

Master 531

Chapter 531 - 531. Capital City

The king had moved his hand to his bearded chin and was trying to think of a proper response but could not find it. "I lack the words to express the amount of surprise I feel. How long have there been other monsters reaching this point?"

They were not sure they would receive a proper response from Scylla since it seemed like this information was delicate. However, Scylla readily replied, "It has been for about seven years. For some reason, the harpy queen came out of nowhere and flew directly to the main coliseum to speak with the king. She had figured out she was not demi-human and fully a monster. Her intelligence was enough to make any harpy that did not mindlessly attack others a protected species that was guided to our kingdom."

"That explains why we have seen a decrease in the harpy migration every year. They used to stop in the forest to hunt and rest but now they are so rare that we could go all year without seeing one." The queen had worried over this change and believed that it was another monster starting to go extinct.

"I have a friend with a very intelligent harpy as their tamed monster. However, it is better to call them sisters since that is how they act. I fully believe that they can have the intelligence to stand as their own race as well." Walker was recalling his time with the three tamers he was lucky enough to call friends.

"We do not believe it to be a common occurrence for a monster species to suddenly become more intelligent. I doubt monsters like orcs, rabid crabs, or horned rabbits will ever be able to do this. I think it is the similarities to other intelligent races that put them aside. A harpy is similar to a demi-human so much so that we have confused them as demi-humans before."

Scylla's words made sense. There were some monsters that could be confused as demi-human or in some cases as humans themselves. The more intelligent they were the more they seemed to gain forms close to humans. Even the ancient dragons which had massive and powerful forms were known to have human forms.

"Then we may have more than just the goblins to narcissist. I believe uniting and protecting these future races should be a large part of the alliance here." The queen spoke her own thoughts on the matter. "The goblins were once a step away from being their own race. Now they are once again on that path. I would like to live in a world with more such races."

This was information that the elves would die for. They would record this phenomenon in their records to immortalize it for generations. They would search the entire world to find these growing races and do whatever they need to let them rise.

"Kroll thinks, we should help and not beat new races. We want meet more like us." Kroll was slowly understanding that he would not be alone in this groundbreaking path. He wanted to meet these others that had started to rise as well.

"You all know that there is a massive stretch of land with nothing on it. There is an intersection right here where the forest, the plains, and the human kingdom intersect. What uif that spot became the future of the alchemy guild, the rising races, and the heart of trade for every single nation?" Walker suddenly placed a finger on the map bringing this idea up.

"You would like us to create a city together?" The elf queen was wide eyed at this proposal.

"Leader sees this as a way to better create a future linking the three kingdoms. If all of you accept this there will be an everlasting bond. Not three kingdoms but one kingdom with three founding cities and a capital city." Su spoke making the three even more consumed by Walker's previous words. The only one that was behind was Kroll and Ventus who soon caught on and showed equal amazement.

"I can not say anything for sure, but in my opinion, there would also be a grand coliseum for our tournaments. We would be able to share knowledge with our most promising young warriors!" Scylla saw this possibility and wanted to start building at that moment. "Actually. Can we please take another intermission for me to send all this to my king? He will want to make his stance open this heard. I believe it to be of the utmost importance."

"Please do. I think everyone should take a moment to think. Walker looked to Kroll, Ventus, and the elf queen. "I also believe the queen will want to speak to her neighbors in the forest," Walker said this while he also watched Scylla rush to the side of the room and sent many messages with the little crystal balls.

"I believe this will change everything..." The king came out of a daze and said this while looking around the room. This meeting had been going on for longer than they knew. But one thing was clear. That the three kingdoms would be stronger than ever before if they all moved forward with this. The humans were not specialized in anything. They instead spent their time on tactics, strategy, and growth. The demi-humans were more of a physical powerhouse with low knowledge. The elves were masters of al and natural mana.

The three would balance each other and give birth to a brand new future that no one had ever seen coming. This decision was not small and was taking precedence over all others. So much so that if it did pass the other races would be forced to recognize and send representatives to make new treaties and trade agreements. This was no small matter.

Chapter 532 - 532. Bring Him Here

The king said this peace and started to map out things on a separate piece of paper. He dedicated himself to created roads and merchant paths so this capital city could be built. He wanted to make sure that there would be a way for this all to come together and become one. He also knew that this would be the job for his kingdom to take over. They had many architectural structures and ideas that could be used here.

The most interesting conversations was with the queen, Kroll, and Ventus. "Kroll can hear my brothers' voice in heart. We are one." This was the way Ventus and Kroll were able to exist as such. The goblin spider rider system gave Kroll the ability to hear and communicate with Ventus within their minds.

The queen found this fascinating since her people rarely gained any form of beast taming system. There was also the fact that the knowledge of the goblins' systems were almost all war based because they had been unable to share the proper knowledge with others due to their status as monsters.

"You also said that you have a leather working goblin and one that cooks. Is that a unique goblin system or are they just general systems?" The queen wished she had her own attendant here to archive this but made due with the fact that the goblins would be protected with her and her people.

