

The Amazing Son in law/

Super Hero Charlie Wade - Charlie Wade Chapter 7248

As the first group to arrive and not surrender, the Yamaguchi-gumi found themselves in an extremely uncomfortable situation. Their primary concern now wasn't escape, but proving their innocence, as the inability to defend themselves was particularly frustrating.

The Inagawa-kai was similarly disheartened. They felt trapped, like captors who had unexpectedly become captives themselves.

No one knew who was blocking the retreat outside, but the enemy clearly had the upper hand. The enemy had cars forming an encirclement and well-positioned fortifications, making them seem unbeatable.

In contrast, the only available cover was the dozen corpses strewn near the door.

However, using the corpses as cover wouldn't help them break through, as the enemy would attack the moment they exposed themselves.

The encirclement was wide, and several cars were positioned outside the exit. If they ran out quickly, they might use these vehicles for cover. But the 20 to 30 meters between the exit and the cars were completely exposed to enemy fire. It seemed unlikely that more than a few could make it, and even if they did, they would still be trapped within the encirclement.

With no clear escape, they had no choice but to remain hidden for now.

In these circumstances, teaming up with the Yamaguchi-gumi seemed like a reasonable option. Yet the Inagawa-kai worried that the Yamaguchi-gumi had already secured the hidden money. Helping them break out would feel like aiding their escape indirectly.

For the Inagawa-kai, cooperating to escape was acceptable, but ensuring someone else's success was out of the question.

Meanwhile, the eleven assassins outside the Bluestone Alliance were also in a tough spot. The Sumiyoshi-kai's encirclement was wide enough for the assassins to hide behind and under several cars. Though still undetected, they couldn't move without risking exposure. Acting rashly would turn them into immediate targets.

The Sumiyoshi-kai's small leader, aware of his tactical advantage, aimed to solidify his position. He instructed his men, "Get a few high-powered off-road vehicles. I'll create a gap in the encirclement, and you drive in to push the other cars aside. We need to clear them out. If they try to use those vehicles for cover when they escape, it could cause problems for us."

Several subordinates quickly chose three high-powered off-road vehicles and prepared to drive into the encirclement to clear the way.

This forced the eleven assassins of the Bluestone Alliance into a desperate situation. They were hiding among scattered vehicles, knowing that if the enemy cleared them away, they would be exposed. Retreating or breaking through was unrealistic under these circumstances. Even as top-tier assassins, their chances of survival were slim.

One of the assassins urgently whispered to the captain through the intercom, "Captain, they're about to clear the vehicles at the door. We'll be exposed soon. What should we do?"

The captain, hearing the message and sensing the tension of the nearby Inagawa-kai members, cursed silently. "Are you stupid? How can I call you back now? If I do, I'll be exposed!"

As the captain delayed his response and the enemy vehicle drew nearer, the assassin, seizing the cover of the engine noise, raised his voice in desperation. "Captain! Say something!"

Startled by the loud voice, the captain quickly shut off his communicator. But the Inagawa-kai members nearby had already heard it. One of them whispered, "Who the hell is still making calls right now?"

The captain stayed silent. It was dark enough that his identity was hidden. As long as he didn't speak again, no one could pinpoint him.

Several Inagawa-kai members heard the call, but in the darkness, no one could identify who had made it.

Suddenly, someone muttered, "Brother! I think there's a spy here. I heard someone say 'captain' on the communicator, but I missed the rest!"

"Spy?!" The Inagawa-kai captain immediately tensed.

Trapped between danger ahead and threats behind, he couldn't see clearly in the darkness. The possibility of an enemy infiltrator worried him.

Thinking fast, he ordered, "Everyone, get down and turn on your phones. Look around for any unfamiliar faces!"

"Damn it!" The Bluestone Alliance captain seethed silently. "If they really do this, I'm done. I may be well-trained, but I can't fight off a whole group by myself. If they rush me, I won't stand a chance..."

Chapter 7249

He found himself in a dilemma. Staying meant risking discovery. Escaping was equally grim, given the situation outside. His men had no clear way out either. If he was caught while fleeing, it would lead to an assault from both inside and outside.

