

The Amazing son in law Chapter 7411-7414

Stefanie sun covered her mouth and laughed softly. “Not just his wife—many of his close female friends were there too. I told you, Brother charlie is incredibly popular. Any young woman who spends time around him is bound to be drawn to him.”

As the two women chatted, their nerves gradually settled.

With only twenty minutes left until showtime, a staff member arrived to inform Tavana, “Ms. Sweet, you’re about to go on stage. Please start preparing.”

Tavana nodded and looked at Stefanie sun. “When you take the stage, give everyone a surprise!”

Stefanie sun smiled. “Let’s do this!”

Meanwhile, charlie was strolling near the stage, wearing a staff badge.

His role as a Feng Shui consultant was merely a cover.

Tonight, aside from briefly changing outfits and joining the dancers for a performance, he had no other tasks. As for his appearance on stage, it wouldn’t be for at least another hour and a half. Stefanie sun was set to make a surprise entrance about an hour into Tavana’s performance, and his own appearance wouldn’t come until her final song—at least another 30 minutes after that.

Peering through the gaps in the stage equipment, he observed the massive crowd filling the National Stadium. He couldn’t help but marvel at the sheer influence and star power required to attract such an audience.

7:20 PM.

The final countdown to the performance had begun.

Tavana’s entrance was designed to be spectacular. The massive screen behind the stage was an integrated structure, secured by a one-way bearing and held upright by steel cables.

Once the cables were released, the towering screen—measuring dozens of meters high—would slowly tilt forward, creating a striking visual effect as it descended.

At that moment, Tavana had already made her way to the top of the stage via an elevator.

There, the staff secured a protective harness for her. As the performance began and the screen started to tilt, she would need to maintain her balance and step onto a special platform that would ensure she remained upright behind the falling screen.

The pedal was crucial. Roughly the size of two A4 sheets of paper, it was supported by an electrically adjustable rod. When the massive screen was upright, the pedal remained at a 90-degree angle to it. Tavana had to stand on it, gripping the frame behind the screen to maintain her stability.

As the screen began to tilt forward, the pedal had to tilt backward at the same angle but in the opposite direction. This synchronization was the only way to ensure that Tavana remained standing upright.

By the time the screen was fully lowered, the pedal would be lying flat, allowing Tavana to unhook her safety harness, step down, and seamlessly transition onto the catwalk. Singing as she moved, she would join her dancers, igniting the crowd's energy. Meanwhile, the massive screen would begin its slow ascent, adding to the dramatic spectacle.

With five minutes left before showtime, Tavana was already in position on the pedal with the staff's assistance.

charlie walked around the back of the stage, looking up at Tavana standing dozens of meters high. He couldn't help but admire her. This was equivalent to the height of a ten-story building—many people would struggle to keep their balance. Yet, she stood confidently, gripping the frame with one hand while holding her microphone in the other, ready to perform at any moment.

As the clock struck eight, the venue was suddenly plunged into darkness. Then, a powerful symphony erupted from the suspended stage speakers as the stage lights and massive screen illuminated in perfect unison.

The crowd went wild. A wave of deafening cheers spread across the stadium like a tidal wave.

Excited fans scanned the stage, searching for Tavana, eager to see how she would make her entrance.

Just as anticipation reached its peak, the massive center screen suddenly moved—it was tilting forward!

At first, the audience suspected a technical malfunction. But upon closer observation, they noticed the screen's controlled descent. It wasn't falling uncontrollably—it was part of the show!

As the screen began its slow forward tilt, Tavana held onto the frame tightly, focusing on maintaining her balance.

She knew the safety rope behind her would keep her secure. Even if she lost her balance or misstepped, it would prevent her from falling.

However, she couldn't afford such an accident. If it happened, she would be left dangling in midair, turning the meticulously planned stage entrance into a complete disaster—worse yet, a public embarrassment.

As she focused on stabilizing herself, she suddenly felt the safety rope behind her growing tighter and tighter.

A sense of dread washed over her as she looked up and saw the rope stretched taut, no longer extending as the massive screen continued its descent.

Cold sweat broke out on her forehead. The rope had some elasticity, but it couldn't counteract the force entirely. Once it reached its limit, it would inevitably yank her backward.

If that happened, she would be left hanging helplessly, waiting for a rescue.

Backstage, panic erupted among the staff.

One crew member shouted, "Oh no! There's a problem with the safety rope's motor! We activated the switch, but it's not releasing any more slack. If this continues, Tavana will be pulled up!"

"What do we do?!" another voice cried out.

The stage director felt his heart drop. "Tavana has put everything into this performance. If something goes wrong now, she'll be devastated! And with the motor malfunctioning, how will she even get down if she's stuck in the air?!"

At that moment, Tavana could feel the rope's pull intensifying, and her grip weakening. Her wrist was starting to give out.

Through the in-ear monitor, she called out urgently, her voice laced with panic, "Find a way to release the safety rope—fast! I can't hold on much longer!"

At that moment, chaos erupted backstage.

During such a grand entrance ceremony, if Tawanna's safety rope couldn't be loosened and she ended up dangling awkwardly in midair, it would be an embarrassment seen by the entire world.

Even before the performance began, the crew would have scrambled to rescue her, and the incident would have dominated headlines across the global entertainment industry.

However, rescuing Tawanna in this situation was extremely difficult.

Her safety rope was controlled by an electric winch installed at the top of the stage.

The winch operated via a wire controller, which was being frantically pressed by a staff member backstage in a desperate attempt to release the rope.

