

Married At First Sight Chapter 4289

---

Chapter 4289

“Kathryn, I know your injury isn’t that serious. You just lost a little more blood than usual. After a few days in the hospital, you’re almost fully recovered. It’s clear you’re not gravely hurt, yet you still refuse to forgive your brothers. You really want to send them to prison, don’t you? Those are your own brothers—your flesh and blood, born of the same mother. If you hadn’t pushed them too far, they wouldn’t have treated you like that. You brought this on yourself.

Kathryn, mark my words—you won’t have a good ending. You’re as heartless and ruthless as your mother. People like that never find peace. Look at your mother—she had wealth and power, but what did it get her? In the end, she was destroyed, driven to death by her enemies.

Everyone, look at this! I raised this ungrateful daughter! Not only does she refuse to support her own father, but she also sent her three brothers—no, five brothers—behind bars. Three biological, two adopted. How did I end up with such a miserable fate? My own daughter turned on her family, determined to ruin her own brothers. Let me tell you all, this unfilial daughter of mine is Kathryn, the eldest daughter of the Farrell family and president of the Farrell Group!”

Holden stood outside Kathryn’s hospital room, blocked by her bodyguards, unable to get in. He made a scene at the door, yelling and drawing attention from the crowd on purpose.

Unfortunately for him, this was an old act. He pulled the same stunt multiple times a day—so often that even the doctors lost patience and called hospital security to remove him.

The spectacle had long lost its novelty.

Kathryn Farrell—the eldest daughter of the Farrell family—had been kidnapped and brutalized by her five brothers. This time, she was done with family loyalty. She called the police and had all five of them arrested.

The shocking part? Her biological father believed that since she survived, she should let it go. He expected her to forgive them, hoping for leniency in their sentencing.

When she refused, her father and adoptive mother showed up at the hospital daily, making a ruckus just to keep her from getting any rest.

Her injuries weren't minor. The night she was brought to the hospital, she had nearly frozen to death. Her arm had been slashed with a knife, and her body was covered in bruises—painful reminders of the brutal beating her brothers had given her.

Back when they attacked her, they had no regard for family bonds. So why should she?

After a few days of following the drama, the people of Jensburg lost interest.

Everyone sided with Kathryn.

She was the biological daughter of the Farrell family, but she had been switched at birth by the butler and raised in his rural hometown. Her adoptive parents mistreated and abused her. Despite growing up in such a harsh environment, she survived—strong and resilient, like a weed pushing through concrete.

Meanwhile, the butler's real daughter lived the life of a wealthy heiress in the Farrell family, doted on by everyone.

Once the truth was exposed, Kathryn returned to her biological family. But the adopted daughter stayed too, still enjoying the privileges of being the Farrells' second young lady.

What followed was a series of events set in motion by the adopted daughter's own greed. In the end, she sealed her own fate.

When Kathryn finally reunited with her real family, her father and brothers treated her with nothing but hostility. Her mother, Clarissa, wasn't any better at first. But over time, things between them improved.

The public had been following this scandal for a while. By now, they knew the whole story—and their sympathy lay with Kathryn.

As for Holden? His outbursts were nothing more than the barking of a stray dog.