

Married at First Sight [On

Chapter 4478.

Yantail's boss had real vision—and guts. He transferred half of his shares to River and locked him in at Yantail. As long as the company thrived, the boss had nothing to worry about.

And he was right. Yantail's boss had gone from near bankruptcy to becoming a billionaire.

And he was only going to get richer.

At this point, Yantail was basically River's company. There was no way he'd walk away from it for another job.

Instead, he'd pour everything he had into making Yantail even stronger.

The original boss didn't get involved anymore. River handled everything. The boss only showed up at big meetings—and even then, he mostly just listened to River.

These days, he spent his time taking care of his daughter, who was in her last year of high school, and his son, who was in junior high. The rest of the time, he traveled with his wife and enjoyed his life. And every year, the money just kept rolling in. It was the kind of carefree life most people only dreamed of.

Before he gave River those shares, plenty of major companies tried to lure River away with huge offers. None of them succeeded—and the boss knew what he had to do.

He shocked everyone by handing River half the company.

There's a big difference between working for someone and working for yourself.

River and Yantail's boss were the perfect combo—complementary and built on trust. That's why Yantail was what it was today.

Donovan thought to himself: If I were Yantail's boss, I don't think I could've done it. Half the company? No way. At most, I'd give River a small percentage. Half? Forget it.

No wonder people said the boss had vision and guts. Maybe he wasn't a business genius, but he had great instincts. He hired River, trusted him completely, and stuck with him.

And when people talked bad about River, the boss didn't listen. He didn't care. He didn't even hesitate—he'd fire anyone who tried to throw shade at River.

He lived by one rule: trust who you hire, and don't hire anyone you can't trust.

"His success is our nightmare," Romina said. "Don't forget, Yantail and Lafond are in the same industry. We're competitors—and competitors are enemies."

"Exactly," Donovan said. "I wanted to poach him for Lafond, too, but before I could even make a move, Yantail gave him half the company."

Romina let out a sigh of regret.

They missed the best executive talent out there.

"Fine, I'll admit he's brilliant. But he's still our archrival. Whenever I see him, I get this itch to fight."

She paused, suddenly alert. "Wait a minute—what are you getting at, brother? Are you saying you think River and I could actually be a couple?"

Romina wasn't stupid. She picked up on it fast.

She glared at her brother, wide-eyed. He knew full well she and River were sworn enemies—yet here he was, trying to play matchmaker?

Donovan grinned. "If we forget about the business stuff, the only man I've ever thought was good enough for my brilliant little sister... is River. So far, I haven't met anyone more suitable for you. You two understand each other perfectly. One glance and you know what the other is thinking. You're beautiful, he's handsome. You're a perfect match."