"Krolls' brother is goblin armorer. Other brother is wilderness chef." This was one goblin unique system and a general system. Both were important facts to show that the goblins really were becoming their own race.

"We will need to make the city known as one built by four races than built by three...or wait. One built by the seven races if those under the protection of the demi-humans would like to make themselves known." The queen realized the massive undertaking they had begun already. The excitement made her curiosity begin to consume her.

Due to the elves' strong thirst for knowledge Walker could already see that they would be pushing the most for this new city. Not only would it make a show of their power while they helped top create it, but it could also show that they were ready to be out in the open.

Scylla held a glowing crystal ball and instantly stood straight. When it fell to sand in a pile with the many others she had used she had received her orders from King Rorick.

"Sir hero Walker. My king is preparing to come here. He requests permission from the elves to allow him to use one of the eldest relics of the demi-human kingdom to instantly come here."

This silenced the room. Such a relic was something that would cost a massive amount of mana from the people of the kingdom and was often only used in the most serious of cases. "You have had this weapon with you the entire time? Did you bring it here in case you heard something that you did not like?" The queen became cold hearing this. The kingdom had been under threat the entire time.

"Not at all queen of the forest elves. The artifact is two parts and required the acceptance of the current ruler of as territory. It was created by a wandering space lord when they appeared in our city at the founding. They rested there and gave it as a gift while the demi-humans rose to power." Scylla pulled half of an amulet out from her clothing. It was a slight silver color and had rune upon rune overlapping. The small blue and red jewels embedded within shown with a strange mana that none of them could identify.

"You must voice your approval while channeling mana within this. If you accept only the other holding this can travel through space to meet this other half. The king would be the only one able to use this as the current ruler of the demi-human kingdom. I beseech you to allow this so you may hear his decisions on these matters." Scylla went so far as to kneel and offer this to the queen. It was yet another large matter.

"This could be the final decision needed to move forward today on this matter. We could also stop skirting the remainder of the demon issues. We could have everything set up now. However, do not expect instant results." Walker voiced his opinion which made the king want to also accept.

"I would like to have these things settled sooner so we can begin to create such a future. I believe this is something that we can all support. Even if we may not agree on the other issues, this is something we all need to balance out people and futures." The king could only see merit in this alliance founding a joint city and even taking a new name.

"We believe we need to join the others like us." Kroll also voiced his opinion to the queen who was still thinking about this move. It was up to her now to make the final decision.

"I will allow your king to come here. If this is for the future I see it becoming, then I will take the risk this one time." The queen reached out and took the amulet half in her hand. Scylla lowered her head before standing up to give the queen the space needed. "I the queen of the forest elves welcome the demi-human King Rorick to come here before me for this meeting of rulers."

The words made the mana within the room vibrate. The amulet began to glow in a silver luminescence that made everyone feel as if they were standing in the room but also many miles away. This out of body experience was met with the light becoming so bright that none could see at all.

Chapter 533 - 533. Rorick Enters

"Thank you for accepting my proposal. I the king of Ordist have arrived and am glad to see all in health and strength." King Rorick broke through the fading light with his voice and appearance. He wore simple robes and held no weapons. It made it look as if he had not been ready to leave on such short notice.

"Allow me to apologize for this abrupt appearance and joining. I felt that things were warranting my immediate input and that I had greatly underestimated the power of these meetings. Scylla, please stand down and join the other talks on my behalf." Scylla nodded and looked to Walker.

"I Scylla relinquish my presence as the speaker of the King of Ordist " The bond between Walker and her was severed while she left.

"I King Rorick of Ordist recognize the Hero Walker as the proper mediator of this meeting." The same mana fluctuation happened as before linking Rorick in to the meeting.

"Welcome to the meeting, King Rorick. I hope that you have been made up to date on where we stand?" King August stopped drawing out his plans for roads and trade routes waiting to hear the response.

"Before we begin, may we please drop formalities. We are all equals and I wish for us to act as such. I have heard this plan to form a new capital and unite our kingdoms completely. The other matters are not as clear as of yet. But this is one I wish to pursue. So much so that I used a relic that will take five years to recharge."

This last statement made them all realize just how much the demi-human kingdom was willing to invest in this. The words King Rorick spoke more than convinced the others that he was there to join them together.

"I second that."

"I agree as well."

Kroll and Ventus agree."

Rorick did not even flinch at the fact that there was a goblin and a grey haired spider in the room. Instead, he smiled warmly. "I am glad to meet another monster that has taken the step to become a race like mine. You are welcome to visit my coliseums when you are grown. I have many for you to meet." Rorick was glad to see them.

"Kroll would like to see world one day. Will remember this for then." Ventus scratched at the floor slightly showing his own excitement.

"Then since we are dropping formality..." The king uncrossed his arms and stretched his back. "I hate these chairs. They are not comfortable.

"I have been cursing them myself but they were made many years ago and we would never change them." The elf queen supported this greatly changing the rooms' atmosphere.

"Kroll and Ventus want to make these for home. Can learn?" The queen smiled and nodded.

