be prepared for what you’re walking into.” I frown at her. “Please,” I say, shaking my head. ” Don’t hold back. We want to help -we have resources now -” “I know,” she says, placing a hand on my arm. “I just these people have been through a lot. This is not going to be a walk in the park.” “That’s all right,” Cora says with a sigh, starting to look around, her hands on her hips.

“We’ve never been park people, really. We like the beach.” “All right, then,” Isabel says, nodding and starting forward. “Let’s get started.” She fills us in on her family as we begin to walk, letting us know that James is well and – interestingly – at the palace today, enough – reconnecting with Sinclair and seeing if there’s a place for him in the administration.

A beautiful smile takes over Isabel’s face when she tells us about Sadie, even though I don’t think she knows it. The little girl is apparently growing like a weed and a fast learner, eager for every picture book she can get her hands on. While all of this news about my friend’s family warms my heart to its core, that heat fades from me the deeper we get into the camp. Isabel gives us a thorough tour, taking us down row after row of tents where families live together, scrapping together their world as best they can. “How did these people get here,” Cora murmurs, confused. “Well, this is the Wolf Camp,” Isabel says quietly, “the Human Camp is across the river -” ” What?” I ask, a little appalled. “You’re keeping them separate?”

“I’mnot keeping them separate,’ Isabel says, turning to me with narrowed eyes. ”

They demanded separate accommodations.”

“Oh,” I sigh, realizing that that makes sense but disappointed nonetheless.” But anyway, these wolves are all people who had their home destroyed during the war and don’t have family to take them in, or have no way to get to that family, or who otherwise don’t have access to the resources they need to get their lives back together.” “Why the fences?” Cora asks, looking around at the tall chain-link fences all around the perimeter with barbed wire on top.

“They’re not to keep the people in,” Isabel sighs, “people can come and go as they please. The fences are here to keep other people out.”

“Who?” I ask, a little appalled, my hand instantly going to Rafe in my sudden fear. “Stragglers, mostly,” she says, shrugging to me. “There’s probably a better word for it – but there are plenty of people – both human and wolf – who do not like the way that services are being distributed to refugees, and who believe that they can do it better on their own. Still, they need supplies as well, and many don’t hesitate to prey on those within this camp if they can get in.”

“Oh my god,” I sigh, looking around at all of the poor people around us, dozens and hundreds of them living in tents, doing their best just to survive after the war took everything from them. “Will you...will you take me to the human camps too?” “I will,” she says, biting her lip and looking up at me. “Though...they may not be as happy to see you as you think.” “Because I’m a wolf?” I ask quietly. Slowly, she nods.

“The humans have felt deeply betrayed by all of this, and I can’t say I blame them,” Isabel sighs. “It’s wonderful that human and wolf governments are able to come to a cease -fire, but the realization that this entire city is under wolf jurisdiction and that wolves have for a long time considered humans second-class citizens, if not...worse,” she shrugs, clearly frustrated with it and without solutions regarding how to make it better. “It’s not good.”

“Still,” I say quietly, looking at Cora, who nods to me. “I want to go.”

“Okay,” Isabel says quietly, and then she turns to look me in the eye, glancing down at Rafe. “But there’s something I want you to see first. Actually,” she turns to Cora now, meeting her eyes, “I’m more eager for you to see it, considering your medical experience.”

Cora smiles and glances at me, making Isabel frown a little bit, but Cora just waves a hand. “We’ll fill you in,” she says briefly, nodding to Isabel, “but you may want Ella now even more than you want me, if it’s something medical.

But please, lead the way.” Isabel does, silent and stern as she takes us towards a large brown tent towards the front of the camps. She takes a deep breath as she pulls back the flap, and then we all step inside. And my heart sinks down to the very pit of my stomach. Because the tent is absolutely filled with children.

Chapter 402 – The Children’s Tent

There are dozens of children in this tent – maybe hundreds – and my heart breaks as I look them over. Each of the children is laying in on a medical cot, being tended to by a very tiny staff of medical and social workers who look run off their feet. “Oh my god, Isabel,” I murmur, my heart going immediately into my throat.

“Who are...who are all of these children...” “They’re the pups of the camp who are sick,” she says quietly. “Some of them have parents,” she says, nodding to a couple who are sitting quietly by their daughter’s bed, reading her a book even though the little girl can barely pay attention because she’s whimpering with pain. ” But a lot of them,” Isabel says, taking my hand and drawing my attention back to her, “a lot of them are alone.

The rest of the orphans have already gone to the adoption center in the city, but these ones -” “They need help,” I say, my voice tight, determined. “Yes,” she says quietly. And then she turns her eyes to Cora. “Can you...would you be willing to spend some time here? We can use all the hands we’ve got.” ” You’ll want both of us,” Cora says, turning to me to consult. And I nod to her, but turn back to Isabel first. “Are there children like this in the human camp as well?”

I ask quietly. “Yes,” she replies. “A tent as big as this, filled. Maybe bigger.” “Okay,” I say, my heart breaking. But that resolve in me that started earlier, it hardens. “Here today? The other camp tomorrow?” I ask, looking up at Cora, who twists her lips, judging the number of people in the room. “It depends on the severity of the cases,” she murmurs, crossing her arms. “What are you talking about?” Isabel asks, looking between us and then up at Conner, frowning. You’re about to see something very cool,” Conner replies, giving her a soft smile.

“But just... let them work. They’ve got their own system.” Isabel turns to me with a frown, but I just dip a little kiss to my baby’s head and then get started. Cora and I fall immediately into the routine we set up when we were healing the men in the bunker after their battles. She begins by speaking with one of the doctors about the worst cases and as I put Conner to work as a nurse – my old job going bed to bed and speaking to the children and their families (if they have them) with a notepad, noting those who seem most in danger or in the most pain. I move around too, mostly saying hello to people, letting them see the baby, getting the feel of the room with Isabel at my side to show me how things work. But that doesn’t last long, because Cora comes back to me pretty fast. “Come on, Ella,” she says, taking my hand and leading me to the far corner of the tent. “We need to act now. This one is...very bad.” And so we get to work.

The time slips by very quickly as we go from bed to bed, coordinating with the doctors and social workers already on staff to ensure that we’re doing the best work that we can in the short time that we have available. But generally, we fall into a pretty stable routine of me healing the children while Cora and Isabel consult to determine who is next. Conner takes Rafe while I heal, ensuring that he’s content when he’s away from me.

"He's a really good baby," Conner murmurs to me the fifth or sixth time that he takes Rafe from me and tucks him happily away in the crook of his arm. "He's...very chill. I wasn't expecting that." "Well," I sigh, smiling up at him, "Rafe likes his dad better than me and you probably remind him of Sinclair. You're both..." I wave a hand towards Conner's large, muscular frame, "gigantic and stuff. Probably thinks he's right at home!" "I can't believe that's true," Conner says casually, grinning down at Rafe.

Everyone loves the Luna." As if in confirmation, Rafe gives a happy little squeal and reaches out a hand to me, which I kiss. I look back up at Conner." You'll let me know? If he needs anything?" "Always," Conner murmurs, giving me a little wink and stepping away with the baby, who tucks his face away against Conner's chest, apparently getting ready for a nap. And so I turn my attention away, heading over to the little girl who looks up at me with wide eyes in a pale face. "Hi," I say, smiling and sitting next to her, taking her hand. "What's your name?"

"Leah," she says, the word barely audible as it escapes through her cracked lips. "Well, Leah," I say, smiling as I lean closer. "I know you've been feeling pretty badly lately, but I'm going to help you feel better, if that's okay with you." Slowly, Leah nods and closes her eyes, leaning back against her pillows. I squeeze her hand a little as I glance towards the empty chair next to her, my heart breaking as I consider that she has no parent to come sit with her.

But I brush my grief for this little girl aside, because it's not going to do her any good, and then I close my eyes and access my mother's gift, letting it sweep through me first and then into her, where I find...quite a lot of damage done. "This one might take a while," I say, feeling Isabel's presence by my side. "That's all right, Luna," she replies quietly, and I smile a little to hear her say that name. "You take your time."

Leah's injuries are extensive she's battered and bruised from her experiences either during the war or from her time here in the camp. But I also find something... darker, deeper within her. I don't know anything, really, about biology or what organs I'm sensing in her as ill (and I make a mental note to immediately get some books or take some courses on the subject) but it doesn't really matter.

The gift, in its grace, can sense when something is wrong – and it knows how to fix it. I'm really, in all things, just the conduit. But as I put the gift to work, I'm so, so grateful to my mother for letting me be the conduit for this particular gift. It's almost as if she knew it would bring me a personal joy to be able to help in this way.

It does take a long time for the gift to do its work, to heal a long lesion within what I think is – maybe? – Leah's liver. And then, when that's all patched up, the gift flows through her body and slowly knits up all the cuts and bruises on her and at the last works to gently eradicate what feel like...well, tiny little dots in her body, which are just wrong.

Oroff.

I don't know how else to explain it. When I finally open my eyes, I look down at Leah's hand still in my own and smile to see that it's already warmer than it was when I started. And I look up, my smile deepening when I see that she's peacefully asleep, a little smile on her face. My heart squeezes as I hope that she's dreaming, and that her dreams are wonderful.

"Okay," I murmur, sighing and standing up, surprised to find my body stiff. "Let's let her rest." I turn then and am a little surprised to see Isabel standing there, staring at me in shock. "What..." she mutters, "what did you just do?" "I healed her," I say simply, giving a little shrug, understanding that it's going to take her some time to comprehend. We told her about the Goddess' gift before we got started but I'm well aware that it's one thing to hear about it and quite another to see it work. "How long was I ...out?" "Over an hour," Cora snaps, striding over to us and giving me a little glare. "What?" I ask, my eyes going wide. And then I groan a little, because that's...that's way too long. If I spend an hour on each of these children...

"Well, if you'd simply did what I told you to do," Cora says, glaring at me some more, "andjusthealed her liver- her body could have done the rest over the next few days, or we could have come back -"

"There's no way," I say, my voice shaking a little with emotion as I return Cora's glare, "absolutelyno wayI was letting this little girl suffer for one more moment."

"Well," Cora says, opening her eyes wide and waving a hand to encompass the rest of the room. "You healed her, every little bump and bruise, and in doing so let all the seother children continue to suffer. Some of which reallyneedyou, Ella."

And my heart sinks as I look around and realize that she's right. My eyes snap back to my sister's and the guilt overtakes me, knocking out my anger like a tidal wave as I think of every little kid in each of these beds, quietly suffering, waiting for me – And quite suddenly, I burst into tears.

Chapter 403 – An Angry King

“Oh, Ella,” Cora sighs, her shoulders slumping as she sees my reaction to her words. She strides over to me and wraps me in a big hug. “I’m sorry,” she murmurs into my hair, “I shouldn’t have said it like that.” “No,” I sniff, you’re right – I should have listened – ”

“It’s okay. You did so good by her,” Cora says, loosening her grip and turning me towards the little girl asleep in her bed. “She wasn’t going to make it, Ella,” Cora whispers as we look down at the girl. “Not even a few more days maybe not even through the night. And look at her now.”

Tears are streaming freely down my cheeks now. “She’s perfect,” I murmur, and Cora nods.

“So, you did a good thing,” she sighs, wiping at my tears in her own brusque way, “but we still have work to do. All right?”

“Okay,” I say nodding and looking around the room. “Who’s next?” “A little boy,” she says, looking down at her clipboard. “Named Philip.” “A sweet little boy!” I gasp, and then I bury my face in my hands and start crying again, thinking of my own sweet baby – and if he ever got sick – “Ella,” Cora sighs next to me, and I hear her take a deep steadying breath.

“We are not going to get through this if you keep crying all the time.” “I can’t help it,” I sniff, looking up at her and wiping again at my tears, which just seem to keep coming. “Do you think...if these kids don’t have a home, Sinclair will...” “If you go home tonight and ask Sinclair to adopt all these kids,” she says slowly, raising her eyebrows and shaking her head at me, though unable to keep a smile from starting on her lips, “he’s gonna flip, Ella.” “But - ”

“Move on, kid!” she laughs, giving me a little push between the shoulder blades to keep me moving. “Let’s go help Philip!”

“Philip,” I say, taking a deep breath and nodding steadily, trying to put my motherly impulse to save and keep and raise all the children away, though it is very difficult. We don’t have far to go, but as we walk I take my baby from Conner’s arms, even though I know I’ll have to give him back in about two seconds.

“What do you think, baby,” I murmur to Rafe, looking down and watching him sleep, warmth crawling through me and chasing away my sadness as I look down into his perfect little face. “Should we bring home about a dozen new orphan siblings for you today? Do you think daddy will be mad?”

Conner drops Cora off first and then drives us back to the palace. To my extreme disappointment, I was convinced not to bring any children back with me tonight, so it’s just me and Rafe in the car with him. Conner surprises me by driving around to the back of the palace and pressing a button at the top of the car, opening a wide black door.

“Oh,” I say, leaning forward curiously. “So there is a garage...”

Conner laughs a little and confirms my suspicions. As he pulls into a parking spot very close to what I assume is the entrance, I place a hand on his shoulder. “You did really well today, Conner,” I say softly. “Thank you, Luna,” he says, flashing me a smile. “You should...” and I hesitate here, not really knowing what to say. “I should what?” he asks, curious. “Well, I know that you’re part of the military,” say, taking my hand away and twisting my fingers together anxiously, “and I know that you probably have all sorts of ambitions there, but...well, if you’d like to be part of my team, even just for now, and help me continue doing this work, we’d be really happy to have you.”

I smile at him, hoping it’s an offer he’ll consider, and hoping even more that it doesn’t derail his own plans. “I’ll think about it, Luna,” he says, meeting my eyes with a very genuine smile. “I promise I will.” And then we both nod at each other and get out of the car, me unstrapping the baby and leaving his car seat where it is – because he’s just going to need it tomorrow anyway.

Conner leads me through the winding halls beneath the palace to an elevator, which we climb into. He presses a button and swipes a card from his pocket and, when it reaches the second floor, I’m very surprised to find us in the hallway where my personal rooms are. “Oh,” I say, my eyebrows arching almost to my hairline. “Well, that’s terribly convenient, isn’t it?” “Only the best for our Queen,” Conner says, gesturing forward so that I can step out ahead of him. I smile at him and do so, but frown and turn when he stays in the elevator. “You aren’t coming?” Nah,” he says, smiling at me and shrugging. “I’ve got to get back to the barracks, Luna. Have to get some rest so that I’m fresh tomorrow.

I roll my eyes at myself – of course. What was I thinking, that he was going to come and hang out with me and Sinclair? I wave goodbye to him and wish him a good night’s sleep, considering that I’ll just have to give my own report to Sinclair, even though I figured Conner would handle it.

But still. I can handle that, right? As long as I don’t fall asleep on my feet first. But when I push open the door to our suite, I can tell already that Sinclair is mad. Frowning, I close the door behind me, looking towards where he sits at his new desk by the window, already glowering at me with his arms crossed. “What is it?” I ask, confused.

“Ella,” Sinclair snaps, standing and striding over to me as he gestures to the darkness outside the window. “You were gone all day- and while I don’t care about that, you didn’t answer your phone the entire time -”

"My phone," I say, frowning up at him and passing the baby over to the arms he holds out, silently asking for him. "I don't even think I brought it

"Yes," Sinclair growls, frowning down at me even as he lifts Rafe to his shoulder and begins to lovingly stroke his back, welcoming him home and giving me a lecture at the same time. "I realized that you left your phone behind after panicking for three hours that something had happened to you."

"Why didn't you just contact Conner?" "I did!" "Well then what's the problem?" I ask, exhausted and crossing my arms over my chest, truly not getting it and honestly maybe too tired to try.

"The problem," he growls, turning to give Rafe a kiss on the cheek and run his eyes over him, ensuring that he's okay – which, of course, he is. "Is that I was hesitant about you even going to the Refugee Center, let alone staying there all day- "

"Well, we didn't go to the Center all day," I murmur, turning away from him and heading to our expansive closet which is basically a second bedroom where we keep all of our stuff in beautiful, neat little cabinets and racks. "We went to the Wolf Camp almost immediately." "WHAT!" I turn to glare at my mate where he stands at the door. "I don't know why you're freaking out, Dominic," I snap, starting to lose my patience a little bit. "We were totally fine, and -"

"It's incredibly dangerous in those camps," Sinclair says, storming forward to loom over me. "I don't want you and Rafe there where anything could happen -"

"Too bad," I say, objecting to the command in his voice and crossing my arms, looking up at him stubbornly and slowly shaking my head. "Because we're going back tomorrow. Actually, not back – we're going to the Human Camp" And then I see Sinclair's face turn a shade of red I've never seen before. I blink in surprise, taking a step back as I watch him just get...angrier and angrier. My breath hitches in my throat – not because I'm actually afraid I know he'd never hurt me – but I've just never...pushed him this far.

Chapter 404 – Balance

“Dominic,” I murmur, reaching for him. “No,” he snaps, taking a step away from me and shaking his head. “You’re taking this too far, Ella – I know you want to help, but I cannot have you putting yourself at risk like this!” He sputters for a moment, turning away from me and hanging his head, bringing a hand up to cover his face.

I reach for him, seeking him through our bond, not understanding this reaction and needing to know –

He opens his heart to me when I gently ask him to through the bond. He lets me see all of his fear, all of his anxiety, all of the guilt that already rolls in him when he even thinks about the possibility of losing Rafe and I when he could just keep us so safe-

And my heart breaks, for what feels like the eightieth time today, as I stare at my mate’s back, his broad shoulders.

“I’m so sorry, Dominic,” I whisper, closing the distance between us and wrapping my arms around his waist from behind, resting my head against his back, closing my eyes. “I hear you feel your fear for me. But I...I can’t not do this....”

“Ella,” he says, his voice cracking with the strain of his worry, of not understanding why I’m pushing this so hard-

But before he can continue, I let out a deep breath and pass him my own feelings down the bond and along with them, the memories I have from today. Of little Leah, and her sunken pale face, and how fresh her skin looked after I spent an hour holding her hand. And little Philip, who lost a hand, and whose wound was badly infected-

Who will never grow that hand back, but who now will live, and be fitted with a prosthesis, and live a full life –

And the memories of a dozen other children who I helped – who need me, 1 who aren’t safe unless I’m there to help them. The bare idea that I would ever, ever give that up, just to keep my own self safe?

It’s absolutely unthinkable to me.

“You’re forgetting who you chose as your mate, Dominic,” I murmur, my arms still wrapped tight around him.” Please, please don’t ask me to turn away from them. I can’t do it – not when I’m the only one who can help them like this. The only one who can really take away their pain.”

Sinclair turns towards me then, staying so close that I’m able to keep my arms around his waist, and he settles his free arm around my shoulders, Rafe still curled up in his other. As I look up at him I see that his eyes are wet with tears. I reach up a hand to gently wipe away the ones that start to fall down his cheeks. "All right, Ella," he says, his voice gruff. But then he shakes his head at me, not giving in completely. "I see it now – I understand and...and you're right, to hold you back from this would be to ask you to betray who you are. And who you are is the reason I love you. I get it."

I nod, looking up at him, sending a pulse of love and gratitude down our bond. Because I really am just so grateful to be with a man who understands who I really am, down to the core of my being. And more than that a man who is willing to bend, even though he's never been a particularly pliant person, when I tell him what I need.

"But we're doing this on my terms," he continues, a little bit of his growl coming back to his voice even as it's still thick with emotion, and worry, and tears. "All right?" "All right," I whisper, agreeing to it freely because I know he's already given in so much. It's my term now. "Your terms, Dominic. Whatever you say." "Damn right, whatever I say," he snarls, a little playfully, and I grin up at him, loving it – loving him. And I raise myself on my toes, tilting my head back, hoping for a kiss – which he gives me, freely. A good long one that tells me how much he loves me, but also how much he intends to protect me, to keep me safe. Even if I insist on going into what are essentially war zones every day."

Trouble, through and through," he sighs when I finally pull away, just an inch. "You've known that for a long time, big scary Alpha," I murmur back, giving him a smart smack on his rear that makes him jump a little and then laugh. "Thought you'd be used to it by now." "Yeah," he sighs, letting me loose a bit. "Me too." And then he starts a bit as I pull away further now, looking down at his crisp white shirt which is now...well, not so crisp, or so white, but instead covered in a fine layer of brown dirt.

"What the hell did you do to me..." he murmurs. "It's really dirty at those camps," I sigh, stepping away and crossing my fingers. "I'm sorry – was the shirt expensive? I didn't mean to -" And then he laughs, giving me my own smack on the ass and nodding towards the door in our closet which also delightfully leads to the bathroom. "Shower, immediately," he sighs, "filthy girl."

I laugh and give him a wink as I saunter away from the door, "you like me filthy," I call over my shoulder, "and you know it." "Don't listen to your mother," Sinclair murmurs, pretending to cover Rafe's ears. I laugh as I start to pass into the bathroom. "We're not done talking!" he calls after me. "Didn't think we were!" I call back, and then – happy – I strip off my clothes, looking forward to a nice, long, hot shower.

About an hour later, after I've showered and eaten the food that Sinclair ordered up for me, we're finally settled in bed in the dark. Or, the near-dark as I lit a little magnolia-scented candle on my bedside table, wanting to be able to see the changes in his face as we talk.

He's so handsome, I think, smiling at him over our baby, who rests between us, babbling little nonsense words and grabbing his feet as he rolls around on his back. Why wouldn't I want to stare at him whenever I can?

Perhaps intuiting my line of thinking, my mate smiles back at me and reaches out a hand, slowly letting his thumb drift over the line of my cheek. I turn my head a little and kiss that thumb, hoping he knows how well I love him. But...well, I think he does. Because I know just how much he loves me – he shows me every day. I very much hope that I do the same for him.

"So what's your plan, trouble," he murmurs, his deep voice so resonant that I can almost feel the vibrations of it through the mattress. Rafe turns towards his father, laughing a little with joy at the sound of it. I smile and stroke my baby's belly, pleased at how much he loves the sound of his daddy's voice. "I need a team," I whisper, looking up and meeting his eyes. "A big one," he agrees. "I'm not letting you go there again with just Conner, Ella. I know that you believe in the good in everyone but there are people out there who would hurt you."

"Okay," I agree, nodding once. "But...can I have Conner?" "Do you like him?" Sinclair asks, tilting his head to the side. "Should I be jealous?" And I laugh, reaching out and giving him a smack on the shoulder. "Don't be ridiculous," I murmur. "But no, he was very good and helpful today. And he's nice, and Rafe likes him too." I shrug. "But...I don't want to derail his career. Would it be bad, to bring him on board with me?" "Not necessarily," Sinclair answers, thinking as he speaks.

"It would be a diversion from his current plans but," he shrugs, "if he does well protecting the Queen, it could be quite a good mark in his favor. Would you like me to speak with him?" "Very much," I say, my eyebrows going up. All right," he murmurs. "Who else?" "Cora," I say quickly, though I bite my lip. "If she can be drawn away from the Clinic, which...well, which Roger might like. But also..." I laugh a little, looking up at my mate. "I want Hank too, if I can have him." "How long are you anticipating this project will take?" he murmurs, frowning at me.

"Hank might be willing to leave the clinic for a few days to help an emergency refugee situation, but he's very passionate about the work he's doing there. I don't see him leaving it not willingly." "Well, I don't want to ask him to do that," I sigh, looking up at the ceiling as I think it through. "Isabel, certainly, I need. What about James? Did you...did you have a good talk with him today?"

"Yes," Sinclair says, and I turn my eyes back to him. "Though I'm afraid I want him myself, Ella, unless you can make a good argument for why no one else can take his place on your team. I want him to train as an ambassador." "Really?" I ask, my eyes going a bit wide. "But he's ...military..." "He's also smart," Sinclair counters, “and charming, and good with people, and trustworthy. And we may be in a situation in the future where an ambassador who knows the ways of war is going to be quite an asset. “Do you want to send him to Venda?” I ask quietly. Slowly, Sinclair shakes his head. “Or major problem,” he murmurs, “is still with Atalaxia.” And I go cold as I realize that...well, that I forgot all about Atalaxia – this incredible force looming behind us. But as I look into my mate’s eyes, I realize that he hasn’t forgotten about it – not for a second. And that, even if Sinclair’s worried about me? The main focus of his worry is on this other nation that’s still harboring my uncle, and very well might be planning to support Xander in his desire to take our child.

Chapter 405 – Pillow plans

I sigh, closing my eyes for a second. “I forgot all about the Atalaxians,” I murmur.

“You’ve had a long day,” Sinclair replies, even though that’s not really an excuse. Not for a Queen, who needs to balance it all. I take a moment to collect my thoughts before opening my eyes and looking at him again.

“What I want,” I say quietly, “is a big team to go solve a lot of the overarching problems with the refugees. Doctors, lawyers, social workers anyone who can help us start to patch the big problems there, to get these camps functioning not as a holding space but as a system that helps people get back to their lives, or start new ones.”

I think more on his question of how long I think this will take. “But once that’s done...” I shrug a little, “I won’t need such a big team, once that’s accomplished. But I still want systems in place that help people, and I want to run them. Would that be...possible?”

“I think it’s very possible,” Sinclair says seriously, reaching out a hand to stroke my hair. “And I think it’s very good of you to want to do it. When do you want to start?”

“Tomorrow,” I say, my eyes going wide. “I need to go to the Human Camp – I need to see if anyone there needs to be healed immediately, especially the children – ”

Sinclair laughs, shaking his head at me. I make a little squeak of protest at his wanting to delay me, but he shakes his head, letting me know that I’m misinterpreting him. “I’ll make sure you have the bodyguards to do it, first thing in the morning. The lawyers and social workers – they’ll take a bit longer. Is that all right?”

“Yes!” I breathe, suddenly incredibly excited. And then my eyes fill with tears again as I smile at my mate, as I scooch closer across the gigantic bed until our baby is frankly squeezed between us, wanting to be close to my mate and our child at the same time. “Thank you, Dominic.”

“Of course, Ella,” he says, kissing me on the forehead. We stay like that for a long moment, passing love between our bond in a steady loop, each of us connecting with Rafe so that he feels it too. He gives us a contented little burble in reply.

“Although Ella,” Sinclair murmurs, making me look up at him.

“What?” I ask, curious and a little worried. “This time?” he says, leaning in to hold my gaze, making sure he hears me. “You’re taking your phone.”

And I laugh, nodding and tucking my head under his chin, perfectly happy and excited about our new plans. Okay, love,” I sigh, content. “I’ll take my phone. I promise.”

Cora

I'm completely beat that evening as I unlock the door to our little house – but even if I'm almost too exhausted to feel my own feet beneath me, I can't help but smile as my key twists in the lock. My key, I think, grinning. My lock. My house!

As I push the door open and look around, I still can't quite believe it – that Ella and Sinclair gave us this house, that it's really ours. At first it felt a lot like Roger and I were just living here, that it was just a loaner or something.

But as every day passes, and we feel more and more relaxed here....

Well. It starts to settle in. That this is my home, with my mate.

And I smile down at my belly, running a hand over it even though I'm not showing at all. Because in a couple of months, we're going to bring a little baby home here. And he's going to grow up calling this place home.

And it's such a rich, wonderful anticipation that...well, I lose my breath a bit, I'm so happy. But I inhale deeply and look up when I hear my mate at the top of the stairs.

"Hey," Roger says, smiling widely and starting to hurry down them, eager to be at my side. He reaches me almost in an instant, pushing the door shut behind me in the same moment that he wraps and arm around my waist and kisses me.

And I wrap my arms around his neck and kiss him back, smiling as I do so – because this, too, feels a little unreal, especially after the horrible things that I saw today. Roger, mine, my mate – waiting for me, in our house.

How the hell did I get so lucky?

"Where you been, gorgeous?" Roger murmurs, moving his face back from mine just an inch, his arms still wrapped around my waist. "I was surprised you weren't home when I got here."

"I know," I sigh, shaking my head a little. "It was...a crazier day than I thought it would be."

"Really," he says, surprised. "What happened?" And then he lets me go, moving to the door to twist the lock and then taking my hand, leading me into the kitchen where I'm sure that there's some kind of takeout waiting for me.

"We went to the refugee camp, the one with the wolves," I tell him, smiling with pleasure as my suspicions are confirmed. Roger opens the fridge and pulls out some packages of my favorite Thai noodles. He starts to put them into a bowl for me as I sit down at the table and continue. "There were so many children there who needed help. Ella healed the ones who needed it most – but it was...it was a lot."

"I'm surprised to hear that," Roger replies, bringing me my food along with a big glass of cold water. "Well – or maybe not to hear it. But I'm surprised that I didn't know that it was so bad that so many children were suffering. That seems like the sort of thing that Sinclair would be on top of."

"We've been gone for long time, and we've been distracted," I say, starting to slurp up the noodles eagerly, so hungry that I'm unable to help myself from being messy. But in my heart, I know Roger couldn't care less, so I allow myself to dig in and indulge. "I guess Sinclair didn't have all of his information systems in place to give him all the details."

"Are you guys going back?" Roger asks, curious, and I hear a little hesitation in his voice.

"Yes," I reply, continuing to eat as I look up at him. "Tomorrow, if we can. But to the human camps. There's just... so much to do. So many people who need immediate help – and Ella really can provide that immediate care that other doctors can't. And she needs me," I say, giving a little shrug, "or else she'll have an emotional breakdown over each and every kid." I smirk, remembering how she was today. "And try to adopt them."

Roger laughs at this, shaking his head a little, because he knows Ella's personality well enough by this point to understand exactly what I mean. But then he quietly looks at the floor, raising my suspicions.

"What?" I ask, putting my fork down and waiting. Because I know there's something he's not saying. Roger just sighs and looks up at me. "Can't you guess?"

"You're worried," I reply, shaking my head a little. "That it's too dangerous."

"Knew you were clever," he says with a cheeky wink. I open my mouth to protest but Roger just raises a hand, asking me to wait. And, obliging my dear mate, I do. After a moment he starts again.

"I trust you, Cora," he says, taking a deep breath. "But you are pregnant. And even beyond the baby, you're aware that I'm..." he shrugs and I smile already, anticipating the joke, "mildly fond of you."

I laugh aloud and he grins at me, holding my gaze. "Cora, after everything that we've been through, you know it would kill me if anything happened to you, right? So, would you mind if I asked Sinclair to ensure that you're going to these camps with a heavy guard?"

I open my mouth to agree instantly, but then I hesitate.

"What?" Roger asks, encouraging me to speak.

"I don't mind the guards," I say honestly, "but we're going to the human camp. And...I wonder if it's good for us to show up with like, twenty wolves to help a group of people who patently distrust wolves."

"A good point," he says, nodding and looking off into the distance a little. "I'll bring it up with Sinclair. But do you mind, overall?" he asks, looking back at me again, "the idea of an increased guard?"

"I do not," I say, smiling at him and giving a little shrug. "Though I imagine Sinclair's already got it planned."

"That's what's nice about having an Alpha brother," Roger says, laughing a little. "He solves your problems before you even know they existed."

"He also gives you houses," I point out, reaching for my glass of water and taking a big gulp.

"Yeah..." Roger says, hesitating and rubbing the back of his neck, looking down at the floor.

"What?" I ask, picking up on a hesitation in Roger's voice that's new to me. I stand up, finished with my noodles and go to stand next to my mate at his place leaning against the granite countertop. "What's wrong?"

"Are you ready to get pissed off?" he asks, looking up at me through his eyelashes a bit.

I cross my arms, saying nothing, just waiting for my mate to continue.

Chapter 406 – Meet Me There

Cora

Roger's silent for a long time, smirking at me, making me answer.

"I make no promises," I reply after a long moment, shaking my hair back in a lofty way that makes him laugh. "But seriously, what is it?"

"Well," Roger sighs, letting his shoulders drop and looking at me squarely now that some of the tension is gone. "Sinclair wants to give us more than a house now. He also wants to give us...a wedding."

My jaw drops a little. "A wedding?" I ask, baffled. "But we're...we're wolves," I say, wrinkling my nose. "Or at least – mostly wolf," I say, glancing down at my belly where my little hybrid baby is growing.

"Yeah, he wants it to be a wedding and a mating ceremony at once – a symbolic uniting of the wolf and human worlds. Because I'm a wolf," he says, pointing to himself, "and you're a human," he continues, pointing to me. "Or at least, sort of."

I still shake my head, confused.

"And he wants it to be on TV," he says, grimacing as he drops the final bomb, "like a royal wedding, for the entire world to see."

And, just as Roger predicted, I immediately get very, very pissed off.

"This is such bullshit," I murmur, pulling my cell phone out of my back pocket and immediately starting to text Ella to tell her precisely what I think of this plan.

"Wait," Roger says, laughing a little and reaching for the phone, "just give it a minute -"

"Are you seriously on board with this?" I snap, looking up at him, my anger transferring immediately from my sister to my mate. "After I've told you, like a thousand times, that I want our mating ceremony – whatever it is 1 to be special, and meaningful? I mean, if we were just going to do it any old way we would have done it by now

"Cora," Roger says, drawing my attention away from my tirade and covering my phone with his hand, stepping close to me, "I am on board with whatever it is you want, all right? So, let's put the phone and the rage away for a few minutes and just talk about this. But no one is going to force you to do anything you don't want to, okay?"

I take a deep breath then, turning towards my mate and putting my phone on the counter, sliding it away from me. "Okay," I agree, nodding but looking down at the floor.

“What’s up,” he murmurs, putting his hands on my hips and pulling me close, resting his forehead against mine. “Why did that make you so angry? It was just an idea.”

“Because,” I sigh, sorting through my emotions as best I can. “Because what we have, Roger,” I continue, putting my hands on his chest, “it’s so important to me. It’s – it’s the best thing I’ve got, and so much more than I ever thought I wanted, or could ever have.”

Roger makes a soft, sweet noise of understanding then, drawing me closer and wrapping his arms around me.

“And it’s not that I don’t want to help Ella,” I say, my voice slightly muffled against his shoulder, “and like...the nation, or whatever. I just...this is important to me. I want it to be right, just this one thing.”

“All right,” Roger murmurs, his arms wrapping me up even tighter, making me smile. “I understand, and I agree. It’s a no for us.”

“I’ll tell her, okay?” I whisper, and I feel him nod his head. And then, sighing with relief that I have him on my side and that I just have him at all – I let my body relax against Roger’s and breathe in his warm, rich, comforting scent, letting it wrap all around me.

“So,” he says after a few long moments of relaxing against each other, “can I just give you the mark now?”

“What!” I shriek, going tense in surprise.

“I mean, if we’re not going to do it publicly- why wait -”

I pull back from Roger, staring up at him, trying to ascertain whether or not he’s serious

But the moment I see the big wicked grin on his face I scowl and smack him on the chest, knowing that he’s teasing me. “No, Roger,” I growl. “I still want it to be right! I’m not going to just let you bite my neck when we’re hanging out in the kitchen and I still have noodle -breath!”

“I like noodles,” he murmurs, stepping close and lifting a hand to slide his fingers under my shirt to the place where my neck meets my shoulder, where he intends to mark me. “And you smell amazing right now – ”

I laugh, shoving him away. “I smell like dirt and field hospital,” I reply, shaking my head and stepping away. “You’re just listening to your wolf too much-”

“Well he won’t shut up Roger groans, tilting his head back even as he laughs. “Seriously,

Cora, it's bite her now, do it! On a constant refrain, whenever you're around!"

My own wolf perks up inside of me, raising her snout smugly to the sky and giving a little howl of triumph. I want it too, she says, giving a wolfish little grin, but I know how to contain myself.

"Well, my wolf," I say smugly, crossing my arms over my chest, "says your wolf is being an impatient brat."

"Yes," Roger growls, grabbing me by the waist again and pulling me close, obviously. Like man, like wolf. This is implied."

"Well," I reply, laughing and smiling up at my handsome mate, my eyes sparkling. "Your wolf had better take some lessons from mine. Because he still has some waiting to do."

"I'd like to meet this wolf of yours," Roger murmurs, kissing me swiftly and then nudging me with his nose. "She sounds judgmental. And cruel. Like someone else I know."

"Excuse you," I growl, giving him a little shove on his chest that doesn't move him at all. "She is beautiful and refined and self-contained."

"Well, I want to see this for myself," he says, giving a happy sigh. "Do you want to show me?"

"How?" I ask, suddenly eager. Because if there is a way – then yes, I absolutely want to do that. I mean, I know that Roger can sense my wolf- but to really see her, to meet her, this part of me that I have to keep inside because I'm half human? What does he have in mind?

"I've been thinking," he says, cocking his head to the side, "about this little thing they call the dream state. Did Ella ever tell you about it?"

"Yes," she says, my eyes going wide." Yes, she did!"

Unfortunately, we don't get to the dream state for a long time because we're too excited about it to actually sleep. So we go through our evening routine as best we can, with both of us showering, and then relaxing quietly in the bedroom, and then laying in bed reading boring books until we're drowsy enough to actually drift off.

I glance over at Roger pretty much every two minutes or so to see how he's doing, and then suddenly between one glance and the next – I see that he's breathing deeply, with his eyes shut and his mouth slightly open.

Eager, but feeling my body getting ready to shut down, I put my book away and switch off the light, leaning close to Roger to press a kiss to his cheek before I put my head on my pillow. Then, after reaching out to place a hand on his slowly-rising chest, I close my own eyes.

As instructed, I keep myself focused on the goal: to open my mind enough to allow Roger to come in, to send him a little invitation down my mating bond.

And as I feel myself begin to drift off, I do my very best. Come with me, Roger, I say internally, in half of my own voice, half my wolf's. Meet me there.

Chapter 407 – At the Beach

Cora

When I blink my eyes open, I gasp a little at the gorgeous sight before me. Ocean stretches as far as the eye can see in front of me and there, at the horizon, just the tiniest sliver of a sun can be seen, finally taking its own rest below the horizon.

I look to my left and right and chills stumble down my spine at the beautiful beach that stretches out in each direction – perfect white sand against which the surf lightly crashes, lined with palm trees and scrubby forest with no human buildings in sight.

All of this beautiful, untouched nature makes the super plush beach day bed that I'm sitting on even more incongruous, though, and I laugh a little as I look down at it. But my laughter fades as I admire my flowing white dress, and the crisp white sheets, and the amazing warm breeze that brushes against my skin. The bed has four posts from which gauzy fabric flies, and candles are scattered around all of it.

It's so incredibly beautiful that I lose my breath. And I lose it again when I see the handsome man walking across the beach towards me.

"Hey, gorgeous," he says, grinning at me with his hands in his pockets. "Looks like it worked."

Laughing in wonder now, I shake my head at my mate. "I thought – I thought it was supposed to be a forest!"

Roger shrugs, looking around at the beautiful landscape, the evening breeze lifting his hair. "That's Ella's dream state. I guess this is yours." Then he turns to me, the corner of his mouth lifted into a little smile. "Thanks for letting me in."

"Come sit!" I say, scooting over to make room. My mate obliges me, seating himself on the bed. I look him over, laughing. "Why are you dressed in linen pants?" I ask, wrinkling my nose.

"You dressed me like this!" he protests, waving a hand at himself. "I have no control!"

"I did not," I laugh, shaking my head. "You look like you're going to Margaritaville to listen to some Jimmy Buffet."

Roger glares at me a little and then closes his eyes, concentrating. Between one blink and the next, his clothing changes so that he's now in a more familiar black pants and white button-down shirt, though it's not as crisp as something he might wear with a suit. Definitely more beach casual.

“Oh,” he murmurs, looking down at himself. “I guess it was me.”

“We could have just taken it off,” I say with a shrug, scooting closer and reaching out to touch him, to run my hand over his shoulder and his arm. To my surprise, he feels completely corporeal exactly as he does in the real world. “Can you feel that?” I ask.

“I can,” he confirms, a little pleasant shudder passing through his body. Then he takes my chin in one hand and leans in to kiss me, just a soft touch of his lips on mine. “Can you feel that?”

“Mmhmm,” I say, leaning back and grinning widely.

“This is so cool.” Roger says, flopping back onto the bed and staring up into the sky with a wide smile on his face. “Now we can hang out all the time – all day and all night.”

“Nah,” I say, leaning back as well and putting my head on his shoulder. “Sometimes I will lock you in dream jail when you piss me off. And then I will come here, and have dream margaritas all by myself.”

“Cruel,” he growls, snapping his teeth at me and making me laugh. “Just as I said.”

“Oh yeah!” I say eagerly, sitting up suddenly and looking all around as I remember where all of this started. “Where’s my wolf?!”

“I don’t know,” Roger says, sitting up next to me and likewise looking around.

“Why don’t you know?” I ask, turning to him, confused. “Haven’t you done this before?”

“No, Cora,” he says, rolling his eyes at me playfully. “You’re my first mate which is kind of required for the exercise. I have never done this before either. Everything I know about this comes second-hand from Dominic.”

“Oh!” I say, and then I start to laugh. He sits up and laughs with me, even though he doesn’t know what’s funny.

“What,” he murmurs, taking my face in his hands like he can’t resist and kissing me again between words, “what’s so funny?”

“It’s just so cute,” I whisper, still giggling. “Usually I feel like the naïve one with all of this wolf and shifter stuff! But finally we’re on the same playing field! I get to pop your dream cherry!”

Roger laughs along with me, nodding and kissing me and pulling me backwards on the bed with him. ”

Anytime you want, Cora," he murmurs against my mouth as his breathing starts to get heavier. "You're the boss in your own dream – I'm ready when you are."

"Really," I murmur, rolling him backwards a bit so that I can straddle his hips, placing a knee on either side of him and laying my stomach flat against his. And then I run my hands through his hair, bringing my mouth back to his. "Anytime I want?"

But before he can answer me, simultaneously, Roger and I both gasp, our eyes going wide. "Oh my god," I say, freezing on top of my mate, staring into his face.

"Did you," he whispers, not even daring to blink, "did you feel that too?"

And I sit up in a flash, my hands flying to my stomach as I look down at it. Because that that was from the baby-

And then, quite suddenly and totally without warning-

It comes again.

A single, steady pulse of...happy.

"Oh...oh my god," I murmur, tears suddenly springing to my eyes. "Seriously, Cora," Roger says, his voice shaking, and I turn my eyes to his face as he works to prop himself up on his elbows, "am I imagining this?"

"No," I say, shaking my head vehemently and laughing a little desperate laugh, "I mean unless we're both imagining the same thing. Do you do you think it's the dream?"

"Or," he says, reaching out to touch a tentative hand to my stomach, "is our son actually..."

"...happy," I finish for him.

But we get our answer the moment Roger's palm presses flat against my stomach, because it comes again.

Happy...happy...

And then I really do burst into tears, burying my face in my hands. Roger sits up, wrapping his arms around me, and I feel his shoulders shaking a little with his own tears.

Because our little boy – he's finally big enough, now, to not just be a little bundle of cells in my body – but instead a little person in there, feeling his own very real little feelings, big enough finally to start to pass them to us through the bond –

And we've finally got the first one. And it absolutely shatters my heart into pieces to know that the first thing he's telling us is that he's happy.

"Oh my god," Roger says, still crying as he takes my face in his hands and starts to kiss me again, passing his own feelings along the bond to me, and along to the baby through their own bond, which is attached to mine. Roger sends the baby joy, and happiness, and pride, and love –

And I send it all too –

But then I worry that we're overwhelming the baby, so I stop –

"Don't stop," Roger says, his lips still against mine, "let him feel it."

So I don't I pass my baby all the love 1 in my heart, and my excitement to meet him, and what a treasure he is to me already –

And the baby starts to pass it all back to us faster now –

Happy, happy, happy.

And Roger and I cry harder, laughing with each other, holding each other tight.

Chapter 408 – Just the Faintest Touch

Cora

After a few minutes of this – or maybe an hour, I honestly don't know how time works here – the baby's happiness fades away and then into silence. But not in a bad way – more like he just...

"He fell asleep," Roger murmurs, laughing a little and falling back on the bed, taking me with him since his arms are still wrapped around me.

"It's too early for the baby to sleep..." I murmur, confused. "That happens around like, the seventh month -"

"All right, Dr. Cora," Roger mutters, and I can hear him rolling his eyes, even though I can't see it, which makes me laugh. "Considering that we're hanging out on a magical dream beach, passing our emotions down a magical bond with our unborn child, I don't really think that your medical knowledge is coming into play here -"

"Oh shut up," I murmur, slapping his chest and sighing with contentment. Roger laughs and takes a deep breath of my scent.

"That was amazing," he whispers. "I'll never forget that as long as I live."

"Do you think we just felt it because we're here?" I ask, still likewise thrilled. "Or, will we feel it when we're awake too?"

"I don't know," Roger replies. "But maybe something about being in the dream amplified it. I guess we'll find out."

"Yeah," I say, happy, content. Because as much as I want to feel it all the time, I am also content to wait, to experience all parts of this pregnancy in their own time. "I guess we will."

And I close my eyes and relax against my mate, little shivers passing through me as he traces his fingers idly over the skin of my back, both of us still marveling in the magic of that incredible first connection with the baby.

But suddenly, something changes. And I open my eyes to see my wolf standing there on the beach, just a short distance away.

"Roger," I say softly, starting to sit up. He opens his eyes and looks where I'm looking, likewise catching sight of my wolf in the sand, staring at us, her tongue hanging happily from her mouth.

“Oh,” he says, likewise sitting up and holding me close against him. “Wow, Cora...she’s beautiful.”

But I don’t reply as I look at my wolf, at all of the thousand shades of brown that run through her fur, from tawny to chestnut. Because I know that she’s not here to be admired – though she’s enjoying that too.

Come with me, she says – and I know, instinctually, that Roger hears her as well. I have something to show you.

We both eagerly get to our feet as we look at each other, laughing. Because neither of us feel an ounce of fear, even though this is completely bizarre. When we’re standing, my wolf dances in an eager circle and then trots away from us along the beach.

Roger takes my hand and we follow, walking quickly, both dying to see what she’s leading us towards.

Before we get far, another shadow detaches itself from the forest and comes bounding towards us. Roger laughs as his wolf dashes over to us and eagerly presses his head to Roger’s chest, nuzzling against him.

“This is so cool,” Roger murmurs, shooting me a grin before his wolf comes to press his snout into my own hands.

Hello, Roger’s gigantic wolf says as I marvel at his size, at the way he nearly comes up to my shoulder and can completely encircle me when he winds himself around my body, as he does now. You are mine. You should let him bite you!

I laugh, cooing to the wolf “soon, soon,” and running my hands through his warm fur. Roger laughs as well and puts his arm around my shoulder when his wolf dashes off towards mine.

“Told you he was annoying,” Roger murmurs.

“He’s perfect,” I reply, sighing and turning my face up to his for a kiss. But before our lips can meet, my wolf gives another little yip, calling us forward. Confused, but pleased, Roger and I start out again.

“I have no idea what is happening,” Roger says, grinning.

“I think it’s gonna be good,” I say, peering after my wolf. “She’s really excited.”

We both quicken our steps when my wolf stops beside a little patch of green bushes and again turns in her eager circle. Her prancing gets even more eager as we get closer.

Come come, she says, her tongue lolling as Roger's wolf stands proudly at her shoulder. We want to show him to you.

And then a moan tumbles from my mouth as I fall to my knees in front of the little bundle of fur sleeping there on the beach in front of me, nestled lovingly into a little soft bed of leaves. Roger almost collapses next to me, his hands hitting the sand hard – I think saving him from falling flat on his face in shock.

“Oh,” I say, my voice trembling and my entire body shaking as I reach out towards the incredibly perfect, incredibly tiny little wolf pup sleeping in front of us. “Oh, you...”

And as I reach my fingers out, I barely, just barely feel the brush of fur against them – though not completely, as if he's still half out of the dream – or more than half –

You can't touch him yet, my wolf says, her voice full of love and pride. He is not big enough. But soon.

Roger moans wordlessly as he reaches out too, to try to touch the tiny infant pup, and I feel his own shock and disappointment and joy and wonder as he, too, just barely feels the ghost of fur against his fingertips.

Because even if we haven't met our baby yet this...this is his wolf, his soul. And he's so, so beautiful...

Tears are slipping down my cheeks again as I lay down next to the pup, as I study every inch of him, and feel Roger curling up next to me to do the same.

“He looks like you,” I say through my tears.

“How can he look like me,” Roger says, his own voice hitching with emotion, “he's a...a wolf...”

“His wolf looks like your wolf, you idiot,” I murmur, laughing and reaching out a single finger again to trace the line of my son's wolf's snout, which I can barely feel. His little nose is still pink with his youth, not even turning black like it will when he's older and his little ears are now just 1 triangles pinned flat against his skull –

But all over he's fuzzy, and he's warm, and his little ribs are rising with his breath, and his little tiny paws are the cutest things I've ever seen –

He is a good pup, I hear Roger's wolf tell us, proud. I like him.

We both laugh at that – at the simple, flat way Roger's wolf states things – and I glance over my shoulder to see my own wolf prancing and pressing herself close to Roger's wolf, raising her snout to tap her nose against his, agreeing with the sentiment.

"I like him too," I say, resting my head down so that my nose is inches from the baby's.

"Yeah," Roger says, curling up behind me and peering over at me so that he, too, can stare at the pup as much as he wants. "We'll keep this one, for sure."

I laugh at my mate at his weird, dry sense of humor that always keeps me guessing and then, to my grief, the world slowly starts to fade as the dream brings itself to an end.

"Oh no," I cry, suddenly frantic, wanting to stay here forever – for days, for weeks if we can to watch him grow maybe see him open his eyes –

"It's all right," Roger murmurs in my ear, pressing a kiss to my cheek. "We'll be back."

"That's right, little baby," I say, turning back to my son, who sleeps peacefully on. "We'll be back. We'll see you here soon."

"We love you so much," Roger murmurs.

And then his voice fades, and the vision fades, and all that is left is rest.

Chapter 409 – Assembling the Team

Cora

When I wake up the next morning the dawn sun is already streaming through the windows, and I am absolutely – hands down – the happiest I've ever been. I'm curled up against my mate's side, my hand still on his chest where I placed it when I fell asleep, and when I look up into his face? I see him already smiling down at me.

My mouth bursts into a smile.

"Well," he says, turning fully towards me now and nudging my nose with his. "That was an incredible dream, wasn't it?"

"Do you think it was real?" I whisper, desperately, desperately hoping that it was.

"I do," he replies, nodding. "I don't think...well, the things that you made up the beach, the landscape...they were all pretty static, no?"

I gasp a little, offended – "It was not static! It was intricate and there was a breeze I could smell the salt -"

"No, Cora," he says, laughing, "I mean like, unchanging. The things that changed – you, me, the feeling the baby passed to us, and the wolves? Those all seemed very real."

"Yeah," I say, relaxing again and snuggling close, tucking my head beneath Roger's chin. "I think it was real too."

"He's a really cute pup," Roger murmurs, sleepily kissing my hair. "Way cuter than Rafe."

"I know, right?" I mumble, yawning. But we don't have to tell Ella and Dominic that."

"No way," he replies. "No need to hurt their feelings. They'll find out soon enough. We're quiet for a moment before I ask my next question. "Did that go...how you thought it would?" I ask, hesitant.

"No," Roger says instantly, laughing. "Honestly, Cora, I thought we were going to have way more sex -"

And then I burst into laughter too, because that's what I had expected as well. I don't know what Sinclair told his brother, but from everything Ella has said? It sounds like the dream state has been a place for them to really explore their relationship in a very physical way – after all, they had sex there first, before they ever did with their real bodies.

And while I can certainly see Roger and I using the dream state for that kind of exploration in the future? A part of me is really, really glad that mine and Roger's experience brought us closer in a different way.

Because right now, I feel so much more like a family than I did before we went to sleep. And it's not that we weren't a family before – but now that we've...we've felt him? Met him, just a little bit?

The baby is so real to me now, so vividly himself, already, that I can't help but think of him as my son, and me as his mom, and Roger as his dad, and us – all of us – as a very real family.

"I know," Roger says, placing a finger under my chin and turning my face up to his. "I feel exactly the same way."

I laugh then, curious. "Wait, how do you know what I'm feeling?"

"You're passing it down the bond," he murmurs. "Are you not trying to?"

"Not intentionally," I say. "But...I was thinking about you. And the baby. So maybe it just...went." He nods, agreeing, understanding.

Then, curious, I reach out and take Roger's hand, giving it a little squeeze and passing a curious little pulse down our mating bond to him, seeing if I can do it intentionally. I'm still not used to this wolf stuff, and I don't know how good I am at it. "Did you feel that?" I ask.

"I did," he murmurs, pleased. "You're curious."

"Yes," I reply, smiling happily. And then I close my eyes and concentrate, still keeping one touch on the bond between me and Roger but also giving a little tap on the bond that I now feel so much more powerfully between me and the baby than I did yesterday. I give it just a little nudge.

And to my shocked pleasure, the baby responds, nudging us back.

My eyes flash open and before I can even ask, I see on Roger's thrilled face that he felt it too.

And then I laugh, and look down at myself, and send another little nudge, this time with a question attached.

...Happy? I ask.

It takes a moment, but then the reply comes and I feel it ring through me like a bell. Happy! My boy sends back, and I laugh, and feel myself start to cry again. Happy, happy.

And then he curls away again, content.

“He’s happy,” Roger says, choked up, taking my face in his hands and kissing me again. “And I don’t think I’ve ever once been happier, not in my whole life.”

“Same,” I reply, laughing at how stupid it sounds, to say it so simply like that. “Roger, I feel exactly the same.”

Ella

When the car turns into Cora’s driveway, she’s already standing outside her door with a to-go mug of tea in her hands, a big smile on her face. Rafe gives a little squeal of anticipation when the car stops and Cora starts to walk towards it.

I look down at my baby, strapped into his car seat, in surprise. “Can you tell when your auntie is near?” I ask, curious. But, obviously, he doesn’t reply.

“Well, you’re very bright and chipper today,” I say when Cora opens the door and peers into the car, blinking a bit in surprise at the two extra men in the row of seats behind me, and then at the guard sitting beside Conner in the passenger seat.

“I am indeed,” Cora says, climbing into her seat and closing her door behind her. “Um, what’s all this?” she asks, a little hesitant before murmuring a hello to Rafe and leaning down to kiss him on the head.

“Sinclair wanted us to have extra guards,” I say, giving a chagrined little shrug. “Do you mind? I told him he could.”

“Yeah,” she says, after smiling around at everyone and saying her hellos as Conner pulls away from the house. “Actually,” she continues, “Roger had the same idea. Did they coordinate this morning?”

“Probably,” I say, rolling my eyes and making my sister laugh. I shake my head, thinking that our two wolf mates sometimes really do have the same mind, even if they’re such different people.

“So!” I continue, leaning forward and grinning at Cora. “Why are you so happy this morning?”

“I’ll tell you later,” she says, waving a hand at me while she glances around at the four men in the car.

Sensing that Cora wants to keep her reason for her happiness private, my grin deepens. "Oh!" I say, leaning forward, "so you and Roger were..."

And then I lean forward, trying to scent her over Rafe, to see if I can prove my suspicions correct –

"Ew, Ella!" Cora gasps, leaning forward to smack me in the arm. "Stop doing that it's none of your business!" And then she blushes terribly as I burst into laughter. Cora glances around at all of the men who are pretending, quite studiously, that they can't hear us at all.

But I just laugh and turns away from my sister to look out the window. "Fine, fine," I say. "But I'll get all your secrets out of you soon enough."

It's a cheerful ride to the Human Camp – Cora is clearly riding high, and I am feeling good myself. But things start to change as we approach and we're able to see a little bit of what we're going to be working with through the fence before us.

"Oh geeze," Cora says, leaning forward to peer through the chain-link. "This looks...Ella, this looks worse than what Isabel showed us yesterday."

"She said I would be," I reply, grimacing as well. But even a glance tells me that Cora is right – that Isabel may have been underselling the difference between these two refugee camps.

When we pull into the spot and begin to climb out of the car, Conner and the guard in front – Anthony, who was likewise with us at the bunker 1 step out first, looking around to ensure that all is well. When Rafe is safely strapped to my chest, Cora and I step out next, the extra two guards following. A big smile breaks out onto my face as I see Dr. Hank standing awkwardly at the entrance to the camp, Isabel at his side.

"Hank!" I call, waving to him as I hurry over, Cora following slowly behind. I turn to see a little frown on her face, but I ignore it as I give Hank a hug and smile at Isabel. "So, you two have already met?"

"Yessss," she says, turning to raise an eyebrow at me. "Though I wish you'd have told me he was coming."

"I was asked to come," Hank insists, frowning at Isabel in turn.

"I didn't say you weren't," Isabel says, looking at him coolly. I hesitate now, looking between them. What was...what's wrong?

“May I have a word, Ella?” Hank asks, nodding over his shoulder to an empty space behind him where we can speak alone.

“Sure,” I say, stepping aside with him. But he sighs when Conner and another guard step forward as well.

“It’s all right,” I say, putting up a hand to stop them. Both hesitate, but they let me go when Hank and I step a few feet away. Hank has, after all, been cleared as a trustworthy person and certainly not a threat. “What’s – what’s wrong, Hank?”

“You’re underestimating this, Ella,” he says, frowning at me and glancing over at Cora, Isabel, and all of the other men. “Going in like this? It’s never going to work.”

Chapter 410 – Inside the Camp

“You, the future Queen,” Hank says, shaking his head at me, “asked me to be here, and already your friend Isabel is sniffing around me like I’m some kind of convict? Just because I’m a human?”

“What?” I ask, confused, glancing over at her. “Isabel Isabel is on our side in this, Hank – she wants to help humans too -”

“It’s not about what she wants, or she thinks she wants,” Hank says, shaking his head and catching my gaze, making me listen to him. “It’s about generations of families telling wolves to keep separate from humans, to not tell them their secrets. And then it’s about the very recent shock that humans have experienced, realizing that wolves are real – and having their world absolutely destroyed by that knowledge.”

“So...” I say, frowning, starting to understand. “Do you do you not want to help? Do you want to leave?”

“No” he says, surprised, “No, Ella, I want to help very much. I just think you need to be prepared for the kind of reception you’re going to get if you walk in there with fifteen wolves in tow. Especially if they, like Isabel, have good intentions but still see humans as inherently different at best, or at worst as dangerous, or untrustworthy.”

“Isabel doesn’t think that,” I snap, instantly defensive.

“She certainly didn’t trust me,” Hank says, shrugging, his eyes apologetic.” And again, Ella, you asked me to be here.”

I sigh, murmuring that I’ll talk to her, but then something else he said rings in my head. “Wait, fifteen?” I ask, confused and looking over my shoulder. “Where are you getting fifteen wolves from? We only brought four guards...and Isabel...”

Hank sighs and then nods to the two black cars in the parking lot that I didn’t notice. And then, as I look at them, the doors open and men begin to spill out. I groan, realizing that Sinclair sent more ahead of us.

“Okay,” I sigh, looking back at Hank. “I take your point. How do you think we should do this?”

“I think,” he says carefully, looking over at our group, “you should let me and Cora take the lead. And leave the vast majority of your guys at the gate, telling them to come in only in an emergency.”

“Sinclair will flip if I go in without a guard,” I say, shaking my head.

“Two,” he says, holding up as many fingers for me to see. “One for you, one for Cora. And Ella? Pick nice ones, okay?”

And I sigh, and nod, and we head back to our group.

Twenty minutes later, after a long conversation and a great deal of negotiation, Cora, Isabel, Hank and I head into the camp with three guards behind us – Conner, Anthony, and a new one named Theo who has a radio line to the men waiting outside the gate open at all times. He also has his phone constantly in his hand and sends Roger and Sinclair text updates what feels like every ten minutes.

“You really don’t have to do that,” I say to Theo, resting a hand on his arm and looking up at him. “My mate is just ...overreacting.”

Theo nods to me and then looks down at his phone. “Alpha Sinclair said you’d say that,” he says with a little bit of chagrin. “And...he also said you forgot your phone again, so me being in constant touch with him is the consequence of that.”

“Oh damn it,” I murmur, scowling and pulling my hand away, frustrated. “I did forget my phone, didn’t I?”

“Yes you did, Luna,” Theo says, giving me a little smile as he tucks his own phone into the carrier attached to his belt.

“Fine,” I sigh, turning to Hank and Cora, who are consulting with Isabel.” Okay!” I say. “Let’s get started!”

Unlike last time, Isabel doesn’t give us a tour of the camp. When I ask why, she tells me that while she felt it would bolster the wolves to see me visiting, she worries that it will have the opposite effect on the humans – that they might see us moving through the camp as a kind of predatory prowling.

“We can’t blame them for that,” I sigh as we head directly for the children’s medical tent. “Their world has been so displaced by the secret of shifter existence. Especially these humans.”

“Plus, humans are naturally more wary,” Isabel says passively, “we are predators to their prey, after all.”

“Isabel,” I say, stopping and putting a hand on her arm. “Do you really think that about humans?”

And then Isabel’s mouth falls open a bit and she blushes. “Oh my goodness,” she murmurs, shaking her head. “I...I just heard what I said. Forgive me, Ella,” she continues, clearly contrite and embarrassed, "I...I grew up in a wolf household. I really do understand humans and wolves to be equal, I just spent my entire life with wolves."

"It's okay," I say, cocking my head to the side. "I'm sure you're not alone in that. And that plenty of humans have a lot of ideas about what wolves are like. But..."

"No," she says, interrupting me and nodding eagerly. "I get it. I need to... spend some time thinking through those preconceived notions." She glances now to where Conner, Cora, and Hank are waiting for us at the entrance to the tent. Both of the doctors arms are crossed in frustration, clearly eager to get to work. "And I think I was...not very nice to your human friend there," she murmurs before looking back at me. "I'm so sorry, Ella. Will you forgive me?"

"There's nothing to forgive," I say, smiling at her. "Your heart is in the right place, Isabel. I know you and I know that we can just move forward."

Smiling at me, nodding, Isabel takes my arm and we join Conner, Cora and Hank, the two guards following behind. Without a word, we all pass into the tent and my heart instantly sinks at what I see.

"Oh my god," I murmur, one hand immediately going to my mouth as another presses my baby closer against my chest.

The tent is loud filled to the brim with crying children and only a very small number of adults working their way around the room. I grit my teeth with frustration because these poor people they clearly need so much help, and they certainly have not been getting their fair share of it. As bad as the children's medical tent was at the Wolf Camp?

This one is...five times worse.

"We have to get to work," Cora says, turning angry eyes to me. I nod, agreeing completely as Hank strides away, already seeking action.

"Same old plan?" I murmur, seeking her guidance, and she nods once before striding off herself, Isabel going with her. One of the guards follows her as Conner comes to my side.

"I'm with you, Luna?" he asks.

"You're with me, Conner," I say, and then I nod to Theo as well, who is likewise assigned to my duty. And, with that as our final word, we get started.

The hours pass quickly as we move through the tent. We follow our old methods, with Cora and Hank discerning the worst cases and me attending to those first. The guards stay to the side as best they can, letting us consult and heal, and throughout the day I see their expressions changing. At first they were hesitant, wary, as the humans with whom we worked gave us glares and clutched the children to them protectively.

But then, as our guards Theo and Anthony see the work we're doing – see the relief we bring to the children, see the change in their parents' faces as they see their children given new life – an ease comes to my guards' expressions and their postures.

After I open my eyes and smile down at a little boy named Benny whose breath had been rasping, but who is now smiling and breathing easily, Theo looks at me in wonder and nods, his head bobbing eagerly. I smile at him, glad that he's truly on the team now, in spirit as well as assignment. Behind him, holding Rafe in his arms, Conner grins and gives me a thumbs-up.

I move to stand up, smiling at both of my guards, but the little boy catches my hand.

"Hey!" he says, grinning up at me.

"Hey," I reply, laughing and sitting back down to smile at him. "How are you feeling?"

"Better," Benny says quickly, obviously eager to move on from that very boring subject. "Hey, are you one of the wolf people?"

"I am," I say, laughing.

"No, you're not," he says, narrowing his eyes at me, still holding my hand.

"Why don't you think so?" I asked, grinning and cocking my head to the side, charmed by his bold, frank nature.

"Because," he replies with a frown, "you are pretty. And so small."

I laugh and wrinkle my nose at him. "Wolves come in all shapes and sizes. My mate is very big. You would believe he was a wolf, if you saw him. But my sister is a human," I say, pointing over at Cora, who is checking a young man's vitals in a bed nearby.

"That's impossible," Benny says, narrowing his eyes at me. "If your sister is a person, you are also a person!"

I laugh and shake my head. "Not in this case," I say, grinning at him. "I promise, I'm a shifter."

"Prove it," the little boy says, smiling fully at me now and revealing a missing front tooth that's so cute it breaks my heart. "Turn into a wolf!"

Chapter 411 – The Writer

“Nah,” I say, leaning in to stroke a hand over Benny’s hair, “I can’t shift right now now. I have to go and help some other kids.”

Still suspicious, the boy takes his hand from mine and crosses his arms over his chest. “Tell me your name. When my mom comes back, I’ll ask her to look you up on the internet. Then we’ll know whether or not you’re a wolf.”

Laughing, I tell him my name, and then I look around the tent. “Where is your mom, anyway?” I ask. “I’d like to meet her.”

The little boy is quiet for a moment and then he shrugs. “She’ll be back any minute.”

“Oh,” I say, and then I feel my heart ache a little bit inside of me, though I do my very best to keep my voice cheerful. “Did she just step away? When’s the last time you saw her?”

“Coupla days,” Benny murmurs, looking down at his blankets for a second. I glance up at Isabel, who has come close and was listening. She grimaces and then nods, confirming my suspicions. This little boy hasn’t seen his mother for a long, long time.

“Okay,” I say, reaching out and stroking a hand over his hair. “I’m going to do some work, okay? But I’ll come back and visit you in a little bit, all right, kiddo?”

“Okay!” he replies, instantly cheerful and smiling up at me. “Will you turn into your wolf then?”

“We’ll see,” I reply, laughing and giving him a wink. Then he waves to me as I stand up and move to Conner to instantly take Rafe into my own arms, hugging my baby close and passing him all of the love I have in my heart down the bond to him.

Because I honestly feel as if I could spend the rest of the day crying if I allow myself to think too hard about Benny, who was just quietly suffocating in his bed while he waited for his mother to come back.

Hank catches my eye and comes closer, glancing at Benny as he does.

“Will he survive?” I murmur, pitching my voice low enough so that the boy can’t hear me.

“After what you just did, Ella?” Hank asks. “Yeah. He’s going to make it. But he needs more than just medical help,” Hank continues. “You know that.”

“I do know that Hank,” I reply, and then I look sharply at Theo. “I need you to text Sinclair,” I say, my voice taking on more of Sinclair’s command than I’ve ever heard it do before. "Tell him we need to triple everything. Or more, if we can. All of the medical aid that's being sent to these people, and the social workers, and...and everything. All right? Tell him I said immediately."

Theo's eyebrows go up, but he does as I say. My eyes return to Hank, though I'm very surprised to see him smiling at me.

"Well," he says, sliding his hands into his pockets. "Look who's just become a Queen."

I laugh in surprise but then roll my eyes at him. "Not yet," I sigh, straightening my shoulders and starting to look around the room. "When I'm a Queen, you'll know because I'll be wearing my tiara 24/7. It's the only perk of the job."

"Nah," Hank says, putting a warm hand on my back and guiding me towards the next patient. "The perk is being able to do this. And to order your mate to send thousands of dollars of supplies at the drop of a hat."

"Yeah," I say, smiling at Hank as I hand Rafe off to Conner. Then I get back to work, seating myself in the waiting chair next to a little girl with cuts and bruises all over her arms and face. "Hi, sweetheart," I say, giving her a warm smile. "What's your name?"

The rest of the day and early evening passes predictably. Cora and Hank consult with the doctors and nurses already working here to determine the work that I should do, and I heal, and Conner guards Rafe, and Theo and Anthony guard Cora and me.

By the time I can see darkness beyond the edges of the tent, I am pleased with the day's work – we've helped dozens of children, and even brought some back from a very dark place. I look around the room, exhaling a satisfied breath, but I blink when I notice a very real change in the people in the tent.

When I had entered this morning, the people – especially the adults – had shrunk away from my team, and had barely noticed me. I am, after all, the smallest person here and had a baby strapped to my chest. The people had watched our every movement with narrow, suspicious eyes, always waiting for the next shoe to drop – for us to reveal the way in which we were going to hurt them, or take something from them.

But now, after a long day of working to help?

The narrowed suspicion is gone, and now many eyes are wide with wonder, trained on me as I move through the tent. I blush a little and duck my head, tucking my hair behind my ear as I hold a sleeping Rafe tight against me.

"What?" Cora asks, noticing my sudden change in attitude.

"They're all just... looking at me,' murmur, feeling awkward. I Cora looks around and then laughs. What, did you not expect all of the hero worship and awe when you decided to come and use your demigoddess powers on a bunch of unsuspecting mortals?"

"Demigoddess powers," I say, scoffing a little. "Don't be ridiculous, Cora – "

"Well, that's what they are, Ella," she says, laughing at me again. "I mean, do you need me to start making it rain to prove my point?"

"I'd prefer it if you didn't," I say loftily, laughing a little. "But still," I say, dropping my voice and stepping closer to her. "I mean...I'm just a girl. I'm just helping the best way I can, like anyone else would do -"

"Not anymore you're not, Ells," Cora says, patting my cheek with a sigh. " You're a part-goddess wolf Queen."

"Yeah," I sigh, twisting my lips, but then I glare at her a little. "Well, you're a weird hybrid soon-to-be wolf mom who is probably like, a duchess or something, once Sinclair gets all the titles figured out."

"And a doctor," Cora says, giving me a wink and moving forward on to the next case. "Don't forget that!"

"I won't!" I sigh, following after her. " Because you sure as hell won't let me!"

We're both still laughing as I give Rafe – cuddled in Conner's arms a little kiss on the cheek and then sit down in the chair waiting by the bed of my next patient – the one I've been told is the last one of the day.

"Hi," I say brightly, looking at the little girl – probably about eight years old and then up at the woman who is 1 probably her mother, though she looks a bit young for it. Still, by the affinity between them – both with long, dark brown hair and pale skin – I know that they're family. "My name is Ella. I've heard you're not feeling well."

"No," the little girl murmurs, moving her hands to her stomach and frowning. "I am sick."

I glance up at Cora, who nods to me. They've briefed me, of course – the girl isn't just sick, she's got some kind of bacterial infection that's increased to the point where it's threatening the health of her inner organs. Still, I like to check in with my patients before I get started, to make a connection with them.

"I'm sorry to hear that," I say, offering my hand and hoping that she'll place hers in it. The girl hesitates, but I just leave my open palm there in case she changes her mind. " I'm going to try to make you feel better, if you'll let me. Will that be all right?"

The girl glances at the woman with her, who nods, though I note that she's staring at me quite intensely. The girl looks back to me and likewise nods.

"What's your name?" I ask, smiling at her.

"Jessica," she replies, just a whisper.

"Jessica," I repeat, my smile broadening. "Well, let's see what we can do. Just relax." And then I take a deep breath, and close my eyes, and fall into my meditative state.

It's a trickier case than a clear-and-cut wound, since the bacteria has spread throughout her gastrointestinal system. But after the gift has done its work sweeping through her and fixing all the things that it felt were wrong, it returns to me and I open my eyes. About twenty minutes have passed.

I smile at Jessica, my eyes traveling over her face, which already looks better less wan, less pained and worried.

"How are you feeling?" I ask quietly, and to my pleasure she puts her hands in mine now. "Much better. And..." she hesitates, looking at the woman next to her, "hungry. Can I have something to eat?"

"Of course you can," I say, grinning and looking up at Cora, who gives me a thumbs up and turns away to ask one of the passing nurses about some food. "Is there anything else you want?" I ask, curious.

Jessica shakes her head no, smiling at me, but the woman next to her clears her throat. Curious, I turn my gaze to her.

"Thank you, Luna," she says, surprising me a little by using a wolf's title, which none of the other humans have done. "Thank you so much for helping my sister," she says, her voice choked. I reach to her with my other hand, smiling at her as the tears drip down her cheeks.

"Of course," I say, squeezing her hand when she gives it to me. "I'm just glad that I was able to help. What's your name?" I ask.

"I'm Sarah," she says quietly, giving me a shy little smile. "But actually, Luna, we've... we're already connected, in a strange way. I – I know all about you. I've been hearing about you my whole life.'

"Really?" I ask, my eyes going wide with surprise.

“Yes,” she says, laughing a little and nodding eagerly. “And actually, um,” she hesitates now, glancing around before leaning close to whisper. “A few weeks ago, I actually... left a letter on your doorstep.”

My eyes fly wide open in my shock and I suddenly clutch the woman’s hand tight in mine, knowing suddenly precisely who she is.

Or, if not who she is precisely what she did to save my son’s life.

Chapter 412 – A New Guest

Ella

“You,” I breathe, staring at Sarah in awe as she begins to eagerly nod. But I just shake my head in wonder. “You were the one who warned us – who left us the note that told us that -“.

And my eyes instantly snap to Conner, standing a few feet away and watching us warily, Rafe sleeping in his arms.

Sarah’s eyes follow mine. “Is that him?” she whispers. “The little baby?”

“Is that the prince?” Jessica asks, sitting up eagerly in her bed. “Oh – I’ve heard so much about him-”

But I’m instantly on my feet, moving to Conner to take my child and turning my head to Theo as Conner transfers Rafe to my arms. “Call Sinclair – tell him we’re bringing someone home -two people. Prepare...whatever gets prepared. I don’t know. And – and record this ” I say, pointing to Jessica and Sarah. “I want him to see it. All of it.”

“Luna,” Theo says, frowning, “I can’t do both at once-”

“Figure it out!” I call over my shoulder, quickly moving around the bed to Sarah’s side, bringing the baby close so she and Jessica can see them.

“Yes,” I say, tears filling my eyes as I sit on the bed with Jessica on my left and Sarah, still in her bedside chair, on my right. I lean forward so they can both see Rafe sleeping between them.”

This is Rafe – this is the baby, the prince. And you saved him,” I say, shaking my head and staring between them. My voice shakes with the intensity of it – with how much I want them to know the impact they had, how grateful I am for their early warning

Because if if we hadn’t gotten that note –

If we hadn’t known –

Those men who came through my window it would have been a complete shock, and I never, ever would have been able to react in time. And Sinclair wouldn’t have been as wary may not even have been home –

And my baby would be gone – in Xander’s hands-

“I owe you everything,” I whisper to Sarah, the tears starting to streak down my cheeks

now.

“It was my pleasure, Luna,” Sarah says, crying now too as she smiles at me, clearly so, so happy to have helped to be able to finally meet me, and Rafe, and see the results of what must have been so dangerous for her to accomplish.

“He’s so big,” Jessica says, her eyes wide as she looks down at Rafe. Her words make me laugh and I look back down at my sleeping baby. “Yeah, he’s my little meatball,” I say, “you should see his dad.”

“He’s beautiful, Luna,” Sarah says, hesitating as she reaches out a single finger towards him. But I hold the baby forward a little, letting her brush his cheek. As she touches him, a huge smile comes to her face. “So lovely, the little prince.”

“What’s what’s going on here?” Cora asks, suddenly standing behind Sarah, her eyes wide with surprise and worry. She had only stepped away for a few minutes, and suddenly everything has changed.

“This is Sarah,” I say, smiling up at my sister and wiping at the tears on my cheeks. “She...well, she wrote the note.”

“The note?” Cora asks, her face twisting in confusion.

“Yeah,” I reply, nodding. “The one.... on the doorstep, the day after the christening. That told us...”

“Oh,” Cora says, and then she gasps as she figures out the true significance of this. “Oh my – oh my god.” Then she crouches down at Sarah’s side, looking up at her. “Are you serious?”

Sarah laughs and shrugs a little, clearly shy and not knowing how to respond. “Yes,” she says.

Cora turns to stare at me. “We have to bring them back!”

“I know,” I say, nodding eagerly. But then, seeing Sarah shrink away from us a little at Cora’s words, I reach out a hand to her, smiling at this new pair of sisters. “Would you like to come to the palace with us? As my guests? We can make you very comfortable there, and we want to thank you -”

Cora turns her head sharply at me, narrowing her eyes a little and letting me know- without words that she expects me to tell them the whole truth.

“And, well,” I say, sighing a bit as I look Sarah in the eye. “My mate will want to meet you too, and hear the story. And he will have questions.”

“Oh,” Sarah says, looking at Jessica, clearly worried.

“But I promise,” I say, reaching out a hand that I place gently on her knee. I withdraw it immediately when I see Sarah flinch. Still, I persist, leaning forward. “I promise, Sarah – you will not be harmed, and we – we will do everything we can to help you. We just we’d love to know more about you, and that day, and your life...would that be all right?”

Sarah hesitates again, looking between Cora and I.

“You can say no,” I say softly. “Though I very much hope you will trust me and say yes. I...I owe you everything, Sarah.”

And then, with her eyes firmly on Rafe, Sarah nods once. Cora stands up immediately, moving forward to the guards, letting them know to prepare. But I stay with Sarah and Jessica, talking softly with them for the next few hurried minutes while I can hear my team behind me, working in a bit of a flurry.

Then, when Theo taps me on the shoulder, I finally turn around. “We’re ready, Luna,” he says, his face again serious. “If you are?”

“I think so,” I say, turning to Sarah and Jessica. “Shall we?”

And the two of them stand up and walk with me out of the tent, and out of the camp, and towards the cars that will take us all to the palace.

About thirty very tense minutes later, our convoy of cars pulls up to the back entrance of the palace and travels into the underground garage that we left from this morning. Cora sits tensely beside me as I look persistently out the back of the car, towards the car behind me in which Sarah and Jessica are riding.

I was very, very unhappy when Theo told me in no uncertain terms – that Cora and I would be riding separately from the refugees. I had fought him on it, but he was stalwart, holding out the phone to me with the direct order from Sinclair written clearly in a text message.

But, since no one would get into the cars until I agreed to the order, Sarah eventually gave me a soft touch on the elbow and told me that it was all right. Only then did I relent, though I’m still not happy about it.

“Hank texted,” Cora murmurs as we pull slowly towards our parking space.

“You still text Hank?” I ask, my eyes going wide as I look towards my sister for the first time this ride.

“He didn’t text me,” she says, rolling her eyes. “He knows Roger would kill him. But he texted you, through me, because he says you’re not answering your phone.”

“Clever Hank,” I murmur, leaning forward over Rafe’s carrier. “What did he say?”

“He said to tell you he thinks you’re doing right by Sarah and Jessica,” she says, her voice warm, “and that he’ll meet us there again tomorrow, if we can.”

“Okay,” I say, starting to unbuckle Rafe immediately when we stop. “Text him back that I said thanks, and yes, we’ll text him in the morning to let him know our plans.”

“So stiff,” Cora says, looking up at me and raising her eyebrows. “Where has my sweet sister gone? Don’t you at least want me to include some kind of rainbow or star emojis to lighten that up a bit?”

I pause before I lift my son out of his car seat so that I can glare at my sister. “This is serious, Cora,” I snap.

“Sorry, sorry,” she sighs, turning to get out of the car.

I’m not actually mad at her, obviously, but I don’t have time to tell her so. As soon as I get out of the car I head to Sarah’s side. “Okay,” I say, smiling at the sisters. “Please come inside – we’re going to get you settled in a room, and have dinner sent to you. Does that – does that sound all right?”

“That sounds fine,” Sarah says, raising her hands to play anxiously with her hair as Jessica presses close to her side, her arms wrapped around Sarah’s hips.

“Okay,” I say, giving them both a warm smile before I see movement at the door that leads into the palace – and then a very familiar, too-tall, too- broad silhouette come through the door. “You two stay right here for a second, okay?” I say, and Sarah nods before I dash away to Sinclair.

“Ella – “He says immediately, his voice worried as he looks beyond me.

“Look at me, Dominic,” I demand and he instantly does as I say, his eyes wide with surprise.

“What is it?” he asks.

“What do you have planned for them?” I ask, bouncing Rafe in my arms, because he’s starting to cry a little- probably picking up on some of my anxiety and a little of the anger that's starting to curl in me as I anticipate what my mate is going to say.

Because I know – I just know that his Alpha instinct is to treat this woman like a prisoner of war, and not like the savior she is.

And damn it, but there's no way in hell I'm going to let him do that.

Chapter 413 – Biding Time

Ella

Sinclair blinks at me in surprised confusion and then sighs as he speaks honestly.
“We’ve prepped an interrogation cell -”

“No,” I snap, pointing a finger up into his face that he immediately swats away. “No,” I continue to insist, taking a step closer and frowning furiously up at him. Rafe, in my arms, starts to cry harder. “Those two have been through hell, and they saved Rafe’s life -”

“We have no idea who they are, Ella,” Sinclair growls down at me, “they could be anyone -”

“They are not.” I snap, interrupting him and making him groan and tilt his head back in frustration. “They are refugees – two people who lost everything, if they ever had anything to begin with. I understand that we need to hear their story, Dominic, but we owe them everything. We owe our child’s life to that woman over there,” I continue, pointing behind me to where I know Sarah still stands.

“So, what would you have me do,” Sinclair says, forcing himself to be patient as he lifts his head again and looks at me.

“Treat them as our honored guests,” I reply. “Put them in a guest room – guard it if you have to! Bug it so you can listen to every word they say, if you’re that worried! I don’t care! But until we know more, we treat them as the honored guests I know them to be. Feed them, allow them to get clean and warm, let them sleep, and then tomorrow we ask questions. All right?”

Sinclair takes a deep breath, closing his eyes and rubbing them slowly with the thumb and forefinger of one hand. Then, after a moment, he drops his hand and looks at me again. “A guest suite, fully guarded. On a lower level – nowhere near where we sleep. And no one sees them until morning-not even you. All right?”

I nod sharply and he turns away, letting his staff know and coming up with a new plan.

As Sinclair does that, I move back to Sarah and Jessica, who are standing anxiously with Cora. I hurriedly tell them the plan – that we’ll let them take the night to relax and refresh, and then we’ll see them again in the morning. Sarah lets me know that she understands, and that this is fine, and I take her hand again, giving her a squeeze.

“Thank you, I say, smiling at her. ” For everything. And also for your patience – I know that this is...well, that it’s weird,” I say with a shrug.

"It's okay, Luna," she says, giving me a soft smile and running her hand over her sister's hair. "We grew up in the home of a Duke, after all. We know what it's like to have to bend to the needs of a royal household."

And my jaw drops open at the woman's revelation:

That she grew up in the home of my uncle Xander. And she might be the one who has the answers to all of the questions that we have about what he intends to do next.

I open my mouth to ask more when suddenly Theo is at my side.

"If I may, Luna," he says formally, nodding to me and then at the rest of our little group. "We're ready for you."

And I sigh, nodding again to Sarah to let her know that I'm on her side. She nods back, and then, as a group, everyone moves into the palace to figure out our next steps.

Cora and I only caught bare glimpses of our mates in all that came next. Roger nodded to both of us, his face serious, as we passed him in the hall. Cora blew him a kiss and I smirked, a little, as I saw him reach into the air, pretending to snatch it – a gesture that to the Betas to whom he was speaking probably just looked like him stretching.

But it cheers me immensely, in all of my anxiety and sadness for Sarah and Jessica, to see Cora so happy. I bump her with my shoulder as we walk towards mine and Sinclair's personal chambers – as Theo let us know Sinclair asked us to do – and she gives me a little wink, which further encourages me to consider that all is well.

I relax further when we get into the privacy of my rooms. Cora and I don't say much, clearly both lost in our own thoughts a little bit as she hops into the shower and I give Rafe a little bath. Then Cora takes Rafe from me while I take my turn in shower, taking him into the bedroom to see if she can get him to sleep.

When I come out of my closet in a comfortable pair of pajamas, and see Cora likewise cozy in borrowed leggings and a zip-up hoodie, I can't help but laugh.

"What?" she asks, grinning at me as she turns away from Rafe's bassinet.

"I was just so worked up fifteen minutes ago," I say, shaking my head and crossing the room to her, my comfortable slippers barely making a sound on the floor. "I fell immediately into the panic that I felt when we first found out that Rafe was being threatened. And now...well, now that we're in pajamas, waiting for our mates to handle it, I feel...kind of silly."

I peer down at my baby, who is just barely starting to fall asleep, as Cora puts an arm around my shoulders.

“Nah,” she says, “you did the right thing. Sinclair and Roger didn’t see them in that refugee center – they wouldn’t have realized what delicate people they were working with. Those two needed you to be hard on their side. Like you are for everyone who needs you.”

I sigh as I look up into my sister’s face. “You’re too nice to me,” I say quietly. “Too encouraging.”

“Well, I think there’s a pretty fair chance that Sinclair’s going to yell at you soon,” she says, wrinkling her nose and squeezing my shoulders. “So, I’m just trying to balance it out so that you get a good night’s sleep.”

A housekeeper comes then, bringing us our dinner, and Cora and I carry our trays to the bed where we can keep an eye on Rafe once she leaves. We tuck into our food quietly for a second before I take a deep breath, closing my eyes and forcing myself to relax.