Under normal circumstances, they would visually monitor the rope's tension and gradually loosen it in sync with Tawanna's descent—similar to how someone controls the rope while belaying a climber.

But now, something had gone terribly wrong. The winch was stuck.

It could be an issue with the wire controller, a mechanical failure, or even a power supply problem.

Unfortunately, the winch was designed to lock its brakes when powered off to prevent accidents. Because of this safety mechanism, even though the rope extended for dozens of meters, it couldn't be released at this critical moment.

The staff nearly broke the remote control switch in frustration, but nothing worked.

Meanwhile, Tawanna was on the verge of breaking down.

charlie, watching from the audience, had been eagerly anticipating this concert.

If an accident happened right at the start—leaving him suspended in midair like a fool, dozens of meters above the stage—it would completely shatter his composure.

Just then, a staff member suddenly shouted, “Stop lowering the big screen! Pull it back first and fix the issue before trying again. Inform the audience that the opening will be delayed by ten minutes!”

Everyone agreed this was likely the best course of action at the moment.

Although Tawanna felt disappointed, there was no better option. Retracting the big screen was certainly preferable to hanging in midair alone.

It seemed like the most reasonable solution under the circumstances.

However, charlie had a different perspective. The big screen had already begun its dramatic descent. If they suddenly retracted it now, it would look absurd—like watching a video play in reverse—completely ruining the intended shock and excitement.

Instead of rewinding the scene and bringing Tawanna back for another entrance, it would be better to discreetly rescue her after retracting the screen and then have her appear on stage using the stage elevator.

While this wouldn't be as breathtaking as descending from the top of the big screen, at least it wouldn't be embarrassing.

Besides, since the screen had only just started to fall, the audience hadn't seen Tawanna yet.

Still, as charlie considered it further, he realized this wasn't the perfect solution either. The best approach would be to let the scene play out naturally.

Since the audience had already seen the big screen slowly descending, they were likely expecting Tawanna to make her entrance from behind it. Now, they were simply waiting to confirm their guess and be amazed.

Without hesitation, charlie shouted to the nearby staff, “Don't retract the big screen—keep lowering it!”

The stage director blurted out, “But Tawanna can't hold on much longer! If we keep lowering it, the safety rope will leave her hanging in midair!”

charlie wasn't concerned. He ordered firmly, “Just do as I say. There's a problem with the safety rope—it's about to snap!”

The moment he finished speaking, he focused his thoughts, and in an instant, a surge of spiritual energy shot out, slicing through the safety rope behind Tawanna.

At the same time, a surge of spiritual energy flowed from charlie's body, like a pair of invisible hands gently supporting Tawanna.

The staff initially thought charlie was overreacting. The safety rope was designed to hold at least 800 kilograms—made for rock climbing and mountaineering. How could it possibly break so easily?

But just as the stage director was about to argue, he saw the taut safety rope behind Tawanna suddenly snap and recoil.

His legs went weak with fear. Panicked, he cried out, "It's over... it's all over. I'm finished. Please, God, protect Tawanna. Nothing can happen to her..."

Tawanna had been struggling against the intense pulling force behind her, but suddenly, it vanished. Losing balance, she fell forward onto the iron frame and let out a terrified scream.

Fortunately, the performance hadn't started yet, and the sound engineer hadn't turned up her microphone. Otherwise, the audience would have heard her cry out.

Tawanna turned to look at the broken rope behind her, her legs trembling with fear. With the rope snapped, she was completely unprotected. Her only option was to cling to the iron frame in front of her for support.

But if she did that, wouldn't the entire performance be ruined? Instead of stepping onto the stage in a dramatic entrance as planned, she would appear sprawled awkwardly on the back of the fallen screen—a complete disaster.

Just as panic began to take over, charlie's voice suddenly rang in her ears: "Don't be afraid. Stand tall and stay confident. I've got you."

"Mr. Wade?!"

Tawanna was stunned.

At first, she assumed charlie was speaking to her through her in-ear monitor. But within moments, she realized the sound was far too clear—lacking the usual distortion.

It was as if he were speaking right next to her.

Tawanna was an exceptional musician with a keen sensitivity to timbre. She knew that no headphones could possibly produce such a perfectly natural sound.

Startled, she looked down in shock and saw charlie standing beneath the stage, giving her an OK gesture from a distance.

A warmth spread through her heart, easing some of her nerves.

However, complete confidence still eluded her. The safety rope had snapped—if she lost her balance, she would plummet to the stage below, and the consequences would be fatal.

Just then, the stage director's nervous voice came through her earpiece. "Tawanna, how are you feeling? Should we stop the big screen and find a way to get you down?"

charlie immediately sent a message into Tawanna's mind through his spiritual energy. "Don't be afraid. I broke the safety rope on purpose. This was the only way to ensure your performance wouldn't be affected. Tell the stage director you can handle it—don't stop the big screen. I will keep you safe."

Tawanna trusted charlie completely. Back in Tokyo, she had already witnessed his abilities—far beyond anything normal people could comprehend. Silently cutting a safety rope was nothing for him.

More importantly, she knew he was a man of immense responsibility. If he had taken this step, it meant he had both a plan and absolute confidence in his actions.

Without hesitation, she responded, "Don't worry about me. Just make sure the big screen continues to fall as planned without any disruptions!"

The stage director blurted out, "But if anything happens to you, you could fall to your death!"

Tawanna's voice was unwavering. "Don't worry. I have the blessing of my beloved—I will turn danger into safety!"
