

Fire 1505

Chapter 1505

David asked, "Did she ever mention me when she was alive?"

Kisa stared at him, sensing a desperate hopefulness in his eyes. She clenched her jaw and replied, "My mother only mentioned your name on her deathbed."

David's body trembled slightly, his eyes lighting up with a glimmer of hope.

"What about other times? Did she ever talk about me?"

Kisa kept her eyes lowered, refusing to answer. She knew her mother had never mentioned him, except for that one fleeting moment.

But she also knew her mother's heart had always belonged to David, as evidenced by the diary she had found.

Just as Kisa was about to mention the diary, David's expression suddenly turned cold and menacing.

could she possibly think of me? But she was so blind to bitterness and resentment, as if her mother had willfully chosen

her reading her mother's diary, she might have misunderstood

you really not know

he remembered a particularly bitter and anguishing moment, she didn't like Christopher, why would she have a child with him? She said that she only had children with the person she loved, and that is what

David spoke, the more agitated he became, and a hint of grinding as he spoke through gritted teeth, "Do you know that you are a b*stard who should never have been born? Every time I see you, I have the urge to kill twisted into a grotesque expression, and Kisa could not help but back she said, "You misunderstood my mother. She

"Hahaha," if he had heard the world's funniest mentioned me in front of you. How do you know she loved me?

your relationship. When she was at her most helpless and in pain, she only thought of