What I really need, frankly – before Sinclair comes in and we have to have a big conversation about what we’re going to do next, and relive all the drama from those horrible days when we first found out that someone was coming for Rafe – is a distraction.

And quite suddenly, I remember how happy Cora was this morning.

“So,” I say, smirking as I open my eyes and peer at her.

“What is this new expression,” she says, leaning back warily as she takes in my smirk. “I don’t like this.”

“I was just wondering,” I say, my smile deepening, “why you were so happy this morning.”

“Oh,” she says, and a huge grin breaks out on her face as well.

“See!” I say, laughing and pointing my fork at her, my eagerness amplified by the fact that I’m using it to step away for a moment from my worries. “I know that something was up! Spill!”

“Welllllll,” Cora says, gathering her thoughts and picking up a little cup of chocolate pudding that’s sitting in the corner of her tray. She takes a little spoonful and lifts it to her mouth before she smiles and meets my eyes. Roger and I did the whole dream state thing last night.”

I shriek a little in excitement and Cora laughs but then smacks me on the knee, nodding to my almost-sleeping baby.

“Oh, he’s used to it,” I say, waving a hand at Rafe – who, indeed, does not budge and leaning eagerly towards my sister. “What was it like? Did you see the forest? Did you guys...do stuff?”

“Actually, no,” she says, laughing and likewise eagerly leaning forward. But as she does, I suddenly lean back. “What!?” I gasp. “You did the dream state and you didn’t get naked!? What even was the point -”

“Ella,” she says, laughing and rolling her eyes. “Would you just listen?”

And I do, reaching for my own cup of pudding and eating it eagerly as I soak in the details of my sister’s beach dream, my eyes getting wider and wider as she goes.

“Oh my god!” I gasp when she tells me about feeling her bond with the baby for the first time – and the first emotion coming through, and it being happiness. My eyes instantly fill with tears for the fifth or sixth time that day.

“Jeeze, Ella,” Cora says, leaning forward and wiping at my cheeks, though she can’t help her smile. “You must be so dehydrated all the time – ”

But I smack her hand away, wiping my own eyes and ignoring her comments. “What happened next?” I ask.

And Cora leans forward, eager to tell me the really good part.

Chapter 414 – Three is Better than Two

Ella

I'm really sobbing by the time that Cora tells me that her wolf led her to Roger's wolf, and then to her pup – just ugly crying my little heart out in absolute happiness for my sister, as well as well, as well as in jealousy. Just a little bit.

"Ella!" Cora says, laughing and reaching out to put her hands on my shoulders. "Oh my god, I wouldn't have told you if I thought you were going to react like this!"

"You'd better tell me!" I gasp between sobs, glaring at her. "You'd better text me every morning after you have a dream with your little pup in it! I want to hear everything! That is so amazing – what did he look like?"

"Well," she says, biting her lip a little. "He's still so small, so it's hard to tell

And I start to cry again, making Cora roll her eyes and smack me on the knee.

"Okay, okay," I say, taking a deep breath and working to steel myself. "I promise. I'll keep it together."

It's a lie, but still – I will try.

"He had a little pink nose," Cora says, grinning as I bite my lip. "And dark fur around his muzzle, just like Roger's wolf has," I press my eyes shut and clasp my hands to my chest. "And he has four little white paws – "

"Okay stop," I say, putting a hand out towards her and turning my face away. "That's so cute – I can't even handle it

She laughs then, and I control myself enough to open my eyes again and look at her, seeing that she's shaking her head at me. "I can't believe that you're reacting like this, Ella," she says, her voice awed. "I mean, you told me that you went running as your wolf in your dream and that Rafe was there, behind you! In little flashes!"

"Yes, but I didn't get to touch him," I say.

"Yes, you did," she says, frowning at me. "When you I couldn't reach Rafe through the bond, you told me that you found him in the forest! A full little baby! And you held him in your arms before he was born!"

"Cora," I say, sighing and tilting my head to the side. "Don't you see how that's different?"

But she just stares at me, clearly not getting it, so I sigh and look down at my hands.

“Rafe was was sick, or something, and we were so worried we were going to lose him. What you and Roger got last night – you got to meet your baby, so young, and so healthy! With only happiness in his heart. All during my pregnancy with Rafe,” I say, glancing over at him, guilt running through me anew, “he went through so many terrible emotions.” I shake my head in my grief, remembering it. “Sinclair felt them more than I did – because he had his connection to Rafe sooner than me – but...”

When I look back at my sister, I see her nodding in understanding, her face fallen a little in pity.

“It’s good,” I say, reaching over our trays to take my sister’s hands and squeeze them. “I’m terribly envious – I’d have given anything to have my bond with Rafe as early as you do yours, and to have had him tell me so early that he feels happy, and to have met him as a little pup!”

I take a deep breath as Cora nods along with me, finally getting it.

“But,” I say, leaning forward and smiling at her. “I’m so glad that you got to have all of that, Cora. That is amazing. I want you to do it every night and then come and tell me all about it every day.”

“Done,” she says with a big happy breath, taking her hands from mine and laying down on the bed, propping her head up with her elbow. And then she studies me for a second before her face splits into a wicked little grin.” You know, Ella,” she says, “you could have it all – a second chance at it.”

“What?” I ask, confused.

“Stop breast feeding,” she says, nodding to Rafe. “Get pregnant. You’ll have the chance to do it all meet the little baby in the dream state, have a happy, healthy pregnancy – share it all with Sinclair, like you weren’t able to do with the first one.”

My breath hitches as I look over at Rafe, and then as I stare off into the distance, I...well, I actually let myself contemplate for real just how very much I want that. But still, there are so many reasons to hesitate...

“Not yet,” I say, my voice faint as I stare of and...and consider everything that still weighs on my little family.

“Why not?” Cora breathes, and I jump a little as I feel a tap on my knee. I smile when I look back at my sister, realizing that she kicked me. “Come on, we can be pregnant together. Torture the Sinclair brothers even more than we already do. It’ll be a blast.”

“Because,” I reply, taking a deep breath and sighing. “I...I can't be pregnant again with all this uncertainty hanging over my head. I did it once, and it almost killed me -”

“Literally,” Cora points out, and I shrug, conceding the point.

“I want it, Cora,” I say, definite on that point and suddenly remembering the vision our mother's priests gave me that one time – of a family of four, with two girls and two boys. And the second- oldest child – it had been a little girl, with long rose- just like mine... e- gold hair, and a face

“But not until this is sorted,” she finishes for me, nodding with understanding, I think remembering the vision at the same time I am.

“Not until Rafe is safe,” I agree, and then I grin. “Then! We can get me good and pregnant.”

“Well don't wait too long,” she says, sighing. “I want our first three to be close in age, so they can all take care of each other.’

“Why can't they do that with just two?” I ask, glancing at her stomach, where she's carrying the child I know for sure is going to be Rafe's best friend.

“Because,” she replies, grinning, ” these two boys are going to need a girl to keep things spicy.”

I laugh loudly then, leaning forward to grin at her. “You're right,” I say, agreeing heartily. “Imagine how bored Dominic and Roger would be without us in their lives.”

And then, as if on que, the door opens and our mates come into the room, frowning at us – and certainly not bored. Seeing their faces, Cora and I burst into laughter.

“What is this,” Roger asks, trying to look stern as he comes over to us but failing to keep the smile from his lips. ” I don't trust you two when you're cackling like this.”

“Good choice,” I say, smiling at him and then reaching out a hand to my mate, who surprises me by ignoring my hand and lifting me bodily off the bed, holding me tight against him. “Oh!” I say, genuinely shocked but certainly not displeased.

“Trouble,” Sinclair growls, tucking his head close against me and taking a deep breath of my scent as I savor the feel of his stubble against my cheek. Feeling his worry down the bond, I press myself close to him, sending apology along down it as well. “Living up to your name today,” he murmurs, that's for certain.”

"I'm sorry, Dominic," I whisper to him, truly meaning it. "I – I got freaked out. But I really think it was the right thing to do – bringing them here, making them comfortable."

"You did right," he says, pulling away and nodding to me before pressing a quick kiss to my mouth and sitting down on the bed with me still in his arms. "It was just a big surprise, is all."

"For us too," I say, looking to Cora for confirmation. She raises her eyebrows and nods in agreement as Roger clears the trays from the bed and sits down next to his mate.

"How are they?" I ask, eager. "Did you find anything else out?"

"They're very comfortable," Roger replies, pulling Cora close as he speaks. "We really did put hospitality on it, making sure they have everything they could want. And the suite they're in is nice, if indeed guarded. But no, we didn't find much else out, and we won't until tomorrow. We're having dad come we know he'll want to be in on the conversation."

"Oh, good," I reply, leaning into Sinclair and looking up at him. "What do you think?"

"Overall?" he says, looking down at me. "I think Sarah is who she says she is. And if that's true then..." he sighs, shaking his head, "I think we're going to hear a very sad story tomorrow. I can't imagine what life must have been like, for two human girls raised in Xander's home."

And my heart sinks to think of it – Of the world from which they escaped, a world in which it's logical to let your niece live in an orphanage her whole life and then, when the time is right, to swap sperm samples at her sister's clinic and then try to steal the baby that resulted from that deception.

If I have already suffered so much at the hand of a man I've never met...

What must they have suffered as two humans serving in his home?

Chapter 415 – Awake

I'm up very early the next morning, my mind instantly on poor Sarah, poor Jessica, somewhere in the palace, probably worried about what on earth is coming next.

I slowly pull my body from its warm place at Sinclair's side, grimacing as I try not to disturb him as much as I can – he's so cute, my big tough Alpha, all vulnerable and sleeping and

"Just go, Ella," he murmurs, his eyes still shut. I laugh a little, softly –

Because of course he felt me go every sense is attuned to me, to my safety. his

"All right, Dominic," I murmur, leaning in to press a very soft kiss to his mouth. "But you stay asleep."

"Noo problem," he whispers, and then turns over as I roll to my side of the bed and quickly stand up. I give him a little glance over my shoulder – admiring the tanned muscles of his back for just a second – before leaning down to pick up my little baby.

Rafe is, as he usually is, awake and quiet, waiting for me to come and get him as I always do.

"Lovely little baby," I murmur to him, nudging him with my nose as I take him over to his changing table to get him started for his day. "How did I get so lucky as to have such a good boy? Not even crying in the morning, so his mama can rest."

Rafe gives a happy little squeal that makes me laugh, but it also makes me glance over my shoulder at my mate- because I don't want to wake him. But Sinclair stays still, his shoulders moving gently with his soft breathing. Good – I want him to get his rest.

I change Rafe as quickly as I can and then take him into our gigantic closet to feed him while I pick out my clothes for the day. When Rafe's finished eating I'm about to put him into his car seat so that I can take a shower, but a dark shadow falls over me.

"Give him here," Sinclair murmurs, and I turn to smile at him as I hand the baby over.

"How did you know?" I ask, curious.

"Baby told me," Sinclair says, smirking down at Rafe.

"What!?"

"Down the bond," Sinclair clarifies, leaning close to give me a kiss on the cheek. "He didn't want to go in the car seat. He called for me."

“Clever baby,” I say, a little awed as I peer at my son, who burbles happily up at his dad. “That’s amazing.”

“He just wants to be held,” Sinclair says, giving a little shrug. “When you go to put him down, he calls for me instead of crying, like a human baby would. Not that amazing – just a... different way of letting his parents know what he wants and needs.” Then he heads back to the bed with the baby, probably to check his phone and relax, while I take my shower and get dressed. When I come out, Sinclair passes Rafe back to me and then gets ready himself and I dress the baby.

The result of this early morning is that we’re the first ones in the sunny breakfast room in which we’ll be meeting Sarah and Jessica. I tap my fingers on the table, staring at the door, before Sinclair places a passive hand on mine, making me stop.

“You’re not going to hurry them by worrying about it,” he murmurs, looking down at his phone, where he’s fielding about a thousand messages from the hundreds of ventures he’s started working on since our return from the bunker.

I scowl, knowing that he’s right, but hating it anyway. So rather than sit still, I take Rafe from the table to a small living area on the far side of the room and spread out a little blanket for us so that we can have a little play time before everyone else arrives.

I laugh for nearly half an hour straight as I play with my little boy, marveling at him. He’s just...already gotten so big, I can’t believe it. And he’s so bright, and sweet, and cheerful – god, I can barely believe that he’s mine. He’s fulfilled every wish I ever had about a mom – and beyond that, has allowed me to access a level of love and joy that I honestly didn’t know I was capable of.

“Sweet baby prince,” I murmur to him, leaning over to blow a raspberry on his little belly. “Do you know how cute you are!? And how much we love you!?”

Rafe gives a little squeal of affirmation and I feel a pulse down our bond – a little happy joy from his heart to mine.

“Oh my goodness,” I murmur, laying down on the floor next to him, bringing my face close to his and letting him reach out his little pudgy hands to touch my cheeks and my nose. As he does, I smile so hard it hurts. “Little baby Rafe,” I murmur, kissing his hands. “You are everything to me.”

“I don’t know about this,” a voice above me says, and I jump a little and then laugh when I see Sinclair standing above us, his arms crossed over his chest in mock anger. “I don’t know if I like the idea of this little guy stealing my best girl’s heart.”

I laugh harder, sitting up.

“Seriously,” Sinclair says, leaning over and pretending to talk to Rafe alone now, who just giggles up at him. “You’d better knock it off, kid – it used to be me she talked to that way -”

“Don’t be jealous,” I sigh, taking Sinclair’s hand and tugging him down so that he sits on the floor next to us. “I can love you both.”

“Yeah well,” he murmurs, bringing his face close to mine and then dropping his head slightly so that he can run his lips over the skin of my neck. “Just make sure you always keep me at the top of your list of men you love, all right?”

“Oh, sure,” I say, rolling my eyes. And we’ll see how well you do at that once you have a daughter to steal your heart.”

“I’ll just pretend she’s a boy.”

I laugh now, both at his words and the soft tickly feeling of his lips on my skin. “Oh sure,” I say, sarcastic, “you’d just love that. A little girl tramping around with Rafe and Cora’s son, getting into all the messes that boys do? There’s no part of you that would overreact to her being in any kind of danger as she played boys’ sports, participated in boys’ activities, learning how to fight and be an Alpha.”

“If she’s your daughter? She can handle it.”

“No, Dominic,” I say, soft now, pulling my head back a little to look into his face. “Your daughter would be strong enough to handle that, to handle anything. You’d make her strong, like you do me and Rafe.”

I see the way he melts a little then, the way his eyes go soft as he looks at me, truly hears my words. “Trouble,” he growls, lifting hand to my cheek and resting his forehead against mine, “you’re the heart of everything. There is no strength without you.”

And then my mate presses his lips to mine, and our little baby gives a happy giggle, and I swear that my heart...will probably explode with happiness at any moment.

But before it can, we both hear the door open.

“Is...anyone here?” It’s Cora’s voice.

“Here!” I call after I break our kiss and take a second to clear my choked throat. I raise a hand and waive it so that Cora can see me.

Sinclair takes the opportunity to kiss me again, just briefly, as Cora, Roger, and Henry come over to us at the far side of the room. And then we both smile up at our family as they come into view.

“Why am I not surprised that you’re doing something bizarre?” Roger asks, frowning at us a little and putting his hands on his hips.

“What?” I ask, confused.

“You have an entire mahogany table with velvet-lined chairs,” Cora explains, waiving at the room, “as well as a full breakfast buffet set out. And yet the two of you are over here, sitting on the floor and making out?”

I laugh and roll my eyes at my sister, getting to my knees and then lifting Rafe into my arms. “You have no sense of fun, Cora,” I chide. Sinclair stands and puts out a hand to me, helping me to my feet.

“I have plenty of sense of fun -” she protests, crossing her arms. “I just like a cup of coffee first.”

“Well,” I say, gesturing towards the full pot of coffee waiting hot on the buffet, “help yourself, sister mine!”

“Um,” a sound comes from the door, and we all turn towards it. Sarah and Jessica are standing there, hand-in-hand, a guard in black standing behind them. “I’m so sorry – are we... interrupting?”

I blush a little – god, I’m supposed to be a queen, and this is the picture we’re presenting? Laying on the floor and bickering over who is more fun, the queen or the duchess?

“Please,” I say, hurrying across the room to stand in front of Sarah and Jessica, who I note are clean, and wearing fresh new clothes, and looking rested and happy. Or at least, happier than they did yesterday. “Won’t you come in and have some breakfast? We’re so excited to see you.”

I give them my best smile as they accept my invitation into the room, but as they move to fill their plates with some breakfast something in my stomach sinks a little. Because I’ve been having what is frankly a wonderful morning...but I know that things are about to get very, very dark.

Chapter 416 – Sarah’s Story

Ila

As Sarah and Jessica come to sit down at the table, I’m surprised to see Henry take the lead in speaking to them. I get a little cup of coffee for myself, and a bowl of sliced fruit – honestly, I’m going to be too distracted to eat much and listen interestedly to the start of the conversation.

I don’t know why I’m so surprised, but Henry really does shock me with how charming he is with Sarah and Jessica, immediately putting them at ease as he asks them very simple, easy questions about who they are and what they like. He doesn’t delve into any of the big questions that I’m sure we’ll get into soon where they lived, how they lived, and why they ran but instead 1 does a wonderful job of showing his interest in who they are as people.

As I sit down at my place next to Sinclair and begin to sip at my coffee, I’m interested to see how Henry concentrates his attention on Jessica. She’s so young and so shy at first, but his questions about what she likes – reading, and animals – and what she dislikes – cold weather, chores – really allow Jessica to open up. I see Sarah smiling warmly at her sister and then at Henry as she, too, sees Jessica shed her shyness and become the lovely, happy little girl that Sarah must know at home.

“Yes!” Jessica says, enthusiastic. “I love dogs! I wish I had one! We used to have one, but...” she hesitates, and then looks up at Sarah, biting her lip.

“Master Xander had lots of dogs,” Sarah says, smiling around at us. There was a puppy that we liked best of all we...called him our dog. Frisky, we said his name was.”

“Because,” Jessica says, laughing, ” He was always so playful! And he liked to get into trouble.”

I smile at the little girl, laughing and imagining her with the little dog. But I notice that Sarah’s face turns sad, and she looks away from Jessica, not wanting her to see. My own face falls as I realize that...this story must not have a nice ending. And that Sarah doesn’t want Jessica to remember that.

Luckily, Henry jumps in. “Well,” he says, raising his eyebrows at Jessica. Did you know that there is a mama cat, here in the palace? Who had her kittens just about a month ago?”

Jessica’s eyes go completely round as she gasps at the news. Henry leans forward, smiling at her.” Would you like to play with them?”

“Oh!” Jessica says, clasping her hands together and holding them tight under her chin.

“Yes, please! Oh, I would like that very much!”

Henry looks over at my mate, who smiles and nods, letting him know it’s a good idea – and then Henry rolls away to a corner of the room, where he presses a button on an intercom and says a few words to whoever is on the other end.

As he does, I look over at Jessica who is beaming with excitement, and then down at my own baby, who sitting on my lap and blowing bubbles, grasping at the table cloth and generally exploring his world. When I look up at Sarah, I smile to see that her eyes are on Rafe as well.

She looks up and meets my eyes, her own face breaking out into a big smile to match mine. And I can see...a sort of pride there, in that she was able to help this little baby, to keep him safe with me.

Gratitude races through me first, and then, after it, a deep determination to give this woman everything she needs to build a life. She has given me everything – and I’m determined to give it back.

Before I can say anything, though, a young woman peeks through the door and we can all already hear the kittens mewing. Jessica gasps and stands right up on her chair, trying to get a better look as Henry beckons the young woman forward and directs her to the back of the room.

“Oh, Sarah,” Jessica says, her voice full of pleading as Sarah scolds her and tugs her down off the chair. “Please, please can I go and play with them?”

“If...that’s all right?” Sarah asks, looking around at the rest of us.

I nod eagerly, wanting the little girl to enjoy herself. And so Sarah lets her sister dash off to the living area at the back of the room, completely distracted.

“Well, that was nicely done,” I murmur to Sinclair, peering at Henry who follows Jessica to the back of the room to ensure that she’s settled.

“Henry is full of tact,” my mate murmurs back, smiling proudly after his dad. “You should have seen the clever things he did to convince Roger and me to go to bed when we were kids. We were hoodwinked left and right.”

“I hope you remember these tactics,” I sigh, watching Henry come back to his place at the table. Cora stands up, fetching Sarah a refill on her cup of tea as Sarah looks around at all of us.

“Thank you,” Sarah says, especially to Henry but looking around at us all. “I -I am grateful to have her out of earshot. I know you have questions, and I want to tell you everything but..." she glances over at her sister, who is giggling madly as she lays on the floor, letting kittens climb all over her. "Well, I don't think Jessica needs to relive any of it, or hear details which I've tried very hard to keep from her.'

"We understand," Cora says, setting the fresh cup of tea down next to Sarah and setting in her seat between Sarah and Roger.

Sarah takes a deep breath then, pressing her lips together as she looks around at us. "Well, then," she says, giving a little shrug. "Where can I begin?"

Sinclair and Roger take a larger role now, falling into some of their interrogation patterns that I recognize from our time at the bunker, as elsewhere. But I am very pleased to note that both of them – despite their eagerness to get all the information they want and need from Sarah – are careful to be warm, and kind, and conversational.

Henry intercedes at certain moments, pressing Sarah for a little more information when he needs it, but he's mostly silent.

Cora and I, though we don't ask the questions, are actually the ones to whom Sarah speaks, even though Sinclair and Roger are the one who ask the questions. It's not that she neglects the men in the room, but...I'm not really sure why, but as she tells us her story, I find that her eyes are on our faces, her words directed to us. Perhaps it's because Cora and I react more emotionally to the story, gasping and leaning forward, mumbling our empathy when things get tough, but either way –

As Sarah's story unfolds, it's clear that she's more comfortable telling it to us. And so Sinclair and Roger lean back in their chairs, letting Cora and I take the lead.

And the story that Sarah tells us...it's as sad as I thought it would be.

"I was born in that house," Sarah says quietly, her eyes a bit far-off. "I don't remember being anywhere else as a child – not really. I didn't go to school, I didn't have any friends – honestly, I'm not sure I knew that other children existed for a long, long time. My mother was only allowed to keep me – to keep us – because she promised that we could be raised to be obedient. That we would...replace her, when she became old and infirm."

"And your father?" Henry asks, gentle phrasing the question so that Sarah can answer it in any way that is comfortable for her.

"I never knew him," Sarah says, looking around at us, unashamed of the fact but seeming confused by it. "I don't even know if Jessica and I have the same..." her head dips while she clears her throat a little before looking back up at us, taking a deep breath. Mother always said she would tell us when we were old enough to know. But then...she died before we were old enough, I guess.”

I look Sarah over, sympathy in my eyes. Because while she had a mother who loved her and was present in her life, her reality was in so many ways so much more brutal than mine. Because I had Cora at my side – and we always had hope of a different, better life.

And Sarah, she’s about mine and Cora’s age now, but we both have so much that she doesn’t have. My heart aches for her.

“Sarah,” Cora says, turning my attention to her. “What happened to your mother?”

Chapter 417 – Vengeance

Cora asks Sarah about her mother in a frank, curious way that I think allows Sarah to straighten her spine and answer impassively, like she's giving a report to a doctor instead of having to break a hard truth to a queen who will probably break into tears. And I smile a little at the back of my sister's head, grateful for her for giving Sarah what she needs when I can't.

"He beat her," Sarah says, and my heart twists almost physically within me. "She...she was growing older, and she couldn't do her chores the way she used to. And..." Sarah bites her lip and looks only at Cora now, telling her what she wouldn't be able to say to the rest of us, not while holding her head high. "And he started to look at me, the way he looked at my mother. And she tried to keep me away from him, to find other chores in other parts of the house. And when he figured out what she was doing he..."

Sarah's voice cracks here and I have to look away from her so that my eyes don't fill with tears. Sinclair slips a hand onto my knee, wanting to give me comfort but not to distract from Sarah's story.

Sarah takes a deep breath before she continues. "He told her she was an idiot and a whore, for trying to keep his property from him. And that he could do what we wanted with all of us take our bodies, our lives. And then," she shrugs, looking down at the tablecloth. "He did. He took her life then, to show her...and to show me."

I make myself look back at Sarah now, who looks up at Cora, and then at me. And I hope that she sees, shining in my eyes, my deep and renewed desire for vengeance. Because there is absolutely no way that I am going to let this man live.

"That was the moment," she says, nodding to me and then looking at Sinclair too, though a little shier now. "When mother died? I decided that...that if he could take what I loved most from me, I could take what he most wanted too. The little baby – I could...I could take that away from him. And so I did or, I tried."

"You succeeded," Sinclair says quietly, next to me.

"No," she says, shaking her head vehemently and looking down at her hands. "You'd have been safe anyway – you'd have figured it out."

"The note," Roger says, leaning around Cora to look clearly at Sarah, to make sure she hears him. "It gave us an advantage that...without it, Sarah, they very well could have taken Rafe. We owe you a great debt."

"No," she says instantly, flushing red. "I don't – I don't want anything. And I don't want you to think that I did this so that you would give me anything."

“We don’t think that, Sarah,” I say softly, hugging my baby close and leaning forward to catch her eye. “But we want to help you, like we want to help the other refugees. Though I admit,” my mouth cocks into a little smile here, “I do want to help you a little bit more than the others. Because I’m so, so grateful. I mean, what would you like – you can have anything!” My face splits into a wide grin here as I point at my sister’s mate. “You can even take Roger! He’s the least useful-

Cora gives a little squeak of protest as Sinclair bursts into laughter and Roger turns to glare at me, his mouth falling open. Sarah starts to laugh too as she realizes my joke and shake her head, rather vehemently, no.

But seeing Sarah decline my offer, Roger turns his shock on her.

“Wait, you don’t want me either!?” he gasps, and we all start to laugh harder as he sinks back into his chair, playing along now and exaggerating his fury for the sake of the mood in the room. Because...frankly, we need a laugh.

And I want Sarah to know that we hear her but...well, I want to give her some of the hope that Cora and I always had. That things can get better – and they will. And maybe that starts today, with a little laughter at Roger’s willing expense. I turn an apologetic look his way but he just gives me a wink, understanding, and I turn back to Sarah.

“We’ll talk about it, okay?” I say, still holding my baby tight. “But...we’re going to be friends now, Sarah. Good friends friends for life. And friends help each other get back on their feet.”

Sarah’s smile is slow, but when it reaches its full extent I swear my heart could burst with joy of it. Because I see it there that hope I was looking for.

And I intend to keep every part of my word. Sarah is going to have a good life, and I’m going to help her get it.

“Ohhhh, Sarah!” Jessica moans, running over with two kittens, one in each hand, her eyes filled with worry and woe. “Please, please can we keep them?” She looks down at the little orange ball of fur and then at the grey one, her voice a little frantic. “I love them so much – I can’t you have to let me keep them!”

“Oh, Jessica,” Sarah sighs, putting her arms out and wrapping them around her little sister. “We don’t even have a home to take them to yet -”

“And they’re too young,” Henry adds, looking at Jessica seriously, “to leave their mother. Perhaps in a few weeks, when they’re ready? You and your sister can talk about it again?”

Jessica groans with grief at the idea of leaving the two little kittens, making me laugh a little.

“Well, you can stay here until we find you a home of your own,” I say, crossing my fingers under the table a bit as I make this rather reckless offer without even asking my mate. “So you can still see them every day, Jessica. When you’re not at school, of course.”

“School?” she says, looking at me with wide eyes. “I – I get to go to school?”

“Yes!” I say, surprised and looking at Sarah, who gives me a big smile and nods excitedly. “Yes, Jessica. School every day, and kittens at night. Does that sound like a good start to your new life?”

And a little tear runs down Sarah’s cheek as Jessica says a vehement yes, cuddling the little cats close to her chest. I look up at Sinclair then, hoping that he’ll say.

But he’s already nodding, which makes me burst into a grin. And then he leans forward, pressing a kiss to my forehead. My sweet, good mate, he murmurs to me down our bond. You’ll be a wonderful queen.

And warmth spreads through me at the idea of it – because if being queen means I get to do things like this? Then I’m definitely on board, and excited.

But that warmth is chased a bit with anger, and sadness, and rage.

Because even if we can help Sarah and Jessica...Xander’s still out there in the world, and more men like him. And we’ve got work to do to take them out of it.

Work I am very, very determined to pursue.

Chapter 418 – The Threat of War

Ella

Cora and Roger stay in the meeting room for a little breakfast as Henry escorts Sarah and Jessica from the room, wheeling beside them as they discuss some preliminary plans for Jessica's schooling and Sarah's own desires and ideas about her future life. I smile as Sinclair and I walk slowly behind them, Rafe curled protected in the curve of his father's arm. I wave to my new friends as they and Henry take a left when Sinclair and I have to go right, towards our rooms.

And then, as we make the turn and are finally on our own, I huff a little sigh. Sinclair, as always, notices.

"What's wrong, little queen?" he murmurs, moving closer to me as we walk. "I thought you'd be happy with the result of that. You did a good thing for her and, I imagine, will keep doing so. Plus, we got some very useful information about Xander."

"Was it anything we didn't already know?" I ask, looking up at him with a frown.

"A few things," he murmurs, giving a shrug. "But more importantly, she's a witness we will be able to charge Xander, formally, with...well, I guess we'd need a lawyer to spell out specifically which crimes he committed in switching sperm at a sperm bank and then attempting to kidnap the resulting child."

Rafe gives a little burble right at that moment, making me laugh and smile over at him – my sweet baby, almost as if he knew he was being talked about.

"Well, that's something," I murmur, considering it. "Will we charge him, though?"

"I'm not sure," Sinclair says. "Not that I want to let him off the hook for everything he's done – we just...need to figure out the best way to go about it, especially as he's now with the Atalaxians."

We've reached the door to our room now and Sinclair twists the knob, pushing the door open and allowing me to enter first. I head immediately to our gigantic walk-in closet to get changed into more comfortable clothing, but my mind whirs as I go.

"Go on, little mate," Sinclair murmurs as he follows me into the closet, sitting down on a chaise lounge that I had placed in here just for this reason. I anticipate many little chats in here as either or both of us are getting ready. "Tell me what you're thinking."

"Well," I say, tugging off my dress and sighing as I put it back on its hanger. "It's...it's the Atalaxians I'm worried about," I say, giving him a sorry little grimace.

“What do you mean?” he asks, settling back on the chaise and listening carefully. I give him a little smile and a pulse of gratitude down the bond. It means so much to me that he takes me seriously.

“I mean,” I say, grabbing for a pair of comfortable folded pants, “that I’m not sure we should be...messaging with them. I mean – you heard everything that Sarah said today about what life in Xander’s household was like – it was an absolute nightmare for her, and for Jessica, and her mother. Just years of abuse, justified because they were humans and women.”

I sigh as I pull a t-shirt over my head and look at my mate, my eyes full of sorrow. “The idea that Xander would go to the Atalaxians, hat in hand, and they would see him and be like ‘sure!

Come on in! Your kind welcome here!’” I shake my head, pursing my lips. “It makes me really uncomfortable, Dominic. I...I don’t want anything to do with people like that.”

He sighs, nodding his head and understanding, but also turning a hand upwards towards me in supplication. “Part of ruling is dealing with people whom you intensely dislike. Atalaxia is a powerful nation no matter how much we disagree with their policies, we can’t just...ignore them, or give them the cold shoulder.”

“But shouldn’t we?” I ask, understanding him but unable to resist pushing back a little bit. I come close to my mate then, reaching out and running my fingers through his dark hair as I look down into his face, and then down at my baby. “Everything I’ve heard about them, Dominic, suggests that they’re participating in...atrocities, serious crimes against humanity.”

“Crimes of which we have no real proof, my love – ”

“But how hard would that proof be to find?” I murmur. “I mean, I had one conversation with one woman in a refugee camp, and we have testimony against Xander now. If abuse is as widespread in Atalaxia as I’m being told it is, would we even really have to scratch the surface to find proof of it?”

“And if we did,” Sinclair murmurs, looking seriously up at me. “What would you have us do as a result?”

“I don’t know,” I say, shaking my head as I look down at him, sighing with my worry and my fear. “I’m really not – not trying to talk you into anything, Dominic, or persuade you one way or another. I just...I know that to not oppose tyranny is in some ways to accept it, support it. And if we have the power...”

“Would you go so far as to want to go to war over it?” he asks, quiet but genuine. I go pale at the idea, because I am so... so sick of war.

All I want is to build my life, and raise my child, and live peacefully with my mate.

But would I buy that piece at the expense of others? Would I allow innocents to suffer so that I can sleep peacefully in bed?

I bite my lip and Sinclair clicks his tongue in sympathy, raising a hand to cup my cheek, his thumb tracing my skin. "I'm sorry, love," he sighs. "That wasn't a fair question – you have all good points, and I gave you the one ultimatum that would stop you."

"No," I say, shaking my head and covering his hand with mine. "It's...it's the reality though, isn't it? If I'm saying to stand up to the Atalaxians... the result could be war."

"It could be war either way," he says, his voice soft and worried.

"Really?" I ask, my stomach dropping.

Slowly, he nods. "They're not happy, at all, with the fact that the secrecy pact was broken, and that my response to it isn't immediate denigration of the human race to second-class citizenship. They are very hostile now, at the moment. I will avoid war at all costs but...they're strong, Ella. They could push for it, knowing they have the advantage."

I close my eyes and take a deep breath through my nose, anxiety racing through me at the idea.

War. War again.

Just when I'm finally starting to find peace...

"We're not there yet," Sinclair says, dropping his hand to drift down my side and settle on my waist, pulling me closer. "Don't worry about it now, Ella. Don't borrow trouble before it comes."

"Can't seem to help it," I murmur, opening my eyes and looking down at my mate. "Like calls to like, after all."

He laughs then, the sound so deep and warm that it makes me smile. Then he tugs me closer, pulling me into his lap. "Let me worry about that," he says softly. "You just go patch up the people who were hurt by our last war it's what I know you want to be doing anyway."

"Hey," I say, narrowing my eyes playfully at him and kissing him lightly. "Don't you start thinking of me as some kind of magical street sweeper – I'm not just around to clean up after all this nation's wars, you know! I am not the panacea you seek!"

"Oh I know," he murmurs, teasing me with his lips on mine as he lets his hand drift lower to settle on my bottom. "If you're busy cleaning up after all the wars, you'll be far too busy for me to get you pregnant with all of the heirs I'm planning to produce-

I burst into laughter at this, pulling away from him and pretending to be offended even though, really, we're both well aware that that's precisely what I want too. "Hey, Mr. King Sinclair," I growl, wrinkling my nose at him. "I'm no royal baby factory either."

He scoffs and rolls his eyes, pretending to be frustrated. "Then what are you even good for, Ella!?"

I laugh, a little wicked, and pull his face close. "You know exactly what I'm good for, Dominic." And then I kiss him soundly, and let myself get a little lost in it.

And then we put the baby down for his nap, and I am...much later reporting for duty at the refugee camp than I thought I'd be.

Chapter 419 – Come for Dinner

Ella

When I finally come out of my bedroom, Rafe strapped to my chest, and hurry through the hallways to the front of the palace where I asked Cora to wait for me, I find her sitting with crossed arms and a frustrated look on her face.

“Oh hey, Ella,” she says, smirking at me. “What took you so long.”

I just beam innocently at my sister, flicking my hair over my shoulder. “I don’t know what you mean, Cora. I came as fast as I could.”

“Oh,” she says, raising her eyebrows at me. “I’m sure you did.”

And then I burst into laughter as I realize that Cora – well. Cora hasn’t precisely been one to make dirty jokes in the past, has she? “Looks like Roger’s rubbing off on you,” I say, putting out a hand to help her up, which she accepts.

“He’s trying,” she says, giving me a wink and leaning down to give Rafe a kiss on his forehead. “Are you ready? Finally?”

“Oh, come on, Cora,” I say, rolling my eyes as we head for the door. “It wasn’t like it was that long of a wait.”

“Forty-five minutes! Honestly, Ella – it’s not a quickie anymore if it takes the better part of an hour – ”

“Cora!” I hiss, covering Rafe’s innocent ears and looking around at all of the people milling around at the front of the palace. “They’ll hear you!”

She laughs. “Oh, come on, Ella, they all know too. Do you know how many people asked me where Sinclair has been? I’ve been making excuses for you for well over half an hour and everyone saw right through them -”

“Oh my god,” I say as we step out the front door and find Conner waiting for us. “We will cease speaking of this! Immediately!”

“Good plan,” she says, laughing along with me as we make our way down to the cars waiting for us. We hit the road quickly after I strap Rafe into his safety seat, heading directly for the Human Camp. When we arrive, I see that Sinclair has again sent a relative army of guards, and that Isabel and Hank are waiting for us outside of the gates.

Fortunately, today they seem to be peacefully chatting, rather than standing coldly. I smile at them as I get out of the car, grateful that Isabel is as good as her word in trying to be better at accepting humans as part of the team.

“What kept you?” Hank says, coming closer to us and smiling his greeting but – characteristically – keeping his hands in his pockets and refraining from giving us a hug. I resist the urge myself, knowing it would just make him uncomfortable.

Cora smirks and opens her mouth to tell him precisely what kept us, but I step forward and beat her to it. “We were getting Sarah settled this morning,” I say, smiling at both Hank and Isabel, who were updated last night on everything we know about Sarah and Jessica. “She was kind enough to tell us her story.”

“Oh good,” Isabel says, nodding to us. “I hope that it gave you both some clarity and that you’ll be able to help her in the way that she’s helped you.” She leans down to coo to Rafe now, greeting him. The baby gratifies her by kicking happily and waving his little hands, making us both laugh.

Then, as a group of eight – nine, if you count Rafe – we head into the camp to get to work. We head again to the children’s hospitalization tent, as both Isabel and Hank identified important cases which need my immediate attention. There, we fall into our routines, all of us wanting to help as many people as fast as we can, especially considering our delay in getting here this afternoon. I grimace when I think of my stolen hour, regretting it. Tomorrow I’ll try to get here earlier so I can really help as much as I can.

When I stand up from my third patient of the afternoon, I’m surprised when Hank brings up Sarah again.

“So, she’s all right?” he asks, flipping through the next patient’s chart.

“Who?” I ask, confused.

“Sarah,” he murmurs. “And Jessica,” he adds, a little bit of an afterthought. I smile a little, watching him as he pointedly doesn’t look at me, flipping through pages which I know he’s already read.

“She’s fine, Hank,” I say, purposefully keeping my voice breezy. “She’s going to stay at the palace for awhile – for as long as she wants, really, until she decides where she wants to live. Jessica seems really happy – she met some kittens, and is going to start going to school.”

“Good,” Hank says, letting the clipboard fall to his side and looking deliberately away from me, in the direction of our next patient. I can’t help that my smile grows a little bit as I wonder just how much Hank has been thinking about the pretty, wounded dark-haired woman whose sister we saved yesterday.

But as I study him, I consider that it could honestly go either way. He's very cryptic, isn't he? Is he asking out of professional curiosity for a doctor regarding a patient? Or...

"Next case is over here," he says, stalking off. I look up at Conner, who grins down at me as we follow. I laugh a little, thinking that if Conner is picking up on it too...

Well.

Perhaps there's a little meddling to be done.

"You know, Hank," I say as we arrive at the next hospital bed, taking the charts from his hand and flipping through them even though I have no idea what they say. "You should come over for dinner sometime. At the palace. Catch up with us, like old friends."

"Catch up?" he says, his voice dry. "Old friends?"

"Sure," I say, looking up at him with too-wide eyes.

"Ella," he sighs, laughing a little as he shakes his head at me. "The idea of old times' with me and your family means I'm either going to be watching you die slowly in bed or getting punched in the face for crimes I didn't commit. So...maybe let's cut that as an excuse."

I laugh here, genuinely surprised by his sense of humor. I mean, he's dead on and definitely seeing through my ploy.

"Well then come for new times, Hank," I say, grinning at him. "It will be fun. I mean... Sarah could be there."

"Give me this," he mumbles, snatching at the chart in my hands, looking for a distraction from this conversation so I don't notice the little flush in his cheeks.

"Hey, I was reading that!" I protest, laughing and holding the chart out of his reach.

"You don't even understand what it says," he chides, glaring at me a little but unable to help the little smile that pulls at the corner of his lips.

"Well, a girl can learn, can't she?" I say, lofty. But I hand the chart to him with a wink.

"Think on it," I say. And then I look up at Conner. "You can come too! It will be a party!"

"Oh," he says, genuinely surprised at the invitation as he takes the baby from me. "Um, I'm not sure that's appropriate, Luna...I mean. I can't... hang out with the King."

“Why not?” I ask, confused.

“Because he’s the king, Ella,” Hank replies, rolling his eyes at me again good-naturedly. “You’re just too used to him to see how intimidating he is to literally everyone else.”

“Ohhh,” I say, waving a hand behind me as I dismiss what they’re saying. “Dominic is nice!”

“Nice,” I hear Conner murmur to Hank behind me. “She just described the most powerful Alpha in the kingdom – maybe the world as nice.”

“Yeah, she’s...Ella.” Hank sighs.

But I ignore them, smiling down at the little brown-haired girl looking sadly up at me. “Hi, sweetheart,” I say to her, reaching out and offering my hand. “My name is Ella. What’s yours?”

Chapter 420 – Thanks, but No Thanks

Ella

I'm quite tired when evening approaches in the refugee camp and Cora comes to my side, placing a hand on my back and telling me that we should probably head home. I sigh, looking around, knowing that I can do more but...

"I get it, Ells," she says, looking around with me. "But there's only so much we can do. And you're a queen and a mom as much as a healer now. You've got to find a balance."

"Is it normal to feel guilty?" I ask my sister, who has been working to heal people for much longer than I have. "When you prioritize yourself, and other things, even though you know you can help people who are suffering?"

"It is," Cora says with a little sigh. "

But you, my big-hearted sister, probably feel it more keenly than most.

"Yeah," I say, glancing over at Hank. "He, for instance, compartmentalizes well."

"Don't count Hank out," she says softly, shaking her head. "He's got a big heart too. Maybe just...hides it better."

I turn my head a little, considering him, considering her point. And then my heart aches for him again as I think of how disappointed he was when Cora left him for her mate – because as much as he loved her, we know now that he never stood a chance. Cora and Roger were written in the stars.

But is there someone out there for Hank too?

I hope, quite desperately, that there is. He's so good, and he deserves that, like the rest of us.

"Ready, Luna?" Conner asks, coming over and bringing my baby with him, who reaches for me with his little grasping hands.

"Sure am!" I say, taking my baby and cuddling him close. Cora laughs and leans in as well, fussing over Rafe and I can see thinking about her own little baby, who will be here so much sooner than she realizes. Together, we start to walk out of the tent, but as I turn I hear a little voice calling me back.

"Hey, wolf lady!" a little boy calls, and I turn and laugh to see little Benny running for me.

"Well hey," I say, falling to one knee and wrapping him in a hug as he runs over. "How are you feeling, Bens?"

"It's Benny," he corrects with a little frown, making me smile as he adjusts a set of glasses on his nose. Then, he peers down at Rafe. "Is this your baby?"

"Yup," I say, turning Rafe a little so Benny can see him better. "What do you think of him?"

"I think he's fat," Benny murmurs, reaching out a hand to poke Rafe's belly. I burst out laughing at this, honestly charmed. "He's not fat, he's a baby! They're supposed to be chubby so that they can grow big and strong."

"Well," Benny says, his eyes going wide as they're still fastened on Rafe. "This one's gonna be real big and strong, then."

I laugh again, harder this time as Cora crouches down next to us. "Who are you?" Benny asks, looking Cora up and down.

Cora introduces herself as my sister and Benny narrows his eyes at her. "Oh," he says. "Are you the human one?"

"Yes," she replies, her eyebrows going up. "Does my reputation proceed me?"

"Um, I don't know what that means," Benny replies, blinking at her and making me laugh again, "but she told me she has a human sister," he continues, nodding towards me. "So, you can't turn into a wolf?"

"Unfortunately not," she says, giving a little shrug. "But I'm going to have a baby soon," she says, her hand settling on her stomach, "and he's going to be able to do it."

"Oh," Benny says, his own eyebrows going up now. Then he takes a moment to think before speaking again. "Does that mean he's going to be fat too?"

I burst into real laughter at this, falling back a little with the force of it so that Cora has to reach out a hand and steady me as she grins between us.

"I don't know," Cora says, grinning at Benny, as delighted as I am. "I guess we'll just have to see, won't we?"

"Hey, Benny," Isabel says, coming to stand by his side and offering her hand. "You know you're not supposed to sneak out of bed – Dr. Hank said two more days of bed rest before you're cleared to go to the children's home."

"Dr. Hank is fulla soup!" Benny says, crossing his arms and frowning up at Isabel. The sincere disbelief and frustration in this kid set me off laughing again and Benny turns to grin at me. He takes Isabel's hand, though. "I don't feel sick at all, since the lady came yesterday!" he protests, pointing at me. "I should be allowed to go and find my mom!"

My laughter dies a little as he mentions his mother again, but I do my best not to let it show in my face.

"I know, kid," Isabel says, grinning down at him and giving me a wink. "Maybe we'll have Dr. Hank come and look at you again, see if you can't go tomorrow."

Satisfied with this, Benny nods and consents to be led back to bed, calling his goodbyes to us over his shoulder.

I stand up with Cora, sighing and watching him go.

"He reminds me of you," she says, and I look over at her in surprise to see a big grin on her face as she watches the little boy get tucked back into his bed.

"Really?" I ask.

"Yeah," she says, turning to me with a smile. "So full of life, ready to question everything even though the world has dealt him a tough hand. He's got Ella Reina vibes for sure."

I purse my lips together, trying not to let my sincere pleasure show on my face at the compliment. Because even if Cora meant it as a compliment for Benny...well, he's just so damn cute, and vivid, and determined that I can't help but be pleased with the idea that I am anything like him.

"Oh geeze," Cora says, wrapping an arm around my shoulder and turning Rafe and I towards the entrance to the tent.

"What!?" I protest, confused.

"Let's get you out of here," she murmurs. "Before you start adopting kids."

And I laugh but...I don't really protest.

Because, as a former orphan myself? I know how important it is for these children to find homes and families that love them. And I certainly have enough love in my heart to make that a reality for a kid like I used to be, a kid like Benny.

I just...wonder what Sinclair would think of the idea. Even just hypothetically. I'm still wondering on it when Cora nudges me with her elbow as we pass through the gates of the camp.

“Hmm?” I ask, inviting her to tell me what she’s thinking.

“I know we’ve kind of left it off the table for a bit, Ella,” she says, looking over at me seriously. “But...I wanted to talk to you about all of this wedding business.”

“Oh!” I say, my eyes going wide and eager. And then I laugh, shaking my head as Conner opens the back door of the car for me. I murmur my thanks to him and begin to strap Rafe into his car seat as Cora goes around to the other side. “Honestly, I’m glad you remembered, Cora – because I honestly keep forgetting to talk to you about it amongst everything else that’s been on our plates the past few days. But Sinclair is really excited about it! He thinks it’s important!”

Cora bites her lip a little as we close our doors and buckle ourselves in.

“Oh no,” I say, seeing her expression and reaching for her hand over top of Rafe’s carrier. “Oh, Cora, you don’t want to do it?”

“It’s not that I don’t see the importance of it, Ella,” she says, shaking her head a little as she takes my hand. “Or that I’m not grateful for you and Sinclair for offering this to us but...” she sighs and I hold her gaze as Conner begins to drive us home. “Honestly, Ella, I know I’ve never talked about getting married before, and that this whole idea of a mating ceremony for me is incredibly new, but...it’s more important to me than I thought it would be.”

I nod, understanding, listening.

“And,” she continues, “I...I want something that really reflects me and Roger. That’s small, and intimate, and feels...special to us. Not...like a spectacle for the whole nation.”

“I understand,” I say, softly. Because as wonderful as my own big ceremony was for me, it really was just for me. And Cora, I know, has been waiting for just the right moment for Roger to give her his mark – she really wants it to be right.

“But I don’t want to disappoint you,” Cora says, looking up at me with worried eyes.

Chapter 421 – Bath Time

Ella

“Cora,” I scold, frowning, “you know I don’t feel that way – ”

“Well I know you’d never say it,” she protests, sighing. “But I do get that this union between a wolf and a human that, symbolically, it’s important. And even if you’re not disappointed that it could be...disappointing.”

“I want you to have the mating ceremony you want, Cora,” I reply, steady in my truth here. “Especially in the case of something as important as this.” I give her hand a little squeeze before pulling mine away. “But if you’d like to consider a middle path...maybe you could let me show you what I was thinking?”

She turns her head to look up at me, surprised. “You’ve been...planning?”

“Just a little,” I say, unable to keep the eagerness out of my voice. “Just late at night when Sinclair is asleep and I can’t sleep, or I get up to feed Rafe – ”

“You’ve been losing sleep over this!?”

“No!” I protest, but then I hesitate. “ Well, not much.”

“Ella!”

“Just – can I show you what I was thinking!?” I plead, “sister to sister!?” And then, if you hate it, you can say no.” A wide grin comes to my face then. “But I think you’re going to like it.”

Cora gives a big sigh, leaning back into her seat and closing her eyes. “ Fine, Ella,” she says. “But this is not a yes.”

“I didn’t think it was!” I say, newly excited. Because honestly...it’s gorgeous, and I can’t wait to show her my plans.

When I come sighing into our rooms that evening, Sinclair immediately looks up at me from his casual position on the bed – looking down at his tablet, still doing work, as usual – and immediately laughs.

“What?” I ask, frowning, my baby strapped sleeping to my chest. I put my hands on my hips. “What’s so funny?”

“Nothing,” he says, gracefully unfolding his gigantic self and standing up from the bed. Then he slips his hands into his pockets and smirks as he looks me up and down. “I just didn't realize I was mated to someone who spends their days toiling in the mines, is all."

"What?" I ask again, confused, and Sinclair, laughing, nods towards the bathroom. Both irritated and interested at once, I hurry in and gasp when I see myself in the mirror. "Oh my god," I murmur, leaning in to get a good look at the very real layer of dusty dark brown grime that's covering me from head to foot. "Honestly, why did they let me into the palace looking like this!?"

Sinclair, still laughing, comes to stand behind me. I groan when I see our contrast in the mirror – him the perfect Alpha King, clean-shaved and pressed – and me, a messy ball of dirt with crazy hair –

And then I gasp when my eyes light on little Rafe, who is likewise covered in a light layer of brown dust. "Oh my god!" I exclaim again, immediately beginning to ruffle his hair and moaning as a little puff of dust explodes into the air. "Ohhh, little baby! Mommy's sorry!"

"A little dirt won't hurt him," Sinclair chuckles, reaching out to unstrap the baby from me. "Dirty in those camps, is it?"

"It's bad, Dominic," I murmur, helping him take the baby from my arms. "Honestly, if this is what we look like after just an afternoon, imagine how those people are living..."

"Well, we've diverted a lot of attention to it," he replies, holding the baby away from him a little as he carries him over to his little baby bath. "Hopefully all of the people will be out of those terrible camps and in better situation in a month's time, though of course some cases will take more."

Rafe, waking a little now that he's away from the warmth of my body, starts to cry a little in protest.

"Oh," I say, my heart going out to him. I hesitate, wondering if I should just take him and let him sleep dirty honestly, I can't stand to hear him cry like that –

"Keep going, Ella," Sinclair murmurs, smirking at me and laying the baby down in his bath. "Let him cry a little for once he's the happiest baby in the world, it doesn't mean you're doing anything wrong." Then, as I begin to strip out of my clothes, Sinclair takes off Rafe's little outfit as well, tossing it into the hamper.

"You know," I sigh, watching the little pieces of baby clothing disappear into the basket, "he'll probably be too big to wear those by the time they're clean. He grows like crazy."

"Damn straight he does," Sinclair says, tickling Rafe's naked belly, proud, as he turns on the warm water and prepares to start bathing him. Rafe still fusses unhappily but reaches for his father's finger, wanting to hold it.

My heart breaks with how damn cute it is, seeing them together, before I turn and start the water in the shower for myself. I continue talking to Sinclair as I climb into the hot stream, relishing the feel of it against my tired muscles.

"I talked to Cora about the wedding," I call over my shoulder, starting to shampoo my hair. "I don't think she's into it, Dominic. I'm sorry."

"That's disappointing," he replies. "But yeah, Roger told me pretty much the same thing."

"Are you mad?" I ask, turning to see his reaction, and Sinclair shoots me a little look of disbelief.

"Of course I'm not mad, Ella –"

I laugh a little, shaking my head and turning away to rinse the shampoo from my hair. "That's not what I mean I know that you'd never be mad at them for wanting a different kind of mating ceremony. But...does it mess up your plans at all? For the coronation, and the coronation weekend?"

"It does a little," he calls to me. As I soap my body, I smile to see him taking a washcloth and using it to gently clean the baby, making soft, warm noises to little Rafe as he does. Rafe, tired, lets his father know his protest, but my heart swells with the patience I see in my mate as he washes his baby, explaining softly to him that he's sorry he has to take a bath so late at night, but mommy got him all filthy doing her humanitarian projects –

I laugh when I hear Sinclair's commentary and flick a little water from the shower at him, which makes Sinclair turn to me with a grin.

"Will you be able to fill the time at the coronation?" I ask, soaping up my loofah and beginning to clean my body. "With some other activity, that might convince the humans and the wolves that we're united?"

"Probably," Sinclair says to me, giving Rafe a final rinse. "But...let's see if she can't be persuaded, Ella," he says, reaching for a towel and then lifting the baby out of his tiny tub and wrapping him up and turning to me. "I have a feeling that when Cora sees what you've got planned for her, she's going to be swept away."

I grin at him as I, too, rinse myself off and warp a towel around my body. "How do you know what I've got planned?"

"You're not the only one up late at night," he murmurs, carrying my warm, clean baby over to me. "Sometimes I see what you do."

“And sometimes,” I say, grinning up at him as I take Rafe from him, wanting him close again. Rafe immediately quiets when he’s in my arms again, which pleases me to no end. ”

Sometimes you just snore endlessly, keeping Rafe and I up for hours – ” “Lies,” he snaps, smiling a little as he takes my chin between his thumb and forefinger and turns my face up to him.

“You like it when I snore. Reminds you that a strong, powerful Alpha is sleeping next to you, ready to rip your enemies to shreds – ”

I bite my lip a little, grinning up at him because...well, honestly, I do like that. I like that quite a bit.

“I’m not sure I need the snoring to remind me of that,” I murmur, stepping closer to him, feeling a little heat build in my core as I stare up into his beautiful, rugged face.

“And what would remind you of that,” he murmurs, his eyes flashing with hunger.

“Oh,” I whisper. “I have an idea. Or two. Or ten.”

Chapter 422 – Wedding prep

Cora

“Ella,” I sigh, turning to my sister, who is standing behind me with her hands clutched together, tears rimming her eyes, not breathing because she’s trying so hard not to burst into tears

“You look so beautiful!” she squeaks, and I can’t help but laugh because she looks like a little cartoon character, standing there, completely undone by the sight of me in a wedding gown.

“Ells!” I laugh, taking a few steps towards her and reaching out my hands. “You can’t do this for every new dress!”

“But you look so differently beautiful in each one!” she shouts, and then a sob breaks from her and she burries her face in her hands, letting loose. I burst into laughter at this, raising my own hands to my cheeks and taking a deep breath.

“I’m sorry! I can’t help it!” she cries and I just shake my head, pulling my hands away and smiling as I turn to look at myself in the mirror.

I mean, she’s not wrong – I look damn good in this sparkling white gown that hugs my body all the way to the floor and then spreads out behind me in a beautiful beaded train. But honestly – Ella is so much more sentimental than me. She has gotten choked up at every single one I’ve tried on so far – and they’re all beautiful but ...I’m just not having the same reaction as she is.

“You don’t like it?” she gasps, scurrying to my side and meeting my eyes in the mirror. “But Cora – you look amazing – you look so romantic-

“I know, Ella!” I say, turning and putting a hand on her shoulder. “But I think the problem is that I’m not I’m not very romantic! You are, for sure, but-”

“Ohhh,” she says, frowning and swatting my hand away, “you are too romantic. You confessed your love for Roger in a rain storm! He swept you off your feet and carried you inside! You – ”

“Okay,” I say, raising my hands as I give in, “I will admit that that part of our story is romantic – ”

“And you conceived your little baby that very night!”

“Okay! I’m a romance novel heroine! You’ve got me!” I laugh, “But Ella! I never craved any of that – I’ve never, ever been the girl who thinks about her wedding day, or what her first dance would be. This just...means less to me, than it does you."

"But then why do you care if we do it?" she asks, wiping away her tears. "Why don't you just throw you a wedding, if it doesn't matter?"

"Because the mating does matter," I murmur, turning back to smile at myself in the mirror. My wolf raises her sleepy head inside me and gives a little yip of confirmation, making my smile deepen. I run a mental hand over her fur, letting her know not to worry that I'm not giving in.

"Okay," Ella sighs, standing close to me and putting her head on my shoulder as we both stare at me in the mirror. "But you should keep this dress anyway. Roger is going to flip when he sees you in it."

"I know, right?" I murmur, turning and admiring the way the dress hugs my curves.

My sister squeals a little, throwing her arms around my shoulders. "See! You do like it!"

I laugh with her. "I always liked it," I shrug. "I just..."

"I get it," she says, nodding. "But let's keep the dress. Just in case. And... maybe the ballgown too?" She gives me a big grin in the mirror, because I know that one was her favorite, even if this one is mine.

"Whatever you want," I say with a sigh and a shrug. "It's on the Sinclair dime anyway."

"Yeah, let's bankrupt 'em" Ella says, grinning and hopping away from me to move towards one of the poor stylists in the corner who has had to put up with her new queen's hysterics while watching me try on twenty gowns. But while Ella speaks quietly with the stylists, probably purchasing four or five of the gowns just to have options, I turn to shake my head at myself in the mirror.

Because this...this just isn't right.

And suddenly, quite suddenly, I know precisely what I want to do. Before Ella can come back, I slip behind the little dressing screen and take off the dress, folding it carefully and putting on the outfit that I came in. When I come out one of the stylists comes over to take the gown from me.

"Um," I say softly, glancing over at Ella, who is still consulting. "Can you have this one sent to me, at my house? And...not tell her?"

"Uh," the woman says, hesitant, because she knows it's Ella paying not me.

“I promise she won’t be mad,” I say, assuring her. “And if she gives you any heat about it, you can tell her it was me. I promise it will be all right, but...could you please do this? Just between you and me?”

The woman hesitates but then lets out a sharp breath and smiles at me, nodding. “Sure,” she says. “I...I can do that.”

And then, with a new spring in my step and an idea in my head, I go to give my sister a kiss goodbye. Because I’ve got work to do.

Roger exhales with exhaustion when he comes through the door that night. He hangs his head as he presses the door shut and takes a deep breath, clearly transitioning from work to home life and having trouble clearing his mind.

I suddenly feel very, very guilty and take a step back, trying to like...melt into the shadows or something. I don’t know.

But Roger – with his wolf hearing – instantly snaps his head to me.

“Cora?” he asks, cocking his head to the side as he sees me standing in the living room, fully dressed with my shoes on, standing next to two tiny suit cases and a certain white box wrapped in a silver bow. “What...what are you doing?”

“Um...” I say, hesitating and trying to come up with an excuse. Because he’s so tired we don’t have to do this tonight, we can just wait until tomorrow

God, I’m so dumb, I should have texted him before – I should have checked to see if he was up for it –

“Can’t a girl just...stand in her living room?” I finish lamely, tucking my hands behind my back and giving him a too-innocent smile?

“No,” he says, smirking and advancing slowly towards me, his shoulders rolling back like the predator he is. “She can’t, when she’s you, and you’re always tucked up in bed watching Greys Anatomy at this hour. And when you’ve packed two suitcases.”

“Those are just decorative,” I say dismissively, raising my chin but unable to resist smiling too. God, he’s just so good looking. “I’m trying something new. But what I’m getting from you is that it’s not working as a style concept, suitcases in the living room. Notes taken! I’ll fix it in the morning.”

“Cora,” he growls, coming close enough to snatch me by the waist and pull me tight against him. I laugh as he does, loving it-loving him. “What are you doing? What’s going on?”

“Nothing,” I murmur, smiling as I look down and place my hands on his chest. “It doesn’t matter – you’re so tired – ”

“Hey,” he says, putting a finger under my chin and lifting my face so he looks into my eyes. “I want to know.”

“Well,” I say, biting my lip and looking up at my gorgeous mate, who I love so, so dearly. And I tap the little bond inside of us, the one that’s just between his heart and mine. And I let him see my love, and my excitement, and that I’m...I’m ready.

I see his face change in a minute as he begins to understand.

“Well, Roger?” I say, grinning up at him. “What would you say if I asked you to elope with me tonight?”

He stares at me for a moment, shocked and thrilled, and then he gives a whoop of happiness as he moves faster than I can see, sweeping my legs out from under me and making me laugh recklessly as he spins me in a circle.

“Hell yes, Cora,” he whispers down to me after we’ve turned three times, his face bright with his smile. “Absolutely. Let’s go. Right now.”

Chapter 423 – Run Away Bride

Cora

As Roger drives down the dark highway, I type out a quick message to Ella on my phone: Hey! I'm going to be MIA for a couple of days. Roger and I are taking some time to ourselves. I'm sorry to leave you hanging with all the work we have to do at the camps will you forgive me?

I bite my lip anxiously when I press send and stare at my phone, waiting for the reply.

"Quit that," Roger says, glancing at me.

"What?" I ask.

"Worrying about it," he says, giving a little shrug. "She's not your boss, Cora."

"Yeah well, Dominic is your boss," I point out, raising my eyebrows. "Did you even text him?"

"Nah," he says, grinning broadly. "I'll let Ella break it to him and just face his wrath when we come back."

"If we come back," I say, sufficiently relaxed by his encouragement and leaning back against my chair. "Who knows. Maybe we'll like eloping so much that we just...stay."

"I encourage this," Roger says, laughing. "Thoroughly. We can probably assume new identities, just completely abandon our lives and our responsibilities."

I laugh at the idea and look at the window, the thrill and excitement of elopement still rushing through me. "Yeah, but then we won't get to see Rafe grow up. And little no-name here won't have his best friend." I run my hand passively over my stomach, sending a little pulse of happy down the bond to the baby so that he can feel my excitement along with me. But he doesn't send anything back – probably asleep. Or whatever.

Who knows, with these magical mystery babies Ella and I have. "About that," Roger says, glancing at me again. "Do you have ideas? For names, for the baby?"

I turn to him, surprised. "Do you know? I actually...don't."

Roger laughs at me, shaking his head. "Let me guess. Ella had her names picked out from childhood, and you never thought about it once."

"Hit the nail on the head, Sinclair," I say, winking at him, making him laugh. "It's almost like you've met us or something...uncanny."

He laughs again and then we let the moment sit for a while before he speaks again.

"Well, I have some thoughts," he says quietly.

"Really?" I say, sitting up straight and looking at him eagerly. "You have ideas?"

"I'm not stone, Cora," he says, smirking and tossing me a little glare. "I think about our child, and his future, and what I'd prefer to call him. Or not to call him."

"Okay," I say, grinning. "What names are off the list, then?"

"Edgar," he says, immediate, and I burst into laughter.

"Why Edgar?"

"Because," he says, serious. "Any name with 'gar' in it is mean to a little kid. And I knew someone named Edgar growing up and he was...a dick."

I laugh harder at this, agreeing. "All right, Edgar's off the list. What's on it?"

He hesitates for a second and I reach out, shoving his shoulder a little. "Tell me!"

"No," he says, sitting back and putting on his most stubborn expression. "You'll accuse me of being sentimental. I want this to be a discussion, so you have to come up with some too. And then we'll decide together."

"Roger," I say, rolling my eyes but unable to keep myself from smiling at my secretly-sweet mate. "That's the most sentimental idea I've ever heard so much more sentimental than just telling me the names you like."

"Well then give this discussion to me as a mating gift," he says, nodding. "I get to make that request at least, don't I?"

"Oh, sure," I say, sighing happily. "Whatever the groom wants on his wedding day – that's what they say, isn't it?"

He glares at me a little, making me laugh, and then we continue our journey into the night. Roger reaches out and takes my hand as we drive quickly towards the coast, giving my palm a squeeze and passing his excitement to me along the bond.

And I pass it back to him, letting him know that I'm just teasing – and that I'm all worked up about this too, feeling sentimental and excited and thrilled. Even if I haven't been looking forward to this evening for my whole life? I can't wait for it now.

“What do you think?” I whisper as Roger and I step out of the car and look at the tiny little beach cottage sitting before us. It’s lit from within by warm yellow light – I had the owner come and open it up for us so that it would be cozy when we got here. The whole house is probably as big as our living room and kitchen put together, but when I saw it online it was just so adorable that...

Well. I knew it was perfect.

“It’s perfect,” Roger says, turning to grin at me over the roof of the car. I smile right back at him, so pleased that he feels precisely as I do.

Then, without another word, we both spring into action – Roger going to the trunk to get our bags and me moving to the door of the little bungalow with the white box under my arm, punching in the code to unlock it. When Roger joins me at the threshold, I push the door open and we step inside.

“Oh,” I say, my hands going immediately to my mouth as I stare into the prettiest, tiniest little beach house that I’ve ever seen. There’s a little kitchen space off to our left, and a sofa off to the right, but the majority of the house is the bedroom directly ahead.

“Wow,” Roger says, and I look up to see him blinking in surprise. I grin and follow his gaze to the beautiful bed decked out with white linens and beyond it the wall of windows that looks directly out onto the beach, and beyond that, the ocean. “Wow, Cora,” he says again, and I look up to see him smiling down at me.

“Do you like it?”

“I love it,” he murmurs, wrapping an arm around my shoulders. “Do you know what it reminds me of?”

“Yes,” I say, laughing a little.

He lowers his face to mine, nudging my nose with his, urging me to say it.

“My dreamscape,” I whisper, my face breaking into a big smile. Because even though that bed was directly on the beach with no house or facilities around it...well. We’re corporeal now, and we need a kitchen and a bathroom and a roof.

But everything else? I knew it the moment I saw the pictures. It’s so precisely like I dreamed it would be that you’d think I’d created it myself.

“Come on,” Roger says, leading me into the house so we can have a better look around. He peeks into all the corners his Alpha training of course immediately going into protection mode, making sure we're safe – as I go directly to the back wall and press the windows open. To my delight, they turn out to be not windows but doors that fold completely open so that the whole wall opens directly onto the beach.

Eager, I press them all back and then lean against the wall, looking out over the sand at the ocean stretching out before us.

A few moments later my mate comes up behind me, wrapping his arms around my waist and pulling me back against him, lowering his face to my hair and inhaling my scent. I reach one arm up behind me and wrap my hand around the back of his neck, feeling the softness of his skin against my palms, loving the way the short hairs at the base of his head brush against my fingertips.

“So, is it everything you were looking for, Mrs. Sinclair?” he murmurs to me and I smile, a little shiver going through me to hear the name. My name.

“It’s everything I never knew I wanted,” I whisper back, feeling so happy and complete that I can hardly bear it. And then I turn in my mate’s arms, and tilt my head back to look at him, and I smile.

And my mate bends down a little, shifting his arms so that they move from my waist to just below my rear, and then he tightens his arms and stands up straight, taking me with him. I laugh then, running my hands through his hair and kissing him. After a long moment, he pulls back, just half an inch. “To bed?”

But slyly, I shake my head and wiggle. “Put me down. I want to...do something.”

Curious, Roger puts me on the ground and I grab the white box off the bed, grinning. Then, I point to the little iron fireplace next to the bed. “Will you light that?” I ask.

He nods to me, just once, and then watches me as I disappear with the box into the bathroom.

Because I might be a wolf in my soul, but...I want one part of this to be human. So as Roger lights a fire I untie the silver ribbon on the box.

And lift out my wedding dress.

Chapter 424 – The Mark

“Well that’s weird,” I murmur, looking through my phone as my mate sits shirtless beside me, finishing up the last of his paperwork before bed.

“What’s weird,” he asks, though I can tell he’s only half paying attention. But I frown, looking at the message from Cora. “Cora says she’s going away with Roger for a few days.”

“What?” he asks, his head swiveling to me, his voice instantly more alert. Then he snatches his own phone off the bedside table. “That can’t be right,” he says, flicking through his messages. Roger didn’t say anything to me.”

“Well, whatever,” I say, giving a little shrug. “They can take some time for themselves –

“Ella,” Sinclair sighs, and I look over at him in surprise. “We’re planning a coronation and trying to run a country. I’m depending on him to be here!”

I frown at him and shake my head a little. “Don’t be so unromantic, Dominic,” I scold. “They’re in love, they’re going to have a baby. Plus, Cora looked amazing in the wedding dresses today – I think I’m going to be able to talk her into that wedding. If they do that for us, why wouldn’t we let them have a few days away?”

“Did she say that she was going to do it?” he asks, raising his eyebrows at me.

“Nope!” I say, smiling as I start to type a reply on my phone. “She said to forget about it.”

“What!?”

“Don’t stress,” I say, laughing and glancing at him again. “I know her! I think she’s gonna say yes. We should move forward with the plans.”

Sinclair just groans and shakes his head, typing his own message out probably to his brother. I concentrate on my own.

That’s fine, Cora! Take whatever time you need. Don’t worry about the camps Isabel, Hank, and I can hold it down. Will fill you in whenever you get back xoxo.

That done, I look quickly over at the baby to make sure that he’s still sleeping – and I smile to see that he is before curling up next to my mate, resting my head against his chest and giving him a little kiss there as he finishes his message to Roger and presses send.

“Did you yell at him?” I ask.

“Yup,” he replies before tossing his phone aside and wrapping his arm around me. “Okay well don’t yell at Cora,” I murmur, getting sleepy. “That’s my job.”

“You got it,” he replies.

We’re silent for a long moment before Sinclair clears his throat. I open my eyes, surprised, before looking up at him. “What is it?” I ask. Because I know him – I know that he’s exhausted, and that we both need to catch what sleep we can.

So, if Sinclair is clearing his throat, wanting to talk about one last thing before bed?

Something’s up.

“Ella...” he says, hesitating. “I want you to trust me when I tell you what I have to say.” I sit up fully now, frowning down at him.

“Tell me,” I demand, getting suddenly anxious. “Right now.”

“Come back down here,” he says, pulling at my shoulder. But I just shake my head at him, frowning, my anxiety getting worse.

“Not until you tell me.”

“Ella,” he says, his voice low with warning.

“Dominic!”

He just glares at me for a long moment before he realizes that I’m not going to give in, and then he closes his eyes for a second, steeling himself. “Ella, we got word from the Atalaxians today. They...they want to send a delegation to the coronation.”

“What!?” I gasp, appalled.

“All the other neighboring nations are coming,” he says quickly, “sending a delegation if not their royals themselves. It would be an incredible insult not to invite the Atalaxians as well.”

“Wait,” I say, putting out a finger to stop him. “Am I hearing you right? Not only are they coming, but you invited those bigots!? Into our HOME!?”

“Ella,” he growls, snapping his eyes open and swiping at my finger, knocking it away.

“We had to extend the invitation – it would have been such an obvious act of aggression if we didn’t – ”

I scoff, thinking that perhaps the Atalaxians need a little aggression in their lives, and start to move away from Sinclair, kicking away the blankets. But before I can get far, I hear him snarl and then feel him wrap his arm around my waist and tug me, hard, back to him.

I let out a little yelp of surprise as Sinclair levers himself over me, swiftly gathering both of my wrists in one of his hands and lifting them over my head before using his body to pin me to the mattress.

“What!” I gasp, and then I frown up at him, angry. “What are you doing!? Get off of me, Dominic!”

“Not a chance, little queen,” he murmurs, glaring down at me, a little darkness in his eyes. “I’m starting to think that you need a little reminder of who is the Alpha in this relationship, and the King in this nation,” he says, firm.

I glare up at him, wriggling a little beneath him, but he holds firm. “I’m allowed to have my opinions!” I snap, starting to get pissed. “I don’t have to agree with everything you say and do!”

“You do not have to agree with it,” he growls, bringing his face close to mine. “But you do have to support it, little mate. We need to present a united front.”

I open my mouth to protest but he silences me with a look. Bitter, I close my mouth.

“There,” he says, slow, satisfied. “I listen to you, Ella,” he continues softly. “I appreciate your input, but this is serious. I cannot have you second- guessing my decisions. I am doing what I know right for both of us – for our family. And you need to trust me.”

I clench my jaw as I stare up at him for a second, but then something in me gives. I turn my attention to my wolf then, seeing her pressing herself close to the ground even as a little grumble rolls in her chest – because even if she doesn’t like it, she respects our mate’s dominance.

And she trusts him. Trusts that he will fight for us, and care for us, and never make a decision that will put us in jeopardy.

And as I see her submit, I know that it’s right. I lift my chin, staring directly into my mate’s eyes, letting him feel my submission down the bond even as my face tells him that I’m not happy about it.

Just the corner of Sinclair’s mouth pulls into a tiny smile as he lowers his face and brushes his lips briefly against mine. And then he takes his other hand, the one not pinning my wrists above my head, and runs it down the length of my flank, dipping down to grip my ass in his palm.

“See? When you do as I say...there are rewards.”

I can't help it then when my eyes flutter shut when I feel him squeeze my ass, taking control of my body. My head falls back a little bit, baring my neck to him. Sinclair takes immediate advantage of this, pressing his mouth eagerly to my pulse, licking my skin, letting his teeth rasp sharp against my flesh. And I moan as he lets his body press closer against me, letting me feel the weight of him pinning me down.

He growls at the sound of me moaning, hungry for it, loving it. And I I love it too – because as stubborn as I can be, there is something so good about it – something perhaps biological about submitting to my Alpha that makes me want to cede him complete control.

“Say it,” he growls, moving his hand slowly up the length of my body, over my breast and across my neck until he takes my face in his hand and turns it towards him so that I can feel his breath against my lips.

“I submit,” I groan, feeling pleasure shudder through me as I feel the length of him straining against the fabric of his underwear, pressing hard and insistent against my entrance. “I trust you, Dominic – I – I know you're doing this for us. For all of us.”

And he growls has assent before slipping his free hand down his own body, pressing his boxer briefs down so that he can free himself. Then, when I'm panting for want of him, he presses himself into me, filling me so completely that a moan breaks from my throat when I feel him slide against all of the aching parts inside of me that want all of him, more of him, all the time.

“Good girl,” he murmurs before pressing his mouth to mine and claiming me – claiming all of me as his before we lose ourselves to each other. And I give myself willingly, trusting him completely, as I know he does me. My Alpha, my mate.

Chapter 425 – Under the Moon

Cora

After I dress, I surprise myself by feeling a little shy as I reach for the door to the bathroom to go back to the tiny bedroom where Roger's waiting for me.

Because, I mean, it's no secret why we're here. And Roger's not stupid – he probably figured out what I was doing when I went into the bathroom with a big white box.

But still – it's always something, isn't it? Anticipating what it might be like when the man you love sees you in your wedding dress for the first time. And as I think it, quite suddenly, I can't wait.

I pull the bathroom door open and step back into the bedroom, my eyes instantly going to Roger, standing by the open doors to the beach, the ocean air lifting his hair lightly in the breeze.

And, as I knew they would be, his eyes are already on me. Because he was waiting. And my face bursts into a grin as his expression goes slack.

I feel it all down the bond, which is open to me right now. His awe, and his pride – his love, his desire, the overwhelming swell of pleasure that comes from seeing how beautiful he thinks I look right now on this night – in this dress

"Cora," he says, the sound of my name rough as it works its way from his tight throat. But it's the only word he can manage, lifting a hand to cover his mouth and shaking his head at me, just staring.

I turn a little so that I'm facing him completely, still smiling so hard my face might start aching if I keep this up for much longer.

"So, you like it?" I ask, twisting a little so that he can see more of the dress, see how the beadwork catches the light of the fire and makes the dress look incandescent in the glowing dark of this little bedroom.

He just stares at me for a moment before a little growl rumbles in his chest, his only answer. And I burst out laughing and cross the room to him, holding my hands out.

Roger takes my hands as I come around the bed, using them to pull me closer so that he can slide his hands over my body, feeling the intricacies of the dress for himself, as well as the contrast it presents to the bare skin of my back, my arms. He lowers his face to mine, kissing me softly as he traces his fingertips down the length of my spine, sending shivers all through me.

Then, slowly, he pulls away and takes a step back. "I don't know what I want I can't pick – do I want you close, so I can keep my hands on you? Or far away, so I can see again how beautiful you look? God, Cora – this dress was made for you – "

I wrinkle my nose and smile up at him, terribly pleased. "I'm glad you like it," I murmur, wrapping my arms around his waist. "I liked it too. Ella made me try on like, a thousand. But this was the one I liked best."

"Well, it's perfect," he sighs. "It's just a shame that I'm going to have to rip it to shreds when I tear it off your body in like, thirty seconds..."

I gasp and pull away, my hands defensively clutching the dress at my chest. "Roger! Don't you dare!"

"I don't know, Cora," he murmurs, shaking his head at me and closing the distance between us again, hungry. "I don't know if I'm going to be able to help it. How did you even get this thing on, anyway? I'm never going to have the patience for like, a thousand tiny pearl buttons – "

"There is one zipper," I say, swatting at him. "And you will respect the dress! It is precious to me! I -"

And then I hesitate, blushing, because I myself now am on the verge of saying something very sentimental.

"What," Roger says, his mouth quirking up as he senses it. "Tell me."

"No," I say, laughing and looking down, shaking my head.

"Cora," he says, a warning and a command in his voice. And, while those don't usually do anything for me I have no real intention of letting Roger be the boss of our lives, like Ella and Sinclair – his gentle fingers under my chin, turning my face up to him, persuade more completely. "Please. I want to know."

"Well," I say, quiet, staring up at my gorgeous mate, "I never had a mom with a wedding dress to hand down to me. And if we ever have a daughter..."

A tiny, strangled little groan escapes his throat then – not of frustration, or of annoyance, or anything like that. But simply because he can't help it, because he, too, is a little undone at the sweetness of the idea.

A daughter, one day, getting married, in a dress like this. And suddenly, as I look up at him, I know that we're both thinking the same thought: that we have so much life ahead of us, and so much joy, and neither of us can wait a single second longer to get started.

Roger takes my face in his hands and he kisses me, slowly, sweetly, but with the full force of his commitment to me, to us, and to our future. It sweeps through me and I press myself close against him, my hands wrapped in the fabric of his shirt, tugging him close.

Roger begins to move backwards then, slowly guiding me to the bed, but as I realize the direction of his intentions I pull away, glancing towards the doors.

“No?” he asks, a little confused.

“Um,” I say, realizing a conviction that I didn’t know I had within me until this very moment. And then I look back up into his eyes. “I think we have to go outside for this.”

“What?” he asks, confused. “Cora, there’s nothing that says – ”

“No,” I say, shaking my head, utterly convinced. “Please – I...I’m sure of it.”

And then he laughs a little, not really understanding but not caring much. He gives a quick shrug and then turns to the bed, yanking the duvet off the top and wrapping it into a ball. Then, he passes it to me. Confused, I take it, but as soon as I do Roger dips down, wrapping one arm around my back and using the other to scoop me up beneath my knees, lifting me up into his arms in one swift motion.

I’m laughing too now, enjoying every minute of it, and I nod towards the beach, and the sea, and the sky – knowing, for some reason, that we have to do this out there.

“All right, little demigoddess,” Roger murmurs, his lips close to my ear now. “Under your mother’s moonlight, as you will it.” And then he carries me out into the sand, which as he says well-lit by the full moon above. is

“Oh,” I say, looking up into the sky. ” Do you think that’s it? Because something is... calling me, if that’s the right way to say it. Not even a tug, just an instinct.”

“I think mating ceremonies happened under the moon a lot in years past,” he says, stopping when we’re surrounded by sand on all sides, much closer now to the sea than to the little house, which shines like a happy beacon in the distance. “But, considering who your mom is...I think maybe she wants to see it.”

I smile at him as he puts me down on my feet, my toes singing a bit to touch the sand. I love the beach – always have.

“Well, that’s very romantic,” I say, looking up at the moon. “Plus, we need a witness.”

“Nah,” Roger says, shaking his head and taking the blanket from my hands, shaking it out and spreading it out in a crisp rectangle on the sand. "Mating ceremonies – they don't need witnesses, unless you want them. They speak for themselves. Once you have my mark it is...just known, I guess."

A little shiver runs through me at the thought of it, my wolf beginning to pant eagerly in anticipation. She's been wanting this for a long time, I know, and frustrated me for continuing to put it off.

But...I was right. Because this moment? It's so perfect that I wouldn't have wanted his mark in any other place, any other time, any other way.

Roger holds out a hand to me, and I smile and take it, and then we step forward onto the blanket, moving to the center.

And then, to my surprise, Roger goes to his knees. I don't ask questions though, instead simply following suit, turning so that I face him, our hands loosely clasped between us, our knees touching.

I smile up at my mate, who looks so incredibly gorgeous in the moonlight, with the night air blowing between us. And he smiles right back at me, shaking his head a little in wonder. Then he sets his shoulders, his face turning serious.

"I take you, Cora," he says, his voice low and soft. "As my love and my mate, for the rest of our lives and whatever comes next. I promise you the protection of my body and the warmth of my spirit. I will hold you close on dark nights and bright days. I love you, quite simply, forever. I am yours and you are mine."

Something burns warm in me at that, a bright and golden thing wrapping itself around that bond that already exists between us – his promise, made true, strengthening it.

Roger smiles at me, gentle. "Your turn," he whispers.

Chapter 426 – Cora’s Promise

Cora

I smile up at my mate, but I shake my head a little bit, not...not knowing what to do next. “Do I...,” I say, laughing a little, “just say what you said?”

“You can,” he replies, shrugging one shoulder and smiling back at me. I can feel his happiness vibrating down our bond. “Or, you can say what you want. There are no wrong answers, Cora.”

“Okay,” I say softly, and then I take a moment to consider, sitting up straight and squaring my shoulders.

“I take you, Roger,” I say softly, gazing into his perfect face. “Even though...I never expected you. I take you because you challenge me, and you hold space for me, and because...” I hesitate now, trying to find words for it. But he waits, patient, listening.

“Because you make me feel like the world is a rich and wonderful place worth exploring. And I want to do that I want to see it all, experience it all, at your side. I love you, Roger,” I continue, my eyes starting to line with tears, “because you make me brave.” My voice starts to crack now with my emotion, and he falters a bit, leaning forward, taking my cheek in his palm. I laugh a little, leaning into it but I shake my head, because I’m not finished.

“So, I promise to love you through all of it – through our whole lives, and whatever comes. But with you? I have... just so much faith that it will all be good. I love you, Roger – I am yours, and you are mine, and I think – I think it’s been that way for a long time. It just took us a little longer to figure out.”

He laughs then, and nods to me, and I feel that same golden warmth again, doubled this time, as my own promise wraps around our bond and becomes true, real, solid.

I can feel it now, singing between us, our fated mating bond ringing with our very real acceptance of it. And now the only thing that’s left is the mark.

My wolf turns an eager circle in me, lifting her face to the sky with a deep and eager howl. And Roger’s – I can feel his wolf prowl forward.

He claims me then, my mate reaching across the distance between us like he can’t wait a moment longer to have his body against me. Roger pulls me to him, his arms around me in the instant that his mouth meets mine, kissing me with a rough determination that I very much want, and need.

I again fist my hands in his shirt, turning to pull him on top of me as I lay myself down on the blanket, chills running all through my body as my mouth opens fully to him, as his tongue dips in to press against mine

Roger's hands are intent now, one pressing me close to him as his breath sharpens, the other sliding to the center of my dress at the back, finding the top of the zipper and dragging it slowly down. His mouth follows the direction of his hand, moving from my lips to my jaw, my neck, and then further down as he presses the wedding gown down away from my body so that it settles on my hips.

"Come back," I breathe, panting, wanting him again, and my mate complies, bringing his face back to mine and kissing me again as his hand pushes the dress further. I lift my hips, allowing it to slide completely off, to rest in a heap at the edge of the blanket.

A little frantic now with wanting him, my hands shake as they work at the buttons of his shirt. But he just growls and takes his face from mine for a second, tugging the shirt up over his shoulders and tossing it away.

The wind picks up around us, the breeze stiffening as my mate pulls me against the warm skin of his chest, his hand drifting down the naked expanse of my back to take a firm grip on my ass. He groans then, his head turning away almost as if he can't help it, his whole body clenching with want.

My hands move again, almost of their own accord as Roger brings his mouth again to my neck, his teeth bared now, running over my skin in a way that makes me shudder, hard – because I know – I know how badly he wants to sink those teeth in there, just there now-

I fumble at his belt, at the button at the top of his pants, but I'm so distracted-

"Fuck, Cora," he breathes, and suddenly I'm surprised to feel myself lifted, twisting against him as he sits flat on his ass with my knees on either side of his hips, my stomach pressed almost against his face as he moves one hand to his clothing, hastily breaking the button and the zipper of his pants as he forces them down. Roger turns his face to look up at me as he kicks the pants off, shaking his head a little. "Please," he begs, desperate, "I can't – I can't wait any longer – "

I breathe his name and bring my mouth again to his as I let my body slide down against him, as I feel him position the hard mass of himself at the apex of my thighs and then, slow, insistent, press inside of me as I lower myself down onto him.

