Chapter 811 Do You Want to Be with Him?

Halfway through the night, Stephanie finally got her hands on Jenny. "We finally meet, Miss President."

"Not you too." Jenny rolled her eyes, having been pestered enough tonight.

Stephanie giggled. "I'm genuinely congratulating you here! Now, no one will push my family or me around in Bardoff anymore!"

"No one here bothered you in the first place," Jenny teased, though she knew Stephanie didn't really concern herself with it, nor did her family. In fact, they had been keeping a low profile ever since they moved there. In a way, it was like repaying Jenny's kindness of looking after them by not causing more trouble.

The two women observed the flow of the crowd in the hall from their spot on a nearby couch.

"No, he just asked me to give him another chance? Jenny huffed.

"Another chance?" Stephanie thought, then asked, "Do you still have feelings for him, Jenny?"

At the end of the day, Jenny was the one who would decide whether she wanted the relationship to continue. If she did like Alec romantically, the man wouldn't have to do much to win her over. But if Jenny didn't, then whether Alec recovered his feelings for her didn't matter anymore.

"I don't know." Jenny shook her head. "I just don't think I have the time for him or romance anymore."

Helping more people and getting more surgeries done felt far more rewarding than wasting her time with Alec.

Jenny was about to reach the main hall when Blake stormed toward her, her eyes moist and red.

"You sneaky bitch!" Blake screeched.

Jenny cocked an eyebrow at her. She hadn't crossed Blake a single time tonight, so what the hell was she on about?

"Alec wanted to break up with me, but I know it was your doing, wasn't it?!" Blake screeched again like a tire hissing on the pavement.

"Alec's breaking up with Blake?" Jenny thought. She was truly surprised. She had only told Alec to not rely on Blake or her family, and here he was, already breaking up with her. Still, she smiled. "I'm not sure what you mean, Ms. Watkins?"

If Jenny was in Blake's position, she'd spend her time moping over her minimal chance of being heir to do what she loved instead. She'd even leave the family if that meant finding her own happiness.

Sadly Blake didn't plan to do so. She neither had the determination nor wanted to let go of the safety net that was her family, so she could only let her family conflict painfully tug at her from all angles.

Jenny spotted Alec the moment she returned to the hall. His height made it nearly impossible to miss him. The man nodded slightly at her when their gazes met but did nothing else. Now Jenny didn't know what that meant. So she paid no mind to it and continued on with the night.

Near the end of the celebrations, Jenny heaved a great sigh in anticipation of the night ending and was grateful nothing terrible happened. But the moment she did that, she spotted Randy Glass walking into the hall.

The Glasses had long gone bankrupt, and neither had they been invited to tonight's celebration, so his appearance alarmed quite the crowd. Some guessed he'd been invited because they once were related to the Walters since Jolene Walter was the daughter of Rowena Glass.

Jenny, however, was certain that no one from the Glass family had been invited. She glanced at James at the far corner of the hall, who was standing beside Jolene. Many guests had been surprised to see her there, but all that mattered to Jenny was ascertaining whether Jolene had invited Randy.

The first thing that came to mind when Jenny saw the dozens of bombs strapped to Randy's body was to run, but Randy seemed to have guessed it already. "I advise you to stay put, or I'll blow up these pretty little things and hurt everyone here."

So Jenny stayed put. Even if Randy didn't detonate the bombs, she still had to put on a brave front to protect the others' life, or she'd become the talk of the town for the next decade for being a coward.

"Good, good. You still have your wits about you, I see.' Randy's grin turned menacing as he dragged Jenny up onstage, the bomb detonator in the Randy nodded in approval, then gazed at Graham and James amongst the crowd. "You two are so fucking pleased with yourselves, aren't you? You got what you wanted-my family wiped off from Bardoff City."

"You can tell us what you want, Randy, and well give it to you, whatever it is. Just let Jenny go first. I'll swap places with her instead." Graham offered. If Randy detonated those bombs on his body, he would lose his daughter.

Randy snorted. "I said to stay put, didn't I?"

Graham pursed his lips but stayed where he was.

While everyone waited for Randy to speak up about what he wanted from them, Stephanie had just returned home. She was about to relax and head inside after the exhausting night when she spotted someone familiar at the door.

"Let me make it up to you." Paul grabbed onto Stephanie's wrist, stopping her from walking away.

"Some things aren't that easy to mend," Stephanie replied.

"I know I messed up before, Stephanie. But I know better now. I know I need to improve, so please, give me a chance." Paul said dearly.

In truth, he rarely showed this side of himself, so Stephanie was actually touched by his words. She loved him once, after all. But still, she remained level-headed. They weren't compatible. Even if they dated one another, they'd never have a happy ending.

There was no point in wasting each other's time.

Shaking loose from Paul's grip, Stephanie said, "You don't need me around to improve yourself. You should be able to do it alone.

But their shot wouldn't hit a vital spot, which meant Randy still might be able to trigger the detonator.

Jenny decided to try and get Randy to move into the sniper's target.

"I know you just want your family to go back to how they used to be. I can make that happen," Jenny said.

Randy narrowed his eyes at her. "How?"

"I can return all the properties that belonged to you. I'm sure all the witnesses here can hold me accountable."

Alec huffed a laugh, then raised his palms in the air to indicate he wasn't going to do anything. He then slowly walked over to Randy and handed him the guarantee.

Just as everyone thought the danger would pass, a voice came from the crowd. "He isn't actually going to believe them, is he? I mean, who here would even stand with the Glasses to enforce the guarantee? Is he that naive?"

Randy immediately dragged Jenny back upon hearing it, his expression shifting drastically.

"Naive? Haha...hahaha!" He cackled hysterically. Though the guarantee had been a shifty idea, he had still held out hope. He hadn't wanted to commit suicide that night, either.

But it was too late now.

After removing the bombs from Randy's body, the bomb squad disarmed another one by the hall entrance before announcing they were done. Only then did they realize that Randy had never planned to kill anyone, just intimidate them. They could've left at any time they wanted from any other entrance in the hall.

Those pissed at being messed with took their chance to go up to Randy to slap and kick at him with all their might.

As the guests left, Jenny recalled what was spoken when Randy was about to seize the guarantee. No one else had noticed, but Jenny had immediately recognized who had spoken-Yvonne Dickman.

She turned to find the woman, who immediately hid behind Brandon under her searing glare.

Brandon wasn't looking too good at the moment, either. He had heard Yvonne speak during that tense moment, thus incurring Jenny's wrath.

With a sneer, Jenny warned, "You better be careful, Mr. Britt. The rose you adore so much might bleed you with her thorns."