Just as he hesitated, unsure of what to do, a sudden gunshot rang out outside!

One of his men was hiding in front of a Toyota Alphard. A Sumiyoshi-kai off-road vehicle barreled straight toward the Alphard at high speed, showing no signs of stopping. The off-road vehicle crashed into the side and rear of the Alphard with a loud bang, sending the car skidding sideways.

The assassin hiding in front of the Alphard feared being run over and quickly rolled away, attempting to hide under the adjacent car. Unfortunately, he was caught in the glare of the headlights.

The Sumiyoshi-kai members standing guard outside the encirclement spotted him immediately. Without waiting for orders, those with guns drew their weapons and opened fire. The assassin scrambled under the car, dodging the bullets, and rolled to the other side. He turned sideways and returned fire.

Despite his efforts, he was outnumbered. Although he managed to kill one Sumiyoshi-kai member, he was struck by a bullet in the left shoulder as he leaned forward to shoot.

Seeing the fight break out and their comrade injured, the other assassins knew escape was impossible. From their hiding spots, they opened fire on the Sumiyoshi-kai members.

The area outside the door erupted into a chaotic gunfight, with continuous gunfire echoing all around.

Though some Sumiyoshi-kai members fell, they maintained the advantage in numbers and firepower. After several rounds, they had killed three Bluestone Alliance assassins and injured two more.

The Sumiyoshi-kai leader at the scene seized the opportunity. Using their encirclement to their advantage, he ordered his men to start the vehicles, preparing to tighten the perimeter. He deliberately shouted, "Brothers, get some bottles and siphon gasoline from the tanks! Let's make incendiary bombs and burn these bastards alive in the encirclement!"

"Bastards!" one Bluestone Alliance member yelled from behind a car. "If you have the guts, let's see whose gun is faster and more accurate! Throwing firebombs isn't heroic!"

The Sumiyoshi-kai leader sneered. "I only care about who dies first!"

He then commanded his men, "Get ready to set the fire! Burn them all!"

Realizing the Sumiyoshi-kai intended to use incendiary bombs, the Bluestone Alliance members exchanged quick hand signals and sprinted toward the entrance.

Staying inside offered a faint chance of survival. Outside, if the Sumiyoshi-kai threw firebombs, death was inevitable. Their only hope was to retreat indoors.

Hearing footsteps rushing inside, the Inagawa-kai leader no longer cared about finding spies. He immediately shouted, "Brothers, whoever comes in—kill them!"

For a moment, gunshots echoed relentlessly through the corridor.

The surviving Bluestone Alliance members were immediately attacked by the Inagawa-kai as they entered, completely shattering their morale.

They were seasoned international assassins who had taken down high-profile targets. Many missions deemed impossibly difficult had been successfully completed by them. Yet, they had never experienced such humiliating helplessness—caught between two groups and brutally assaulted.

The Inagawa-kai members fought with fierce determination and rage. They had previously been ambushed, and one of their own, who had been about to drive out, was killed by the enemy outside. Their pent-up anger now exploded on the Bluestone Alliance assassins.

As soon as the assassins entered, two were gunned down in the chaos. The survivors dropped to the ground, firing back and shouting, "Stop shooting! There are enemies outside! Your people were just killed by them! We were chased in by them!"

The Bluestone Alliance's return fire hit several Inagawa-kai members. The worst casualty was the Bluestone Alliance captain, who was struck in the thigh by a stray bullet, causing him to bleed heavily.

He realized the bullet in his leg likely came from one of his own men.

But he couldn't retaliate. In the chaos, firing at his allies was not an option. The muzzle flash in the darkness would be glaringly obvious, and others would see his gun aimed at the wrong people. The Inagawa-kai were already suspicious of a spy; one wrong move could get him killed.

Desperation overtook him. At this rate, escape seemed impossible.

He never imagined that this backstage passage, just a few hundred meters long, would turn into a brutal meat grinder. And now, he and the elite Bluestone Alliance assassins were being relentlessly driven into it, step by step...