I moan, hard, into Roger's mouth as I feel him fill me – as I feel my inner walls stretch against him, squeezing him, wanting him. My eyes press shut as my back curves unbidden, as my hips begin to pulse against him.

Roger's own groan as he slowly seats himself fully in me has me shuddering with the pleasure of it, with how perfectly he fits me, with how – how deep he goes-

Roger begins to pulse with me now, each steady thrust of his hips sending his hard cock deeper, pressing against that building intensity within me.

Roger goes slow, indulging, letting it build in me as the minutes pass. And then, when I know that I'm close, and I can feel him shaking beneath me, wanting his release as much as I want mine, I moan, my whole body shuddering now as I concentrate everything on that point, on him my mate. I lean myself forward, tucking my head next to his, baring my throat to him.

"There, little mate," he growls, wrapping his fingers in the hair at the base of my neck and pulling – not harshly, but no, not gentle so that my neck and shoulder stretch open before him. He presses a kiss there as our hips continue to work together, bringing me closer closer

And then he licks the spot between my shoulder and neck, the place of his intent and I moan, and shudder, my whole body starting to shake as I –

As I come so close, as I start to want it to badly I could scream –

"Ask me for it," he murmurs, pressing his sharp teeth just to the edge of my flesh.

"Please," I beg, hardly able to form the words – "give me your mark, Roger I want it -"

Another low growl as he thrusts, hard, up into me and then, a moment later, sinks his teeth into my skin. Everything, everything seems to explode within me – around me.

The air whips around us suddenly and the earth – I swear it shifts and shakes in time with the sharp gasp and the steady moans that pulse from me.

It intensifies, the shaking below us, the wind around us, as I feel Roger's body go rigid and clench as he finds his own end

And there's pain too, mixing with it, sharpening the waves of bliss and satisfaction that run through me, a sharp and salty edge that intensifies the pleasure as my head falls back, as I feel the warm rush of Roger's seed spreading inside of me –

As I feel his teeth lift from his bite, his mark-

And then the gentle press of his tongue against it, tenderly licking the blood that swells there. He holds me then, tight, for a few long moments as the wind dies down around us, catching his own ragged breath as I continue to shake and shudder against him.

As he comes back to himself, Roger begins to murmur soft things to me, pressing me against him and slowly laying backwards, turning his body so that mine comes to rest against the blanket, his stomach and chest pressed tight to mine

And I honestly don't know when I realize that I'm crying – sobbing, a little, with the intensity of it – with the joy, and the pleasure, and the completeness that I feel

“Cora,” he murmurs, his face close to mine, stroking my hair. “Are you are you all right?”

And I open my eyes, confused

And then laugh because – because his face is so worried “I'm fine, Roger,” I murmur, pulling him close and kissing him about a dozen times – “it was just really intense – well, you were there – ”

“It was incredible,” he murmurs against my lips, but then he pulls away again. “Does it are you hurt?”

I bite my lip a little, twisting to try to look at it but I can't quite see he marked me high, closer to my neck. than my shoulder – “it does hurt,” I say, telling him the truth. “But – not in a bad way, if that makes sense.”

He murmurs something in affirmation, the rumbling pleasure in his chest letting me know he understands as he nuzzles his face against mine.

I let my body collapse a bit now, exhausted after everything – after all of it – and Roger lays himself half on top of me, his head tucked close to mine. I kiss his forehead, catching my breath, and then turn my face up to the sky, opening my eyes.

And then, utterly shocked, I gasp.

Chapter 427 – A Mating Gift

“What?” Roger asks, going suddenly rigid and raising his head, his alpha instincts probably anticipating an attack of some kind “No,” I say, gaping up at the sky. ” Roger, look -”

And he turns to follow my gaze, his own mouth falling open as he sees. What looks like a thousand shooting stars cross the sky in a blink, one after the other, chasing each other across the blackness above the sea.

“Oh my god,” he murmurs, his head falling back as he stares upwards. Instinctually, I close the slight distance between us so that my body is pressed seamlessly against his, and I take his hand, and we both stare.

His body, like mine, is still thrumming with the joy of it – of the promises, the s3x, the marking, all of it – but this – the awe we both feel We’re both silent for a long time as we stare up at the sky, marveling.

“Cora,” Roger says after a long moment, turning his head to me a little but unable to tear his eyes away from the meteors that flash across the sky. ” Did you...do this?”

“What?” I ask, shocked.

“I mean,” he says slowly, “I’m pretty sure that you did the wind, and the earthquake –

“The what?” I gasp.

He turns to me for real now, a wide smile breaking out on his face as his eyes meet mine. “I mean, I know I’m good Cora, but you had to have noticed-

“An earthquake?”

“The ground shook, Cora! What did you think it was?”

“I thought it was just a – a little shake! Not an earthquake.”

“Well, yes, just a little one,” he replies, still laughing, giving me a tiny shrug. “I mean, I don’t think you levelled any cities – though, I mean, I can try harder next time – ”

It’s my turn to growl now, smacking him on the chest. “You don’t get to take credit for my gift, mate – ”

“I mean,” he growls, turning towards me and grabbing me by the waist, pulling me flush against him again, stomach to stomach, “I get some credit

I laugh again, kissing him, joy rippling through me as he kisses me back. But then he pulls away a bit, staring into my eyes for a long moment before glancing up at the sky again. "But seriously," he says, "do you think you did it?"

"I honestly don't know," I say, looking up again at the sky, where the meteors continue to streak, leaving behind their long tails of golden light. They're slower now, more patient, less a frantic rush of stars. Now they seem to take their time, wanting to put on a show. "I mean...that," I say, pointing up to them, "sort of matches how I feel. So," I shrug, "... maybe."

"Wind, rain, hail...now earthquake and meteor?" He raises his eyebrows, impressed, and I grin to see it. "Nobody'd better piss you off, Cora," he says, considering. "Or we'll get an asteroid and another species-ending event, like the dinosaurs."

"Yeah," I say, giving him a playful shove. "So, keep that in mind, sir."

He laughs, turning to me again and nudging his nose against mine. "Oh, I intend to piss you off every day," he murmurs, grinning. "I like taking you to bed when you're angry."

I snap my teeth at him then, making him laugh, inviting it. Because honestly, he doesn't piss me off – not really.

Roger not everyone gets him, but with me he walks a very fine line of teasing, bringing me right to the edge of my limits but never pushing too far. And me? Too-serious me? I need that in my life.

And he's right. It makes us great in bed.

"All right, little mate," I murmur, laughing and turning my head away so he can study his handywork on my neck. "What's it look like? Did you do good, or did you mess up and give me a sloppy mark?"

"Hmm," he says, raising his head to study it. "Nah, it's real pretty Cora. You'll like it. And I put it high, where everyone can see -"

I laugh at him then, spinning my head back, grinning. "Jealous," I accuse, narrowing my eyes playfully at him.

"Mmm, yes," he murmurs, dipping his head now to press a kiss to my collar bone. "I want everyone to know you're mine. Can you just start wearing a t-shirt that says 'hands off?'"

"Oh sure," I say, laughing harder now. "I'm sure that will go over really well with the humans we're trying to convince that we truly believe human and wolf kind are equals – for the only human in our little wolf family to start walking around in a t-shirt that says '

Property of Roger Sinclair.”

“Ohhh, I like this new wording,” he says, sitting up a little and grinning down at me. “I can get you one for each day of the week -”

I’m laughing harder now, shaking my head at him. “Only if you wear a matching one,” I reply, “pink, ‘ Property of Cora,’ emblazoned on the front and the back.”

“It would be helpful, honestly,” he says, his voice full of mischief as he brings his face again close to mine. “I already have to beat the women off with a stick – this will cut my job in half -”

I shriek then, smacking at him with my hand, “you shut up! You so do not have to turn women away – ”

“I do!” he insists, laughing harder now. “Seriously, every five minutes! Sorry, I’m a mated man sincere apologies, I know, it is a loss for womankind, to have a specimen like me off the dating market – ”

I growl then, even as I laugh, grabbing him tight and pulling him against me, letting my nails sink a bit into his skin. “You’re a liar,” I murmur, bringing my lips to his, “but if you push it, I really will make you wear the shirt. Because you’re mine, Roger Sinclair. And I’m not sharing.”

“Good, Cora Sinclair,” he murmurs before he kisses me, a long and sweeping kiss. “And neither am I.”

“Good,” I reply, closing my eyes and taking a deep breath, relaxing, bliss still running through me – deep and true.

Just then, I feel...a curious little tapping along my second bond and burst into a smile. Roger laughs again, glancing down towards my belly, and I know that he feels it too.

“Baby’s up,” I murmur.

“Probably the earthquake,” he replies, “hard to sleep through.”

I laugh again and send my own little feeling along the bond to the baby. Happy? Happy! Comes the response, making us both laugh.

“I wonder if this means that he’ll be a happy kid,” Roger murmurs, smiling with a deep content that I also feel, “or if he just...doesn’t have a very wide emotional range.”

“He’s just like, a tiny little thing right now!” I protest, putting a hand on my stomach. “He’s like, the size of a marble. He doesn't have room for any emotions beside happy. And it's not even like he knows the word – he's just telling us he's content."

"Well let's see what else we can make him do," Roger says, shifting himself lower so that his face is closer to my belly now.

I laugh at him, shaking my head but playing along. "He's not a Labrador, Roger," I murmur, "he doesn't do tricks." But my mate ignores me.

"Baby," he says, pitching his voice loud, which makes me laugh harder, because I know that this isn't how it works. The baby – he probably won't be able to hear anything outside my body until much further along in the pregnancy. But still, Roger is making me laugh, so I indulge him.

"Baby," Roger says, sending me a happy little glance, "I'm going to say some names, and I want you to tell me which one you like."

Giggling, I wait, but no response comes.

"I don't think he wants to play," I say, grinning down at my mate.

"Sure he does," Roger says, grinning up at me and then focusing on my stomach again. "Baby, what do you think of Edgar?"

We both wait, but nothing happens. I reach out my hand and Roger gives me his, his eyes still on my belly.

"Let's try it this way," I murmur. And then I close my eyes, and send the word along the bond, so that the baby and Roger can both hear it. Edgar?

There's a long pause...and nothing.

"Knew the kid had taste," Roger murmurs, proud.

"Okay, well, try one you actually like," I urge.

"Are you going to do it too?" he says, flashing his eyes up to me.

"I will," I say, squeezing his hand. "I promise. But mine are really good, so I'll give you first try so you feel like you had some say in it."

Roger laughs and then dips his head to kiss my stomach before passing another name along the line.

Chapter 428 – Names

Cora

Matthew? Roger tries, passing the name down the line to the baby and I grip his hand, and we both wait...

But nothing.

"The baby doesn't like the name Matthew," I whisper, laughing a little. "Well, it was just a starter," Roger murmurs, grinning at me again. "You try one."

"All right," I say, leaning my head back and taking a deep breath. And then I pass a name down, trying... Oliver.

"Oliver!?" Roger bursts out in disgust and I gasp, glaring at him.

"You are biasing our son!" I accuse, sitting up to smack him. "I said nothing when you said stupid Matthew!"

"Matty is a cute name" he protests, laughing and blocking my blow. "Oliver is the name of a sickly Victorian child who wants more gruel -"

I growl and lay back, taking a deep breath and gathering myself. "Well, let's see what the baby thinks," I murmur, sending Roger another glare. And then I try again, whispering Oliver? down the bond. But nothing comes back.

"Good baby," Roger murmurs, kissing my stomach again and making me laugh. "Don't let her call you that. It's terrible."

"Okay okay," I say, taking a deep breath. "Let's try one more."

"I'll pick it?" Roger asks.

"Sure," I reply, relaxing. "But this time, pick one you really, really like. One that you'd actually want him to be called – your favorite."

"Okay," he murmurs.

And then Roger passes another name down the bond, and I smile, because...

Because I love it.

And we wait...

And then both Roger and I gasp at the same time as we feel the baby respond.

Happy!

“Oh my god,” I say, laughing and sitting up as Roger snatches me to him, pulling me fast into his lap.

“Did we did we just -” he stares at me, thrilled. Laughing, elated, I take his face in my hands and kiss him, and kiss him, and kiss him.

Because...I think we just named the baby.

Roger and I stayed on that beach almost until the sun came up, and then we gathered up all of our sandy clothes and the blanket and trooped back to the house, where we closed the doors and slept for hours and ignored the whole world.

We woke up in the early afternoon to the owner of the bungalow tapping on the door, bringing us a basket of food so we could eat something, and Roger went to get it while I curled further up in bed, deciding that I was never, ever getting up.

Of course, I had to, eventually, because Roger wouldn't let me eat all my meals in bed, instead insisting that I come and sit with him on the couch for the elaborate dinner he made. Well, elaborate for Roger, who never learned to cook. But the spread of sandwiches and warmed soup and crackers he made was delicious, and certainly hit the spot.

We spent two more days like that, surviving on whatever the landlord brought us every day in baskets and otherwise laying in bed talking, making each other laugh, sending messages to the baby when he was awake to see what he'd do. And honestly, the baby never did much, but it made us laugh to do it.

And sex, obviously a great deal of that as well. But honestly, it blurred in with everything else we did, a usual part of the day as we napped, and went swim and laid out in the sun. The entire time it was just...so natural, and so easy. Just Roger and I simply together, away from the world.

And it was wonderful. But after the second day, we knew we had to get back – because as much as we like each other, we like our lives too.

“We'll do this again, yes?” Roger murmurs, pulling me close outside the little bungalow after we've packed and locked up. “Next week?”

I laugh and let him kiss me, let it sweep through me. “Maybe not next week. But soon.”

He nods, giving me another little peck, before looking around. "I really like this place. Maybe the owner will let us buy it," Roger murmurs, looking fondly at the bungalow.

"That's sweet, baby," I sigh, but then I put a hand on my stomach. "But, considering that this little guy is coming along? We're going to want more space."

"True" Roger says, his eyebrows raising. "And considering what the goddess said that night on the boat?..."

I break into a grin. "You're thinking more?"

"I'm thinking a bunch more," he nods, eager. "And I'm going to enjoy the process very much, Cora –"

"Oh, sure," I say, laughing and rolling my eyes, shoving him away a little bit. "You just make the babies, I'll grow them, and carry them, and then raise them"

He laughs, wrapping an arm around my shoulder as we head for the car. "Nah, I'm going to be a very involved dad. You'll see. You'll barely have to lift a finger."

"Good," I say, standing on my toes to kiss his cheek as he opens my car door for me. "Or, we can just pass them all off on Ella," I say, giving a shrug.

"She'd be into that?" Roger asks, loading our tiny luggage into the trunk before crossing to the driver's side.

"It would be her dream," I say, rolling my eyes and sitting down in the car, closing my door behind me as Roger climbs into his seat. "Ella, loaded up with four of her own kids and as many nieces and nephews as we can pass over to her to raise? She'd be in heaven."

"Sounds like a deal," he says, half serious and grinning at me as he buckles his belt and starts the car.

"I know," I say, smiling down at him and stroking my belly fondly. "We're lucky. We've got a good family."

"Good family," he agrees, "and only getting bigger and better." And then Roger kisses me on the cheek before we pull away from our cozy little dream bungalow and head home. As we pull closer to the city, though, I grimace a little, glancing between Roger and my phone.

"What is it?" he asks, noticing even my subtle movements.

“Um!” I reply, grimacing a little. “Have you...checked your phone at all? In the past two days?”

“No,” he says, frowning at me. “I knew that Dominic was just going to swamp me with a bunch of stuff I don’t want to think about, and that Ella would text you if anything bad happened. Why?”

I laugh a little, raising my eyebrows at him. “Well, apparently he’s pissed,” I say, grinning.

“Oh god,” Roger sighs, digging his phone out of the center console of the car where he apparently left it for the entire time we were gone. He hands it to me so I can assess while he drives, but when I tap the screen and press the buttons, nothing happens.

“You let it die!?” I ask, appalled.

“Well, it’s not like we can’t resuscitate it,” he murmurs, gesturing towards the chord coiled neatly in the little well beneath the dashboard. Laughing, I grab the chord and plug it in, waiting until the phone comes on. When it does, my eyes go wide.

“Ohhhh boy,” I say, flicking through the messages.

“That bad?” he asks, grimacing.

“Well, I think you should reroute the GPS,” I murmur, flicking through the dozens of messages. “Nothing like truly horrible happened or anything but ...yeah. He wants to see you. Now.”

“Well,” Roger sighs, glancing at me and switching lanes so that we can head to the palace instead of the house. “It was nice being mated to you, Cora.”

“Three days of bliss,” I say, pressing my lips together and pretending to be sad as I pat his knee.

“Remember me to the child,” he murmurs, taking the exit. “Tell him I was a good man.”

“Don’t make me lie to the baby, Roger,” I sigh, tucking his phone away and picking up mine so that I can text Ella and tell her we’re on our way. “I’ll tell him you were adequate, at best.”

Roger just laughs, as I knew he would, and takes my hand, giving it a little squeeze.

Chapter 429 – Breaking the News

I shriek when I hear the tap on the door, jumping up from the bed and dashing towards it, so excited to see my sister that I can't even think about moving slowly.

Behind me, I hear Sinclair stand up and give a little growl. Without even looking, I know he's standing with his arms across his chest, his feet wide apart, glaring at the door. But! That's Roger's problem. Not mine.

I fling the door open and immediately throw myself into my sister's arms. "Cora!" I shout, laughing. "I missed you!"

"It was two days, Ella!" she laughs, shaking her head and hugging me back.

"Three!" I insist, frowning at her.

"Well, whatever," she says, rolling my eyes. "We've spent longer apart than that."

"Yes well," I say, pulling back and grinning at her. "I missed you. Don't go away again. It was boring without you."

"I can't believe that," Cora says, frowning at me as we move into the room. "Didn't you go to the camps and work? That's never –"

But I gasp, my hands flying to my mouth as soon as I see it.

Cora, surprised, turns to me with wide eyes and then starts to look around for whatever is wrong as Roger comes into the room as well, shutting the door behind him. Figuring it out first, Roger starts to laugh.

"What!?" Cora asks, looks between her mate and me.

"Cora!" I gasp, stepping forward and grabbing at the neck of her shirt, yanking it back so I can see –

Her mating mark – right there! High on her shoulder, almost on her neck!

"Oh," she says, laughing and blushing a little, reaching up to run her fingers over it and then sending a little glare Roger's way. "Yes, he decided to put it in a very noticeable place, didn't he?"

"Damn right I did," Roger murmurs, ducking down to give me a kiss on the cheek before moving over to Sinclair.

I ignore them – and whatever boy fight is going to immediately ensue as I throw my arms around my sister, shrieking again with happiness. ”

Cora!” I shout, rocking her back and forth in my arms, “I’m so happy for you! Congratulations! What – what happened! Tell me everything!”

“Wait,” she says, unable to keep from beaming with happiness herself, but she pulls away from me and shakes her head. “You’re – you’re not mad? That we we eloped, instead of doing the wedding you planned!”

“Cora,” I say, my shoulders falling in my disappointment, “I never cared about that – and even if I was disappointed, I’d never let it overshadow my happiness for you! This,” I say, gesturing again towards her mark, “is such a wonderful thing and you two waited so long and were so patient – ”

Unable to help myself, I cry out again and wrap my sister in another hug.

“Well thanks, Ella,” she says, hugging me tightly back. “We’re really happy. It was...a really special couple of days.”

“I want to hear everything,” I say, pulling back. I open my mouth to ask for more details, but we both turn- distracted when we hear Roger and Sinclair raising their voices at each other.

“You should have been here, Roger,” Sinclair says, his whole body tense, glaring daggers at his brother.

“You didn’t need me, Dom,” Roger says, throwing out a dismissive hand. ” Cora and I needed to do this -”

“Um,” I say, stepping closer to Cora. ” What do you say we steal the baby and go... somewhere else?”

“You don’t want to watch the fireworks?” Cora says, turning her head to the side and grinning at me.

“I want to concentrate on you,” I say, nudging her with my elbow and grinning. “Besides, they need...a minute to work this out. Come on.”

Then, quickly, I cross the room again as quietly as I can, reaching for the baby, who is laying in his pack-and-play, messing with some toys. He gives a little happy squeak when I pick him up, which makes me smile.

I turn to Cora then, nodding to a door on this side of the room. Frowning, because she’s never been through it before, she follows me with curiosity. I watch her face as I open the door and we pass through. I'm gratified when I see her expression move from curiosity to wonder as we enter a perfect little living room.

"Oh," she says, looking around with raised eyebrows. "Oh wow, I had no idea this was here..."

"We just had it fixed up," I say, closing the door behind me. "Damon's taste was..." I grimace and shake my head. "But through here!" I continue, walking to the center of the room and pointing towards another door, "there are more bedrooms, for the kids! So, we have like, our own little family suite here, which I think is really nice."

"I love it!" Cora says, laughing and sinking down onto the sofa, curling up her legs beneath her in a way that makes me smile, because she looks so cozy, and that's precisely what I want. I know that we live in a palace and that there's a sense of refinement to the entire place, but I really wanted to create a space within it where my family and I could feel comfortable, at home.

And Cora's immediate reaction, curling up against the pillows? It confirms that I did well in my design.

"So," I say, turning Rafe around so he can see his auntie as I sit down on the couch myself. "Tell me everything!"

She does, then. Well, I can tell that she skips over some details that are more personal – just between her and Roger but my eyes predictably well up as soon as she starts telling me about how they went onto the beach, and the promises they made to each other, and the meteor shower.

"Oh geeze, Ells," Cora says, laughing and shaking her head at me. "I'm going to stop telling you about my life if all it does is make you cry."

"You'd better not," I cry out, sniffing hard and wiping my face with the heel of my hand.

"Here," Cora says, sighing and leaning forward to take the baby from me so that I can blow my nose and pull myself together. I smile as I watch her settle the baby on her lap, grinning down at him and giving him a little baby talk that makes him laugh and reach for her.

I bite my lip, loving the sight of Cora with the baby, and then I lean against the pillows, not asking for him back. Not just yet.

"So, is that all?" I ask, curious, my eyes all dried up. "The whole story?"

"Umm," she says, looking away.

“What!” I laugh, kicking out a foot to shove her on the knee. “Tell me!”

“You’re just going to go to pieces, Ells,” she says, rolling her eyes and hugging Rafe close against her.

“Well, that just makes me want to know more,” I say, laughing and leaning forward eagerly.

“Okay, well,” she says, grinning – and I know she can’t wait to tell me either. “We...kind of named the baby.”

I gasp, a long and deep inhale of breath as I sit up straight, clasping my hands to my chest. “You did!?”

Laughing, Cora nods. “I remembered what you said about...how you named Rafe? How you tried out different names, and he really responded when you said Rafe?”

My eyes instantly fill with tears at the memory and dart to my son, my little baby. And I laugh, and nod, “he kicked,” I say, biting my lip. “And he did it again and again when we repeated it.”

“Well,” she says, giving a little shrug. “We were playing with the bond, and the baby kept telling us he was happy, and so we tried...asking him names. And he didn’t like Matthew or Oliver – ”

I wrinkle my nose now, because I don’t really like either of them myself – they’re not bad names, just not for this baby

“But he did like...”

And then she grins a little wickedly at me as I hold my breath, waiting, desperate to know – “...the name we picked out.”

“Cora!” I shout, leaning forward to smack her hard on the leg, making her shriek and then laugh as she holds Rafe tight in her arms. “You’d better tell me right now!”

I raise my hand to smack her again and as I do the door to the room opens, Roger and Sinclair coming in, their eyebrows raised. They both flinch as my hand lands on Cora’s thigh with a satisfying smack, making her laugh harder and kick her leg at me again. Even Rafe gets in on it, laughing a little in Cora’s arms.

“Um, if you could please stop abusing my mate,” Roger says, putting a hand out and stepping forward.

“Dominic!” I protest, looking desperately towards my mate, who smiles around the room. “They named the baby and she won’t tell me what it is!”

Sinclair laughs and raises his eyebrows at Cora. “That’s cold, Cora,” he says, “you know that baby names are her catnip. This is gonna kill her.”

“Yeah well,” Cora says, grinning as Roger moves to sit on the rolled arm of the couch behind her, putting a steady hand on her shoulder. “I figure if I hold out, she’ll give me something shiny as a bribe.”

“You can have my crown!” I cry, meaning it. “Just tell me!”

“Ella,” Sinclair scolds, coming to the couch, where she scoots forward so he can sit behind her and she can lean back against him. “Not even yours to give.”

“Which is why we can get it back,” I hiss, glancing at him over my shoulder. Cora and Roger laugh at us then, but they keep their lips sealed.

“We just want to have it between the three of us, just for a little bit,” Roger says, smiling down at his mate, and a rushing warm feeling runs through me when I see him looking at her like that with all the love in his heart plain on his face.

“Actually,” Cora says, glancing at me with teasing eyes. “I think I’ll tell Rafe. He should be the first to know his bestie’s name, after all.”

My mouth falls open in protest as Cora leans forward and whispers something in Rafe’s little tiny ear. To my surprise, he seems to listen to the word, and then he bursts into a smile looking up at Cora.

“That’s right!” Cora says, laughing and grinning down at her nephew, “that’s your cousin’s name!”

“Come back to mommy, baby,” I murmur, reaching for my baby and taking him back before leaning against Sinclair again, who wraps his arms around me in moral support. “Tell me auntie’s secret, right now!”

Rafe looks up at me with his big innocent green eyes, a bubble on his lip. And I can’t do anything but laugh.

Chapter 430 – Plans in Motion

Ella

“So you two,” Cora says, flicking her gaze between Roger and Sinclair, “you’re all right now? After fifteen minutes, it’s all cleared up?”

Sinclair shrugs. “We kept it pretty cut and dry. He’s on probation.”

“No, I’m not,” Roger murmurs, dismissive, shaking his head to Cora.

“He is,” Sinclair growls. Roger just leans down, pretending to whisper in Cora’s ear but speaking loud enough for all of us to hear, “probation doesn’t mean anything. But it made him happy to slap a word on the lack of consequences.”

Cora laughs, her face turned up to her mate, and I bite my lip to stifle my own giggle, wanting to be loyal to Sinclair, who just sighs behind me.

“Either way,” Sinclair says, moving on. “Congratulations, Cora,” he says, his focus on her now and his voice sincere. “I’m very happy for you – for both of you. It’s a big event.”

“Thank you, Dominic,” Cora says, smiling at him softly and turning her head to the side, clearly touched. I beam at my sister as well. It’s not that I’ve let her off the hook for keeping the baby name a secret when I want to know so terribly badly – but? Well. I’ll bug her about it later.

“We are sorry though,” Cora says, reaching up to take Roger’s hand. “I know that...the wedding meant a lot to you, and that it was going to do good things for the nation. But...” she bites her lip, hesitating, and I can tell that she feels selfish. I open my mouth to protest against this but she continues before I can start. “But – I needed it to be like this, to be personal. I hope that you’ll forgive me.”

“There’s nothing to forgive, Cora,” Sinclair murmurs, smiling at her warmly. “I completely understand you’ve done nothing wrong.”

And quite suddenly, something comes to me. “Cora,” I say, turning my head to the side and leaning forward. “Does.. anyone else know? About your mark, or your little personal ceremony, besides us four?”

She frowns at me, confused. “Well, no,” she says quietly. “I mean, neither of us really have social media or anything -”

“Or any friends,” Roger murmurs, a little chagrined, which makes me laugh. They don’t need friends, they have us!

“Well then,” I say, a big smile breaking out on my face. “Would you consider...doing it anyway?”

“What?” Cora asks, confused.

“Well, if no one knows,” I say, my smile growing – because this could work! “Why not just have the wedding/ mating ceremony publicly, like we thought of before?”

“Oh!” she says, surprised, and then she starts to laugh, I think a little inspired by the idea. But then she realizes that she already has her mating mark and her fingers go to it, brushing it

“We could get makeup artists to cover it up,” I suggest with a little shrug. “I’m sure they can do it – they do magical things in the movies.”

“Um,” Cora says, looking up at Roger, who just gives her a simple shrug, clearly communicating that it’s her choice. And then she grins, turning back to me. “Really?” she says, “You think it would work? And – and it would help you?”

“It really would, Cora,” Sinclair says warmly behind me. “I think it’s precisely the message we want to send to both our people and some of our honored guests: that humans are equals in our eyes, that they’re part of our family. But, if you’d rather not – if you’d rather just keep the memory of it to the beach, because it’s special to you

“No,” she says, interrupting with a huge smile on her face. “No, I want to do it – I think...it will be fun!”

“I’m going to mark this side this time,” Roger murmurs, drawing a finger down the opposite side of her throat and shoulder. “See if I like how it looks any better...”

She scowls and swats his hand away. “Enough of you,” she murmurs, though I know she doesn’t mean it. Cora hasn’t had nearly enough of Roger, and I doubt she ever will. I hug my baby close and grin at both of them, so incredibly excited for their life together.

And to throw them a wedding!

Time moves quickly once the four of us have made our plans, and my days and weeks quickly fill with tasks. I wake up early earlier than Sinclair, even to take care of the baby and begin to make my plans. He scolds me for it every morning, telling me I need my sleep or that I should wake him up to help but every morning I brush him off.

Because I feel the same way about him and I’m happy he gets to sleep an extra hour while I take care of things. He needs it.

Sinclair is busier than he's ever been. He reminds me, in some ways, of the cold, brooding, discerning business man I met at the beginning of all of this. In some ways I lost track of that man I fell in love with in all of our odd adventures in Vanara, and in the bunker, and in the RV, and everywhere else.

But now, as our life comes back together to resemble what it looked like before? Steady days, routines, living in our own home (even if it is a palace now)? I see flashes of him come back. And it's not that he's lost the sides of him that he's shown to me over the past months but...well, he's just more complex now, isn't he?

And, if at all possible, I love him even more than I ever have.

Sinclair made his formal claim for the throne a few days ago, and no one contested it. Now all that's left is for the governors to ratify the claim, and the packs to demonstrate their support by paying fealty at the coronation. It's all gone smoothly, as Sinclair predicted it would, and so we've moved forward with the plans. Delegations from all the neighboring countries are set to begin arriving in our beautiful Moon Valley over the course of the next few days.

Of course, I'm most excited about the delegation from Vanara including King Gabriel – but I'm also very curious to meet our other neighbors.

But the thing I'm most worried about predictably is that the Atalaxians have indeed signaled their intent to attend, and they're bringing a large delegation.

I do my best to spend a little time every day with Sarah and Jessica, usually in the evenings, bringing Rafe with me to chat and play. They're thriving now, and I think that they're happy and excited about the future that they're building for themselves but...

Well, I haven't had the heart to tell them that Xander is in Atalaxia, and that they're sending a delegation. It's not that I'm keeping it from them – if they asked, I'd tell them in a minute, of course. But they're safe here, and moving forward, and I don't want Sarah to have to worry about the past unless she absolutely has to.

So, I keep putting it off, and she keeps not asking so...we're at a happy little stalemate, I suppose.

"What do you think the Atalaxians be like?" I ask Sinclair one night, laying naked with my belly pressed to his, a little sweaty and still catching my breath after our evening activities.

"Really, Ella?" he murmurs, tracing a lazy hand down my back. "I do my best work, and you want to ask about the Atalaxian delegation?"

I giggle a little and rest my chin on his chest, looking up at him. "If you wanted to keep me from asking complicated questions, Dominic, you shouldn't have gone and become King, making me a Queen. Should have just stayed a businessman and lived in our old house, kept me locked away in the bedroom as your happy little mate – "

He growls, sliding his hands down my body to grip two firm handfuls of my ass. "Don't tempt me, trouble," he murmurs, and I bite my lip as I feel warmth pool at my core, again. "But you're right," he sighs, using his grip on me to pull me upwards so that my face is even with his, so that I can dip my head and press teasing kisses to his mouth. "You're a Queen now, and these are good questions."

"So?" I murmur, each of my kisses getting longer and longer. I can't help it. "What do you think?"

"I think they'll be strict," he says, giving me a healthy smack on the ass to illustrate his point, making me flinch and then laugh.

"And?"

"And distant. They'll want to seem neutral on everything, even though they're decidedly not."

"The women too?" I ask, curious, dropping my head further to trail kisses down the length of his jaw as Sinclair's hands idly explore my body.

"They won't bring any women," he murmurs, which makes me sit up in surprise.

"What?" I ask, a little shocked. Sinclair opens his eyes, a little hazy with desire, and blinks up at me. "This isn't new news, Ella – the Atalaxians don't understand women as equal citizens. They won't see them as useful participants in a party of ambassadors."

"But even...their wives? Their daughters?"

He sighs, raising a hand to my face and stroking gently at my cheek. "

Their wives and daughters are those they will seek to protect most. And by protect, yes, I mean isolate. They wouldn't even think of bringing their women out of their homes, let alone allowing them to see the rest of the world."

My mouth drops open in horror and surprise.

"I know, darling," he says, shaking his head as he looks up at me. "It's horrible. But...it's their nation and their customs. We have no control over it."

I sigh then, laying back down on top of my mate and resting my head against his warm chest. "This is going to be difficult for me, Dominic," I murmur.

"I know, sweetheart," he sighs, wrapping his arms tight around me, letting me know that he understands and takes my side. "For me as well. We'll get through it together."

I nod, understanding, believing him but suddenly my earlier jokes about being happily locked away in his bedroom aren't as funny as they were before.

Chapter 431 – Arrival of Old Friends

Ella

Cora comes early the day that the festivities begin – if they can be called that. Because while the atmosphere is supposed to be festive, I know that simmering beneath it is a great deal of political tension that my mate is hoping goes just precisely right.

I throw my arms around my sister the moment I open the door to my bedroom, letting her in. “Thank you thank you thank you!” I cry out, the words all mushing together as one.

“Whoa!” Cora says, catching me and laughing, giving me a hug in return. “It’s fine, Ella – honestly, where else would I be on a day like this?”

“I don’t know, sleeping?” I say, looking at her with wide eyes. “Its 4 am!”

“True,” she says, giving a little shrug and grinning at me. But then she slips a hand to her belly. “Not like I wasn’t up anyway, though.”

“What?” I gasp, tugging her into the room. Cora is about two full months pregnant now, which isn’t much according to a human pregnancy, but if this is a wolf pregnancy? Then she’s probably just getting into her second trimester.

But...is this her second trimester? With a hybrid baby...

She laughs at me, watching me try to do the math in my head as I stare down at her belly, which is juuuust barely starting to swell.

Which is so, so cute

“Yeah,” she says, giving a little shrug. “The morning sickness is starting to hit hard. I got away with it in my first trimester but,” she sighs. “It mostly hits at night for me too. So, I was already up.”

“Poor sister,” I murmur, looking up into her face and meaning every word of it. I reach for her then, wanting to put a hand on her cheek, but she laughs and pushes it away, which makes me laugh as well. Cora isn’t one for coddling or pity.

“What can I get you?” I ask, the smile returning to my face. “I’ve heard ginger tea does good things?”

“Distraction,” she says, nodding firmly. “That will be the best.”

“Well distraction I’ve got,” I say, grabbing her hand and leading her towards my gigantic closet.

She gasps a little when she steps inside because even though it's 4 am? It's already chaos – clothes and supplies everywhere. Even a little cart with coffee, tea, and breakfast snacks.

“Oh, hey, Cora,” Sinclair says, turning and grinning at her as he stands at the mirror, tying his tie for the fourth time. He wants to get it absolutely, perfectly correct. “Thanks for coming early. We’ve got a long day. Did Roger come too?”

“No,” she sighs, sitting down in the poufy arm chair next to Rafe’s littleplay pen, smiling down at him and patting his head to say hello. “He is lazy, and wanted more sleep. He says he’ll be here at the more reasonable hour of seven.”

“That’s too late,” Sinclair murmurs, shaking his head and reaching for his phone. “I need him here by six...”

“Good luck,” Cora murmurs, accepting the little cup of tea that I hand her.

“It’ll be fine,” I say with a sigh. “Boys are lucky – they have so much less to do on mornings like this. Just throw on a suit! Run a hand through your hair! Gorgeous, ready to go!”

“Oh, come on, Ella,” Cora laughs, sipping at her tea, grinning when she detects that I’ve given her something with ginger in it anyway. “Like it’s so hard for you to get gorgeous.”

“She has a point!” Sinclair calls out, tossing his phone back onto a side table after he finishes texting Roger and turning back to his tie.

“Oh, you both flatter,” I murmur, giving them both a pleased little glare and flapping my hands at them. “But we’ve got appointments, Cora – hair, nails, the works. It’s going to be a lot.”

“I’m kind of looking forward to it,” she says, giving me a smile. “I haven’t been pampered like this in a long time. Plus, the outfits you’ve picked out for me for this weekend...” she whistles, impressed. “They’re stunning.”

“Well, you’re the bride,” I say, turning and giving her a grin. “You’re supposed to steal the show.”

“On Sunday,” she says, rolling her eyes, “I’m supposed to steal the show. But tonight? And then the coronation tomorrow? That’s supposed to be all you, Ella.”

“Or him!” I say, pointing to the man who is going to be you know crowned King.

"All eyes will be on you, my Queen," Sinclair says, coming my side and tugging me close, pressing a kiss to my cheek. I smile when I note that his tie is indeed perfect. "Or," Sinclair continues, considering and turning to the baby. "On Rafe."

"He is very cute," I say, likewise turning my eyes to the baby, who burbles in the playpen, swatting at some toys hanging above him.

Cora laughs at us, taking a sip of her tea. "Guys, he's very cute, but...you're looking at him with parents' eyes. I'm sure people will be much more focused on the two of you."

"Not when they see his outfits," I say, bursting into a smile. And I dash over to the little dresser where we keep Rafe's things, but before I can pull anything out another knock comes at the door to the room.

"Your first appointment," Sinclair murmurs, moving away from me to answer the door. "Ready?"

"As we'll ever be!" I sigh, turning to give Cora a wink. "Let's get started."

"Gabriel!" I laugh, throwing my arms around the King of Vanara as soon as he mounts the four short steps up to the dais on which Sinclair and I stand, greeting each of the delegations as they arrive.

He laughs, catching me in his arms and giving me a warm, lingering hug.

"Ella," he murmurs, his voice low and pleased. "It is such a joy to see you we were all so worried when you left. It is a joy to see you again, healthy and happy."

"And the baby!" I say, laughing and pulling away, reaching to take Rafe from Cora's arms in a hurry so my son can meet the King who was so kind to me during such a large part of my pregnancy. Cora smiles, handing him over willingly, Roger at her side likewise looking eagerly at the Vanaran delegation, which holds so many familiar faces. Henry declined to attend this part of the ceremony, citing long hours and boredom, though he'll be at the dinner tonight.

"Oh my goodness," Gabriel says, laughing and taking Rafe from my hands and cradling him in his arms, staring down at him with true joy. Then he laughs, lifting his head to Sinclair at my side, his eyes crinkling with pleasure at the edges. "Well," he says, reaching for my mate and giving him a warm hug around the shoulders. "No need to guess who this child's father is. He's the image of you, Dom."

"Ah, he's got some of his mother in there," Sinclair says, returning his old friend's warm hug.

“Lies,” I sigh, reaching to take the baby back and snuggling him close to me. “He’s all Dominic, and it’s taking its toll on my poor arms,” I murmur, hefting Rafe up. Everyone laughs at my joke, because they can see it’s plainly true Rafe is a big baby for his nearly- four-month age; he’s already wearing six-month clothes, sometimes eight.

But he’s also adorable, so I forgive him.

Rafe’s tired, I know, but he’s being so good. And frankly, I want him here by my side through all of this. Not everyone in this room is our friend, and I can’t bear the thought of leaving him alone even with any of the nannies who we’ve hired even though I’ve gotten very close with several of them. I started out as a nanny, after all they’re some of the people in my new life who I’ve grown closest to.

Gabriel and Sinclair move slightly to the side, exchanging more warm greetings and giving me a chance to greet several of our old friends, including James, Isabel, and sweet Sadie, who have been separated for at least a month while James went back to Vanara to serve as our ambassador while Isabel and Sadie stayed here so that Isabel could work with me on the camps. We’ve made incredible progress, which has been a delight to me, but we’ve also got quite a bit of work still to do.

I grin when I see Thomas as well, the King’s rather discreet boyfriend, towards the back of the delegation. I give him a happy wave, which he returns with a little bow, and I make a mental note to get to know him much more on this trip than I did the last one.

Our time with the Vanarans goes far too fast but there’s a literal line of people waiting to come and greet us, so we only have about three minutes with each to greet them and make plans and promises to meet up again soon.

Still, it breaks my heart to only be able to spend moments with the people who mean so much to me I find myself a little overwhelmed when they begin to move away, waving and calling their goodbyes.

I’m still waving, Rafe clutched to my side, when I feel Cora step up next to me. I can feel her tension already.

“What is it?” I ask, the smile falling from my face as I look over at my sweet sister. She looks amazing, dressed in a lavender gown with a little cape draped formally over her shoulders. I’m wearing something similar, but all in white, which makes my rose-gold hair shine out like a beacon.

But Cora, even though she’s beautiful, is clearly worried. Serious, she raises her chin at the delegation that’s coming next and I turn towards them, surprised to see each of the members dressed in serious black clothing, standing in four straight lines of five people each. They look more like a military formation than a delegation of ambassadors.

And I note suddenly that they're...all men.

"Are you ready for this?" Cora asks, quiet. I shift Rafe to my other side and reach out to grab her hand. "I guess we have to be."

Then, Cora and I take a deep breath, moving forward to greet the Atalaxians.

Chapter 432 – The Delegation

Sinclair steps close to my other side so that Rafe is between us. My hand still holds Cora's on my left as Roger steps to her side. Together, I realize, we present quite a united front: the Alpha King and his demigoddess Queen standing with their much-coveted child and heir. And then, next us, the Duke and Duchess, likewise a brilliant alpha and a magical goddess-born half-human hybrid wolf.

I find myself smirking a little at the thought of all of our magnificent formal titles when I know the truth: that we're honestly just four people desperately grateful that we've been lucky enough to find each other and build a family.

But still, facing this delegation? I'm a little glad that we've got some intimidating credentials to speak for us. Brave little mate, Sinclair says to me down the bond, making my smirk deepen. I'm glad you're letting them see that you're not scared of them.

Oh, I'm scared of them, I pass back, not bothering to look up at him for support. But you're right. There's no reason for them to see it.

He gives me a warm nudge of support as the first line of five Atalaxians step forward and give a bow. The man at the far left of the line steps forward then, beginning to speak. He introduces himself first – the first and most significant member – and then moves on to each new delegate, who bows his heads to us each in turn.

I turn my head a little as this formal introduction progresses, because this is ...odd. I understand that this reception has a rather official quality, but each of the greetings we've given to each delegation before this has been warm and chatty, with people introducing themselves warmly or greeting Sinclair and I as old friends, if they know us.

The Atalaxians? They don't say a word, instead letting their singular speaker do all the work.

Still, I do my best to follow along as Rafe begins to fuss in my arms, not liking something – I don't know what, though. I hold him higher, tighter against me, trying to pass a little calmness down our bond so that he can relax, maybe fall asleep. The baby responds to this, resting his head against my chest a little and settling.

The speaker finishes introducing the first line of delegates, which includes the predictable ambassadors and senators who have been sent to witness the coronation and have discussions about the future connections between our two nations.

However, when the first row clears, moving away and revealing the second row, I'm surprised to hear the speaker introduce a Prince, which makes my eyes raise. Why had he not been included in the first row? Wouldn't he be the highest-ranking delegate?

I study the Prince as he steps forward and gives his bow, though I admit that I do not catch his name, which I kick myself for. I'm a Queen now or about to be. I should be paying attention.

When he raises from his bow I find myself a bit struck by him, if I'm being honest. He's about my age, and tall, with dark hair and a handsome face with eyes such a light blue-violet that they surprise me in his dark-featured face. While he's broad shouldered, he's a great deal slimmer than my own mate, though the power than emanates from him.

I blink, again surprised. He is...not someone to be trifled with. I don't know how I know it, but I do – I'm absolutely sure of it. The prince nods steadily to Sinclair, looking serious but perhaps even a little bored, like he's done this a thousand times. And then turns his eyes to me, but when our eyes meet he goes a bit rigid in the shoulders.

My eyes go wide, surprised at his reaction as he stands straight, staring at me for a long moment. Sinclair reacts instantly, a subtle growl building in his chest as he takes just one step forward.

The Prince comes back to himself in a second, his eyes flicking to Sinclair before he regains his bored composure, nodding to me, and then to Cora, and then to Roger before stepping back in line.

Surprised, confused, I look up at my mate, whose shoulders are stiff with displeasure.

What...what on earth just happened?

That line of delegates is dismissed and Rafe starts to fuss again in my arms, unhappy.

I begin to coo to him, upset that he's upset. Honestly, my sweet baby hardly ever cries, instead letting us know what he needs through little taps and pulses down the bond to which we respond as quickly as we can. It's honestly the best part of being a wolf mother – and an aspect of it I never really considered until Rafe came along.

I look up at Sinclair, worried. "I think I have to take him out," I murmur, glancing down at the baby.

A moment, my mate replies, mind-to-mind, though he reaches out a hand behind me to settle on my back. I need us all here, for this delegation at least. If he cries, he cries. And I nod, understanding and turning back to the crowd.

The third line of Atalaxian delegates disappears, and the fourth moves forward. I watch passively as they each step forward and nod to us. I nod in turn, though I admit that my attention is decidedly focused on my son, who cries in earnest now, unhappy. I hold him tight, bouncing him in my arms, worried and wanting him to feel better.

I send a little curious pulse down the line, which has worked before sometimes he passes me an emotion, or has even given me a brief impression of the thing he wants –

But today, nothing. He's just upset. My eyes are totally focused on the baby, ignoring the final members of the delegation in my maternal concern for my son, when suddenly the speaker's words catch my immediate attention.

"Our final delegate," the speaker says, "is Duke Xander of Moon Valley, who has been given honorary citizenship in Atalaxia for his services as advisor to the King."

My eyes flash up, going wide as they focus on my uncle, the man who tried to steal my son.

Inside me my gift flares hot with rage, channeling something from Cora's that speaks to heat, and burning, and destruction –

She grabs my arm, sensing it, and I can feel her own fear in her grip, but something about it works – she holds me back from reacting at all, giving me a moment to reel myself back in. It was the right choice, I see, as Sinclair immediately steps forward for both of us, glaring down at the Duke.

"You should have asked," he growls, violence in every line of him now, and I can feel him holding himself back from murdering Xander this instant, "about whether this man was welcome upon our nation's soil. Because he is not. This man is a war criminal, and wanted for several crimes in Moon Valley – including the attempted kidnapping of our Prince."

Sinclair takes another step forward, clearly ready to either tear Xander to pieces or take him into custody – I honestly don't know which –

Xander an old, wrinkled man with cruelty in every line of his face – just smirks up at Sinclair, not moving an inch.

But the Atalaxian speaker – a high-ranking senator himself – steps forward then, interceding. "Alpha Sinclair," he says, his word heavy with the acknowledgement that my mate is not yet King, "Duke Xander is a protected member of our delegation an Ambassador. If you harm him or take him into custody, it will be considered an act of war."

Sinclair's growl deepens as he turns violent eyes on the senator now. "And did you think it would not be war already, when you brought him as a member of your delegation? After, surely, you know all he has done to us, to our family?"

“We had hoped,” the senator drawls, a smug look coming to his face, “that you’d be more reasonable than that, Alpha.”

Rage continues to burn hot within me as I stare at the old man before me who looks fixedly at the baby in my arms, and doesn’t bother – not even once to raise his eyes to me.

Rafe wails with displeasure, perhaps feeling my rage and my fear, perhaps... god, I don’t know, perhaps sensing some malevolence from this man as well-

Cora’s hand tightens on my arm and I nod slightly, just once, letting her know that I’m not going to do anything stupid. I feel her hand hesitate, and then loosen, just a little bit.

Sinclair, to my surprise, takes a step back. I snap my gaze up to him because honestly, I was looking forward to seeing this man’s blood on his claws. But then I remember, of course, that he is a King now or at least, close enough.

And damn it, it will be war if we kill Xander now. I settle uncomfortable under the realization that part of the responsibilities of rule mean measuring our vengeance against what is good for our nation.

And so I send Sinclair a little pulse of support as he steps back, even though my wolf scrabbles and claws in me to be let loose, to be allowed to rip his throat out.

Sinclair doesn’t check his glare, or his growl, as Xander steps back into line with the rest of the Atalaxian ranks. And I know that hatred radiates from all of us as the delegation as a whole moves away. I keep my eyes on them, every step.

And I note that the only one who looks back is the violet-eyed prince.

Who looks directly at me.

Chapter 433 – Catharsis

I barely have time to close the door before Sinclair slams me against it, but I don't feel an ounce of pain, No, because I need this just as badly as he does – and I want him, hard, now

Sinclair grabs me low behind my thighs, yanking me up and wrapping my legs around his waist. Eager, already panting, I shove at the fabric of my skirts, getting it out of the way as he moves one hand between us, fumbling at the button of his pants before shoving them down and freeing himself.

Then he returns his hand to me, a single deft move tearing the delicate fabric of my panties, tossing them to the ground-

Sinclair groans, fierce and feral, as he drives his hard, thick cock deep into me in a single powerful thrust. The moan that rips from my own throat matches his. Because I want him – need him as badly as he does me at this moment, after that horrible surprise.

We spent two more hours in that hall holding back our emotions, greeting delegations, doing our best playing happy King and Queen while all along our emotions were roiling inside

And I could feel it, the whole time, our rage, and our panic, and our desire to end that horrible man and to destroy every single one of the damned Atalaxians, who clearly planned this

We passed the emotions back and forth between ourselves down the bond, unable to help it, until we reached this fever pitch.

When it finished – when we were all done greeting delegations – we both know that we needed this – this, and only this, to work out our rage and our frustration somewhere – on each other

Roger and Cora had walked away with us and Cora had been confused when I hastily passed the baby to her – because of course, of course she assumed that the last thing I would want with Xander in the palace is to be away from Rafe for a single moment

But Roger had taken her arm, and tugged her away with him for a moment, letting Sinclair and I hurry ahead, because he could tell that we needed space.

Space for this, to tear each other apart and find each other again always have as we

My back curves with want, with need, my hips pulsing along with each of Sinclair's steady, long thrusts into me. He doesn't hold himself back for a single second, wrapping his fist into the hair at the back of my neck, pulling my head back and exposing my throat. As he pounds himself into me, venting his pent-up rage, I moan my encouragement to him, telling him to give me more, to go harder.

My mate, ever willing, complies, slamming himself into me again and again. I'm as eager as he is, panting, and when my body begins to come to its crest, as I begin to spill over and over, my whole body clenching against him, holding him tight, Sinclair roars, low and deep. And then he lowers his face to my throat and sinks his fangs deep into my mating mark, sending me again into a deep wave of pleasure that makes me moan and shake around him.

He finds his own end then, spilling himself into me, so thick and heavy, warm and rich that the sensation makes me moan again as I cling to him, panting, the echoes of my completion running through me again and again.

I'm still pressed up against the door with Sinclair leaning hard against me a few moments later when my eyes finally flutter open as I come back to myself. We're both still panting, hard, and I bury my hands in my mate's hair, forcing my breaths to deepen, to come back to myself.

When he feels my breathing change, Sinclair shakes his head a little and pulls it back, looking up into my face. "Ella," he says, shaking his head, his voice thick.

"No," I murmur, sensing the apology on his tongue. I stare into his face, nodding to him, making him see it. "I needed it too. I wanted it, Dominic. Just like that."

He murmurs something unintelligible to me, pulling away from the door and carrying me with him to a nearby chair that he sinks into, taking me with him to settle into his lap. His shoulders still shake, just a little, with the aftershock of everything.

We stay like that for a long few moments before he shakes his head again, clearing it, and looks back up at me, more himself now than he was a few minutes ago when we entered the room.

"Are you all right?" he asks, and then his eyes dip to my neck and shoulder, to the blood there. "Shit..." he murmurs.

I laugh a little and close my eyes for a second, placing a hand over my mark. There's a flare of lavender behind my eyes, but a moment later when I pull my hand away the wound is gone. "I'm fine," I say, smiling at him. "Goddess- born, remember? And like I said – I needed it too."

He looks towards the door to the rest of our suite then, worried. "We should get to Rafe –"

“A minute,” I murmur, turning his face back to me. “Dominic – I know why I needed that. It...it gives me a great deal of comfort, to pass control over to you, to let you take charge of me, and take care of me. But – how are you? Is it enough? Do you feel...are you all right?”

My mate takes a moment to let a growl rumble in his chest, letting me know how deep his pleasure in me is. “Ella,” he murmurs, pulling me deeper into his lap so that he can lower his face over mine, nudging me with his nose. “You are my entire comfort in this world. But yes I was...so angry, and frustrated, and wanted to –

“To kill them all?” I murmur, smiling a little.

“Yes,” he growls before pressing a long and lingering kiss to my mouth. “I shouldn’t have let them get me so riled. But they played their cards precisely right.”

“Well,” I murmur, wiggling against him suggestively, and eliciting a low growl from my mate that makes pleasure streak through me again, “anytime you need to take that ferocious energy out and avoid creating an international incident...you know where to find me.”

His growl deepens as he runs a hand down my body from shoulder to ass, dipping his head to press a kiss to my neck, and then my chest.

“You joke, Ella,” he murmurs, “but... you have no idea how much you steady me. Because that – I mean, some people might not understand, might think I was just taking out my anger on you, but -”

“No,” I say, serious, placing my hands on his cheeks and turning his face up to me. “I understand, Dominic. I feel...precisely the same. I want to be that for you, as you are for me.”

He kisses me then, a different kind of claiming than the one against the door a moment ago, but still just as powerful. Sinclair and I – our physical connection has always been more than just sex. It has always allowed us to come together, to be each other’s refuge.

Today was just...a vivid example of that fact.

A little knock comes at the far door.

“Cora,” I sigh, and then my mate gives a little grumble of assent as I stand up and move towards the door, scooping up my ruined panties on the way and tossing them in a trashcan as my mate, behind me, does up his pants.

Then, I pull open the door to see my wide-eyed sister standing with her mate, who smirks knowingly. Rafe, still unhappy, cries in Cora's arms.

Chapter 434 – Provocation

“Ohhh, Rafey,” I murmur, reaching for my baby boy as Cora and Roger come into the room. “I’m so sorry, mommy and daddy just needed a minute.”

“Yeah,” Roger says, his smirk deepening. “To talk.” I shrug a little and return his smirk, refusing to let him embarrass me as I carry my baby over to his little changing table and gather the supplies I use when I feed him.

“What happened out there,” Cora says, a little breathless as she presses the door shut and looks around at us, wide-eyed. “I mean – is that...okay? For them to just bring a criminal and an enemy back into the nation?”

“It’s not precisely legal,” Sinclair sighs, waving the group of us forward towards our little living room once I’ve got all my supplies gathered. “But it is complicated, and a very... targeted message that they’re giving to us.

That they’re on Xander’s side in this, agreeing with his policies and his lineage, not mine.”

Together, we troop into the living room and I settle onto the couch as I begin to feed the baby, hoping that he gets as much comfort as I will from the familiar routine.

“Are you two all right?” Roger asks, looking between me and Sinclair, who settles on the arm of the couch behind me.

“We’re fine,” my mate growls, and Roger smirks a little but nods as he sits in an armchair across from us. Cora looks a little confused, but shrugs, giving up trying to figure it out and sitting in Roger’s lap, clearly wanting to be close. He wraps his arms around her waist, pulling her back against him.

“All right,” Roger says. “Then what’s our plan on how to retaliate?”

“Unfortunately,” Sinclair sighs, “they’ve played their cards well, bringing Xander here on a diplomatic mission. Because I have to be...perfectly diplomatic this entire weekend, or else I risk not being crowned.”

“Really?” I ask, surprised as I look up at him. “It’s that precarious?”

“These are a King’s duties,” he says, giving a little shrug. “If at the first trial of diplomacy – no matter how large the trial – I rip someone’s throat out? I’d say it’s enough to give any nay-sayers a strong argument for why I should not be the one to lead this nation.”

I sigh, shaking my head and looking down at Rafe, my sweet boy. “So. We have to tolerate him.”

* "I'll send a message to the Atalaxians that Xander is not welcome at any of the more informal events," Sinclair murmurs. "But yes, when they gather as a delegation en masse? There's nothing I can do to prevent him, unless I do want to risk sparking war. Not unless he crosses a line himself."

"Well?" Roger says, tilting his head a little, curious."

Can we...provoke him into doing that?"

"Do we want to?" I ask, grimacing a little. "I mean, obviously I don't know him, but this is a man devious enough to plan to get me pregnant and then steal the child. I don't think he's someone we're going to trick into a faux pau that we can use to kick him out of the palace."

"Ella's right," Sinclair murmurs behind me, and I look up to see him shaking his head and crossing his arms over his broad, muscled chest. Something stirs in me again as I look at him, and Sinclair glances at me, the start of a smile down his lips as he senses my arousal, either through my scent or down the bond

I just shrug a little. I can't help it. He laughs a little.

"What is with you two," Cora murmurs, still confused and looking between us.

Roger just laughs and tugs her closer. "Don't worry about it, Cora," he murmurs, kissing her neck. "I'll explain it all to you later."

She sighs, still confused, but gives in.

"It's unlikely that the Atalaxians are going to do anything to truly provoke war – this was just their gambit, their way of letting us know where they stand.

If we can just...get through the weekend without killing him, they should go away and give us more time to develop a better strategy for getting Xander back and ensuring that he sees justice."

"Do you think they'll let him go?" I ask, curious.

"I don't think that Xander actually means anything special to the Atalaxians," my mate replies, looking seriously down at me. "I'm securely in power now, and everyone knows that Rafe is my son and heir. If he tries to claim the throne through Rafe..." Sinclair shrugs, implying that it's pot going to go well, internationally.

I smile at Sinclair, glad to see that my clear-thinking mate has returned, pleased to have been able to play a part in that. And I, too, feel so much clearer now after our little... interlude.

“So, he’s a bargaining chip,” Roger says, nodding, understanding. “They know we want him. Now they want to see what they can get.”

“Well,” Cora says, sitting up a bit straighter, her strategic mind at work. I smile at her, thinking that Cora has probably the best mind for these sorts of games of all of us – except, perhaps, for Henry, who I suddenly wish was here. Cora could have been a champion poker player, I think, had she not picked medicine.

“I think,” Cora continues, “that our best move then is to demonstrate to them that their bargaining chip is actually of very little value to us.”

“And perhaps,” Roger chimes in, nodding his agreement, “keeping an eye on him to see if he does make a misstep.”

“And if he does,” Sinclair growls, a sound of vengeance that makes me smile, “we take him.”

I take a deep, contented breath now, smiling around at my family and down at my baby.

“It’s a good plan,” I murmur, nodding my agreement. “

Now..we just have to put it into action.”

Our little family meeting is unfortunately short-lived.

We spend a few more minutes coming up with the details of a plan, but then the knocks start to come at the door – hairdressers and housekeepers, stylists and party planners. Everyone we’ve asked to come and help us get ready for the evening –

Because that formal greeting? That was just the start of the day.

We’ve got dinner and the afterparty to contend with, which I’m sure will present its own challenges.

We all change – Cora and I into more formal gowns, Roger, Sinclair and Rafe into tuxedos. I squeal with delight as I dress Rafe in his, even though he sleeps through most of it. But he just looks so cute that I can’t stop staring at him.

Cora laughs, coming to my side and looking down at my little sleeping baby. “Is it going to be all right to take him with us?” she murmurs. “Does he need more sleep?”

“He’s getting used to being a busy royal baby that naps on the go,” I sigh, lifting him up into my arms.” Besides, Conner is coming,” I say with a grin, “to be Rafe’s bodyguard again. And Rafe’s used to sleeping in his arms after all these weeks at the camps.”

“True,” Cora says, giving a little laugh. “I bet Conne never thought he’d have that title – Royal body guard’ slash traveling crib.”

I laugh along with her, pleased that the mood has changed so much in the two hours since we left the hall where we greeted all of the delegations. But I feel bolstered now, ready for whatever comes next. And as Sinclair comes to my side, I can see that he, too, is steady.

“Ready for dinner?” my mate asks, running a hand down the back of my sparkling silver gown.

“Ready for war, you mean?” I ask, grinning in reply.

Sinclair laughs, dipping his head to kiss me once and giving me a nod. “Come on, private,” he growls, giving me a light smack on the a*s. “Time to move out.”

Chapter 435 – Dinner Party

Ila

I enter the elaborate dining room at Sinclair's side with Rafe tucked sleeping in my arms. There are no doubts or hesitations on my face and I lift my chin high as I smile slightly, letting people see me as my mate's unbothered Queen, as someone entirely unruffled by the events of this morning.

Sinclair, walking at my side, presents a similar image: the unflappable Alpha King, his body fully capable of every violent rumor of which our guests have heard, but toned and refined by the mind of a King, a true power player.

The effect we have as a pair ripples through the room with people turning to us, many eyes going wide. Because we really do present the image of two people who should not be trifled with.

I have to admit, a little thrill goes through me at the idea of this. Because, honestly, I usually think of myself as sweet and determined, but certainly not powerful and imposing. But tonight, at Sinclair's side? It comes to me easier than I thought it would.

Cora and Roger come into the room behind us, our personal guards following after them. Many eyes turn to my human sister, considering her alongside and her fated Alpha mate. I know Roger and Cora are baffling to many people within the wolf community who can't understand how or why Roger would have a human woman fated to be at his side.

But one look at my stunning sister in her lavender gown? Well. Let's just say that even without the information that she's a demigoddess who can control the weather, I think it's making a lot more sense to a lot of our gathered guests.

Still, as Sinclair and I approach our chairs at the head of the table, I'm aware of some frowns and whispers around the room. Even though the four of us present a strong and untied front, there are as there always are dissenters amongst our supporters. My eyes move immediately to the group of five ambassadors from Atalaxia, dressed in black and gathered at the far end of the table.

Sinclair sent word, of course, that my uncle was absolutely not invited to attend this smaller, more personal dinner, and I am pleased to see that he's not there. But I narrow my eyes in their direction anyway, wondering what the hell else they've got up their sleeve.

"Dominic, Ella," I hear Henry's voice say, and I turn to see him wheeling towards us. My face breaks into a grin and I lean forward, giving him a kiss on the cheek and tilting the baby so that Henry can say hello as Sinclair greets his father as well.

“I’ve heard you’ve had a tough morning,” Henry says quietly as people around the room begin to take their seats. “I’m sorry I wasn’t there – ”

“Please,” Sinclair says, dismissing his apology with a wave. “We handled it well. There’s nothing you could have done.”

“Still,” Henry sighs, rolling up to his place at the table on Sinclair’s left. “I’d have liked to have seen the man for myself, been able to assess him. But I’m sure I’ll have more opportunity for that as the weekend passes.”

“Yes,” I sigh, taking my own seat as Sinclair pulls it out for me. “I’m sure you will.”

I hold my sleeping baby close to me as Cora and Roger take their own seats to my right, and then I look up at Sinclair, who is still standing. A warm smile lights my mate’s face as he lifts a glass of wine towards the waiting group of people and begins to welcome everyone formally to the palace, letting them know that he hopes the weekend will be full of many pleasurable and fruitful conversations about the future of our collected nations.

I smile up at my mate as I listen to him speak, proud of this man who can so seamlessly move between worlds. I’ve seen him in so many different lights now father, mate, soldier, politician, and beyond – and I’m so impressed that he is able to perform each role so admirably. Honestly, my heart tumbles a little over itself as I watch him. I couldn’t have designed a more perfect mate if I tried.

I blush to myself a bit, looking down at my baby, thinking myself the luckiest girl in the world. And then I glance around the table, pleased when I see everyone’s eyes focused on my mate, a variety of expressions crossing their faces most of them warm.

But when my eyes fall on the Atalaxian prince?

I’m shocked to see him looking directly at me. Staring, even.

I blink and sit up straight a little bit, surprised. And my shock only increases when he fails to look away, instead holding my gaze, his face expressionless as he studies me, apparently ignoring the speech and instead trying to figure me out.

I find myself growing more and more uncomfortable under his gaze. What... why on earth would he be so interested in me?

I stare back at him, my own eyes fixed, trying to figure out the mystery

But then I jump a little when the room breaks into applause. I bite my lip then, a little ashamed at having missed the tail end of my mate’s speech. But – well, considering that we went over it together last night, refining all the details, I suppose I already know what he said.

When Sinclair looks down at me and tilts his glass towards me, I beam up at him, giving my full support. His own smile deepens before he turns back to our crowd of guests, calling for a toast to international friendship and a bright future. Our guests call the words back to him, heartily joining in with the spirit.

I raise my own glass along with everyone else, genuinely hoping that this can be true. But as my eyes again return to the Atalaxian delegation?

I see that while they raise their glasses in a slight show of support, their eyes are cold. And I have a distinct feeling that they're going to make our jobs very difficult.

The rest of the meal goes well, with general chatter and delicious food. I pass Rafe to Conner so that I can manage a knife and fork and I do my best to participate, chatting with the guests closest to me, but as I glance at Cora and find her eyes already on me, I know we're united in our thought: that the real challenge is going to come after dinner, at the after party.

When we finish our desert and the dinner breaks up, I get to my feet feeling newly steeled for the evening ahead.

"You all right?" Sinclair asks as he stands next to me. I can tell immediately that it's less a question of whether I'm handling this well, but instead if I feel prepared for what's coming next.

"I'm perfect," I assure him, giving him a bright smile as Conner brings me Rafe, who is awake now and looking around the room curiously.

"All right, trouble," Sinclair murmurs, leaning down to kiss me on the forehead. "Let's go get this done."

Chapter 436 – Meeting the Prince

Sinclair moves away at Roger's side as Cora comes to mine. We both fuss over the baby for a moment, checking to ensure that he doesn't need anything, but when we're sure that he's ready to go I turn him in my arms so that he can look out at all of the people who have come to visit us on this big weekend.

Cora, Rafe and I head into the room together with Conner close behind us, as planned. We decided to split up on this one always staying in sight of our mates, but giving people the opportunity to come and speak with us privately if they're so inclined.

The strategy works. A great variety of people come and introduce themselves to Cora and I, and I'm pleased to see that the majority of these people are women. I smile a little smugly inside, glad that I was right that the women who attend our coronation as part of these delegations who might feel awkward or shy approaching the gigantic, intimidating Sinclair brothers feel differently about approaching two women, one pregnant and the other holding a baby.

The result, to my pleasure, is a great deal of happy chat. I meet a variety of fascinating women who are all eager to tell me about their lives, their plans for their nations' futures, the collaborations that they're excited to pursue with us. At each turn Cora and I are genuinely enthusiastic, wanting to work with these people to make our world a better place.

"Wow," I say to Cora after we part ways with a dowager Queen and her granddaughter, who is the next in line to her own throne. "It's...incredible. I had no idea that most of these nations and people even existed."

"I know," she murmurs, running a hand over her hair and looking around. "I feel like we need to go back to school, Ella – we're not nearly prepared enough for our positions in this nation. We need some serious history lessons."

"Well, you go to school," I murmur, sighing. "And just give me the wikipedia version of whatever you learn, okay? Because I am done with schooling."

"You were good at school!" Cora protests, a little appalled.

"I was good," I say, looking at her with raised eyebrows, "but I wasn't addicted to it, like you were. Honestly, Cora, you'd still be in school if there were more degrees to get."

"Well," she sighs, putting her hands on her hips for a second and tilting her head to the side for a second. "That's probably true..."

I laugh, smiling at my clever sister, and then Rafe gives a sad little cry. Curious, I look down at him and instantly smell something very unpleasant.

“Oh, geeze,” I murmur, realizing that he needs to be changed. I look anxiously over my shoulder, wondering where the closest bathroom is that has a changing area

Honestly, it’s my house now – I should know this stuff –

“Here,” Cora says, reaching for Rafe. ” Let me.”

“Cora, I can’t -”

“Let me,” she insists, taking Rafe from my arms. “You’re needed here more than I am – go talk with Roger and Sinclair, and Conner and I will take the baby to be changed. All right? It’s going to take a long time and the Queen should be present to...do Queen stuff.”

“All right,” I sigh, though I hate handing my baby off to her for the second time today. Rafe doesn’t seem displeased, though, smiling happily up at his aunting and reaching out his hands for her, trying to grab her cheeks. Cora laughs and sends me a quick wink before turning to Conner and letting him know the plan.

I turn then, looking for my mate, and seeing him across the room speaking with a bunch of Alphas with Henry and Roger by his side – I set off towards him.

I take the long way around, hoping to disappear a bit into the shadows at the sides of the room and avoid anyone in the center of the room pulling me for a chat.

And I almost, almost make it – honestly, I’m about three-fourths of the way there – when someone steps into my path, clearly wishing a word.

I sigh a bit inwardly but take a deep breath, putting on my Queen expression – calm, smiling, interested as I look up to see who desires a moment of my time.

But my smile falters a bit when I realize that it’s...him.

“My Queen,” the Prince of Atalaxia says, giving me a sharp, formal bow. ” It is a pleasure to meet you.”

I go a little still, my smile increasing a little at the irony of this because...

He stands straight and looks at me then, staring at me for a moment, clearly waiting for a response. But I just stand in silence, not knowing what to say. Then, I’m a little shocked to see a smile pull at the corners of his lips.

“Can I take your silence to mean...” he says quietly, “that it is not precisely a pleasure for you?"

And damn me but...

Something about the way he says it his self-deprecation, the warmth in his voice...

I feel my smile growing.

"I have to say," I reply, a little laugh on my voice now. "That whether or not it is a pleasure to speak with you, highness, is...complicated to say the least."

He bows his head a little, nodding, and I hear him huff a sad little laugh under his breath. "Honestly, I warned them against bringing that man, surprising you all like that -"

"Then why did you do it?" I ask, taking a step forward, wanting to look up into his face –

He raises his eyes to mine again and I'm shocked again by their color and clarity – by the light blue-violet color of them, such a surprise under such a dark head of silky black hair.

"I don't know," he replies, shaking his head and slipping his hands into his pockets as he takes a deep breath. "They spent hours deciding on it on precisely what to do, what to say. I promise – it was a very deliberate choice."

"And were you not privy to those meetings?" I ask, raising an eyebrow at him, wanting to push him for more information.

"I am my father's sixth son, Highness," the prince sighs, shaking his head, again smiling that sad little smile at me. "I am a figurehead at best on this mission, and privy to nothing important. You'll have to forgive me for that. I wish I could tell you more."

I stare at him now, my eyes narrowing a little bit because...honestly, I can't put my finger on it -but something about the way he says that makes me believe him. I believe that if he could tell me more, he honestly would.

He smiles at me again, and I realize that I've been silent for about thirty seconds now. I blink and stand up straighter, a little embarrassed, but he just grins at me an expression that causes a single dimple to curl onto one cheek. Then, he holds out a hand.

"I'm Calvin," he says. "And honestly, your highness, it is...more than a pleasure to meet you. I hope you believe me on that."

Slowly, I reach out, my eyes still on his face, and I reach out my hand to slip it into his, accepting this small gesture of friendship. I open my mouth to introduce myself but –

Before I can

A pulse runs through me when my palm meets his, like the sound of a deep bass note resonating through my chest

It thrums through me, chased by something sharper – lighter – a second pulse, like lightening jumping through me, a spark that runs through my veins

I jump, working to pull my hand away, but before I can his fingers close around my hand, holding it tight.

Any expression – polite, or kind, or happy – falls from his face as he stares at me in shock.

We stand there, palm to palm, for a long, long moment. A moment too long, frankly, until I hear someone clear their throat next to me.

And then I look up into my mate's green eyes, his stern face, with my palm pressed tight in another man's hand. Our enemy's hand.

"Ella," Sinclair says, his eyes flicking to the Prince next to me, "are you...all right?"

"Yes!" I say, suddenly gasping in a deep breath and pulling my hand from Calvin's – honestly, I hadn't realized that I'd stopped breathing –

"Yes, Dominic," I say again, regaining my equanimity and smiling up at him, taking a step closer to his side. "I was just...greeting our guest," I say, gesturing towards the prince.

Sinclair turns his expression to the Prince, his eyes dark.

Chapter 437 – Be Careful, Little Mate

Ella

“I don’t think we’ve met,” Sinclair says, looking Calvin up and down, his voice low and dangerous.

“Not personally, no,” Calvin says, and I watch him, a little surprised to see that he has regained his composure faster than me. He again executes his sharp little bow, showing obeisance to Sinclair, the kind of gesture one Royal gives to another. “I am Prince Calvin, of Atalaxia. And, despite the uncouth gesture that my party made this morning, I hope you will believe me when I say that I am very pleased to be here and eager to build a good relationship between our nations.”

Sinclair raises his eyebrows in surprise, looking for a long moment at the Prince and then down at me, ”

Well,” Sinclair says, his words careful and measured. “It is good to hear you say that. After the events of the morning we were convinced that peace was not a priority for you.”

Clavin sighs and glances over his shoulder, to where the rest of his delegation are speaking quietly with a group of people I don’t know. ” Honestly highness,” he says, his voice low as if he’s seeking not to be overheard, “for many of them? It is not. But I hope that over the next few days I can convince you that you have at least one ally over this border.”

Slowly, Sinclair nods, pulling me closer to his side. “I look forward to being convinced,” my mate says evenly, still studying this strange Prince.

Clavin bows again to both of us, realizing that this interview is over. “A pleasure, your highnesses,” he murmurs, beginning to turn away.

“Ella,” I call – and I surprise myself to hear my name fall from my mouth.

Calvin turns back to us, slow, likewise surprised.

“Please,” I continue, “call me Ella.”

The Prince hesitates for a moment, flicking his eyes to Sinclair, but then he bows to me more deeply than he’s done before. “It will be a pleasure, Ella.”

And then he turns away.

I press myself closer to Sinclair’s side now, a little unnerved.

“What the hell was that,” Sinclair asks, his voice baffled but not at all angry at least not with me. I look up at him, slowly shaking my head. “I honestly don’t know,” I whisper.

But what I cannot deny?

Is that it was...something. Something real, something significant.

And as Sinclair and I find our way to Roger’s side – Cora and Rafe, I smile to see, are already making their way back into the room through the main door – I find my eyes following this strange prince.

Wondering who the hell he is, and what he could possibly want from me.

Sinclair and I go to bed late that night, after hours of chat with delegates from other countries. Honestly, even though all we did was stand around chatting, it feels like I’ve run a marathon.

I settle my sweet baby in his little crib, giving him a kiss on the head before flopping fully-dressed onto my own bed.

My mate laughs at me. “Ella,” he says, shaking his head, “up. Come on. You can’t fall asleep like this.”

“I can do what I want,” I mutter, turning stubbornly away from him. “I’m the Queen.”

Sinclair laughs harder now, coming close and slipping my shoes off my feet, which makes me moan a little with pleasure to feel them released. Sinclair, intuiting how good it feels, sits on the edge of the bed and takes one of my feet in his hands, beginning to massage it.

I moan again, louder this time.

“I like it when you make that noise,” he murmurs, his voice low, hungry. I open an eye and glance at him because honestly, even though I’m exhausted, when my mate talks like that?

Heat already begins to pool in my core.

“I like it when you make me make that noise,” I murmur back.

Growling with pleasure, my mate drops my foot and crawls over me until his body stretches above mine, holding his weight on his elbows to avoid crushing me completely. I take a deep, contented breath and turn onto my back, lifting my hands to pull his tuxedo shirt out of his pants and then slip my palms onto the hot, warm skin beneath.

Sinclair's growl deepens and he lowers himself, taking a deep breath of my scent before pressing determined kisses to my neck, my shoulders, my chest – every one of them sending a new shiver through my body.

"You were wonderful tonight," he murmurs, letting himself fall to the side and pulling me with him so that I'm pressed warm against him, stomach to stomach. "The perfect Queen."

"I was not," I laugh, pressing my hips close to his, wanting to feel him tight against me. "I didn't even know half of the nations that those delegates were from – I'm a sham Queen, very ignorant -"

"No," he murmurs, lifting his head to look at me, ensuring that I see and hear him. "You were perfectly yourself, Ella very charming. No one holds your lack of knowledge against you – they're aware of your story. They love that you're a real person who cares about her people – not some born-and- bred lady who knows how to affect the airs of a Queen and play the game."

"Yes," I say, my hands faltering a little on their path lower. "But doesn't that make me...a bit of a crappy Queen."

"No," he hums, closing his eyes and exhaling deeply when my hands continue their path, slowly unbuckling his belt. "It makes you perfect."

"All right," I laugh softly. "If you say so, Dominic. You know best."

"Damn right," he growls, and I laugh a little more. I get his belt undone and begin to start on the button of his pants but suddenly his hand is there, stopping me.

"What was that," he says, and I look up to see eyes on me now. "Earlier – with the Atalaxian Prince?"

I bite my lip, pulling my hands away. "Are you mad?"

"Why would I be mad?" he asks, frowning, a little concerned.

"Because I was talking to him," I say quietly, "by myself. When we sort of agreed that... we'd give them the cold shoulder, and all talk to them together."

"He cornered you, though, didn't he? Didn't give you a chance?"

"But that's also my fault," I sigh, shaking my head. "I should have just gone with Cora to change Rafe I was stupid, to try to cross the room alone."

“Ella,” Dominic murmurs, taking my chin in his hand and shaking his head at me. “It’s never so serious that you can’t cross a room alone. Honestly, if it was that dangerous I wouldn’t have put you in that situation.”

“But...I was nice to him, when I should have been cold” I say, grimacing a little. “He was hard to be cold to though, he was...nice, and charming, and he...charmed me a bit.”

“Did he?” Sinclair said, curious.

“Yes,” I say honestly, looking up at him. “I was prepared to cut him, to push past and move immediately to your side but – honestly, Dominic, he was really nice to me, and easy to talk to. I felt instantly disarmed.”

Sinclair hums a little, intrigued and a little worried. I stay quiet for a moment, letting him sort through his thoughts, watching his eyes go a little vague as I see him turn things over. When he focuses again on me, I know he’s made a decision.

“He surprised me as well,” Sinclair says, his voice even and considerate. “I didn’t expect one of them to single themselves out, to...suggest that there were divisions in their faction. If it’s a ploy by them, it is...a strange one. Though not unconvincing? I don’t know. I need to talk to my dad about it – see what he thinks.”

“I think that’s a good idea,” I murmur, bringing my hands back to their place on Sinclair’s warm body now, wiggling myself closer.

“But Ella,” Sinclair says, his voice still serious, letting me know he’s not finished. I look up into his eyes again. “Be careful with him, all right? He’s been ...curious about you. I haven’t missed the way he focuses on you. It may also be a tactic a part of their plan. Just... be on your guard and trust your instincts when it comes to this Prince, yes?”

“All right, Dominic,” I murmur, nodding to him. “I promise I will.”

“Good girl,” he growls, wrapping a hand around my back and pulling me tight against him again before using that same hand to begin to work at the zipper that trails down my spine.

“So,” I say pouting a little as I slip my hand down his stomach, into the top of his pants, reaching for him. “I’m not in any trouble?”

Sinclair’s growl deepens as I take the wide, hard mass of him into my hand and begin to slowly stroke.

“Why, little mate,” he rumbles, his voice catching a little, “Did you want to be?”

His hand slips into the open back of my dress now, taking a full handful of my ass into his palm, making my breath come hot and short.

“Well,” I whisper, smiling a little bit as I tilt my face up to his, bringing my mouth close so that I say my next words directly onto his lips. “Maybe just a little bit...”

My mate snarls, a vicious noise that makes me smile, before lifting his hand into the air and delivering a sharp smack right in the place it just left, right on my ass.

The sharp feel of it reverberates through me and I moan louder now but before I can make much noise at all my mate silences me with his mouth over mine.

Chapter 438 – Coronation

Sinclair and I wake up only a few short hours later, our clothing spread out all over the bed and floor all around us, because today is the big day.

I groan a little when I feel Sinclair stir.

“No,” I murmur, wrapping my arm around him and pulling him back down. Or, I should say that he lets me pull him back down. Because there’s no way I’m strong enough to physically make my big scary Alpha do anything he doesn’t want to do.

But he is sweet, and obliges me.

“I know,” he murmurs, cupping my face in his gigantic hand. “I’m sorry, trouble. But we’ve got to get up and look pretty for our big day.”

“Let’s just go ugly,” I sigh. “Really... lower expectations for the rest of your reign. You can rule in sweatpants and t- shirts. They’ll call you the Comfortable King.”

He laughs, and I can feel him shake his head. “Come on, Ella,” he cajoles. “Don’t you want to look pretty to match the crown?”

I crack an eye open, tempted. Because honestly, I forgot about the crown. I’ve been very much looking forward to the crown.

He laughs again, looking down at me. There she is,” he says, smiling at me. “My little magpie. Come on, gorgeous.”

“Fine,” I sigh, sitting up straight with a pout. “But I am having two cups of coffee today, which means that that one-” I say, pointing to the baby, “is going to be all jittery all day.”

“A compromise I think we can accept for one day,” Sinclair says, pulling me close. I turn my face up to him, sensing that he wants it, and Sinclair kisses me long and lingering. As he does he passes feelings to me down the bond pride, and happiness, and a great deal of contentment.

And I pass him back my own feelings much the same, as well as a great deal of hope and pleasure to see him lead this nation for which he’s fought for so long. When Sinclair breaks our kiss, he beams down at me.

“Thank you,” he murmurs, shaking his head at me in wonder. And I smile back. “You’re going to be a wonderful King, Dominic.”

He wraps his arms tight around me, taking a deep breath, simply accepting my faith in him. And I let him hold me tight and warm, pleased to the end of me to see this day finally begin.

We only let go of each other when Rafe gives a little squeak, wondering why we've let him lay alone in his little crib for so long even though we clearly know he's awake.

Sinclair and I both laugh.

"He wants in on the love," I say happily, crawling away from my mate and getting out of bed to gather my little baby in my arms.

"It's a big day for him too," Sinclair says, likewise getting out of bed and coming over to the two of us, kissing Rafe on the head. "He'll be a Prince, after all, once the day is done."

"Hear that!?" I say to the baby, laughing a little. "Little Prince Rafe! Cutest little heir to the throne that there ever was!"

"True," Sinclair murmurs, dropping a kiss to my head too and then moving towards the bathroom as I take Rafe to his changing table to get him ready for our big day.

The day, as predicted, is...incredibly long.

I starts with a great deal of formality as Sinclair leads me into a room that is a strange mix of auditorium and conference chamber, with the kind of stadium seating all around that looks more like...I don't know, a college lecture hall?

But instead of there being a stage at the front of the room, the seating is on three sides of it, with an elaborate table on the fourth side of the room and a narrow empty space at the center. Sinclair seats himself at the center of elaborate table, with me to his right and his father to his left. I look behind me and grin when I see Cora and Roger come into the room, dressed in the traditional formal clothing of nobility of Moon Valley.

Sinclair and I are likewise formally dressed, with me in a burgundy velvet gown with a matching cape and Sinclair in a sleek black jacket and pants with a blue sash over the front as well as a great number of medals. I don't know what any of the medals mean, but he does look dashing.

Which, honestly, is all that matters to me.

I grin down at little Rafe, who is dressed like his father no medals, though – and he grins up at me, giving a little squeal. I smile at him, laughing. "Are you excited for the big day?" I whisper, giving him a little pulse of curiosity down our bond.

He sends me a happy pulse back, letting me know how he feels. A little thrill goes through me, as it always does, to be able to communicate so effectively with my son even though he is so young. And he laughs as he looks up at me, almost as if he's happy about it too.

I give him a big hug, pressing a couple of kisses to his soft hair, before I feel Sinclair's warm hand on my back.

"Ready?" he asks, and I beam up at him, giving a single nod.

What happens next takes...hours, and a great deal of patience. But as each of the governors of the distinct provinces of our nation comes forward and affirms Sinclair as their choice for King, I remind myself that this is actually the important thing. The elaborate coronation will come next, but this? Where first the governors and then the individual packs consent to be ruled?

I glance at the smaller cohort of five Atalaxians just visible at the back of the room, knowing that this is not their process: that they rule their people by force and sheer will.

And even as I'm bored to the ends of me over the extent of this hours-long process and have to work every minute keeping the boredom off my face so as not to insult our citizens, I recognize the importance of this, of the people having a say in their ruler, even a King.

Their recognition that this man is the best one to lead us.

So as each governor and pack leader pledges their fealty and support, Sinclair gives a deep nod of recognition, and I follow suit, trying to look them all in the eye to let them know that they're seen, that they're heard, and that we will truly do our best.

