

The Amazing Son In Law (Charlie Wade)

Chapter 3370-3371

When the commander of the government army heard what Gorka said, his eyes suddenly brightened.

“Front feint attack, side roundabout!”

“This is definitely a very feasible battle plan. This Gorka really has some abilities!”

How did Gorka know that his set of common to no more common attack tactics turned out to be a genius-like decision in the eyes of the opposing commander.

This is also mainly because the opponent’s military literacy is too low, so low that it is horribly low.

Although wars continue in the Middle East, it must be admitted that the entire modern Middle East is not good at fighting long wars.

Since the Second World War, the requirements of wars on tactics, strategies and patterns have become higher and higher. The whole world has learned a lot of war experience from that war. Even the weak Southeast Asian countries have changed one by one. To be brave and good at fighting, only the Middle East has not improved its talent for warfare. On the contrary, it still lags far behind other regions.

Syria, Afghanistan, and even Iraq have fought for so many years. No matter how large the local armed forces are, they basically fought in the guerrilla mode.

Low military literacy is the biggest problem for the armed forces of all countries in the Middle East except Israel.

The training level of soldiers is not enough, the command level of officers is not enough, the ability of coordinated operations among various departments and arms of the army is extremely poor. At the same time, the army generally lacks strong will to fight. In many cases, the seemingly huge army is actually broken by a poke.

Not to mention Syria, a country that has been fighting all the time, even those super-tyrant countries that started from oil, their military is better than anyone when it comes to spending money on equipment, and almost every other aspect is a mess.

For example, Saudi Arabia, which is almost entirely equipped with American-style advanced equipment, was able to seize the M1A2 main battle tanks sold to them by the United States when confronting the Houthi armed forces, which earned it the reputation of “transportation captain”.

The military level of the local tyrants is so worrying, not to mention Syria.

The commander of the government army who partnered with the Gorka actually had no professional military education at all. He was basically at a loss as to how to arrange troops and formulate tactical strategies when a team of thousands of people came out.

Even the simplest infantry coordination is a plan proposed by Gorka.

The reason why government commanders did not expect to use infantry artillery was mainly because their artillery training level was extremely low, and they were barely able to shoot at close range on the training ground. They really pulled out and let them bomb in the hills and hills. Mead's base, they couldn't even calculate the coordinates.

Had it not been for the experts of Gorka who were proficient in calculation, they had come out to fight Hunter (Hamid) this time, and they had not even prepared to bring towed artillery.

Because their soldiers are only good at handling one heavy firepower weapon in addition to guns, that is, RPG rockets.

That is too simple for them. No survey, no calculations, and no coordination with various departments are needed. If you want to explode, you just put the thing on your shoulder and aim it visually, then launch it and it's done.

Even if you are illiterate, you can easily operate it.

But behind the artillery thing is a complete set of tedious tactical systems. These elements are indispensable for reconnaissance, calculation, site selection, coordination, offense and defense. For artillery with a range of 20 to 30 kilometers, if the coordinate calculation is not clear, it may not be able to blow up the enemy in one day.

Therefore, he, who didn't understand shit tactics, immediately regarded it as a standard after hearing this set of skills and tactics of Gorka.

However, the problem is also coming.

Why let your army pretend to attack?

Even if it's a feint, you have to behave with the opponent on the frontal battlefield, right?

Moreover, you can't pretend to be outside the enemy's firepower range, right? In that case, fools can see that this is acting.

However, on the frontal battlefield, one's own side has no advantage, even if it is a feint, it will lose a lot of soldiers.
