Chapter 1581

Right after Sherry's car left the gates of Stockton Residence, another black MPV emerged from the shadows.

Inside the car was the man with the golden-framed glasses, elegantly sitting in the rear seat.

John had just come home a while ago. He said to his driver, "Follow them. Don't let them notice you."

The driver nodded.

Mason chose an expensive and grand restaurant that served some of Sherry's favorite dishes. The only downside was the distance from Stockton Residence.

Sherry took a forty-minute ride to reach the restaurant.

The sky had gotten dark when she arrived. When she got out of the car, she saw Mason sitting by the ceiling-to-wall window on the second floor.

He waved at her with a

Mason made a self-mocking scoff and left the topic aside.

Sherry pondered for a moment and asked, "Mason, if you run into any problems at Westchester, just contact me."

He looked at her friendly smile and pursed his lips. "Yeah, I will."

She raised her glass. "I'll use this fruit juice to propose a toast. I wish you all the best when you return to Westchester. Cheers."

Mason picked up his glass, clinked it with hers, and then drained it to the last drop.

Sherry chuckled at his reaction. Anyone who knew less might have thought Mason had just finished a glass of wine in a single gulp.

Mason also curled his lips when he saw her smiling.

Meanwhile, the man in the car outside the restaurant saw them smiling happily through the window. His brows furrowed and his expression turned grimly frosty. She had never smiled this bright when she was with him, yet she smiled like the sun when she had dinner with Mason. The interior of the car got cold and depressing, which pressured the driver and Peter. Neither of them dared to even make a noise.

John curled his lips and then opened the car door. "Alright. Get in. We are going home." He sounded calm but for some reason, it aroused anxiety in Sherry's heart.

She looked at him as she got into the car. John got in right after her. He sat beside her and held her hand.

After a quiet journey home, the car drove them straight to their house.

Sherry wanted to get out of the car, but he pulled her back. Although she tried to pull her hand away from him, he dragged her closer to himself. He then opened the door and carried her out.

Sherry immediately said, "Put me down! I can walk!"

John ignored her and carried her into the house.

Sherry choked on her words as if she had cotton stuffed in her throat. He never believed her, so no matter how much she explained, it was useless.

The room went quiet for a while.

“Sherry, why are you not talking any more?” He stroked her face and continued coldly, “Is it because you won’t even bother to explain yourself?”

Sherry pursed her lips and said, “I’ve already explained myself. What else can I do if you don’t believe it?”

His eyes flickered for a moment. He chuckled and said, “I went on a business trip for two days, and you had dinner with him behind my back. How can I trust you?”

“I didn’t mean to keep it from you. I ran into him when I brought Caprice to the park this morning. We had a chat and he left.”

“Then, he invited you to dinner and you said yes?” John stared at her sharply.

The girl seemed startled by her father and mother's argument.

Sherry's chest tightened. Then, she felt the weight on her lift all of a sudden.

John had gotten out of bed. He carried Caprice and strode out, leaving Sherry alone in the spacious, quiet room.

Sherry's heart was pounding. She was nervous. It took her a while to sit up and leave the room with her shaky legs.

The bright corridor revealed the red marks on her wrists, which she had gotten from struggling to break free from John.

She had a glance at the living room.

John had a bowl of mashed fruits in his hand and was feeding Caprice on the couch. The girl was munching quietly, and the fear on her face was long gone.

Sherry sighed a breath of relief. She did not want to see the man, so she went back to her room, locked it, and headed to the bathroom.

Sherry sat beside the bed for a while. She wanted to see Caprice, but the girl was with the man.

She had no idea if the man was still mad at her, and if she took the risk to go out, it might exacerbate things. Therefore, all she could do was hide in the room.

Back in the living room, Caprice had just finished a bag of snacks.

John wiped her mouth and asked, "Do you want more?"

Caprice shook her head and then looked in the direction of the bedroom.

John's gaze shifted. He asked, "Caprice, what are you looking at?"

She said with protruded lips, "Why isn't Mommy coming out?"

Sherry's eyes flickered.

However, knowing that he would not be able to come in anymore to hurt her, she lifted her chin and glared at him coldly before she went back inside.

John was left speechless. His expression turned frosty as he chuckled. He then pulled his phone out to text her.

"I'll spare you tonight for the sake of Caprice. If I find out that you are seeing Mason again, you will suffer the consequences."

Ding!

Back in the bedroom, Sherry heard her phone buzz just when she placed Caprice on the bed. She glanced at it and her expression changed. She inhaled deeply and replied, "I know."

She would be stealing Caprice away tomorrow, so it was not just Mason but she would not even be seeing John anymore.

After replying, she carried Caprice in her arms and started to read the girl a story about Red Riding Hood. The girl listened with all her heart until she fell asleep on her mother's chest.

Sherry then said, "It's cold, so I'm not bringing Caprice out today. You should go get some rest as well."

Jason was Caprice's personal bodyguard and would follow the girl wherever she went. Now that he learned Caprice was not going out, there was no reason for him to follow her. He smiled and nodded before he went away.

Sherry nervously exhaled and then went back into the room. She grabbed the sleeping Caprice and the backpacks she prepared last night before striding back outside.

Brandon got out of the car and helped her open the door.

Sherry tossed the backpacks inside before she went in with the girl.

"The airport! Now!" she said.

Brandon nodded and started the car.

Madam Stockton ordered the driver to drive as fast as he could.

The cart sprinted all the way to the gate and stopped beside the parking lot.

Madam Stockton got out swiftly, and so did Julie.

Madam Stockton was aware of Julie following her, so she said, "You don't need to follow me. Call John, tell him to call Sherry, and maybe he can change her mind."

Julie immediately answered, "Alright. I will call John right away." She pulled her phone out but did not dial John's number. Instead, she watched as Madam Stockton get into her car.

The car engine roared to life and sprinted out of the gates.

As the car accelerated out of her sight, Julie's expression turned cold and her eyes showed a hint of viciousness. She muttered, "Mother, don't blame me for this. You should blame yourself for seeing things that you shouldn't and trying to chase me out of the family."

Meanwhile, the white MPV had driven away from the residential area of the Stocktons.

The man on the other end of the call slightly furrowed his brows.

Why did she stutter?

Was she feeling sour because of what he had done to her last night?

His expression changed as he softened his tone. "I was impulsive last night. As long as you stay by my side, and stop seeing Mason, I promise I won't do that to you again anymore."

Sherry's brows and chest tightened. She had taken Caprice away, yet the man was trying to apologize to her.

"Sherry, why aren't you saying anything?" he asked.

Sherry frowned. She said, "I don't know how to answer you."

The man went silent for a few seconds before he said in delight, "This place is famous for its wine. I've bought you several bottles, and I think they will arrive at your doorstep by tonight."

Sherry was silenced but the man's sudden change of attitude and topic. Should he not be mad that she refused to talk to him? Why did the man apologize to her on the phone and even bought bottles of wine for her?