Still, as the final delegates come forward, I can't help shifting in my chair just a little bit because...it has been a long time. I look jealously down at the little bassinet by my side where Rafe naps, giving a little sigh through my nose.

Must be nice, to be a little baby prince, sleeping through the biggest day of his life.

But then, finally, it is done, and Sinclair takes my hand and helps me to my feet. And as the people cheer he raises our joined hands in a sign of victory.

Our people have elected, unanimously, to support Sinclair's claim for the throne. There were some who took the opportunity to make their doubts known – which is their right – but overall the support was enthusiastic. And I smile out at our people, incredibly pleased that they see what I see in my mate: a warm, dedicated, powerful man who will be good for this nation for all of us.

Rafe sends me an eager little pulse down the bond, letting me know he's awake and a little afraid of all the noise. I drop my mate's hand to pick up the baby, and the crow cheers anew when they see Rafe in my arms, blinking around at all of them confused.

Sinclair wraps an arm around my shoulders, smiling at both of us. "Ready for what's next?" he asks, eager.

"Yup," I say, grinning up at him. "Time for the crowns!"

Chapter 439 – The Crowd’s Approva

Ella

We move immediately to the grand hall of the palace, where we met our delegates a few nights ago. Sinclair and I wait quietly in a little room off the side of the entrance for everyone from the first room to move to their chairs in the second, where there are already thousands of people waiting. While there was only room in the first chamber for a small selection of our population, the grand hall is much larger.

And it’s packed.

I squeal a little bit with excitement as I peek through a little velvet curtain that covers a window on the door, excited to see so many people gathered to celebrate with us. I lift Rafe so he can see too, but then I feel a hand on my shoulder and turn to see my sister’s beaming face.

“Ella!” she laughs as I squeal and wrap my free arm around her. She wraps her arms tight around me, rocking me back and forth. “I’m so happy for you both,” she murmurs into my shoulder, laughing a little. ” Unanimous! It’s unprecedented!”

“Happy for all of us!” I laugh, pulling back to grin at her a little. Rafe reaches for her, happy, and Cora gives him a kiss and a cuddle, but doesn’t take him from me. Not yet.

I glance behind Cora to see Roger happy at Sinclair’s side, their father with them. They’re speaking with a couple of the Royal aids, who are showing them something on an ipad.

“What is that?” I ask.

“Probably footage from outside,” Cora says, still smiling. “It’s crazy out there, Ella. The streets are filled.”

“Oh,” I say, my expression suddenly falling with worry as I glance towards the door. “Is that...safe?”

“No, the crowds are all really happy,” Cora says, her eyebrows going up. There aren’t a ton of humans, but those who are there are celebrating.” She takes a moment to smile at me softly. ” They’ve done a lot of analysis and polling, Ella, and they say that the humans were largely convinced to support Sinclair’s reign because of you.”

“What?” I ask, confused. I mean – I haven’t even been in the public eye for long –

“Yeah,” she says, nodding eagerly. ” They know that you cleared out the refugee camps and got all of those people help – and they love your story orphan girl, who found her mate by chance, and didn't even know she was a wolf? And they don't know the details of your divinity or your magic-but there are lots of rumors of your healing going around, and everyone is very excited about what you can do, and the fact that you're using your gift on the most needy populations. You're kind of like...beloved, Ella!"

I blush at this and swat her away. "That's ridiculous, Cora," I murmur. "I'm sure you're exaggerating – it's all for Sinclair –"

"No," she says, serious now. "It's real, Ella. Wolves and humans alike – they love you."

I look at the floor a little, blushing harder – and I find that even as I desperately hope that it's true, I can't really believe it.

Because I mean I want the people to know that I love them and I'm going to help them. But beloved? That just seems-"Ready?" Sinclair says, coming over and looking between Cora and I. Roger grins at me from beyond my mate.

"Oh, she's ready," Roger laughs, "She's been waiting to get her hands on that crown for weeks now."

"Don't be jealous, Roger," I say, raising my chin at him and pretending to be haughty. "Just because you don't get a crown."

"It's true," he sighs, pretending grief. "I just get a stupid necklace."

"It's a livery collar," Cora sighs, rolling her eyes and moving to his side, looping her arm in his. "If you call it a necklace again I'm going to smack you."

"If we kill them now," Roger says in a false stage whisper, loud enough for us to hear, "we can take it all, Cora!"

Cora and I burst out laughing at this clear joke, but Sinclair just glares at his brother and shoves him on his shoulder. "Don't even think about it, Rog," he growls. "You don't want the work."

"Truth, brother," Roger says, clapping Sinclair cheerfully on the shoulder. "Your life is safe with me."

"Boys?" Henry says, rolling over and looking sternly up at his sons. "If you're done kidding around? We have a coronation to begin."

Both Sinclair and Roger have the decency to look mildly ashamed of themselves, making Cora and I laugh again.

Sinclair looks down at me, and I nod, letting him know that I'm ready. We rehearsed this all, after all. Sinclair will go first, and then me second, and then Cora will take Rafe and she, Roger, and Henry will go down the long aisle to the front of the room, where the thrones sit. It's all been timed very precisely, and we've got one chance to get it right.

It's televised, after all, and Henry emphasized how important it was for us to let the world see us as dignified, serious people who take our responsibilities with the gravity that they deserve. And I agree with him – as much as our family likes to joke around and tease, I know that in our hearts we're all determined to show the people of our nation the respect they deserve.

So, collectively, we all pull ourselves together.

Sinclair drops a lingering kiss to my lips and then moves to the door, where his aids are waiting to give him any final briefs. I exhale a deep breath and stand behind him, passing Rafe to Cora after giving him a kiss on the cheek. The baby grumbles a little but goes to her and I spread my hands down over my velvet dress, hoping to hell that I'm not all wrinkled and don't have any baby spit-up over my shoulder or anything.

Cora and Roger settle in line behind me with Henry and my pulse begins to speed up as the door before us opens and I hear the crowd roar their approval. Sinclair sends one last smile over his shoulder to me and then moves forward, moving slowly and deliberately into the room to walk down the long aisle to the throne he has claimed with the support of his people.

The aids smile at me, waving me gently forward. I move just to the edge of the door, not letting the people see me yet – as was planned – and, when the count reaches the two-minute mark – meaning that Sinclair has reached the throne – the aids wave at me, signaling me to begin.

Taking a deep breath, I step towards the door, and then through it, and a huge roar bursts out in the room. A blush raises on my cheek as a smile bursts onto my face.

I bite my lip a little – because I know that I'm supposed to be dignified and serious right now, but the way that they're cheering for me –

I can't help it. I raise a hand to my heart, and bow my head a little, completely overwhelmed and humbled by their approval. Contrary to my intent, the cheering only increases. I laugh a little, shaking my head and then begin to walk forward.

But even as the crowd claps and cheers, I hear a noise behind me that makes me turn, just a little bit.

My little baby – Rafe – crying for me.

And my heart breaks as I feel him sending pulses down the bond, looking for me a little afraid of all the noise and being left alone, even though he loves his auntie Cora.

Still, he's looking for me –

And despite the fact that I know I should move forward, that all of this is timed-

I turn back, seeking my son.

Chapter 440 – A King, A Queen

The aids go pale as they see me hurry back to the door, their eyes going wide. This is not protocol

“Ella!” Cora gasps, her eyes moving quickly over me as she bounces Rafe in her arms, trying to calm him. “What are you doing!?”

“He wants me, Cora,” I breathe, hurrying to her side and reaching for my baby. Cora doesn’t hesitate, handing him over to me, even though she rolls her eyes.

“He’s going to be fine!”

“Well, he is now!” I say, already turning back to the door, my baby beginning to calm, though his face is still red and a few tears stand out on his cheeks.

The aids wave to me frantically and I nod to them, mouthing my apologies as I again head through the door and hurry towards the aisle.

The crowd, which had gone quiet in their confusion, suddenly bursts into the loudest cheer yet, a great deal of laughter and joy in their noise now. I laugh along with them as I head down the aisle, shrugging my apology and hoping that they understand. Because as much as I’d love to be their dignified queen?

I’m always going to be a mother first.

There’s a huge smile on my face as the crowd cheers for Rafe and I, as I coo to him and wipe the tears from his face, as I see him look around at everyone in wonder and surprise. He’s not scared anymore not with me holding him. Someone in the crowd shouts his name and I swear he turns when he hears it, making me laugh.

And then when I’m about halfway down the long aisle – I finally glance towards the throne and see my mate standing at the end of the aisle, waiting for us. And my smile deepens as a thrill runs through me from head to foot to see him there, waiting for me. I swear, my feet start to move faster of their own volition, eager to carry me to his side.

And – even though I didn’t mean for them to see it – the crowd loves it, and cheers harder. I laugh at this too, reaching out a hand for Sinclair when I come to the end of the aisle and climb the three short steps up to him.

“I’m sorry,” I say, still laughing as he takes my hand and pulls me to his side. “I tried to be dignified – it didn’t work

“It’s all right, trouble,” he murmurs, kissing my hair. “This was better. It was you.”

I almost purr with happiness then, pressing my face briefly to his chest and letting him hug me before taking a deep breath and standing straight at his side. Because he's right – as much as I thought the people of this nation wanted me to be their dignified queen...

Well. They'll just have to make do with regular old me.

And maybe that's all they really want anyway.

I'm smiling, warm and happy, as I watch my sister and her mate come down the aisle, walking slowly behind Henry, who really does manage to look strong and dignified as he makes his way towards us. When he reaches the end Henry makes a short detour up the little ramp that we had built for him as Cora and Roger come up to stand at our side – Cora next to me, and Roger next to his brother, presenting a united front.

The next bits go as fast as the previous meeting was slow.

The mayor of our fine city – a human – comes forward along with the head of the largest pack – a wolf – to together perform the ceremony. Sinclair and I turn towards them and he goes to one knee, reciting an oath to dedicating his life to protecting this nation and its people.

I smile, watching him make his vow, especially the words that we had changed, which promise explicitly to protect and serve both wolf and human kind together. One that is done the mayor hands Sinclair a scepter that marks his sovereignty, and then the pack leader comes forward to reverently place a crown on his head, declaring him King.

When Sinclair stands, the crowd roars their approval. He faces them all and looks around smiling, nodding deeply to let them know that he accepts his new position with the gravity that it is due. The cheer goes on for a long time and I send Sinclair a little pulse of joy. He turns to me then, taking my hand and beaming his own happiness at me.

It takes a few moments, but when the crowd dies down Sinclair turns towards the throne, accepting from one of the aids another crown from atop a blue velvet pillow.

I find my face settling into serious lines now as I see it, finally, in his hands.

Because while I've joked about wanting to wear this crown and it really is very pretty – I'm well aware that it's not a piece of costume jewelry to be played with. That it is, instead, a very real promise that I'm making to the people of this nation to care for them, and protect them, and fight for them.

And I intend to live the rest of my life making that promise come true. I tilt my chin up to my love, my mate, holding his gaze as he lifts the crown above my head with both of his hands.

"I crown you, Ella Sinclair," he says, his voice booming through the room. "As my mate and my Queen. You are my whole heart, my conscience, my peace, and my will. You are the greatest joy of my life and the best gift I can give to my people is to have you by my side. Do you accept?"

Slowly, I lower my head and bend my knees, just a little, impulsively pressing a hand again to my heart that I hope shows how much his words have meant to me. And then, as I bow to my King, my mate, and before my people

I feel the crown come to rest on my rose-gold hair.

And the crowd cheers again.

I stand, beaming out at all of the people who shout my name, a few tears coming to my eyes as I realize that their support is genuine – that maybe... maybe they're starting to see how much I love them, and love me back.

Overwhelmed, I wrap an arm around my mate's waist, leaning into him.

"A little more, trouble," he murmurs into my ear, and I look up at him, surprised. Because whenever we've practiced this before that was the end of it. Just a little procession back down the aisle and then the party

"What?" I ask.

"A surprise," he murmurs, and then his face bursts into a grin as he turns away from me. I follow the direction in which he reaches, turning backwards to see-

And I gasp when I see another velvet pillow, and on top of it-

A teeny tiny golden crown, just a little precious circlet unadorned by any jewels, just big enough for a baby's head-

Chapter 441 – A Prince

Ella

I can't help it, not at all. I burst immediately into tears. The crowd, when they realize what's going on and when I think they see my over-emotional reaction to it – begin to again shout their approval. Sinclair laughs when he sees me crying, shaking his head at me as he returns to my side with the little crown in his hands.

"Well, if you didn't want me to cry!" I say, stamping my foot lightly, "you should have told me!"

"Nah," Sinclair says, smiling at me, his voice soft but somehow still audible over the cheers of the crowd. "This is way better. It was worth it to see your face."

"Okay well," I say in a rush, wiping hastily at my cheeks before raising Rafe a little so that he's sitting straight up in my arms, looking up at his father with a happy smile. "Get on with it! I want to see how he looks!"

Sinclair laughs at me, shaking his head, and the crowd quiets, eager to hear what their King will say.

"Rafe Sinclair," my mate says, looking seriously at his son. But Rafe frowns and waves his hands at him, confused by the seriousness of his voice, which makes Sinclair instantly laugh and have to start over.

The crowd laughs along with us, pleased, I think, to see their serious King look so human, to see how much he loves his son.

"Rafe Sinclair," my mate tries again, his voice lighter this time, and Rafe lets out a little squeal of joy that threatens to make me cry again. Sinclair grins, leaning over a little. "I crown you as my Prince and my heir, to ascend to this throne when it is your time to rule. I promise to raise you to understand this responsibility, to grow to be a good man, and to deserve it."

And then, when I think my heart will burst with love, Sinclair gently places the little crown on Rafe's tiny head.

I watch eagerly to see what Rafe will do and then I burst into laughter when he reaches his pudgy hands up touching it experimentally, trying to get a grip on it so he can pull it off.

But I move his little hand away and the crowd again bursts into cheers, charmed – I know – by their little Prince, who deserves every moment of their adoration.

I step close to Sinclair, turning my head up to him, and he bends a little and kisses me, warm and real and true. I lose myself to the kiss, loving him so much I can hardly bear it, and I have no idea, really, if the crowd cheers to see us because I'm lost in him.

The next thing I know Sinclair has his arm wrapped around my shoulders, and he's leading me back down the aisle, and we're waving to our people.

Before I know it, we have left all the people behind, and we're back in the private little room at the front of the great hall, and Henry and Cora and Roger come in smiling and laughing behind us.

But I have no eyes for them – instead, I can only look up at my mate, my Alpha, my King, my love for him shining and beaming down our bond.

"I love you, little Queen," he murmurs, an arm around my waist pulling me close, Rafe snuggled between us. Sinclair uses his other hand to tilt my chin up towards him. "You look just as good in that crown as I thought you would."

"Wait till you see me later," I murmur, feeling a mischievous.

"Later?" he asks, quirking an eyebrow at me.

"I believe," I say quietly, wanting to keep it between us, "that I promised to show you what I look like in nothing but this crown."

A growl reverberates in his chest, and my King lowers his head, and he kisses me. And I stand on my toes and kiss him right back.

The party that night is a big one. The guest list isn't completely open the majority of our citizens are celebrating out on the street – but there are certainly hundreds of people here.

Everyone from each of the foreign delegations were invited to celebrate with us, along with many of our most honored citizens.

I admit that I'm nearly overwhelmed by all of the guests and the attention. Sinclair and I spend hours turning to each new person who comes forward to greet us, to congratulate us, to shake our hands and tell us about their excitement for the future of the nation. I do my best to give each of them my full attention and to match their enthusiasm.

The result, of course, is that after three hours of the party I'm totally exhausted. But the ballroom is still packed with people, and our job isn't nearly done, so I squeeze Sinclair's hand, and kiss Rafe's head, and turn to the next person who claims our attention.

“Hey!” A familiar voice shouts, and my face bursts into a grin as I turn to see little Benny from the human refugee camp rushing towards me at the head of about five children, some of whom I recognize from the same place.

“Hey, Ben!” I say, not needing to force my enthusiasm this time as I crouch down and open an arm to welcome him into a hug. “I’m so glad you could come!”

I sent an invitation to the children’s home about a week ago encouraging some caretakers and children to attend, but I hadn’t received any word back. I look over Benny’s head and smile warmly at the other children and at the caretakers who brought them, who each give me a shy wave.

“I didn’t know you were a Queen,” Benny says, frowning up at my crown after he pulls back from my hug.

“Well, that makes sense,” I say, wrinkling my nose at him. “Considering I just became one today.”

“I thought you had to be born a Queen,” Benny replies, turning his head and studying my crown curiously. Then he turns to look at Rafe, who is dozing a little, his own little crown still perched on his head. “Like him.”

“Well,” I say, considering. “I guess it happens all sorts of ways.”

“So, can I become a king?” Benny asks, curious.

“Is someone already trying to take my job?” Sinclair asks, coming up behind me, and I laugh, looking up at him.

“I think you’ve got some stiff competition,” I reply, and then I stand up, gesturing towards Benny and the other children, introducing them to their King, who graciously leans down and shakes each of the orphans’ little hands. Afterwards, we greet the caretakers warmly, telling them how much we appreciate their work.

“I know that Ella intends to be more deeply involved in the future,” Sinclair says, smiling at me. “If you’ll allow her to.”

“Oh, we’d welcome the help,” one of the caretakers says.

“Then I’ll come visit,” I say with a big smile. But Sinclair squeezes my hand, letting me know that while he recognizes that I could spend all night with these important guests, we have more to see. So I sigh and crouch down again, telling the children about the huge table of deserts in the next room that they’re welcome to raid to their hearts’ content.

Thrilled, the children rush off.

“We’ll have some more desert sent home,” I say to one of the caretakers as she passes, touching her arm on her way. “A whole truck load – enough for all of the children. Would that be all right?”

She nods, thanking me, and then moves on.

“You like them,” Sinclair murmurs in my ear. “You like that little boy most of all.”

“Yes,” I sigh, glancing up at him. “Am I so obvious with my favorites?”

“Only to me,” he whispers, giving me a kiss on the forehead as we both turn to look at our next guest. But when we see who it is, all of the joy leeches from both of us.

Because standing there, in front of us, ready to congratulate us on the happiest day of our lives, is my uncle Xander.

Chapter 442 – A Private Chat

Ella

My face falls into stern, cold lines as I see my uncle step forward. He was invited to this party, of course, as part of the delegation – but honestly, after our stern message to the Atalaxians about how he was not welcome, I'm surprised that he was willing to attend.

I look up at Sinclair and follow his hard gaze towards his security team, which nods to him, assuring him that they fully vetted Xander, ensuring that he held no weapons or means of hurting us.

And considering that my mate is a weapon himself and could tear this man to pieces as easily as breathing, I suppose that there's nothing to worry about either way. Still, I tighten my arms around my child and feel Sinclair bristle behind me, his hackles rising.

Inside me, my wolf has her teeth fully bared, snapping, eager to sink her teeth into this terrible man.

I don't bother to calm her. Her rage is justified.

Perhaps sensing the effect he has on us, Xander smiles a little smugly and steps forward just one step, giving us a deep bow.

"Your highnesses," he says, his voice clear and precise. "I come to offer you my congratulations on your ascension to the throne and the naming of your heir. It is...quite an accomplishment."

"Not without its obstacles, of course," Sinclair says, a bit through his teeth. "But yes, it is a wonderful day – though one darkened by your presence. I'll ask you to leave now, Xander. You are not welcome here, despite the protection of the Atalaxian government. If you refuse, I'll have you removed."

"I'll go," he says, straightening, his eyes going immediately to Rafe in my arms. "I merely wanted a chance to see the child I arranged to bring into the world. He is...as handsome a specimen as I hoped he would be."

"But no desire to see me, or acknowledge my presence?" I snap, riled despite myself. "Your own blood? Your brother's child?"

"My brother's daughter," Xander corrects, not bothering to be vicious with his words or to look at me, his eyes still on Rafe. "My focus rests on the male line."

Slowly, I turn and pass my child to his father, who takes him willingly. Then I take two steps forward, interposing myself between myself and Rafe so that Xander forced to look at me. When he bends to try to look around me I shift my weight so that he cannot.

“No.” I snap, my voice as cold as ice. “You will look at me, Xander. I am your Queen.”

“You are not my queen,” he hisses, his eyes finally meeting mine, flinty and dark. “I am Atalaxian now.”

“It does not matter to me,” I say, dismissive, and then – without really realizing what I’m doing – I access my gift. I don’t close my eyes to do it this time, instead allowing the lavender calmness to radiate from me, to reach out towards him. I can see it, the lavender tint that the air around us takes, but I’m not sure if everyone can. Not that it really matters.

“What,” Xander breathes, hissing as my gift touches him, as he feels it begin to work, to sweep through his body.

I don’t let it heal, merely seek. And I see...all of it, inside of him.

“You will die,” I say, quietly and calmly. “No matter who your Queen is, or what country you call home. I can see it within you – the cancer is taking hold, spreading throughout. Even if you had gotten Rafe away from us, you wouldn’t have lived long enough to enjoy any real time on your throne.”

“Lies,” Xander hisses, taking a frightened step from me. “You are a witch – like all women -”

“Enjoy the rest of your short life, Xander,” I say with a sigh, turning away from him and returning to Sinclair’s side, taking my child back into my arms. “We need not bother killing you. You’ll be dead soon.”

“You have cursed me – ”

“I didn’t need to,” I interrupt, my voice bored. “Now go away. We have celebrations to attend. I’ll tell Sarah and Jessica you said hello,”

Xander stiffens at this, his eyes flashing as he looks between Sinclair and I. “My property – ” he growls. “You will return them immediately – ”

“People aren’t property, you horrible old fool.” Then I sigh and turn my eyes to Sinclair’s guards and nod. Instantly, they come forward and grab Xander by the arms, dragging him away. He makes a fuss, drawing some gazes, but he’s removed from the room quickly enough that the disturbance largely goes unnoticed.

I sigh then, letting my shoulders slump for a moment as I turn towards Sinclair, resting my head against his chest. "Are you all right?" he murmurs, running a comforting hand down my back.

"I am," I say, nodding and taking a deep breath. Then I look up at him. "I'm sorry – did I...I don't want to cause an international incident. I hope I did right there."

A little smile turns up his lips. "You did perfectly, Queen," he says, running his knuckles down my cheek. "Do you need a moment?"

"Would you mind?" I ask, looking towards the open door to a small balcony nearby. "Just to...collect myself."

"Not at all," he says, reaching for the baby. But I hold Rafe close.

"I want him with me," I say, grimacing a little.

"Of course," Sinclair murmurs, dropping a kiss to my lips and pressing a hand to my back, urging me to take what time I need. "I'd come with you, but-"

"No," I say, smiling up at him. "The people need their King. We won't keep them waiting."

He nods, proud of me, and I whisper again that I'll only take a moment before heading directly for the balcony and the fresh air it promises. I hear footsteps behind me and look curiously over my shoulder, a smile lighting my face when I see that Sinclair has sent Conner to keep an eye on us if we need him.

Conner smiles back at me, giving me a little nod, and feeling more peaceful already I step out into the dark of the little balcony. It is instantly quieter the moment I step through the doors and I take a deep breath of the fresh night air, closing my eyes for a second as I let the breeze rush over my skin. Rafe burbles a little in happiness, and I laugh, looking down at him. "Do you like the peace and quiet too, baby Prince?" I ask quietly, and he grins and waves his hand, telling me he does.

I laugh again, lifting him a little to press a kiss to his face before stepping to the edge of the balcony, leaning against the rail and letting my body relax.

My mind turns, predictably, to my horrible uncle – and all of the terrible things that he said to me just a few moments ago. I mean, none of them were a surprise – Henry has long suggested that Xander would feel that way about me, about Rafe.

But still – hearing it from his own lips? It was still a blow, to hear someone be so horrible, so callous.

I scowl a little, considering that I perhaps shouldn't have mentioned Sarah and Jessica at all that that was a slip and a mistake that I tripped into because I was so mad

But I don't get very far into the consideration as a shadow peels itself from the wall, clearing its throat awkwardly.

I jump and give a little shriek as the shadow steps forward.

Chapter 443 – A Drink

“Please,” the shadow says, his voice awkward and apologetic.

I’m still rigid with fear when Conner storms out onto the balcony, his hand smacking the shadow-person in the chest, slamming him against the wall. ” Who the hell are you!?” Conner demands.

“Please!” the shadow says again, “I’m so sorry! I was just standing out here, also getting fresh air! This is a complete accident!”

And suddenly, the voice snaps into place in my memory. “Conner!” I call, Rafe fussing in my arms, not liking the sudden change in my energy and the fear spiking through me, though I’m calmer now. “Please – it’s the Atalaxian Prince. He is – I don’t believe he means us any harm.”

And even though something about that concept doesn’t match up – an Atalaxian? Not meaning us any harm? Especially after the meeting I just had with my uncle?

Still, somehow, I know the truth of it down in my bones. He doesn’t.

Conner glances at me and then backs up a little, removing his hand from the Prince’s chest. “Should I escort him out of here, Luna?”

“No,” I sigh, shaking my head. “Not unless he wants to go, of course. But the night air is for everyone. I can’t have it all to myself just because I’m the Queen.”

The prince looks between Conner and I for a moment, stepping further into the light so I can see his pale features and the details of his chic black suit. “I would...stay, for a moment, if that’s all right? Have a quiet word with you, so that we don’t leave this evening on bad terms?”

“That’s fine,” I say quietly, somehow a little pleased that he will stay. I’m still terribly curious about him, perhaps despite myself.

“Would you mind?” Conner says to the prince, his voice tight. “If I performed a body check? To ensure that you don’t have...”

“Be my guest,” the prince says, spreading his arms wide and allowing Calvin to pat down the sides of his body, and then his legs.

When Conner stands up and nods to me, his face quite serious, I nod back to him and give him a smile, grateful for his protection. “I’ll be just inside the door, Luna,” Conner says.

“Thank you,” I say, genuinely meaning it, hoping that he hears the sincerity in my voice. Conner nods again and steps to the door, standing with one foot in the ballroom and the other out on the balcony, a constant threat to Calvin should he make one wrong move.

“Protective of you,” Calvin says, glancing at Conner and taking a few steps closer to me not too close, but close enough to be conversational. “As he should be. Your men are loyal.”

“As loyal to me as I am to them,” I say with a little shrug, studying Calvin’s face carefully. As I do, I wonder a little how did he blend so seamlessly into the shadows? It’s not that dark out here was I just so distracted that I missed him?

Or is something else going on?

“Congratulations,” Calvin says, dipping into a little bow. “The ceremony today was very moving, as was the vote. It is inspiring to see how much your people support you – the wolves and the humans both.”

“Is it?” I ask, turning my head a little. “Do you...not get this kind of support from your own people?”

“I’m afraid it’s not a question we ask them,” he says, his voice a little chagrined. “My father’s policy is instead to...tell the people how they feel about the royal family. And then punish them if they show any evidence to the contrary.”

I raise my eyebrows, genuinely surprised that he’s being so candid with me.

“I can’t say that I think this policy is wise,” I murmur, wanting to shout from the rooftop that his father is a tyrant, but working very, very hard to be a diplomatic Queen.

“You can be harsher than that if you wish, Queen,” Calvin says, smirking a little as he takes a step closer at me and studies my face for a moment before dropping his gaze to Rafe in my arms. “I certainly won’t tell anyone.” He’s quiet for a moment and I adjust the baby so he can see my son better.

A smile comes to Calvin’s face. “Your son is a very handsome boy,” he says, smiling at Rafe. “I’m sure he’ll grow to be a strong King, like his father.”

“Thank you,” I say quietly, looking proudly down at Rafe myself. Then I look up at Calvin, curious. He’s young, I think my own age – certainly younger than Sinclair – but, well, I’m a parent, aren’t I?

“Do you have children of your own, Calvin?” I ask.

I find myself surprised when he nods and smiles, bringing his gaze up to mine. “Two,” he says, his smile growing as he thinks of them. “My Luna gave birth to our son just a few months ago – he’s just barely older than this one here.”

I grin broadly at him, liking him even more now that I know he’s a father. There’s something about that – the alliance between parents who love their children. And damn it, even if I was determined to hate the Atalaxians... well, I can’t hate all of them now, can I?

Which, I suppose, is perhaps what this prince wanted.

But something about what he said...I turn my head a little, curious. Something about his words strikes me as...wrong. And I can’t put my finger on it just yet.

“And your other child?” I ask, curious.

“My daughter just turned three,” he replies, his smile increasing. “She is...well, she makes me laugh more than I thought anyone ever could. She’s a joy to me.”

“That’s wonderful,” I say quietly, smiling up at this man who is such a surprise. Because he seems – honestly, he seems like he could be a friend. ” Dominic and I hope to give Rafe a little sister at some point, to torture him a bit.”

Calvin laughs at this, shaking his head. “No, little girls are always a gift. I’m sure Rafe will treasure her.”

“Calvin,” I say softly, almost a sigh, taking another step closer and taking a risk, unable to hold back my words any more. “Considering your country’s policies on women and girls – you have to realize that what you’re saying comes as a surprise to me.”

He nods slowly, sighing a bit through his nose. “Well perhaps it is less of a surprise to you then,” he says softly, his words barely audible as he glances towards the door. “That the father of a very beloved daughter might want a stronger alliance with a nation that feels very differently about girls and their futures.”

I look up at him and see true honesty in his eyes, and I’m struck and moved by it. I open my mouth to make him that promise of friendship on the spot when suddenly I realize...

That while Calvin has mentioned twice how much he loves his daughter and wants more for her...he didn’t include her mother in that sentiment. And when he mentioned her before, he referred to her not as his “mate,” but as his “Luna.”

I frown now, confused, staring up at him.

“What?” Calvin asks, taking another step towards me, concerned I think to see my concern. He reaches out a hand, I think instinctually, seeking to press it against my own arm to help where he can-

And as he leans closer, suddenly his scent hits me in a wave-

My eyes go wide as I breathe in the crisp winter scent of him – starlight on snow, and frost, and bergamot – my nose even tingles the way it does when I sense snow in the air

–

And – something moves within me I don’t know what, because it’s not...it’s not big enough to be truly real, but it is something that feels remarkably like

Like...a bond.

A bond, between me and this strange prince.

And as I step away from him the prince’s eyes go wide as he senses it too.

Chapter 444 – Into You

“Ella,” Clavin says, his voice thick with emotion. His hand continues its path, reaching for me, his fingers brushing the velvet sleeve of my gown before I can pull away.

“What,” I whisper, taking a few steps back, wanting space between us. “What was that?”

“I don’t – ”

Before he can finish though, we both turn towards the darkened doorway to the balcony. I instantly recognize the silhouette I see there as my mate’s and breathe out a breath of relief.

I mean it’s not that I think that Calvin or I did anything wrong, or that Calvin was going to hurt me, but whatever passed between us? It was strange.

And suddenly as I remember the pulse that happened last night, when Calvin touched my hand – I want my mate here, now, at my side.

“Is everything all right out here?” Sinclair growls, his voice low and full of the threat that his words don’t carry.

He takes a step forward into the darkness as Calvin takes a step away from me and bows to him, both a formality shown to a king and a display of deference to an Alpha who thinks he might sense a threat to his mate.

“Everything is fine, Dominic,” I say, holding out a hand to him, doing my best to keep my voice light though I suspect I’m failing a little bit. “Prince Calvin was just telling me about his children. Did you know that he has a son just older than Rafe? And his daughter is three.”

“I did not know,” Sinclair says, prowling to my side, his eyes fixed on the Atalaxian prince. “Your family keeps such information close to their chest, do they not?”

“We do,” Calvin confirms, his voice formal and quiet now. “Though, we do share it with our closest friends. And I very much hope that after this trip that I will be able to tell my children about my new friends in Moon Valley.”

“I hope so as well,” I say, hoping my words assure Calvin that I’m on his side, and to persuade Sinclair that no matter what he sensed, Calvin has not done or meant me any harm.

“I don’t know if this is going to be possible,” Sinclair says quietly, his voice grumbling and stern as he stands close at my side, pressing his hands into his pockets and looking Calvin up and down. “Especially after the stunts your delegation has been pulling with Xander. He upset Ella very much tonight. Were you aware of this?"

Calvin sighs and looks at me, his face genuinely pained. "I was not, What did he do?"

Briefly, Sinclair informs Calvin of Xander's approach, his refusal to look me in the eye. Calvin sighs deeply as he listens, lifting a hand to rub at his eyes in frustration and I think embarrassment.

"I'm sorry," Calvin says, dropping his hand and looking first at me and then at Sinclair. "It is...please, I beg you to consider that there was and is dissent within our nation. While I'm sure that some of our delegation encouraged Xander and support his disgusting ideas, some of us want better."

"Well," Sinclair says slowly. "Then I'd look forward to speaking further with those persons."

"If you'll allow me to set it up," the prince says quietly, "I will do so."

"Please," Sinclair says. And then he shuts his mouth, clear that that's his final word on the subject this evening.

Calvin bows again, to each of us, and then says he'll put the wheels in motion before stepping towards the door. When he reaches it, he clasps Conner on the shoulder and bids him a good night as well, a move that adds another tick in his favor as far as I'm concerned. I quite like it when persons of power make a point to acknowledge people in positions of service.

But, knowing that's less important at this particular moment, I look up at Sinclair. "Is everything all right?"

"I thought I'd ask you the same," he says, looming over me a bit, clearly displeased.

"What?" I ask, frowning, confused. "What did I do?"

"What are you doing out here, Ella?" Sinclair says, shaking his head at me a little. "Having private conversations with a member of our enemies' royal family?"

"You heard him, Dominic!" I say, waving a hand towards the door. "He wants to make a change!"

"Or he's just telling you he wants a change," Sinclair growls, "to get you on his side. He knows you're soft hearted! He told you about his children who we don't even know exist – in order to soften you up!"

“Hey,” I snap, pointing a finger up into his face. “I may be soft-hearted, Dominic, but that’s something you value about me. You can’t have it both ways – you can’t love that about me and then use it as a reason to discredit me when it’s convenient for you.”

Sinclair sighs and then nods his head. “All right, that’s fair,” he murmurs. “But Ella, we agreed that you’d let me take the lead on these things – that you would allow me to take care of you, to set our path.”

“I still agree to that,” I say gently, stepping close to him now and dropping my hand, looking up at him with wide and loving eyes. “Dominic, if you tell me never to see him again, I won’t. But last night you told me to trust my instincts, and they’re telling me to trust him. Prince Calvin – he speaks to me and if this is an in with the Atalaxians? A way to create an alliance, to avoid war, to perhaps even help some of the women within that nation? Wouldn’t we want to accept that?”

“He speaks to you,” Sinclair growls, “because he’s into you.”

I burst out laughing at this and Sinclair’s growl deepens, which – I mean, it’s probably not good – but honestly it just makes me laugh harder.

“Dominic!” I say, giving him a little shove on the shoulder. “He is not-he has a Luna! And two children! There’s absolutely nothing to suggest that his interest in me is anything but friendly and political.”

“You don’t see the way he looks at you, Ella,” my mate growls, jealousy in every thrum of his voice. “I’m used to watching Alphas approach a she-wolf they desire – it is distinct -”

“Dominic,” I sigh, raising a hand to press to his cheek. “Just because you’re into me doesn’t mean that everyone is. Some men just want to be friends.”

Sinclair laughs at me then, roughly, shaking his head. “Ella, my love, every man that meets you wants you. I think that you’re just so used to being looked at with desire that you fail to see the signs.”

“Well,” I murmur, stepping even closer now, letting my body press against his as I look up at him between my lashes. “I don’t miss it when you look at me that way.”

My mate pauses for a moment, his breath hitching, and then he growls anew, grabbing me into his arms and pressing me close, though he is of course careful not to smush the baby. “That’s not fair, Ella,” he murmurs. “You can’t end every argument by seducing me.”

“Says who,” I whisper, my voice throaty and low.

He laughs, then, dipping his head and kissing me like he can't help it. Which, considering how much I want that kiss, if he feels anything like I do right now perhaps he can't.

"Come on," he murmurs as he pulls away. "Let's get back inside. We still have guests to greet – it's going to be a long night."

"I know," I say, lifting the baby a little higher as I allow my mate to direct me back towards the ballroom. "And then, tomorrow, another big day."

"A wedding," he confirms, looking down at me. "A big day, and a happy one."

"I know," I say, grinning up at him. "I'm so excited for Cora and Roger. It's going to be lots of fun."

Chapter 445 – Wedding Preparations

Ella

“Ella!” Cora shouts from the closet, her voice a little frantic. “Ella, help! Please!”

I turn quickly towards the closet, a biscuit and a cup of coffee in each of my hands and Rafe strapped to my chest in his little carrier. “What’s wrong?” I call as I hurry towards her.

But I see the problem immediately as I come to the door, with Cora wrapped up in yards of fabric and one of the stylists tugging fervently at the buttons which close the back.

“It doesn’t fit,” Cora says, her face worried.

“What?” I say, my eyes going a little wide. “But we did a fitting two days ago did you -”

“I guess I got bigger,” Cora sighs, looking down at the little baby bump that makes me so happy to see. “I don’t know – it would be a ridiculous thing to consider with a human baby, but with the way these wolves grow? In leaps and bounds?” She looks back up at me, shaking her head. “I’m sorry Ella what the hell are we going to do?”

“We’re going to use the back-up dress,” I say, grinning widely and shoving the rest of the cookie in my mouth while I put my coffee down on a shelf. Then I move for a big white box I’ve kept secretly in the corner under a pile of other big white boxes.

“Oh, thank god,” the stylist murmurs under her breath, making me laugh.

“Can you call the seamstresses?” I say to the second stylist, who nods and steps away to place a call on her phone. “We might need some last-minute alterations.”

“I can’t believe you planned all this, Ella,” Cora sighs as I take the top off the box and reveal an identical wedding gown, just one size larger. “How...how did you even have the foresight to see this coming?”

“I had a wolf pregnancy too!” I say, lifting the dress out and carrying it over. “I remember how unpredictable it is. At least you aren’t being flown over to another country right now in a middle of a war.”

“True” Cora says, beginning to strip off the first wedding dress as I hang up her second and begin to steam it. “This is....slightly less stressful than that. But only barely.”

I laugh a little, shaking my head and glancing over my shoulder at her. “So,” I say, eager. “Are you excited?”

“Um,” Cora says, her voice high and noncommittal-

I gasp a little and turn fully to her now. “You’re not excited for your wedding!?”

“Ella!” she says, laughing and shaking her head at me as she steps fully out of the dress and the stylist takes it away. “You know that none of this has been important to me, and that Roger and I already had the mating ceremony to end all mating ceremonies. So,” she shrugs, “this all makes me more anxious than anything.”

“Aww,” I say, moving to my sister, the steamer still in my hand. “Don’t be anxious, Cora. It’s going to go beautifully!”

Cora sighs and smiles at me before dipping her head to kiss Rafe on his. He burbles up at her, happily kicking his legs, making her laugh. “You’re more comfortable in the limelight than me, sis,” she says with a smile. “The way you handled the coronation yesterday-

“I was a mess at the coronation! I ran backwards! I cried!”

“It was perfectly you though,” she says, raising her eyebrows at me with a smile. “Everyone loved it. I loved it.”

“Well,” I say, grinning at her, “you just be perfectly you! And it will be just as great.”

“If you say so,” she says with a grin, crossing her arms across her chest. “Actually, do you have a robe or something I can wear while I wait for the dress to be ready? I’m chilly.”

“Here try this,” I say, pointing the steamer at her and letting out a little burst of warm steam that makes her jump and laugh.

“Get away from me, demon,” she says, swatting at me and laughing, making me turn away and get back to work. But even as I point to the robe hanging up in a corner of the closet and Cora dashes over to pull it on, I am filled with excitement.

Because this day? I have a feeling it’s going to be a really good one.

We’re holding the wedding in the great hall, where we had the coronation yesterday, but it has been satisfyingly transformed. I was a little hesitant about the choice because I didn’t want everything to look the same, and like we couldn’t make something special for Cora and Roger, but...well, it’s the biggest space we’ve got, and there are crowds of people already waiting outside of the palace in addition to the hundreds we’ve invited to attend as guests.

“Wow,” I say, turning around in the empty hall with Sinclair at my side, Rafe in my arms in a chic little tuxedo with a white jacket. To my chagrin, he wouldn’t consent to wear his little crown today – kept taking it off his head – but...well, I suppose that’s all right. “It’s incredible, Dominic – it’s beyond what I imagined it could be -”

“How is that possible,” he laughs, looking around, “when you planned it all?”

Sinclair is dressed to match Rafe, a little surprise I planned that makes him laugh. But they’re already such twins anyway, I think that it’s adorable. Not wanting to show up the bride, I opted for a very pale green that looks pretty with my hair. We decided not to wear our crowns today, wanting to be very much the siblings of the bride and groom instead of King and Queen, but well, we look nice without them too. I look my family over and am very pleased with the picture we present.

“I don’t know how it’s possible,” I say, looking around the room again in awe. “I mean, I told them my ideas, but this team – they really took it and ran. It’s amazing!”

And I’m not exaggerating – not at all. I told the team that I wanted everything to be white – white roses, white satin, white candles – but this? The entire room looks like a fairytale. And when the sun flows in the windows and brightens the whole space?

“It really is incredible,” my mate says, wrapping an arm around my waist and pulling me close to his side. “You did beautifully, trouble.”

“I didn’t do it, the aids did!” I laugh, but I turn my face up for a kiss, accepting the compliment. Sinclair bends a little, kissing me lightly, before turning towards the aid who bustle up the aisle.

“Are we ready, sir?” she asks, looking up from the iPad settled in the crook of her arm. “To begin letting the guests in?”

Sinclair looks at me and raises his eyebrows. I nod eagerly and smile at the aid. “I think so. Let’s get this started!”

The aid grins at me and eagerly rushes off as Sinclair and I head to the front of the room, where we intend to greet as many guests as we can as they come in. Of course, we won’t be able to say hello to them all – far too many – but I intend to do my best.

“Ready, little prince?” I ask, smiling down at my baby, who looks up at me and gives a happy little squeal, passing excitement down the bond and making me laugh.

“We’re lucky he likes crowds and attention,” Sinclair murmurs as the aids move to the doors, starting to pull them open. “If he was a shy prince, he’d have a much harder time.”

“He knows how much we love him, and how much everyone else does too!” I say, unable to help squeezing my little baby and covering his little head with kisses. “How could they help it? He’s such a cutie.”

“Just like his mama,” Sinclair murmurs, dropping a kiss to my own head that makes me smile up at him.

But before we have time to say anything else? The doors are open, and the crowds start to fill the room.

“Welcome!” I call, stepping forward to greet Cora’s first guest.

Chapter 446 – The Wedding

Even though Cora got ready in my room at the palace, we did a great deal of work to make this wedding as public as possible as public as our coronation, if not more so. In order to do that, once Cora was dressed we escorted her down to the garage-level of the palace to where a beautiful open- top vintage Rolls Royce was waiting to drive her around to the front.

“Are you serious?” she had said, rolling her eyes, but she was laughing at the same time – because, honestly, it was very cool.

Roger had his doubts about the plan, wanting to know if it was safe, but all the security details that Sinclair had put out had assured us that there were no major threats to our safety. The majority of the humans who objected to a wolf King had either been satiated by Sinclair’s sincere promises that humans and wolves would be on equal footing or have taken their complaints underground.

And, as Cora suggested to me last night, actually a great number of people humans and wolves alike are very excited about the reality of having a royal family to call their own.

Sinclair and I see the proof of this when we finish welcoming the hundreds of guests who will be inside our Hall for the ceremony and step forward towards the doors, where we can see Cora’s car turning down the road.

The crowds lining the streets in front of the palace go wild when they see us, shouting and cheering for Sinclair, for Rafe, and – I blush when I hear it – for me as well. Sinclair starts to wave to everyone so, smiling, I do too, and then –

I hold the baby up so everyone can see, and the roar goes louder.

Sinclair and I laugh at that as I tuck Rafe again securely by my side, pleased as I think any parents would be when people show affection for our child.

But my smile grows when the cheers turn towards Cora, their duchess, as she waves to them from the car that drives her down the road.

Cora’s name has been in print quite a bit lately, and this morning a huge piece was published on the two of us the two sisters who were raised human and have found themselves at the center of all of this drama. It was a flattering piece that focused the majority of its attention on my sister only fitting, as it’s her wedding we’re celebrating today – and our struggles as orphans, her time putting herself through medical school, her rather unknown and private relationship with Roger Sinclair.

I had tried to show it to Cora this morning, fawning over the pictures, but she had waved it away, not wanting to see it, I think a little embarrassed by the attention.

But that Cora is gone now, replaced by a beaming woman in a beautiful wedding gown, her long veil trailing down her back as she waves eagerly to the people who have come to see her off on her wedding day, who call her name and wish her luck.

I glance back over my shoulder to where I see Roger and Henry standing at the front of the room the place where an altar would be, were this a religious ceremony. Roger gives me a thumbs-up and Henry waves, and then Sinclair and I step forward out of the palace and begin to walk down the steps to escort my sister inside.

“This is crazy,” Cora whispers, laughing as Sinclair offers a hand to help her step out of the car.

“It’s cool, though, right?” I say, laughing too as I wrap my sister in a hug. “You look beautiful, Cora,” I add, tears filling my eyes as I take in my sister in her incredibly gorgeous wedding gown, which manages to flatter while making no secret of her pregnancy. After all, we’re very proud of the new addition to our family.

“Oh geeze,” Cora says, shaking her head and reaching a hand up to wipe at my cheeks. “Seriously, Ella, you can’t start this now we’re never going to make it through the day –”

“If you think this is her first time crying,” Sinclair says, smirking and reaching for Rafe, “then you’re woefully mistaken, sister-in-law.”

Cora laughs then as I pass Rafe off to his father and she loops her arm through mine.

“Ready?” I say, sniffing the rest of my tears back and smiling.

“Sure am,” she says, giving me a wink.

And then, following our King up the stairs, Cora and I make our way towards the palace. When we get to the top of the stairs, we turn to wave to the crowds who all cheer wildly, and then we turn inside. The aids close the door behind us and the music begins to play.

“Congratulations, Cora,” Sinclair says, kissing her on the cheek before starting down the aisle.

It’s a very short little wedding procession for our duchess. Cora has friends, of course, but none she felt close to or comfortable enough asking to be a bridesmaid. So, we decided to keep it short and sweet, perhaps reflecting more wolf tradition than human.

Sinclair and Rafe are thus the only ones who process before the bride, and I smile to see Rafe looking interestedly around the room at all of Cora’s well-wishers.

When my mate and child reach the front of the room, the music changes, turning into the classic wedding waltz.

"I love you," I say, standing on my toes to kiss my sister's cheek, knowing that it's our turn.

"Love you more," she murmurs as she kisses me back.

And then, her arm in mine, I walk my sister down the aisle.

We had talked about this at length, of course but in absence of any real father figure, Cora asked me to walk her. And, obviously, I cried my eyes out and said yes. Henry offered but...

Well, it's always been me and Cora, hasn't it? We've been mother and father to each other, sister and best friend. So, me walking her down the aisle on the day she marries her mate and her best friend?

It's right. It feels absolutely right.

And it gives me the most magnificent view of Roger's face as his eyes focus on Cora, as his face falls to see how beautiful she looks, as he forgets to breathe and just...stares at her.

I bite my lip, glancing up at my sister, seeing her practically glowing with joy, speeding up with her eagerness to be at his side.

"Cora," Roger whispers, taking three steps forward when we get to the front of the room and climb the short set of stairs to the dais. "You look..."

Unbidden, she reaches for him, wanting his touch. He grasps her hand and, shaking his head, begins to pull her close. But Cora stops for a moment, looking over at me. "Do you consent, sis?" she says, grinning at me. "To give me away?"

"To this guy?" I say, raising my eyebrows and pretending to look Roger dubiously up and down.

Both laugh, and Roger shakes his head at me. "I'm taking her whether you consent or not, Ella," he says, grinning, Cora's hand still held tight in his.

"Well then," I say, smiling between the two of them. "Good thing I agree."

My sister and I hug once again before I let her go and move to stand next to my mate, taking my baby eagerly back into my arms.

“They look good together,” Sinclair whispers in my ear, his eyes on my sister and his brother. “It’s right, the two of them.”

“They’re so lucky to have us,” I say, sighing and grinning at him. “To have brought them together.”

Sinclair laughs a little and shakes his head. “Nah,” he says. “These two? They’d have found their way to each other. Fated mates,” he says, slipping his hand around mine. “We have a way of doing that, don’t we.”

“We sure do,” I sigh, resting my head on his shoulder.

And then, a blissful smile on my face the whole time, I watch my sister marry her mate.

Chapter 447 – Reception

Cora and Roger's reception goes late into the night, which is just fine by me because for the first time this week? Sinclair and I haven't been the focus of the attention, and we just get to party.

I mean, that's not completely true. We're still the King and the Queen of our nation and we can't ignore our duties entirely. But it's much, much easier when Cora and Roger are the ones who work their way around the room, greeting all of their guests and thanking them for their attendance.

I smile as I sip at my soda during a break in the dancing, watching as Roger holds Cora close to his side as they chat to some people I don't know old friends of Cora's from med school, I think.

"He hasn't kept his hands off her all night," Sinclair says, laughing a little. I grin up at him. "Look who's talking," I say, glancing down at his own arm wrapped firmly around me.

"What can I say," he murmurs, grinning down at me. "You're very touchable."

Rafe, resting sleepily against my chest, gives a little squeak that makes us laugh.

"Don't worry, baby," Sinclair says, lowering his head to kiss Rafe's soft hair. "You're very cute too, I haven't forgotten."

Rafe grumbles a little but relaxes, his eyes drifting closed against me.

"I don't think he's going to make it much longer," I say with a sigh, considering my little baby. "Do you think the party will miss me too much if I bow out early?"

"The party will miss its most beautiful guest, surely," Sinclair says, and I roll my eyes a little at his flattery, "but I'm sure everyone will forgive. And Cora will be jealous."

"Nah," I say, eyeing my sister across the room. She hasn't stopped smiling since we walked down the aisle. "She's having a good time – like I knew she would. Cora always thinks she doesn't want a fuss until she gets it, and then she's pleased."

"She's lucky to have you," Sinclair says. We relax for a moment, me considering my escape, but then I feel Sinclair go stiff beside me.

"What is it?" I ask, peering up at him.

"Nothing new," he murmurs, his eyes on the far side of the room. "Just..."

Atalaxians.”

“Oh,” I say, my heart falling a bit. I saw Calvin for a moment earlier in the day when he came to say hello and to congratulate Cora, but he’s the only Atalaxian that I can even begin to say I like. The others?

Well, they’re here, as all of the delegations from foreign nations were invited to the ceremony and the reception in full. But earlier, when I saw that my uncle actually had the gall to show up? I was completely shocked.

“Is he still there?” I ask, trying to stand on my tiptoes to see, but I’m too short.

“He is indeed,” Sinclair murmurs, clearly as unhappy about it as I am. Xander hasn’t tried to talk to us tonight hasn’t even attempted to give his congratulations – which is fine by me. Still, I think both of us will be much happier when he’s gone.

Sinclair frowns a little, keeping his eyes focused on the group of foreigners across the room, and I feel a little worry twisting inside me. I glance at my mate, wondering if it’s coming from him, or if I’m intuiting it myself.

But suddenly, a great deal of shouting breaks out from that corner of the room and my stomach drops.

Sinclair is instantly in motion, grabbing my hand and striding across the room. I hurry my pace to keep up with his long strides, almost running, and Rafe wakes up against me with an upset little squeal. I send calm thoughts down the bond to him to let him know that all is well, and he quiets, but I think he can still sense my agitation because he’s awake now and fussing against me.

“What is this,” Sinclair demands, his voice loud as he steps into the middle of a large group of people. My mate keeps his hand around mine though I stand a little back from him, letting him take charge.

But I immediately see the problem, and I am not at all surprised that my uncle is at the center of it.

My eyes dart around at the people several Atalaxian men, looking chic if rigid in their tuxedos, bristle as they frown at a human woman with her twin daughters pressed tight against her side. The woman looks worriedly around at all of the foreign men.

“I – I’m sorry,” she says, her voice clearly upset and confused. “We – the girls were hoping to have more of the candy,” she says, looking up at Sinclair and trying to explain, clearly thinking herself in trouble. She gestures towards the little individually wrapped bars of peppermint bark – Cora’s favorite -that we left at each guest’s seat as part of their party favors.

"I noticed that...this table hadn't eaten theirs," she continues, her voice tight, "and the girls, they just asked..."

"How dare you," my uncle growls, looking down at the woman and her children with clear disdain, "even speak to me, let alone beg of me a favor

My mouth drops open completely in my shock at this horrible man. Seriously? He views human women as so far below him that he flips out when they speak to him?

"Enough," Sinclair cuts in, his voice a hot knife through the tension. The Atalaxians, who originally lined themselves behind Xander, note that my mate is clearly supporting our guest and then fall back a step, hesitating in the face of the opposition.

"I made it clear," Sinclair says, focusing his eyes now on my uncle, "that your ridiculous politics have no place in my court. I have no control over how you treat people in your new home in Atalaxia, but here? You will respect my guests, no matter their gender or their shifter status." He takes a step forward, squeezing my hand once before dropping it to truly loom over my uncle. "Now. Is there any final confusion on that point?"

I quickly step to the woman, who I unfortunately don't know, and slip an arm around her shoulder. "I'm so sorry," I whisper, shaking my head, hopefully letting her know with the earnestness on my face that this was a complete mistake. "Please," I say, turning her away and smiling down at her daughters. "You did nothing wrong come with me, we'll get you as much chocolate as you can carry -"

But before we can fully turn away, a snarl rips from my uncle, making us all turn and freeze as he hunches before Sinclair, clearly on the edge of transforming into his wolf.

"I will not be cowed," Xander growls, "by some over-eager pup who lets women and humans run his house my line is the true power in this nation

"Be careful, Xander," Sinclair says, allowing his own ferocity rise to the surface as he steps closer to this smaller, older man this wolf he could end in a second, were it his choice. "

I've taken out stronger men than you. And I won't let you again question my choices, or my mate."

Xander snarls up at Sinclair, clearly wanting a fight, but the wolf in him knows that he's already been beat. Despite himself, the old man takes a step back, his shoulders hunching instinctually under the force of Sinclair's stare.

“This is my kingdom now,” Sinclair says, his voice soft and deadly. “And you and your kind? By which I mean prejudiced old bigots? You are the ones who are not welcome.”

He takes a moment, then to stare hatefully into Xander’s eyes before lifting his gaze to the rest of the Atalaxian delegation, letting them know that the message counts for them as well if they take Xander’s side.

Only Calvin has the grace to hang his head in shame. The rest, I can tell, are still making up their minds as to their next move.

Chapter 448 – Borrowed Trouble

Ella

I feel the poor human woman's shoulders shake and I take a deep breath, remembering my duty to her as well. "Come on," I say, trying to keep my voice light as I turn her and her daughters away. "I'm so sorry about this – let's get somewhere more peaceful."

And as we begin to walk away, I leave my faith in Sinclair to settle this as he will. But I hope to hell the Atalaxians know what's good for them, because my mate?

He won't hesitate to fight, if they push him to it. And if they do? I shake my head, considering how fast each of them will lose.

But I put this out of my mind, chatting lightly with the woman as we move away, asking her name. The woman introduces herself as Tempest Bowers, a journalist and the wife of an elected official of one of our eastern provinces. Genuinely pleased to meet her, I begin to ask more questions about their lives as we move to the head table, where I know for certain that there is plenty of candy for the girls to take.

But before we can get there, someone hits my shoulder – hard as they pass, making me stumble. My ankle twists in my high heel and I lose my balance, threatening to fall, gasping and holding Rafe tight to me.

Tempest grabs my arm just in time.

"Oh my goodness," she says, her eyes wide as she helps me regain my balance. And then both of our eyes move to follow the hateful old man my uncle, of course who hit me hard with his shoulder on his way out. He does not bother to look back and apologize.

Of course, why would he? He did it on purpose.

"He's a hateful old creep, isn't he?" I ask, frowning after the man, and the woman to my surprise – bursts out laughing.

"He is certainly a piece of work," she says, nodding along and dropping my arm. "Do you...know him?"

"He's my uncle," I say with a grimace, making her laugh again, harder this time.

"I have some in my family," Tempest says, looking after him as he storms from the room, "who are...less pleasant too. So, I can emote with that."

I smile genuinely at her then, liking this woman very much. We finish crossing to the table where Sinclair and I had our dinner and I hand the girls as many candy bars as I can find left on the table, knowing no one will miss them. The girls begin to grin as their hands fill, excited at their bounty.

“Okay, enough!” Tempest says, putting her hands out and laughing. “Go find dad, all right?” she says, nodding to them.

“They’re beautiful girls,” I say as I watch them run away.

“Thank you,” Tempest replies, reaching out to run a finger across Rafe’s sleepy cheek. “Your own is a very handsome little guy himself.”

“Oh, he flatters himself so,” I say on a happy little sigh, looking down at my kid with a smile. “And I agree, but I am biased.”

Tempest glances over her shoulder, seeing Sinclair striding towards us. ”

“I’ll leave you to this,” she says, gesturing towards him. “But it was very nice to meet you, your highness – and thank you, very much, for your help over there. I apologize for any trouble – we really didn’t know – ”

“Please,” I say, my eyebrows going up. “You did nothing wrong. And please call me Ella,” I say with a grin. “After that? We have to be on a first name basis.”

Tempest laughs and nods, stepping away from me with a little wave just before Sinclair gets to my side.

“Are you all right?” he asks, his voice worried. Then his eyes follow my new friend as she walks away. “Is she?”

“She seems well recovered,” I say, pleased, “though I wish it hadn’t happened at all. I mean honestly, why would the Atalaxians even come to a party of mixed humans and wolves when they despise the idea so much?”

“I sense,” Sinclair replies with a grimace, “that they were looking for a bit of a fight. Or, at least that Xander was.”

“Really?” I ask, my eyes going wide.

“I’m starting to wonder,” Sinclair murmurs, his eyes on the door where Xander just left, “if the Atalaxians brought him to have someone to pick their fight for them. I mean, come on they had to know he’s at the end of his rope and wasn’t going to just come along for the ride.”

“Clever,” I say, stepping closer to him and likewise looking towards the door. “Bringing someone who they knew would force you to show your cards.”

“And it may not be done,” he sighs. I look up at Sinclair to ask why, but we’re both distracted when the bride and groom come to our sides.

“Is everything okay?” Cora asks, stepping close to me and I think unconsciously reaching for the baby. I smile a little, handing him over to her, pleased to see how much Rafe’s auntie loves to have him close by. “What was all that?”

Roger stands solidly next to Sinclair and I turn my fond gaze to him now. He’s not as familiar with human wedding traditions as Cora and I are, but I have to admit – he makes quite the handsome groom, and I think he’s been enjoying the party.

Still, as he stands there listening to Sinclair recap the events? He’s every bit the King’s responsible second, eager to help.

I take a deep breath, so grateful again for my family, but I’m distracted from this pleasure by Roger’s next words.

“I don’t know, Dominic,” Roger says, his hands on his hips as he, too, looks towards the door. “I don’t trust this. If he was publicly embarrassed and his new nation didn’t stand up for what he believes to be his rights, as you suggest, I’m not sure a man like Xander is going to be content with just going back to his room to pout.”

“I have to agree,” a voice chimes in, and Roger and Sinclair part to reveal Calvin standing there behind them, his own face worried. “I came to let you know that trouble is brewing, but...I think you’ve already figured it out.”

“Really?” I say, taking a step forward, my face falling. “Is he...do you know what he has planned?”

“I don’t think he has a plan,” Calvin says, his eyes immediately on me and only on me. “But he believes himself to have been insulted. I don’t think he’s going to take it lightly. And quite frankly, I think he was egged on by some of our constituents tonight. I think...” he sighs, looking down at his shoes, ashamed, “honestly, I’m sorry, but I think they wanted to set him off like this.”

I sigh deeply, suddenly worried, but I don’t miss Roger and Sinclair carefully assessing Calvin as my mind races, trying to figure out what to do.

“Let’s go,” Cora says, nodding towards the door and taking my hand. “There’s no point in standing here worried. Let’s go back to the room where we know we’re safe, where we can find out what’s going on and regroup – ”

“Cora,” I say, frowning up at her. ” We’re not going to drag you away from your wedding reception – ”

“Oh,” she says, waving a dismissive hand and rolling her eyes. “Don’t get me wrong, Ella, this has been amazing but come on, you know that none of this really mattered to me. I’d much rather get the baby back to the room, where we can feel safe.”

I bite my lip, hesitating, but Roger is at her side in a second. “She’s right, Ella,” he says, glancing around at the party. I look around too and see that Sinclair is having a private word with Calvin, thanking him for his help. My eyes stick to them, worried, but I pull my gaze away with a sigh.

“You’re sure?” I ask, honestly thinking that it would make me happiest.

“This party is going on all night with or without us,” Roger says with a grin. ” Honestly, no one will notice that we’re gone.”

“All right,” I breathe as Sinclair comes back to our side with a sigh. ” Everything okay with the prince?” I ask.

He nods to me and looks around at our little group. “To the rooms?”

“War command,” Roger says, giving a firm nod. I’ll get dad and meet you there. And with that, the four of us put the wedding behind us and head out, ready to take on whatever Xander is bringing for us next.

Because we all know it – Xanders’ got something up his sleeve.

He didn’t come here to celebrate.

He came to take his last shot.

And the Atalaxians? They’re letting him.

Chapter 449 – Grasping at Straws

Ella

Sinclair walks Cora and I swiftly back to our suite of rooms, Rafe still bundled safely in Cora's arms. When we get there, Sinclair gives me a swift kiss on my head, already looking down the hall.

"I'm going to catch up with Roger," he murmurs. "We'll send dad to you whenever we find him -"

"Why," I say, grabbing his hand, worried. "Why don't you all just come here?"

Sinclair shakes his head as he looks down at me. "We need eyes on Xander we have to talk to the staff, see if anyone knows where he went. I promise – we'll both come to you as soon as we have more information. All right?"

I bite my lip but I nod, not liking it but trusting him. With his own nod of assurance, Sinclair strides away.

"Come on, bride," I say, pushing the door open to my room and allowing Cora to sweep through with my baby and her long train. "Let's get you changed into something more comfortable."

"Oh, thank goodness," Cora sighs. "I mean, this dress is fantastic, but it's heavy."

"Oh, you poor thing, in fifty pounds of silk and satin," I murmur sarcastically, kicking off my heels and leading all of us into the closet. Before I do anything, though, I take my sweet baby from my sister and lower him down into the wheeled bassinet that's waiting there for him. I'll transfer him to his real crib later, but he's perfectly happy taking a little nap here before I change him.

"He's such an easy baby," Cora says with a sigh as I move behind her and start to un-do all of the buttons that run down her back. "How did you get so lucky?"

"He's just an angel," I say, my voice overly doting, making us laugh. "But seriously," I say, "I think wolf babies are just different. A lot less crying, a lot more understanding between parents and child even when they're that young. It's incredibly convenient."

"I hope that's true," Cora says, her hand absently going to her own stomach. "I don't have as much patience as you, so if this kid isn't as easy as Rafey here? We're going to have trouble."

"You'll be great," I say, grinning at her as I finish with the buttons and she starts to shimmy out of the dress. As she does I move to lift the soft white sweatsuit I had made for her off the shelf. Cora gasps when she sees it. "Ella!" she says, hands on her hips. "You didn't!"

"It says Mrs. Sinclair on the back," I say, grinning and handing it to her.

"It's too much," she says, sighing and waving her hand. "Honestly, Ella, you keep it – you're Mrs. Sinclair too! And you've given us too much already with all of this -"

"Oh stop," I say, rolling my eyes and grinning, pressing it into her hands. "If you don't think I had my own made just like it, you're crazy."

She laughs at that, taking the outfit and starting to pull it on. "Well, it's very soft."

"I know," I say, unzipping my own dress and reaching for some soft clothes myself. "Plus, we get to have the same name now, officially. Isn't that cool?"

"Oh," she says, going a bit still, realizing it. "Oh wow, for the first time in our lives," she says, laughing. "Sisters in name in addition to genetics and friendship."

I grin at her, glad she thinks it's as cool as I do, and we both laugh with the pleasure of it.

When we're both changed, I change Rafe into his own pajamas – he fusses a little, wanting to be left in peace, and I murmur my apology before tucking him in again and wheeling the little bassinet into the bedroom with us so that we can wait for Roger and Sinclair to come back.

"What do you think Xander's planning?" I ask, sitting down next to my sister on the new little loveseat that Sinclair and I put at the end of the bed. Considering that we use this room more than we thought we would to entertain our siblings, we needed more places to sit.

"I don't know," Cora says thoughtfully, curling up on her side of the little couch and facing me. "Nothing good, obviously but..." she turns her head to the side, considering. "Well, if you were Xander, what would you do?"

"Go for Rafe?" I posit, glancing down at my peacefully sleeping baby.

"Nah," she says, shaking her head, clearly lost in thought. "I mean, yesterday Sinclair made a very definite move in marking Rafe as his heir. It kind of makes that option null to Xander."

"What do you mean?" I ask, frowning.

"Well," she says, looking at me evenly, "even if he were to...take out Sinclair," she says slowly, and I my eyes go wide even at the hypothetical thought. She moves on quickly. "Either way," Cora continues, "Rafe is already Sinclair's heir to his throne. There's no way for Xander to really claim Rafe as his own now as part of Xavier's line. Rafe's thoroughly a Sinclair, just like us. If Rafe inherits, the people who would be his obvious guardians would be you, and Henry, and Roger."

"And you," I say, reaching out a foot to nudge her on the knee, insisting she include herself.

She waves a hand at me, dismissing the idea, but I grin and nudge her again, letting her know that she's in this whether she likes it or not.

But still, I take her point. "So," I say softly, "you think he's doing something else?"

"I do," she says softly, her eyes un-focusing a little as she accesses the strategic part of her mind. "I think that while Xander hasn't made it easy, the Sinclairs have successfully countered every move that he's made. We've got him on the run, and now he's embarrassed himself in front of everyone at a public event."

I nod, understanding that Xander really has been worked into a corner. He's got very few resources left, and if he's realizing as we perhaps have that the Atalaxians have brought him here less as an important player and more as a pawn that they can use to spark a war?

Xander may be realizing that his time and power is running short.

So, he's scrambling.

"So, what would he do?" I wonder aloud, considering it.

"I think he'd...grasp at whatever straws are left to him," Cora says softly, clearly thinking it through as she speaks. "He'd grab at whatever he thought was rightfully his, whatever he can hoard to make himself stronger."

"But he's lost his home here, and his rights – we'd have him arrested, if the Atalaxians weren't claiming him."

"So, what does he have left..." Cora says on a sigh, looking up at the ceiling as she racks her brain.

And I think hard as well, considering all the things that Xander has lost. I mean, he was once in Roger's position the Duke, the brother to a powerful King. And he lost all of that. He made an bold play to get it back – planning to get me pregnant and steal the child, using Rafe to retake the throne but...

Cora's right. We turned away his plan there. And then he lost his connection to the Dark Lord's priests when Sinclair and Roger killed them all, and his home when we made him run from it, and his servants when...

But suddenly, I go quite, quite pale.

"Cora..." I breathe, my eyes going wide as I look up at her.

"What," she says, her breath starting to come quick as she realizes that I've figured something out. I shake my head. "Jessica, and Sarah," I say, starting to panic myself.

I mean, we haven't seen them for days as soon as I found out that Xander was here I told them and Sarah let me know, politely, that they wouldn't be attending any of the events to which they were of course invited, but instead sticking to their little suite of rooms to avoid seeing him.

But me – of course, idiot me – threw it in Xander's face that I knew them, that I helped them

And – and it probably wouldn't take much at all for him to have done a little searching, a little casual chatter with the staff to learn that a young woman and her sister, refugees, were staying here in the palace

"We have to tell Roger and Sinclair," Cora says, jumping to her feet immediately, striding for the closet so she can get her phone and call her mate-

But before she can get there, a scream splits the air outside.

My head whips towards the window, my mouth falling open.

Because that was high pitched, shrill –

The sort of sound that would come from an eight-year-old girl.

Chapter 450 – Kidnap

Cora spins to look at me, her eyes wide, and together we both run for the window. Cora gets there first, unhooking the latch and throwing the window open, bending out so that she can see. I lean out too, my eyes scanning the ground below.

My gaze locks, instantly, on the action.

A man one whose figure and face I've glared at too many times in the past few days – drags a small girl by the hand. He has his arm wrapped around the waist of a woman. She fights against him, but her movements are sluggish.

“He's got them,” I say, grim, and then I look to the side at my sister, determined. “Tell Sinclair. Stay with the baby.”

Cora stares at me for a second and then her eyes go round with shock. “Ella,” she says, reaching out for me, Ella, what -”

But I've already turned back to the window, and before I can even think about what I'm doing, I transform into my wolf and surge out.

I hear my sister scream my name behind me, but I'm already gone, leaping from my narrow window ledge to the next below us, and then another, steadily working my way down the palace wall as fast as I my paws can carry me. The majority of my concentration is on aiming my jumps and ensuring that I land in the right spot, my wolf's instincts taking over, but a little part of my mind is suddenly grateful that my wolf is small and nimble.

Sinclair, with his gigantic wolf, would never be able to balance on these small ledges, and neither would Roger.

Instead, my smaller rose-gold wolf makes quick of the vertical surface of the palace wall and darts towards the ground. The girl screams again as my paws hit the flagstones of the courtyard and I'm already moving across them towards the man who drags the woman and the girl away.

As I bolt across the courtyard towards them, I see from my periphery that I am not the only one to respond – palace guards begin to converge, their guns raised, but they hesitate when they see that Xander will not make it easy for them to take aim on him without risking Sarah and Jessica.

And the guards hesitate further when my snarl rips through the air, a steady order that clearly says he's mine.

The guards fall back just a little, probably thinking that their King isn't going to like it very much that they let me take the lead. But my authority brooks no compromise: I mean it.

This is my fight, and I won't let them take it from me. Xander spins when he hears my snarl, looking first above my head as if he was looking for a larger wolf. Then his eyes fall, meeting mine, and he has the gall to laugh.

"A she-wolf?" he says, his voice thick with derision. Xander yanks Jessica closer to him and Sarah struggles anew, though her movements are slow. I focus on her for a moment, noticing blood on her forehead, in her hair, and realizing that Xander has hurt her – somehow – to make this escape possible.

Xander holds fast to both of them, and despite their struggles and his older age, he's still a wolf. He is stronger, innately, and his determination to take what is his is steel.

I growl again, prowling closer, my demand that he let them go is clear in my narrowed wolf's eyes, my bared fangs. Xander just scoffs at me, beginning to turn away. "You cannot touch me, she-wolf," he snarls. "I will rip you to shreds."

A louder snarl tears from between my teeth, letting Xander know that that's precisely what I intend to do to him.

He spins again to me and then, vicious, he hurls Sarah to the ground and kicks her hard in the ribs. I hear bone crack and she moans, curling up, shuddering on the ground. I yelp, moving towards her, knowing that she's badly hurt –

But before I can take more than a step, Xander pulls Jessica hard against him and pulls a knife from his pocket, pressing it to her throat. "A step closer," he growls, "and I will kill her, she-wolf. You can keep the old one – I have no more use for her. But this one?" he says, looking down at Jessica and running a lecherous hand down her cheek, "I had her bred special for me, just to my tastes. And I will take her."

A growl rumbles in me and from the corners of my eyes I see the palace security creating a circle around us. My muscles go tense, because I know that Xander sees it too, and I know he sees that his chances of escape are waning.

But a man like Xander, who is already on the run, playing his last card? That won't cow him. It will just make him desperate.

And if he knows we're going to take him out, he may do his best to leave as much collateral damage in his wake as he can. His knife, now, is pressed tight against a little girl's throat.

So, I do the only thing I can.

I transform back into my human form and hold my hands out placatingly.

“Don’t do anything you’ll regret, uncle,” I say quietly. “If you give the girl to me now, we will give you a fair trial.”

“You have nothing with which to negotiate,” he says, backing away, and Jessica cries out as he pulls her with him, reaching out her hands to me in a way that makes my heart twist with fear. Xander wraps his fingers in her hair, tugging hard and making her shriek, but her hands drop as she goes with him. “She is mine, and I will take her. Now, call off your dogs,” he growls, tipping his head towards the guards on either side of us.

I hesitate, suddenly wishing I had Cora’s mind or Sinclair’s strength because –

Because, damn it, I don’t know what to do.

I take a step forward, not wanting Xander to put more distance between us, and his eyes narrow, his hand pressing the knife even tighter. So I counter, seeking to placate him, raising my hands on either side and shouting an order for the guards to lower their guns. My eyes flash to Sarah, who lays on the flagstones to my left, breathing softly and whimpering in pain.

Good, I think, alive. And then I refocus on Xander, who continues to slowly back away from me. For every step he takes, I take one step closer.

“Stop,” he growls, his eyes fully focused on me, angry. “Stop following me, you worthless girl – let me pass -”

I see, quite suddenly, that all of his attention is on me in this moment. That I’m pissing him off enough by continuing to step after him that he doesn’t notice the end of the courtyard behind him and the wide set of stairs that follow. If I can just...keep him distracted...

“No,” I say softly, not pushing him enough to do anything to Jessica but wanting his attention here, on me. “You don’t control me, Xander. No matter how much you’ve tried, I’ve defied you at every turn.”

“You did nothing,” he hisses, steadily moving backwards, three steps from the stairs now –

“I didn’t have to,” I murmur, taking one step forward myself. “I had the right friends in place – my sister, my mate -”

“Your sister,” he spits, laughing.” That human bitch – ”

He takes one more step back. Only two steps left...

The insult rankles in me, but I don't let it get far. I take another step forward, a larger one this time. God, it's so close, I have to time this just right...

Xander reacts as I hoped he would, taking another step back, a big one, big enough that his next step will land just on the edge...

Chapter 451 – On the Edge

Ella

My eyes flick to Jessica's to find her gaze already on me. I stare at her, hoping she can intuit, hoping she has the courage to run when –

“If you think my human sister is a bitch,” I say, taking another precise step forward, forcing Xander to rise his foot to take his final step back. As that foot falls, I bare my teeth. “Then just wait until you really meet me.”

And as Xander places that foot down, and it falls on the edge of the stair that he didn't know was there, I bare my teeth and transform in a flash.

Xander's foot slips and slides unsteadily to the step below, unbalancing him. He flings out an arm to balance himself and while he keeps one hand steadily on Jessica –

As I hoped, the hand he flings out for balance is the one that holds the knife.

The moment she feels the cold press of it leave her neck, Jessica screams and rips herself away from Xander. His hand is still knotted in her hair and I swear I hear it rip from her scalp as I leap for him, but I can't turn and see Instead, I'm already in the air in my wolf's body, sailing for him, my teeth bared. His eyes are wide as my paws slam into his shoulders, as I take him down to the ground.

A garbled scream falls from his mouth as he whips the knife in his hand toward my side, but it's too late. My teeth are already closing around his throat, digging deep.

The dagger cuts me, I can feel it, but it slides away from my skin to clatter on the ground as Xander's body crashes into the stone steps. My jaws close, my teeth meeting, and instincts take over as I shake my head, ripping the life from him as I tear his flesh.

I feel him go still beneath me quickly, leaving no time for a last gasp or a final word.

I did my job well.

My chest heaving, I stand above him for a moment, looking down into his face, making sure his eyes are dead.

And then I disdainfully step away, wanting nothing more to do with him, wanting the taste of his putrid blood out of my mouth.

I transform back into my human body as I continue to stand above him, my shoulders still heaving, and I drag an arm across my face, wiping the blood away from my mouth with my sleeve as much as I can.

Guards converge around us, shouting orders and I blink suddenly, brought instantly away from my primal instincts to protect and back to my reality, where I'm standing above a dead man on the palace's steps.

My first thought is for Jessica, and I turn, seeking her –

But suddenly, I see flashes ahead of me and turn wide-eyed back to the stairs. Because I realize with quick horror that while I concentrated only on Xander, and Jessica, and the guards...

That this is still a palace in the middle of a city on a night when we hosted a very large party.

And that the stairs ahead of me are crowded with people who look at me in shock. And press, who snap pictures of their Queen covered in blood.

There is a momentary pause when I panic and stare out at the flashing cameras, but then suddenly – quite suddenly – everything is chaos. An arm grabs me and I look up into Conner's face, blinking in surprise to see him there

And I turn when I hear Jessica's voice, screaming her sister's name

"I have to get to Sarah," I say on a gasp, knowing that she needs to be healed.

"You have to get inside, Luna," Conner says, his voice worried. I tug at his arm but he won't let me go, so I glare up at him. "Seriously, Ella," he says, his voice low as he whispers his words, "you're covered in blood, and the Alpha is going to flip out if he sees you here like this -"

"But she -"

"She's breathing," he says, nodding to me, "she's conscious – let us take her inside, you can heal her there -"

And I look up at him, blinking a little, and then I nod, agreeing to it, realizing that he's right. Because I am panicking right now, and trying to do everything at once, and completely forgetting that I'm a Queen and not some vigilante who can just do what she wants Conner, seeing that I understand, nods once to me and then stands straight, supporting me as I step away from Xander's lifeless form. Conner's hand is still supportively around my arm as we begin to stride towards the entrance to the palace.

“Jessica!” I shout, seeing that the girl is scared and struggling against the guards who hold her back from her sister, at whose side medics are already gathering.

Jessica whips her head to me, her eyes scared.

“Come with me!” I command, holding out my free hand. The guards hesitate but then let the girl go as they see my serious face. Jessica rushes to my side, wrapping her hand in mine, whimpering in fear as she does.

I pull her close to my un-cut side, wrapping my arm around her. “The doctors are going to bring Sarah in,” I say quietly, “don’t worry, all right? I’ll keep you safe.”

“Do you,” she says, looking back, “do you promise she’s all right?”

“I promise, Jessica,” I say quietly, meaning every word of it. “We just all need to get inside, okay? And Sarah needs people to lift her, and you and I?”

We’re too little for that. The doctors – they’re going to help bring her in.”

Jessica nods shakily, pressing herself closer to my side, but she trusts me and lets me guide her to the door.

We’re almost there when suddenly a large form fills it, and my knees go almost shaky with relief as I instantly recognize my mate.

I want to throw myself in his arms, but I’ve got Jessica with me now know that I can’t. Not yet. and I

Conner removes his hand from me now, knowing that I’m safe, and he steps back as Sinclair takes a step forward, his face livid and scared and breathless all at once.

“Ella,” he growls, stepping close to me and glancing momentarily down at Jessica and over at Conner, assessing them as threats in his panic.

But I reach up and place my hand on his cheek, shaking my head. “I’m fine, it’s fine,” I say, nodding fervently.

He releases a slow and steady breath. The rage and fear still burns in him, I know, but it’s tempered now with the knowledge that I’m okay. He opens his mouth to say more but I nod down at the little girl.

“We need to get her in,” I say, my eyebrows going up.

He hesitates, wanting to storm out and assess the situation, wanting simultaneously – I know – to yell at me for taking whatever risk it was that I just took

But he masters himself, glares at me a little, and nods as he realizes that I'm right. And then the King steps behind Jessica and I and escorts us into the palace.

We move quickly through the halls, heading immediately for our rooms, where we know we'll be safe and I'll feel more at peace, with my mate and my baby and my family all near. Conner comes with us, briefing Sinclair on the details as we walk. I keep a hand on Jessica's shoulder, not wanting to be separated from her for an instant.

"Sarah needs to be brought to us," I say to Sinclair, who still glares at me but nods once. He, in turn, looks over his shoulder at another of his guards and nods to him, letting him know to pass the order around. Then we all move steadily through the halls towards our room.

We get there quickly, luckily not passing many people in the halls who would see poor Jessica's tear-stained face or my bloody face and clothing. But when I press open the door, Cora's appalled gasp is enough to make up for it.

"Ella!" she shouts, dashing over to me and throwing her arms out, clearly wanting to wrap them around me, to hold me and make sure I'm okay.

"Cora, no!" I gasp, stepping back. She hesitates and I gesture towards her pretty new sweatsuit. "Cora you're all in white -"

"Oh my god," she mutters, burying her face in her hands. "You're so ridiculous, Ella – I can't believe that's what you're worried about –"

"Jessica," I say, getting down on one knee as Sinclair closes the door hard behind us. "Do you remember Cora?" I ask, pointing up at my sister.

Jessica looks up at Cora and nods.

"She's a doctor," I say, hoping the words are reassuring. "She's going to have a look at you, all right? Make sure you don't have any bumps and bruises that we need to fix. And while she does that, I'm going to go get changed into something cleaner, okay?"

Jessica hesitates, clearly not wanting to be separated from me, but then nods shakily as Cora reaches out a hand.

"Come on, kid," Cora says with a smile, tugging Jessica away. "Does anything on your body hurt?" Cora asks as she leads Jessica over to where Roger stands with wide, scared eyes, not understanding what's going on. Relief courses through me when I see Rafe sleeping in his godfather's arms, blissfully unaware of the drama and the violence of the night.

Jessica begins to speak and I loose a long breath, glad that she's in good hands.

And then I look up at my livid mate, and nod once, heading for the bathroom. My heart wrenches to not go immediately to my child, to take him in my arms, but...

Well, I am all bloody. And my mate and I need to talk. Sinclair understands immediately, following me into the bathroom where we can speak privately.

And he slams the door hard behind him.

Chapter 452 – Fallout

Ella

I spin around to face my mate, my hands on my hips, ready to defend myself. But he closes the distance in an instant, taking my face in his hands.

“Are you all right?” he growls, looking down into my face, his eyes quickly moving over my features. My mouth falls open a bit and I blink in surprise. “I’m fine, Dominic.”

“Thank god,” he breathes, wrapping his arms around me and gathering me to him in a tight hug. “I mean, I’m mad as hell, Ella I can’t believe you did that, but -”

“Dominic!” I protest, pulling back a little and frowning up at him. “How could I not have done that!?”

“Are you seriously asking me how you could have not jumped out of the window and attacked a man under the explicit protection of a nation about to take us to war? How you could have just let the palace guards that we hired to protect our people handle it, like they were about to do?”

I narrow my eyes at him, but...well. I also see his point.

Still. I stand by it – every moment of it.

“His life was mine to take,” I say, my voice more of a growl than I intended it to be. “Mine, Dominic. And no – I didn’t do it for vengeance, but he crossed a line tonight, trying to take Sarah and Jessica like he did. Would you have let him live, after he did that?”

Sinclair’s mouth tightens into a thin line. “No,” he says, answering honestly. “I’d have had the guards shoot him, take the shot as soon as they safely could.”

“His death was mine,” I repeat. “If someone was going to take it, I wanted the blood on my hands. And you, of all people, know why.”

Sinclair steps back from me a second, looking down at the man’s blood quite literally all over me. And then he sighs, and shakes his head, and surprises me by starting to tug at my shirt.

“What?” I ask, confused.

“What, would you like to sleep in your blood-soaked clothing, Ella?” He asks, glaring at me a little. “You need a shower, and to get changed.”

“Oh,” I reply, realizing that he’s helping me. And so I take a step back, raising my hands and letting my mate pull my shirt over my head.

“It’s not that I disagree with any of the things you did,” Sinclair says softly as he helps me strip. He pauses and glares at me when he sees the long cut along my side, but I roll my eyes before closing them and accessing my gift. It just takes a second – it’s a scratch, honestly and when I open my eyes I’m all healed up.

I twist so Sinclair can see the skin again smooth and healed. Satisfied, he nods and then moves to the shower, turning the water on so it’s nice and steamy, just how I like it.

“Like I was saying,” he picks up, turning to me again. “I’m not sad to see him go, just...”

“I know,” I say, sighing and stepping into the shower as Sinclair strips his own tuxedo, now likewise stained with my uncle’s blood. “I’m...Queen now. I should have let someone else do it. Should not have...gotten my hands dirty, as it were.”

Quickly, I soap myself down, doing best to keep my hair dry as Sinclair ducks into the closet to grab us both a fresh set of clothes. When he comes back, I’m nearly finished. I rinse myself off as I look at my mate a little guiltily.

“People got pictures, Dominic,” I say quietly, my voice apologetic. “There may have been...press.”

“I’m aware,” he says on a sigh as I turn off the water and step out of the shower. He hands me a towel, looking at me with a blank face. “It will...be what it is. Wolves won’t care about the violence – I think, when the details come out, they’ll understand. Humans, though...”

“I know,” I sigh, glancing at the door as I towel off. “All the good press will we bought with Cora’s wedding...”

He steps close to me then, wrapping an arm around my naked waist and again pulling me flush against him. “We’ll handle it, Ella,” he murmurs, brushing his knuckles down the length of my cheek, and I smile a little up at him.

“You think it’s fixable?”

“I think you’re the Queen,” he says, shaking his head with a little shrug. “No going back now.”

I laugh a little, looking up at him. “That’s not what I asked.”