"Of course I will send over an elf that can work with wood. TI will also add your home to the patrols of enforcers so you can learn even more. I expect you to become a full fledged race recognized by the world sooner than expected." The queen was full of hope and positivity.

"Those that are on the same path as you in my kingdom are trying to grow as well. But they fear the world a little too much. They have yet to fully take control of their own villae and rely on demi-humans too much. I recommend you learn fast and then take full control." Rorick spoke with this advice wanting the goblins and grey haired spider to lead the other monsters in this way.

"So on the present topic. We all agree that we will form this new capital? We can flawlessly unite our kingdom and create a better future. No requirements other than equal representation." August was making sure that they all agreed. The nods and from the others made him relax yet again.

"I have one condition. Every race will be allowed access to the city. Dwarves, Merfolk, other elves, demons, dragons, monsters becoming their own race, and any others that we find or that journey there." Walker did not wish this to be just for the races in the agreement. He was a true hero and to him, that meant that he was a hero to all races.

"I agree with leader. Some races may not be in a position to stand next to all right now, but one day they will and should not be pushed away." Su spoke up for the first time in a little bit believing that more support for another hero would make it clearer that the requirement was not an option.

"The demons will only be allowed when they have paid for the sins they have committed. My father was a victim of theres and I do not have the right to move on from where I stand until that is done. However, I do see the reason you all wish to go about it by removing the corruption guiding them. So I will support that movement until it is a failure. At that point, I will personally enter the demon territory and end the threat one way or another."

This was enough for them to work with. Having the demi-humans' support in this matter was more than enough for them all to move forward and meet the dwarves. "Then we have an agreement to do things the hard way first. We remove the lord of the demons and their sin demon generals. From there the bad will be weeded out by those oppressed." August summed their plan up.

"We have an agreement and can draw up the contract and bond our souls to it. Kroll and Ventus, do you agree?" The queen made sure to include the final members in the decision.

After a little thought, the two stopped looking at each other and looked at them all. "As long as all welcomed. Goblin and Grey hair support this." This was the final say.

Chapter 534 - 534. Stopping Point

Before Walker knew it he and Su had watched many plans drawn up for road ways, materials, construction, land, and many other things. Every single one went in to details that he had never learned and never understood. All the two knew was that they were witnessing history.

After many hours in the windowless room the kings, queen, and other pair of representatives showed weariness. "I think we will stop here for the night. We have the start of the city plan and orders to our armies to reinforce the elven and demi-human borders." August felt that his decisions would not be as clear and cut if he did not rest.

"I agree. We may be used to sleepless nights but if we do so now we could miss an important detail." The queen agreed. "I will have rooms made for each of you and also have my scribes prepared for tomorrow unless you would like someone else.?"

"Walker hasn't learned any scribe skills yet....right?' Rorick was hoping that Walker could act as the scribe but saw that Walker was shaking his head no. "I had hope that it would be easy and we could stay a little more casual. I feel like I have gotten more done today ignoring formalities than ever." Rorick had not been one for formalities but even the demi-human kingdom had laws and rules to follow.

"You're telling me about it. The nobles always stand in my way for the smallest things. I wanted to build another orphanage and they were up in arms about funding. But I say that I want additional street cleaners and they praise me." August shook his head. He had many instances of skirting nobles to achieve his goals.

"Try elders. They always say that things need to be a certain way. I literally have a skill that lets me speak with our ancestor's spirits and I am still told I am too young. I even find myself telling this to my successor. We all become elders one day." The queen was skating her own head at herself.

"Krol and Ventus are not enjoying proper talk. We like blunt to understand. Words are many when there is nothing to say." Even Kroll and Ventus had the feelings that there was too much in the way of progress. It was a stunning scene for Walker and Su who had never seen rulers as anything other than powerful figures of royalty and perfection to some degree.

Walker and Su had a devilish grin at each other before they spoke as well. "Su, do you wonder what it is like to be suddenly told you are an ambassador when you thought you had just been handed a travel medal?"

"Yes I do leader. Do you know what it is like to be added to a tournament as a test for a king who likes battle?"

"Su, of course I do. What about when you find elves that are stuck in their ways that they need hero title holders to make a change most of them want?"

"Leader, I understand that pressure. I am sure it is the same as the hero made to be a mediator without much knowledge."

The two were starting to have trouble holding back their laughter while the kings and queens stared at them slightly pale. They had been the ones to cause all of these things without any thought on how the party felt.

"I do need to say. There are way too many words used. Having to appear in a hall and talk everything through takes a lot of time. I feel like this isn't the kind of adventuring I imagined." Walker sighed slightly but remembered the places he had explored and shrugged it off.

"Leader, I think we may have taken the joke a little far..." Su had noticed the others' faces and was worried they had offended all of them.

"It's alright. They just need rest after they agree that we will have a resting place in the new capital. It is important to have the mediator there sometimes. Meaning that the mediators' party would also have somewhere to stay." Walker was sneaky and threw this in there. He wasn't after a mansion but knowing that there would be a small house to sleep when they passed through the area was a perk.

