"It will be 720 million dollars." Edna smugly pushed the calculator before Knox.

"It seems your card can't be used to pay that big a sum, Mr. Knox."

"I'll pay for the remaining 220 million dollars," Yolanda said as she whipped out a bank card.

"It's yours? I refuse to believe that you have 200 million dollars." Julie passed the bank card to John, her subordinate, and ordered, "Give this a proper check."

John took the card and called the bank to enquire. After a while, he reported back to Julie awkwardly and said, "Ms. Monroe, this card belongs to her."

"Impossible! How's that possible?" Julie roared. Her face contorted.

"It's impossible for her to have so much money!"

"She got lucky, Ms. Monroe. She found a 16th-century saint's relic from Espaynol at our store."

Edna couldn't take it anymore. She whispered to Julie and tried to explain to her. "She probably sold the relic."

"I see." Julie unwillingly gave the bank card back to Yolanda.

"I knew she couldn't have so much money. You won't be so lucky the second time. Mark my words."

Julie mocked Knox sarcastically. "Winnie's cousin is so useless," she thought.

Winnie might be from an ordinary family, but she was humble and down-to-earth. She would never do things to show off or to bring someone else down.

With such a comparison, Julie thought that Winnie was a much better person than Yolanda.

To her, poor people of wretched beginnings should just work diligently their whole lives for the second generation of rich families, like her. They shouldn't think of changing their lowly identities.

What Yolanda was doing was digging into Julie's every pet peeve.

Of course, Yolanda wouldn't care for Julie's thoughts. Her mocking and teasing were just white noise to Yolanda.

She hadn't noticed what Julie and the rest were saying at all, but Knox couldn't take it anymore. He retorted, "When we get top-grade gems, you'll regret it."

"Hah, so what if you do?" Edna was unfazed.

"You've bought so many boulders. If you don't even get at least one decent-quality gem in one of them, that would be abnormal. It'll be impossible for you to get your money's worth unless all of your boulders turn out to have Imperial Emerald- graded gemstones.