Gently, Sinclair lowers his face, pressing his lips to mine. “We’ll figure it out,” he murmurs when he pulls away, just an inch. “Now,” he raises his head more and swats me on the ass, maybe a little harder than necessary, but it just makes me grin. “Get dressed. Let’s go...see what the hell our family thinks.”

I stand on my toes and kiss him again, grateful that he’s on my side. I know that he’s madder than he’s letting on, and that this really is a big deal, but...

Well, it’s good to know that he’s got my back.

I hurriedly get dressed in the soft clothing Sinclair brought in for me, twisting my hair up into a quick bun before stepping into some slippers. When I’m ready, I nod, and Sinclair and I together walk back into our bedroom.

Cora sits on the couch with Jessica by her side, a tablet in her hands. Roger stands next to her, Rafe asleep in his arms. Henry turns his chair towards us as we cross the room.

“Well?” Sinclair asks, nodding down at the tablet. “What’s the verdict?”

Cora looks wide-eyed at both of us. “It’s...not good,” Cora says softly, shaking her head as she concentrates on me. “The press is getting wind, and social media is already going crazy.

Ella, are you – are you all right? Did -”

“I’m fine,” I say, stepping to Roger’s side and reaching for my baby. “But forget about the news. Where is Sarah?”

“Infirmary, downstairs.” Henry reports, smiling kindly at Jessica, who looks around at all of us, worried and confused. “We’ve been getting reports, and the aids are desperate to come in and start making plans for how to handle this but...” he glances up at Roger. “We wanted a moment, to make sure we’re all on the same page.”

“Which is?” Sinclair says, crossing his arms and looking around.

“Full support,” Roger says in an instant. “You did the right thing, Ella,” he says, locking eyes with me and nodding. “I mean, I personally wouldn’t have leapt from the window to do it?” He cocks his head to the side a little here, a smirk pulling at his lips. ”

But Xander crossed the line – he was going to get taken out. It was just a question of who did it.”

“And are we all agreed?” I ask, looking particularly at Cora now.

She blinks up at me. “Wait, why am I being singled out?” she asks.

"Because," I say, shrugging a little. " You're..."

"Human?" she says, raising an eyebrow.

And none of us say anything, because honestly, that's what we're all thinking.

"Ella," Cora says, shaking her head at me. "Just because I'm human doesn't mean a little bit of me isn't pleased to see that man meet his end. Did I wish that that responsibility fell on your shoulders? Probably not. But still," she shrugs, meeting my gaze steadily. "I am on your side, with everyone else.

And I'll defend you to the ends of it."

"Good," I say, looking around. And then I sigh and look at my mate. " Ready?"

"I'll let the aids in," he says, moving towards the door with a nod. "It's going to be a long night."

"Have Sarah sent up too," I call to him, and I wait to see him nod again before I kneel before Jessica, taking her hands. "We're going to bring her here, and I'm going to heal her up, okay? And then the two of you can go back to your rooms, if you'd like."

"Okay," she says, her voice soft and still a little scared.

"Okay, sweetheart," I say, taking her hand and giving it a squeeze. As I smile at her, I access my gift a little bit and let it sweep through her, healing the few places on her scalp where Xander hurt her, as well as a few bruises on her body. It isn't much, but I'm glad to help her feel even a little better.

When I move to stand up, though, Jessica tightens her hand. She looks anxiously at Cora, Roger, and Henry, and then quirks her finger at me, asking me to come closer so she can tell me a secret.

I lean in, turning my ear to the little girl.

"Ella, I know I'm supposed to be nice but..."

I nod, encouraging her.

"I hated the Master, Ella. He was always so mean, and we were scared of him always. I'm...I'm glad he's dead. I'm glad you did it."

I breathe out a deep breath and then move a way a little, locking eyes with the little girl and nodding deeply. "Me too, Jess," I say, squeezing her hand tight and giving her a big smile. "It wasn't nice but...well," I shrug and let my shoulders fall with a sigh. " Sometimes, when people aren't good to us? We don't have the choice but to stop being nice."

And she gives me a little smile, and I return it tenfold.

And then I get to my feet, ready to face whatever consequences come for me. Because that approval, from this little girl who has suffered under Xander far more than I have?

It's more than I need.

I will stand by the actions that I took tonight and never, not once, publicly apologize for them. I did it for me, but I did it for Jessica too, and all the little girls like her.

And even if the press tears me to shreds, I know in my heart: I'm fighting for the girls who have never had someone to fight for them.

Girls like Jessica, and Sarah, and Cora and me, when we were small.

And I'll do it all again in a heartbeat.

Chapter 453 – Press

Ella

We stayed up all night working and strategizing. A flurry of aids came into the room right away as well as several guards, who worked with Sinclair to brief him and to begin to come up with a plan about how to handle the press.

I trusted my mate to handle that, though, focusing my attention singularly on Sarah when she was wheeled into the room on a hospital gurney. Sarah was conscious, but in a great deal of pain, and Cora and I moved immediately to her side. Cora asked questions of both the attendant doctor and Sarah herself as I handed Rafe to Henry.

When Cora quickly briefed me that the wounds, as far as she could tell, were nothing that I hadn't handled before, I nodded to her and quickly took Sarah's hand. "I'd like to heal you, Sarah, if you'll let me," I said quietly, looking her in the eye.

She laughed a little, shaking her head at me. "Go ahead," she said with an attempt at a grin that immediately fell away as she winced, favoring her side where Xander kicked her.

I exhaled sharply, hating that he put her in pain again, and that I was the cause of it. But, eager to be the solution as much as I could, I closed my eyes and concentrated, accessing my gift and healing my friend.

The work was done quickly and barely twenty minutes later I opened my eyes to see Sarah staring at me in awe. "

That's...incredible," she said. "I mean, I watched you work on Jessica, but feeling it?"

"Better?" I asked, and she had just laughed, marveling a little.

Things moved quickly then, with Sinclair glancing over at me meaningfully, indicating that he had things he wanted to run my way. I nodded to him but turned first to Sarah and Jessica to ensure that they got settled. When they hesitated about going back to their rooms tonight Xander had, after all, kidnapped them from that space I insisted they take one of the personal rooms in the back of Sinclair and my personal quarters one of the rooms that we hope to one day fill with our children.

They had smiled at this idea, wanting to be close, and Cora took Jessica by the hand as Sarah lifted herself from the gurney and walked away, completely free of pain.

"Wow," the attendant doctor had said, his eyes wide. "What did you..."

"Another time," I had sighed, placing a hand on his shoulder. "We should talk but..."

another time?”

He smiled at me, still a little shocked and awed, but he agreed and quietly left the room. I sighed then, and took the baby back from Henry before moving to Sinclair's side, ready to face whatever was next.

We were up until about...three in the morning I guess, preparing press releases and dealing with all the details. By the end I had tucked Rafe away into his little crib and fallen into bed exhausted. I had always thought it was an exaggeration when people say they fell asleep before their head hit the pillow, but as I have absolutely no memory of laying my head down?

I guess they weren't exaggerating after all.

I groan a little as I roll over in bed now and glance at the clock. My groan only deepens when I see that it's only 7 am.

Four hours of sleep – that's... Appalling.

“Morning, little Queen,” I hear my mate rumble beside me and I turn towards him with a frown on my face, noting the tablet on his lap.

“Dominic,” I murmur, working to sit up. “Did you sleep at all!”

“A little,” he says, reaching out a hand to stroke over my hair. “I wish you'd slept more. What got you up?”

“Anxiety, I guess,” I say, moving myself closer to him and nodding towards the tablet. “What are they saying now?”

Last night, the news had gone pretty wild with everything, playing all kinds of footage from the event me racing across the flagstones in my wolf's body, me negotiating with Xander while he pressed a knife to Jessica's throat, me leaping through the air again in my wolf's form with my teeth bared, me looking wide-eyed out into the crowd with blood all down my front

It had been...a frenzy, honestly, with no one really knowing what was going on or how to react. Sinclair had been right – a lot of people, particularly humans, were upset with what they called the “wanton violence” displayed by wolf kind. And while the words were levied at both Xander and at me...

Well, the sight of a newly crowned Queen covered in a man's blood while his corpse laid at her feet? It wasn't... great.

"I think," Sinclair says, a smile on his lips, "you're going to be...pleasantly surprised." He passes the tablet to me.

"What?" I frown at him, confused, but he nods to the tablet and I look down at it.

The baby fusses a little, passing a little pulse of need down the bond and I hesitate but Sinclair gets up, heading toward Rafe's crib and letting me focus. So, I sigh and concentrate, frowning as I read the headline at the top of the page.

A Queen for the People, it reads. My frown deepens.

What? What is this? My eyes move down a little and I blink in surprise to see that I recognize the byline: the article is written by Tempest Bowers, the woman I met last night, whose daughters just wanted some chocolate...

My mouth falls open a little as I begin to read because...

The article, as a whole, is a rather stunning defense of my actions last night. And Tempest?

She's done her homework.

My eyes fly over the tablet, seeing all the details of my life plainly laid out for the readers, wondering how the hell Tempest figured all this out and further how she got it all done by seven in the morning. But as I continue to read, and see the number of people that she interviewed...

I realize that Tempest? She's probably been working on this for a long time.

"Clever lady," I murmur, shaking my head as I read through the article. She starts by addressing the violence of last night, with all of the details about Xander's death at my hands, not shying away from any of it. Indeed, I come away in the first paragraphs looking...well, precisely as we thought humans might see me: a cold-blooded murderer, over-reacting to a situation that deserved more diplomacy.

But then Tempest continues to spin out the story, including all the details of how Xander knew I was his niece but abandoned me to be raised in an orphanage, only to find me years later and violate my body and my privacy by having me impregnated with the sperm of his choice. She continues to focus on Xander only for a few short paragraphs, detailing his politics and his forced subjection of Sarah, and Jessica, and their mother.

But then, to my surprise, the story turns again to me. It's a love story, really, of how Sinclair and I found each other despite Xander's plans and fell in love, how hard we worked to rid this nation of Damon – who honestly wouldn't have been much better than Xander himself. She even tells of Xander's attempt to kidnap Rafe, and then all the work I did in the refugee camps to help people who really need me.

There are some guesses in there, and hints, about the magic I wield, which was never precisely a secret even if it's not common knowledge. I smirk to see how well she's begun to guess at what, precisely, I am able to do with my powers. She doesn't go so far as to say I'm a magical all-healing Queen, but she does detail the incredible number of people – especially children – who walked away from the refugee camps entirely healed of dreadful injuries and diseases.

In the end, Tempest returns to the question of what I did last night, and carefully asks the reader to reconsider the situation. While it may appear at first glance as if a woman brutally murdered an old man, Tempest ends by asking: "what side, really, would have your Queen take? I, for one, might prefer a fierce Queen who doesn't wait to let bureaucracy handle serial abusers who attempt to kidnap little girls, but who instead tears their throats out and ends the issue there. Ella Sinclair isn't a politician, she's a woman who fights for her people, and heals them too. At least, those who deserve it."

"Damn," I say, lowering the tablet to my lap and looking up at Sinclair, who smirks down at me with the baby in his arms. I reach for Rafe, knowing he needs to be fed. "I mean, are people... reading this? Do they believe her?"

"Shared on social media over a million times in the hour since it's been published," Sinclair says, happily handing the baby to me. I smile down at Rafe, tugging up my shirt and preparing to feed him, but Sinclair places my a soft hand beneath my chin. I look up at him.

"People are seeing you, Ella, for what you truly are," he says quietly. "I'm glad for that, and grateful. But I knew, eventually, that they would."

I smile up at him, my eyes shining a bit with my tears. "Do you really think so?" I ask, shaking my head, marveling a bit.

Slowly, he nods, a grin taking over his face. "Thanks to Tempest Bowers, they're seeing it faster than I thought they might." He stands up, running a hand through his hair. "She really helped us out here, with this article."

I laugh a little, turning my attention back to Rafe when he gives a hungry little squeak of protest. I quickly get him started, sighing a little when I feel him latch. Then, I look back up at my mate.

"Well? What do you send the woman who has single-handedly saved your reputation?" I ask, grinning at him. "Like, a fruit basket?"

Chapter 454 – The Threat of War

Ella

We're able to see the true fallout of Xander's death as the next few days pass, which are...more stressful than I'd like them to be. Cora, luckily, stays at my side through most of it, knowing that I need her support.

"Well," she says, lounging in bed with me and flicking through her phone " you'll be happy to know that incidents of people calling you a hero outweigh those calling you a murderer three to one by this point!"

I sigh and throw a pretzel at my sister, giving her a little glare that she returns with a grin. Both of us are lounging around in pajamas because Sinclair has asked me not to leave our suite until things calm down a bit. Rafe lays peacefully in the blankets between us, gurgling and grabbing at his toes.

"Don't tease me," I murmur. "You know I hate this."

"You need to get over it, Ells," Cora murmurs, returning her attention to her phone. "You care way too much about what people think about you. You did what you did for everyone's good. People just love to have someone to dogpile on. And like I said, there are way more people on your side than those who are against you, so I think it's all turning out nicely."

"Easy for you to say," I sigh. "You're the martyred duchess whose wedding I ruined."

"I know," she says, flashing me a wicked grin. "No one's saying anything bad about me, the poor innocent duchess!"

I growl a little and toss another pretzel at her, satisfied when this one bounces off of her head.

Both of us turn towards the door when it opens though, and twin smiles light our faces when both Sinclair and Roger come in.

"Hey!" Cora calls, sitting up and waving to her mate. "Welcome to the slumber party!"

"I'm jealous," Roger says as he and Sinclair cross to us. Roger easily slides onto the bed next to Cora, wrapping an arm around her shoulder. "You three look so comfortable. And cozy."

"Yeah well," I mutter, leaning against Sinclair as he settles on the bed behind me and drops a kiss to my cheek before leaning forward to tickle Rafe's belly. The baby giggles eagerly, which makes me smile, just a little. "You wouldn't be so happy about it, Roger, if you were forced to be cozy because you're on house arrest. Or suite arrest. Or whatever."

"Well, Ella," Roger says, looking at me with wide, innocent eyes, a wicked grin starting on his mouth. "I mean, you could always, you know, leap out the window if you're feeling too contained

Cora bursts into laughter as I throw a pretzel at Roger now, hard. But he just snatches it out of the air and pops it into his mouth, grinning at me.

"Settle, settle," Sinclair says with a sigh, wrapping an arm around my waist and pulling me close against him. He rubs his cheek warmly against my head and passes a great deal of warmth and love down the bond, knowing that I need it. It hasn't been easy on me, these past few days. Even if Tempest article did a great deal of work to shine the truth on the situation?

Well, I know that it's rather an understatement that I've been living up to my nickname.

"Ready for your update, trouble?" Sinclair asks, planting a kiss on my cheek. "Or do we need to bring you more snacks first, so you have something to temper the anxiety?"

"Just tell me," I sigh, popping another pretzel in my mouth. I have indeed been snacking a lot these past few days. Anxious eating has never really been my thing but...well, I've never been the focus of international attention before, have I?

"All right. The justice systems have decided not to press charges against you, calling you a political agent and a technical extension of the military. Since Xander was a war criminal and was actively committing a violent crime that would have resulted in an order to use lethal force to stop him, your actions have been marked as an extension of that order."

"Wow," Cora says, her eyebrows going up. "How the hell did you manage that?"

"It took some doing," Roger says, "dad was behind a lot of it. But, as a result, the role of Queen has been officially marked as a military and political figure in this nation, which is... pretty cool."

"I got lucky," I mutter, looking down at the blankets and sighing, feeling guilty.

"You didn't," Sinclair says, giving me a nudge. I look up at him, meeting his frown with my own. "It's right, Ella. The Queen should have political and military power in the nation if the King does, and no one who truly understands this situation believes that you did anything wrong. All right? So stop blaming yourself."

I shake my head at him, giving another sigh. "You're not telling me everything," I say, knowing that I'm right.

And Sinclair grimaces, which just makes me groan and lay down on the bed next to my baby. I close my eyes and breathe in Rafe's sweet baby scent as he reaches out a pudgy little hand and grasps at my cheek, making me smile just a little bit. "Go on," I say, my eyes still closed. "Let's have the whole story."

I hear Sinclair sigh again before he begins. "The Atalaxians, as we guessed are... displeased."

"Understatement," Roger adds, his voice dry.

"They're...using this so-called offense as a rationale to go to war."

"What?" I hear Cora breathe, shocked, and my own eyes fly open. "Does this mean," my sister asks, hesitating, "that...that we're at war?"

"Not yet," Sinclair says, his voice serious. "They haven't declared war. They're just saying that this is an offense worthy of it. It's...a bullshit move, and everyone knows it – Xander is barely their citizen. But they're taking advantage of it, trying to back us into a corner so that we give them whatever they want in exchange for not going to war."

My lips draw into a thin line as I stare at my little baby, my sweet Rafe, wondering what his future holds.

War.

War is the last thing I want for our world right now, for Rafe's future.

And yet, somehow, I'm at the heart of it.

I rack my brain, wondering if there was anything I could have done to stop it...

"Don't," Sinclair murmurs, reaching out a warm hand that settles on my hip. I look up at him as he shakes his head. "It's not your fault Ella. It would have happened no matter what."

"Do you think that's true?" I ask, holding my mate's gaze. "I mean, Prince Calvin confirmed as much, the night of the wedding. That the Atalaxians encouraged Xander that night so he would overstep. Was this a setup from the start?"

"Is that what that Prince said?" Cora asks, fascinated.

I turn a little so I can see her and I nod, confirming it.

“That’s so...odd...” Cora says, her voice wondering.

“Why?” Sinclair asks, and I sit up, because I want to be able to easily look between them now.

“Because,” Cora says, her mind clearly working through it. “If that was their plan all along, to force your hand, then why on earth would Calvin tell you it? It gives you all the power to point it out – to pass the blame back to them.”

“Well, we don’t have any proof,” I say, giving a little shrug. “It was just...a personal conversation. Nothing written, nothing recorded.”

“Still,” she says, looking at Sinclair now with a little frown. “It is...odd. Either there’s something else going on here? Where like, the Atalaxians want you to think that they set you up? Or, more simply...”

She cocks her head to the side, confused.

Sinclair finishes for her. “...that the Prince is up to something else,” he murmurs, his voice quiet, considering.

“Who is this guy?” Roger asks, leaning forward, curious.

And bizarrely, almost as if in answer to the question, a knock comes at the door.

Sinclair calls for whoever it is to come in, and an aid peeks through the door with an odd look on her face.

“A note,” she says, holding out a little envelope. “For the Queen.”

Sinclair stands and moves over to the aid, taking the note from her hands. “Who is it from?” he asks, turning the paper over in his hands.

“From...Prince Calvin of Atalaxia,” the woman says.

We all go a bit still at that moment. Then Sinclair thanks the aid, dismissing her, and slowly crosses the room to hold the envelope out to me.

“Well, Ella?” he says as I take it.”

What does your Prince have to say for himself now?”

Chapter 455 – Ella Gets a Note

Ella

I snatch the note out of my mate's hand, muttering "he's not my prince," but no one really acknowledges the words as I tear the envelope open and eagerly read the short letter inside. When I see what it says, my eyebrows arch almost to my hairline.

"What is it?" Cora asks, leaning eagerly forward.

"He wants to...go to dinner," I say, frowning a little.

"Dinner," Sinclair says, frowning and sliding his hands into his pockets. "

Why on earth would he want that? We have three more dinners with the Atalaxians scheduled over the next few nights, he could go to any one of those

"No, Dominic," I say softly, looking up at him. "The note is only addressed to me."

My mate goes still as my words, and their implications, sink in. And then his face goes dark.

"Okay!" Roger says in too-cheerful tones, wrapping his hands around Cora's arms as he stands up, dragging her with him. "Time for us to go! It's been a pleasure, Dom – we'll see you later – "

"What?" Cora gasps, fumbling to her feet and looking between Roger and me. "No, I want to stay!"

"Nope!" he says, moving her hastily for the door. "We're out of here!"

"Roger, I'm in pajamas – "

"If you don't kill anyone, Cora, no one will care what you're wearing -"

My eyes follow my protesting sister as Roger pulls her from the room, shutting the door behind them. And then my eyes snap up to my mate who glowers silently down at me, the only sounds in the room our little baby happily cooing next to us.

"You know I didn't do this, Dominic," I say, my voice stern as I slowly start to shake my head at him.

"I didn't say you did, Ella," he snaps, his voice a low snarl. But he's pissed – I can tell by the stiffness of his shoulders, the tense set of every single one of his muscles.

I move slowly, not wanting to set him off. I mean, I'm not scared, not at all I didn't do anything wrong to begin with, and he'd never hurt me. But still, I don't want him to lose his temper, not when he's clearly working so hard to contain it.

So, quite calmly, I reach for the baby and gather him close to my chest before standing up and moving to my mate's side.

"What do you want me to do?" I ask, my voice perfectly calm. Because...

I mean, honestly? Even if I only ever admit it to myself? I want to go. I'm not only eager to make a connection with the only Atalaxian who has even hinted that he might want to build bridges between our nations, but even more than that?

There is some kind of connection between Calvin and I and I'm dying to know what it is. I want very much to go to this dinner and find out more.

But Sinclair – he's my mate. And he is about ready to tear this man apart for asking me to dinner – especially because Sinclair thinks that he's into me or whatever.

As Sinclair stares down into my face, I can tell all of these thoughts are rushing through his mind as well. But then he loses his breath and wraps an arm around my waist, pulling me close to him as he softly raises a hand to my cheek. "What do you want to do?"

But I shake my head, not letting him get out of it that easily. "I am your Queen, Dominic," I say quietly. "I am done taking things into my own hands for now. If you want me to go, and to see what I can do to make a connection with Atalaxia, or if I can learn anything new from him, I'll do it. But if you want me to stay?" I shrug. "I'll stay."

He growls a little, his arm tightening, and even though I know he's upset I can't help but smile a little. I like it when he's possessive like this. Warmth coils within me, heating me from the inside out.

Sensing that heat, Sinclair moves his thumb to my mouth, tracing the line of my lower lip with the edge of his finger.

"Let me think on it," he murmurs.

"What's there to think about?" I ask softly, genuinely curious.

"The pros and cons," he answers, taking a deep sniff of my scent, apparently relishing it, "of ripping him to shreds for daring to ask you out on a date."

I burst out laughing here, earning a little smile from my mate. "Dominic," I say, shaking my head at him, "it's not a date -"

"Then why didn't he invite me?"

"Because every time you talk to him you get all growly!" I say, laughing. "I'm nice to him, which is beneficial for international relations!"

"Well," Sinclair murmurs, snapping his teeth at me a little, "maybe you should be a little less nice to him."

I shake my head up at him, stepping closer to that my body lines as flush as it can against his with the baby in my arms. "First you tell me that you'd prefer I didn't kill the enemies, now you're telling me not to be nice? Honestly, Dominic, mixed messages over here -"

"How about," he murmurs, moving his hand from my face and slipping it to my shoulder and then down my back, "you just stay in bed, all the time? Then no foreign princes will ever hit on you, and I'll get a great deal more peace

I laugh again, raising myself onto my tiptoes and tilting my chin up, silently begging for a kiss and sending a little pulse of love and desire down our bond. Sinclair growls in response and lowers his mouth to mine, kissing me roughly, claiming me as his. I open my mouth to him, eagerly giving into it, letting him know that I'm his-his-his-

The kiss deepens and I'm a little frantic suddenly, wondering how to simultaneously get the baby to his crib while continuing to kiss my mate, because no part of me wants to break away any time soon

But Sinclair groans, and lifts his face from mine, even though I'm still pressed tight to him.

"I can't," he sighs, panting a little as he looks down at me.

"What!?" I say, aghast.

He shakes his head, glancing over at a clock. "I'm already late, Ella - we've got more negotiations with the Atalaxians, and I have to find Roger -" he rolls his eyes and glances towards the door, "who the hell knows where he went..."

I pout up at my mate, disappointed. "Fine," I say, my voice a little mean. "But you owe me, all right?"

Sinclair laughs, taking my chin possessively between his fingers and shaking his head at me. "Tonight, trouble. I'll make it up to you tenfold."

I sigh but step away, disappointed but knowing that it's necessary to be patient, even though patience has never been one of my strong suits. I glance over at the bed, where the invitation sits discarded.

Sinclair follows my gaze and we're both silent for a moment, looking at it.

"Do you want me to reply to that?" I ask quietly.

"No," he responds, and I look up to see him shaking his head. Then he leans forward and kisses me again, softly, just for a moment. "Let that bastard wait. I'll be seeing him this afternoon anyway – maybe I'll get a better idea of what he wants. Are you all right with that?"

"I am if you are," I say, meaning every word.

And my mate kisses me again, and then drops a kiss to our baby's head before murmuring his goodbyes and heading again out of the room, off to his King's business.

I sigh more deeply this time, looking down at my happy baby. "Just me and you, little meatball," I murmur, smiling at him. Rafe squeals a little in happiness, waving his fists at me, and I laugh.

"You're right," I say, turning back to the bed to flop back down and spend some time with my little guy, "it's not so bad, is it?"

But even as I play with Rafe, my eyes drift over to the discarded invitation on the bed.

And deep down? I hope that whatever Calvin and Sinclair say to each other today means that I get to say yes to that.

Because something at the center of me is urging me to go and speak to this Prince alone, to hear what it is he has to say.

Chapter 456 – Negotiations

Sinclair

I storm down the hallway on my way to the meeting, but I'm gratified to see Roger waiting there for me at the door, leaning against the wall. I nod to him, not breaking my stride, but he falls in with me as we head inside.

"So, what'd you bring?" Roger asks, his voice serious.

"What?" I ask, half turning to him in my confusion.

"To kill the prince," Roger says, his face deadpan. "Like a gun, or something more dramatic like a morning star? Or are you just going to like, tear him limb from limb -"

"Roger," I sigh, shaking my head as I arrive at the head of the table but his face just breaks out into a grin.

"What is it?" our father asks, looking between us. I know that he can tell from my serious face that something's up, and from Roger's joking one that it's well enough under control that we don't need to take major action now.

"Don't worry about it, dad," I murmur, not wanting to get into it with the Atalaxian delegation already filtering into the room.

"Prince Calvin asked Ella on a date," Roger says, leaning close so that dad can hear but speaking loud enough that I know what he said. I sigh deeply, grabbing a packet of papers off the desk and flipping idly through them, making a mental note to beat the crap out of my brother at the earliest opportunity.

"What?" dad says, looking at me with wide eyes.

"It's not like that," I growl, glaring at Roger. "Can we just drop it for now? We've got more important things to worry about."

Dad glares at Roger too, taking my side as the majority of the persons attending this meeting begin to take their seats. Roger laughs a little but comes around to my other side, sinking into the chair on my right while my father takes his place on my left. King Gabriel is here as an advisor on our side, ready to argue staunchly against war, as well as six other pack members from our territories. My eyes scan the room, noting the presence of nine Atalaxian delegates with one empty chair.

Just as an aid begins to close the door, the final delegate appears: Prince Calvin, slipping into the room and heading for his chair without even looking at me.

I glare daggers at him, unable to help it, willing him to look at me, to face me.

But he doesn't raise his eyes.

Inwardly I sigh, because I want him to look at me – I want him to know that I know what the hell he's up to, even if Ella doesn't see it, or pretends she doesn't.

But he's either clever or a coward, because he keeps his eyes down.

So, I move on and begin the meeting by greeting everyone and thanking them for their presence. I express my sincere hopes that we can find a path to peace, stating that neither of our nations will truly benefit from a war. Then, with opening statements behind me, I take my seat, opening the table to conversation from both sides. The conversation is long, and drawn out, and largely unproductive. The Atalaxians are well prepared and clearly seeking war. I sigh inwardly as I start to realize that my suspicions were correct: that they came here wanting war, that they likely hoped Xander would do something to give them a reason to push for it, and now that they've sunk their teeth into it? They're unlikely to give up.

And frankly, it makes a lot of sense for them to want to go to war with us. Atalaxia is a large, conservative nation with deep pockets and excellent military powers. Moon Valley is smaller, and while we have better technology, better strategic location, and a fantastic set of national resources, we've also recently been gutted by civil war.

Damn it, Damon, I think to myself, scowling inwardly. You set us up for this.

Because it's true – Damon's war is what tore us apart, made us a wounded animal ready for Atalaxia to come in for a kill. While they're pretending that they want this war because we've moved against them, everyone knows it's bullshit. No, what Atalaxia really wants is to wipe our nation out, to annex this territory and all of its resources into itself.

Not only would this be strategically and financially profitable for Atalaxia, but it would be an ideological coup as well. A lot of powerful men in that nation have some truly awful ideas about gender and humanity; they would see it as a very personal victory to come to our nation and teach our women, and our humans, their "proper" place in the world.

I grit my teeth as I think about it, the warrior in me wanting to go to war, to wipe the Atalaxians off the face of the earth in turn.

But the King? Who is responsible for his people, and who knows that this nation has nowhere near the resources, currently, to take on this larger force?

Damn it, but I know we'll lose. Or if we even have a shot of winning, that the war will stretch on for years – that, damn it, Rafe might be grown by the time it comes to a close

—

I squeeze my eyes shut for a moment as I realize that...that Rafe could even fight in this war, if it goes for as long as I think it could. That if I fail in these negotiations, I could be signing my own son's death warrant on the battlefield

A shudder passes through me and beside me I feel my brother lean closer. It's a very subtle move – he doesn't touch me, or give any indication that he knows what I'm thinking. But still I can tell. He knows that I'm upset, and in his own way he's trying to be there for me, however he can, without letting the Atalaxians see how much they're tearing me up inside.

I take a deep breath, grateful for him.

And suddenly I remember...that Roger knows more than Ella and I do about Rafe's future. That he didn't tell me everything he and Cora saw at the moonlight baptism we asked him not to but he told me that Rafe's life isn't a tragic one, even if it has hard parts.

If my son died young on a battlefield, Roger would have seen it. And the fact that he didn't...

A great deal of relief rushes through me at the thought and I send a prayer up to the Goddess, thanking her both for my brother and her insight, begging her again to keep my child safe.

Because Rafe – in the end, this is all about him, isn't it? About the world in which he'll grow to be a man, about the Kingdom I'll one day hand over to him.

And as I raise my eyes I look directly at Calvin over the table, who I find looking right at me for the first time. Because he has a son too – just about Rafe's age, does he not?

And is this what we're doing? Two men a King and a Prince – choosing to send our sons to war against each other?

Is this really what we want in the world?

Slowly, as if he can read my thoughts, Calvin nods.

And then, to my surprise, he stands up and leaves the room. The man speaking one of the Atalaxian delegates falters in his speech for a moment, clearly confused at Calvin's abrupt departure. And I glare too, because this man-

Well, he's certainly got balls, doesn't he?

Because his message can't be plainer in this moment.

He wants exactly what I want – to save our children from war – but he's not willing to talk to me about it.

No.

For some reason only he understands, Calvin only wants to speak to Ella.

I grit my teeth as I lean back in my chair, watching the Prince leave the room and close the door behind him, glaring a little at the door once he's gone.

This man he's played his hand well, forcing me to put my Queen in play when my strongest instinct is to protect her.

And even though I know that Ella can handle herself? God damn it, but I know something else is at play here – something beyond international relations.

This man? He's got more at stake with my mate.

And I just don't know what the hell it is.

Chatper 457 – Preparations

#Chatper 457-Preparations Ella

I jump almost out of my skin when Sinclair bangs through our bedroom door. I spin with the baby in my arms, my eyes wide. Sinclair's clearly all worked up as he slams the door behind him, his eyes instantly fixed on me, looking me up and down.

"Why are you dressed like that?" he asks, his voice angry, though I can tell that he's not mad at me he's just worked up at what must have been a very stressful day.

"Like what?" I ask, looking down at myself. I'm wearing what I think is my most conservative dress – black, floor length with a little bit of a train behind me, with long sleeves and a crew neck that cuts across my collar bones, showing nothing beneath.

"Well, you look beautiful, Ella," Sinclair bites out, glaring at me a little like it's an accusation.

I blink at him for a moment, my eyebrows raising. "Is that a problem, Dominic?"

"Why are you all dressed up?" he growls, crossing to me.

"I just thought that I'd get ready, in case I am supposed to go to dinner – "

"And you decided to wear that!?"

"Okay," I say, keeping my voice calm and doing my very best to keep my own temper now, because my mate? He's pushing it. I put one hand out, resting it against his chest. "All right, Dominic. I'm going to give you a minute now to rethink your words, and then we'll start again."

He narrows his eyes at me, not liking at all that I'm talking to him like a kindergartener. But I cock my head to the side, asking him to consider the irony that at this moment I need to talk to him like a kindergartener.

After a long moment he sighs and turns away from me, hanging his head and putting his hands on his hips. "I'm sorry," he murmurs, pulling himself together. Then he drops his face in a hand. "It has been a long day, Ella."

"Oh, sweetheart," I murmur, taking a step forward and putting a hand on his back, stroking up and down, wanting to bring him comfort. "Tell me," I say, and my mate turns and puts his arms around me as he tells me all about the meeting.

I sigh when he finishes. "I'm sorry, Dominic," I say, looking up at him. "I know you tried."

He shakes his head, looking down at me with his gorgeous green eyes. "It doesn't matter what I tried – they've already decided."

I nod, understanding, but knowing that he's going to take the blame on himself no matter what logic presents itself.

Then I bite my lip a little, considering. "Does this mean I'm going to dinner?"

He sighs again, more deeply this time and steps away from me, putting a hand on my shoulder and turning me around. I do as his hands tell me to, spinning so that my back is to him, and then I sigh a little as he clasps my zipper in his hands and starts to pull it hastily down.

"Yes," he says, and I sigh in disappointment –

But then I frown, because...wait, what?

"I'm going?" I ask, trying to turn, but my mate holds me still until he has the zipper all the way down to my ass. Then he starts to push at the gown at my shoulders.

"You are," he says. "I already sent word to the Prince, accepting in your stead." A shiver passes through me at the warmth of Sinclair's palms against my shoulders, my upper arms, but "Well then what are you doing?" I ask, turning and frowning at him even as he tries to stop me. "I'm already dressed! I'm -"

"I'm taking this damn dress off you, Ella," he says, gruff. "Don't you have like, a dirty old sack you can wear? Or a saggy sweatsuit?"

I laugh but I take a step back from him, starting to pull my dress back on. "Dominic! I'm not going to dinner with our enemy looking like a slob. This dress is so matronly -"

"Matronly?" he says, slipping his hands into his pockets and raising a single eyebrow at me. "Ella, I was hard the moment I walked in the door and saw you in that dress –"

"Yeah," I say, waving a dismissive hand, "But that's every dress –"

"Damn right it is," he growls, stepping towards me again, the predator in him coming out.

But this just makes me laugh, as much as it turns me on. Because Sinclair – I like him like this. Maybe we should keep this Atalaxian Prince around if it gets my mate all worked up...

“No, Dominic, I’m wearing this,” I say, struggling to pull my dress back up over my shoulders while I hold the baby.

“Fine,” he says with a little sigh, taking the baby from me. “But take it off anyway. Just for a few minutes.”

“What?” I ask, confused as Sinclair kisses Rafe, murmuring a greeting to him as he carries him over to his little crib and placing him down inside. When that’s done, Sinclair stands by the bed and raises a hand, beckoning me closer with his fingers in a way that gets me even more worked up.

“I’m going to scent mark you,” he says as I start to walk slowly over to him.

“What?” I say again, though I don’t stop moving, wanting to be in his arms as he shrugs off his suit jacket and starts to unbutton his shirt. “Dominic, you haven’t had to scent mark me in months – I’m your mate I already carry your scent all the time -”

But my words falter a bit as Sinclair gets his shirt off, revealing his broad, muscled chest. My mouth goes a little dry as his hands move to his pants, unbuckling his belt and shoving them down to the floor.

“Do it, Ella,” he commands, his voice low and bossy.

I do as he says, raising my hands to my shoulders and pushing at the dress, slipping it off my arms and letting it pool on the floor around me.

“On the bed,” he orders, nodding to it, his voice brooking no argument.

I obey, stepping out of my dress and over to the bed. And then I slowly start to crawl across it, wearing nothing but my black pumps, and my panties, and my lacy bra.

A growl rumbles in my mate’s chest as he watches me crawl to him, as I sit up with my knees apart, looking up at him with my hands resting on my thighs.

“Well?” I say, flicking my eyes down over my nearly-naked body. “If you’re going to do it, Dominic -”

But he doesn’t let me finish my sentence, climbing onto the bed himself in a flash, grabbing me to him and then laying me slowly out onto the bed so that I’m stretched beneath him the way I used to be, at the beginning of all of this, when he would take his time rubbing his body over every inch of mine.

I moan a little as he begins the ceremony again, starting by pressing a lingering kiss to my neck and then moving downwards over me, pressing his skin to mine, making sure that every inch of me bears his scent.

I do my best to stay still not because I can't touch him but...well, because part of me enjoys reliving this experience, thinking of when I was too scared to touch him, when I tried to deny what he did to me, physically, and how desperately I wanted him.

"Dominic," I say quietly as his hips settle between my legs, pressing himself against me as he works his hands slowly up and down my arms. "Not that I'm complaining, but... why are we doing this?"

"Because," he murmurs, lifting his body and then sliding a broad hand beneath me before swiftly flipping me over onto my stomach in one move that makes me laugh, just a little, before he starts on my shoulders and my back. "If I'm going to send you out there with him, I'm going to make sure he damn well knows you're mine."

And I laugh again, shaking my head even though it's resting comfortably against the pillow. Sinclair works his way down my back, making sure every inch of me gets a fair share of his attention. "He already knows that, Dominic," I murmur, almost undone by the pleasure of it. "Everyone does- the world does. A man would have to be a fool to try to take me away from you."

"Because he knows that I would kill him in a second," Sinclair growls, possessive and territorial and mine.

But I turn over a little, looking up at him, reaching out a hand to touch his arm, making him listen to me. "No," I say softly, holding his gaze. "Dominic, because everyone knows that no one could ever convince me to walk away."

And something in him gives at that, at the realization that he doesn't have to hold onto me because he knows that nothing in me wants to leave. And it's not that he didn't know, but

Well. He's an Alpha, isn't he? And I'm his Luna, and his mate. It's in him, somehow, this instinctual urge to hold me tight, to snarl recklessly at anyone who gets too close.

But as I hold his gaze, Sinclair sighs and lays himself down next to me. "All right, Ella," he murmurs, nodding and pulling me close against him. "You're right."

"Am I stinky enough?" I murmur, giggling a little bit.

"No," he growls, sliding his fingers into my hair and taking a steady grip there. "Not ever."

"Well then," I whisper, leaning close and pressing my lips almost against his. "I guess I'm going to be late to dinner then, aren't I?"

“Good,” he growls. “Make him wait.”

And then my mate kisses me, and presses me down into the mattress, and I relish every moment I'm in his arms.

Chapter 458 – Changes

Cora

I blow lightly on my cup of tea, doing my best to cool it and concentrate on the book that's open in my lap. But even as I try, my eyes continually drift to the picture window in front of me that overlooks the front of our property, including the driveway where Roger's going to pull in any minute now.

At least, that's what I've been telling myself for the past two hours.

I sigh, frustrated. I sent him a text a while ago asking him to let me know when he'd be home not that I really need to know, I just...wanted to know.

But Roger is notoriously bad at keeping an eye on his phone, and I know that he and Sinclair have had a particularly stressful day today. So, I do my best to just...exercise my patience.

But I sigh because, even though patience is usually one of my virtues...

Today? I'm finding it a little hard.

Happy!

The baby's little tap comes skipping down the bond out of nowhere, and I burst into a grin, looking down at myself.

"Oh, so are you liking the ginger tea, little guy?" I ask, laughing a little as I stroke a hand over my belly.

He doesn't respond because...well, because I asked him out loud, and he can't hear me, but I smile nonetheless, taking another sip.

Happy? I ask, sending the word and the feeling down the bond to him.

His answer comes back in an instant. Happy happy!

I laugh again, desperately pleased at this, and wondering what's going to come next with him. Because he's getting bigger, I can almost feel him growing by the day, and soon he's going to start feeling all sorts of new things. But will he even have words for them? Will we feel them before he does, and be able to pass the same emotions back and forth, asking questions like we do with happy? Will it be –

But even as I ponder it, excited, headlights flash across the drive and my face bursts into a grin.

“Daddy’s home, little baby,” I murmur, taking another sip of my tea before putting it down on the coffee table as I watch Roger park the car, and step out, and storm for our front door.

“Ut-oh,” I sigh, watching his every step and continuing to stroke my stomach. “Daddy’s in a mood, baby...”

Happy! The baby pulses, making me laugh for real now.

Because daddy is anything but happy, isn’t he?

This kid – already with his jokes. God, I love him so much.

Roger throws open the door, scowling as he storms through it, pushing it shut behind him and already looking up the stairs, clearly intent on going right up and not even noticing me sitting here.

“Hey!” I call cheerfully, and Roger whips towards me, stopping so fast in his tracks that he almost trips over his own feet.

“What are you doing in here?” he asks almost growls.

I lean back a little in surprise, looking him up and down. “I’m sorry,” I say, my voice deep with sarcasm. “Am I... not allowed to sit in our living room?”

Roger scowls, hanging his head for a second and running a hand through his hair before looking up at me again. “I’m sorry,” he says, and I can tell that he means it even though his voice is clipped. “You just surprised me – it’s been...”

“One hell of a day?” I offer.

And he sighs, and nods.

“Come here,” I say, reaching for him and folding my legs to make space on the couch.

“Actually, Cora,” he says, glancing up the stairs. “Can we just go to bed?”

“Really?” I ask, going a little still. “You’re not hungry, or...”

“Please,” he says, hanging his head again, almost begging for a moment. “I just want to go to bed. With you. And just...be there. All right?”

“Okay,” I say, a little disturbed now. Because I don’t frequently see him like this. Once we broke into Roger's tough shell, he revealed himself to be funny, and sweet, and full of jokes. This Roger, which exists even beneath that? Earnest, vulnerable Roger?

Well, if he's showing me this side...he must really be upset.

I'm on my feet and moving to his side in a second. "Sure," I say, nodding to him and taking his hand. "Let's go."

And my mate nods to me once, tugging on my hand and pulling me up the stairs with him.

We don't say much as when we get up to the bedroom, instead moving smoothly through our evening routine. Roger gives a quick kiss before heading to the bathroom to take a short shower, washing off the day. I'm silent as I change into my nightgown, laying out a pair of pajama pants on the bed for him, because I know that's all he'll sleep in.

Then I turn on the fire because I want the warmth and a little light to see by, but otherwise shut off all the lights and climb into bed, waiting, idly stroking my stomach.

I watch my mate as he comes out of the bathroom a few minutes later, his face serious and his eyes far-off, thinking through something that I know he'll tell me about in a few minutes when he's ready. I can't help admiring him a little when he drops his towel and reaches for the folded pajama pants on the edge of the bed.

Feeling my desire down our bond despite my efforts to keep it to myself, Roger raises his head a little and smirks at me. But I just shrug, because I mean, it's not a secret.

My mate's hot. What am I supposed to do when he shows up all naked in bedroom, the fire highlighting the carved lines of his body in a flickering orange glow?

His smirk turns into a full smile by the time he gets the pajama pants on and moves to his side of the bed, pulling back the covers and slipping beneath them. I scootch across the mattress, pressing myself to his side, and Roger lets out a wicked little growl as he wraps his arms around me and pulls me close, resting his cheek against my chest and letting out a long sigh of comfort.

"Poor Roger," I murmur, running my fingers through his still-damp hair and cooing softly to him in a way I rarely do.

Because most of our relationship is based on a great deal of laughter and teasing. But tonight? Tonight, I can tell he needs something different.

I start to run my fingernails lightly over the skin of his back in a way that I know he likes.

And Roger, to my content, starts almost to purr with the pleasure of it. Interestingly, for how much we usually want to tear into each other, there's not too much that's sexual about this moment. Instead, it's simply comfort freely offered and gratefully accepted by two people who love each other very, very much.

"Tell me everything, baby," I murmur, hoping he will.

And Roger, to my pleased surprise, comes right out with it.

"It's war, Cora," he sighs.

"Really?" I ask, unable to keep the dread from my voice. "Did they declare it?"

"No," he says, shaking his head and wrapping an arm around my waist, wanting me as close as I can get. "But- we were in meetings with the Atalaxians all day and it's very clear that's where they're headed. Dominic could tell, I could tell, dad could tell. They've got us in a bad spot, and they want war. So? They're going to declare it the minute this delegation gets back."

I sigh, dread filling me, but still...

I mean, we knew it was heading for this, didn't we?

So, what has him all wrapped up?

"Tell me," I say quietly, nudging him a little down the bond, letting him know that I know that there's more.

He doesn't bother to deny it, instead heaving a big sigh. "Dominic and I talked a lot tonight about what it is we need to do. He sent Ella to that damn dinner -"

"Really?" I ask, my eyes going wide.

"We're grasping at straws, Cora," he says, defending his brother even though he should know he doesn't have to. I'm actually glad Ella's going to that dinner – there is something weird between her and that Prince, and I for one want her to figure it out.

Plus, I know she'd never, ever betray her mate.

Even if...

Well. No point in voicing my suspicions now, especially if they're likely to be wrong. No need to raise trouble that's not already there.

“Everyone’s got to do their part,” Roger says next, sounding a little bitter about it.

Worried, I move down in the bed so that we’re laying next to each other in the dark, face to face so that I can see his eyes. “Tell me what you mean when you say that,” I reply, knowing that there’s something there.

Roger sighs again, closing his eyes as if he can’t bear to look at me when he says it. “Dominic asked me to take the military,” he says, shaking his head. ” To train the armies, to run them, to...to be at the front lines of this war, Cora.”

My blood goes cold as I hear him say it, and dread fills me at the idea of my mate at the front of this war the King’s brother, in charge, a clear target.

And for the first time...

My baby passes me the same emotion back: worry.

Chapter 459 – Dinner with the Prince

Ella

Conner opens my car door and gives an odd little bow as I get out of it.

“What on earth was that?” I ask, grinning at him.

Conner, to his credit, blushes a little as he gives me a shrug. “I don’t know, you’re a Queen now. Aren’t I supposed to bow?”

I wrinkle my nose at him. “I have no idea,” I say, laughing, pleased when he laughs with me and closes the car door behind me. “But since neither of us know, maybe we should cut it out?”

“All right,” he says with a grin, looking up towards the restaurant where Calvin asked me to meet him. I’m a little thrilled, honestly, to be out of the palace for the first time in weeks and also pleased that this was kept quiet enough that there is no press here to capture the moment.

“I’m glad you’re here, Conner,” I say quietly, taking a deep breath to steel myself.

“Anytime, Luna,” he murmurs, and he keeps close by my side as I walk up the stairs.

I’m relieved to see, when I get inside, that the restaurant is dark and only about half full, all of the patrons gathered in deep booths so that I can only see the tops of their heads. I smile to myself, thinking that the Prince chose his venue well.

“This way, Highness,” a young woman says, smiling at me and leading me not into the dining room but towards a small elevator. The three of us are a bit packed in, but the ride is short – just to the second floor. When the door slides open, the young woman smiles and gestures forward into a very small, very pretty private dining room. There’s even a little balcony terrace outside that looks absolutely gorgeous in the moonlight.

Calvin is sitting alone at a table, looking at his phone with a half-full glass of wine in front of him. When I step into the room he looks up and he smiles.

And damn it, but I have to admit...he’s really good looking. Not as good looking as Sinclair – I mean, at least not to me but the way that smile lights his face, and those cheekbones, and those violet eyes?

Damn.

But I don’t have much time to think on it as he stands up and holds out a hand to me, inviting me to the table.

I smile myself, not needing to force it as I cross the room to take his hand. That buzz of electricity passes between us as he leans forward, murmuring a greeting and intending to brush the barest kiss against my cheek – nothing inappropriate, nothing that wouldn't pass between an ambassador and a Queen

But he flinches back at the last moment, and I smirk a little, considering that he probably got a whiff of precisely how much Sinclair has marked me as his tonight.

Calvin hesitates as if tempted, but then he pulls away.

Still, something flutters in me at the nearness of this man.

What the hell is going on?

"I'm so glad you came," Calvin says, gesturing towards my seat. Then, to my surprise, he looks beyond me at Conner, who is standing a few paces behind. "Will you be joining us?"

I turn to look at Conner, my eyebrows raised

"No," Conner says, nodding and smiling a little in recognition of the graciousness of the invitation. "I'm fine over here," he gestures towards a little couch in the corner of the room, where he'll be close enough to protect me but far enough to give us our privacy.

Calvin nods to him and Conner moves away. I smile a little as I sit.

"Honestly," Calvin says, his voice hesitating a little, "I wasn't sure if you were coming."

"I'm sorry I'm late," I say, though... well, I'm not really sorry, am I? My mate needed a little reassurance and I'm happy to give it to him, even if it's at Calvin's expense.

"Are you hungry?" he asks, peering at me, truly trying to assess what he can do to make me comfortable. "I know that nine in the evening is late for a dinner in your culture -"

I smile at him, pleased at his solicitousness – because I honestly get the impression that he cares. He wanted to have this dinner so that we can talk, but if I'm hungry? He wants me to eat.

"Actually, I am a little hungry," I say, leaning forward with a laugh. "And thirsty, if there's more wine."

"Always more wine," he murmurs, raising a hand and signaling to a waiter I didn't see. The waiter comes forward and fills a waiting glass for me.

"I haven't had much to drink lately," I say quietly, raising the glass to my lips and savoring the taste of the rich red. "But one can't hurt, can it?"

"Can't hurt what?" Calvin asks, leaning forward in his curiosity. He frowns at me, genuinely not getting it.

"The baby," I say, looking at him like it's obvious while he takes a long sip of his drink. "Rafe's only a few months old – I'm still breastfeeding, Calvin

And then I stop, and burst into laughter, because Calvin chokes a little on his wine and turns beet red.

"Seriously?" I say, leaning forward, unable to stop my grin. "Is that should I not have said that? Is that embarrassing for you?"

He clears his throat and looks down at the table, embarrassed, though I see him smiling and shaking his head. "No, Highness, it's -"

"Ella," I correct, my voice pleading.

"Ella," he says, looking up at me a little now, growing more comfortable. "It's just honestly, I've never heard a woman say that before."

"Really?" I say, leaning forward and looking at him with wide eyes, setting my glass down on the table next to me. "I mean, did you know –"

"Of course I know," he says, laughing and rolling his eyes at me. "I understand the mechanics of how young babies are fed, it's just..." he leans back, running a hand through his hair, "honestly, Ella, women in my world never, ever talk to men about that sort of thing. And it's not that I agree with that, or think they shouldn't I was just... surprised."

Slowly, I shake my head at him, holding his eyes. "You know I think that's crazy, right?"

He laughs, nodding, and I laugh with him.

"I do know that," Calvin says on a sigh. "And I agree. It is...crazy, that in my world women and men are so separate. It is something which I'd like to see changed, but which is so ingrained in our culture that it's going to take generations to really shift."

I nod, understanding. And then I tilt my head at him, interested to see how easy this conversation already is. Because even if we're talking about a really complicated subject that's difficult for him? The way that we're talking – it's like speaking with an old friend, someone I've known my whole life.

I'm not surprised for a moment, then, when the conversation from there flows easily. Calvin asks questions about my life and I tell him everything, readily, easily – all about Cora, and my sweet baby Rafe, and growing up in the orphanage and the strange way I met my mate. Some details I keep back – he doesn't need to know all about my powers, or the fact that my mother is a deity – but the rest? The rest I share.

It doesn't pass my attention that he moves on readily whenever I begin to speak about Sinclair, but honestly? I don't ask a whole lot about his wife. And I wonder at myself there, trying to figure out what part of me is holding back. Because I am interested in her fascinated, really, dying to know – but for some reason?

Somehow, I just don't ask.

We go for hours, learning a great deal more about each other. Food comes, and we eat it, and I'm sure that it's good but honestly I don't know if I taste it because I'm lost in this conversation, which contains a great deal of laughter and joy.

When a clock in the corner chimes midnight, though, my jaw drops open. "Has it really been that long?" I say, marveling and shaking my head at my companion – my friend now, undeniably.

Calvin grimaces a little. "We have a saying," he says with a shrug, "that mice wait for good friends lose themselves in each other, and that's when they eat all the grain."

"Really?" I say, wrinkling my nose, charmed a bit.

"Yes," he says, leaning back and laughing. "So, when you have a mouse problem in your home, people dismiss it as a sign of a house full of friendship and laughter."

"Oh," I say, smiling now and nodding. "Like how we say it's good luck, if a bird poops on you."

He blinks at me, shocked. "Wha-what!?"

I burst into laughter yet again, leaning back in my chair and letting the joy sweep through me because of course, if you didn't grow up hearing that, it really is just gross, isn't it?

"Just something we say," I say, wiping at my eyes a little, my body still shaking with mirth. "I think to make people feel better when that happens to them."

He laughs too, grinning at me and understanding.

I sigh then, and look back at Conner, who is still sitting on the little couch flicking through his phone. "I guess I should -"

"Stay," Calvin says suddenly, his voice serious now in a way it wasn't a moment ago, and I feel his hand suddenly on top of mine on that table.

Whatever it is between us that thing that happens when we touch – it sweeps through me, making the hair on my neck stand on end.

Calvin stares up at me, his eyes pleading, and I know that he feels it too. "Please, Ella," he says quietly, glancing towards the terrace next to us. "One more drink – just to round out the night."

I bite my lip, knowing that I shouldn't but...

"All right," I say quietly, nodding to him, and not moving my hand away from his.

Chapter 460 – Confessions

Ella

Calvin nods to me, just once, and then stands, moving his hand from mine and going to speak to the waiter, nodding towards the terrace. As he does I turn to Conner, who raises his eyebrows at me. I know he heard, and now he's asking if that's what I really want.

I hesitate, but then I nod and he does as well, putting his phone back into the pocket.

Calvin's at my side then, gesturing towards the terrace, and as I move with him I hear Conner walking up behind me. As we step outside, Conner moves to take a seat at the table we just vacated so that he can keep his eyes on me with this change of venue.

I send him a little smile, and Conner gives me a wink, as Calvin and I step out into the fresh night air.

"Your man," Calvin says, leaning against the balustrade and glancing in at Conner before smiling at me. "He keeps a close eye on you."

"Conner is a friend," I say, smiling at the waiter who comes and brings us two cocktails. "As well as one hell of a fighter. He'll kick your ass if you try anything."

Calvin laughs at this, shaking his head. "Well then he's going to have a boring night," he murmurs with a bit of a sigh. "You're safe with me. Not that your mate the King hasn't already made his own assurances."

"What?" I ask, pausing with the drink on the way to my lips.

Calvin nods over the balustrade down to the street. "Six men," he says, "on the street and in front of the restaurant." Then he takes a moment to turn and peer upwards. "Probably more on the roof."

"Really?" I ask, turning and peering up, though I can't see anything. "A bit of overkill," I murmur, scowling a little. Sinclair so overprotective. Somehow, instinctually, I know that Calvin has no ill intentions towards me honestly, I knew he was my friend before, but tonight really solidifies it for me.

But Sinclair? Well. I suppose he doesn't know it the way I do.

"Nah, it's not overkill," Calvin says, sipping his drink and smiling at me. "With you as his Queen? I get it."

I smile at the compliment, but I also narrow my eyes a little. Because that? That was...a little closer to hitting on me than he's ventured all night.

"And what about you," I say, a little tart, because if he wants to talk about Sinclair then I'm definitely bringing up his wife. "How many guards did you leave at home with the mother of your children?"

"Oh, thousands," he says with a casual sigh that makes me laugh. But when he grins at me I realize that he's serious.

"Thousands!?"

He laughs a little. "She lives in the palace," he says with a shrug, "with my entire extended family. She is...very well protected there."

"What's her name?" I ask, my voice soft.

"Margaret," he replies, looking out over the streets, his voice flat like he's simply reporting facts.

Noting by his body language that he very much does not want to talk about this, I change the subject, looking down at my drink. "And what is this?" I ask.

"It's called Spirenbreau," he says, nodding towards it. "I had it brought from Atalaxia to share with those I hoped would be my new friends. It's a traditional summer drink. Try it," he says, giving a little shrug. "I think you'll like it."

And so I take a little sip, pleasantly surprised at the rich taste and the crisp little bite of the chilled liquor. It tastes like melons.

"I do like it," I say, smiling at him and placing the drink down on the stone balustrade against which he leans. Then I lean on it too, staring at him as a quiet minute passes between us.

"Calvin," I say quietly, leaning closer towards him, gazing at him seriously.

The smile drops from his face a little, his expression matching mine. "Why won't you tell me about your wife?"

He drops his eyes then, looking down at the drink in his hand and I think taking a breath. "I'll tell you all you want to know about her, Ella," he murmurs.

"But why do I have to ask?"

He lifts his eyes to mine then and something...something passes between us, even without us touching. Almost unconsciously, he takes a step closer to me.

“I don’t want to speak about her with you,” he murmurs as I stare up into his face, into those violet eyes.

I nod a little, grateful for his honesty but... “Why?” I ask, my voice breathy, a little stunned. Because this man stunning, his entire presence consuming. And something about him – it draws me.

“Because,” he replies, a little growl in his voice now. “It is not right, Ella. Not with...not with you.”

“Why?” I ask again, pushing, shaking my head and not understanding. Because...

“Do you seriously not know?” he murmurs, staring down into my face, I swear a little angry now. “Because if you’re just toying with me, Ella, making me say it when we both know –

“What are you talking about?” I say, flinching back a little.

He blinks at me, surprised, and then he leans forward, closing the distance I created in moving back. We’re not touching, no part of us

But the air between us, I swear it glows.

My eyes widen as energy crackles in the air, like static electricity, or tiny bits of lightening. “What...what is this?” I ask, my voice starting to tremble a little in fear.

“I don’t know,” he murmurs, shaking his head, though his eyes don’t leave my face. “It has never nothing like this has ever happened to me before and I’ve never heard of it – ”

“Heard of what?” I ask, begging now, a little scared.

“Ella,” he says, his voice earnest, and he reaches out a hand to wrap around my arm and I gasp, because even though he doesn’t even touch my skin, this thing between us it intensifies.

I feels – god, it feels like a spark in my soul, like a thousand tiny flares of light

But I don’t have any time to explore it, because Calvin presses forward, his eyes on mine. “She’s not my mate, Ella,” he says all in a rush.

“What?” I ask, confused overwhelmed

“My wife,” he says, shaking his head at me. “Our marriage – it was arranged, expected. We didn’t even have a mating ceremony because we’re not even chosen mates – she was selected for me, so we could have strong children -”

I shake my head, a little horrified at the idea. And then something within me makes me reconsider my judgment, because honestly didn’t I do something similar the day when I selected my human sperm donor? I, too, picked someone because I thought they would give me a happy, healthy baby

But I mean, I didn’t marry them-

I shake my head, seeking to clear it as Calvin takes another step towards me so that there’s just a breath of space between us now. I tilt my head to look up at him, frightened and fascinated.

“She’s – she’s not your mate?” I ask, my voice choked.

“No, Ella,” he says, raising a hand to cup my cheek. He hesitates before he places it there, but then he gives in almost as if he can’t help himself. And I gasp a little at the surge of something of power, perhaps? – that passes through me.

“Then -” I whisper, my whole body starting to tremble with the force of it of whatever this is.

“Ella,” Calvin says softly, almost an apology, because he knows that this could wreck both of our lives, “I think you are my mate.”

Chapter 461 – Back to my Mate

Ella

Immediately, I tear myself away from him. “What!?” I gasp, appalled at the idea.

His face falls in horror, in disappointment. “Ella, I – ”

But I don’t say another word to him. Instead, I spin and hurry back into the dining room as fast as I can. Conner, seeing me coming, is immediately on his feet, a growl in his throat.

“What’s wrong,” he snaps as I press myself to his side, his arm going instinctually around me, protecting me. “What did he do?”

“Nothing,” I breathe, glancing back at Calvin who looks at me with a hand over his mouth, as if he could cup the words he just said into his palm and shove them back down his throat. “Can we just...can we go home?”

“Did he touch you!?” Conner snaps, looking at me, appalled.

“No, Conner!” I say, my voice breaking as I look up at him a little desperately. “It’s fine – it’s all fine! Can we just go!?”

His eyes sweep over me as his growl intensifies, but when he sees that I really am all right he’s immediately in action, moving me quickly to a fire exit next to the elevator and hastily pushing open the door, ushering me quickly down the set of stairs as he lifts his phone to his ear, calling the car and telling it to be ready right now.

The hostess gasps a little as we burst out of the staircase, but Conner ignores her as he ushers me out of the restaurant and over to our car, which immediately pulls up to the curve.

My whole body is still shaking with the intensity of the last few minutes. It might even be trembling harder now, because while I started to tremble because of whatever thing is between Calvin and I, I’m starting to shake harder now as I try to work through the implications of this.

“Luna,” Conner says, his voice worried as he helps me duck into the car and then climbs in after me, shutting the door. “Are you all right!?”

“Um,” I say, looking up at him, wrapping my arms around myself.

His eyes go wide when I don’t immediately say “yes.”

Frantic, he barks at the driver to go and then slips off his jacket and wraps it tightly around my shoulders, using his hands to chafe at my arms, trying to warm me up. And while honestly it does nothing – I mean, I'm not actually cold.

– I appreciate his efforts, his desire to help.

I lean into my friend a little just a little, murmuring a thank-you as I pull the jacket tight around me and tumble into my thoughts. Because...

Mate.

Mate!

Honestly, it's not possible – Sinclair is my mate

But...

I shake my head, trying to figure it out. Because Sinclair – I know he's my mate, my fated mate, and that what we have is so much deeper than just a chosen mate. I mean, our connection, our finding each other, our family – it was fated, envisioned for us even as I was a child. He's not at all just some guy I met and liked by chance-

We are – I know it in my bones, we are fated mates, in our own way.

But...

I bite my lip because...Lydia.

Sinclair already had a fated mate before me. And it hadn't been a good fit but they had been sure: the bond was there, she was his fated mate, and wolves – we're only supposed to get one.

So...if Sinclair can have two...

Wouldn't it make sense that I could too?

I moan a little at the agony of the idea, leaning my head against Conner, who wraps a tight arm around me.

"If you don't drive faster," he growls at the driver, "I'm going to rip your damn head off and carry the Luna back myself. So DRIVE!"

The driver glances back at my bodyguard with wide eyes, but he does indeed step on it. And I close my eyes and pray that he does get me home fast.

Because I need to be home, with my mate and my baby.

Right. Now.

Conner stays pinned at my side as he gets me home, helping me out of the car in the garages below the palace and escorting me through the halls. But as we approach my door I lift a hand, placing it flat on his chest.

“You should go,” I murmur, stopping and starting to shrug off his jacket.

“What?” he asks me, baffled, looking at the very short space between us and the door to my suite as if a thousand assassins could leap out in that tiny distance.

“Conner,” I say, looking up at him seriously. “I am so grateful for how good you’ve been to me tonight -”

“Of course, Luna,” he says, frowning down at me. “You’re well, you’re our Luna, and our Queen – I’d do anything for you -”

“And I’m very grateful for that,” I say, handing his jacket back to him. “But Sinclair is going to be...volatile this evening,” I say, my lips pressing into a thin line. “And considering that your scent is on me now...”

He frowns at me, confused, but then realizes that I’m probably right, because he was so nice and comforting to me in the car, putting his arm around me.

Conner puts his face in his hands, letting out a deep sigh before looking up at me. “What did that asshole do to you, Luna? I’ll kill him for it -”

“Nothing,” I insist, shaking my head.

“Seriously, Conner, he didn’t do anything bad – just...just let me handle Sinclair, all right? And maybe...make yourself scarce for twenty-four hours or so.”

Conner laughs a little, but he also goes a little pale. “All right,” he murmurs, nodding. Then he looks again at the door to my room. “Are you sure you – ”

“I can walk ten feet by myself, Conner,” I say, rolling my eyes a little, and I hear him laugh as I wave over my shoulder. I pause with my hand on the doorknob, watching Conner disappear down the hall, and then with a deep sigh I press the door open and step inside.

The room is dark, which makes sense, because it’s very late now, and the baby is asleep –

“Ella?” Sinclair asks, and I don’t even jump as my eyes move to where he’s sitting in a chair by the window, fully dressed, clearly waiting for me. He stands, already intuiting that something’s wrong.

And I sigh, pressing the door shut behind me and leaning back against it.

“What’s wrong,” he growls, taking a step towards me and I hang my head and shake it, tears pricking at my eyes.

Because as much as I held it together on the rest of the car ride home, not wanting Conner to see me fall apart as we walked back to the room, now that I’m here?

I start to completely unravel. Sinclair gasps a little when he realizes how upset I am and he’s before me in a moment, reaching for me.

And I throw myself into his arms, wrapping my own around his waist, pressing my head against his chest and sobbing as I take a deep breath of his comforting scent, as I feel his arms wrap around me, as he lowers his face to my hair and presses a kiss there.

He lets me cry for a moment, I think shocked

But then that moment passes and I feel him start to go tense with fury.

“What did he do,” Sinclair growls, already livid.

But I tighten my arms around him and shake my head.

Because Calvin – honestly, he didn’t do anything.

It’s my stupid mother this time again.

Because the Goddess is the one who deals out mates – and did she seriously do this? Did she give me a second mate, when I’m finally, finally happily settled with my first?

What the hell is she playing at?

Chapter 462 – Rampage

Ella

“Ella,” my mate growls as my tears start to subside a little bit. And I look up at him with a sniff, into his face that is terribly dark with his anger. His whole body is shaking – not trembling like mine was, but honestly shaking as if he’s trying very, very hard to hold himself back.

“You need to tell me, right now,” Sinclair continues, his voice thick with the effort of not bursting from the room and hunting down the Prince, ” what the hell just happened. I need to know whether or not I need to go murder someone.”

A dark little laugh bursts from me at this – at the casual way my gorgeous mate threatens murder – and his growl intensifies because he is perfectly serious. Hastily I shake my head no as I look up at him.

“No, Dominic,” I say, doing my best to pull myself together and stand up straight. “It’s not like that – it’s...” and I sigh, my eyes going wide. “I mean, it’s a lot – but he didn’t do anything really bad.”

To my surprise, Dominic snarls, his head whipping towards the door.

“Dominic, I just said that – ”

“You said not really bad,” he snaps, implying that he did something bad.”

I reach a hand up now and place it on his cheek, something about Sinclair losing his temper allowing me to fortify myself, to pull myself together for both of us. “I’m going to need you to contain all of this,” I say quietly, making him look at me. “Because you are not going to like what I have to say. But you have to hear it.”

“Please, Ella,” he murmurs, dropping his arms from their tight place around me and taking my face in his hands. ” You’re killing me. Please, please tell me what is going on.”

“Not until you promise not to murder anyone,” I say, dead serious.

And he sighs, but then he nods, agreeing to my terms.

And then I take my mate’s hand and I lead him over to the bed. I take a moment just the briefest one peer into my baby’s crib, my heart filling with joy at the sight of my sweet, darling baby boy. I send him a very tiny pulse of happiness and joy down the bond, hoping it gives him sweet dreams, and then I turn to my bed, and I pull back the covers, and I kick off my shoes and climb in fully dressed. to “What the hell?” Sinclair asks. “Ella, you’re -”

“Just get into bed,” I sigh, reaching for him. “Come on bed is...it’s where we are just us, where we have all our best talks.”

Sinclair sighs but, seeing that I’m serious, he does as I say, crawling over me to get to his side of the bed and then slipping himself under the covers. I immediately curl up next to him, tucking my head beneath his chin as he wraps his arms around me.

“All right, trouble,” he murmurs, again kissing the top of my head, and I smile at the nickname, because it lets me know that he’s in a better emotional place to hear news that I know is going to wreck him. “Tell me everything.”

And I do as my mate says.

I start at the beginning and I don’t hold anything back.

I tell him all about how much Calvin and I were instantly drawn to each other from the moment I saw him, about the pulses of energy between us whenever we touched. I tell him about the genuine friendship I feel for the man and our instant connection – how it feels, immediately, like talking to an old friend. And then I tell him about what happened tonight – the glow between us, the spark within me that I’m pretty sure he felt within himself, the very literal energy that passes between our bodies when we’re close.

Sinclair goes tenser and tenser as I speak, but he doesn’t interrupt. I wind my arms closer around him not only because I’m grateful for him, but also because I think he needs it, needs to feel my body close so that he doesn’t race out of the room and hunt this man down.

But he breaks when I finally tell him Calvin’s last words.

“And he said...Dominic, he says he thinks that I’m his mate.”

The snarl that rips from Sinclair when I say the words even I draw back in fear as he pulls himself from my arms and throws himself out of bed, his chest heaving, his eyes on the door. His whole body is trembling again, harder now, and he very obviously holds himself back from shifting into his wolf and tearing through the palace – looking for this man

Rafe starts to cry in his crib at the sound and I think the insane emotions that are pulsing from Sinclair at this moment, but I can’t even look over at my baby, my eyes only on my mate.

“Dominic!” I cry, reaching for him, “ don’t -”

“What the hell am I supposed to do, Ella,” he growls, and I see his body start to shift as he loses control, his shoulders hunching, his nails elongating to razor-sharp claws. “Just let this man live after he’s tried to take you from me!?”

“He didn’t -”

“He did!” Sinclair barks, and then he loses it, letting out a roar as he transforms fully into his wolf and sprints for the door. He bashes the handle with his paw, breaking it and ripping the door nearly off its hinges as he wrenches it open

And then I’m alone, my jaw hanging open, sitting in bed in my black gown as my baby screams in the crib next to me.

It takes me...a long moment to pull myself together as I stare at the open door to the bright hallway, as I consider.

Well, that my mate is probably out there hunting a Prince, adding more fuel to the fire of war.

But then I turn my head towards my child, who still screams with fear and shock and sadness, and I know that there’s absolutely nothing I can do.

And so I slowly stand up, and move to my child, and gather him into my arms and shush him lightly as I move to the door, pushing it shut as best I can with my foot as I concentrate on my baby.

My heart feels like it’s been torn to shreds, honestly. I’m livid, I realize, because I need Sinclair with me tonight I need to talk this through with him, and as much as I realize that he’s upset I can’t believe that he just did that just burst from the room in a murderous rampage.

But as I look down at my child, and I stare at his poor crying face, I force myself to slow my breathing and start to feel...centered.

Because as much as Calvin may think he’s found his mate, and Sinclair might be rightly flipping out because he thinks someone tried to take me from him...

Me?

I’m steady.

I made my choice long ago, and as I look down at my little Rafe – who looks so much like his father that it breaks my heart – I have no doubts at all.

I pass calm and feelings of safety down my bond to my baby and he settles a little in my arms, though he still fusses, unnerved by the noise and the surge of emotions that woke him. So, I continue to bounce him a little, shushing and murmuring comforting nonsense. As I keep my attention to my baby, I move towards the window and turn to my wolf inside me.

Well? I say to her, a little pissed off. You've been awfully quiet throughout all of this.

She whines a little, guilty, torn, and turns in a confused circle.

Is he our mate? I ask, a little tremulous, considering that she's perhaps been quiet because I've been pushing her away, not wanting to know.

She sits back on her haunches, lifting her nose to the sky and letting out a confused howl. I don't know, she says, hanging her head and then laying down with her snout between her paws. He is ...he is something to us. But Dominic is our mate. This other one...he is important, but I don't know what he is.

I sigh in frustration, passing it to my wolf who again whines, feeling guilty that she can't help me parse it, that she doesn't know.

And then I turn my face up to the sky, my eyes immediately finding the moon hanging exactly where I knew it would be.

"Well, mom?" I ask, shaking my head at her. "Are you happy now?"

But of course she doesn't reply, even though I continue to stare at her for a very, very long time.

I don't know how much time has passed before Rafe falls back asleep and I turn away from the window, heading back to my bed. I take Rafe with me, because I'm exhausted and far from sleep and I want his company. I curl up in my bed with my little baby, staring down at his beautiful sleeping face.

Don't do anything you'll regret, I say to Sinclair down our bond, hoping he's close enough to hear it.

And honestly hoping that my advice is not too late.

Chapter 463 – Fated Mates

Ella

Dawn lights the horizon when the door creaks open and Sinclair comes back into the room. My eyes go immediately to him from my place sitting up in bed where I've spent way, way too many hours alone gazing down at my little baby.

Sinclair pushes the broken door shut and sighs before he raises his eyes to mine. "I'm sorry," he says, his voice thick with guilt.

"You'd damn well better be," I murmur to him, because honestly? I'm pissed.

He moves closer to me now and I can see that he's absolutely exhausted, but my eyes rove over him, looking for blood. Because if he killed Calvin, surely there would be –

"I didn't kill anyone," he murmurs with a sigh as he sinks onto the bed next to me, burying his head in his hands. "Though I wanted to, and I would have."

"He didn't do anything, Dominic," I say, my voice determined.

"He did, Ella," Sinclair snaps, glaring at me. "I get that we're in uncharted territory here with the possibility of both of us having two fated mates, but honestly? It's not like there isn't some precedent. If a couple are chosen mates and one of them meets their fated mate? There's a protocol to be followed."

I pause for a moment, a little shocked. "Really?" I ask, curious. "What is it?"

"Well it's damn well not keep it a secret from everyone and take her out on a romantic date where you touch her face -"

And I can't help myself from laughing a little at this, a dark, angry little laugh.

He turns to glare at me but I just shake my head. "Dominic, if the man thinks that he's my fated mate and all he does is touch my face – is that honestly a crime worth his death?"

"Yes," he growls, completely sincere, "when it's my mate it sure as hell is."

"Did you find him?" I ask, because I have a lot I want to say to this man, but I need the details first.

"I did not," he murmurs.

"Did you try?" I ask, pushing him.

“For...about fifteen minutes I did, yes,” he confesses. “And then I came to my senses and realized that I cannot kill an Atalaxian prince without dire consequences.”

“So, you realized that you were overreacting -”

“I was not overreacting

“Fifteen minutes in,” I continue, ignoring him, letting my sharp tone let him know precisely how I feel about this. “And then you just...stayed out all night? And left me here, all alone, even though you knew I was upset and needed you?”

He pauses now and I see his shoulders slump with guilt. “That’s why I apologized.”

“Not because you hunted a Prince.”

He snaps his gaze to me now. “I don’t regret that, Ella,” he says, his voice low with anger again. “He is very lucky I didn’t find him, and if he’s a smart man he’ll never step foot in my presence again.”

My eyes go wide as I realize that he’s dead serious.

“So what did you do all this time?” I ask, my voice soft.

“I went to Conner and...kind of ripped his door down.”

“What!?”

“I could smell him on you,” he growls, and I groan because I knew that was going to happen.

“Was he there?”

Sinclair nods. “I...owe him an apology too. I frightened him, but I just... confirmed the details you told me.”

“Did you think I was lying!?”

He turns to give me a glare. “I just worried that you missed something, Ella – I wanted another perspective. All right?”

I clench my teeth a little, unhappy, but I nod. “Then what did you do with the hours you were gone?”

"I just...ran," he says, shaking his head. "I needed to sort my mind, burn out my energy and my anger. But," my mate continues, turning to look at me, "I do regret leaving you here all alone. I honestly don't know how I could have stayed, Ella – I'm not...I wasn't strong enough of a man to find a way to stay at your side when I wanted to tear the world to shreds."

He drops his gaze again, guilt in every line of him. And my heart wrenches to see it because – I mean, because I know we're going to get through this, and I understand that he was completely overwhelmed by the idea that I might have another mate, that he could potentially lose me

But still. I was so baffled, and so confused, and I needed him to hold me and talk to me last night – and he wasn't here.

"You have to find a way to be that stronger man, Dominic," I say quietly, shaking my head at him. "For me, for your children," I shrug, looking down at sleeping Rafe. "Because this isn't going to be the only challenge we face, and your only solution can't be to shift into your wolf and go out to murder the world when fate crosses you."

He sighs again, and he nods, because he knows that I'm right.

I let him have a moment to sit in it, clenching my teeth against my own instinct to comfort him. When I can't bear it any longer, I speak.

"So, are you done?" I ask, my voice quiet.

He turns to me, confused. "Done what?"

"Done flipping out? Can we finally have the conversation that we should have had hours ago? Because I have just been sitting here, wondering, and worried..."

And damn it, even though I tried to be tough, the tears come back to my eyes now and my lower lip starts to tremble.

I hear Sinclair's tongue click as he shifts towards me then, reaching out across the bed and cupping my cheek in his palm. Instantly, wanting his touch, I press my face into his hand. "Yes," he says quietly, moving now to climb fully into the bed with me. "I am sorry, Ella you're right. You needed me and I left. I am...very ashamed."

I nod down at the bed, telling him silently to lay down. He does as I say as I sniff back my tears and we both lay down on our soft mattress, the baby between us.

"It was very difficult for me," he murmurs, trying to explain. "To hear that another man... could have some kind of claim on you."

“And how do you think I felt?” I say quietly, staring into his eyes, “the first time I heard about Lydia? And then when she came back into your life?”

He frowns a little. “Lydia – that’s different – she’s – ”

“Your fated mate, Dominic,” I say, shaking my head at him. “So if you don’t think that I understand the jealousy you felt when you heard that Calvin – ”

He growls a little even when he hears the name, which makes me smirk just a little bit. But I press forward.

“That he even just claimed that he thought I could be his mate?”

Sinclair takes a moment to think this through. “All right,” he murmurs. ”

Then you may have some inkling. But Ella – is he?”

I open my eyes wide and shrug. ” Dominic, I have no idea!”

Sinclair sighs, closing his eyes for a moment and getting his thoughts and emotions in order. I wait quietly, studying his beautiful face, and when he opens his eyes his expression is newly determined.

“All right, trouble,” he says, his voice now a deep purr. “Let’s get some things straight.”

He reaches for me then and I scooch closer so that Rafe is pressed warmly between us. Sinclair slides an arm easily around me, his palm pressed warmly around my lower back, and I reach out my own hand, my fingers tracing up and down along his ribs. I nod then, letting him know that I’m ready.

“Even if he is your mate,” Sinclair says, closing his eyes as if he can’t stand to look at me as he says those words. “Would you leave me for him?”

“No,” I say instantly, frowning, a little appalled. And then, angry, I give Sinclair a little smack on the ribs that makes his eyes fly open. “Why would you even ask that!?”

“I just wanted to have it said,” he growls, giving me a half-hearted glare. “So that we’re on the same page, all right? It’s not unheard of, for someone to leave their mate when they meet someone they’re fated to -”

“I’m your fated mate, Dominic,” I growl, raising my hand to stroke my fingers over the stubble on his cheeks, my heart breaking to think that he’d even considered me leaving him as a possibility. “I love you, and I’m in love with you, and I’m not going anywhere.

Okay?"

"Okay," he murmurs, pressing his eyes shut for a moment and taking a deep breath.
"Then the next order of business is...to figure out if he's actually your fated mate."

"Well," I say softly, frowning at him. " How...would I know?"

Sinclair frowns at me, confused. "Ella ...I mean...you would just know."

Chapter 464 – Dedication

Ella

I frown at him, starting to get angry again. “What does that even mean, Dominic!? You just know – well obviously if I just knew, then I’d have told you definitively yes or no!”

“Well, maybe you do know and you’re trying to spare my feelings!”

My eyes go wide then and I lean forward, staring at him, a little appalled. “I am trying to figure out a very important question about my life and my identity, Dominic,” I growl. “So no, I am not trying to spare your feelings I am asking you to help me. So please, tell me how it is that a person would just know.”

Sinclair sighs in frustration, his eyes narrowed at me before he shuts them and does his best to think.

“Sometimes I forget,” he murmurs, “that you’ve only had your wolf for a few months. Please, Ella, forgive me. I – there must be some things that are instinctual to me, and to Roger, that to you and Cora are...harder.”

“Yes,” I say, nodding, agreeing. “So .” I hesitate now, because I’m about to ask him for details that I’m honestly not sure that I want. But I steel myself, knowing that I need them. “How did you know...that Lydia was your fated mate?”

He sighs a little and opens his eyes to look steadily at me, a question in his expression. I nod seriously, letting him know that I understand what I’m asking. So, he sighs again and begins.

“It was...instant,” he explains, his eyes going a little distant with the memory. “The intensity of it was like my attraction to you – because I was always attracted to you, Ella, even when you were just the human nanny that lived down the road. But with Lydia? When I saw her after I reached my majority, the bond was instant.”

I think back to when I saw Calvin for the first time and – well...I did notice him, didn’t I? And when he looked at me, I couldn’t look away? Was that...

“Can you tell me more?” I push, needing more details. “Like...what did it feel like?”

He nods, continuing though I can tell it is hard for him. “I was just fucking sixteen. She was...god, she was Roger’s lover, his girlfriend, and they were very serious. But the first time I met her again after I’d reached my maturity, I felt her come into the room. And though she was across it, and in a group of people, my eyes went instantly to her, and I was immediately aware of what she was to me. The bond – my wolf instantly knew, I instantly knew, and there was no doubting it.”

“And then for two years?” I prompt. “You just...knew?”

“It was more than just knowing,” he says shaking his head at me. “It was my wolf pining for her, and having very strong, carnal, bodily reactions to her presence whenever she was around. And she felt the same way – but Roger, we all thought, was dad’s heir. And that,” he says with a shrug, “was more important to her than the bond. At the time.”

“So, she was able to...deny the bond?”

“Not really,” he murmurs. “Her wolf, I’m sure, was as crazy for me as mine was for her. But Lydia was a very determined, calculating woman. She had a great deal of willpower, when properly incentivized.”

We both lose ourselves in our thoughts for a moment, and I have to admit that jealousy coils in me even though I know that Lydia is dead, and that our own fated bond is stronger than theirs ever was. Still...it’s not easy to think about Sinclair loving anyone else but me.

It really does make me want to defend my claim on him in a very real, bodily way.

So, on some level, I suppose I do understand his reaction last night – his very real need to end the threat to our relationship.

But as I think about it further... honestly, I’m not sure that there is a threat at all.

“What?” Sinclair asks, and I look up to see him studying me.

“I don’t know,” I say, my frown deepening.

He makes a sound low in his throat, urging me to speak, and I take a second to collect my thoughts before I cock my head to the side.

“And there was nothing like...physical in the air between you? No...literal sparks, or anything?”

“No,” he says with a frown, shaking his head. “But you’re...goddess-born, Ella, who knows what the hell goes on with you.”

I sigh, shrugging, recognizing that as a possibility. But I press forward. “And you instantly...wanted her? Like, sexually?”

Slowly, he nods, but I’m grateful he doesn’t go into detail. “It was all I thought about for two whole years, Ella. It was consuming. And I’m sure she felt it too and every mated pair that I've ever talked to about it has felt the same. The sexual connection is... intense."

I'm quiet for a long moment before I speak again.

"Honestly, Dominic," I say quietly, "I don't feel at all like that about Calvin."

"What?" he asks, confused.

"I mean, I like him a great deal," I say, giving a little shrug, "and he's very handsome-"

Sinclair growls at this and I swat at him, scowling a little. "Would you stop?" I scold, "again, like with what I said about Roger being hot, it's just an observation – it is a fact that Calvin is a very good looking man – "

The growl deepens and I can't help it – I laugh. "Stop!" I say, swatting at him again.

"You stop!" he orders, frowning at me. ""This man put his hand on you – he told you he thinks he's your mate, and you expect me to sit calmly while you say you think he's handsome!?"

"Okay, I take it back," I say, sighing and rolling my eyes. "He's very ugly – complete trash, face-wise. A toad – "

Sinclair groans, burying his face in the pillow, because he knows I'm lying. But I smack him again, because I want him to listen to me.

"Seriously, though," I say, sitting up a little and shaking my mate's arm until he looks at me. "Honestly, Dominic, I think there's some connection with Calvin but what you said about like, knowing instantly? Or like...pining for him, and your wolf going crazy, or anything carnal?"

Sinclair stares at me and I shake my head slowly.

"Dominic, I don't have any of that."

My mate sits up now, staring at me eagerly. "Are you serious?" he asks.

"I promise," I say, my face sincere. "I even asked my wolf when you were gone, and she said she didn't know

"She would know, Ella – "

“Well then,” I say, giving a little shrug. “Dominic...I don’t think it’s right. I don’t think he’s my fated mate.”

My big, scary, sweetheart mate gives a heavy groan then, falling back on the mattress and covering his face with his hands in relief. A huge smile finds my face as I study him, as relief sweeps through me. Because honestly – until Calvin said the word mate? I hadn’t been thinking it at all.

It was only him that put the idea in my head, that made me freak out. Because I figured he would know.

Sinclair pulls his hands down his face a little, studying me. “You’re not just saying that to make me feel better?”

I roll my eyes at him. “I swear on everything that matters, Dominic,” I say all in a rush, eager for him to believe me. “I’m serious – if that’s how people feel when they meet their fated mates? I do not feel that way about him, and neither does my wolf.”

My mate moves faster than I can see and I give a happy little shriek as he pulls me over the baby, tugging me tight to his chest and wrapping me up there like he’ll never let me go. I laugh a little when I realize what happened, snuggling my face against his chest and breathing in his warm, delicious scent.