Walker saw the other nod slowly accepting that. "Alright then. We will close this meeting here for now. Tomorrow we will discuss further construction such as another adventurers guild building in the capital, a tamers guild location, and finally the joint work force that will greatly bring the working classes together. Until then we shall rest."

Walker closed the meeting officially. "Ehm, yes. My enforcers will guide everyone to the proper resting places. I look forward to having you all for breakfast in the morning to try some of the natural fruits and herb teas from our home."

The queen stood and opened the door for them all to move out. The sound of them walking out made the fairly tired merchants, attendants, elders, guild master, and Scylla stand tall. With a few words they were also pausing their conversations and heading to rest.

Walker and Su browsed the tables to find trade agreements and the guild decisions making amazing progress. "Finally we can go and sit. They started to argue about what materials the curtains were made out of and I have no idea why it mattered." Gil looked like he had been pushed to the limit.

"At least they listened to you. They tried to brush me off as if I was a know nothing. Luckily Midnight just had to pick her head up and they learned to use their ears." Remey patted Midnight on the head while she puffed her chest up. Midnight was very proud of her job thus far. But now they had earned their rest until the next morning.

Chapter 535 - 535. Specifics

The night soon was breaking way in to morning for the party. This brought them to the second day of decisions when it came to the meetings. So far there had already been a huge amount of growth, not only had an up and coming race been added to the mix to join and learn through experience but there was also the new capital being formed from the three uniting sharing their strength and knowledge.

"Midnight, make sure they listen to Remey more today. They should be speaking about the things that were more or less were building from the decisions of their kings and queen from the previous day." Walker had filled in his party members on what had occurred.

"Leader, will you want me to work as a middle man between the groups today? The groups may begin to work on things that affect their progress and need to be shared between each other." Sui was already thinking of what would happen through the day and Walker could only nod in approval.

"I think today I might have a little trouble. They should be speaking on locations and criteria for hiring staff members." Gil spoke up wanting to make sure that Walker remembered the worries he had.

"That will be an important standard to set for an adventurers guild. If they are too relaxed they could end up with a guild that does not function properly. But if they also end up with a poor design or location they could end up with not enough room to do what the guild does." Walker had already bounce ideas off of everyone and referenced their guild in the kingdoms to the demi-human adventurers guild.

"I remember, We thought that a space above their largest training area would be best since they could build a proper dissection area and allow for training spaces at the same time. All that would be needed is a larger above ground building." Gil reminded himself of the best idea they had and how he would introduce it.

Midnight was following Remey closely and Onyx had already taken a space on Gil's shoulder. The pairs were set and the party returned to the queens' hall to find the others already there just arrived. "I believe we can begin the second day!" Walker said this and caused everyone to fall in to motion.

The next four days went in a flurry of debate and all contracts. The laws revolving around the adventurers guild became signed and written. There were trade routes to be created and trade laws to be brought and taught to each kingdom respectively. Most importantly the details of how and when the new city was being built had been decided.

The three kingdoms were to begin sending builders and resources in less than a month. They had already sent mages and soldiers to protect the area along with sending soldiers to the border to sure it up against the demons.

The laws for the new city had been a tough topic since each wanted them to follow the laws of their own kingdoms. However, with a significant amount of guidance from Walker, the rulers were pushed to make them include everyone. There would be free trade that welcomes large auctions of multiple items to give everyone a fair chance at rare goods. This law greatly pleased the rulers since they feared an unfair advantage.

Kroll and Ventus found that they could speak on the laws revolving around monsters and hunting. This was mostly due to their fast expanding knowledge of the other monsters that had begun to form their own races. The demi-humans had not been able to guide those under their care to this stage but it was clear that the goblins and grey haired spiders would reach it soon.

To this end the final day, Kroll and Ventus left to return to the place they had begun to build their own village. They took craftsmen and a few other notable professions to attempt to teach other goblins. Before they left Walker found out that their numbers had reach seventy goblins and over a hundred grey haired spiders. More had sensed the growth of their races and found the little village.

One set of laws that was hard pressed for Walker and Su was that there be a set of regulations and processes for a being of another race seeking shelter from oppression and war. This was mostly due to the demons and their treatment of their own people but could apply to any of the races in the world. It was a section of laws that had never been in existence to their knowledge and radically changed how races could be cared for.

When the topic first arrived Walker saw the looks of distaste and frustration on all of the rulers' faces. Yet, as the conversation went on they turned to excitement since they were breaking new ground on a set of laws that would make life better for everyone. Building an accepting environment to not only strengthen their people but all others in the future.

The development of an inter-kingdom education system was another breakthrough they had come to. There were many new laws and cultures coming together. They all agreed that they would need somewhere for the young to go and learn how the world would work. It was also a good way for many different system users to attend and try and help the young to gain their systems earlier.

