

The Amazing son in law Chapter 7436

Tawana kept ranting, and the British celebrity on the other end was practically fuming.

But Tawana didn't waste time—she cut the Gordian knot. She sent a voice message, blocked him immediately, and, not stopping there, went on Instagram and other social media platforms to unfollow him.

Who a celebrity follows—or unfollows—is like a weather vane that fans watch closely.

There's a group of people so invested (or bored) that they monitor celebrities' follower counts and lists daily. The moment there's a change, they spot it and rush to discuss it with fellow fans online.

When Tawana suddenly unfollowed the British talent, fans noticed instantly, and chaos broke out in the fandom.

The two had worked together often, interacted publicly, and always presented themselves as close friends.

So Tawana's sudden unfollow came as a shock. For mainland fans, it felt a bit like Tawana suddenly unfollowing Samuel.

At first, fans were confused, thinking it might have been an accident.

But it didn't take long for people to realize something was off.

Accidentally unfollowing someone on one platform like Instagram or Facebook is believable—but doing it on both? That's no accident.

If this was a coincidence, what kind of bizarre finger slip would that take?

Clearly, it was intentional.

So the speculation began: Why did Tawana unfollow the British talent?

Did they have a falling out?

A clash of interests?

At first, no one could make sense of it.

Then someone sharp posted online: “Didn't Tawana just criticize Britain during a livestream in China? Could that be the reason they broke off contact?”

Suddenly, everything made sense.

That must be it.

And importantly, it was Tawana who unfollowed him—not the other way around. So if there was a falling out, it's pretty clear Tawana was the one who ended it.

The internet exploded in an instant.

Some right-wing netizens in the West couldn't comprehend what had gotten into Tawana—had she been brainwashed into becoming a spokesperson for China? “Girl, you're American,” they cried, “yet you're promoting a rival nation on the other side of the globe and throwing your own country's allies under the bus. What are you thinking?” Left-wing netizens, on the other hand, were more understanding. They argued that it didn't matter which country you're from—we all belong to a shared human community. We should rise above our biases and act with compassion. They added, “Even if your child did something wrong out in the world and brought it home, as a parent, wouldn't you take responsibility?”

Tawana didn't care about the debate. She was laser-focused on winning Charlie Wade's heart. She would bulldoze anything in her way—be it Buddha or God.