“God, Ella,” he murmurs on a sigh. “I was so fucking scared -”

“I know,” I murmur back, pressing my hands against him. “I’m really glad you didn’t kill him now.”

“I’m not,” he growls, and I laugh a little. “He still made a move on you, Ella. And even if you’re not into him, he’s definitely into you.”

“Okay,” I say, admitting it a bit now and biting my lip. “I guess...he is. But Dominic, he’s not completely to blame here, all right? There is something between us and even if it’s not a mating bond...it’s something.”

Sinclair peers down at me and I look up at him for a long moment and then he nods. “I can deal with that,” he murmurs quietly, accepting it. “As long as you and me?”

“We’re good, Dominic,” I murmur, resting my head against his chest. “I’m very in love with you and nobody else. You’re my mate.”

“And you’re mine,” he says back, finality in his voice as he holds me like he’ll never let me go. “I love you so much, Ella. If I lost you...”

And I nod, understanding the sentiment even if he doesn't finish the thought out loud. I take a deep, relieved breath and peering over my mate's body to look at my little sleeping baby. Pleased, contented, I reaching out a hand to trace a soft finger down Rafe's belly.

Because nothing, nothing exists that can tear our little family apart.

And quite suddenly, after all of this?

After the stress of a sleepless night, and these insane questions, and this reaffirmation of our dedication to one another?

As I feel my mate breathing softly beneath me, and stare at my sleeping baby...I realize that I'm ready.

Even with war on the horizon, and this new looming question of what the hell is between me and this Prince of Atalaxia...

I know, without a doubt, that I'm ready for baby number two.

And I smile and turn my face to my mate, because there's no time like the present to get started trying.

Chapter 465 – Home and War

Cora

Roger and I are quiet the next morning as we go through our breakfast routine in the kitchen. It's not an awkward sort of quiet, just...us thinking our own thoughts while staying very close to one another.

We stayed up late last night, first attending to the baby. Roger was heartbroken, too, that our barely- formed child was already worried about something – and that it's all our fault. So we spent a good long time passing him comfort and happy thoughts down our bond, letting him feel reassured. When he finally drifted off to what we call sleep even though, honestly, it's probably not an accurate term Roger and I took a deep breath and finally got back to the real conversation: what the hell we're going to do.

But, of course, we didn't come up with any solutions. Because our past experiences in the last, barely-finished war have already made it clear to us that trying to make plans? It never works.

So we eventually fell asleep holding each other close, whispering promises to put each other and our family first, even as the nation and its people ask us for more.

"That's weird," Roger murmurs, flicking through his phone as he leans against the counter, a cup of coffee in hand.

"What," I ask, turning to him and blowing on my tea to cool it, "the fact that you're actually reading your messages? That you know where your phone is? That it's charged?"

He flicks his eyes up to me and smirks, but shakes his head. "No," he murmurs. "Sinclair sent me a message telling me not to come in until this afternoon. Says he needs to sleep."

My eyebrows go up in surprise. "Wow, slacking on the job, so early in his reign."

Roger laughs a little and tucks the phone away in his pajama pocket. "Nah, something's up," he says. "He wouldn't take a sick day unless he needs it. Do you think it has something to do with Ella? That crazy dinner she went to last night?"

My eyes widen as I consider it. "Maybe," I say, reaching for my own phone, hoping maybe she texted to fill me in. But I scowl when the screen comes up empty. And then I turn my head to the side a little, curious...

Because it's not like Ella to not send me ten texts in the morning – general greetings, pictures of Rafe, selfies of her with bed-hair with her gigantic mate walking around in the background of the picture.

“Hmm,” I say, looking up at Roger. “Sis is being very quiet too.”

“Well,” he says, smirking and putting his coffee down, stepping closer and wrapping a hand around my waist to pull me close. “Either way, it means I have the morning off. What ever shall we do?”

“Oh, I’ve got some chores in mind,” I say, grinning and putting my tea down before standing on my toes so I can wrap my arms around his neck. “Some tile in the shower needs to be regrouted

“That bathroom is brand new, Cora-

“Or the garbage disposal keeps making this really weird noise -”

“You’re imagining that,” he murmurs, pulling me sharply closer. “Or it’s haunted, which is also something I can’t do anything about.”

I laugh, nudging his nose a little with mine. “Well then, there is a problem with the bed -”

“Oh really?” he says, bending a little and wrapping his hands around the back of my thighs before standing up straight and taking me with him. I grin and wrap my legs around his waist, leaning back a little so I don’t crush the baby between us.

“Mmhmm,” I say, a low and throaty affirmation. “It’s actually a problem with the sheets, underneath the blankets –”

“Well,” he says, starting out of the kitchen and heading for the stairs. “This sounds serious – we’ll have to investigate this right away -”

And I laugh as my gorgeous mate carries me upstairs, and into the bedroom, and slams the door shut behind us.

Roger and I thoroughly enjoy our morning off, so much so that we’re still laying in bed chatting hours later, all wrapped up in each other. I slip my fingers through his hair, only half listening as he tells me more about his and Sinclair’s plans to create an Alpha Academy to train young wolves to be officers in the war, staring at the shape of his moving lips and marveling at how good looking he really is

When suddenly, we hear the front door downstairs creek open and then slam shut below us.

Roger is instantly alert, his arm wrapping around me as he pulls me beneath him a bit, his lips peeling back over his teeth as he growls at the door, tense and waiting for more hints about exactly what

“Cora!”

Roger’s body slackens as soon as Ella’s voice rings up the stairs, accompanied by her pounding feet.

I sigh, putting my hands on Roger’s chest and giving him a little shove. “Come on,” I say, “we’re going to want to get dressed before she -”

“Speak for yourself,” he murmurs, leaning back against the pillows. “She’s the one bursting into our house it’s her own fault if she sees something she doesn’t want to see –”

But I just stand up and throw his pajama pants at him before moving to the closet and pulling on a robe. I’m barely covered when Ella bursts into the room, Rafe perched on her hip.

“Cora!” she says, scowling at me, annoyed, one hand still on the door handle. “What’s wrong with you – why didn’t you answer any of my texts!?”

I shrug at her, frowning a bit. “I don’t know the phone was downstairs!”

“I needed you, Cora!” she says, hoisting the baby a little higher and frowning at me as Sinclair appears in the doorway behind her, looking sleepier than Ella does, but equally serious. Still, I ignore him for now, a little annoyed at my sister.

“I’m not at your beck and call, highness,” I say, rolling my eyes and looking around for more clothes. Because even though Roger is just languishing naked in the bed, barely covered with the sheets, I am not wolf enough yet to have that little immodesty. “Would you mind giving me a minute of privacy to get dressed?”

“This is important, Cora!” Ella protests, frowning at me and crossing her arms.

“Five minutes, Ella!” I snap, glaring at her as I turn into the walk-in closet.

“Fine,” she mutters, turning away back towards the stairs, clearly intending to meet me in the kitchen or the living room.

“Hey, Ells!” Roger calls after her retreating form. “Hey, Dominic! So nice to see you and have you acknowledge my presence in my own home!”

“Sorry, Roger!” Ella calls from the stairs. “We love you too! We just need Cora’s magic for a minute!”

Roger frowns at me as I come out of the closet with a set of clothes in my hands and start to get dressed for the day. “Your magic?” he asks. “What, do they need a sudden storm or something?”

“Who knows,” I murmur, shaking my head, and then I glare at him. “Would you please get dressed? This family is weird enough, we don’t need to have chats about magic while one of us is naked.”

“I prefer the term ‘tastefully nude,’” he says, smirking at me as he gets up and comes to my side, giving me a sweet, thorough kiss before smacking my ass and heading towards the closet to find some clothes.

Chapter 466 – Asking Mom

“All right, Ella!” I call as I troop down the stairs, dressed for the day, Roger following behind.

“In here!” she calls, peeking out from the living room and giving me a big smile. “Also, sorry,” she adds, grimacing a bit. “We were very rude, bursting in here like that, weren’t we?”

“I’ll forgive you as soon as you give me my little nephew to hold for a few minutes,” I say, smiling and reaching for Rafe, who my sister happily hands over to me. I’m instantly gratified when he gives a squeak of happiness and reaches out his own hands, clearly recognizing me and wanting to see me as much as I want to see him.

“Yes,” Ella sighs, crossing her arms as she observes me with the baby.”

Rafe makes everything better.”

“That can be his slogan,” I say, grinning at the baby, “when he’s King.”

Ella laughs and I turn to smile at her as Roger comes into the room after me. I shift my gaze to Sinclair, who stands behind Ella, quiet with his arms crossed over his chest.

“What’s wrong?” I ask, looking between the two of them. “First you tell Roger not to come to the palace this morning, and then you’re bursting in here this afternoon? What’s up?”

“We had kind of a crazy night,” Ella says with a grimace, moving to the couch and sitting down on it. Sinclair moves to stand by her, clearly tense and still not adding anything to the conversation.

“Oh?” I ask, sitting across from my sister. Roger sits behind me on the arm of the couch, paying close attention and sending a little pulse of wonder and curiosity down our bond. He, too, is very intrigued by this.

Ella sighs and then begins to tell me all about her evening last night – first the dinner with Calvin, and then his claim to being her mate, and then Sinclair turning into a wolf and bursting out the door, seeking to hunt him down.

My eyes go wider and wider as Ella continues.

“But,” Ella says with a shrug. “Honestly, I don’t think he’s my mate, Cora. I am not...into him, in that way that mated pairs are supposed to be.”

“Really?” I ask, turning my head to the side. “I mean, he’s really good looking Ella – ”

Roger scoffs behind me and Sinclair glowers, which makes me and Ella burst into laughter.

“No,” she says, shrugging and reaching across the couch, clearly seeking her baby. I hand Rafe back to her and she pulls him into her lap, clearly deriving a lot of comfort from having him near. A little excitement twists in me, because I can’t wait to hold my baby just like that. “It’s not like that, Cora – I mean, I feel a very interesting pull towards him? And there are like, literal sparks in the air between us whenever we get close or our skin touches?”

My eyes dart up to Sinclair now, who growls behind Ella to hear her say this detail. But she just rolls her eyes and ignores him.

“But Sinclair says that...when you meet your fated mate, your wolf knows it, and you’re like...very attracted to them. Like, tear your clothes off attracted to them.” She pauses for a moment, her eyes moving between me and Roger. “Is that what it...was like? For you?”

“Well,” Roger says, his voice unusually serious. “We have a bit of a different story because Cora’s wolf was so tucked away for so long. But as soon as her wolf...woke up? For the first time?” I look over my shoulder to see him nodding vigorously. “Yeah, Ella. We knew. Immediately we knew. I mean, I knew before because of the intensity of my feelings and my attraction to her, but when our wolves found each other...”

“There was no denying it,” I finish, giving my sister a little shrug. “But Ella,” I say, frowning a little, “why did you come here? I mean, it’s a crazy story and I’m glad to know it. But why rush across town when you’ve clearly had a rough night and very little sleep?”

“Because,” she says, biting her lip a little. “We were kind of hoping that you could...ask mom.”

“Oh!” I say, blinking in surprise a little. “How...how do I do that?”

She shrugs a little. “You just like...call to her.”

“What,” Roger says, and I look up again to see him smirking. “Like, she just puts her hands to the side of her mouth and hollers?”

“Would you take this seriously?” Sinclair snaps, drawing all of our eyes to him.

“All right,” Ella murmurs, narrowing her brows at her mate and scooting forward on the couch. “You come sit here with me. It was just a joke, Dominic.”

Roger just grins but Sinclair scowls, clearly stressed, and slips in behind Ella, wrapping his arms around her. My heart goes out to him as I watch him tuck his head against hers, because as much as Ella says Calvin is not her mate? I can tell that he's stressed and wants a definite answer.

"Okay," I say as I breathe out a steady breath, reaching my hand up for Roger's. He gives me his, not asking why I want it, but I just want him close. "So, like, inside? Where the gift is? I just...call to her?"

"Yeah," Ella says, giving me a little smile as she leans into the man who is undeniably her mate. But...well, Sinclair had two. I guess it's possible, would even be...symmetrical, for Ella to have a fated mate as well.

"I'd ask myself," Ella says with a shrug, "but I burned up the bond when the priestess tried to take Rafe."

Ella hugs her little baby closer and I give her a sad smile, thinking about everything that my sweet sister has gone through in the fight for her family. And suddenly, all I want to do is contact mom even just to give her a piece of my mind for giving Ella such a tough path. So, I squeeze Roger's hand, and I sink inside of myself, searching... reaching...

And it takes a few minutes, but suddenly I come to a very steady place within myself, where my gift glows with a warm lavender light. And then I call out without words...

Mom?

There's a pause, and then a pulse within the gift, and then it burns brighter. And when I open my eyes...she's suddenly there. The goddess, transparent, incorporeal, in my living room.

"Oh," I say, jumping a little in surprise.

Because she's just there.

"Hello, Cora," she says, giving me a delighted smile.

"Hey, mom," I reply, my voice quavering a little. Because she's so beautiful, and I can feel the love she has for all of us radiating from her, so much so that it brings a little bit of a tear to my eye.

"Um," Roger says, and I glance up at him to see him looking at me like I'm a little crazy.

I frown at him and then look around at the rest of my family. "You can't see her?" I ask, a little surprised.

"Nope," Ella says, grinning at me and laughing a little, hugging Rafe tight. "From our perspective, it looks like you just called the armchair mom."

I laugh a little and gesture towards her. "Well, she's right there," I say with a shrug.

"We believe you," Roger says, giving my hand a little pulse.

"Time is short, Cora," my mother says, turning her head to peer at me. "I cannot appear consciously like this to you for long, or frequently. But I could tell by your request that you needed my help."

"Yes," I say, sitting up a little straighter. "Um, do you know what happened with Ella? Or do I need to tell you?"

A little humor passes unintentionally down the bond between me and Roger, and I can tell that he thinks it's very funny that I look like I'm talking to the armchair. But I just roll my eyes and ignore him.

"I know everything, Cora," she says, her smile beatific.

Chapter 467 – Seeds

Cora

The Goddess' smile only broadens as she continues her thought. "But you can tell your sister that I have not been so generous as to send her two mates at once. And because I know it will worry her now, you can tell her that I have made her only one mate in this world, even though her mate had two."

I grin a little then, thinking about her phrasing it as a generosity and not the torture that it clearly is for Sinclair. "Why, though?" I ask, suddenly curious. "Why did he get two?"

"Because," the goddess says, laughing a tinkling little laugh. "I have bigger plans, Cora, that stretch generations into the future. One day, Dominic's experience loving two mates will help him empathize with another who likewise struggles." She smirks a little at me. "Though...maybe don't tell him that," she wrinkles her nose playfully, "Might be more fun if you don't."

I laugh suddenly, delighted at the realization that my mother the Goddess is a little bit of trickster. How have we missed that before?

"So, what's the deal with the Prince, then?" I ask, and I ignore Roger as he mumbles something behind me about not understanding what the hell is going on.

"The bond with the Prince," mom says with a shrug, "it is something else. But some things, my love, must remain a mystery. The connection that I have built between Ella and the Atalaxian Prince – it is merely a seed." She glances at my stomach, and then her eyes move to Ella. "Seeds, like children, take time to grow. But when they do..."

She smiles then and leaves the thought unfinished, shaking her hair back from her shoulders. "Is there anything else, daughter?" she asks, beginning to fade just a little bit.

"The baby?" I ask, suddenly desperate to know while I have her here. My hand moves instantly to my stomach. "Is he... will he be all right?"

She grins at me. "Your child will be born safe and sound, Cora, do not worry." A little laugh rings through the air as she fades almost completely from sight. "And tell Ella that I love her, and to keep trying. I am eager to lay eyes on my first granddaughter."

And quite suddenly, she's gone.

I blink at the sudden absence in the room and then take a deep breath before looking around at my family, who all stare at me.

"That was super weird," Roger says, his eyes wide.

“Well, you probably also looked like a lunatic talking to the air,” I say, rolling my eyes at him, “the night she visited you on the boat.”

“Cora,” Sinclair murmurs, and all of our eyes turn to where he’s sitting behind Ella, his face tucked miserably against his palm. “Please...please tell me what she said. I’m dying here.”

“Aww, Dominic,” I murmur, and I consider for just a second dragging it out a little further just to tease him. But he’s so miserable that I can’t. “Calvin isn’t Ella’s fated mate. She said that she only made Ella one mate, and it’s you.”

“Ohmygod,” he whispers, all in a rush, and the tension visibly goes out of my sister and her mate. My heart breaks a little when I see Sinclair’s shoulders begin to shake with the relief of it as Ella presses herself back against him, murmuring sweet reassurances.

I smile as I watch them, but I’m a little relieved when Roger slips onto the couch behind me, pulling me into his lap. I turn my attention to him as he wraps his arms around me, giving Ella and Sinclair a minute.

“What about me?” Roger murmurs, nudging me with his nose. “How many do I get?”

I lean back from him, suddenly a little appalled at his question. “You get one, Roger Sinclair,” I growl, grabbing his shirt in my fist.

“Awww,” he says, his face falling in pretend disappointment. “I was hoping for like eight or nine. Really start a little harem for myself -”

“I would kill them all,” I hiss, though I start to laugh. “”Though I probably wouldn’t need to – they’d get one look at you and all reject the bond immediately – ”

“That’s just what I’d tell you,” he murmurs, grinning at me and pulling me close. “When secretly, I’d keep them all in a little cabin out in the woods, my secret wives – ”

I burst into laughter at the idea, but my mate and I both turn to my sister when she calls my name.

“What else did she say?” Ella asks, her face happy and at peace. So, I tell her everything strange thing mom said about the bond being a seed, and seeds, like children, needing time to grow.

“That is so weird,” Ella breathes, her face scrunched up in confusion.

“Cora,” Sinclair says, his deep voice still very serious despite his mate’s clear peace and happiness. "You asked 'why did he get two.' What...what did she say to that?"

I grin at him now, feeling a bit of my mother's mischief coming through to me now. "She said Roger got two pop tarts this morning because they come in a pack," I say, my voice slow and resonating with wisdom as I grin at him, "it's only right that they be eaten together."

Sinclair narrows his eyes at me as Ella laughs. "Tell me," the King orders, his Alpha coming forward in the command.

But Ella just turns to him with a scoff. "Cora's conversation with our mother is hers, Dominic. You don't get to make that demand of her."

"She told you the answer to your question," he grumbles, glaring at her. Ella sighs and takes his face in her hands. "Does it really matter?" she asks, shaking her head. "I am your mate, Dominic, and you are mine, and that's enough."

"Unless he has a third out there somewhere," Roger murmurs unhelpfully, smirking.

Ella gasps and glares at Roger, but I just laugh and start to stand up. "Enough of this," I say, getting to my feet. "Are we done with all this serious Goddess chatter? You have a country to run, and I have a shift at the clinic this evening."

Everyone starts to stand then as well, Ella coming close and wrapping me in a hug. "Thank you, Cora," she whispers to me, very seriously. "I'm so grateful."

"Easily done," I say, smiling down at her. She starts to pull away from me but I hold her close for a moment longer, bringing my lips close to her ear so that I can whisper. "She said to keep trying, Ells – she wants to see her granddaughter soon."

When Ella pulls away from me she's beaming with happiness, her eyes starting to fill with tears as she clutches Rafe close. "Really?" she breathes.

I nod eagerly and Ella spins away, throwing herself into Sinclair's arms with a happy squeak.

"What?" Sinclair asks, frowning and looking between me and his mate. "What did you say to her?"

"Would you stop being so serious, Dominic?" I say, rolling my eyes at him as Roger comes and wraps an arm around my waist. "It was all good news this morning from our little chat with the Goddess – you need to cheer up! You don't need to know all the details."

He sighs and glares at me a little, though his sigh lets me know that he realizes that I'm right. "You're really not going to tell me?" he says, chagrined. "What she said, about me having two mates?"

"She told me not to," I say with a grin. "I think she wants you to figure it out yourself. But...I can tell you that she definitely gave you two mates for a reason."

Sinclair's sigh is deep but I see a great deal of contentment come to his expression as he and Ella say their goodbyes and head out to their car, where several guards are waiting. As they go, Roger stands close at my side.

"Any goddess messages for me?" he murmurs, smiling down at me.

"Nah," I say, grinning up at him. " Just that the baby will be born happy and healthy. But that's all I asked."

He smiles at me, pleased but curious. " Really?" he says, stepping close and pressing a palm to my cheek. "You didn't ask anything else? You're not curious?"

"Roger," I say, shaking my head up at him as I wrap my arms around his waist, "I am so curious about our future and how our lives are going to unfold. But I have no real interest in being an oracle. I want to find out as we live it. It's enough for me."

"And you're enough for me," he murmurs back, and then he leans in, giving me a perfect kiss.

Chapter 468 – Departure

Ella

Sinclair and I dress very formally that night, knowing that how we bid our farewell to the Atalaxian delegation is going to be something that we handle with a great deal of care, especially as we know that Calvin will be there. We even wear our crowns, hoping that they oblige the Atalaxians to see us as representatives of the state which they intend to destroy.

Rafe, unfortunately, has other ideas about his formality.

“Oh, god,” I sigh when he shrieks and pulls his tiny crown off for the third time. “Dominic, he won’t wear it

“So don’t make him,” Sinclair says with a grin, coming to stand close to me in our closet, putting his hand on my back and peering down at our son.

Honestly, he’s a baby -”

“He is the future King – “I huff as I slide Rafe’s crown around my wrist like a bracelet. “Without the crown he’s just our little baby meatball – ”

Sinclair laughs now, taking the baby from me and holding him high up in the air, making Rafe shriek with laughter. “Did you hear how your mommy talks about you, Rafe!?” Sinclair calls, pretending to be appalled. Rafe just giggles harder, delighted. “A future King, and she calls you a meatball!”

“He is,” I say, laughing and reaching for him. “He’s my little meatball, though,” I murmur, taking him back into my arms and leaning into my mate. “He’s just getting so big. And he’s very round.”

“Wolf babies grow faster than human babies,” Sinclair murmurs, leaning down to kiss me on the cheek and then Rafe on my head.

“That’s horrible,” I murmur, clutching my little baby to me. I turn my mouth down at my baby. “You quit it, Rafe. Stay little.”

“Not forever,” he says with a sigh. “ Just through these first couple months so that they’re stronger, then it kind of evens out. But yeah...he’s going to start getting teeth soon.”

“What?” I gasp, appalled and looking up at Sinclair. “He’s too little for that!”

“Sorry, love,” Sinclair murmurs, kissing my hair. “Our little pup needs his fangs.”

“Well,” I sigh, turning to the room when Sinclair tugs me in that direction. “As soon as those show up, I am done breastfeeding.”

Sinclair laughs with me as we make our way to the door. But both of us grow serious as we pass through it, because while we’re certainly able to distract ourselves for a few minutes?

Well. We’re still a nation on the brink of war, and it doesn’t look like there’s anything we can do about it.

At dinner we do our very best, trying every angle we can think of to get the Atalaxians to turn. Henry’s there, doing the same, though Cora and Roger opted out of this one. I can’t say I blame them – Sinclair told me on the ride to their house this morning that he’s asked Roger to take charge of the military, and I have to say – it’s probably given them a lot to think about.

But despite our best efforts, the Atalaxians turn away all of our last- ditch offers and ideas, apparently determined to go to war. Only Calvin, sitting across the table from us, looks towards us with any real regret in his expression.

Not that Sinclair is in any mood to look favorably on anything that Calvin says or does. Every time the Prince visibly moves or breathes, Sinclair sends a growl his way. I keep having to put a hand on my mate’s knee, reminding him to reel it in.

“Let’s not have any regicide tonight,” I murmur quietly as the meal breaks up.

“It’s not regicide if you kill a Prince out of the line of succession,” Sinclair mutters back, sounding tempted and making me laugh.

I stand up with a sigh, turning my face up to my mate. “Dominic, I think I have to do this on my own,” I say, knowing that it’s time to have the difficult conversation with Calvin.

“Absolutely not,” Sinclair snaps, livid.

“I’m serious,” I insist, looking up at him with clear eyes. Rafe, sleeping in my arm, fusses a little, I think disturbed by our heightened emotions on this subject.

“I’ll keep it together,” Sinclair growls, his words belied by a vicious snarl as he looks over to the corner of the room, where Calvin is clearly waiting to face us, his shoulders tense even though he has calmly slipped his hands into his pockets.

I give Calvin a little smile, honestly a bit impressed with the coolness with which he’s handling this. Not everyone would be able to stand straight and look Dominic Sinclair in the eye the night after hitting on his mate.

I smirk a little at the thought and quickly pass Rafe into Sinclair's arms. "Here," I murmur. "Just – go stand outside of the door, and I'll keep our bond wide open the whole time so you know exactly how I'm feeling, okay? And if I'm even the least bit uncomfortable, you can come in and bite his head off."

Sinclair's growl deepens, but he takes the baby and glares over at Calvin. "Dominic," I say, putting a hand on his arm and making him look back at me. "

Please remember that I have a bond with this man. My mother wants us to have a connection. Any time you feel like killing him, just look down at Rafe and let his cuteness lull you into a new calm."

I stand on my toes to give my gigantic scary mate a kiss on the cheek, and then I step away, heading for Calvin. Sinclair moves to the door, grumbling his discontent. I smile a little when I see him stand just outside of it so that his shadow still falls into the room.

"Highness," Calvin murmurs, giving me a short bow as the last of the Atalaxians filter out of the room past my mate.

"Ella," I insist, stepping close and smiling at him, even as I feel a rumble of Sinclair's unhappiness shiver down the bond. I smile, ignoring it, and gesture quickly to the other side of the room, where a couch and comfortable chairs wait. "Will you please come and speak for a little, Calvin? We have...to talk."

Calvin, to his credit, just glances once towards the door where Sinclair stands before sighing and heading towards the back of the room. I follow, sitting next to Calvin on the couch, careful to leave enough space for a person to sit between us.

We're going to war with his people anyway, Sinclair mutters directly into my mind from outside the door. Just let me rip his head off.

Part of mom's plan! I quip, again holding back a grin. Look at Rafe! Take comfort in his cute tiny face!

Calvin turns his head as he studies me, perhaps wondering where my little smile is coming from. But then he sighs, hanging his head a little. "Are you rejecting our bond, Ella?" he asks, as if afraid of the answer.

"Calvin," I say, leaning forward, wanting to touch him but refraining. "There's no bond to reject. Or at least, not the kind that you think there is."

Calvin looks up at me, shocked. "Ella," he says, shaking his head. "Yes, there is. You're my mate!"

Chapter 469 – Friendship Across Boundaries

Ella

I ignore the soft growl that rumbles from the doorway, though Calvin glances briefly in that direction.

“No, Calvin,” I say, shaking my head softly. “We did a little bit of research this afternoon. And I’m sorry to say it if it makes you sad, but you’re not my mate.”

“What?” he breathes, confused, his eyebrows knitting together. “But – ”

“Why do you think you are?” I ask, honestly conflicted now.

And Calvin sweetly and awkwardly blushes, looking down at the carpet. “My wolf is... pretty convinced, Ella,” he murmurs, probably fully aware that the words are enough to set Sinclair off again.

“Really?” I ask, pushing now, “Because my wolf – she says that you’re important to me, but she wasn’t sure enough to give it the name mate. And everyone else I’ve asked, Calvin...they were sure. Is your wolf absolutely positive?”

He sighs now, looking down at his hands as he perhaps consults with his wolf inside. “It’s...the strongest connection I’ve ever felt, Ella,” he murmurs. “With anyone. Is it...is it not enough? Even if my wolf feels a little bit of doubt, and can’t give you a certain yes?”

And suddenly my heart breaks for this man who I realize is...lonely. Who had an arranged marriage to a woman I’m not sure he loves, who is surrounded by a Kingdom full of people whose deepest beliefs he at least doubts, if not outright disbelieves. Calvin – he saw the bond between us and he grasped at it desperately, wanting it.

Wanting the different life I potentially offered one with love in it, and a new world full of different ideas.

My heart – it absolutely breaks for him, and down the bond I feel Sinclair’s own pity as he feels my emotions along with me.

But still I can’t love him just because he wants me to. I have a mate whom I love very, very much.

“Maybe it would be enough,” I say softly, “in a different time, a different... life. But Calvin, we asked and had it confirmed. You’re not my mate – I only have one. And it’s Dominic.”

Calvin looks up at me now, his face twisted in confusion. “Who on earth would you ask about that?”

“Well,” I say, smiling a little bit. ” She’s not precisely on earth -”

Ella, Dominic says down our bond in warning. Because the Atalaxians – they don’t know anything about my divine origins right now, or at least we don’t think they do. We honestly don’t know how much Xander told him, but since they didn’t bring it my or Cora’s powers in the peace talks as a negotiating point, we’re assuming Xander kept any knowledge of or lineage and our gifts to himself.

He deserves to know, Dominic, I reply as Calvin stares at me in confusion. It’s his bond too.

“Can we trust you, Calvin?” I ask quietly, leaning forward and raising a single eyebrow at Calvin.

Slowly, Calvin nods and I bizarrely feel a little pulse of truth down...down what I can only assume is a new bond between myself and this prince. My lips part in surprise as Calvin stares at me in confusion, feeling it too, and then I feel almost a sigh down my bond with Sinclair as he gives me tacit permission to continue.

And so I tell Calvin everything – about the Goddess being my biological mother, and contacting her today, and everything she said about our bond being a seed. By the end of it, Calvin stares at me with wide eyes.

“God,” he says, leaning back against the couch’s arm. “Now I’m just... embarrassed. Here I was, ready to confess my devotion to you, and all along it was...nothing romantic. Not at all. Instead just a seed, whatever that means.”

Sinclair lets out another low growl from the doorway, letting Calvin know that he needs to watch himself, but I ignore him, reaching out a hand between us. “Just because it’s not romantic doesn’t mean it’s not important,” I say quietly.

Calvin reaches out as well, hovering his hand above mine until we feel that pulse between us. Until the glow forms between our hands, eventually raising sparks in the air. We both stare at it and a smile finds my lips.

“See?” I say. “Magic.”

“Incredible,” he murmurs, shaking his head. But then he pulls his hand away and tucks it into his pocket, glancing towards the door. “I’m sorry... I realize what I did was selfish, and hasty, and it likely caused you a great deal of stress.”

“Stop,” I say, scootching forward across the couch now so that we sit close together. “Calvin, you have nothing to be embarrassed about – ”

He huffs a laugh, looking down into his lap. "I was ready to leave my wife, Ella," he murmurs, "to leave my entire country behind-"

"No," I interrupt, and he looks up to see me shaking my head. "You'd have gone home, Calvin. For your children. And eventually, you would have figured out that what's between us? It's special, but it's friendship. And you'd have been glad for it."

Calvin sighs and raises a hand, pressing it softly to my cheek. "For what might have been, Ella," he murmurs, "I'll at least treasure that always."

The connection burns between us, humming through me and raising the hairs on my neck. I stare at him, smiling a little, marveling at the magic that swirls in the air. But before I can get truly lost in it, someone clears their throat from the doorway.

I smile as my eyes fall on my mate, my sweet baby in his arms, glaring at both of us. Rafe lets out a little happy squeal and waves his hand, clearly choosing to respond to my emotions instead of his father's. Calvin hastily drops his hand from my cheek.

"I should go," Calvin murmurs, starting to stand.

"Do you have to?" I say, sorry to see him leave. There's so much left here we need to explore –

"Yes," Sinclair and Calvin say at once, making me grin and look between them.

"All right," I say, putting my hands up and admitting when I've been outvoted. "But Calvin, you always have friends here. I hope that you truly believe that. The Goddess has wrought a bond between us, though it may be a mystery why for a long, long time."

"And you'll always have a friend in Atalaxia, though I may be the only one," he says with a little shrug. Then he looks over at Rafe, sleeping in Sinclair's arms. "Though I hope the numbers grow as our children do."

"Me too," I say, standing and daring to put a hand on his shoulder, feeling the little pulse pass through me like a zap of electricity. Calvin grins at me a little when he feels it too.

Enough, Sinclair says in my mind, and so I take my hand away, though I hope Calvin doesn't notice.

Calvin looks at me for a long, long moment before he nods once and turns. Then he nods tensely to Sinclair as he crosses the room. He takes a moment to study Rafe before he walks silently out the door.

I sigh as I watch my friend leave. He doesn't look back.

Sinclair slowly walks to my side, wrapping a supportive arm around me when I press myself against him. "Are you all right?" he murmurs.

I look up at him. "Yeah," I sigh. "I wish that it wasn't so awkward now. I mean, I really like him, Dominic. He feels like an old friend. I don't want to part on bad terms."

"It's not bad terms," he says quietly, his lips turning up at the corner. "He's just disappointed because he thought he was finding the love of his life a very pretty love of his life at that – and as it turns out it's just some weird sparky Goddess bond that does not get you in his bed."

I laugh out loud at the bluntness of my mate's words, shaking my head at him and wrapping my arms around his waist. "Don't sound so smug about it, Dominic." I can't help a little smile though.

"I'll be as smug as I want," he says, smirking at me before dipping his head to press a kiss to my mouth. "I get you in my bed, after all."

"My bed," I say, narrowing my eyes. "I picked it."

"I paid for it," he counters. I laugh, and when I do Rafe fusses and reaches for me, sending a little pulse of want down our bond.

"Ohhh baby," I say, taking Rafe in my arms and cuddling him close. "You're right, let's get you to bed, little boy."

And even as I walk quietly back to my room with my baby in my arms and my mate at my side, a little coil of grief still curls in me.

Because even if I have a new friend in Atalaxia, one my mom picked out specifically for me?

Tomorrow, we still go to war.

Chapter 470 – War

Ella

The next day, Cora and Roger come over early. Roger and Sinclair head out, their faces solemn, to speak with their aids and their advisors regarding how to respond to the news we know is inevitably coming. Our reconnaissance teams told us that the Atalaxian delegation did indeed return home last night and were apparently in council until dawn.

Which suggests that at any moment now, they'll declare war.

Sinclair, I know, is spending a great deal of time deciding how to publicly respond. I think that he and Roger right now are recording a message that will go out to the nation as soon as the war is declared. But Cora and I?

Well.

We're just...being moms.

"Ella," she says, sighing and holding Rafe out towards me in my closet, wrinkling her nose. "I think your precious future King needs to be changed."

I sigh, my sweater only half over my head. "So? Go change him."

When I pull my sweater down and settle it neatly over my stomach, I see her grinning at me, my baby still outstretched in her arms. "Nope," she says, shaking her head. "Your baby, your diaper."

"You're going to regret that policy," I say, taking Rafe from her with raised brows, "in juuuust about three and a half months, Cora."

"And for three and a half months, I will be diaper free!" she calls after me with a laugh as I carry my smelly baby over to his changing table in the bedroom.

Rafe grins at me, looking honestly a little proud of himself, and I can't help but laugh as I lay him down and quickly change him. "Little Rafe," I coo, smiling down into his perfect face and tickling his belly, "getting so big! Do you want to try an apple today? Or some avocado?"

As I finish changing Rafe, Cora comes out of the closet, changed into a comfortable set of my clothes. She came to the palace today in more formal clothing, but as soon as Sinclair let her know that she probably wouldn't be required to appear or speak she immediately expressed her intention to change.

I smile at her, picking up the baby, my eyes going to where her little baby bump is clearly evident under her sweatshirt.

"I know," she says, rolling her eyes and laughing as she comes over to me. "I'm getting huge."

"Oh, no you're not," I say, laughing as we together move into the living area through the next door and settle onto the couch. "Trust me, you'll know you're huge when you can't even see your feet."

Cora does look down at her feet as she tucks them up beneath her on the couch, her hands going to either side of her belly. "It just goes so fast, these wolf pregnancies," she says, shaking her head. "Human moms get nine months to adjust; it's kind of crazy that wolf mothers only get two-thirds of that time."

"Or less," I say, raising my eyebrows. "I didn't even make it to six months."

"I wonder how long mine will be," she murmurs, still studying her belly, smiling down at her little baby-to-be." No way of knowing, with this hybrid stuff."

"Surprises are always exciting," I say, resting back on the couch and holding my baby close to my chest, turning him a little so he can look at his auntie. Rafe giggles a little, the sweetest sound in the world.

"Not when the surprise results in a pup," Cora murmurs, and I laugh at her displeased tone. "I'd like to know, to have a timeline."

"Timelines are just you trying to control the chaos, sis," I murmur, resting my head against my baby's. "And with children – and this family?" I shake my head a little. "Maybe it's better to just lean into the unknown. There's no way of predicting or controlling what will come next."

"Yeah, well," Cora sighs, looking up at me now. "With war on the horizon? And Roger looking like he's going to be in the midst of it all?" she shakes her head. "Forgive me, Ella, if I lean into my desire for increased control a little more instead."

I nod, understanding her. Before I can say anything else, though, the door opens and Roger and Sinclair come through, their hands shockingly empty of tablets, phones, paperwork – any of the usual accoutrements of running the nation that I'm so used to seeing them carry these days.

"What," I say, frowning up at my mate as he comes to stand behind me. "All done work for the day?"

"Nothing more we can do," he murmurs. "Budge over I want to sit."

I grin, scooting forward almost halfway across the couch to make room for him to sit down behind me. Cora wordlessly makes more room, going to sit on Roger's lap and draping her legs over the side of the armchair on which he settles. I lean back against my mate, pleased when he slips an arm around me. My smile grows when I see Roger press a kiss to Cora's jaw, and then another on the mating mark he placed high on her neck.

"So?" I say, turning a little to look at Sinclair, finding his eyes already on me. "Is it done?"

"It is," he replies with a little sigh. Then he reaches for the remote and presses a few buttons, turning on the television that hangs on the far wall. The channel immediately turns to a news venue, and words stretch across the screen.

WAR DECARED

Not wanting to hear the details he already knows, Sinclair presses mute and wraps his arms more tightly around me. I sigh, pressing myself against him, and then I dip my head again to press another kiss to Rafe's soft hair.

"We tried so hard to avoid it," I murmur.

"They know they have the upper hand," Sinclair replies, and I can feel him shake his head, feel his disappointment down the bond. "It's a gamble – but if they win? The rewards will be worth it. Moon Valley is incredibly valuable, both in land and intellectual resources."

"Which means they'll fight very hard to take it," Roger sighs. "It's going to be...a long war."

"How long?" I murmur, looking down at the top of Rafe's head, so glad that he's oblivious.

"Long enough," Sinclair says quietly behind me, "that it's unlikely he'll grow up knowing peace, Ella. I'm sorry."

"Don't be sorry," I say, my reply instant – because it's really, really not his fault. And I bolster myself then, knowing that Sinclair is as worried as I am. Knowing that he needs me to be strong for him, as he is for me. I work to put a smile on my face, to make myself feel the hope that I know lives within me, even though my heart hurts.

"At least," I say, turning to look up at Sinclair, letting him see that hope, "Rafe's got a big strong papa to protect him."

“Oh, he doesn’t need me,” Sinclair replies, laughing a little and reaching down to take Rafe’s tiny hands in his own giant mitts, moving Rafe’s hands in quick jabs to make it look like he’s punching. I laugh to see it. “Our boy’s a fighter, Ella. Born that way.”

I bite my lip, because I wanted Rafe to choose his future to decide to be a fighter if he wants to be, or an artist if that speaks to him more. Or both. Or something in between.

But, well. We all grow up in worlds that shape us beyond our own desires. And if our hearts are true...well, they lead us to what was meant for us anyway, right? Despite all obstacles.

“He’s going to have a beautiful life,” I murmur, stroking my baby’s hair. “No matter what Atalaxia throws at us. We’re going to give it to him.”

“That’s right,” Sinclair says, kissing my head. I turn my face up to him and happily accept the next kiss, which he places on my mouth.

“Don’t forget about our baby,” Roger calls, frowning at us. I grin as I turn back to my sister and her mate, curled up in their chair. “His life is going to be even better.”

“Really, Roger?” Sinclair says, his voice dry. “We have to get competitive about this too?”

“Damn right we do,” Cora says, a wicked grin on her lips that makes me laugh. “Our kid is going to be even happier than yours.”

“Challenge accepted,” I say, pretending to glare at both of them. “Whoever’s kid has the better life wins.”

And we all laugh a little, because we know that both boys are winners here, with a family like this to fight for them.

“Whatever happens,” Sinclair says, looking around at all of us, “we have each other. And that’s all that matters.”

“Precisely,” Cora says with a nod, her hand tracing idly over her stomach. “Whatever this world throws at us, we can face it.”

And I hold my baby tight, and lean back against my mate, and smile around at my family, knowing in my heart that they’re right.

Because I’ve got big plans for our future – plans I haven’t quite shared with them yet. But I’m so grateful to have such a strong family by my side, through the good times and the bad.

Chapter 471 – Autumn Turns

Ella

While we spent the rest of the day that war was declared between Moon Valley and Atalaxia quietly together, Henry joining us for lunch and then a peaceful dinner, the three months that followed?

They flew by at a baffling pace.

A lot of it was Roger and Sinclair working their tails off, not only getting our military whipped into shape and handling international relations to make sure that we have a variety of pledged allies, but also dealing with an increasingly-mobile wolf baby and a very, very pregnant Cora.

“I hate this,” Cora grumbles, flopping back onto my bed and pushing herself up against the cushions, her hand pressed against her ever-aching back. “I’m never getting pregnant again.”

“Well, it’s not like you did it intentionally the first time,” I say, grinning at her and sitting down on the edge of the bed, Rafe wiggling in my arms. “I doubt mom is going to give you a lot of choice about the second time, it being Roger’s destiny to be a father of many hybrids.”

“Whatever,” Cora mutters, leaning her head back and closing her eyes. “We’ll get him a surrogate. Six surrogates. However many he wants. He teased me about having seven mates a while ago and I said no way then, but now I’m rethinking this policy.”

“Birth and pregnancy are beautiful, Cora,” I say in a too-reverent scolding voice, and when she opens one eye to glare at me we both burst into laughter.

“Oh my god,” she murmurs, sighing and sitting up a little, stroking her hands over her seriously gigantic belly. “I mean, I know I love the kid – but my human body is ready for this little wolf to be born.”

“I still can’t believe you haven’t told me his name,” I sigh, sitting Rafe down on the comforter and grabbing his leg when he immediately tries to scurry away. He’s nearly eight months now and he’s big. And fast. Rafe gives a little squeak of protest but I tickle him as I pull him back, making him laugh. Then I reach for an apple slice on a little plate by the bed and hand it to him. Rafe takes it eagerly, not crawling away anymore because the only thing he’s more interested in than exploring is eating.

I smirk at my boy, tickled at the sight of him fascinated by his apple. And then I turn my attention back to my sister.

“Roger and I just want to keep the name to ourselves until he’s born,” Cora says, smiling. “The whole nation is following my pregnancy, after all,” she continues, rolling her eyes, “we at least deserve one little thing to ourselves, right?”

I shrug, conceding that what she says is true. In the first months of the war people really have rallied around Cora, excited about the birth of what they’ve called the Baby Duke as a bright spot in increasingly dark news from the war front.

It’s not that we’re doing poorly in the war in fact, Sinclair, Roger, and Henry predicted that the first few months would be hard. We, after all, are a nation with new leadership and dwindled military forces after our civil war. The important thing, our men have told us, is merely to hold the line and delay true action until we’ve had a little time to build our forces.

Calvin, to everyone’s surprise but mine, has been a huge help in this. Even though I haven’t had any word from him, our reconnaissance has reported that he’s taken a much more active role in Atalaxia, speaking out against the war and delaying forward motion where he can.

A friend indeed, I think to myself, smiling a little as I hand Rafe another piece of apple.

“He’s been eating a lot of solids lately,” Cora says, and I look up to see her considering Rafe.

“Well, I don’t think anyone produces enough breastmilk to feed this little meatball all alone,” I say, grinning and leaning close to my baby, sniffing his hair. “He’s so hungry.”

“Ella,” Cora says, her voice dry, “he’s not a meatball anymore. He’s a meatloaf.”

“Don’t be so mean – “I scowl at her, but I laugh at the same time.

“It’s not mean, it’s true,” she says, laughing with me. “I mean, he’s eight months, but he’s what...thirty pounds?”

“Thirty-five,” I say, smiling at my little boy.

“He’s a giant!”

“You’ve seen his dad,” I say, rolling my eyes and laying down behind my baby so that I can see my sister and use my body as a block to keep Rafe from crawling off the bed. “And it’s not like Roger is a little guy. Your own boy is going to be a meatloaf too, eight or nine months from now.”

Cora laughs at this and grimaces.” So,” she says, turning her head, narrowing her eyes at me a bit more. " Have you...stopped breastfeeding?"

"Mostly," I say, trying to be casual.

Because I know what she's getting at here and it's not something I'm ready to chat about. I haven't even told Sinclair what I'm trying to do, let alone Cora. "Sometimes I breastfeed before bed – helps him sleep."

It's a lie, though. I stopped doing that a few weeks ago. Cora grins at me a little, seeing through it.

"Ella," she says, laughing and leaning forward towards me. "Why don't you just talk to me about this!? Everyone knows that you're trying to have another baby – "

"Cora!" I shout, sitting up and whipping a throw pillow at her, which she swats down, laughing. "Nobody knows that!"

"Mom knew it," she says, tucking the pillow behind her back.

"Mom is an all-knowing goddess," I counter, rolling my eyes.

"And seriously?" she says, "Sinclair, who watches you like a hawk, has no idea?"

"That honestly surprises me too," I say, leaning back down on the bed and giving in, having this conversation even though I don't think I'm ready for it. "But he's so busy I think he's distracted and hasn't put the pieces together."

"So why don't you tell him?"

"Cora," I say, my face falling now a little bit with worry. "You of all people should know why."

"What? I " and then her face falls too. "Oh, Ells," she says, shaking her head. "It's not going to be like that again."

And I feel tears prick my eyes as I look down at the comforter suddenly overwhelmed with the memories. Because – honestly, I have done this all before. I spent years trying to get pregnant and it never took. Of course, we didn't know then that I couldn't get pregnant with a human partner, and that's obviously changed now.

But the emotions? And the waiting? And the not getting pregnant?

Because I have been trying for months now...

And I'm not pregnant yet.

"It is like that again," I say quietly, not looking at my sister.

"Hey," she says, moving forward on the bed and reaching out a hand to my shoulder. I look up at her, and she points at Rafe. "What's this?"

"What?"

"What's this?" she says again insistent.

"It's Rafe, Cora – duh, and he's not a this –"

"It's your baby," she says, shaking me a little. "And if you want another one, you can have another one, okay? It's foretold! You've had visions about this!" she says as tears fill my eyes as I get precisely the pep talk I need from my no-nonsense sister.

"Then why hasn't it happened yet?" I ask, quietly.

"Maybe you need a little help," she says, giving me a shrug and a smile. "I mean, a medical procedure helped you get pregnant the first time – maybe you and Sinclair just need a little medical assistance to get pregnant, like thousands of women do. And hey, that's what I'm for!"

"I wanted to do it naturally this time," I sigh, glaring at her, a little jealous. "Like you, when you got knocked up the first time you had sex with your mate."

"Yes," she says, looking at me earnestly before glancing down at her gigantic stomach. "And now I am miserable, and can't sleep, and pee every five minutes –"

I burst out laughing, shaking my head.

"The grass is always greener!" she says, giving my shoulder a little shake before leaning back against the pillows. "But seriously, Ella, you just finished breastfeeding – and maybe it just takes time. Maybe just...trust the process. Have a lot of sex. And if in a few months things are still stalled? We'll try something else."

"Okay," I say with a big sigh, rolling onto my back and taking my baby with me. Rafe gives a happy little squeal as I pull him onto my stomach, cuddling him there. "Thanks, Cora," I add. "I needed that."

"Well, I need a c-section, immediately," she murmurs, disgruntled. "Can you please arrange that? You're the Queen."

“Just trust the process, Cora,” I say, grinning as I throw her words back at her, making her groan. “Have a lot of sex – if in a few weeks your baby still isn’t born – ”

“Weeks!” she moans, tilting her head back and pressing her eyes shut. “No way, Ella. I’m not making it weeks. This baby has to come immediately or I’m going to lose my mind. Now, preferably, or tomorrow at the latest.”

I grin at my sister, feeling sorry that she’s so miserable but also happy and excited.

But if she’d only known then how prophetic that last statement would be

Chapter 472 – Alpha Academy

Ella

The door opens then, Roger and Sinclair coming through.

“No!” Cora calls, pulling the pillow out from behind her back and flinging it at Roger. “Not you, who did this to me! The source of my misery!”

Roger just grins as he snatches the pillow out of the air. “And how is my gorgeous mate, mother of my child and heir?” he murmurs, quickly crossing to her and wrapping her in his arms.

“Villain,” she growls, grabbing him by the shirt and pulling him closer, pretending to be mad but unable to hide her smile. “You’re going to pay for this!”

Roger just snarls and pulls Cora closer, covering her face and head with kisses that make her shriek and swat at him, laughing.

I grin as Sinclair comes over to me, leaning over to look down at me and Rafe. Rafe squeals happily when he sees his papa, reaching his arms out and asking to be picked up. Sinclair beams as he lifts his baby and swings him into the air, which makes Rafe laugh wildly.

I grin, happiness racing through me as I watch them, and then as I look over at Cora and Roger, who are smiling happily now with him tucked close to her on the bed, asking how she’s feeling. Cora laughs as she lists her bodily complaints, and Roger listens to every one of them, nodding and murmuring his consolations.

“So,” I say, sitting up and curling my legs beneath me, beaming at my mate with his little baby – the tiny mirror image of him – in his arms. “Any news from the war front?”

“Some good things,” Sinclair says, sitting down on the bed facing Cora and Roger so that we can all talk – if Roger and Cora ever remember that we’re here- and putting an arm around my shoulders to tug me close. “We’re making good progress with some of our more ambitious plans.”

“Like what?” Cora asks as Sinclair extends a leg across the bed and places Rafe down so he can crawl. Without a word, and perhaps without even realizing that he’s doing it, Roger extends a leg along the other side of the bed, ensuring that Rafe can’t fall off in either direction. I grin, looking between the Sinclair brothers, so pleased to see them become such dads.

“We officially got the vote to fund and start the Alpha Academy,” Roger says, grinning at Cora.

“Oh?” she says, her eyebrows going up as she looks around. “Wow that...incredible...”

Sinclair grins at Cora's false enthusiasm. “What?” he says, leaning forward to her. “You don't like the idea?”

“Well, it may just be that I'm about to become a mom to a little boy,” she says, her hand again stroking over her stomach as she speaks her mind. “But yeah – it gives me a little bit of anxiety to think of an academy that takes young men and trains them to be on the front line of the war.”

“The military takes men as young as eighteen,” Roger says, his voice careful to let her know that he considers her point even as he counters it. “The Alpha Academy starts recruiting at age twenty, and many of the recruits will be as old as twenty-five.”

“Plus,” Sinclair softly points out, “wolves reach their majority at age sixteen.”

My eyes immediately snap to Rafe, who just seems to be growing so fast. Less than fifteen years and he'll be grown in wolf culture. My stomach turns over at the thought.

“I mean, I get it,” Cora says, looking down at her belly with a shrug. “I just... I hate the idea of Rafe and the baby growing up in a world where they're trained to put their lives on the line.”

“It will be their choice,” Sinclair says quietly. “No one would make them go.”

“Yeah,” Cora says, her eyes a little colder now. “But in this family, with all these big tough Alphas swaggering around? And growing up in a nation at war? I doubt they're going to choose to be poets.”

“You never know,” Roger says, tipping his head so that it rests against hers. “They may surprise us.”

“We won't take boys into the Academy to teach them how to sacrifice themselves, Cora,” Sinclair says quietly, his voice heavy with responsibility. “We would teach them to fight, and to survive.”

Cora nods, understanding, but still clearly displeased. “What about girls?” I ask suddenly, frowning a little.

“What?” Sinclair asks, turning to me.

“Girls,” I say, looking between him and Roger. “Can girls go to the Academy too?”

Their hesitation tells me everything I need to know.

“That’s so sexist!” I protest, throwing my hands up in the air.

“Seriously, Ella?” Roger says, leaning forward to look at me with eyes full of doubt. “You’re telling me that if you had a beautiful little girl with rose-gold hair and a sweet little angel face, you’d want to ship her away to a military academy?”

I hesitate, because I know that if I had a little girl...

Well. My instincts would probably be to tie her to my side before I let her do that. But then I look at Rafe and consider – why should it be any different? Why should I have different standards of safety for him, than for a girl?

“Female wolves have different bodily strengths, Ella,” Sinclair says, his voice careful.

“Oh, that’s such crap,” I say, rolling my eyes and turning to him. “I’ve seen my wolf-she’s bigger and more powerful than plenty of men’s wolves out there -”

“No one’s doubting you -”

“But you’re saying girls can’t go to Alpha Academy because our wolves are weaker?”

Sinclair presses his mouth into a line as he looks at me, lowering his brows. “I can concede that point, Ella,” he says softly, his voice hard, “and still insist that the Academy only accept male cadets. At least for now. You’re fighting hundreds of years of male-only wolf military tradition, and while you may be right that we need to ask questions about those traditions, wartime is not the right time for that. No girls.”

I scowl at him, narrowing my eyes, but I back off.

“Okay,” Cora murmurs, leaning forward and clearly preparing to get up. “As pleasant as this incredibly tense dead-end conversation is, I want to go home and lay in my bed.”

“Oh,” I say, my face falling as I turn to look at her. “I’m sorry – you’re right, I shouldn’t pick a fight. Stay! We can have dinner here.”

“No,” she says as Roger stands up. Cora takes his offered hand and accepts his help getting to her feet. “It’s not your fault, ELLS – I’m just...very tired and sore and grumpy and hungry and

“The list goes on,” Roger says, smiling down at her.

“Yes,” she says, looking up at him. “And you’re going to spend all night hearing about it.”

“Good,” he replies, tilting up her chin and pressing a kiss to her mouth.

I sigh but get up, letting Sinclair catch the baby as he begins to crawl away. My mate playfully scolds our child as I hug my sister goodbye.

“You’ll call me?” I say, looking down at her stomach. “If anything happens?”

“You know I will,” she says, giving me a small smile that falls from her face, replaced by a sigh. “But I think I’ve still got some time left on this one.”

“My phone is on regardless,” I say, pointing to it on my bedside. “You call.”

Cora agrees and she and Roger walk out of the room, him already pressing a firm hand to the small of her back where he knows she’s hurting.

When the door closes behind them, my mate comes and stands next to me, Rafe in his arms.

“Are you mad?” he asks, looking down at me, ready to hear me out if I am.

“No,” I reply, looking up at him and raising a hand to brush my fingers against his cheek. “It’s just all very difficult, isn’t it? And I shouldn’t pick fights about problems we don’t have right now. All of that – Rafe training to be a warrior, potential daughters that’s all years down the line.”

“I worry about it too, you know,” he murmurs, pulling me close.

“You do?” I ask, my eyes going wide. And suddenly I feel a little guilty – because he’s already got so much on his plate to worry about. He should leave worrying about Rafe’s future to me, let alone non-existent potential future children.

“Of course I do,” he says with a smile. “But…” he shifts Rafe to the side so that he can pull me flush against him, his face growing wicked and hungry as he looks down at me. “I can maybe think of a thing or two that we can do to get our minds off of it. Even just for a little bit.”

“Oh, yes, Alpha,” I murmur, smirking and standing on my toes to bring my face closer to his. “Tell me precisely what you’re thinking.”

But my mate? He doesn’t. Instead, he presses his mouth to mine, parting my lips with his, and languidly kisses me, leaving words behind and showing me what he’s thinking instead.

Chapter 473 – Awake

Ella

I'm groggy, a few hours later, when I wake up because I honestly haven't gotten much sleep. But still, I'm instantly aware that I'm awake because something in my body is... different.

As my eyes crack open, I have absolutely no idea what it is, and no real interest in finding out. Because nothing feels wrong or off...just... different...

So, I yawn and snuggle my body back against my naked mate, my spine pressed to his warm stomach. Sinclair gives a deep, sleepy little growl as he tightens his arm around me, holding me close even as he sleeps. I smile at this, happiness sweeping through me as I think about how lovely it is to have a mate that holds me and protects me even when he's mostly unconscious.

And he's so warm, and the bed is so soft, and the sheets are so smooth under my bare skin that I almost...

Almost fall back asleep...

But then? My eyes suddenly fly open.

Because there is...there is something new within me.

As I start to put the pieces together, I am instantly, starkly awake – and so is Rafe, I realize, as I peer through the dark over the side of the bed. My sweet baby is peering at me curiously through the slats of his crib – almost as if he can feel it too

This new...new thing within me, a bond that wasn't there hours ago – but which is there now, just a tiny silver thread of something new

My hands fly to my mouth and my eyes instantly fill with tears because even though I didn't experience this with Rafe – my wolf wasn't awake then, after all, to help me feel it – I suddenly know precisely what it is.

My voice is shaky as I breathe the word, hardly daring to voice it.

"...baby –"

Rafe bumbles something, smiling at me and leaning forward, grabbing the edges of his crib, trying to pull himself up so that he can be closer – almost like he knows it too –

And suddenly I'm laughing – the sound bubbling out of me, rich with joy. "Baby!" I say again, sitting up in a flash.

“What?” Sinclair murmurs, his voice foggy with sleep, his hand slipping to my waist as I spin to him, pushing him onto his back and throwing a leg over his hips so that I’m straddling him, my hands on his chest-

“Baby!” I shriek, thrilled, almost in pieces because of it, completely unable to contain myself, or think coherently, or make any sense

Sinclair blinks suddenly awake, his hands tightening on my hips as he stares up at me, confused – worried but one look at my thrilled face makes him realize that nothing is bad is going on so what...

“Dominic!” I breathe, laughing and giggling as I lean forward. “Don’t you feel it!?”

He frowns at me confused for a second – “Ella,” he murmurs, “what...”

But then his eyes suddenly go wide and I know, instantly, that he feels it too.

Sinclair snaps to a sitting position as well, shifting me back a little so that I’m sitting in his lap, his arms going tight around me as he stares down into my face. “Oh my god,” he murmurs, still shocked, still feeling it out- making sure that it’s really there – “Ella, it’s...”

“A baby!” I shriek, throwing my hands in the air above our heads.

“A baby,” he murmurs, his eyes suddenly flooding with tears as a mystified smile finds his lips. “Oh my god, Ella, another baby – ”

And I squeal with delight as I wrap my arms around his shoulders, as he tucks his head against my neck and takes a few shaky, happy breaths, passing all of his emotions to me along the bond

Happiness, and sudden anxiety, and joy, and pride, and a thrilled sense of fatherhood-

I put my hand on my mate’s cheek and pull his face up to mine, grinning at him with abandon and wiping away his shocked and happy tears. “A little baby, Dominic,” I murmur, beaming into his face. “A brand new baby!”

“The best surprise I’ve ever gotten, Ella,” he murmurs, staring at me like I’m a marvel as he sniffs his tears away, still laughing a little in shock. He pulls away from me just a little bit, looking down at my stomach almost like he will see a baby bump – though of course there’s nothing yet

I laugh again, pulling Sinclair’s face back up to mine and kissing him, passing all my own joy down the bond. Because this moment – I've been waiting for it my whole life. A little surprise baby, much desired and already much loved

Sinclair kisses me back with all the love in his heart, holding me close and rocking me back and forth before he lets me go, laughing again.

"Wait," he says, his voice eager and thrilled, "let's check -"

"What?" I breathe, suddenly curious and a little anxious – is the baby all right? – is-

"Here," he says, putting a steady hand on my cheek. "Close your eyes," he murmurs, his voice excited, if soft. I do as he says, loosing a deep breath and draping my arms lightly around his neck before I close my eyes. I feel Sinclair connect to me down our bond, and then together we turn to the little silver bond that runs between both of us, just as Rafe's bond does so slim, so tenuous and new

I feel Sinclair move forward to it, almost as if he puts a mental finger out and strokes it, just gently –

And in a glowing rush, I suddenly know...so, so much about her.

Her bond feels a great deal like her brother's, but also has a line of sweetness and determination within it not that that Rafe lacks those traits, but there's just more

When I open my eyes they're filled with tears and my lower lip is trembling.

"Did you know all this?" I ask quietly, completely overwhelmed. "When Rafe was still growing? When he was this little?"

Slowly, Sinclair nods.

"Why didn't you tell me!?" I ask, smacking him on the shoulder and laughing.

"I didn't want you to be jealous," he murmurs, "which you definitely would have been."

I laugh with him, conceding the point as tears slip down my cheeks, as I look down at my flat belly and press a hand over it where she exists, where she'll grow. "She's already... like the start of a whole little person in there..."

"We're born who we are," Sinclair murmurs, "so much of our personality already intact. It makes sense that it'd be there in the beginning."

"Yeah," I say, rubbing my belly absently, and then I burst into a grin again and sniff my tears back as I lift my eyes again to my mate's. "Plus," I say, joy sweeping through me again, "it's a little girl!" I squeal the last word, thrilled, making Sinclair laugh his booming laugh and pull me tight against him.

"I know," he whispers, falling back onto the mattress and taking me with him, turning me in his arms so that we lay side-by-side, our faces close together. "You two are going to run me ragged."

"That's the plan," I say, giggling with my joy, running a finger down his beautiful cheek. "Now the numbers are even. But me and Babygirl are going to get Rafe on our side for the important votes – don't worry –"

"Oh?" Sinclair asks, his voice dry, an eyebrow raised. "Is this family suddenly a democracy?"

"Oh," I say, pouting and teasing him, "did the poor King think that he was in charge? Get it out of your head, Dominic," I say, laughing and shoving his shoulder with my fingertips. "Me and Babygirl are in charge now."

"Is that what we're calling her?"

Sinclair asks, his voice soft as his eyes shine, taking in every aspect of my face. "Babygirl Sinclair?" I smile as I gaze back at him, as I feel him connecting with the new baby again, already passing love down the tiny sliver of a bond.

I wrinkle my nose at him. "Just for now," I whisper. "Although Princess Babygirl is very cute."

"A Princess," he says, his eyebrows suddenly going up as if he considers it for the first time. "Wow, a Princess..."

"Our Princess," I whisper, grinning at him and leaning in for a kiss –

But before I get very far, my phone on my bedstand begins to ring.

And I sit straight up

Because only one call would come through at this time of night.

Cora.

Chapter 474 – Sharing the News

“Cora?” I gasp the minute I get the phone to my ear, still scrambling out of bed and tangled in the sheets.

“Hey, Ells,” she says, her voice somehow both tight and bored at once. “Sorry to wake you up – ”

“You didn’t wake me – ” I say quickly, reaching for Rafe in his crib and scooping him up in my arms. Behind me, I hear Sinclair climbing out of bed too, coming to my side.

“I didn’t?” Cora asks. “Why actually.” Her voice goes stony. “Don’t tell me. Knowing you and Dominic, I probably don’t want to know.”

A little laugh bursts from me as I shake my head, trying to get back on track with this conversation. “Cora,” I say, looking down at Rafe’s bright, wide -awake face, “what’s up? Why are you calling? Is the baby -”

“Yeah,” she says on a sigh. “Roger insisted I call. Baby’s on its way!”

“Oh my god!” I shriek, spinning to Sinclair and beaming at him for the second time this morning. “It’s time for the baby! We’ll come right away -”

“No, take your time,” she says on a sigh and I frown at her even though she can’t see me.

“Cora, what is going on? Why are you calling in the middle of the night for us to come but then also telling us not to hurry?”

“Because my stupid mate made me call you,” Cora says, her voice annoyed. She lowers her voice to a whisper. “He’s completely freaking out, Ells, even though everything is progressing totally normally -”

“Awww,” I say, passing Rafe to Sinclair’s waiting hands and smiling up at him. “Go easy on him, Cora! He’s a first-time dad!”

“And a last time dad,” she mutters, making me laugh again, “if he’s this annoying every time I go into labor.”

“Okay, well, should we come?” I ask, looking up into Sinclair’s face, a silent question in my eyes. Can we go? Is there any pressing national business that means we need to stay back? Sinclair nods eagerly to me, letting me know we can.

“Yeah,” she says on another sigh. “Do you mind? Honestly, Ella, I don’t think my body is anywhere close to ready to push but Roger just wants everything in place.”

“Okay,” I say cheerfully, nodding up to Sinclair who gives me a wink and starts to walk away to the closet to get himself and Rafe dressed. “Honestly, Cora, if he’s freaking out this much how did you ever talk him into a home birth?”

“Well now he’s trying to talk me out of it – anyway,” she sighs, “will you just come?”

I grin as I hear Roger yelling something in the background, his voice thick with anxiety though I can’t hear what he’s saying. My heart swells a little for my secretly-sweet brother-in-law, who I know has his whole heart wrapped up in what’s happening today.

“Yup,” I say, “we’ll be there as soon as we can. And we’ll let Henry know too.”

“Okayyy,” Cora says on a sigh. “See you in a bit!”

“Excited!” I call through the phone before hanging up and tossing it onto the bed. Then I practically skip into the closet in my excitement, going immediately to Sinclair’s side and wrapping my arms around his waist, grinning up at him.

“Is Cora all right?” he asks, cupping my face in his palm.

“I think so,” I say, nodding up at him. “Apparently she’s still got time – Roger’s just freaking out.”

“Of course he is,” Sinclair says with a laugh. “Roger’s great under pressure except when it comes to things that are completely out of his control. It’s going to drive him crazy to have to watch Cora have to go through a great deal of labor and pain and not be able to do anything about it.”

“That’s so weird, but also so sweet,” I say, nodding and pressing a quick kiss to his chest before flitting off to my side of the closet and selecting some clothes that I hastily pull on. When I’m ready, I turn to take the half-dressed baby from my half-dressed mate and finish getting Rafe all wrapped up in cozy layers.

“Are you ready to meet your little cousin, Rafe?” I coo to him, plucking a little squeeze pouch of baby food off its place on the shelf and sitting down with him in our little arm chair so he can have something to eat while Sinclair finishes getting ready. “And then, in a couple of months, your little baby sister?”

Rafe grins at me and I laugh, because the way he looks at me when I talk – god, it’s as if he’s already starting to understand.

I spend a few quiet moments with my son, thinking about how he’s going to react when there’s a little baby around –

And quite suddenly my eyes fill with tears when I realize that in my mind I've already stopped thinking about Rafe as The Baby

That the title has already passed to my little girl

"What is it?" Sinclair asks, and I whip my head up to see that I was so lost in my thoughts that I didn't even notice when he walked over to me.

"Rafe's not the baby anymore," I say, sniffing even as I laugh at my own ridiculousness. "I didn't even think about that "

"Of course he is," Sinclair says, smiling sympathetically at me and taking Rafe from my arms. "He's always the baby."

"He's already so big!" I insist, gesturing towards him. "He was trying to stand up in his crib today! And now that there's a Sinclair cousin coming today – and another baby on the way "the tears start to spill down my cheeks and I press my hands to my poor mother's heart. "Oh, he won't be the baby anymore! He's the eldest!"

Sinclair laughs at me a little, shaking his head. "He's always our baby, Ella. You know that. He can be both."

I stand quickly, reaching for my baby boy and clutching him protectively to my chest when my mate hands him back to me. I shake my head as I look up at Sinclair. "It's just all going so fast..."

"Life has a habit of doing that," Sinclair murmurs, stepping close and wiping my tears away with his thumb. " But if it didn't, you won't get to live it."

I nod, sighing and looking down at Rafe, who looks up at me with curious and interested green eyes. I can't help but smile at him and press a quick kiss to his head. Then I look back up at his father. "Let's not tell anyone about the new baby yet, all right?" I say quietly, sniffing back the last of my sentimental tears. "Let Cora have her day."

"It's a good idea," Sinclair says, wrapping an arm around my shoulders and pressing a kiss to my forehead. " Though Roger will probably be able to smell it on you."

"Do I already smell different?" I ask, my eyes going wide. I am, at best, a few days pregnant – honestly, even if that.

Sinclair sniffs the air around me lightly, experimental. "A little," he says with a shrug. "It's subtle, and Roger will be distracted, but yes, Ella, any wolf who gets close enough to you is going to be able to tell that you're carrying my pup."

"Weird," I say, looking down at myself and sniffing. "Why can't I smell it?"

"I don't know," he says, his mind already moving towards other things as he starts to look towards the closet door. "Can you usually smell yourself?"

"I don't know..." I say, honestly thinking about it. Seriously, I've known I'm a wolf for a while now, but it's still weird. "Can Rafe smell the baby on me?"

Sinclair laughs, tugging me along with him as he starts out of the closet and we cross to the door of our room. "I don't know, ask him."

So I do, babbling a little to my sweet baby as we walk down the hall. But of course he doesn't respond with his own words, though he sends a great deal of happiness down our bond and reaches out his hands to me, trying to touch my face and making me laugh.

I'm quite full with happiness as Sinclair and I climb into one of the cars in the garage downstairs, surprising the poor sleepy attendants who rush to get it ready for us. But even with the little delay, we're on the road in a few minutes, heading to Cora's house to help her, and calm her mate, and greet the new little Sinclair baby.

Chapter 475 – Chaos at Home

“Oh geeze,” I say when we pull up to Cora and Roger’s house in the pre- dawn morning and see that every light is on. “You ready for this?”

“Sure!” Sinclair says, grinning at me as he puts the car in park at the end of the driveway. “It will be a nice role reversal – this time Roger can be the one worried sick and I can be in the background cracking jokes.”

“Aww, sweetheart,” I say, grinning at my mate and putting a soft hand on his cheek. “It’s cute that you think you’re funny enough to crack jokes.”

Sinclair’s brows knit together as he frowns at me. “What are you talking about? I’m very funny.”

“Okay, baby,” I murmur, patting his shoulder as I turn to climb out of the car.

“I am!” he insists as he gets out of the driver’s seat and starts around the car.

“Dominic,” I sigh, hiding my teasing grin as I lean into the car and unbuckle Rafe, pulling him into my arms. “You have so many blessings. Why do you need to be funny too?”

“Because I am funny!” Sinclair says, crossing his arms and glaring at me.

“Okay!” I say cheerfully, not contracting him but moving quickly towards the front door of the house without confirming either.

“Ella!” he scoffs, striding after me.

“What!?” I laugh, knocking on the door for once instead of just striding in because I want to give Cora and Roger their privacy if they’re not ready for us. We did get here really fast, after all the roads were empty this early.

“I make you laugh all the time,” Sinclair says, still frowning down at me.

“Yes, sweetheart,” I say, grinning with mischief as I gaze up at him, “but I’m laughing at you, not your jokes.”

He growls at me, starting to get a little miffed, and I burst into laughter. Sinclair opens his mouth to protest more but both of our attention snaps forward when the door flies open, revealing a harried Roger staring at us with the fingers of one hand already tangled in his own hair.

“Come in,” he says, his voice frantic and full of dread. “I need you to talk sense into her –
”

"No, he doesn't!" Cora calls, and, grinning, I peer beyond Roger to see her starting up the steps, leaning hard against the banister. "Everything is fine, please come in!"

Roger sighs a deep, tortured breath and I pat him on his shoulder as I hurry past him and up the stairs to Cora, taking the plate of toast she's carrying out of her hand, Rafe perched on my hip. Cora smiles her thanks at me and presses her hand to the small of her back as she concentrates on getting up the stairs.

"Why don't you just use the stair lift chair?" I ask, gesturing towards it.

"Because I'm perfectly capable of getting up the stairs, Ella," Cora growls as she continues to lift herself up one step at a time, glaring at me.

"Well duh," I say, rolling my eyes at her. "It's just fun."

This makes her laugh a little and she shakes her head at me. "Okay, good," she says. "Someone sane is here. Can you please have Dominic just tie the other one up downstairs until this is all finished?"

"Can you please talk some sense into her, Ella?" Roger calls from the bottom of the steps, and I turn to see him standing at the bottom, looking desperately up at me.

"About what?" I ask, looking between them, baffled. Because honestly Cora looks fine to me just very pregnant and in the early stages of labor. And she would know if anything were actually wrong – she's an OBGYN.

"We need to go to the hospital!" Roger insists as Sinclair closes the front door and stands at his brother's side at the bottom of the stairs, radiating support but unable to keep a little smile from his mouth, clearly enjoying seeing his big brother all freaked out. "This idea of a home birth was a terrible idea – what were we thinking -"

"We decided on a home birth months ago, Roger!" Cora calls over her shoulder, sighing as she does. I grin at her as we get to the top of the steps because I can tell that this is an argument they've been having all night, and one that she thinks is getting old. "We're not changing plans now!"

"We were idiots months ago," Roger growls, starting to follow us up the stairs. Sinclair comes with him as Cora and I walk to the bedroom.

"I think a home birth is a good idea," I say, following Cora into her bedroom and over to the bed, where I place her toast on the side table before lifting Rafe more securely into my arms. Cora climbs into bed and then puts her hands out for Rafe, who I lower for a kiss, though I don't pass him to her. She's already got one baby to worry about.

"It is a good idea," she says with a sigh after she gives Rafe a sweet kiss and musses his hair. "I'm perfectly healthy – there's no reason to not do it at home, and I've got doctors coming to stand by just in case! Ridiculous," she mutters, pulling the blankets up over her knees.

"You'll be safer in a hospital," Roger says, crossing his arms as he comes into the room.

"No, I won't," she sighs, flicking him a little glare as she settles the blankets just how she wants them. "My sister, the magical healer, is here. It'll be fine I couldn't be any safer."

"I had a home birth, Roger," I say, turning to him and gesturing to Rafe, who gives a happy little squeak. "Or, well, a palace birth, even if it wasn't our home yet. And everything turned out fine!"

Roger's face goes slack as he stares at me. "You almost died, Ella!"

"Oh," I say, turning my head to the side as I remember it. "Oh yeah!" I laugh a little, giving a shrug. " Honestly, I always forget that part..."

Roger just groans, turning away and covering his face with his hands. "He's watched too much Little House on the Prairie," Cora murmurs, rolling her eyes at me. "He thinks a home birth is all boiling water and screaming and blood everywhere – "

Roger groans again, louder this time, and I see Sinclair clench his jaw to keep from laughing as he pats his brother's back.

"It's going to be fine," I say, smiling at Roger's turned back, but I turn back to Cora when I hear her moan a little. "Contraction?" I ask.

"Yup," Cora answers tightly, taking a deep breath. "About five minutes apart."

"Did your water break?"

She nods, but doesn't answer, clearly gritting her teeth through the pain. I murmur to her consolingly and reach for her hand, Rafe still wrapped cozy in my other arm.

"Oh my god," I hear Roger murmur, coming quickly to my side. "Is she...is she all right?"

"I'm right here!" Cora growls, lifting her head to glare at him.

"I'm just asking!"

“You can ask me!”

“Okay!” he says, a little frantic. “Are you all right!?”

Cora squeezes my hand and glares at Roger for a long half minute. Then she gives a little gasp as the pain of the contraction starts to fade. She pants a little and turns her eyes to Sinclair. ”

Please, Dominic,” she says, shaking her head at him. “Can you please take him downstairs and get him drunk or something? I can’t take this frantic energy.”

“I’ll be calm!” Roger insists, whipping his head to look around at us like we’re going to lock him away or something.

“Come on, brother,” Sinclair says, crossing the room to take Rafe from me and then wrapping his arm around Roger’s shoulders, turning him out of the room. “Seriously, maybe you do need a drink -”

“I need six drinks,” Roger sighs, melancholy as he allows himself to be lead away.

Cora sighs and leans back against the pillows as we hear their footsteps and voices travel downstairs. I sit next to her on the bed, smiling at her.

“He’s just going crazy because he loves you,” I say quietly.

“I know,” she sighs, looking at the empty door that her mate walked through a moment ago. “And I love him to. He’s just driving me nuts, and he’s not allowing me to freak out at all.” She pauses for a moment, her hands going to her swollen belly before she looks up at me. “He’s supposed to be the calm one, I’m supposed to be the one freaking out about pushing a gigantic Sinclair baby through a very small opening in a few hours!”

“Aww, sis,” I say, leaning forward and wrapping her in a hug as I secretly pass Cora’s words down the bond to Sinclair, advising that he tell Roger that Cora needs him to be calm and collected so that she doesn’t have to play that role today.

My mate sends me back a pulse of confirmation, letting me know that he’s on it.

“How long do you think you’ve got?” I ask, pulling away from Cora and looking her over, seeing the tension and fear on her face as well as her characteristic determination. I smile when I see that – my sweet, tough sister, ready to take this on like she does everything in her life.

“Hard to tell,” she says with a sigh, running her hand over her belly. “A few hours, at least. But I'm glad you're here, Ella."

"No place I'd rather be," I say, smiling at her and crawling across the bed until I'm sitting in Roger's spot, snuggled up against her shoulder. She sighs and grabs the remote from the table next to her. "We've got about four minutes until the next bout of agonizing pain. Want to watch tv?"

"Sure," I say, nodding as Cora flicks it on and puts on some deliciously mindless reality show. And together, we settle in to wait for the baby to be born.

Chapter 476 – Labor

Cora

I narrow my eyes at Roger when he comes upstairs about forty-five minutes later. “Are you going to behave better now?” I ask, my voice tense.

“Yup,” he says, leaning in the doorway with a lazy smile.

I start to laugh as I look over his too – loose stature. “Is it because you’re all drunk?” My eyes shift to Sinclair as he appears in the doorway behind his brother. “Seriously, did you get him all drunk?”

Sinclair, Rafe sitting up in his arms, just gives a little shrug, his mouth pulled up at the corner in a secret smile.

“I am only,” Roger says, smiling as he steps into the room and holding up a hand with his thumb and pointer finger pressed very close together, “a very tiny bit drunk. Just something to steady the nerves.”

Ella laughs next to me before she scoots off the bed.

“All right, then,” she says, gesturing to me as she moves around the bed and reaches to take Rafe from Sinclair. “Take your spot, Roger. And stop freaking her out, okay?”

“I promise,” Roger mumbles, giving Ella a sloppy little salute before climbing onto the bed and taking her place.

“We’ll be downstairs,” Ella says when I turn my eyes to her. “You just call, and we’ll be right up. Okay?”

I nod to her, smiling a little, grateful that she’s here. Beyond having the power to heal me instantly should anything go wrong, it’s just...really nice to have my sister close by.

Roger sighs as he pulls himself into the spot close on my right and tucks his legs in under the blankets. Then he turns to me, his face serious. “I’m sorry, Cora,” he says quietly.

“Thank you,” I say, my anger fading as I see that he means it. I lift a hand to his cheek, wanting to touch him, wanting him close.

“I just love you so much

“I get it,” I say, nodding.

He nods too, capturing my hand and pressing a kiss to it. "But I didn't listen to you. And Sinclair made me sit down and listen – which he shouldn't have to do, so I'm sorry about that. But he explained that you need to be the one freaking out today. So, I have to just... be steady. Is that right?"

"It's closer," I say quietly, studying him. "I mean, Roger, it's not that you can't feel afraid too – I get that it's a big day-"

He nods, agreeing with me. "But I was taking all the air out of the room. I'm sorry, Cora – you're right, we had a plan, we should just trust it. Everything's going to be fine, yeah?"

"Yeah," I say, a little smile coming to my lips now as he slips an arm around my back, tugging me close.

"How far apart are the contractions?" he asks, looking down at my belly and stroking it softly with his hands.

"Still five minutes," I answer, my voice quiet. "Or, maybe a little faster now? Four and a half?"

"Cool, cool," he says, pretending a calmness that I know he doesn't feel. "That is all very cool..."

Suddenly, I start to laugh.

"What?" Roger asks, turning to grin at me.

"You're just very sweet, Roger Sinclair," I murmur, taking his cheeks in my hands and leaning forward to press a kiss to his mouth. "Trying to do everything right."

"Well, I have to try, don't I," he murmurs against my lips, kissing me back. "I'm going to be a dad in a few hours."

"To a real cutie," I say, leaning back and smiling down at my belly. And I bite my lip, feeling significantly calmer now, starting to get...well, maybe a little excited, alongside being terrified. "Do you think he'll have any hair?"

"Nah, completely bald," Roger murmurs, a little thoughtlessly as he tucks his head close to mine and takes a deep breath of my scent, "like an old man." I laugh again, harder this time.

"And what color do you think his eyes will be?" I ask.

"Purple," he replies, making me click my tongue and pull away to glare at him.

“How would that even be possible!?”

He grins at me. “These are goddess grandchildren,” he says, grinning at me. “Anything is possible. The baby could have wings.”

“That,” I say, rolling my eyes, “would have shown up on an ultrasound.”

“But purple eyes,” he says, holding up a finger, “would not.”

“Ridiculous,” I sigh, but I’m smiling as I snuggle close to him. Or at least I smile for a second, before the next contraction starts again. “Oh boy,” I say, sitting up, a hand moving low on my stomach. “Here we go.”

Roger goes rigid next to me but does his best to stay quiet, his eyes on me throughout the whole contraction. He keeps his arms around me too until the pain passes.

“All right?” he says quietly when it all fades.

“Yeah,” I say, turning my eyes to his now. And then I smile a little, returning my hand to his cheek. “I hope the baby’s eyes are just like yours,” I murmur.

“Nah,” he says, smirking at me. “Big brown ones, like his mom. That would be best.”

“Well, I guess we’ll just have to wait and see,” I reply, dropping my hand from his cheek and wrapping my fingers in his instead.

“Maybe we can get the baby to hurry up,” Roger murmurs, turning his attention to the bond that runs between us and the baby.

I laugh, even as I focus on the bond as well. “Nah, don’t rush him,” I sigh. “He’ll come on his own time.”

“Poor kid,” Roger says, sighing as he inspects the bond and passes love and comfort and reassurance to the baby, as well as to me. “He’s all uncomfortable, cooped up in there.”

“Well, tell him we’ve got a nice big crib for him out here,” I say, laughing a bit. “Whenever he’s ready to make his appearance.”

“Come on, kid,” Roger murmurs. “Any time you want, we’re ready.”

And honestly, for the first time? I agree. I’m finally ready – completely ready to bring our baby into the world with a nice, calm, maybe slightly tipsy Roger at my side.

Unfortunately, the baby really does take his time. The whole day passes and dusk darkens our windows before my contractions really start to heat up. By then, the house is busy with all the people we've asked to come to the house for the birth our family, but also several medical professionals to really ensure that everything goes smoothly.

Actually, just one person is missing by the time I'm almost ready to push. But I smile when I see him standing, quite suddenly, at my bedroom door.

"Hey, Cora," Hank says, smiling at me with genuine happiness and pride.

"Hank!" Ella says as she turns at my side, her face lighting with a grin.

"Are you kidding me!?" Roger bursts out, kneeling next to me on the bed and looking between Hank and I with an appalled expression.

"Roger!" I gasp, momentarily distracted from the pain racing through me as two nurses bustle around the room, getting everything ready. "You will apologize to Hank!"

"Why is he here?!" Roger shouts, his frantic anxiety starting to come out again now that his buzz has worn off and we're a little closer to the birth itself.

"Hank is the most respected doctor in the city!" I hiss in response, "and our friend!"

"And your ex!"

"And!" I point a finger in his face, glaring now even as my breath comes short with the next contraction, "he saved Ella's life like four times! And Rafe's! So! He's here!"

Roger growls at me but then sits back on the rubberized sheets that we put on the bed about an hour ago, giving in and glaring around the room.

"Nice to see you too, Rog," Hank says, leaning against the doorframe now and grinning around at all of us. "Man, I didn't think I would, but I missed the Sinclair drama – "

Ella laughs and leaves my side temporarily to go give Hank a hug as I pant through my contractions.

"How far apart are your contractions, Cora?" Hank asks, staying at the door even as Ella comes to my side.

I groan through the pain, glancing at Ella and nodding to her, asking her to speak for me as I cling to Roger's hand.

“She’s less than two minutes apart,” Ella says, a little too cheerfully considering the amount of pain that I’m in.

“Well, it sounds like you’re ready, but I’m not an obstetrician,” Hank says with a shrug, nodding around to us. “I’m just here in case of an emergency.

Is there somewhere I can...”

“Downstairs,” Ella says, sending him a quick smile and a wave over her shoulder. “Go have cigar and brandy with the men.”

Hank wishes me luck as he goes but I barely hear anything as I tip my head back onto the pillow, panting as the contraction fades.

“All right, Mrs. Sinclair,” the head nurse says from Roger’s other side. “It’s time to push. Are you ready?”

“Ready as I’ll ever be,” I reply, glancing both at Ella and Roger, who I’ve asked to stay. Ella gives me an excited smile and Roger gives me a tense, heartfelt nod.

And then I give an exhale and steady myself as I begin to push.

Chapter 477 – New Baby

Cora

“You’ve got this, Cora!” Ella cheers at my side while I squeeze Roger’s hand, panting and shouting as I give what the nurse has told me is one last, final push.

I put everything I have into this final moment, squeezing my eyes shut and pushing as hard as I can, wanting this done – wanting to feel my little baby in my arms

And suddenly the pressure lessens, and my eyes fly open as I gasp And there’s a little baby’s cry ringing out through the room.