This would cut down on those without systems in life and also unite the people more. On the topic of people without systems, there was a new way for them to find work. Many would choose the lower no skill jobs to scrape by. But in the new city, there would be a huge amount of jobs and careers that they could take to assist in communications between the various facilities there. It was more than just a new hope for system users.

Chapter 536 - 536. Final Signatures

The three groups working on their respective tasks came together for a final meeting. Walker stood tall from the large round table with many maps and plans upon it. "Today will be the final signing of contracts. We can start with merchants please."

Markus Raven stood up as the representative of this group. "We have set up price points for various potions, created items, and even services the other kingdoms do not possess. However, the price of herbs and potions will be dictated by the current head of the alchemy guild which shall take effect in exactly one year."

This was the date set for the guild to establish itself. This seemed like a long time but in the plans that had been made, it was extra. The guild could begin operation as soon as the buildings and heads were established. The sooner the better.

"The Garnet family shall establish a joint auction branch with the Demi-human group known as collectors. They both have many years in the sale of any and all goods."

The collectors were a group that collected rare items and materials for the Demi-human kingdom and held auctions to sell them. It was an equal to the human kingdom's Garnet family and operated just as well.

"Furthermore the new trade paths and guides will begin within one week for those still here. This training period will last an additional two weeks. The roads will begin construction immediately from each kingdom with the great assistance of the earth elemental mages from the forest elf city."

Markus sat back down after highlighting the greatest things and signing a final document which was then brought to Ibis.

"The adventurers guild had taken on to itself the privilege to extend another branch in this city and one within the new unarmed city. The laws applicable and regulations have all been taken in to account. There are two documents for the conduct of both branches."

This had taken some time and a few sleepless nights but Ibis still felt his energy was limitless. "We will begin recruiting here tomorrow and education will follow. There are top staff of the human branch that will assist with all effort."

"We will also issue quests for adventurers to venture to the new city and work as labor along with hand picked adventurers to come here and begin the training by guides. After they have learned they will be able to teach others in the respective kingdoms they come from."

"Locations for both branches are already established and blueprints are waiting for approval. Thank you for this opportunity." Ibis signed the paper as the guild master of the adventurers guild. The pride he felt in the moment was immeasurable.

The signed al contract finally came to rest in front of their rulers. The three were looking at those who had been deliberating just as much as them with an air of confidence. These three had never done something so large in their entire lives nor in their kingdoms' histories.

"First of all, I thank the human king and the demi-human king for reaching out to us with the same kind hand as we extended. Furthermore, I am grateful to find that our forest home held two new rulers on the path to becoming their own equal races. These things bring pride to the world."

The queen was absolutely beaming. She had not shown such joy to any since they began but it was clear now that there was nothing but pure joy. "I am blessed that we will also be recognizing others treading the path to becoming a race and hope for their futures. My home has finally opened itself to the rest of the world and we will use all of our might to create a place that can bring everyone closer and stringer."

The queen signed the contract in front of her then passed it to king August. "I have seen many things I did not expect nor could fathom. The heroes who were birthed in my kingdom have risen above it at such a young age and I believe that the joint city we create will become a place for many equal geniuses to rise. We have taken the time to decide on a name for the capital we shall build. We chose a name that means to come together and create something new; the city of Genesis."

King August said this and a murmur swept through the room in approval. They had all been wondering the name of their new city and were impressed with the hefty name. King August did not see any reason to dwell on any other topic since everything else had already been explained.

"I would first like to apologize for the fact that I did not come personally at the first word of this meeting. I wildly underestimated the importance and found this out early enough to arrive here in time to make this leap forward." King Rorick wanted to make sure that they all knew he valued this alliance and was ready to put everything behind it.

"My people are on edge due to current times and we will be able to find further growth and solace in this new city. My people will take full responsibility for creating the fields to feed those who wish to grow there. My people will also shoulder the heavy materials and assist every craftsman we can, it is something we are able to do that humans and elves can not. This is the reason we shall all grow, we are able to protect each others' weaknesses."

King Rorick looked down at the al contract below his hand and signed it immediately. He refused to let this chance pass by. He may not be going to war any longer but had found a new path. He had found those which would push his people beyond the limits they had found. The walls would be broken to foster this future.

Chapter 537 - 537. Waking The Continent

The al contract once signed resonated with the mana of each of the signers. Walker came forward from his seat and took it. Each of his party had already signed it and he was the last. The recognition of the heroes was the greatest backing such an undertaking could have. Not only for the fruitful future but also for the acceptance of the peoples.

As Walker signed the al contract himself he felt that some of his mana was being absorbed in to it. This was something he had never come in to contact with and learned about here in the elf kingdom. Many races would use these contracts as a way to hold each other accountable but they were mainly used by rulers and nobles.

When the al contract is broken then those involved would be notified by the systems and penalties would be doled out. Not only the kingdoms or races affected would be punished by each other but also by the world.

The last pen stroke Walker made caused the contract to become enveloped within blue flames. This wasn't fire in the traditional sense because the natural mana did not reflect this. Instead, it was the world claiming the contract and pushing it in to the systems.

