Chapter 4158

Although Liberty still showed Kathryn some respect, and they were in the middle of the transition period, she often had to consult Kathryn on various matters. This plan was her way of protecting her three brothers—at the very least, ensuring they could keep their homes, shops, and other properties.

She didn't want them to lose everything.

"Mr. Lewis is here. You should go."

As they entered the hotel, they saw Duncan approaching slowly. His two bodyguards pushed a wheelchair behind him, walking at a measured pace.

Guests coming and going cast curious glances at Duncan.

The lobby manager stepped forward, offering to assist him, but Duncan politely declined.

Liberty took a deep breath before turning to Kathryn. "Call me if anything happens. I wish you good luck."

"Thank you!" Kathryn smiled. "We'll both need it."

Liberty walked toward Duncan.

Kathryn turned and headed out.

"Duncan."

Liberty stepped forward to support him. "Come on, let's go home."

Duncan accepted her help, and they walked out together at a slow but steady pace.

Duncan murmured, "Miss Farrell is gone."

Liberty nodded. “She didn’t say anything to me, but I’m sure it’s happening tonight. Her three brothers left work on time and didn’t stay late. They finished all the tasks assigned to them.”

Duncan spoke in a low voice. “They have a few helpers—two of them are the brothers of the Farrell family’s fake daughter.”

Liberty remained silent.

Once they were in the car, she sighed. “Kathryn is a good person, but she has very few people she can call family. Her adoptive parents treated her terribly, and even after reuniting with her biological parents, her father and three brothers never truly accepted her. If it weren’t for the Farrell family’s century-old rule of passing leadership to daughters instead of sons, even her biological mother, Clarissa, wouldn’t have supported her.”

Clarissa had only come to value Kathryn later—when she saw no other way to secure her daughter’s survival. She had wanted to send Kathryn away, hoping to protect her.

But that was because Clarissa was trapped by the family’s rigid traditions. Kathryn was her only legitimate heir—the only one who could inherit the Farrell family name.

Shiloh, despite being raised and groomed for over twenty years, wasn’t a blood relative. That disqualified her from taking over.

Holden’s three sons weren’t fit for leadership either, and they also fell short of the family’s strict inheritance rules. That left Kathryn as the only choice.

Had the Farrell family not had such traditions, Kathryn wouldn’t have mattered to them—even after returning to her biological family. Their loyalty would have stayed with Shiloh.

After all, Shiloh had spent over twenty years with them. She had been their daughter in every way that mattered—except by blood.

Kathryn, on the other hand, had been a sudden addition to their lives. They never had a real bond with her.

Even now, Holden and his sons still longed for Shiloh. They might even be planning something against Kathryn to avenge her.

Shiloh's downfall wasn't Kathryn's doing. But Kathryn's return had cost Shiloh everything she once had. Blinded by resentment, Shiloh had repeatedly provoked Kathryn, refusing to back down—until she destroyed herself. And yes, Kathryn had helped that downfall along.

Liberty and her allies stood by Kathryn, believing she had the moral high ground.

But Marco and the others saw it differently. To them, Kathryn was ruthless and cruel.

At the end of the day, people's loyalties shape their sense of right and wrong. There's no true fairness in this world—just different perspectives.

Duncan said, "She went through hell before she found happiness. But now, she will have a good life. Mr. Fraser loves her, and he always will. He's loyal to her—he'll never leave her. As for family? She let go of that a long time ago."