“Here!” I gasp, leaning forward fervently, some motherly demand in me needing my little baby now even as I see him in the nurse’s hands. “Give him to me!”

The nurse hesitates, looking towards her colleagues. I moan a little, still reaching, wanting him now

“Do it,” Ella snaps suddenly up from my side. She stands and moves towards the nurse, putting a hand on her shoulder and gesturing towards me. “He needs his mother – ”

Roger is completely still at my side, his eyes focused totally on the baby, who starts to cry his little heart out.

“Please,” I beg, reaching for him.

“All right,” the nurse says, nodding and bringing him forward. “We’ll clean him up in a minute – ”

And she takes two steps forward, and leans down, and places my little baby in my arms

And I burst immediately into tears.

Because the weight of him against my arm-his little head curled against my elbow-my heart just breaks to feel him close to me, so strange and new and yet so completely right.

I stare down at my little baby, tears dripping down my face as I take in every ounce of him, every tiny finger and toe, his wide and crying mouth with its perfect tiny lips –

Roger is pressed tight to my side, his arms wrapped around me, staring down at our perfect son.

“I can’t believe he’s here,” I whisper in complete awe.

"I can't believe he's so mad," Roger replies, his voice reverent.

I burst into laughter, glancing at my mate and shaking my head at him, sniffing back my tears, grateful that his strange sense of humor has at least stopped my crying. "You know, Roger," I say quietly, "most new parents say something nice about their kid when they meet him for the first time, like how beautiful he is, or how much they love him."

"Well, he's making a lot of noise, Cora," Roger murmurs, still staring at the baby with an expression somewhere between shock and awe. "I doubt he'd even hear me wasted compliment." it'd be a "Ignore him, gorgeous boy," I murmur to the baby, cuddling him close and pressing a kiss to his forehead. "Welcome to the world. You are very, very loved."

"See?" Roger sighs. "I couldn't have come up with something that good. He needed you for that."

"Well, he's got me," I sigh. "My whole heart, forever, little baby."

And though I'm exhausted, and my whole body is aching, I just feel such rich, complete happiness in this moment.

We sit for a few more minutes where it feels like Roger and the baby and I are the only three people in the world. I almost jump in surprise when I feel Ella's hand on my shoulder.

Her own face is streaked with tears of joy when I look up at her. "What do you think, Cora?" she asks quietly. "Will you let the nurses clean him up and wrap in him in a blanket? And I'll check you out, see if I can heal you up?"

"Oh," I say, suddenly remembering that – yeah, the baby needs to be checked. And I laugh as the nurse comes close, reaching for him. "I'm sorry," I say, shaking my head. "I didn't mean to yell at you earlier -"

"It's okay, you didn't," the nurse says, grinning at me as she takes the baby from my arms. "You're just an excited new mom and the birth went beautifully, no complications, so there's no harm in wanting to hold him first."

My eyes follow the nurse as she carries the baby across the room to be weighed and checked out by the doctor. But the nurse is right – everything went well, and the baby looked fine to me. I don't anticipate any problems.

"You lucky thing," Ella murmurs, sitting down next to me and holding her hands out, palm up. "I basically bled out after my traumatic pregnancy, and you get away scot-free?"

"Don't be jealous, Ells," I sigh, placing my hands on top of hers and laughing a little. "I'm sure your next one will be perfectly smooth."

She flinches a little, looking up at me with wide eyes, and I turn my head to the side, not understanding her reaction. But then she just grins and shakes her head, dismissing it. "I'm sure it will," she says with a happy sigh. "Now, does anything hurt?"

"Aren't I the one who usually asks that?" I murmur in reply, leaning my head on Roger's shoulder, starting to feel my exhaustion now more than I did before.

Ella laughs and closes her eyes, starting to call upon her gift. I feel it when it starts to sweep through me, and I sit up a little with curiosity. This isn't the first time Ella has healed me, of course, but this is the most conscious I've been for it and I can really feel it this time – the way the gift runs through me, seeking out the parts of me that hurt and sweeping through them piece by piece until...

Well, until I feel completely fine.

"There," Ella says, taking her hands away and opening her eyes. "All good?"

"Yeah," I say, laughing a little. "Honestly, Ella, it's still crazy that you can do that."

"Thank mom, not me," she murmurs, standing up when the nurse brings the baby back. He's not crying anymore, even though he fusses a little unhappily in his swaddled blanket. I see Ella bite her lip and tuck her hands behind her back, and I laugh when I realize that she's actively stopping herself from grabbing the baby because she wants to hold him so badly –

"Take him, Ella!" I say, encouraging my sister, who I know will love this child his whole life almost as much as I will. "You can hold him."

"No," she says, nodding towards Roger. "His dad should have that honor first."

"Yeah, Cora," Roger grumbles beside me. "It's my kid too."

"Oh, shut up," I sigh, taking the baby back from the nurse and turning a little so I can see Roger better. "You're scared to hold the baby and you know it."

"Well," Roger says, hesitating as he takes his arms from around me and starts to reach for the baby, stopping at the last minute. "He's very small..."

"I'll go get Dominic," Ella whispers, slipping out of the room. "Give you two a minute alone.”

The birthing nurses and obstetrician likewise skirt out, giving us a moment, though I'm well aware that they have work to do over the next couple hours now that the baby is born.

“Are you ready?” I ask, preparing to pass the baby to Roger, who really does look at the infant with wide eyes.

“I'm used to them when they're bigger,” he murmurs. “Rafe I can handle...”

“Come on, new daddy,” I laugh. “You can do it.” And then I slip our newborn son into Roger's arms

And I swear, I see his heart completely melt.

“Hey, little guy,” Roger murmurs, his lips trembling a little as he looks the baby over from head to toe. The baby presses his eyes shut and gives a frowning little mew. “Oh, it's all right,” Roger sighs. “It's nice here, I promise. You'll cheer up really soon.”

The baby yawns in reply, and both of our faces break into ridiculous smiles.

Chapter 478 – Meeting the Family

Cora

“He’s amazing,” Roger says, beaming as he raises his head look at me in wonder. “I didn’t – damn it, Cora, I didn’t know I could love someone this much -”

“What about me!?”

“Someone besides you,” Roger says, rolling his eyes. “You’re my mate, Cora, obviously that’s different.”

“Damn well better be,” I murmur, bending over the baby and stroking the skin of his perfect, tiny face with the tip of my finger. Roger leans close, giving me a kiss on the cheek.

“Thank you,” he says, his voice so quiet I barely hear him. “You’re amazing Cora. I’m so grateful for you, and for him, and everything you did to bring him into this world.”

I smile as I raise my eyes to my mate’s and then I kiss him for real, passing all of those sentiments back down the bond. Because this little baby – he really is both of ours, equal parts of both of us, the perfect embodiment of everything we mean to each other.

And quite suddenly, he’s our entire world.

“So, what do you think,” I say a moment later when I break the kiss, looking back down at the baby. “Does the name still fit?”

“Yeah, I think the name still fits,” Roger says, his lips turning up in a smile as he looks the baby over. “I think it’s perfect.”

“All right,” I say, beaming down at our kid. “Then welcome, to the world, little J-”

But then, the door opens, and I see Ella peeking in.

“I gave you a full five minutes,” she squeaks. “But I don’t think I can bear it any longer-”

I laugh, reaching out a hand towards her. “Come in!”

When the door opens, I see Sinclair and Henry peering curiously behind her, both eager to set their eyes on the baby. Only Rafe isn’t excited, but he has an excuse because he’s curled sleeping in Sinclair’s arms. My smile widens as the my family starts to troop in.

“Wow,” Sinclair murmurs, bending over to peer at the little baby in his brother’s arms.

“He’s beautiful, Cora. Congratulations.”

“Roger!” I say, laughing and giving him a little shove. “Let them hold the baby!”

“I would,” Roger says, looking over at his family with a big smile. “But I’m afraid to move. I don’t want to drop him.”

I laugh, reaching to take the baby from Roger and then turning to place him in Ella’s waiting arms, which are practically vibrating with their eagerness to hold her new nephew.

“Oh!” Ella squeaks, one hand going to her mouth as she looks down at our perfect little baby boy. “Oh, he’s so perfect! And so little! And so cute – oh I didn’t think he’d be cute like this ”

“Excuse me,” Roger says, sitting back against the pillows and crossing his arms over his chest. “You didn’t think my baby would be cute!?”

Ella laughs, shaking her head and not bothering to look at my mate. “No, not like that, Roger, don’t be ridiculous – I just – I expected him to be dark, like Rafe – like you and Dominic -” she grins, studying her nephew. “But his hair is lighter,” she murmurs, running her fingertips over his soft fuzz of hair, “like Cora’s. It’s beautiful.”

I beam as I watch my sister fall in love with her nephew, as I watch Sinclair look over her shoulder at him with pride.

“What did you -” Ella says, lifting her head in sudden surprise and looking between Roger and I. “What did you call him? Do we finally get to know?”

“Well,” I say, sitting up straight now, feeling quite formal all of a sudden. ” Ella, Dominic, Henry – Roger and I are very pleased to introduce you to your nephew and grandson... Jesse. Jesse Sinclair.”

Ella gives another sudden squeak as her hand again goes to her mouth. “Oh my god,” she murmurs, pressing her eyes shut against her sudden tears, ” it’s so perfect – oh, I can’t handle it, Dominic, you have to take him -”

Sinclair moves fast now, passing the sleeping Rafe to a laughing Henry and then reaching for Jesse, taking my tiny baby into the crook of his gigantic arm and beaming down at the newest member of the Sinclair tribe as Ella wipes at her tears with the back of her hand.

“What a little tiger,” Sinclair murmurs, grinning at Jesse and running a broad palm over the baby’s head.

“May I?” Henry asks, eager to meet his grandson. And Sinclair smiles, waiting patiently as Ella darts over to lift Rafe out of Henry’s arms so that Jesse can take the place of honor.

“Well well, little grandson,” Henry says, smiling softly at the little baby who fusses in his arms once Sinclair passes him over. “Don’t worry, I’ll send you back to your mother soon I know she’s the one you want. I just want to get a good look at you. Do you know who I am? Grandpa?” Henry smiles and lowers his face to kiss the baby’s head. “I’ve been waiting a long time to meet you, little Jesse,” he murmurs. “We’re all very glad you’re here.”

The next few minutes pass in a haze of happiness with everyone marveling at the newest, freshest member of our family, each of us wondering a little absently about his future, about how much we’re going to love him. Somehow, inevitably, he ends up back in my arms and though I’m glad his family all got a chance to say hello, I admit that there’s a great deal of relief to have him back with me.

“Right here, where you belong, little baby,” I murmur, staring down into my son’s face as he starts to drift off to sleep, frowning a little and making me laugh. “Here with your family that loves you.”

The doctors and nurses come in a little after that and the room is busy, though I admit I don’t catch much of it, too distracted by the sight of my sleeping baby and my own exhaustion. Roger gets up from the bed to go and fill out the birth certificate paperwork and do some other things – I don’t know what – while I stay in the bed, just spending some quiet time with the baby. Eventually, though, I feel a familiar hand on my shoulder.

“Congratulations, Cora,” Hank says when I look up, and my face bursts into a grin. “He’s really beautiful.”

“Thanks, Hank,” I say, smiling at him and covering his hand with mine. But then I blink, quite suddenly, to see a familiar face behind him. “Oh, Sarah!” I say, smiling at her too. “Did you come to see the baby?”

“Actually,” she says, biting her lip – and then, to my surprise, wrapping her arm around Hank’s. “I came with him. He said it would be all right – is it all right?”

“Of course, it’s all right,” I say, laughing a little and looking between them. “I just – I didn’t know – ”

“Wait, what!?” Ella says, gasping and coming to my side. “What’s all this!?”

Hank, I grin to see, blushes and waves his hand, dismissing it. “It’s not important right now we don't want to take away from the baby – ”

“Hank!” Ella says, laughing and smacking him on the shoulder, “why didn't you tell us!? Sarah!” she exclaims, stepping forward to wrap her arms around our friend. “I'm so happy for you two!”

“Thanks,” Sarah says, laughing and blushing as well. “But really – I don't want to distract _.”

Ella hugs her again as Hank turns back to me, smiling his quiet smile and slipping his hands into his pockets.

“I'm glad I was here,” Hank says, though equally glad my presence was unnecessary. Your doctor said that everything went beautifully.”

“It did,” I say, grinning at him. ” Thank you for coming, Hank,” I say, meaning it genuinely.

“Anything for you, Cora,” he replies, giving me a quiet smile. “And for this family. I'll miss you all when I'm gone.”

“What?” I ask, my eyes going suddenly wide. “Where...where are you going?”

Chapter 479 – Sad Farewells

Cora

“Well,” Hank says, sighing contentedly as he wraps an arm around Sarah’s shoulders. “With Ella here in the city able to patch up anyone pretty much instantly and cure a variety of diseases just by holding people’s hands, there’s not as much use for me here.”

“Oh!” Ella squeaks, and I laugh because I can tell that she feels guilty for making Hank feel a little redundant.

“No, Ella,” Hank says, grinning at her. “Sarah and I just talked about it and I think we can be of more use up in the Northern provinces. There’s a great deal of people there – both humans and wolves – who are without healthcare, and especially without a surgeon.” He shrugs. “I think we can do some good.”

“I think that’s really cool, Hank,” I say, grinning at him.

“I think it’s right,” he says, smiling at me. “But still, I’m glad we got to be here for this, and to meet Jesse.”

“I’m glad too,” I say softly, smiling at my friend. Because as much as my life is full now, and I have less and less time to spend at the clinic...I will certainly miss him.

Hank leans forward to give me a kiss on the cheek, his own quiet farewell, and then Ella walks he and Sarah from the room, murmuring something about Sinclair wanting to say goodbye.

When he leaves, Roger walks quietly over to me, his hands in his pockets, his eyes on the door. “What was that all about?”

“Well,” I say, smiling up at him, “you’ll be glad to know that Hank is moving away – up to the northern provinces, actually.” I don’t know much about the kingdom’s territories up there, but I do know that it’s a lot of wild land and a lot of rough living. I wonder, privately, if it will suit Hank and Sarah, who don’t exactly strike me as country folk.

“Oh,” Roger says as he purses his lips and looks towards the door, nodding slowly.

I click my tongue, my face bursting into a grin.

“What?” Roger asks, turning to me.

“I can’t believe you’re not crowing with victorious joy,” I say, laughing and shaking my head at him.

"Well," Roger says, lifting his chin, though he can't fight his smile anymore. "My mother told me that if you can't say anything nice, don't say anything at all."

I roll my eyes. "Words you've never lived by."

"Yeah well," he says, sinking onto the bed and smiling as he looks at the baby and me. "I'm a role model now. I've got to reform my ways."

"Hear that, Jesse?" I whisper to my sleeping boy. "He's going to reform for you."

"Yup," Roger says, leaning close to peer at the baby.

"I give him one week," I whisper to Jesse, laughing softly.

"I give myself three days," Roger counters, making me laugh harder. Jesse's eyes flutter open a little and he gives a sad little mew.

"Aww, poor baby," I murmur, holding him closer and rocking him so that he'll go back to sleep.

"He just wants to be in on the fun," Roger sighs, stroking a hand over my hair. "Doesn't want to miss a single laugh."

"Well then he's going to have to get a lot less sleep," I say, lifting my head to grin at my mate. "Because we laugh a lot in this family. And I don't intend to stop anytime soon."

Roger nods to me, confirming my thought, and leans in for a kiss.

Ella

Sinclair comes to the bottom of the stairs, Rafe tucked still sleeping in his arm, and frowns up at me as I descend with Hank and Sarah, clearly intuiting my emotions through our bond.

Hank is leaving, going to work in the northern provinces! I say to my mate mind-to-mind, genuinely upset. Make him stay!

Sinclair blinks his surprise for a second, and then he smiles. And how on earth would I make him do that?

I don't know, I reply, scowling. Some sort of...King edict. Just command him.

My mate shakes his head at me and then turns to Hank and Sarah as they reach the ground floor.

“So,” Sinclair says, nodding to Sarah and Hank. “I hear you’re leaving. It’s a shame – you’ll be much missed here.”

“How did you...” Hank says, frowning at his King, and then he glances back at me. “You know,” he says, shaking his head, “I’ll never get used to that.”

“You might have to,” Sinclair says, raising his eyebrows. “I’ve heard the packs in the northern provinces are very tight-knit and have...strange magics.”

“I’ve heard that too,” Hank says, nodding. “Their healing practices are said to be quite unique. I’m very interested to learn from them.”

“Well, I hope you’ll share with us what you learn,” Sinclair says as I come to his side and pout at Hank and Sarah, really not wanting them to leave. “Even just so Ella has an excuse to call you back to the capital every once in a while to throw you a party and see how you’re doing.”

I nod eagerly, letting them know I want that very much.

Sarah laughs and Hank smiles at me. “Thank you both,” Hank says, looking between us. “For such incredible opportunities. And for introducing us. Sarah and I are...” he says, turning to smile at her now and making her blush, “well, we’re very happy.”

“I’m so pleased to hear that,” I say, tucking my clasped hands under my chin and beaming at them. “And you’ll keep in touch?”

“I promise we will,” Sarah says, reaching out to put a hand on my shoulder. “I owe you everything, Ella – keeping in touch is the least we can do.”

“Well, you could stay,” I say, raising my eyebrows, but Sinclair just laughs and tugs me close to him.

“Don’t listen to her,” he says, shaking his head at me even as he smiles. “Your path is your own. Though I hope you’ll let us support your work financially, if that’s appropriate.”

“I will let you do that,” Hank says, raising his eyebrows at Sinclair, his face serious. “There’s a great deal of poverty up there, which is part of why we want to go. A little bit of well- financed medical care could go a long way.”

“It’s done,” Sinclair says, his eyebrows going up as he reaches out a hand, which Hank shakes heartily. “You’ll send me the particulars?”

“I will,” Hank promises, smiling between us.

And then I groan, because I know that's the end of the conversation, and I hug my friends again before they go, making them promise to send me emails and pictures and texts and whatever else it is they can whenever they can.

When they finally leave the house, I slump against Sinclair's side.

"I got one new nephew but I lost two friends," I murmur, sad.

"And you got a new pregnancy," he whispers into my ear, "so I think it's actually even."

My face bursts into a grin and I squeak a little – because, well, I didn't precisely forget. But I did get distracted. Just for a moment.

"How's she doing in there," Sinclair murmurs, turning me and looking me up and down, his protective Alpha instincts coming back in full force now that I'm pregnant again.

"I have no idea," I say, grinning up at him and stepping close. "Everything's exactly the same as it was this morning."

"Good," he murmurs, stroking a hand over my hair. "Let her grow a little, our Princess."

I smile so hard that I have to close my eyes, leaning against my mate and pressing my cheek to his chest as he wraps his free arm around me. "This is the greatest day," I whisper with a sigh. "Even if my two stupid friends did just tell me they're moving away – not even that can kill it for me."

"Don't worry, trouble," Sinclair murmurs, continuing to stroke my hair and hold me close. "I don't think that's the last we've seen from those two."

"Why do you think that?" I ask, lifting my head and peering up at him.

"I genuinely don't know," Sinclair says, shaking his head at me and frowning just a little. "Just a feeling."

"Hmm," I murmur, giving a little shrug. "Maybe the goddess is sending you messages now."

"Maybe," he says, nodding. "She gave me you, after all. Clearly, I am her favorite."

I laugh at this and stand on my toes, begging a kiss from my mate which he gladly gives me.

"Think we should go upstairs and see them?" Sinclair asks, looking up the staircase.

“Nah,” I say, tugging him to the living room where Henry is comfortably settled with a glass of whiskey. “Let’s let them have a minute and talk to grandpa instead.”

Chapter 480 – A New Family

It takes a little over two hours, but finally the last of the doctors leaves, the door clicking shut behind them.

“Finally,” Roger sighs, falling back into the linens of the freshly-changed bed. “Now we just have to get our stupid family to leave and we’ll get some sleep – ”

“Excuse me,” I say, glaring over at him. “If you think you’re tired -”

“Fine fine,” he sighs, turning his head to grin at me. “You’re right. What can I get you, my love? Do you want anything?”

The doctor officially gave me and Jesse a clean bill of health after I delivered the placenta and Jesse had his first feeding and full check-up. It was, of course, a relief to have everything turn out right and relatively easy -especially in comparison to Ella’s experiences – but now that they’re all gone?

Honestly, it all feels very real.

Like now I have to be a mom, and Roger has to be a dad all by ourselves.

“I don’t know,” I say, laughing a little and looking between Roger and our little baby. “Honestly, it’s all kind of weird, isn’t it? All of this fuss and then they just...leave you alone with a baby. To do what you will.”

“I know,” he says, looking at me with wide eyes. “I’m glad you know what to do. I’m totally lost.”

“I don’t know what to do!” I protest, laughing and shaking my head.

“What!?” he breathes, sitting up sharply.

“I’m just a doctor, Roger!” I say, laughing harder now and feeling a little hysterical as well as exhausted. “People come to me pregnant, but then I send the babies home with them! I don’t know what to do with a kid – that’s Ella’s department.”

“Well then,” he says, looking anxiously towards the door. “I take back my previous words. Ella has to stay – for like, ever.”

“Or at least until this kid is six -”

“Can we push to seven?” Roger asks, looking at me with real anxiety that just makes me laugh harder.

There's a little knock on the door but suddenly Roger and I are laughing too hard to answer it. It cracks open anyway and Ella again peeks her head in.

"I thought I heard the hysteria of new parents," she says, shaking her head at us and smiling as she comes into the room. "Are you totally freaking out?"

"Full meltdown," Roger says, wiping a tear of mirth from his eyes. "What are we supposed to like...do with him?" he asks, gesturing to the baby as Sinclair comes in after Ella, shutting the door and grinning at us. Rafe fusses, starting to blink awake in Sinclair's arms.

"You're suppose to love him," Ella says, coming close and reaching for the baby, which I gladly hand off to her. "And, you know. Keep him alive."

"Loving I can do," Roger sighs as Ella folds her legs beneath her on the bed and Sinclair pulls a chair up to the bedside, completing our little group of six. "The rest...we're going to need some help."

"It's not so hard," Sinclair says kindly, smiling down at Rafe who yawns and looks around at us sleepily, a little confused. "They sleep a lot their first couple of weeks. And then, after that, they find ways to tell you what they want."

"Maybe we should trade," Roger says, looking dubiously between Rafe and Jesse. "Yours looks...sturdier."

Ella grins suddenly and looks at me like she's considering the idea but I just laugh and shake my head. "You can't take my baby, Ella," I say, crossing my arms. "Even if Roger is inept, I still like him."

"I didn't say I didn't like him," Roger murmurs, sighing and leaning against me, happy.

Rafe lets out a surprised little screech all of a sudden and all of our eyes turn to him as his own gaze fastens on his cousin, his eyes going wide like he's noticing him for the first time.

Which, I mean, he honestly probably is.

"Do you want to see the baby, Rafe?" Ella coos, leaning forward so that Rafe can meet Jesse face-to-face for the first time.

I smile in surprise and delight when my sweet nephew really does lean forward to see Jesse, his face very curious. Rafe lets out another little squeak, more demanding this time, and reaches out his hands towards the baby.

“Oh my god,” Sinclair murmurs, looking down at his son with a fascinated and pleased expression. “He really does want to go to him!”

“This is Jesse,” Ella says, laughing a little as she beams at her own baby. “He’s your new cousin! And I think you’re going to be best friends.”

“They’d better be,” Roger murmurs. “Because they’re going to be together a lot. It’s going to be very inconvenient if they don’t like each other.”

“Oh,” I scold, giving him a light smack on the chest. “They will. Besides, shut up, I want to watch this...”

And the two of us lean forward as Sinclair sits Rafe on the bed, letting him lean forward and continue to reach for the baby.

“Lay them down,” Ella says softly, her voice a little awed, “next to each other -”

“What?” Sinclair asks.

“Please,” Ella says, almost beyond herself, as if she’s speaking from instinct. “Let’s just...try it...”

Sinclair looks at me and Roger and I just shrug, fine with it if Ella is. I don’t see Roger’s response, but I don’t hear a protest, so I assume it’s okay.

And so Sinclair gently flips Rafe on his back and lays him out on the blankets, and Ella very gently, very tentatively places Jesse next to him, close enough for Rafe to touch.

To my shock, the usually rambunctious Rafe stays very, very still for a moment as he stares at his cousin. And then he begins to turn, and almost gently reaches for Jesse –

And the moment they touch, when Rafe’s fingers brush against Jesse’s cheek, and Jesse’s little eyes flutter open –

All four of us parents take a sharp intake of breath.

Because we all feel it – each and every one of us.

We look around at each other for a split second and then all of our eyes dart back to our kids, who are still touching, just barely, skin to skin.

Rafe babbles a little, saying hello to his new cousin, who just sighs and closes his eyes again.

“Oh...oh my god...” Ella says, her hands going to her mouth for a split second before she reaches down and gathers Jesse back up into her arms. ” Did you guys...”

“Um, yeah,” Roger says, and I turn my head to see him staring wide-eyed at Ella. “Yeah, I think it’s fair to say we all felt that.”

“What was it?” I breathe, fascinated and confused but...not at all scared.

“It’s a bond,” Sinclair murmurs, pulling a now-giggling Rafe into his lap and stroking his broad hand over his son’s hair as he looks around at the rest of us. “Can’t you all feel it?”

Each of us, I think, shifts our minds inwards to that place in our hearts or our minds or our souls where our wolves live, where we access our bonds. And Dominic is right – it’s not a bond with me, not really. But the bond between me and Jesse, which shines rich and bright between us? There’s... something new there, another bond that I can sense beyond it. I can’t reach it, or touch it...

But I know it’s there.

“Oh...weird,” Roger murmurs, his eyes bright now as he smiles at his brother. “Our kids have a bond? Do...do we have a bond?”

“Uhm, only the bonds of brotherhood that we forged sharing a bedroom for ten years,” Sinclair says, shooting Roger a little glare. “I mean, siblings are bonded through their parents, of course, but a bond like this? And between cousins?”

He shakes his head.

“I mean,” Ella says, giving a smug little shrug. “We knew they were special.”

“Just because you like them doesn’t mean they’re special,” I say, rolling my eyes at my sister and reaching out for my baby. Ella laughs and leans over to pass Jesse back to me. I smile when he’s back in my arms, dropping a kiss to his perfect, tiny little cheek.

“I like them and they’re special. What do you think it means?”

We all look to Sinclair, who just gives a little shrug. “I have no idea,” he says, “why should I know?”

“Because you’re the one who figured it out,” Roger says, laughing a little.

“Well,” Sinclair says on a sigh. ”

That’s all I’ve got. Maybe it has something to do with being grandchildren of the goddess. Or...their gifts, or something. I have no idea.”

“I wonder if any future kids will be likewise bonded,” I murmur, smiling a little as I think of that possibility. Because, honestly, even though I’m bone tired...I’m already starting to forget some of the miseries of pregnancy.

I know that I’ve only been a mom for a couple of hours now but...I already really love it. I’m starting to understand Ella’s mania for more, honestly. I smile down at my baby, thinking that if he’s this great already...

Well, then I probably want like...five more. Maybe not anytime soon...I want to enjoy this one first. But yeah. Quite suddenly, I definitely want more.

“Only one way to find out,” Sinclair says, and I don’t miss the way that he smiles at Ella. I grin privately to myself, but my smile quickly turns into a yawn.

Chapter 481 – New Baby Cousin

Ella

I see a yawn stretch over Cora's face and immediately start to get to my feet. "You're exhausted," I say, "we'll let you get some rest – "

"No," Roger says, suddenly a little frantic again. "You guy can't leave what if – what if the baby cries and Cora sleeps through it – I have no idea what to do "

I laugh at my brother-in-law and shake my head at him. "We're not going far, Roger," I say, pressing myself to Sinclair's side as he, too, stands up. "We're going to sleep across the hall after we make sure Henry gets home safe. You'll be able to shout if you need anything."

"Oh, thank god," Roger murmurs, slumping back against the pillows and putting a weary hand over his face.

"So dramatic," Cora says, rolling her eyes but laughing anyway. I grin at my sister and then move to her side, pressing a kiss to her cheek and blowing one to the sleeping Jesse, my new perfect nephew.

"You guys sleep tight, all right?" I say. "And really – we're here if you need us. Or even if you want us to take the baby in the rolling bassinet – he can sleep in our room – "

"We'll be fine, Ella," Cora says, rolling her eyes at me now.

"They do this all the time in hospitals, take the baby to the nursery so the mom can get some sleep! I could "Stop trying to steal my baby," she laughs, flapping a hand at me, "just because you miss having a newborn."

"I do," I sigh, again clutching my hands beneath my chin. "They're so cute and tiny then..."

"Come and take your meatball, Ella," Sinclair says on a laugh, holding out my perfect little Rafe to me. And I laugh too, taking Rafe in my arms and holding him tight against my chest.

"You're perfect too, Rafe," I say, kissing his head, "no matter how big you get."

And then Sinclair and I call our soft goodnights over our shoulder and close the door behind us as we pass out of the room, letting my sister and her mate have a peaceful night alone with their new baby.

As soon as we're alone in the hall, I fall back against the wall with an excited little sigh.

"What is it this time," Sinclair says, stopping and grinning at me as I hold Rafe close to my chest.

"I'm just so excited," I say, smiling up at him. "I get to do that again in what, six months!? I love the newborn stage! I love the first night, when you can't sleep because you can't bear to close your eyes and stop looking at them! I'm so excited. I'm not going to be able to sleep."

"You really were born to be a mom, trouble," my sweetheart mate says, stepping forward and running his hand over my hair. I grin up at him, nodding fervently. "Luckily," he says, raising an eyebrow at me. "I do not at all mind the process of knocking you up. Not one bit."

"Dominic!" I gasp, swatting at him a little and covering one of Rafe's ear with my spare hand. "Not in front of the baby!"

"Ella," Sinclair says, laughing at me as I start down the hall. "We have sex in front of the baby all the time – "

"Yes, but that's natural," I say, laughing and throwing a haughty look at my mate over my shoulder, pretending to be more bothered than I am as I open the door to the guest room. "Baby Rafe doesn't need to hear all of your lewd innuendos about what it is you enjoy."

"It wasn't even an inuendo," Sinclair murmurs, stepping close to me in the dark of the room and pulling me to him, a little more roughly than he needs to, just the way I like it.

"Well, mind your manners," I murmur, my voice low and throaty. "Because we have competition now for best Sinclair parents. And I am not losing to those two idiots in there."

"Not a chance," my mate says, laughing his dark little laugh. "We've got them beat hands down."

"I know, right?" I say, wrinkling my nose at him. And my mate kisses me swiftly before giving me a swat on the rump.

"You get the baby ready for bed, I'll make sure dad gets home?" He asks, heading for the door.

"You got it," I say, giving him a quick thumbs up and a wink. Sinclair nods to me, smiling, and heads out the door, leaving me in the dark with the baby.

“Well, Rafey,” I say, laughing as I swing the baby up over my head, making him give a tiny shriek of joy. ” You got a new cousin today, and a new bond! What do you think?”

Rafe burbles happily as if in reply and I smile at him as I carry him over to the little changing table I set up a few hours ago, starting to get him ready for bed.

“I’m very happy for you, Rafe,” I say sternly as I change his diaper and start to put his pajamas on. “But if you like your new cousin more than your new little sister, just because you have some weird kind of bond?” I look at him for a long moment, shaking my head. “If that happens, we’re going to have big problems. Okay?”

Rafe just grins at me, babbling as I pull up his tiny zipper.

“I’ll take that as a yes,” I say, smiling as I pull him up into my arms. “And I’m holding you to it, even though you don’t even really speak English yet.”

When Sinclair comes back into the room about half an hour later, Rafe and I are cozily settled on the bed, each of us warmly wrapped up as he plays with some of his soft blocks and I lay quietly by his side, talking to him and giving him a cuddle whenever he looks for it. But I grin when my mate shuts the door behind him, smiling at us.

“Don’t let me interrupt,” he says, starting to pull off his blazer as he comes to the bed.

“Please do,” I say, sitting up a little. ” We missed you.”

My mate comes immediately to bed, pulling off his shoes and slipping into the bed fully dressed so he can be with his little family sooner. I smile when I see his eagerness, knowing he feels precisely the way that I feel: that this is our happy place, when we’re all cozy together with no great pressures or problems weighing on us.

“Are you sleepy?” he asks. “Hungry?”

“Both,” I say, giving a little shrug. ” But, we should wait until Rafe falls asleep to attend to either.”

Sinclair nods, glancing at his son before opening his arm to me, inviting me in. I accept immediately, scooting over so that I’m curled up by my mate’s side, a thrill running through me at the warmth and closeness of him.

“I’d love you anyway,” I say quietly, ” but I have to say, I really love that you’re basically a furnace of body heat that always keeps me warm.”

Sinclair laughs with both pleasure and surprise when I say this. "Glad I can be of service," he murmurs, dropping a kiss to my cheek and pressing closer. "What made you think of that?"

"Don't you feel it?" I ask, turning to look at him. "It got so cold suddenly. I don't know what happened."

"I guess I didn't," he murmurs, "but, apparently I'm a furnace, so maybe it makes sense that I -"

But suddenly he stops, his jaw falling open a bit as his gaze falls on the window.

"What?" I ask, but I don't tense because the feeling he passes down the bond is joy and wonder. Eager, I turn, trying to see what he sees

And suddenly, my eyes light on the window to. "Oh my god," I say, my voice a little breathless. "It's – it's snowing

Huge, gorgeous flakes of pure white snow drift slowly down from the sky, dancing gracefully across the window pane.

I watch them for a long, fascinated moment before I frown a little. "Isn't it ... isn't it way too early for snow?" I ask, confused.

"Well," Sinclair says, laughing a little. "When your mom is a demigoddess who controls the weather, probably not."

"Ohhh," I say, finally getting it. "Oh, that is so special," I murmur, pressing a hand to my heart, "what a wonderful way to welcome your baby to the world

"Welcome, baby Jesse," Sinclair sighs, pulling me close against him and smiling at me as we watch the snow. Rafe crawls over to us and puts up his arms so that I will pull him into my lap, a request which I happily oblige.

"And welcome Princess Babygirl," I murmur, smiling and laughing a little at the ridiculous placeholder of a name. Sinclair laughs along with me. "Cora doesn't know it yet, but this is for you too. We love you so much already."

I sigh, feeling the warmth of my mate behind me, and my sweet baby in my lap, and the new bond with my little girl growing within me -And I close my eyes, feeling totally, completely blessed.

Chapter 482 – Growing Family

“What do you mean I made it snow?” Cora frowns at me as she bustles around the kitchen, making mimosas. “That’s ridiculous – you must have imagined it.”

“It totally snowed!” I protest, laughing and shaking my head at her, turning to Sinclair at the table for support.

“It did,” he says, raising his eyebrows at Cora even as he hands Rafe another slice of apple. “The news is completely baffled by the sudden cold-snap that immediately disappeared by morning. They’re calling it the duke’s miracle.”

“What!?” Cora gasps, spinning to stare at Sinclair wide-eyed.

“That’s so cool,” Roger says, grinning at baby Jesse in his arms, who peers up at his dad with sleepy eyes. “Mom’s magic, Jesse,” he whispers. “It’s very cool.”

“You guys are just teasing me,” Cora sighs, leaning against the counter as I turn the knob on the stove, cutting off the fire beneath the pan of eggs, sausage, and bacon that I’ve finished frying up.

“Dominic is dead serious,” I say, nodding to Cora eagerly with raised eyebrows. “Seriously, word got to the media that the nation’s beloved duchess had her baby and that night it snowed unseasonably early – people are freaking out.” I laugh a little as I starting to portion our breakfast out onto plates.

“Oh my god,” Cora says, covering her face with her hands. “I didn’t even mean to do that – do you really think it was me?”

“You tend to affect the weather when you’re emotional,” Roger says, grinning at his magical mate with a happy shrug. “I think it makes a lot of sense.”

“Oh, that’s so weird,” Cora says with a sigh, shaking her head at Roger and then at me. “People are going to start figuring out what we can do, Ella,” she says. “We’re going to need to have some sort of story.”

“I think my secrets kind of already out,” I say, giving a little grimace. ”

And why do we have to tell anyone anything? Just let the rumors fly – it’s not anyone’s business but ours.”

“Yeah,” Cora says, rolling her eyes at me before turning back to her previous task of adding the world’s tiniest amount of orange juice to nearly-full glasses of champagne. “Until they burn us at the stake for being witches or something.”

"We won't let them do that," Sinclair murmurs, smirking a little as he focuses his attention on Rafe's breakfast.

"Plus," Roger says, shrugging at Cora as if it's inconsequential, "it's not like it will work. You can just rain on the fires, Cora."

I burst out laughing at this and Cora, despite herself, laughs too.

"Well, whatever," she sighs, carrying a mimosa over to Roger and Sinclair first, who murmur their thanks. "I guess you're right and it doesn't really matter at least not until our children develop some weird gifts that end up being dangerous or something. Or make them social pariahs."

She returns to the counter, handing me a glass of mimosa and taking one for herself, raising it to all of us in a toast. The rest of us raise our glasses as well, toasting baby Jesse and then drinking deeply

Well, they drink deeply. I fake mine, just letting the bubbles of the champagne press against my lips before putting the drink down on the counter, neatly tucked away where Cora can't see it.

Because as much as I would usually love to toast my nephew's birth with a festive breakfast beverage...

Well, my reasons for not drinking are so much better. Still, it's Cora's day, and I don't want to steal her thunder just yet. Not that I think she'd mind, just...one happy announcement at a time.

"How did he sleep?" I ask, raising my chin towards Jesse.

"Fitfully," Cora says, crossing her arms and frowning over at him. "But that's normal, right?"

I nod, smiling at her a little. "He'll find his patterns soon, don't worry. How did you sleep?"

"About the same," she says, giving me a little smile. "I kept waking up every time he like...moved."

I grin at her, remembering that habit in the early days of a new baby. "You'll get used to it too."

"Well, some people," Cora says, laughing already and glancing over at Roger, "are already used to it."

“You cannot begrudge me my sleep, Cora,” Roger says, looking at her completely unashamed of himself. “It is self-care. I will not apologize for it.”

“You have a baby to care for now,” she throws at him, though she smiles. I grin, truly appreciating their teasing relationship. “You need to be a little more self-less.”

“I will care for the baby during the day,” Roger says, gesturing to the baby cradled in his arm. “At night, he’s your son.”

We all laugh again, mostly because we know he’s not serious. Roger, like Sinclair, will certainly do his share of childcare without complaint, day or night. He’ll just tease Cora about it more, mostly because he knows that it makes her laugh.

“How can you take care of the baby all day,” Sinclair asks, turning mischievous eyes on his brother, ” while you run the military from the palace?”

“I’ll bring him with me,” Roger says, grinning down at Jesse like it’s obvious. “Never too early to get the boy used to a war room.”

I grin, picturing Roger in his admiral’s uniform with a baby asleep on his shoulder, a little barf dribbling down his back. And honestly, I don’t mind it as much as I probably should. These Sinclair dads – I don’t think they’re going to have any hesitation about incorporating their children into the day-to-day activities of their lives.

As I consider it, though, my hand passively drifts over my stomach, because I wonder quietly if the same will be true when there’s a girl in the picture. Would Roger have said the same thing – that it’s never too early for the child to get used to a war room if Jesse had been a girl and not a boy?

I sigh a little, hoping that it’s not true. Because this little girl – she’s going to grow up with two big Alpha boys who are barely a year older than her, and I’m damn well going to have a word with them if they try to cut her out of their activities just because she’s a girl.

You all right? Sinclair says, passing the words discreetly into my mind but keeping his eyes on Rafe as Cora sets out the breakfast plates that I forgot about in my musings.

Yes, I say, letting him see my light worry but also letting him know that it’s not about anything big. Just...mom thoughts.

He nods to me, giving me a little smile as I take my seat next to him.

Our breakfast is lovely, but it goes far too fast. Sooner than I'd like, Sinclair puts a hand on my knee and looks at me with a sad expression, silently letting me know that we really have to get back to the palace. He's a King after all and while our family comes first and we'll always make time for them, we do have responsibilities.

"Oh no," Cora says, pouting as she looks between us. "So soon?"

"I'm sorry," I say with a sigh. "I mean, if you'd just take me up on my offer to move into the palace while Jesse is a baby

But she just laughs and waves a hand at me as she gets up and clears our plates, dumping them in the sink. "Not a chance – you just gave us this house, we're not moving again just to have a free nanny."

"A free auntie," I say, getting up and moving around the table to say goodbye to Roger and Jesse. "Which is much better. Bye baby Jesse! See you soon!" I leaning down to kiss my baby nephew while Roger holds him safe in his arms.

"Ella," Cora says, frowning as she holds up my undrunk mimosa, which she has found still sitting by the sink. "

Why didn't you drink this?"

At the same moment, just as I'm standing up straight, Roger suddenly grabs my wrist, his eyes flaring wide as he looks up at me. "Wait a second..." he says, his voice suspicious.

I go still, my eyes flicking to Cora, who looks at me in confusion, and then to Sinclair, who starts to grin at me a little bit, shaking his head as he stands with Rafe in his arms.

"Ella," Roger says, slowly turning my wrist over and giving it a long sniff. " Oh my god!" he gasps, staring up at me in sudden delight. "You are! You totally are! How did I miss this!?"

"Miss what?" Cora asks, her eyes flicking around at us.

"You were distracted," Sinclair says, laughing and shrugging.

"Miss what!?" Cora demands again, standing up straight. But then her eyes go wide as she looks at the undrunk mimosa in her hand. "Oh my god!" she gasps.

"Well," I say, turning to grin at my mate. "Secret's out now, isn't it?"

Chapter 483 – A Small Gathering

Ella

It takes us longer than I know Sinclair would prefer to get out of Roger and Cora's house that morning, mostly because Cora spent so much time freaking out, hugging me, and scolding me for not telling her immediately. But in the end they let us go, Cora wiping her eyes and Roger giving us a big smile, baby Jesse asleep in his arms.

I hold Sinclair's hand the whole ride home, squeezing it, so happy and excited. We're just so blessed right now, and I'm doing everything I can to bask in that glow. My mate, my baby boy, my baby girl on the way?

What more could I ask for?

When we get back into the palace, Sinclair walks me back to our suite of rooms, though I can tell his mind is already on other things.

"You can go," I say, balancing my little meatball Rafe against my elbow while I give Sinclair a little shove on the shoulder. "You don't have to walk me back into the rooms – I'm already inside our house!"

"Indulge me, Ella," he says, giving me a little glancing smile as he pushes open our door and holds it open for me. "I can feel my instincts kicking in already – I'm not going to want to leave your side for the next six months."

"Oh sure," I say, rolling my eyes at him and carrying the baby over to his changing station. "Like overprotective pregnancy Alpha is so different from overprotective new dad Alpha."

"It is different," he says, smirking at me as he leans against the wall, watching me make quick work of Rafe's dirty diaper, our little baby happily babbling as I do. "Or at least, it feels different to me."

"Well, whatever keeps you eagerly at my side," I say, smiling at him with a wink.

"What about you?" he asks, raising his chin towards me. "Are you feeling any different yet? I feel almost bad, honestly – you barely got finished breastfeeding. You didn't even get to do any of the fun non-pregnant things, like shots of tequila. Or a whole lot of sushi."

"That's okay," I say with a sigh, snapping Rafe's onesie shut and lifting him back up into my arms, where he squeals and reaches for me, grabbing fistfuls of my hair. "I'll just take a raincheck on those," I say, stepping close to my mate and letting him wrap me in my arms. "After this next one is born and ready for solid foods, you owe me two children's worth of debauchery.”

“Done,” he says, smirking and cupping my face in his hands, planting a little kiss on my mouth. “Except, knowing you, you’ll probably be planning baby 3.”

“We’ll see,” I say, giving a happy little sigh. “But do you know? There is one thing that I’m particularly excited about.”

“What is it?” he asks, genuinely curious.

I break into a broad smile and turn towards the bed, striding to it as Rafe gives an excited little giggle. “The re- establishment of the nest!” I say, throwing one hand in the air. Sinclair bursts into laughter as I start tugging at the blankets, arranging them into a comfortable circle that looks incredibly cozy. Honestly, I want to climb in right now.

“This is going to be the second version of the nest,” Sinclair comments, and I can tell by his happy tone that he’s pleased. “Next 2.0. Are you planning innovations? Improvements?”

“Well, it’s a Queen’s nest now,” I say, sinking happily down onto my bed, taking Rafe with me. “And it has to accommodate a Prince as well as a growing Princess,” I say, grinning at my son. “So yeah, I’m going to need some funds,” I continue with a sigh, looking seriously up at my mate. “Like, five to ten thousand dollars?”

“For pillows?” he protests, laughing.

“Oh no,” I say, grinning. “That’s just the blanket budget, and the snacks. The pillows are going to be extra.”

He shakes his head at me, still laughing, but comes over and again takes my face in his hands. “Whatever you want,” he says, smiling.

“Exactly what I like to hear. Do you have to go?” I ask, a little mournful. I mean, I just made this nest, and it does look so cozy...

“Yes,” he murmurs, leaning down to press another kiss to my mouth. “But I’ll be back to help you christen the nest later.” He sighs and steps away, handing me a tablet off the bedside table. “Order whatever you want, but please, Ella, try not to bankrupt us.”

“No promises!” I sing, leaning back against the pillows and settling Rafe in next to me as Sinclair laughs and heads for the door. “Come on, baby,” I sigh as I start to click through the tablet, Rafe starting to crawl around in the blankets next to me. “Let’s start by ordering you and Sissy some matching outfits...we’ll get some for baby Jesse too...”

Two Weeks Later

“Cora!” I call into our little closet. “Is he ready!? Let’s go!”

“It’s my party, Ella!” Cora calls back, though I can hear her laughter.

“I knowww,” I whine, a tuxedoed Rafe sitting calmly on my hip. He also looking curiously towards the closet where Cora and getting Jesse dressed in his own little tuxedo. Jesse’s two weeks old now, and just the cutest baby in the world – Rafe excepted, of course – and I can’t wait to see how he looks in the matching tuxedo I got him.

“You know it’s ridiculous, Ella,” Cora says, coming out of the closet finally with her happy little boy, who is all smiles pretty much all the time. I squeal when I see him, just barely able to hold his little bald head up. “He’s just going to barf all over it, plus he’s only going to wear it for an hour! He has to be naked when you present him to mom.”

“It will be the most elegant barf!” I laugh, hurrying close and tickling Jesse’s fancy little belly. “And I don’t care if he wears it for an hour or a minute, it was too cute to resist.” I laugh, completely undone by the sight of Cora’s and Jesse, all dressed up. Rafe babbles happily and reaches forward, trying to touch Jesse, which he always does. I grin when I see it, as I always do these little boys, they really do have a bond already. Rafe gets so excited whenever Jesse comes into a room.

Jesse, even though I don’t think he really understands what’s going on, smiles when he hears Rafe and gives a happy laugh.

“Your guests are gathered,” Roger calls from the door to the living room, raising an eyebrow in our direction. “Are you going to come out here, or just hide in here with the kids all night?”

“We’re coming,” Cora calls, rolling her eyes at him and pretending to be exasperated even though I know she’s not. “Sorry you had to entertain guests for like, ten seconds alone, Roger.”

“It was absolute torture,” he says, crossing the room to us, a half-drunk glass of champagne in his hand. “Why do you think I came in here? I missed my buddies.”

Rafe gurgles and waves to Roger, which makes me burst into a happy, proud smile. He hasn’t said any words yet, but he’s getting there.

“Ohhh, you’re looking very dapper,” Roger says, bending down to peer at his son. “The Goddess will be very impressed, I’m sure.”

“How could she not be,” Cora says, smoothing down the very little bit of hair that Jesse has on his head. "He's very perfect."

"Yes, he is," I say, laughing a little as Roger slips an arm around Cora's waist and we together head for the door. " And very excited for his baptism, I know."

"We all are," Cora says, grinning at me. And in this moment I know she's remembering Rafe's baptism, and her own experiences there.

But this time? It's my turn. Because I'm the godmother, and I'm the one who gets treated to a little insight into baby Jesse's future world.

And I absolutely can't wait to see what's in store for him.

Chapter 484 – Jesse’s Baptism

Ella

A few hours later our entire party is gathered in the forest close to midnight, sipping champagne and mingling quietly as we wait for the hour to be right for Jesse’s baptism. We have a priestess here as well, of course, though this one is much more thoroughly vetted than the last.

I’m in incredibly good spirits as I look around at our party of loved-ones, truly enjoying my night, but when my eyes fall on Cora I see that she’s gnawing her lip a bit with anxiety.

“Oh, Cors,” I sigh, reaching out and putting a hand on her shoulder. I glance over at where Roger is standing a few feet away next to Henry with the baby in his arms, both of them talking with Sinclair, who has a sleeping Rafe held tight against his shoulder. “It will be all right!”

“I know it will,” she sighs, twisting her hands together and speaking softly to me. “And that even if it’s not, it’s not like I can change anything, you know?”

“I know,” I say, remembering how anxious I was at Rafe’s baptism. “But mom she can’t have anything really bad in store for him. It’s going to be all good things!”

“Oh, come on, Ella,” Cora says, shooting me a little glare. “It’s not like mom gave us the easy road just because we’re her daughters. We grew up in an orphanage. We had dark priests stalking us our whole lives.”

“But we had each other!”

“I just want my baby to have a good life,” she sighs, looking anxiously up at the sky, almost as if she can bully our mom into giving her baby a blessing if she glares at the moon enough. “It tortures me to think that he’s going to have to go through...half of what we did.”

“He’s going to have ups and downs, like the rest of us,” I say, wrapping my arms around my sister. “You can’t spare him from that.”

“Yes, I can,” she growls. “I’ll just... lock him in a very comfortable little basement. Very safe, very cozy.”

I laugh and shake my head at her. “Your baby is going to have a big life, Cora,” I say, giving her a squeeze.

“Yeah well, we’ll see how cheerful you are six months from now,” she says, reaching out to trail a little finger down my baby bump. I grin as I look down at it, tapping on my little bond with babygirl to say hello. But she's sleeping or something at the moment and doesn't reply, which is fine. I'm distracted anyway, and I like to give her my full attention when she nudges the bond.

"I know," I sigh, happy but knowing that Cora's right. "I'll be a mess then, I'm sure."

My pregnancy thus far has gone really well. In many ways it's not that different from my first two weeks with Rafe, except with significantly less drama in my personal life. And while I treasured every single moment I was pregnant with Rafe, this pregnancy? Well, it's kind of been a dream – the kind of pregnancy I used to fantasize about. Safe, comfortable, sharing the experience with my little family?

I'm so grateful to have gotten here.

But still, tonight is about Jesse – and as much as I could gush about my pregnancy for days, I want to focus on him.

"The hour grows close!" the priestess calls an old woman this time, dressed in the silvery-white robes of the goddess. She gives us a warm, motherly smile and holds out her hands.

"Go time," I say, slipping my arm to Cora's waist and walking forward with her. Our mates meet us there in front of the goddess, and Henry draws close as well. Our guests gather around, everyone quieting now so they can hear the words.

Cora reaches to take Jesse from Roger's arms and Roger hands him over readily. I dip my head and give Rafe a little kiss on his sleeping cheek before Sinclair hands our baby over to Henry for safekeeping while we're in the forest.

"I'll keep him warm and safe," Henry says, giving us a wink. "Enjoy yourselves."

"We will," Sinclair assures him, running a hand over Rafe's dark head before turning back to the priestess.

"I can't believe you're going to take my little baby into the forest without me," Cora whispers, her voice breaking a little. "I haven't been away from him in...ever..."

"It'll be fifteen minutes," I say, laughing and touching my sister gently on the cheek, even though I remember precisely what she's feeling. I feel emotion stirring in me as well, the product of the special day combined with my memories, combined with my love for our growing little family.

I take a deep breath and sniff, turning towards the priestess.

"You can't start crying already," Sinclair murmurs, his hand warm on my back.

"I can do whatever I want," I mumble back, laughing a little. "I'm a Queen."

He laughs with me, but we turn our attention to the priestess, who reaches out her arms for Jesse. Cora gives a half-hearted little sigh, but passes him over, making many of our gathered friends laugh a little in understanding.

The priestess smiles down at the wide-awake little Jesse, who looks like he peers back at her curiously, seeming to understand, somehow, that it's an important day.

"Who presents this child for dedication?" the priestess says, smiling at the four of us.

"We do," Roger replies, his voice steady and more serious than it usually is. "His mother and I."

The priestess nods, and I smile, recognizing the words and the process from Rafe's ceremony. "And who will carry him to meet the Goddess?"

"We will," Sinclair answers, nodding down at me. "Ella and Dominic Sinclair, his godparents."

The priestess smiles at us and bids us to take the baby, giving us instructions that are more ceremonial than anything else. After all, Sinclair and I know what to do, even if we haven't done it before. Together we step forward, and Sinclair takes baby Jesse in his arms. I loop my arm through his elbow, take one last look over my shoulder at Cora, and then together my mate and I carry our nephew into the darkness of the forest.

We walk for what feels like...too long.

"Is it supposed to be this far?" I ask, peering into the darkness for the pool that's supposed to appear ahead.

"I don't know," Sinclair says, his voice perfectly calm. "It's a magical forest, Ella. Maybe it takes everyone a different amount of time to get to the pool."

"What!?" I hiss, looking around suddenly. "I thought it was just...the woods!"

He laughs, giving me a glance before turning his eyes back to Jesse, shifting the baby in his arms so that he can look around. "Look how interested Jesse is," he laughs. "Maybe it's taking a while because Jesse's having a good time. Maybe he wants it to take longer."

“Well, hurry it up, little baby,” I say, giving Jesse a little poke in the belly that makes him smile. “Auntie’s wearing heels, and her feet hurt in this rough terrain.” Jesse’s just wrapped in a little swaddling blanket now, but Sinclair is right – he’s very cheerful and interested, though I don’t think his eyes can actually see much.

Almost as if on cue, a light suddenly appears ahead of us in the forest pretty silver haze.
a

“Looks like it worked,” Sinclair murmurs, reaching out to take my hand. I press my palm to his, giving it a squeeze.

“Good job, baby,” I say, smiling and Jesse. And then the three of us together move forward, ready to introduce him to his grandmother and get a little hint about his fate.

Chapter 485 – The Goddess' Light

The pool we approach is wide and expansive – more of a large pond, or even a lake, really, shining below the open sky. I tilt my head curiously at I look at it, remembering Cora describing the pool as small and well tucked away in the forest. This one...

Well. Maybe it's different every time, for every child, every pair of godparents. I look up at the moon and smile, thinking fondly of my mother and all the blessings she's given us. And also how she can sometimes be...a little bit tricky.

"Ready?" Sinclair murmurs.

"Almost," I quip, stepping close to him and lifting myself up on my toes, tilting my chin up for a kiss. He smiles and bends his head, pressing his mouth briefly to mine.

"Ready now," I say, grinning at him.

Sinclair takes a moment to look at me in the moonlight, running a hand over the length of my loose hair, and then we step forward to the edge of the pool.

"Goddess," he murmurs, not bothering to raise his voice – he knows she can hear him. "We bring to you, tonight, this child our nephew Jesse. So that he may begin to know you."

"We wish to show him your light," I say, repeating the words that Henry taught me as part of the ritual, a little shiver running down my spine as I do. "And in doing so, let you see him and bring him into the spirit of your grace."

I smile as the light reflecting off the pool grows brighter, insubstantially at first but bolder as the moments pass. Mom – she's here, and she's ready to meet Jesse.

"Here you go, baby," Sinclair murmurs, holding Jesse out so that I can reach over and quickly untuck his swaddling. Then, with the baby safe in my mate's broad hands, Sinclair and I step forward to hold Jesse out over the pool, basking in the light of the moon.

I smile as I look down at Jesse, as the moonlight pools over him. He kicks his little feet and fusses for a moment, frowning a bit up at the sky before giving a little laugh. I can't keep myself from laughing a little bit too, smiling down at my spunky little nephew, loving him so much already.

"He is called Jesse Sinclair," my mate says, his voice a little choked. I glance up to see him gazing at the baby too, his first nephew, the child of his brother and best friend. "His parents, Cora and Roger, have asked us to bring him here to dedicate him to you. We do so in their name."

I grin, tucking myself close to my mate's side, a thrill running through me. How many babies have been dedicated to the Goddess with these words, been welcomed into wolf culture? How many more will we, my little family, get to bring into the fold?

But there's no time to ponder these questions, because as I gaze at the baby something begins to stir in the air beyond him.

"Oh," I breathe, my eyes going wide. And then I take a deep breath, and am swept away in the vision that my mother gives us, the hint of the fate that she's built for him.

My heart seizes as the first images fly by – a happy childhood, a handsome little boy, full of laughter and pranks. And by his side at almost every moment is another little boy – dark haired, always a little taller, always laughing and shouting at his cousin's side. Rafe – Rafe! Happy, and healthy, and Jesse's best friend, as I always dreamed they'd be.

The urge grows in me to reach out and seize each of the moments as they fly past a camping trip, gathered around the fire with Roger and Sinclair, slightly older but so happy – a birthday party with Jesse's face brightly lit by eight candles

I want to grab each moment of the vision, to study them each independently, to get the details in full

But tears slip down my cheeks as I give in to the experience, knowing that this – like life – will fly by, and if I spend my time trying to hold onto the pieces I'll miss it completely.

And so I watch, and my joy deepens when I start to realize that next to Jesse and Rafe, in every vision as they grow older, there's a little girl too.

A little girl with a heart-shaped face and rose gold hair – between her brother and her cousin at all times, laughing with them, fully engaged with their games and antics –

And then a vision comes of the three of them, draped over the pillows of a couch, fully exhausted with their arms and legs thrown over each other like exhausted puppies, sleeping wherever they landed

And though there's no real proof of it, I know she's mine – the little baby growing in my stomach right now. She's there, and she's every bit as much a part of their little group as I hoped she'd be –

Jesse – he has a rich friendship with his cousins, and the three of them... they're a matched set.

I wipe at my face, hardly able to see through the blurr of my tears but eager to do so because there's more

The three – they're older now, much older, in their early twenties, all dressed in black and gathered around a fire somewhere, in a room with stone walls that looks out over a dark landscape. They're chatting and laughing, their cheeks ruddy and healthy, tired but happy. Jesse – he's so tall and he looks just like Roger, with Cora's warm brown eyes. He laughs easily, tossing a cashew at Rafe who

God, I almost sob to see it – but who looks like Sinclair's double

And our little girl! She's there too! I shake my head at...at how much she looks like me

The three, they're a team, and wherever they are, they're there together. I shake my head, not understanding, because they certainly don't look like they're at college, not dressed like that. But wherever they are ...well, they're happy, and they're together, and it's more than I could ask for.

The vision fades, replaced by the next, and Jesse is alone. The laughter is gone from his face, replaced with determination. He moves through a darkness flecked with stars – a darkness which feels...palpable, and as I watch, I see him grab the darkness, shifting it, moving through it like...like he's pushing silk in water...

And then, when he steps out?

I gasp, because...it's...god, it looks for all things like a different world, a world wrapped in darkness. He looks up into the sky and I blink to see that there is no moon. Not merely a night without a moon but...an...an absence there that I can feel. He bares his teeth, and pulls a dagger from his hip, and storms forward

I blink then, because – because –

The vision fades. There's nothing else.

"That can't be it," I breathe, my voice frantic. I whip my head up to my mate, whose face is likewise pale. "That can't be it! He – we need to know! He has to come back!"

Sinclair looks at me and shakes his head – he just doesn't know, it's a mystery –

"That can't be it!" I shout, suddenly livid, and I stumble forward, my feet sinking into the pool as I spin and glare up at the moon.

"Ella!" Sinclair shouts, reaching for me.

"You can't leave it like that!" I shout up at the moon. "You can't send me back to my sister with that as your final image! I won't go!"

"Ella please," Sinclair shouts, seeing me stumble and almost lose my balance as my shoes sink into the mud at the bottom of the silver pool.

"I'm not going!" I shout, waving a hand at Sinclair but not taking my eyes off the moon!
"You owe us more than this!"

And as I glare up into the sky, soft words float to my ears – barely audible words, kissed by starlight.

Chapter 486 – Mothers and Fathers

Ella

“Ella, you can’t just demand

But I glare at Sinclair, slicing my hand through the air and shaking my head as I realize that he can’t hear what I’m hearing.

And the first thing that comes to my ears...

Is a laugh.

“All right, little daughter,” a soft voice says, and I instantly recognize it as my mother. “I stopped there for a reason, but if you get out of my pool, I’ll give you one more.”

I narrow my eyes at the moon but do as the Goddess bids, stepping out of the pool.

“I ended there because I do not know the outcome,” she says, her voice sorrowful. “His mission will be...his own. But, I do know this...”

And I reach out and put a hand on Sinclair’s arm, very tense. I gasp a little as a new vision forms very fleeting, very brief –

But in it, Jesse is an old, old man wrinkles crinkle around his eyes as he smiles down at a child in his arms

His grandchild, or maybe his great- grandchild or maybe not a child of his blood at all, but certainly one he loves very, very much –

It’s gone as soon as it comes, but it’s enough.

Jesse – he lives. And it’s enough.

“Thank you,” I breathe, my eyes turned up now towards the sky, the tension falling from my shoulders. ”

Thank you.”

“Trust them,” the Goddess says, her words even fainter now than they were before. “Even if you don’t trust this world, or me, trust them.”

And I nod, understanding, committing to it.

And suddenly, whatever magic was here lifts, and she’s gone.

The light from the pool fades until it's just...a lake, or a pond again.

"What...what just happened?" Sinclair asks, staring down at me with wide eyes.

"Did you see?" I ask, desperate to know.

"See what?" he asks, shaking his head at me. "See you plunge into the pond yelling at the sky like a literal lunatic!?"

"See the last vision!" I explain, and when he continues to stare at me I let out a deep breath. "Okay. Guess that one was just for me."

"She showed you more!?"

I nod slowly. "She knew I was upset when the vision ended with Jesse in darkness. So, she showed me him as an old man, holding a tiny child."

My mate scowls at me and then glances up at the moon, as if he wants to get mad now but he's a little too scared of her for blasphemy. "Well, that hardly seems fair," he murmurs. "Why do you get extra visions?"

"Well, you," I say, pointing down at his shoes, "have warm dry feet. So. Fair trade."

He laughs at me almost despite himself, shaking his head as he wraps Jesse up tightly in his blanket. The baby's face is peaceful now, his eyes starting to drift shut. "Leave it to you, trouble," he murmurs, "to bully the Goddess into showing you extra magical visions."

"I'm his godmother," I say, grinning and taking the baby from Sinclair's arms when he offers him to me, probably knowing that I'm upset and want to hold the baby close. "If I'm not going to bully a diety for him, who is?"

"I'll leave it to you," Sinclair sighs, wrapping a warm arm around my shoulders. "Come on. Let's go get you into some warm socks."

About an hour later, Sinclair makes good on his promise and comes out of Cora and Roger's closet, tossing a pair of fluffy socks onto my lap.

"All right, Ella," Cora says, frowning down at me with her baby in her arms, "spill."

"I told you," I say on a sigh, "it's not bad."

But, of course, she doesn't believe me. Cora took one look at the wet hem of my gown, my ruined shoes, and Sinclair's pale face when we came out of the forest and went totally still. We tried to put on a good show, ensuring the group of all the wonderful things we saw which is true! – but Cora didn't say much at all, ushering everyone into the waiting vans so that we could all get back to the house as fast as possible.

She's a polite hostess of course, and she made sure that everyone was happily settled in the house with food and drink so Jesse's celebration could continue, but I could tell: the entire time, she just wanted to get us alone so that she could get the full details.

Roger is just as worried, though he's doing a bit better playing it off.

"They said it's all right, Cora," he says, putting a hand on her shoulders. "

They wouldn't say that if it wasn't true." He looks between us now, a desperate hope in his eyes.

"We wouldn't," Sinclair assures him.

"They would," Cora snaps, glaring at Sinclair and me. "They would say whatever polite nonsense they could until they got us alone and then they would break the news to us! So!" she's almost shaking with her anxiety now as I finish pulling the warm socks over my feet. "Spill! Please!"

"Cora," I murmur, reaching for her, and my sister lets me pull her down onto the bed. I wrap my arms around her shoulders and she bursts into tears. "No, Cora, really – it's all right!"

"Is it?" she gasps. "Then why are you all wet – why did Dominic look like that when he came out of the forest!? What went wrong?"

"I'll tell you everything," I murmur, rocking my sister back and forth. "But first I need you to tell me how much you want to know."

"What?" she gasps, pulling back and looking at me.

"It's the same choice you gave me," I say quietly, looking between her and Roger, "at Rafe's baptism. You said there were some details that perhaps a mother shouldn't know – but that it all turned out right. Well, the same thing is true here – it really does all turn out right, Cora. The Goddess – she showed me a vision of Jesse very old, very happy – he lives a long life."

Cora lets out a long, shaking breath, and then her shoulders begin to tremble as she tucks her head down against her baby and starts to cry tears of relief.

“Cora,” Roger says, his voice breaking on her name. I take my arms from around her shoulders so Roger can take my place, and he sits next to her on the bed, pulling her and the baby into his lap and holding them tight against him. Sinclair comes and stands next to me and I lean against his side, resting my head against his muscled stomach. Very suddenly I want to be holding Rafe but he’s downstairs with Henry, because I knew Cora would need my whole attention for this.

I sigh, denying myself the impulse to run down and get him. My sister needs me more.

We stay like this for a long few moments while Cora catches herself. Then, when she’s ready, she lifts her head and looks into Roger’s eyes. He nods steadily to her.

“Whatever you want, Cora,” he murmurs.

Cora turns her eyes to me and nods, finally ready to know.

Chapter 487 – A Powerful Gift

Ella

Cora wipes at her face with the palms of her hands. “I’m sorry,” she says. “I just...I kind of flipped out.”

“The vision wasn’t bad,” I say, “I promise it wasn’t. And we get it – if you came out of the baptism ceremony looking like you’d jumped into the pool? I’d have freaked out too!”

“Yeah, well,” she murmurs, glancing down at my stomach, “maybe I’ll just do that out of spite in six months, see how you like it.”

I laugh then, the noise surprising me, and Cora’s face breaks into a tentative smile.

“There’s my girl,” Roger murmurs, lifting a hand to wipe at the last of her tears.

“I think we need to hear all of it,” Cora says, nodding to Sinclair and then to me. “Please. Just...maybe just for this baby, our first.”

“Okay,” I whisper, nodding. And then Sinclair and I tell her all of it – of all the wonderful things we saw for Rafe as he grows up, and his happiness with his cousins. And then we tell of the darkness we saw, and the incredible way he moved through it – of the challenge clearly laid out for him in his future.

“Wow,” Roger says, a little baffled as he looks down at his baby. “I have...I have no way of really comprehending what any of that means,” he murmurs.

“It was difficult to know what we were seeing,” Sinclair replies, looking down at me for confirmation. I nod. “Then, Ella got really pissed. That’s when she jumped into the pool.”

“What?!” Cora gasps.

I give a shrug. “I wasn’t going to let her end the vision there. So...we kind of got into a fight, and then she gave me the last image – of Jesse old and happy, so that I’d go away.”

Cora bursts into laughter then, looking down at her little baby. “We chose the right godmother for you, baby,” she sighs. “Always getting her money’s worth.”

“Damn straight,” I say looking up at Sinclair with a very clear told-you-so expression on my face. “Only the full baptism experience for my baby nephew.”

“So, what do you think it means?” Roger asks, looking between us.

"I don't know," I reply, resting my hand on my chin and gazing at the baby, wondering about his very strange and very interesting future. "He's going to be very close with Rafe and with the new baby girl. And the way he handled a dagger, and the way he was dressed – I think he's going to be a warrior."

"That fits," Cora sighs, looking up at me with a little guilt in her eyes. "We saw Rafe was going to be a warrior too. So, at least they'll have each other."

A little anxiety turns in me at that, but I just nod, tucking the information away. I mean, considering who his dad is? I can't say that I'm surprised. But I can think about how I feel about it another day.

"I think it's more than that, though," I murmur. "Something mom said"

"Wait, what?" Sinclair says, breaking in and stepping away from me a little, looking down at me. "She spoke?"

"Oh yeah," I say, giving a little apologetic laugh and a shrug. "I forgot you didn't hear her. My bad."

"Your bad!?" he says, appalled.

"Yes, my bad!" I return, rolling my eyes and brushing a hand through the air at him, dismissive. I turn my eyes back to Cora. "Mom said that Jesse's mission will be his own and that she doesn't know the outcome. But honestly, Cora, he seemed...very capable. And very powerful."

I look up at Sinclair, wondering if he felt the same. He sighs as he looks at me and then turns to nod to his brother and my sister. "That was the impression that I got too. That whatever gift the Goddess gave to him... it's a powerful one."

Cora and Roger are quiet for a long moment, shifting their gaze to their little boy. Sinclair and I sit quietly, letting them process their thoughts.

"You know," Roger says quietly, thoughtful. "If you'd asked me before he was born if I wanted him to have a weird, cool, powerful gift, I'd have said hell yeah. But now that he's here? And he's so...tiny?" Roger takes a deep breath that breaks my heart a little bit, shaking his head as he stares at his son. "I wish his gift was something stupid, like... being really, really good at bowling. Or just being magically kickass at Scrabble."

"He's going to get that from me anyway," Cora murmurs, smirking a little, and I bite my lip to see the humor returning to these two. Because if they're joking about it...I think it means that they're strong enough to get through it.

“The last thing mom said to me,” I say quietly, and Cora’s eyes flash up to me with a little bit of dread in them – like she doesn’t want any more information tonight –

I laugh and shake my head. “No, it’s good!” I say, putting up a hand. “She said to trust them,” I continue, nodding. “Trust our kids. And it felt very true – I mean, we’re all aware that we’re not bringing kids into an easy life. They’re born into responsibilities. We have to raise them to be strong, and then when they’re grown? We have to trust them to handle themselves in the world.”

Sinclair nods slowly, agreeing with me. “And I don’t think the Goddess would have given Jesse a powerful gift if she didn’t think he could handle it,” he says softly, putting a hand on my shoulder. “I don’t think she’s in the business of screwing over her grandkids.”

Cora sighs, nodding too. “Just giving her daughters extreme anxiety,” she mutters, sighing and running a hand over Jesse’s sleeping heads.

“I think that’s probably all moms,” I say, standing up and leaning against my mate, who pulls me tight against him. “But...I mean, I think it’s going to turn out okay.”

“Why do you say that?” Cora asks, looking up at me again, I think hoping for another little hint from mom, who of course knows more than we do.

“I just have faith,” I say, letting my lips turn up into a smile. “These kids – they’re going to be good eggs and we’re going to love them a lot. If they end up with the fate of the world in their hands?” I look up at my mate and shrug. “Then I think the world’s got a pretty good shot.”

Sinclair smiles at me, leaning down to give me a little kiss before we turn back to Cora and Roger.

“You guys coming downstairs?” I ask, nodding towards the door, eager to get to Rafe and give him a snuggle and whisper to him how loved he is if he can’t hear me. even

“In a minute,” Cora replies, giving me a tentative smile that has a great deal of warmth behind it. Because even if she is still spooked a bit – I know she agrees with me. Our kids are going to be great – we just have to have faith in them.

“We’ll be waiting,” Sinclair says, giving them a steady nod, and together we let the new parents have a minute alone with their son.

Chapter 488 – Cozy Little Nest

Ella

“Kinda wish I knew what Rafe’s power is going to be now,” I murmur as we lift Rafe’s carrier out of the car early the next morning.

Cora and Roger stayed up in their room for a few more minutes, but they came downstairs much more cheerful and ready to celebrate. I watched them carefully a long time, checking to see if they were just putting on good faces for their guests – but honestly? From everything I could see, they really decided to embrace the good news the Goddess gave them.

It was a wonderful night and a brilliant morning.

But now? Now I want to go to sleep.

“I already know what his gift is,” Sinclair says, slinging an arm around my shoulders as we start into the palace.

“You do?” I gasp, looking up into his face. But then I scowl when I see his smirk and realize that he’s kidding. “Oh, you liar.”

“No really,” he says, raising his eyebrows at me. “His goddess-given power is just... handsome.”

“What!?” I squeak, a little aghast, my mouth falling open at this ridiculous idea.

“Come on!” Sinclair says, laughing and grinning down at me. “Look how good looking this kid is!” he continues, gesturing down at our son in his carrier, who is sleeping with a little bit of drool dribbling out the side of his mouth.

“Oh my god,” I groan, speeding up my steps and attempting to move ahead of my ridiculous mate.

“I’m serious!” Sinclair pushes, laughing, easily catching up to me with his long legs. “Didn’t you see him in that vision, all grown up? He is a handsome guy – it’s got to be his power.”

“Stop flattering yourself, Dominic,” I mutter, stepping into our elevator and jabbing the up button with my thumb. “He looked just like you.”

“Precisely my point!” Sinclair says, wrapping my arm around my waist and tugging me close against his side as the elevator begins to raise, “he’s going to bring nations to their knees with just his smoldering gaze – ”

“Cover your ears, baby!” I call to Rafe, rolling my eyes at Sinclair. “Your dad is going to raise you to be vain and overly pleased with yourself -”

“I want the child to know the full extent of his power! He has to be prepared! He, too, is going to have demigoddesses just falling all over him

I can't help it at this – I burst out laughing. “Stop it!” I gasp, smacking Sinclair on the chest. “We're trying to raise a nice boy – not an egomaniac!”

“But you're not saying that I'm wrong,” my mate says, smirking and cupping my face in his gigantic hand.

“Well, I don't think it's his gift,” I say, narrowing my eyes at him as the doors open. I bite my lip though. “But he really was handsome, wasn't he? In the vision.”

“I'm telling you, Ella,” Sinclair says, grinning at me as we step into our hall. “If it's not a gift it's a curse. He's going to have to keep a fly swatter at his side all the time to keep the girls off him – ”

I burst out laughing again at the mental image, leaning hard against my mate as my cheeks and my side begin to ache. We pass a few staff in the hallway who smile happily at us as we make our way down the hall to our door. Sinclair opens it, pressing a warm hand to my back as I head inside.

“Honestly,” I say with a happy sigh, looking down at our kid, “I think maybe his Goddess gift is...sleeping soundly. Through everything.”

“He's just used to his loud mom,” Sinclair sighs, dropping a kiss on my cheek before I crouch down to lift the baby out of his carrier.

“Don't you listen to anything daddy says,” I murmur to my sweet, floppy little baby as I gather him up in my arms. “He is a big ugly liar tonight -”

“I'm not ugly!” he calls from the closet, because of course his alpha hearing caught my private conversation with my son.

“He is,” I whisper, grinning at Rafe as I tuck him against my shoulder and stand to carry him into the closet, intent on getting him changed into some pajamas. “And whatever he says, you get your good looks from me.”

“Well, that I won't contest,” Sinclair says, grabbing me to his half-naked body the moment I step through the door.

“Wise man,” I say, lifting myself on my toes for a kiss. Sinclair gives it to me a long, lingering one, and then he pats me on the ass before reaching for some pajama pants.

There's a happy little silence in the closet then as we all get ready for bed even though it's about seven in the morning. These baptisms – they're exhausting, but there's something nice about having an entire day of rest afterwards. Like the baby's big day gives us all a little respite to sit back and think about our world, our lives.

When we're all ready, Sinclair and I give Rafe a kiss and then tuck him into his little crib. I sigh after I put him down, crossing my arms over my chest. “Maybe we should take him into the nest tonight,” I murmur. “Keep him close while we can.”

“You can't sleep with them every night,” Sinclair says softly, leaning in to kiss me on the side of my head, just above my ear.

“You just try to stop me,” I growl. “Maybe I'll gather all the children with us in bed until they're sixty – ”

“That's a bad idea,” my mate says, wrapping his arms around me and walking backwards towards the bed, tugging me with him so that we both fall back onto the mattress together.” You'll traumatize them.”

“Fine,” I sigh, curling up with my mate in my fresh, cozy nest. “Just until they're twenty, then.”

“Okay,” he agrees, tucking his head down against my shoulder and playing with my hair with one hand, the other moving down my side to caress my little baby bump. “How's this one doing?”

“I think she's okay,” I say, sighing happily. And then I bite my lip, turning my mind fully to my daughter for the first real time tonight. “It was amazing to see her too, wasn't it?”

“It was,” he murmurs. “What a gift it was to be Jesse's godparent.”

“She's so pretty,” I whisper, my voice squeaking a little in excitement.

“She looks just like you,” Sinclair whispers, laughing.

“I know,” I say, giggling. “Just think she'll have Kings falling at her feet, nations collapsing under the weight of her smolder – ”

“Girls don't smolder,” he murmurs, laughing along with me.

“This one will,” I sigh, putting my hand on top of his on my stomach. “I think she's going to be really special, Dominic," I whisper.

"I think so too," he whispers back. And I smile, and snuggle up against my mate, and wrapped up warm in each other's arms we fall asleep.

I'm my wolf in my dreams this morning, running breathless through the forest, the wind rippling through my hair. I toss my head back, sprinting for the joy of it. Sinclair is by my side, his own gigantic wolf keeping easy pace with me, and I nip at his side, teasing him, urging him faster.

He snaps his teeth at me playfully and obeys, speeding up to pass me, and at his heels is a little brown pup – yipping his joy as he chases his father's tail. I laugh inwardly, joy racing through my heart, watching Rafe and Sinclair go.

But I don't chase after them, because pressed close to my own side is my little charge. She's just barely there half visible, half substantial in the morning light that filters through the trees. But I can feel her – in my heart and down my bond. My own little twin, a little rose-gold pup, who raises her snout to the sky and howls for joy.

I dip my snout, and give her a quick lick across the head, and she peers up at me with eyes so happy they squint.

And then I run, with my daughter by my side, all morning long.

Chapter 489 – Time Grows Short

Five and a Half Months Later

Ella

There's a strange atmosphere in the palace today and I admit that I don't quite know how to feel, because everything is half dread and half excited anticipation.

At least, that's how it is for everyone else.

For me? For me it's just a great deal of discomfort.

"Ella," Cora scolds as I try to bend over and pick up one of Rafe's socks from the floor. "Let me do that –"

"I can do it!" I gasp, reaching for it –

But then I stumble and almost fall over, and Cora catches me by the shoulders.

"Enough!" she snaps, shaking her head at me. "Back to the nest! Stop getting out of it! You're six full months pregnant, Ella – full term! For heaven's sake, if you fall over I'm scared you'll split like a watermelon and just spill the baby out."

"That might be better," I mutter, glaring at the errant sock and doing as my sister says, heading back for my bed. "This baby is big, and I'm not precisely looking forward to pushing her out."

"Well, what did you expect," Cora says, flipping the sock into a hamper and walking behind me to the bed. "You decided to have babies with the most gigantic man I've ever seen."

"First," I say, holding up one finger as I sink down on to my bed and start to tuck my legs under the covers, "I did not choose to have children with that gigantic man, I chose a nice slim sperm donor for my first child –"

"Yeah well, you chose to have the second baby," Cora reminds me, raising an eyebrow at me as she sits down on the edge of the bed.

"And second," I say, choosing to ignore her logic, "Rafe was a little baby. It's not my fault that this one is very content to stay in for as long as she possibly can." I sigh, resting my head back against my pillows and putting my hands on either side of my belly.

"Poor sister," Cora coos, reaching out to stroke my stomach as well. "She'll be here soon enough."

What Cora says is true I've been in pre-labor for a couple of hours now. I'm having mild, irregular contractions which Cora says is unlikely to be Braxton Hicks at this late stage. So, baby girl is coming soon, even if she's taking her time about this as well.

"Remember how crazy it was?" I say softly, my mind turning to the past. "When Rafe was born?"

"I do," she replies. "Do you miss it?"

I peek through my eyelids at her, smirking a bit. "Do I miss almost dying and fearing for my life, having to stop and give birth in a strange palace because the roads to the hospital were blocked?"

She shrugs. "Well, do you?"

"Maybe a little," I murmur, and then I laugh, shaking my head. "It was all very exciting. Poor baby girl needs a fuss too."

"We'll give her plenty of fuss," Cora says, running her hand comfortingly across my stomach. "Besides, two months from now we get to have her baptism, and then it's Aunt Cora's revenge."

"Cora," I groan. "Honestly, it wasn't so bad -"

"I'm going to come back from it soaked," she says, grinning at me, "covered in mud, with an insane story about your daughter's future -"

"You know," I say, sitting up on my elbows and glaring at her, "you don't have to be her godmother -"

"Oh whatever, Ella," Cora says, rolling her eyes and laughing. "Like you have any other friends."

"I have plenty of friends -" I protest, my mouth falling open, but our completely unserious fight ends abruptly when the door opens and our mates come in, our sons in their arms.

Rafe turns in Sinclair's arms and gives a happy little cry when he sees me. "Mama!" he calls, raising his hands above his head and then leaning over, reaching for me.

"Whoa, kid," Sinclair says, laughing and catching Rafe before he hurl himself to the floor in his eagerness to get to me. When they're about halfway across the room, Sinclair puts Rafe on his feet and he totters over to the bed, absolutely breaking my heart with how cute he is.

“Hey, Rafey!” I call, reaching out for him. He bangs into the side of the bed and giggles, reaching for me, and Cora obliges him by lifting him up so that he can crawl over to me and cuddle up in my arms.

“God, when did he get so big?” Cora murmurs, shaking her head at Rafe.

“Don’t remind me,” I say with a sigh, tugging my little boy close and giving him a big kiss on the head. He’s one now. I cried the entire day of his birthday. Sinclair was honestly a little freaked out.

“He’s a show off,” Roger says, his voice a little bitter as he sits down next to Cora with Jesse in his lap. Sinclair moves to the other side of the bed so he can sit in his spot next to me.

“Roger’s just jealous,” he says, leaning over to kiss me on the cheek. “Because Rafe is faster than Jesse.”

“Jesse’s six months old,” Cora says, rolling her eyes at the dads.

“He could be faster for six months,” Sinclair says dryly, trying to hold his smirk.

“Don’t worry, Jesse,” Roger says fondly to his son, softly petting the silky brown hair that’s started growing on his head. “You’ll beat that meatball someday – you’re lighter and quicker –

I burst out laughing at the ridiculousness of my family, shaking my head at all of them. “I can’t believe you’re debating which kid is going to win a footrace,” I say, “when I’m laying here, in agony – ”

“She’s not in agony,” Cora says, waving a dismissive hand, “not yet at least – ”

“In agony,” I insist, reaching forward to smack her on the arm.

“Sorry, my Queen,” Sinclair sighs, wrapping his arms around me. “But the good news is that everything’s wrapped up for now Roger and I have cleared our calendars, so now there’s nothing to do but concentrate on you.

“Yeah, so you’d better make it fun,” Roger quips. “When Cora was in labor, there were drinks – you’ve got to live up to this, Ella.”

Cora laughs and smacks her mate, shaking her head at him. He flinches and then falls back on the mattress in pretend agony, taking Jesse with him and making the baby laugh, muttering something about an abusive wife and mother.

I laugh at them but turn to put my head on Sinclair's shoulder. "How's it going out there?" I ask. "Everything okay?"

"Nothing for you to worry about," he murmurs.

"I know that," I say quietly, watching him closely. "Doesn't mean I don't want to know. It's my nation too."

Sinclair gives me a sad little smile and presses his forehead to mine. Then he passes a bunch of information down our bond at once, letting me see and feel that the Atalaxians have been pressing their advantage. They're aware that our military is rapidly getting itself together and the Atalaxians losing the leverage they had. It means that everything is going according to plan, but it also means an increase in actual fighting along the front.

"I'm sorry, Dominic," I murmur, putting a hand on his cheek. "I know it's not easy to send people to war."

"Nothing for us to worry about today," he sighs, turning his head and pressing a kiss to my palm. "Today is about you, and the baby."

I nod, agreeing, letting us turn to that better thought instead. It's been harder than I thought it would be, to separate our happy personal life from the trials of war when you're the King and Queen...in so many ways, the two bleed into each other.

But we've been pretty good about celebrating our happy moments when we get them. It's pretty much all we can do.

"I can't believe you haven't named the baby yet," Roger says, interrupting us with a frown. "Didn't you have Rafe named like, from the get-go?"

"We did," I say quietly, running my hand over my stomach. "But he was easy – he told us what he liked."

"With this one, we've got names we like picked out," Sinclair says. "But we've said them to her, like you did with Jesse, and she didn't indicate any standouts."

"So, we're waiting to see what she looks like when she's born. See if something clicks."

"I think that's sweet," Cora says, smiling at me softly. "Very old-school, very human, when so much about these wolf kids is already known before they're born."

“I know,” I say, smiling down at my stomach. “I think it’s kind of cool that she’s so different.”