'The contract of three kingdoms; Forest elf, Human, Demi-human. Has been signed in to law. The races shall be united in the creation of a grand city; Genesis. The three rulers shall unite their people and foster growth. War is not permitted. Territorial disputes are not permitted. Laws will be adjusted.

The world recognizes the support of those who hold the title of hero.

The world recognizes the True hero title holder.

With the will of the races and the will of the world, the bond has been made. If the contract is broken then the world shall lay down its greatest punishment to those that have failed to uphold such contracts.'

These punishments were outlined but as soon as the world took a hold of the al contract written by the arcane scribe, it changed the punishments to those put down by the world itself. This made them all realize that they were much more bonded to this future than expected. If they so much as strayed from the path they had chosen then they would be looking at the world and not any other enforcing its' punishment. This was terrifying but also invigorating.

"The world has acknowledged our bond and we will celebrate this." The queen stood up and called for her people to celebrate this day. "Today is to be our first multi-kingdom holiday. The day of Genesis!" With the queens' ruling the others in the room gave a shout. The elders quickly sent word out of the hall to the people.

There were many in the respective kingdoms that were receiving the kingdom notifications of what had been declared and what was in motion. The amount of quests sent out at once to begin preparing materials, training, traveling, and many other things was almost an uncountable number. This was the single largest movement for any that had lived in this age.

There were also many quests and notifications sent to the other kingdoms about this. Deep underground the three dwarven kings had their monthly meeting and were receiving their own notifications.

"What is this! City of Genesis?" One gruff voice shouted in seeming anger.

"Why were we not included within this? Actually wait, we have a quest to receive the heroes? When are they coming? I need to return to the surface to prepare." The second gruff voice was full of stress and excitement.

"Who cares about their little tea party up there. I still have things to talk about. Get your fat self back in your chair and read through the materials we are sending up! The numbers are too low and we need to deal with those yellow pests." The third voice could care less for what was happening and only wanted to focus on the task at hand.

Deep within the waters of an ocean in turmoil, the silence of the water was broken but a melodic voice that was not disturbed by the water at all. "Do we dare set foot on the land to deal with such small matters? We are busy with the demon spawns of the water and nothing else. If they can not come to help us, why would we go to greet them?"

"Father, please allow me. I have not ventured on land in my life and need to partake in the trial to earn my rite of succession. I will carry your word of greeting and establish relations yet again." The melodic voices of other males and females voiced their agreement.

"Then gather your siblings and go. I need not the assistance of those without their rite completed. When you return you will be allowed to swim through the battle field against the demonic Kraken and their spawn."

In the demon lands, the earth rumbled as a fist smashed the ground. Demons felt this anger and annoyance and cowered. The only ones to stand up and begin to accept orders were seven title holders of sin. These demons began to bolster their own armies.

In the highest mountains, the small villages were full of peaceful events and calm demeanor. There was not a worry within their little world of mountains and sky, but as the world turned these actions that came with it caused the end of slumber for a great many of the royal dragon kind. Sleeping giants had begun to awaken.

The light of the sky grew brighter. If any of the world were to look up they would swear they saw through the clouds and in to yet another city. However, this was cast off as the imaginations of children and drunk ramblings of fools. The height of the sky may have trembled slightly but the flutter of wings was enough to cause some of the most sensitive to look up in curiosity as well.

Chapter 538 - 538. Celebrating

The events of the world went unnoticed by the party. They were caught up in the celebration the forest elves had begun. There was music that filled the streets along with many of their traditional dances. Food was freely brought from every corner and shared among them. "I haven't seen this kind of celebration since last year's eclipse celebration." Wade was sitting at a table with the party and rulers, enjoying the festivities.

"You should all visit again during the next eclipse. I will be part of the ceremony as I follow my duty as a future queen. It will be a sight to see." Alma had taken a seat next to Gil which kept Gil a little more silent and red faced than usual. Remey had tried to make fun of him but had been dragged away by Midnight and Su to try every possible sweet they could.

Onyx had curled himself around a high light elemental crystal and was resting. He had been highly focused on the entire process and was mentally exhausted. This was one reason that Walker had not pushed for the party to leave immediately. If they had he could not guarantee that they would all be able to properly travel to the dwarven kingdom. Not to mention over the course of the weeks it would take.

"I expect that you will all be leaving in the morning?" Alma had raised the question slowly. She didn't want to see those that had supported her leaving so soon. That and she couldn't help but want to go with them and continue to see the amazing things they caused with every step. Unfortunately, she was bound to the city and would need to uphold her responsibility.

"Yes, we need to head to the dwarven kingdom to see how they are fairing with the yellow slimes. I have a feeling that they are dealing this the same problems as your city was." Walker had been worrying about how bad this problem may be getting and how much worse it would get while they traveled there.

Alma looked a little sad at this but knew that it was better to help those in need and did not push them to stay. "I think we will be visiting here again. But it would be even better to see you all in the new city. I think that will be the best place for any future leader or representative. Plenty of things to learn." Gil wanted to make sure that he would see Alma again but also made it about seeing everyone again.

