Tawana paused for a moment before responding.

With a confused expression, she asked, “What do you mean, dear? I don’t quite understand.”

Trevor forced a bitter smile and replied, “I mean, I’ll be heading back for training soon. Once you’ve completed these 20 performances in China and returned to the United States, will we still be in a relationship?”

Tawana immediately reassured him, “Of course! Why would we break up because of these 20 concerts?”

Trevor sighed, his tone tinged with dejection. “I don’t know... I just don’t feel as confident as I used to.”

After a brief hesitation, he continued, “You know, after everything that happened in Tokyo, it feels like our perspectives might have shifted. Before that, I never imagined someone like Mr. Wade could exist. I’m worried that this might also affect your worldview and what you look for in a partner.”

Tawana smiled softly, her instinct to comfort him surfacing. However, she hesitated. Since Trevor had brought it up, she felt it would be insincere to gloss over the truth.

Letting out a slight sigh, she said earnestly, “Honestly, Mr. Wade did leave a deep impression on me. Like you, I never imagined a man like him could exist. Do you think I was impressed? Of course. Was I moved? Naturally.”

Trevor’s expression showed no surprise, though there was a hint of sadness and resignation.

Tawana continued, “But darling, these feelings are just part of human nature. Just as you might admire him, I can’t help but do so too—it’s instinctive and uncontrollable.”

“Think about it: your fans or mine—they admire us for qualities that set us apart. But does that mean they can’t fall in love, marry, or build families of their own?”

“In essence, we’re both fans of Mr. Wade, just like so many others. But like most rational fans, I have no unrealistic fantasies. I admire him, yes, but in my life, you are my partner.”

Tawana’s words came straight from her heart, sincere and unfiltered.

She deeply admired Charlie Wade but understood that they came from two entirely different worlds. At best, she might transition from being his fan to his friend. She knew she wasn’t even qualified to be his confidante.

Trevor had initially assumed that Tawanna would either deny her feelings or confess outright that she loved Charlie Wade, leading to a breakup.

However, her heartfelt words took him by surprise and moved him deeply.

Trevor didn't feel jealous of Charlie Wade; like Tawanna, he also admired him.

Hearing Tawanna's honest acknowledgment of her feelings clarified her perspective for Trevor.

Even when she admitted to admiring and liking Charlie Wade, Trevor didn't feel threatened or insecure.

Instead, he was touched by her honesty and sincerity.

With reddened eyes, he asked, "So, we'll still stay in a romantic relationship, right?"

Tawanna's eyes were also moist with emotion as she nodded firmly and replied, "I've had other boyfriends in the past, but you're the only one who has stayed by my side the longest, shared so much with me, and knows my history. I believe we're compatible, and we can continue to grow together in life."

Trevor smiled and asked, "If one day we get married, do you think we could invite Mr. Wade to be our witness?"

Tawanna burst into laughter, though tears streamed down her cheeks. Wiping her eyes, she chuckled through her tears, "I'm not sure about that... but shouldn't you propose to me first?"

Trevor's face lit up with excitement as he exclaimed, "Baby... does this mean you're saying yes?"

Shaking her head, Tawanna teased, "Not until I see a 10-carat diamond ring."

Without missing a beat, Trevor replied, "Don't worry, baby. As soon as I'm back in the U.S., I'll find the perfect 10-carat diamond ring. Once my training is done, I'll fly straight to China and propose to you."

Tawanna looked at him with a smile and said, "You can propose, but I can't promise that I'll say yes."

Trevor nodded eagerly.

He understood that her words were a subtle acceptance of his intentions, but he knew he needed to prepare a proposal that would truly satisfy her.

At last, the unease that had plagued him for days began to fade.

When the person you love admires someone else, it's natural to feel jealousy or even frustration—especially when you don't know who that person is or what they've done.

But when you've experienced firsthand what makes that person extraordinary and witnessed their unparalleled qualities alongside your beloved, those negative feelings dissolve.

Even if he couldn't grow old with Tawanna in the future, one thing was certain: for the rest of their lives, both of them would see that man as a guiding light and an inspiration.

As the plane pierced through the clouds, the faint outline of the land below came into view.

Tawanna turned to him and said, "Honey, we're almost in China. I finally understand why fans travel thousands of miles to see my concerts. Visiting your idol feels thrilling and exciting every step of the way."

Trevor smiled and replied, "Yeah, I feel the same way when I think about seeing Mr. Wade soon."

Tawanna added, "I've never been to the city where Mr. Wade lives, but I already feel like buying a house there. Trevor, let's go check it out together before the concert."

"Sure," Trevor agreed readily. "For a global star like you, buying a house in Mr. Wade's city would probably bring immense publicity to the area. They say your name is practically an economic phenomenon. Your visit to Jinling could put it on the map in ways it's never seen before."

Tawanna nodded and reached out to clasp Trevor's hand tightly.

She realized she'd never find another man like Trevor—someone who had faced so much with her and stood by her through every challenge. If he truly proposed, she would accept and build a family with him, finally ending her years of emotional restlessness.

Yet, as she made that decision, Charlie Wade's face flashed through her mind.

She looked at Trevor, his face filled with happiness, and felt a pang of guilt.

In the end, she knew she was deceiving both him and herself.