“Next one we have,” Roger says, laying Jesse out flat on his stomach so that Jesse can practice lifting his head with some tummy time, “we’re just picking the name out of a hat. Keeping it spicy.”

Cora lowers her eyelids a little and shakes her head at me, making me laugh.

But the laughter very quickly ends when another contraction starts. I exhale a long breath, pressing my eyes shut as my body tightens somewhere low within me. It’s not precisely painful yet – but it is intense.

“Time to get the stopwatch ready, daddy,” Cora says, nodding to Sinclair. “I think these are close enough together to start timing them.”

“I’m on it,” Sinclair says, pressing a kiss to my cheek as he hops out of bed. ” And in between, we can put the boys on the floor and use the stopwatch on them, see which one really is faster – ”

“Oh my god,” I mutter, breathing through the pain.

Cora laughs. “We’re not racing the babies while we wait for Ella to go into delivery!” she says, shouting after my mate as he ducks into the closet to find the stopwatch he uses in the gym.

“Oh, baby,” Roger says, sitting up with Jesse in his arms, patting Cora consolingly on the knee. “Yes...yes we are.”

Chapter 490 – Ella Gets Ready

Ella

I take deep breaths, working to breathe through the contraction. Sinclair is seated on the bed next to me, one hand on my lower back, the other clutching my left hand as I squeeze his fingers, hard.

“You’re doing great, Ells,” Cora says, there on my right, coaching me through it. She was the obvious choice to help me deliver my baby, even though three other doctors wait patiently behind the door to our living room, as well as a small team of delivery nurses.

It’s all overkill, I know – but, well, why not have them on hand just in case. But in the room? It’s just the three of us for now. Roger and Henry are out there too, taking care of Rafe and probably drinking brandy and smoking cigars, for all I know.

The contraction ends and my head falls back as I pant, pressing my eyes shut and working hard to save my energy. Babygirl – she’s taking longer than Rafe, which is fine, it’s just...a completely different experience. While I was physically battered last time, this time I’m just...exhausted.

I can feel Sinclair’s anxiety for me down the line of our bond, even if he tries to hide it. He releases my hand, shakes his out a little bit, and then raises a cool washcloth to my head, patting away the sweat there.

“Thanks, baby,” I murmur, turning my face to him a little bit.

“Almost there, Ella,” he replies, supportive.

“He’s right,” Cora says, bending down low to check on my progress. “We’re going to start pushing on the next one.” She raises her head and grins at me. “You ready?”

“Are you kidding?” I say, raising my head to glare at her a little. “I’ve been ready for hours.”

My sister’s smile deepens as she stands up, moving over to the door to call the delivery nurses in so that there are some extra hands to help with the baby.

“Little Princess,” Sinclair says, giving me a squeeze. “She’ll be here soon.”

“I’m going to be jealous,” I mutter, glancing at him and working hard for a joke, even though I can feel the next contraction coming on, “when there’s another girl in your life, stealing all your attention.”

“Never,” he replies, kissing me on the side of the head. “You’re always my best girl.”

“Better be,” I gasp, but then all jokes are put aside, because the contraction comes on in full force. I groan as the pain grasps me and Cora moves quickly to the bedside, helping me better position my legs as she coaches me through it.

“Okay, Ella!” she says, her voice eager. “Let’s start to push!”

And so I do – I bear down, and put my full force behind it, working to bring my baby into the world

The pain is...agony. My groan turns into a low moan and then a shout as I push, my world turning dark at the edges. I keep pushing, still hearing Cora’s encouragement, feeling Sinclair tense at my side.

But as I gasp a breath back in the contraction fades and my eyes flutter open.

“She’s coming fast now,” Cora says, her voice excited, “you’re almost there, Ella! A few more pushes – ”

But her voice fades away and – and the shadows at the edge of my vision, they don’t fade –

I frown, blinking, trying to understand Because, I mean...I’m not passing out. This is not the darkness at the edge of my vision that I’ve felt before when I’ve felt faint. This is – what the hell, it’s real shadows curling at the edges of my room...

“Do you...” I ask, my voice panting as I whip my head, looking around the room, “do you guys see that?”

Sinclair’s hand is on my face, turning it towards him now, his voice worried. ” See what?”

“The...the shadows,” I say, pulling my face from his hand, looking around the room again. The shadows – they’re growing.

“Ella,” Sinclair says, his voice shaking with worry. “Cora – what’s -”

“I – I don’t know – ” Cora says, looking at me. “Ella? What...”

But her voice fades out, and the room grows dark as the shadows overwhelm it.

And then, suddenly, Cora and Sinclair freeze next to me, and the room becomes somehow a shadow of itself, looking like...like a room in a dollhouse, or something – only half real in comparison to...

To the man who stands at the center of the room, who looks like he's made of shadow itself. Except his eyes, which burn bright as coals in his face.

"Hello, Ella," he says, his voice low and rolling, like thunder.

My eyes go wide as he moves a few steps forward and shadows clear from him, revealing a tall, broad-shouldered man with an angular face, impeccably dressed in rich fabrics, each a darker shade of black. "Congratulations," he continues, giving me a short, teasing little bow, "on the birth of your first daughter."

"Who," I gasp, terrified and still in a great deal of pain, though my birth process is somehow...paused – I'm in the middle of it, but it's not progressing – I gasp, and my hands fly to my stomach, worried for her.

"It's all right," the man continues, walking to my side so that he looks down at me with that burning gaze. "I've transported you, temporarily, to a pocket realm – only taken a second of your life. When we're finished our little chat, you'll be returned, safe and sound. No threat to your child."

"Who," I stutter, starting to get mad, "who are you!?"

"You don't recognize me?" he asks, the corner of his mouth turning up. "I'm afraid your mother has neglected you, then, if she hasn't bothered to teach you to recognize the presence of her husband."

"Her...her husband?" I gasp out – and then my eyes go wide as I put the pieces together. My mother – goddess of the light, and the moon, and wolves frequently paired, rather unhappily, with her sometimes-paramour, the God of Darkness.

"Well," he says, with a sigh, "husband for lack of a better term. You wolves with your mates – makes love so simple, doesn't it?"

"No," I growl, glaring at him, even more afraid now than I was before what on earth is he here for is he -is he going to try to take my baby!?"

He laughs, smiling down at me. "I like your spirit, little wolf – you remind me a great deal of your mother."

"Why are you here!?" I shout, terrified, still wracked with the pain of labor.

"Because it is my right to be here," he snaps, leaning down a little, holding my gaze. "You are the child of my beloved, my wife – you should have been mine, had she not been foolish enough to go choosing those mortal men to sire you. And so, while you are not biologically mine, I have what might be considered...a vested interest."

I shake my head at him, still not understanding what the hell this has to do with my daughter's birth.

"I would have been there at your birth," he says, straightening up, "and your sister's, had I known you existed. I was denied that right, and so I am here," he shifts his gaze now to my stomach, "to witness hers."

"Wha..." I shake my head, my mind thinking too many things at once, "why not Rafe? Jesse?"

He shrugs. "The sons belong to their fathers. The daughters – they are the true children of the moon."

My brow knits together at this cryptic statement, but I have no time, really to think on it because the God – he holds out a hand to me.

Instinctually, I flinch away.

He laughs.

"Your mother," he says, shaking his head with a sigh, keeping the hand outstretched. "She taught you not to recognize me, only to fear me. But not only danger lurks in the darkness, moon daughter. Great beauty is there as well."

I stare up at him, anger roiling in me now. "It wasn't my mother who taught me that it was your horrible priests chasing me and Cora our whole lives trying to steal my son – "

The Dark God tilts his head back and laughs, of all things. My frown deepens. "Those priests – " he says, flicking his hand dismissively, "all mortal politics, Ella. The priests – I gave them power centuries ago before I lost interest. Whatever they're doing today is their own business, not mine."

I shake my head at him, starting to bare my teeth. "Get out of here," I snap, "return me to my mate – "

The God of Darkness smiles so broadly it crinkles the skin around his eyes. "Such fire, little wolf," he says, chuckling. "I do wish you had been mine." He sighs and tilts his head, his calm only stoking my anger further. I open my mouth to issue further demands but he simply raises his hand again, and I feel – quite obviously under his control – the instant urge to hush.

"Enough," he sighs. "I will return you to your home and your task in a moment. All that is left is to deliver my gift."

"A...a gift?" I stumble over the words, horrified at the idea.

"A gift," he continues, nodding. "For your daughter. From me."

Chapter 491 – A Gift

Ella

I go rigid at the idea of this dark god giving my daughter anything.

“No,” I gasp, attempting to push myself away from him – but I struggle to move

“Fear not, moon daughter,” he says, the corner of his lip tilting up. “I do not give curses to those who are my chosen ones – only gifts.”

And with that shadows begin to swirl in his hand. My eyes go wide as they build and build into an orb of smoke and shade.

“No!” I protest again, my voice a little breathless this time.

“Careful, girl,” he growls, taking a step closer, bending over me now. “If you anger me, I will not be so eager to bestow my gift. You would not to incur my ire for your life, instead of a blessing for hers, would you?”

I cringe away from him, not knowing what to do – not knowing which will be worse-

The God of Darkness stretches out his hand over me and the shadows begin to spill down from his fingers, surrounding me.

“A blessing,” he murmurs, “for the first granddaughter of the moon from her benefactor. Long may she live, dwelling in darkness as well as light.”

The shadows, when they touch me, are soft – gentler than I imagined they’d be, like velvet or mist. When I breathe, they flow into me through my nose and my mouth. I gasp, worried – but the smoke, it tastes faintly of...of mint, and cool mornings, and it soothes my aching throat...

I look up at the God in wonder, tilting my head at him.

“See?” he says softly. “Not all that dwells in darkness is wicked.”

And then he smiles at me – a wayward, vicious thing – and gives another short bow before

Before he disappears.

And I blink, and the world – my room – it’s real again.

“Ella?” Cora says, abruptly in front of me now, shining a light in my eyes.

“Ella!” Sinclair gasps at my side as I blink rapidly, trying to clear my thoughts. “Are you –” he spins his head to Cora, “is she all right!?”

“I’m – um I’m fine,” I murmur.

“Your eyes,” Cora says, dropping her flashlight and taking my face in her hands, studying me with horror on her features. “Ella, they went all black you were frozen in place –”

I nod, taking a deep breath, the scent of mint still clinging to the back of my mouth. As I exhale I run my hands over my stomach and check on my bond with my daughter –

It’s still there. She’s just as strong – just as uncomfortable, ready to be born

“It’s okay,” I say, nodding to my sister, to my mate. “It – um –” I hesitate for a moment, torn between wanting to explain and the feeling of the next contraction coming steadily on. “It was it was really weird, all right, but right now?” I shake my head at them, a little frantic, “I think we need to push.”

Cora snaps immediately back into doctor mode, moving down on the bed to position herself between my knees, nodding. “All right, Ella,” she says, pulling me a little lower so that I’m flatter on my back now. “When you’re ready, you push.”

“Ella,” Sinclair growls next to me, and even as the contraction takes hold I turn my face to him and press my eyes shut, passing all of my emotions down our bond – my fear, and my shock, but alongside it my conviction that...that I’m okay, right now, and so is the baby but we’ve got to concentrate on this.

“All right,” he says, his voice low as he sits up and puts his hands my shoulders. “Let’s do this.”

And, with my mate behind me, and my sister ready to welcome my little girl, I push with all my might.

Half an hour later, our little baby girl is born.

I’m inconsolable as Cora places her in my arms, the tears dripping down my face as I peer at my baby, reaching out a finger to stroke her teeny tiny fingers, her perfect little nose. She shouts her unhappiness and shakes her little head, which only makes me laugh as I try to wipe my tears away.

“She’s perfect,” Sinclair breathes, tucked close behind me, peering at our baby over my shoulder.

“She really is,” I say between gasping breaths. “Oh god, she’s so cute – ”

Cora laughs, coming to sit next to me and stroke a hand over her little head. We’re quiet for a long moment as I press my child against the skin of my chest.

“She’s precious,” Cora murmurs, her voice almost reverent. “And I love her, and I’m going to be her favorite aunt.”

“Only aunt,” Sinclair murmurs, his voice a little dry.

“Even if she had sixty,” Cora coos, tapping the baby’s little belly with a single finger, “I’d be the best.” She leans forward, kissing me on the cheek. “I’ll give you two a couple of minutes, all right? Go break the news to the drunk ones in there.”

I turn my face up and kiss my sister as well as she scrunches her nose at me and turns to the door, taking the team of nurses with her. Everyone did such a wonderful job – I’m so grateful to them

But honestly, as much as I want to shout my thanks out after them, all I can do is stare down at my perfect little girl.

I lean back against Sinclair as I study her face and he wraps his arms around me, doing the same.

“She looks just like you, Ella,” he breathes, fascinated.

“What!?” I protest, honestly a little shocked. “Dominic, she’s all scrunchy

He laughs at this, and I can feel him shaking his head. “Newborn scrunch aside – her features? And the shape of her face? Rafe is all me, but Ella...this one is you.”

“Little baby girl,” I murmur, rocking her a little and passing love and comfort down our bond so that she settles, just a bit. I can feel the tumult of her emotions down our bond – she’s happy to be close to me, but cold, and a little frightened. She cries the sweetest little mewling sounds, and I cuddle her close, thinking that it must be so hard, being brand new to the world. I do my best to let her know that she’s all right, that I’m still right here. I press a kiss to her forehead, loving her so much already that I can hardly bear it.

Outside the windows of the palace we can hear the crowd start to cheer as the announcement goes out – their Princess has been born, safe and sound. They started to gather late last night, wanting to be the first ones to lay eyes on her. And today? I had peeked out the front window earlier as I paced the halls, trying to ease the bangs of labor, and was shocked to see the masses of people waiting out there, eager to lay eyes on her.

"I can't say their enthusiasm is misplaced," Sinclair sighs. "She's a really good baby."

"Hear that, baby?" I murmur, smiling at her. "They're cheering for you!"

We take a long, quiet moment together before Sinclair reaches a hand out and strokes my hair. "Ella," he says quietly, and I hear the worry come back into his voice. "What... what happened? Earlier, when you -"

But I shake my head, because of course I know precisely the moment he's talking about. I turn a little so that I can see him and quickly, briefly, give him the fast version of what happened, because I know that we only have a few minutes before the doctors come back in, and Rafe comes to meet his sister, and we have a great deal to do.

My mate goes pale as I tell him how the Dark God took me away into the pocket realm, how he gave our daughter some kind of gift, how he ensured me it was a blessing and not a curse.

"But from the Dark God," Sinclair murmurs, shaking his head, his voice heavy with dread, "who knows what a blessing is to him."

"I know," I say, my voice soft, a little mournful. "But honestly, Sinclair, as it ...came to me, the gift – it didn't feel bad. He was angry at mom for keeping secrets from him for all of these years but I did not get the impression, from the gift itself, that he wanted to hurt the baby or use it as vengeance."

"Then what did it feel like?" he asks, confused.

"I don't know," I say with a shrug. "It felt...a great deal like an open door." As the words fall from my mouth I have no idea where they came from, and that they make absolutely no sense. But, somehow, they're right.

But still, as I look down at my baby girl, my stomach twists with anxiety for all the things it can mean for her future.

Chapter 492 – Princess

Ella

“So you’re all right? You’re both all right?” My mate asks, pressing his forehead to mine, still reeling from the strange news of the Dark God’s gift.

“We are,” I say, nodding, sure of it. And then I shift again, passing the baby to him. “See for yourself, new papa,” I sigh, placing the little girl in her father’s arms.

On Sinclair’s face, and through our bond, I see his heart absolutely melt. “Oh god,” he sighs, shaking his head as he stares down at his little girl. “I’m a gonner, Ella. This one she’s already got me in the palm of her hands, even as I hold her in mine.”

“Don’t worry,” I sigh, curling up next to him, indulging in the sight of my mate the one I love most in the world falling in love with our tiny daughter, as I’ve already done. “I won’t tell her the power she wields.”

“It will be our secret,” he says with a nod and a little smirk on his lips. We’re quiet for a moment, studying her, when suddenly I realize that she doesn’t have a name.

“What do you think?” I ask quietly, resting my head on his shoulder. “Is she an Emma? Or an Eloise?”

My mate’s smile deepens as he looks up at me, and I already know his answer before he says it, because it’s precisely the same as mine.

Those names are great – but they’re not hers.

“Nah,” Sinclair says, grinning at me before turning back to his little girl. “She’s totally, completely an Ariel.”

“I know,” I sigh, tracing a finger down her cheek. “Welcome to the world, Ariel Sinclair. You are already so, so loved.”

And Ariel stretches her mouth in a wide yawn before snuggling down in her father’s arms, happy and content. Sinclair and I both laugh to see it, and I know that his heart, like mine, is so very full. I pass my joy and love down the bond to both of them, and am totally thrilled when Ariel gives a little tentative pulse of love back as she gets used to her new surroundings.

The next hour or so is busier than I’d like, with the doctors returning to the room so that I can finish the after- business of labor and ensure that our sweet Ariel is healthy and happy. But even as I feed her for the first time, and deliver the placenta, and take a shower, and am completely exhausted through it all, I can’t stop smiling and turning towards Ariel in the room, eager to keep my eyes on her.

My baby – my little girl. I'm so filled with excitement that she's here, that she's mine. God – her whole life is out there in front of her, and I just can't wait to see her live it.

Once the doctors have given us the final okay – at least for now, the nurses, of course, will be on hand all night in case we need help with anything – we settle in together as a family. Roger comes into the room with a tearful Rafe on his hip as Cora finishes bundling Ariel into a swaddle and hands her off to Sinclair. Henry wheels into the room after Roger with a sleeping Jesse in his lap, looking excitedly for his first granddaughter as he closes the door behind him.

"Mama!" Rafe shouts, his voice so terribly sad it breaks my heart.

"Ohhh, baby," I murmur, rushing over to Roger and taking my eldest baby up into my arms. "It's all right, we missed you!"

"It's probably the longest he's gone from your side in...months, Ella," Roger murmurs, smiling at me and giving me a little hug as Rafe rests his head against my chest. Henry and Cora come close, Cora wrapping her arm around Roger's and resting her head on his shoulder.

"Maybe ever," I sigh, shaking my head. He really is my little Velcro baby pretty much always with me. But, then again, it's not entirely his fault I'm could be accused of being an overly -attached parent.

But I don't know if I mind that. I just... like being around my kid. Kids, now.

"Poor little guy," I murmur, stroking Rafe's sweet head and turning to where Sinclair walks over with the baby. "He missed us."

Rafe sits up with a little cry and reaches a hand out to Sinclair, wanting him close too.

"We're sorry, kiddo," Sinclair murmurs, smiling at his son and taking Rafe's hand, leaning over to kiss it. "But we were busy! Mom was doing all the work to bring you a new little sister."

Sinclair turns a little then, showing Rafe the baby, and Rafe sits up straight to peer down at Ariel

We all stay very still for a moment, watching the siblings meet for the first time, but suddenly Rafe gives a little cry of disgust and turns his head away, pressing his eyes shut and gripping my robe tight in his fists, not wanting to let me go.

We all burst out laughing at Rafe's tiny jealousy and I stroke his head some more, murmuring sweet things to him as I carry him over to our freshly-made bed, the rubbered sheets and soiled linens thankfully already changed. I sigh a little with gratitude, thinking that it's perhaps a little nice to be queen for things like this. And then I sink down against my pillows, taking Rafe with me and waving to my family to come close.

"You have to be nice to sissy, Rafe," I whisper to him as he peers at his father, clearly allowing his curiosity about his baby sister win out over his jealousy. Sinclair sinks down on his side of the bed and moves so that his side is pressed against mine. Henry wheels close, handing Jesse up to Cora as she and Roger likewise move near.

I turn Rafe in my lap so that he can see into Sinclair's arms more completely. Rafe turns his head, peering at his sister like she's a little alien or a completely foreign species, which makes me smile.

"Her name is Ariel," Sinclair whispers to his son, and I look up to my other side when I hear Cora gasp. I grin when I see her pressing her hand to her chest, her eyes squeezed nearly shut with joy.

"Perfect name," she mouths to me, and I laugh and nod eagerly, turning back to my son.

"What do you think, little Rafey?" I murmur, rubbing his back while he leans out to touch his sister. "Will she do?"

Rafe burbles something to Ariel, which makes me smile, but the moment his fingers press against her cheek I give a gasp. Sinclair does too, his eyes whipping up to meet mine.

"Did you feel it too?" I breathe, suddenly very excited.

"I did," he replies, laughing and nodding. Both of us whip our heads back to Rafe, who smiles at his sister for the first time. Ariel squirms a little in her swaddle, smacking her lips and turning her head to the side, clearly getting sleepy.

"Wait, what is it?" Cora asks, leaning over.

"A bond," I say, turning to her and grinning, "just like with Rafe and Jesse."

"Oh," she says, standing up straight and looking down into her arms at her son.

"Cool," Roger breathes, looking between the babies. "What do you think that means?"

"Still in the dark, brother," Sinclair murmurs, peering curiously at Jesse now. "Should we..."

“Is it too much?” I ask, suddenly anxious, looking down at my fresh new baby. “Is it enough to be born and then get a new bond in one day?”

“In this family?” Sinclair asks, his voice dry. “She’s going to have to get used to being overwhelmed.”

I laugh a little, nodding, and then when my mate peers at me, clearly seeking to know what I think, I just shrug – because frankly, I’m curious too, and really what could it hurt?

“Come on,” Sinclair murmurs, placing the sleepy Ariel down on the bed and gesturing for Cora to lay her baby down too. “Let’s...just give it a try.”

So, quite gingerly, Cora lays Jesse down next to his new cousin, whispering a sweet little introduction as she does. As soon as the babies are laid side-by-side, Jesse blinks and frowns for a minute, turning towards Ariel as if he’s quite suddenly noticed that she’s there. And then I burst into a smile to see that he actually reaches for her – seeking her.

The moment his little hand touches her face, it happens again, making me jump a bit this time. The bond SO tiny, so faint! – snaps into place, and my grin deepens.

“Wow,” Sinclair says, shaking his head. “That is amazing. I’ve never heard of anything like that happening before.”

And then all four of us parents laugh as I move to lay Rafe down next to his tiny cousins, careful to place him next to Jesse, who is a bit sturdier. I don’t want my precious little meatball to roll over on my baby girl in her first hours of being alive.

“Someone’s going to have to fill me in here,” Henry murmurs as he alternates between smiling at his three grandchildren and looking curiously between his sons and their mates.

“The kids have bonds, dad,” Sinclair says, smiling up at his father and running an amazed hand through his hair. “Between each other, separate from us, their parents.”

“Really,” Henry says, his eyebrows going up and his face breaking into a smile of pleasure and curiosity. “Well. I mean, I knew they were special children. But I wasn’t expecting that.”

“Have you ever heard of anything like that happening before?” Roger asks, peering down at his dad.

“I have...heard of something like it,” Henry murmurs quietly before looking around at us. “Though it wasn’t between siblings and cousins, and I’m not fully sure it applies.”

“Really,” Sinclair says, looking at his father eagerly, wanting to know more.

Chapter 493 – Three Cousins

Henry nods and looks consideringly at the kids. “Will you let me do a bit of research, son?” he asks, smiling at them, “and get back to you on it? I hate to be cryptic, but I want very much to make sure that I’m right before I send you on a wild goose chase.”

“I think that’s just fine,” I sigh, reaching down and gathering my daughter up into my arms as Rafe rolls over and starts to burble at Jesse, who gives a little squeak of happiness and starts to laugh, reaching to grab at his cousin’s shirt. “I don’t think I have the energy to hear anything new just now.”

“You’re right,” Cora sighs. “We should let you get some rest. But...could I just...”

And I look up to see my sister clutching her hands against her chest, biting her lip, clearly dying to hold the baby but not wanting to make me give her up if I don’t want to.

“Cora!” I laugh, holding Ariel up, “of course you can!”

Cora sighs happily as she gathers Ariel into her arms, murmuring sweet things to her. Of course, she was holding Ariel before – but this time it’s as an aunt, not a doctor. “Hey, sweet baby Ariel,” Cora coos, smiling down at her first niece as tears gather in her eyes. “I’m so excited to meet you!” She leans forward and kisses Ariel on her head. “I’m going to be your favorite,” she whispers.

“No way,” Roger counters, leaning close to study our little girl. “She’s going to be a daddy’s girl, so favorite clearly transfers to nearest uncle.”

Cora just rolls her eyes at him but I smile, loving it to see my family play- fight over who is going to love our daughter the most.

Cora and Roger take a few more minutes with Ariel before passing her to Henry, who rocks her gently as I lean my head against Sinclair.

“She’s very beautiful, Dominic, Ella,” Henry says, looking up at us with moist eyes. “How lucky you are.”

“We are lucky,” Sinclair agrees, leaning forward to scoop Rafe into his arms, as he’s getting a little rambunctious with Jesse. “Little family of four. Sounds familiar, dad?”

Henry grins at Sinclair but Roger just laughs, scooping up his own happy baby. “You know that makes you the girl in that scenario, right little brother?”

“And is that a bad thing?” I ask, raising my eyebrows at my brother-in- law as Henry hands Ariel back into my arms.

Roger laughs and blushes, instantly realizing his mistake.

“All of that ends right now,” I say, pointing my finger at the men in the family. “Ariel is going to have enough trouble growing up as the youngest girl cousin with Rafe and Jesse – I’m not going to tolerate any comments about what she can and can’t do because she’s a girl.”

Roger nods, smiling at me, on board with the plan. Sinclair surprises me, though, by sighing and turning towards the windows. “As progressive as we’d like to be,” he says quietly, “I do wonder how pigeon-holed she’s going to be by dint of being a Princess. The world will enjoy a tomboy Princess for a couple of years, if that’s how Ariel turns out to be, but eventually...I think our dear girl is going to face a lot of expectations regarding pretty smiles and silk dresses and tiaras.”

I sigh and lean closer to him as I realize that he’s right. Our family can only do so much – Ariel’s going to get all sorts of messages about who she’s supposed to be from the rest of the world as well as her family, just like the rest of us.

“We’ll just have to do our very best,” Cora says with a firm nod, and I turn to smile up at her.

“Actually,” Henry says, his voice considering. “Before you take your rest, Ella...”

“Hmm?” I ask, turning towards him, curious.

“Well,” he says, hesitating, looking me up and down and clearly assessing how presentable I am, “they have been waiting out there for hours.”

“Oh,” I say, my eyebrows going up as I turn towards the windows again, realizing that Henry is right. Our people – they’ve been gathered for a long time, hoping for a glimpse of her.

“She just gave birth,” Cora protests, putting her hands out, “Ella should be allowed to rest.”

“No, Henry’s right,” I say, working to sit up and swinging my feet over the edge of the bed. “They’ve all been so nice, wanting to see the baby – ”

“Ella,” Cora hesitates, her voice worried. “As your doctor – ”

“As a magical self-healer,” I say, my voice dry as I get to my feet, “I’m good, Cora, to go step onto the terrace for a moment. Will you help me put on something nice?”

“Something nice?” she gasps, her eyes going wide at the idea.

“Like a nice robe,” I say, rolling my eyes at her and handing the baby off to Sinclair.
“Honestly, this whole thing will take four minutes, and then I’ll be back to bed!”

My sister rolls her eyes at me, clearly objecting to the plan, but three minutes later I’m dressed in a very pretty white robe, my hair neatly tied back, my crown perched on my head honestly as a practical afterthought rather than a serious accessory. My hair is not the neatest it’s ever been, and the crown functions as a very useful headband.

Sinclair passes the baby to me and wraps an arm around my waist, Rafe on his hip as we leave our bedroom. As we walk down the hall with Cora, Roger, Jesse, and Henry following close behind, I frown a bit at Sinclair’s crown and then Rafe’s – which he amazingly consents to wear.

“Ariel’s going to need a crown too,” I murmur, jealous for her sake. “She can have six, if she wants them,” my mate replies, smirking at me a little bit. “But if she’s as much of a tomboy as you’re projecting she’ll be, I don’t know if she’ll wear them.”

“True, ” I sigh, smiling down at my little girl and dropping yet another kiss to her perfect little head. “You be as girly as you want, little Princess,” I murmur to her, and she gives a fussy little scrunch of her face that makes me laugh as she passes sleepy vibes down our bond. “But yes, you’re going to get some pretty crowns. And mama will get more, all matching – ”

“All right,” Sinclair says, his voice dry. “This is starting to get expensive.”

“Don’t get cheap on us now, Sinclair,” I reply, bumping my shoulder into him as we reach the front of the palace, where the crowds are starting to shout. Guards have already started to line the terrace, so they know something is up.

“I would never,” Sinclair sighs, moving his hand from my waist to my shoulder and leaning down to press a quick kiss to my mouth. “Ready?” he asks, looking from me, to Ariel, to Rafe our whole little family.

“Ready,” I say with a nod, reaching out to swipe a quick finger down the length of Rafe’s perfect, chubby little cheek. He squeaks happily and bounces in his dad’s arm, waving at me. I blow him a quick kiss before turning towards the doors.

Sinclair gives a quick glance over his shoulder at his father, and the Duke and the Duchess with their son, and then, smiling, pushes the double doors open. Together, we all step outside.

Chapter 494 – People’s Princess

The crowds go absolutely wild as we walk into the sunlight and a huge smile bursts onto my face. Honestly, it was a little touch-and-go for a few months there, with the media continually debating if I was a good or a bad Queen after the murder on the front steps. But I laid low, and continued doing my best, and things have continually turned towards the people seeing that I only have their best interests at heart, and that I really do want to fight for the little guy.

Plus, I don’t think it hurts that I’m the mother of a super adorable little Prince, and that I’ve just given our nation its first Princess.

The crowd calls her name and I smile out at them, pleased and baffled about how they already know it. I look up at Sinclair, confused, but he just shrugs and smiles down at me.

Together, my little family and I step forward to the edge of the terrace and I boost the baby a little in my arms so that the crowd can see her. They go mad the moment their Princess’s face comes into sight, shouting that she’s beautiful and how glad they are to meet her.

I can’t help but laugh, a few tears coming to my eyes as I see my entire nation feeling precisely the way I do about my little girl. Just so, so thrilled that she’s finally here.

“And you thought Ariel wasn’t going to get as much as a fuss as Rafe,” Cora murmurs with a smirk, coming to my side. The crowd shouts when they see Jesse come forward too – the Little Duke is also a favorite.

“I know,” I laugh, turning to smile at my sister. “Poor Rafe got none of this.”

“But look at him now,” Cora says, leaning forward and pointing to my son. I turn to see my mate smiling down at Rafe, who is actually waving out at the people. I burst into laughter, because it’s so very Rafe. He loves to wave and say hello – he just has no idea that he’s saying hello to the thousands of people gathered on the streets.

Sinclair raise his hand and waves too, but I just smile and hold my baby close, peering down into her face. She scrunches and frowns for a moment before opening her eyes just a little bit, turning towards the noise of her people.

I laugh in delight, because even though I know she can’t see anything, it looks for all things like she’s trying to look and catch sight of them as much as they are of her. I hold her a little higher, murmuring into her ear all the things she could see if her eye were a little bit more developed, but she just gives a little baby sigh and closes her eyes again, pressing her face against me.

I grin but look up at my husband, because I know baby needs to get inside now. Her Princess duties are done and she's hungry and needs some sleep. Sinclair nods to me, leaning forward to kiss me on the forehead, and then we give one last wave to the people before we turn inside.

"Come on, Roger," Cora laughs, and I look over my shoulder to see her tugging him inside.

"No, this is fun," he replies, his voice cheerful. "Give Jesse to me, we're staying out – "

"Ridiculous," she sighs, but I can tell she thinks he's funny. "Did you not get enough attention as a child?"

"Not nearly," Roger sighs dramatically, "Dominic took it all from me when he was born it was very traumatic – "

I grin and look up into Sinclair's face in time to see him roll his eyes, but he doesn't retort, and Henry just laughs behind us.

"You got plenty of attention, Roger," Henry sighs as we head back to our living quarters. "Your mother couldn't get enough of you – thought you were very funny."

"Just like I can't get enough of you," I murmur to our sweet little Ariel, "Or you!" I say, reaching out to ruffle Rafe's hair.

"What about me?" Sinclair asks as we reach our door, smiling at me as he pushes it open.

"Oh, now that you've given me two children, I'm totally done with you," I say, looking up at him with wide earnest eyes, but not completely able to keep a straight face.

"Liar," he laughs, tugging me close to his side with his free hand.

"All right, Ells," Cora says, coming to my side and pressing a kiss to my cheek. "We'll be just down the hall, yes? In case you need me?"

"Thank you, Cora," I say, stepping away from Sinclair's side as he says goodnight to his brother and father. While I don't anticipate that I'll need Cora tonight, it's good to know I've got a doctor and a sister nearby.

She gives me an extra squeeze as I call goodbye to the rest of the Sinclairs and step into the room with my mate and my children. My children. Plural! I laugh in wonder for the joy of it.

“Happy?” Sinclair asks, smiling at me as he presses the door shut.

“Ecstatic,” I sigh, grinning at him before looking to the kids. “But also exhausted. And busy. Do you think you can get Rafe down, or at least distracted, while I get ready to feed Ariel?”

My mate smiles at me, taking a step closer and cupping my chin in his hand. “Did you hear that?” he asks.

“What?” I ask, confused.

“You just said the most beautiful sentence in the world,” he laughs, shaking his head down at me. “Asking me to take care of our son while you got ready to feed our daughter. Our family, Ella – not that it wasn’t before. But it’s growing – which is what we’ve always wanted.”

“I know,” I coo, pressing closer to him and biting my lip as I look up into his gorgeous face, my eyes shining. “You’re right. It’s perfect.”

And my perfect mate smiles at me before dipping down and pressing a kiss to my mouth – so long that I sink into it, losing myself a little. So long that Rafe squeaks in protest, giving Sinclair’s chest a playful smack because he’s bored.

I burst into laughter again and pull away, murmuring my apologies to Rafe as I snatch the crown off his head. “So sorry, prince,” I say, wrinkling my nose at him as he giggles and reaches for the little circlet. “But you’re going to have to get used to sharing mommy and daddy.”

I move into the closet, pulling out a set of newborn pajamas and a sleep sack for Ariel, who I know is going to want a snooze very soon. She gives a few little fussy cries now, clearly hungry and not yet knowing how to communicate that desire down the bond.

“Poor daughter,” I sigh, changing her as fast as I can and then laying her down into Rafe’s old wheeled bassinet as I quickly change into something a little more comfortable and convenient for breastfeeding. “Just a minute, then we’ll get you settled.”

I do my very best to keep my word, making my way out of the closet in record time. I grin when I see that Sinclair is thanking one of the kitchen workers as they make their way out the door, having just delivered a cart full of food.

“Ah, Rafe’s favorite distraction,” I say, smiling at my mate and my son as I move to my nest and settle down in it, Ariel bundled cozily in my arms. “Food!”

“He’s a hungry boy,” Sinclair says, smiling as Rafe does indeed reach for the tray, almost wiggling out of his dad's arms as he does. "But half of this is for you!"

"Oh!" I say, genuinely surprised, and then I laugh and shake my head at myself, because of course I would forget to eat, so distracted am I by my love for my family. But I lean back against the pillows and tug my shirt up, getting a fussy Ariel ready for her second feeding before I think about feeding myself.

"Yes," Sinclair murmurs, handing Rafe his favorite a slice of apple and wheeling the cart over to me. "I figured you would forget to eat."

"I'm going to be forgetting a lot of stuff over the next week or so," I murmur, relaxing back as Ariel latches and smiling down at her. "You're going to be on overdrive, monitoring the nation as well as me."

"Best duty I ever had," he sighs, getting Rafe set up in the little pop-up highchair that we keep in the corner of the room, moving it close to me and setting some snacks out before him. I turn my head to smile at my son, glad that he's close too.

"Do you think Ariel's going to keep Rafe up all night?" I ask, suddenly curious. "She's going to be up every couple of hours –"

"Ella," Sinclair says, interrupting my train of thought as he sits on the side of the bed and places a hand on my knee. "I want to talk about all of that, of course. But you really, really need to tell me more about what happened when you were visited by the Dark God."

"Oh," I say, looking up at him with a little sadness in my face. Because it's not that it's left my mind precisely – I just...was really enjoying ignoring that and basking in the happiness of this moment.

"I know," he sighs, leaning forward to stroke my face with his palm. "But it's been killing me, my love. Please."

"All right," I reply, nodding, knowing that he needs to hear it all. And so I take a deep breath and launch into the tale.

Chapter 495 – First Night

My mate listens carefully as I tell him, in full detail, everything that happened when the Dark God took me outside of time and gave our little daughter our gift. I mostly look down at her while I tell the story, wondering how this perfect, tiny little angel being could have an ounce of darkness in her.

But even as I wonder that, I consider what the Dark God told me that not everything that is in darkness is bad.

But is that just something he said to distract me, to make me more compliant to accept his “gift?”

Was it, as I suspected, a curse?

“And then I was back,” I say, looking up into Sinclair’s face as he listens closely. “And, obviously, distracted by the insane pain of childbirth.”

A smirk pulls at his lips then, but I can tell that my attempt at humor didn’t go very far towards distracting him. He’s quiet for a long moment, looking towards Rafe but really staring into space as he sorts through his thoughts.

I give him a second to work through it, but I interrupt when I can’t stand it any longer. “So?” I ask quietly. “What do you...think?”

“Well,” Sinclair sighs, turning his attention back to me and to our little girl, who eats hungrily, clearly not having lost her appetite after such a dramatic early encounter. “I certainly wish that the Dark God had simply sent a flower arrangement or a toy. But...I honestly don’t know. We need much more information before we can plan any sort of action.”

“Action?” I ask, a little confused. “What on earth can we do? It’s done, Dominic. Whatever the gift is,” I say, gesturing down at her, “she’s got it.”

“Yes,” Sinclair says, nodding as he sighs and lays himself down a bit on the bed so that he can rest his head against my knee, looking up at my face. “But there’s certainly more we can know. We can ask dad to do some research, see if there’s any precedent for this, if you’re all right with him knowing? And ask Cora to contact your mother, see if she has any insights?”

“Of course Henry can know,” I reply quietly. “And that’s a good idea, with Cora.” I sigh, frustrated with myself for not thinking it first, but Sinclair just sends a pulse of peace down the bond, encouraging me to forgive myself for being scatter-brained on this of all days. I’ve been through a lot, and even though I’m already healed thanks to mom’s gift, I’m still exhausted.

“We’ll work it through, though, Ella,” Sinclair says quietly, reaching his long arm up to tuck my hair behind my ear.

“My instinct still does tell me it’s not all wicked, Dominic,” I say sincerely, looking down into his face. “And with these gods, gut feelings...they tend to be important.”

“I believe you,” he says, his eyebrows going up. “I’d just like all the intel we can get.”

“Me too,” I say, giving him a little smile. But then, even despite my desire to keep pushing on this, my eyelids start to flutter. I blink hard, shaking my head, working to stay up.

“Oh, baby,” Sinclair murmurs, sitting up and leaning in to kiss me on my forehead. “You’re asleep on your feet. Or, well, your ass – but what’s the difference.”

I laugh and shake my head at him. “I need to stay awake till she’s done feeding,” I say with a yawn. “But then, yes, after that...we’re both going to need a nap. Right baby girl?”

Ariel ignores me, of course, continuing to eat. But I grin at her, stroking a hand over her perfect tiny head, loving the way her little fuzz of blonde hair tickles my palm.

“Well, you concentrate on that,” Sinclair says, moving a plate with a simple panini and a bottle of water to the bedside table next to me. “And eat if you can, yes? While you do that, I’ll get Rafe settled.”

I nod, finally starting to feel completely drained as the adrenaline of the day starts to slip from me. I take a lazy bite of my sandwich, barely tasting it as I switch breasts and let Ariel finish up. I’m hardly able to keep my eyes open about fifteen minutes later after Sinclair’s done moving around the room, getting Rafe settled in his playpen with some quiet toys and books and pulling Ariel’s basinet closet to my side.

I give a little squeak of protest when he takes her from my arms, not wanting to let her go, but Sinclair just laughs softly at me and murmurs that she’ll be right here at my side. I take one last peek at Ariel’s face and see that she, like me, is already basically asleep.

And then I yawn, and settle down, and finally completely pass out.

Of course, I barely sleep, because the baby gets me up every couple of hours needing to be fed again. The next day passes pretty much in a blur, with me catching sleep when I can and attending to Ariel when she needs it. I’m not in a total fog the whole time – I still spend time with my son and talk to my mate and admire my baby – but most of the time? Most of the time Ariel and I sleep.

Sinclair is a dream throughout that first crucial night, taking complete charge of my baby boy and allowing Ariel and I the space we need to get used to our new patterns. He spends time with her as well, of course, holding and talking to her while she's awake and not eating, but I can tell that he's exhausted too.

Not as exhausted as me – I definitely get to keep that title. But that first night – it's not precisely easy on dads either, is it? Especially when you've got another little one, barely over a year old.

Which is why I'm surprised, frankly, when Cora, and Roger, and Jesse, and Henry all come trooping in the evening after Ariel was born.

"Oh!" I say, blinking at them and laughing, pleased. "Did – did I know you were coming?"

"Oh my god," Sinclair says, turning to me and cocking his head to the side. "Did I did I seriously forget to tell you?"

I burst into laughter as he slaps a hand to his face, and Roger and Henry join in.

"Always a rare pleasure to see you mess up, brother," Roger says, wrapping an arm around his brother's shoulders and giving him a squeeze. 66 Though I guess you're forgiven for this one that first night is... a lot."

"It certainly is," Henry says, accepting a hug from his son as Cora comes over to give me a kiss, a perky Jesse sitting up in her arms and babbling with excitement as he looks around the room.

"Hey Cora," I say, grinning at her. "Hey, chatty!" I laugh, poking Jesse in the belly, Ariel in my arms. Rafe totters over and wraps an arm around her leg, smiling and reaching up for her or for Jesse – it's not precisely clear which.

The greetings finished, I look around curiously at my family. "So, what did I miss?" I ask. "Why are we all here?"

"To talk about your new weird God encounter," Roger says, grinning at me. "And our kids' weird bond. Life's been so fun since you joined the family, Ella – seriously, I don't think I express my gratitude enough."

"Always happy to keep it spicy, precisely for you, Roger," I say, giving him a wink as I pull the covers of my nest aside, getting to my feet with Ariel cozy in my arms. Roger grins and gives me a nod. "Do we have...new information or something?" I ask, pushing my hair back over my shoulders.

"We do," Henry says, nodding to me. "Shall we go into the living room, where there's room for us all to sit? It's none of it bad news, but I think it would be best for us to have a chat."

Anxiety rolls in me as I nod and gesture towards the door to the living room, looking to Sinclair with my apprehension pulsing down our bond.

"He's not placating you," Sinclair says, coming close to kiss me on the cheek and grab Rafe off of Cora's leg, tossing him into the air as we make our way to the living room with our family. Rafe squeals with joy and I can't help grinning at him. My little boy – already such a thrill seeker.

"All right," I sigh, holding baby Ariel close to my chest as I follow my family through the door and shut it behind me. Then I curl up on my favorite place on the couch, Dominic in the corner behind me, and turn my attention to Henry.

Because he, I'm coming to realize, has been up all night as well gathering information. And he wouldn't be here if he wasn't ready to share.

Chapter 496 – Bonded Power

I give Ariel one last kiss for luck and exhale a deep breath, focusing my eyes on Henry as I lean back against my mate, who wraps a supportive arm around me.

“Actually, Ella,” Cora says, and my eyes dart to her. She smiles and me from across the couch, her arms wrapped around her baby on her lap. “I’m the one who has news first.”

“Oh,” I say, my eyes going wide as I shift a little to direct my attention to her now. “I’m sorry, I didn’t know – ”

She shakes her head, dismissing my apology as Roger comes to perch on the arm of the couch behind her. She reaches up a hand and he takes it, giving her a little squeeze.

“Um, we contacted mom this morning,” she says quietly, apology all over her face. “To... to ask about what the Dark God could have possibly been up to. I’m sorry we did it without you – I know you would have wanted to be there -”

“No,” I breathe, even though I am a little disappointed. “I mean, I wouldn’t have been able to see her anyway, right?”

“Yeah,” she says, cocking her head to the side. “Unless we go to the temple, it is sort of a...one-on-one experience, isn’t it?”

“But we can go,” Sinclair murmurs behind me, supportive, “if we don’t get the answers you need – ”

“It’s okay,” I say, nodding to everyone around the room. “I get it – you don’t need to be so gentle with me. I was completely knocked out from giving birth and we needed information fast. It’s okay. So...” I flick my fingers at my sister, smiling at her. “Please, divulge. I’m dying to know.”

“Well,” Cora says, laughing a little and glancing up at Roger. “Mom was not happy to hear that her boyfriend visited you.”

“Really?” I gasp, a little delighted at the immortal gossip.

“Really,” Cora confirms, her eyes going wide as a grin overtakes her face. “She figured that he knew about you, but she had no idea that he’d go so far as to bestow a gift on the baby behind her back.”

“Behind her back,” I repeat, shaking my head. “Wow. So? Did she say it was... dangerous?”

“She said that he didn’t have the balls to go that far,” Cora says, laughing and giving a little shrug. “Or, well, those weren’t her precise words – but that was the sentiment. That he’s just trying to get her attention and let her know that he’s pissed – but that he knows better than to truly mess with her lineage.”

“So,” I say, looking down at little Ariel who lays cuddled in my arms, drowsy but idly kicking her little feet. “It really was a gift?”

“Mom doesn’t know what it was,” Cora says, shaking her head. “But she... she said she can’t make him take it back, Ells. That immortal gifts they’re not like...presents you can return or regift. They become part of us.”

“That makes sense,” I sigh, hoisting my baby up closer. “Well, at least we know it’s not... bad.”

“Which doesn’t mean it’s good,” Sinclair grumbles behind me. Clearly, he wanted better news.

“There is some precedence,” Henry says, leaning forward in his chair and studying the baby as best he can. “The texts are old, but there are some that report on gifts given by both the Goddess and the Dark Lord. What is interesting is that they seem to be reliable – there is one text in particular that speaks of a Goddess-given gift of healing that sounds quite a bit like yours, Ella,” he says, raising his eyebrows at me.

“Oh,” I say, perking up a little. “Well, that’s interesting. Would I be able to read that?”

“I’ll have it translated,” Henry says nodding, “and sent to you as soon as possible.”

“And what were some of the ‘gifts’ the Dark God has given?” Sinclair asks, his voice heavy and dubious on the word “gift.”

“He doesn’t give everyday gifts like the Goddess does – her interests have always been more domestic, for lack of a better word. She deals with the heart and the home – assigning mates, healing the body, changing the weather to ensure good crops.” He nods to Cora and I as he lists our gifts and I turn my head, because he’s right – while Cora and I have used them in much different ways, they do seem to be gifts that could be used to build a family and keep it safe in hard times.

“And the dark god?” Sinclair presses, his voice a little annoyed in his anxiety now.

“He,” Henry says, shifting his eyes to his son now, “prefers...more sweeping magics. Not things that can or should be used every day. Things that...change the world.”

A shiver runs through me at this and I find myself holding my breath as I look down at my little girl.

“Change the world?” Sinclair asks, going tense behind me.

“The text reports that he once gave a man the gift of eclipse, allowing him to hold the moon’s shadow before the sun for days on end, only relenting when his enemies collapsed to his demands.”

We all go silent and still at this.

After a long moment, only Roger is bold enough to break the quiet of the room.

“What the hell, Ariel,” he breathes, leaning forward to stare at his niece.

A ridiculous little laugh bursts at me from this, and I shake my head as Cora and Sinclair and then Henry start to laugh as well. I shake my head at my brother-in-law, so grateful for him and his strange sense of humor, which revealed itself so late in the game.

“Seriously,” Roger says, sitting up straight and running his hand through his hair, looking at his niece with wide eyes. “She’s the littlest of all of us but it sounds like she’s going to have some serious power.”

“Well, we don’t know it’s going to be something like that,” I sigh, rolling my eyes and trying to shake the tension out of my shoulders. “It could be... something smaller. Maybe he’s just trying to get under mom’s skin.”

“Or up her skirt,” Roger murmurs, and I grin as Cora turns to smack him for speaking such blasphemy about our mother and a deity. Roger just wrinkles his nose at Cora as he grins and grabs his arm where she hit him, pretending that the blow stung when it clearly did not.

“So, Ariel is clearly the most powerful wolf amongst us,” I say with a sigh, propping her up a little in my arms so she can look around at the family. “So, she is the Alpha now.” Ariel, betraying my confidence, just gives a sleepy little mew, her eyelids fluttering shut as she snuggles back into my arm.

Cora laughs and I feel a little pulse of pride and pleasure down my bond with Sinclair.

“At least it means she’ll be able to stand up to her brother and her cousin,” Roger says, looking between the boys – Rafe toddling around on the floor and Jesse in Cora’s arms. “Though ...none of them are very impressive just yet.”

“Do you think?” I ask, looking around at the group. “Does it...I mean, they all have gifts from mom, right? But will her being strong make the boys strong – through their bonds or something?”

"I don't know," Henry says, tilting his head and considering his grandchildren with interest.

"But," Sinclair says, clearly thinking it through as he talks, "that's not how bonds work, right? I mean, Cora and Ella are blessed with Goddess gifts, but Roger and I aren't any stronger for it."

I click my tongue, offended, and turn to glare at my mate over my shoulder. "Excuse me, Dominic, but you have benefited many times from my gift –"

"Yes, darling," he says, rolling his eyes a little and shaking his head, "but you know what I mean. We aren't physically stronger, or gifted ourselves."

"True," Cora says, looking between the two of them. "But...both of us did bond to extremely powerful Alpha wolves who just happen to be brothers "Baby," Roger says, interrupting and beaming down at her, pressing a hand to his heart. "That is...the nicest thing you've ever said to me -"

"It's just a fact, Roger," she sighs, rolling her eyes, making me laugh.

"You think I'm powerful, and tough," he whispers, sliding down the couch's arm to squeeze in behind her, wrapping his arms around her and Jesse both, rocking them back and forth. Jesse squeaks and laughs as Cora tries to hold her own laughter back. "You're amazed with me

"Oh god," she sighs, even though her grin. "I take it back –"

"Never, I'll treasure this moment my whole life –"

I'm shaking with laughter even as Sinclair raises his voice to cut through it.

"As amazing as this breakthrough is for the two of you," he says, his voice not without humor, "what's your point, Cora?"

"I don't know," she sighs, leaning contentedly back against Roger, who sweetly presses a kiss to her neck. "Just that perhaps there's more to these bonds than just raw power being passed between them. I mean, I don't think it's really a chance that Ella and I figured out we're sisters and ended up with brothers. We're...kind of a powerful foursome, when we put our minds to it."

I nod, considering that maybe Cora is right. That perhaps it's less about the bonds themselves and instead what they create in combination.

“And those three,” Cora continues, gesturing between the children, “they’re already bonded to each other, each with a goddess gift. And then Ariel with a Dark gift as well?” She shrugs. “I think, in combination, they could be... formidable.”

“Future of our nation, right here,” I say quietly, leaning to again kiss my little girl and reach out a hand to my son, who I suddenly want quite close. “Whatever gifts they have, I hope they can be convinced to use them to protect themselves first, and then our people after that.”

Quietly, my family nods as we look around at each other. Because our family comes first – but our nation?

These children are going to have a huge role in it. I hold my breath a little, praying inwardly that we can raise them to be strong enough to use their gifts for good.

“Actually,” Henry says, making us all turn to him in surprise. “There’s some precedence there as well.”

And my eyebrows nearly shoot into my hairline. More news today?

I settle back against my mate, ready again to listen.

Chapter 497 – Family Lines

Ella

Henry takes a deep breath then, looking between the children. “I have been very intrigued,” he begins, “by the idea that the children have bonds with each other – bonds like that between siblings and cousins, it’s unusual. Indeed, I thought it was unique, but it is not.”

My brows go up as I listen with interest.

“The children have created between them...something of a triangle,” Henry murmurs, looking between the three of them. “There have been rare examples of individuals having multiple fated mating bonds – my son, interestingly amongst them – ”

I lean back against my mate, who wraps his arm more tightly around me.

“But this,” Henry says, gesturing between Ariel, Rafe, and Jesse, “three people bonded together naturally, each to the other two.” He shakes his head. “I have not yet found any examples of it happening naturally. Though there are those who have...forged such connections.”

“Really?” Roger asks, his eyebrows going up.

“Usually in religious ceremonies,” Henry says, folding his hands in his lap and looking around at us, “in the wilds of the north. Two people already bonded – either by fate or by choice, usually through a mating – would each either willingly or by obligation magically forge a bond with a third.”

“For what reason,” Cora asks, shaking her head. “Like...plural marriage? Or something?”

“No,” Henry replies, shaking his head at her. “This is usually done in communities where those who undergo the ceremony have long taken vows of chastity. No, they do it for the power that results from the bond, which is said to be...unique.”

“This is so weird,” I murmur, looking down at my kids. I mean, I’m very aware that my children and my nephew are special, but...

“The magics of the north are strange,” Henry says on a sigh, shaking his head and giving a shrug. “They are also closed-mouthed regarding what the results of such bonding actually are. But I do imagine it’s closer to the kinds of powers wielded by the dark priests we spent so much of our time defying last year. Spells cast at a price, rather than goddess-given gifts freely used with little effort.”

“But since the bond between the kids was...natural,” Sinclair murmurs, speaking his thoughts aloud, “can we assume that whatever power results from them would...be easier to wield?”

“I have no idea,” Henry says on a sigh, smiling down at his grandsons and granddaughter again. “Though I hope for their sake that it is. Those forged bonds and the resulting magic – they didn’t come without a price.”

“Oh geeze,” I murmur, sighing and looking down at my precious new baby. She can barely stay awake, let alone wield great and powerful magics. “What are you going to get up to, little girl?”

“All sorts of good things,” Sinclair murmurs to me, though I can hear the worry on in his voice.

“I’m sorry I don’t have more definitive answers,” Henry says on a sigh, his face truly apologetic.

“That’s all right, dad,” Roger says, smiling at him. “It’s more than we knew before. Besides – these kids, they’re going to have to learn how to figure it out.”

“And the Goddess said to trust them,” Cora says, shrugging and standing, hoisting Jesse in her arms and smiling at him. “So, I’m just going to let them worry about it.”

I grin at my sister, realizing that this honestly is probably the best method. I mean we’re moms, there’s definitely no way we’re not going to worry. But what can we do? Cora and Roger are right – we just have to raise them well, and trust them to figure it out.

“You’re not leaving, are you?” I ask, sitting up straight as I see Roger get to his feet as well. “Don’t, stay! We can get food!” But I yawn even as I finish my sentence.

“We’re leaving,” Cora says, with a gentle smile, “because Jesse needs a nap, and so do you. And lil miss Princess over there is already asleep.”

I look down in my arms and realize that Cora’s right – Ariel’s drifted off without me noticing.

“Oh shoot,” I mutter. “I wanted to feed her...”

“We’ll leave you to it,” Cora says, leaning down and kissing me on the cheek. “I’m just a phone call away anything you need, sis.”

“Thanks, Cor,” I murmur, smiling at her and giving Roger a hug as well when he dips down to say goodbye to the baby. I wave to them as they pass out the door, Henry looking after them as they go.

“Will you stay at least, Henry?” I ask, leaning back against Sinclair.

“I’m afraid I should take my leave too,” he says as Rafe pushes to his feet and totters over him, reaching out his chubby arms and begging to be picked up. Henry laughs and obliges, lifting my little meatball into his lap. “That is, if this one will let me.”

“If he just sits on you,” I say dryly, “you’ll be too heavy to roll out of here.”

“A fate I will happily accept,” Henry murmurs, turning Rafe on his lap and hugging him close, pressing his cheek to Rafe’s dark hair. “He is so like his father at this age. It’s like having my little boy back.”

My heart fills to hear Henry talk about Rafe that way, and I feel Sinclair’s own swell of emotion down our bond.

“That one, though,” Henry says, looking over at Ariel asleep in my arms. “She is very precious to me as well, because she is so unfamiliar.”

“What do you mean?” I ask, tilting my head in curiosity.

“I never had a daughter,” he sighs, staring at my little girl with her little fuzz of golden-white hair. Then he flicks his eyes to Sinclair. “Your mother and I tried for another – she wanted a little girl very badly, you know. But the Goddess decided that two was enough.”

“I didn’t know that,” Sinclair says, his voice a little thick with his emotion.

“Yes,” Henry says, raising his eyebrows as his gaze again falls to Ariel. “So, this one is the fulfilment of a wish made long ago for a little girl Sinclair. I always wondered what she looked like.”

I clench my teeth against the pricking of tears against my eyes, not wanting Henry to think that I’m sad or that I pity him. It’s just – I never knew he wanted that, never knew my sweet daughter would mean so much to him.

“Do you know,” Henry says, cocking his head, and I lean forward, listening intently. “I never thought she’d be a blonde.”

I burst into laughter at this, and so does my mate, and I wipe away the little tears that spill out from my eyes. “Well, we don’t know if she’s going to stay blonde,” I say, grinning and shaking my head. “Her hair could get darker -”

“No, Ella,” Henry says, raising his eyes to me. “It is clear that this one is your daughter.

She'll have her mother's beauty, which includes your unique hair. She's a Sinclair in name... but she's her mother born again."

"She's got to have some part of me," Sinclair murmurs, a little jealous, leaning forward to peer at her.

"Time will tell," Henry says, leaning back in his chair. Rafe bumbles something, looking up at his grandfather, who grins down at him and runs a hand over his head. "Either way, I am very glad to be their grandfather. I'm so pleased I'll get to see them grow, Goddess willing."

I nod, agreeing to the sentiment, thinking that the children are lucky to have such an eager and dedicated grandfather.

"I do wish," Henry says, I think a little lost in his thoughts now, "that I were more able to play with them – could participate more in helping you raise them by getting down on the floor, running, walking. But," he shrugs, "when the children are big enough to stand on the back of the chair, at least they'll always have someone to cart them around -"

"Oh my god," I say, the words spilling out of my mouth. "Oh my god," I sit up straight, staring at Henry, my eyes flicking to his legs – because honestly, I don't even notice his chair anymore, or think of him at all as someone whose abilities are hindered.

Or of me as someone who is able to do anything about it.

Henry looks at me, his eyebrows going up in surprise as I hastily – but carefully pass Ariel into Sinclair's arms, my mate looking at me curiously too.

"Henry," I breathe, reaching for him, taking his hand. "Why didn't you say anything sooner? Why didn't – I'm so sorry – why didn't I think of it – "

"What are you talking about, Ella?" he asks, frowning at me a little. Even Rafe gives a curious little squeak.

"I'm so stupid," I say, closing my eyes, frantically seeking my gift. "If I can heal you, why didn't anyone -"

"Oh, Ella," Henry says, drawing his hand out of mine. Shocked, I open my eyes, looking into his own. "Ella, my dear, I don't think it works like that."

"What?" I ask, surprised.

"I don't think your gift can heal what has already healed," he says, shaking his head at me. "A disability like this – it is not an injury. Your gift, from what I've learned from your using it, heals what is wrong with my body. But what happened to me so long ago – I've healed from it. My body is just different now – I'm not sick."

"Oh," I say, the logic of that hitting me like a slap in the face. I bite my lip though, dropping my eyes. "Well, would you let me try?"

"Of course, my dear," he murmurs, giving me back his hand.

And so I close my eyes, and access my gift, and breathe softly as it sweeps through Henry. It knits up a few little things that I think are natural with age, but as it moves through him...

He's right.

There's nothing sick or injured about Henry's legs or his spine. The wounds they healed long ago – perhaps not in the way we would have liked but...his body already did the work my gift would have done, as best it could.

Disappointment must be all over my face, because when I open my eyes Henry clucks his tongue and moves his chair closer, cupping my cheek in his palm. "Thank you for wanting to try, Ella. But really – I am not unhappy with my life in this chair. I am a blessed man and as much as I would have liked to run with my grandchildren... well, I'm a bit old for that anymore anyway, aren't I?"

"You are not," I say, scrunching my nose at him.

"Well," Henry laughs, grinning at me as Sinclair sits forward, pressing himself close to my side. "At least I can roll with them, which is probably just as good."

I smile at him, nodding and leaning back to rest my head on Sinclair's shoulder as I do.

"You're going to be the best grandfather, Henry," I say, sighing a little as I smile at him. "They're lucky to have you."

"And I them," he says, grinning down at Rafe and giving my son a wink. "

What do you think, little boy? Should we roll to the kitchens? Get a snack?"

In response to his fifth favorite word – only behind Mama, Papa, Jesse, and breakfast – Rafe's little face lights up and he throws his hands in the air, giving an excited squeak. We all laugh and Henry raises an eyebrow at us. When Sinclair nods his assent, Rafe and his grandfather roll away, off on a little adventure.

And I lean back against my mate, holding my lucky little girl tight in my arms.

Chapter 498 – Baptizing the Princess

Ella

Three weeks later – Ariel was born under a waning quarter moon, not a new moon like her brother and her cousin – I stand anxiously in the woods, my little girl held tight in my arms.

“I’m sensing some anxiety,” Cora says, grinning at me with a little too much glee as she comes up to my side, dressed in a gorgeous silver gown, Jesse awake and interested on her hip.

“I wasn’t anxious like this when Rafe went in,” I sigh, reaching out to touch Jesse’s nose with my fingertip, making him giggle. “I mean, don’t get me wrong, I was anxious – but it’s this one’s complicated little portent that has me all worked up.”

“I know,” Cora says, wrinkling her nose at me wickedly. “I can’t wait – the payback is real-”

“Don’t you dare,” I say, glaring at her and pointing a finger at her. “You’re trying to deliberately jinx my daughter just because your Jesse has some weird shadow magic coming his way – ”

“I would never!” Cora says, laughing and swatting my finger away. “I just like teasing you, Ella. Hear that, Ariel?” she says, leaning over to grin at her goddaughter. “I hope that your future comes out nice and safe and boring, for your mother’s sake.”

“Oh, hold your tongue,” I mutter, scowling and moving Ariel away from her aunt. “I don’t want her life to be boring, I just want...” I sigh, looking down at the little girl who has my whole heart. “I just want it all to be very good, and for her to be safe...but also to have some adventures along the way.”

“A big ask,” Sinclair says, ambling over to my side with a glass of champagne in one hand, Rafe perched on his hip. “Especially for a little girl named Baby Trouble.”

I grin when I hear the nickname, considering that...well, it’s a little bit true, even if the name so far has been a bit of a joke.

Honestly, we’ve called her Ariel very little she’s baby trouble, most of the time. Or Princess Trouble. Or Princess Baby Bubble Trouble. Or whatever combination thereof inspires us at the moment. And, well, she hasn’t really lived up to it – not yet. Rafe – he was a tough newborn, at least for the first two weeks. But Ariel?

God, she’s been a little bit of a dream.

I can only hope that her nickname continues to be ironic for the rest of her days, but I know that's too much to hope for.

Rafe eagerly leans forward from his father's hip, reaching for his sister, spitting out an excited series of syllables that all start with "ba!"

"You like your sister, little guy?" Cora says, laughing and putting a hand on Rafe's chest to keep him from excitedly spilling out of his father's arms.

"We think he's trying to say baby," I say, grinning at my boy, pleasure and pride filling me from head to toe. I mean – I know every mom is proud of her children. But Rafe – he really is such a sweet baby and a clever boy, always wanting to be close to me, close to Ariel.

And his dad too, of course but Rafe and me? We've really got a special bond.

"All right," Roger says, his own baby on his arm and glass of champagne in his hand, just like his brother. "Almost time! Are we ready to do this?"

"Don't talk about it like a sports match, Roger," I say, raising my chin at him jokingly. "It's a sacred ritual. Please act with the gravity it deserves."

"It's our third one, Ella," Roger says, playfully rolling his eyes at me. "It's getting old – "

"You're fated to be the father of like six kids, Roger," I say, rolling my eyes at him right back. "Tell me that when we get to your sixth baptism – "

"At that point we're just going to wander into the back yard in our pajamas," he murmurs, nodding first towards the baby in my arms and then to Cora, silently indicating that I should hand her over. "We're going to drink beer and hold the baby out to the moon on a dish towel, use a plastic baby pool instead of the sacred pond -"

"We are not," Cora scoffs, gently taking Ariel into her arms as Sinclair and I laugh. Roger grins, leaning forward to kiss me on the cheek before passing Jesse to me.

"You know I'm kidding, right, Ells?" he whispers.

I smile at my brother-in-law and gently pat his cheek. "When in doubt, Roger," I sigh, "I always assume you're kidding."

"This is why you're my favorite sister-in-law," he says, ruffling Jesse's hair before turning towards the Goddess' priestess, who begins to call everyone to order. "Now, let's get this party started!"

Cora

I smile down at my perfect little niece, who is looking around the dark forest with interest. “Ready to meet your granny, little girl?” I whisper to her, holding her close and kissing her forehead. “She’s excited to meet you, she told me so.”

Ariel gives a little squeak, which sounds so much like a response that it makes me laugh.

Roger laughs too, wrapping an arm around my shoulders. “Remember the last time we were out here?” he murmurs, and I look up at him.

“Yup,” I say, grinning. “We fought the whole time. I was completely ready to shove you into that pond.”

“Oh, right back at you,” he says, nodding fervently. “It was either that, or grab you and kiss you – I didn’t know which I wanted more. Maybe both shove you into the pond, dive in after you, grab you, kiss you until we both drowned...”

I laugh, shaking my head. “Well, we know which one you settled on, in the end.”

“Well you were crying so much,” he says, rolling his eyes in pretend exhaustion, “I didn’t know how else to get you to stop -”

“Oh, you idiot,” I sigh, laughing and stopping for a second, wrapping my hand around the lapel of his suit jacket and pulling him to me. “Can’t you just for once say something nice?”

“What do you want to hear, Cora?” he asks, smirking down at me and taking my face between his hands. “That it was the happiest moment of my life to that point? That I’d been waiting to kiss you for months, and that afterwards I had to actively stop myself from grabbing you and kissing you every time you walked into a room?”

My smile grows. “Something like that,” I murmur, and I tug on his coat just a little, pulling him down for our second kiss in this forest – which is just as good as the first.

“I love you so much, Cora,” he sighs when he pulls away, his eyelids heavy as he stares down into my face.

“I love you too, Roger,” I say, smiling up at him, passing every ounce of love I feel down our bond so he knows I mean it. Because we tease – but god, do I love this man.

Roger leans in for another kiss, but a silver light flares at the edge of my vision.

“Oh,” I say, my eyebrows going up as I adjust the baby in my arms and turn towards the light. “I think mom is getting impatient.”

“Well then,” Roger says, his arm still around my shoulder, “let’s not keep the Goddess waiting.”

So together, my mate and I carry our little goddaughter forward to the edge of the pool that forms through the trees. I smile to see that this one is different surrounded by rocks this time, a tiny waterfall splashing into it at the edge. Secretive and peaceful, like a hidden hot spring.

Roger nods to me and I step forward, holding unwrapping the baby and holding her out into the moonlight that floods into the grove from above. And then he and I say the sacred words, dedicating our sweet Ariel to her grandmother the Goddess, pledging to love and protect her all our lives.

The moonlight grows brighter as we speak, and I feel a warmth and contentment fill me that I know comes from my mother, who is truly pleased with her granddaughter.

When the words are done, our attention shifts, because – as it did before – the premonition starts to take shape in the air above the water. And as we watch, Roger and my eyes go wide.

Chapter 499 – A Story to Come

Cora

The images of Ariel's future come in quick flashes, and somehow I get the impression that the Goddess is eager to share these glimpses of her life.

The ones that come first are what I sort of expected, especially after seeing some images of Rafe's childhood and hearing about the ones that Ella and Sinclair saw during Jesse's baptism. But these ones focus on an angelic little girl with rose-gold hair who is just... ridiculously happy.

My ears fill almost instantly with tears to see her running and playing with the boys who are so clearly Rafe and Jesse. Ariel – she's always at the center of their games, always laughing so heartily her eyes are barely open above her rosy cheeks. In one flash, Jesse's climbed up onto the branch of a tree and is reaching a hand down for her as Rafe boosts her up from below. In another, Ariel is cuddled between her brother and her cousin, all wrapped up in a big blanket as the three sit around a campfire, their eyes wide and bright as they roast marshmallows and look with awe up at Roger, who is clearly in the midst of telling a scary story.

Roger laughs beside me at the sight and I press myself close to them as we get more insight into her life as she grows older, her teenager years as she becomes the Nation's princess, as she grows into a beautiful, graceful young woman but still one full of pranks, running through the halls of the palace with her brother and Jesse chasing behind.

And then I gasp, a little, to see our little girl dressed as a bride –

My hand goes to my mouth- because she looks so young and so afraid –

My stomach drops when I see her what looks like a moment later, her back pressed to a door as she sobs in her wedding gown as two young men who are so clearly my son and my nephew jump to her side.

The images move faster than I can truly process them next, but my hand falls from my mouth, and my jaw drops in awe as I realize that

That she didn't get married after all, but instead that she ran, that she's...

She's with Jesse and Rafe, as they attend some kind of military school dressed up in fatigues, her hair tucked up beneath a cap, looking for anything like...like a boy...

"Oh my god," I mutter, and then I laugh because it just gets stranger after that-

Ariel, mixing potions in a chemistry class, her eyes going wide as one goes awry and explodes in front of her –

Ariel, an expert sniper, crouching on top of a tower and hitting the bullseye of a target that must be half a mile away

Ariel, curled up in a chair by the fire, sitting in the lap of a very handsome young man whose jaw could cut glass and whose adorable dimples are

And joy swells in me, because I know it instantly, that that boy – he's her mate

But then I gasp again because the image changes – and Ariel is looking up at another young man powerfully built, scowling down at her in some hallway made of stone, but she shoves him, hard, and whips a finger up to point in his face, a defiant snarl on her lips, looking so much like her mother –

And even as a shocked little laugh spills from my mouth, anxiety twists in my stomach, because I know...

I know just as much as I did with the first boy, that this one – he's her mate too.

I can't help it then, I look down at my little baby niece, who burbles and looks up at the moon –

Two fated mates, just like her father...

And suddenly, what the Goddess said to me in my living room that day so many months ago...

It makes...so much sense.

My eyes move back to the images, which fly by even faster now – too swift to catch them all – and I see of our children training hard, laughing together, working to build their lives and help each other and serve our nation –

The last image, though, lingers.

Ariel, with Rafe and Jesse on either side as they always are and her two mates behind her. All standing together on a battlefield with Ariel at the center, magic welling between her hands and passing to her brother, to her cousin.

Their faces are serious as they look at something gathering above them some force I cannot see.

And then...

The image disperses. It disappears.

Roger and I stay still for a long moment, and I'm only shaken out of it by a little mewling cry from Ariel's tiny mouth.

"Poor baby, you must be cold," I murmur, pulling her close and wrapping her up in her blanket. Ariel tucks her little head against me, closing her eyes and opening her mouth in a wide yawn.

"Wow," Roger murmurs as he stares down at our niece. "Wow, I was not expecting that..."

I laugh a little, looking up at him and shaking my head. "Neither was I."

"Damn, Ariel," he says, laughing and running a shocked hand through his hair. "Looks like you've got one hell of a story to tell."

"Come on, baby," I say, laughing and shaking my head at her. "Let's go tell your mom... only the things she absolutely needs to know."

"Really?" Roger asks, raising his eyebrows at me.

"What are aunties for?" I say, shrugging and smirking at him. "A girl's got to have someone to keep her secrets."

He laughs, wrapping an arm around me as we turn back. But before we go I cast one more look over my shoulder, smiling up at the moon and sending a mental thank-you to my mother for her gift, for this glimpse of the future.

And the moonlight flares, just once, and I smile. Because I know she heard.

Ella

"Oh, they're back, they're back!" I gasp, shoving my half-drunk glass of champagne onto a table and rushing forward when I see Cora and Roger emerging from the dark of the woods with Ariel sleeping in Cora's arms. Our gathered family and friends shout a cheer, welcoming them back.

Cora smiles at me, her expression warm and rich as I hurry to her.

"Tell me everything," I gasp, taking my baby back and cooing to her as I rest her little head in the crook of my elbow, gazing down at her perfect, sleeping face.

“Well wait for me,” Sinclair says, laughing as he comes to join our little circle with Jesse on one hip and Rafe on the other. “Honestly, Ella, I’m her parent too – ”

“You should have been faster then,” I say, rolling my eyes at him.

“I’m carrying two kids – ”

But I just ignore him and turning back to Cora. “Go! Spill!”

“I don’t know, Ells,” she says, smiling at me and reaching to take Jesse from Sinclair. “Honestly, as a mother? I’m not sure you want to know.”

My face goes pale with shock and terror and Roger scowls at his mate.

“Cora, don’t say it like that,” he says, giving her a half-hearted glare before reaching out a hand and placing it on my shoulder. “Seriously, Ella, it was all fine – there’s nothing bad. I mean, both Jesse and Rafe showed us that there’s a war coming – and that affects Ariel’s life, as it will all of ours. But seriously – all good news from the Goddess. She’s going to have an incredible life.”

“Really?” I gasp, holding my daughter tight, and looking between my sister and her mate. “You wouldn’t lie to me? It’s really all okay?”

“It is,” Cora says, laughing and reaching out to gently touch my cheek.

I exhale a huge sigh of relief, looking down at my little girl. “You had me scared, baby trouble,” I murmur, tracing a finger over her soft little cheek. But then my mind traces back to what Cora said. “Wait,” I say, my head whipping back up. “What wouldn’t I want to know as a mother!?”

“I mean, I’ll tell you sis – but aren’t there some things a mom should be in the dark about?” Cora asks.

I tilt my head back and groan, honestly not knowing. “I don’t know, Cora – are there!?”

She laughs and I look first at Sinclair, who shrugs, and then back at my sister.

“Come on,” Roger says, nodding at the crowds of people waiting to congratulate us and at the small table of refreshments. “Let’s decide this over some champagne.”

Sinclair nods at me and I sigh, moving with my family and pondering my choices as we accept the congratulations of our friends and let Henry hold the baby for a while, filling him in on the good omens that the Goddess has given us about her future.

“All right,” I say, sidling up to Cora, my eyes on the baby in her grandfather’s arms. “If you think it’s going to stress me out...don’t tell me. But...give me a hint. Is it...like, illness? Or is she lonely? Oh, I really don’t want her to be lonely. Or -”

“It’s none of that, Ella,” Cora says, her eyes sparkling as she smiles at me. “She’s a really happy kid, and her early life she really loves it. She and Jesse and Rafe are all best friends and they stay together through their twenties, at least.”

“So,” I say, cocking my head and studying her. “What...”

“Let’s just say,” Cora says, her grin widening, “that your little girl? Her love life is... tumultuous.”

“Oh my god,” I groan, but I’m laughing as I cover my face with my hands and tilt it back to the sky. Because that? A little heartbreak, a little drama? I mean, Cora’s right – I’m not sure I want to know the details. But that I can handle.

As I pull my hands away from my face, I look upwards through the trees where the moon peeks through the leaves. “Oh mom,” I say, shaking my head a little. “What do you have in store for my little girl?”

“A lot,” Cora says, laughing and sipping at her champagne, Jesse leaning his sleepy head against her shoulder.

“So...” I say, stepping close and whispering – not really wanting Sinclair to hear because something in me tells me that this Alpha dad is not ready to hear about his three-week-old daughter’s future love life – “is she... did you see? Does she have a mate?”

Cora’s smile is bright, but a little wicked. I turn my head, curious. “Yes, Ella,” she says, nodding happily, “your little girl...she’s mated.”

I give a little squeak of joy, my face bursting into a grin as I step closer. “Is he...is he cute?!”

“Really cute,” Cora says, stepping close to share the secret and wrinkling her nose as she dishes. “Like really cute, Ella – big time – ”

I squeak again, turning in a happy little circle. “So, did you get to see...I mean, like a timeline for when she meets him!?”

Cora just shakes her head, though. “I don’t think I should say anymore,” she says, giving a shrug. “I mean, I will if you want me to, Ella, but...” she turns her smile now on our little girl. “I think ...maybe just let her live her life. Don’t you want to be surprised?”

“Yes,” I sigh, leaning against my sister’s other shoulder with a scowl, even though happiness races through me. “I hate it when you’re all wise.”

“It’s the burden I bear,” she sighs, resting her head against mine. “Because if you don’t know, that means you don’t have to keep the secret from Sinclair. Because if he knows?” she blows out a breath. “Ella, if he knew what I know, he’d lock her up in a tower. Like a princess in a fairytale.”

“Damn,” I say, pursing my lips, even though I can’t help being excited for my girl’s future even if I’m also very willing to save all of that drama for twenty years. “Baby trouble is right.”

“Baby trouble,” Cora says with a sigh, nodding, “is absolutely right.”

Chapter 500 – Happily Ever

Ella

“Nope,” Sinclair says, heaving himself out of bed and grabbing his phone off the bedside table as he does. “I can’t live like this, Ella – I’m calling Roger, I’ve got to know – ”

“Dominic!” I say, laughing and grabbing for him, trying to catch the edge of his pajamas and failing because I’ve got a sleeping baby in my arms and another pressed warmly to my side. “Don’t, come back!”

“I just!” he says, pressing the phone to his ear and running a frantic hand through his hair. “You tell me that there’s drama in her life, but that it’s no big deal, and that it’s girl stuff? What the hell am I supposed to do with that for the next twenty years!?”

“You’re supposed to sit down,” I say, laughing harder now and patting the mattress on his side of the bed, still warm from his delicious body heat. “Honestly, if this is the way you react after all of our daughters’ baptisms, we’re not having them anymore – ”

Sinclair sighs and pulls the phone from his face, slumping back down on the bed. “Fine,” he sighs. “Just boys, after this.”

“Mmkay, sweetie,” I murmur, even though my mind flashes back to the vision my mother’s priests gave me so long ago. We’ve got two more coming I think a boy and a girl. But who knows what their own futures hold.

“I’m glad you came to your senses and hung up the phone,” I murmur, scooting myself and my two children closer to him, my voice a little smug.

“I didn’t,” Sinclair mutters, wrapping an arm around my shoulders. “Roger just didn’t pick up.”

I grin at him, shaking my head. “Why can’t you just take good news for what it is? Human families don’t get any insight when their children are born, and Roger and Cora told us that Ariel has an incredible life. The drama – it’s going to happen whether or not you know what it is.”

“Well, you know what it is,” he says, sending me a rueful little glare.

“I do not,” I say, laughing and resting my head on his shoulder. “Cora knows, and she has sworn Roger to secrecy. Ariel’s life – it’s her business. I think we should be just grateful that we know our two children are going to grow to be healthy and happy.”

“I know,” Sinclair sighs, pulling me closer, relaxing and letting himself feel his exhaustion, finally, as the morning light streams around the curtains that we’ve pulled shut so we can get some sleep. He turns his head and kisses my hair after a moment, which makes me smile as I look down at my baby girl, my thumb tracing long strokes along my beautiful son's cheek.

We stay that way for a long moment, peace and contentment radiating through the four of us and along our bonds.

"Dominic," I say quietly, my mind turning softly. "What do you think? If you had the chance...would you want to know? What your godmother saw, what was all laid out for you by the Goddess?"

"What do you mean?" he murmurs, and I turn my head to look at him, smiling when I see that his eyes are moving between our two perfect kids.

"I mean," I say after a long moment, and his green eyes shift to me. "If you... had a chance. To know that...your first mating was going to eventually fail. But that there was me, on the other end of it. And all the confusion at the start when we met and I was already pregnant with your kid, and everything we went through, and the two beautiful children at the end – "

"Alongside a wonderful partnership," he murmurs, tugging me close and kissing my cheek, "which, honestly, is my favorite part – "

"Even more than the kids!?" I gasp, my mouth falling open a bit.

"I mean, the kids," he says, shrugging as if they're not much, which makes me laugh. But then he goes a little rigid as he realizes something, raising his eyes to glare at me a bit. "Wait, are you saying you like the kids more than me!?"

My laughter bursts from me now as I shake my head at him. "No, Dominic. I think – I mean, I think we both mean the same thing. It's our little family that results from all of it, and each part of it is individually wonderful, and of course you are at the center of all of it for me. You're – you're my mate, my love." I shake my head, smiling at him. "The center of my universe. But the whole universe we've built, Dominic it's all wonderful."

"That's precisely what I mean, and how I feel," he says with a steady sigh, tilting my face up to press a soft kiss to my mouth. "You just say it way better than me."

"Well," I say, shaking my hair back over my shoulders haughtily. "I have a way with words."

"Mmhmm," he hums, dropping his head a little to press a kiss to the underside of my jaw and then to my neck, sending a shiver through me. " Amongst other things."

I smile and wait for him to lift his head again, bringing his gaze back to mine. "So?" I say, pushing, truly wanting his answer. "What do you think? If your godmother saw all of this – would you have wanted to know?"

He takes a deep breath, thinking it through. "Well," he says, contemplative, "on one hand, it would have saved me a great deal of stress and sadness at some points in my life, to know that this was waiting for me that this was the true, wonderful hand the Goddess was waiting to deal for me."

He passes some memories down the bond to me in a flash of explanation for what he means when he says a great deal of stress and sadness. I see the loss of his mother, the years he spent tortured, pining for his first mate when she was with Roger, and then their tumultuous marriage, the wanting a child and never being blessed with one, the mating bond he eventually rejected. Then the years after that of just feeling ...empty. And then of meeting me, and wanting me, and wanting our child but not knowing what it meant, to have a child with a woman he thought was human...

I nod, truly understanding. "It would have helped me to," I say. And then I do the same, passing my own memories to him. The horrible years with only Cora by my side, when we each had to play mother and sister to each other. The horrible unknowing years when I was at my darkest point, and then my terrible ex-boyfriend, who I had truly thought I loved – but who betrayed me so deeply. The terrible longing for a child I thought I would never have...

"But," Sinclair says, staring deep into my eyes and passing the warm balm of his love down our bond to me, wiping away those terrible memories. "As much as it would have been good to know what was waiting, Ella...it's important to me that we chose this, and we fought for it – every step of the way. That it wasn't just some fate that the Goddess gave to us. That even if it was fated...we wanted it, we wanted each other. We'd have picked this life anyway, even if it wasn't fate."

Tears slip down my cheeks as I nod at him, because now he's the one saying it just right.

"I'd pick you, Dominic," I say, my voice shaking with my love for him. "In a thousand lifetimes, a thousand chances to make the same choices – I'd do it all again."

He shakes his head at me as tears fill his own eyes and he leans forward, pulling me against him while somehow miraculously managing not to crush our children between us as he holds me tight in his arms.

"So, I guess it wouldn't matter," he murmurs against my hair as I sniff back my tears and nod. "Knowing or not? I've got you now, and our wonderful life, and it's worth everything we paid to get here. You're my everything, trouble."

And I laugh, pulling back a little and shaking my head at him and giving him a smile even. "I think we're obliged now," I say, nodding down at our little girl, "to pass the 'trouble' nickname fully down to Ariel."

"Nah," Sinclair says, smirking at me as he moves his thumbs over my cheeks, wiping away all of my tears. "She might be baby trouble, but you'll always be my trouble. And you'll always be mine."

And I nod, and smile softly at him, because...well, because that feels just right.

"And what about this one?" I say, running my hand over Rafe's soft hair, smiling down at his little body pressed close to me, his mouth just lightly open, his long lashes dark against his chubby cheeks. "He's not trouble?"

"This little guy?" Sinclair says, grinning as he reaches out a hand to rub his son's back. "No way – he's too sweet to be much trouble. He's going to be the best kid."

"You're going to have to teach him to act tough," I say with a little laugh, "or everyone's going to see right through him and take advantage of his soft heart."

"No problem," Sinclair says with a grin. "We'll build him some steely armor to protect that sweet heart of his."

I smile too as I look at my son, but my mind is on his father, who is so much the same. My sweetheart Alpha – the scariest and most powerful man in the world, probably, but also the kindest person I've ever met. A good King, a better mate – a wonderful father.

God, how did I get to be so lucky?

"I love you, Dominic," I sigh, resting my head against him and closing my eyes.

"I love you too, Ella," he murmurs in reply, his arm still holding me tight as we both drift off into a doze, our much-loved, long-desired perfect son sleeping between us. Our wonderful, brand new baby girl still curled against the crook of my arm.

And, even though I know I shouldn't let myself doze like this – that I should put Rafe in his crib, and Ariel in her bassinet –

That Dominic and I should lay down and get some proper sleep stretched out so we don't wake up with aching necks

That I'm going to be up in twenty minutes anyway when Ariel cries, needing to be fed or changed

Well. I just let myself fall into the doze anyway. Because everything is just so perfect right now in this moment that not a single part of me wants to disturb it.

And so, curled warm against my mate with my arms wrapped around the children I always dreamed I'd have but thought I never could, I sleep in complete peace, content in the knowledge that when I do wake up?

It's going to be the start of the rest of my wonderful life – one I'm so thrilled I get to live with my Alpha by my side.

THE END