"Hey Walker, want to take a walk around? I am sure you want to say a few things to the others before you leave in the morning." Wade had read in to the situation unfolding in front of them and decided it was best to let Gil and Alma alone to speak. He also wanted to make sure he had plenty of things he could tease her about later since they were their own party.

"Sure, I want to make sure I say goodbye and allow for the queen and kings to give me some last minute advice on what to do when we arrive in the dwarven kingdom." Walker was a little worried about these things but knew that he could use some heads up on what he would need to do and act like there.

The two stood and moved toward the table center where the three rulers were speaking freely. They had been sharing their woes as rulers and also bragging about their kingdoms equally. It was rare for them to be able to relax in such a way and wanted to do so before they needed to return and bolster their strength towards the new endeavors.

"Ah, come to see me again? I thought that you would be rushing away or resting after all these deliberations. I am glad you have some fight in you yet." King Rorick was glad to see one of those he had seen battle before and enjoyed.

"I will plan to visit the demi-human kingdom again, but I am not sure when that would be. It sounds like I will sooner see you in the city of Genesis." Walker smirked as he said this. The city was definitely going to be built faster than he was estimating due to the joint effort of all three kingdoms.

"You should see us there. When the main structures are built I will attend and make sure things are progressing smoothly. It will also hold as the main summit for the other kingdoms' ambassadors." The queen had already decided this with the other two. She was looking forward to standing in line with her fellow rulers and show off their joint effort.

"Yes, a meeting such as that will require the heroes that have spent their time and hard work to assist in the citys' creation. It will also give you the chance to meet many other rulers and their representatives." King August was sure to add this so that Walker would know the gravity of being there.

"I will be sure to plan that out. I believe we will end up there anyways. The city is going to be a place for people to thrive and we will all want to see it rise properly." Walker assured them that the party would be in attendance. "Now, my party will be leaving in the morning for the dwarven kingdom. We are sure that they will need assistance with the slimes that plague them. I also want more information on the slime breeder most likely causing their issue as well."

The reasons did not escape Walker as he spoke his planned leave. "Then as the three rulers of the Genesis alliance, we issue this quest. Investigate the danger of the yellow slimes to the dwarven kingdom and take our greetings to the dwarven kings." The elf queen said this with affirmation from the other two.

"I also have a gift for you. Whenever an elf leaves the forest they are required to wear this." The queen placed down small green metal leaves in the shape of a wreath. Each one glowed with small runes that symbolized the forest elf kingdom.

"They have a unique rune on them that proves you are related to this city and this kingdom. If any are to send mana through them they will feel the flow of natural mana for a moment. That is our way of showing our standing." The queen was proud to be handing these out to Walker. She had not met any other race that was deserving of this symbol in her lifetime. For her, it was a heart warming event.

"Thank you. We are proud to wear something so important. I hope we can visit soon. But I think it will be even better to meet at the new capital." Walker was impressed and excited to be given these identifications. The party held three identifying symbols from three different kingdoms which held their friends. Nothing was more fulfilling.

"Come on and stop that serious talk. I want to see that foot work you have learned. Scylla told me you have two different skills that you use together and that it was rather inspiring." King Roricks' voice was a little too loud. However, this seemed intentional to make the center of the floor clear and music to start up.

"I don't think you can tell a king no." Wade pushed Walker forward earning him a harsh embarrassed glare. But Walker was not a spoil sport.

"If I am going to push this to the maximum I can I will need a partner." Walker wanted to have someone share the focus with. Surprisingly a slim elf stepped on the air down from a branch to rest in front of him. Her long hair shimmered in the light of the crystal bringing many elves to look at her without reserve.

"My nickname is Light, like a feather. I am the one in charge of every air strider within the city and I hold the wind wanderer system. Let's see if the esteemed hero can match my dance of the wind skill." The elf smiled and many others were attracted to the scene. This elf was long known for showing off her ability to twist through the air in an elegant fashion. Not many could rival her with their skills even though they were a proper attack based system.

"Then I guess it is only right for me to lead." Walker felt his blood start to pump and he jumped forward. His stride fell as he lowered himself and bounced but up with a spin. The elf matched him but didn't even step a toe to the ground. She did so completely in the air while floating just above the ground.

"Pick the beat up!" Walker yelled for the music to increase and was met with a change in tune. The flutes and wind instruments grew even louder and nearly frantic. This pushed his heart in to an overdrive of adrenaline and speed. "I hope you can dodge well. I can't stay too calm with this."

The dance of the wild rabbit lost its' rationality and Walker fell in to the dance of the rabid rabbit. He completely ignored where the two danced and followed suit. He had no reason to worry over the elegant elf that flipped in the air and flung her arms about by him. He was doing the same.

The real awe started as the two approached the branches and vines of the tree nearby. Walker did not hesitate to jump through and on branches causing those watching to fall further in to the spectacle before him. Light was surprised and pushed her movements to their furthest pique while Walker was using the dance of the rabid rabbit and jungle step in tandem. He was bouncing branch to branch as he had always done so.

The queen had stood up with her jaw dropped while watching this. She had never seen an elf move in such a way as Walker nor had she seen the one nicknamed Light use her full skills. It was a show that shook her curiosity to the very core. She couldn't help but wonder what else this hero in front of her would be capable of the next she saw him.

"You are fast and quick. But you can't dance where I can!" Light had become frustrated and suddenly left the branch for the open air. She wanted to steal away the focus and show that she was the dominant power in the air. She had always been the one to deliver the important information around the city. She had guided many wind striders to their duty and even some others with similar skills. But now she faced a challenge she feared to lose.

Walker couldn't control himself with rationality. He stayed to the intense beat and leapt straight in to the air without a single hesitation. The crown watching felt their hearts jump out of their chests at this sight. The only calm ones were Walker's party who had seen many more amazing things and had a feeling tugging at them. They knew something was about to happen.

Chapter 540 - 540. Ripple

' The skill wind ripple has been taken from the sky god system. The user has automatically learned the skill wind ripple.

Wind ripple- 1 mana cost for every fifty steps.

The user uses a single mana to create waves within the air. This ripple gives the user fifty small waves to step over as if they were solid ground. The ripples cause a small disruption to any wind elemental skills nearby. This skill can be used as long as the user consumes mana to increase the possible steps.'

Walker did not focus at all or have the chance to read this system notification. He was consumed by the dance of the rabid rabbit and stepped through the air using the wind ripple skill continuously.

Light was shocked and found that her steps had become shaky and hard to balance. Before she knew Walker was within an inch and was swinging an arm out to her. The music came to an end in this instant as if someone had ordered it and Walker felt his rhythm interrupted. He felt the slight tired feeling and noticed that Light was starting to snake in the air.

He acted as smoothly as possible and started a walk down to the ground using the air ripple skill. He guided Light down and raised his and her hand high before bowing. After the watching audience had shouted their praise he separated from her. "That was a lot of fun. Thanks for helping me learn a new skill." Before she could reply he was already gone towards the musicians who had been stopped by Su.

Walker smiled with a slight bit of embarrassment. He didn't like how the dance of the rabid rabbit skill would keep him moving without his full focus and consent. The instinctual drive was a little too much to handle. However, he was not afraid to use the skill when his party was around since they were able to properly keep him in check. He knew he could always rely on them and they could for him.

Light just looked in awe at Walker since he had just said that he had learned a new skill. To the elf that had been the master of walking through the air, it was something impossible. However, before she could get anywhere near him to ask for more information Walker was crowded by the other wind striders that had been watching from around him.

"Scylla, you didn't do him justice in your description of his skills. That movement was more than any of us could replicate." King Rorick was amazed and brought to a more serious attitude after seeing Walker step through the air in such a manner while using other movement techniques.

Scylla who stood behind him was equally shocked again by Walker and his change in his dance. "My king, I believe he just learned yet another skill. He could not walk and cause those ripples in the air before. I believe we witnessed him get stronger yet again."

"I can say, the difference since I last saw them to now is extreme. I feel that there is an aura of power around them that they lacked. I know we may have higher levels and different systems...but I do not believe that would matter." King August had listened in on the conversation between the two and could not hold back.

"Just from the moment they stepped in to my city and now with them preparing to leave, it is very different. They caused the world to shake due to the experience they gained, brought new ideas to my archers, trained young enforcers in ways they had been missing, showed my people the value the world would have for their products, and they even stood behind my own successor to change our laws." The queen also joined in. This was the problem with sitting next to other rulers.

"You forget that they also are the only ones recognized as friends to monsters, right? I did not miss the fact that they gained more titles. They even helped one of my own gain a title. It is very exciting." Rorick paused before continuing. "I thought this would go very differently, but this may be the first time I have not wanted war with the demons in my life."

There was a look of relaxation on Rorick's face. He had long been stressed by this notion and even more so after the recent events with potions and cursed items. Having this situation was unprecedented and utterly amazing. "Do you think they will bring those dwarves from under their rocks? It has been many years since they traveled out of their own kingdom in flesh and blood. They are too attached to those golem soldiers."

King August didn't even hesitate to respond to Rorick's words, "Yes. If they go there I can almost guarantee that they will want to join this alliance and venture to the city. If the elves and dwarves can somehow combine their forging and ..." The words alone were powerful.

"I can not see such a thing happening now. But you are correct. These are the people to do it." The rulers fell in to their own conversations on the food and futures they wished to see while the party finally rescued Walker from the onslaught of questions the wind striders were giving him.

"I thought I was going to be talked to death, I couldn't even answer one." Walker was breathing heavily while Su and Remy had released him after pulling him away.

"That's what you get for showing off a new skill. You should have told us that you could walk through the air though." Remy was excited to see that Walker had the skill but wished to have seen it sooner.

"Remey, he just learned it. I saw the way he changed his tactics in the middle." Su had seen it all clearly and began lecturing Remey and Walker on the small changes in his movements.
