Chapter 1651

Madam Stockton and Queenie were outside the house.

After Caprice cheered John up and the father and daughter went to bed, both of them sighed a breath of relief.

Queenie exclaimed, "Who would have thought Sherry never cheated on John?!"

Madam Stockton frowned. "It's all my fault."

Queenie protruded her lips. "I made some mistakes as well. When Sherry brought you to the hospital after the crash, I listened to Julie and thought it was her who caused the crash. I slapped her..."

She had been regretting her actions ever since she learned the truth.

Madam Stockton said in a small voice, "It's all my fault. I shouldn't have stopped her from seeing your brother."

"Thankfully, Sherry is still alive," Queenie said with a sigh. "Mom, we shouldn't blame ourselves now since it won't do the situation any good. When John brings Sherry back, we will make it up to her."

Madam Stockton hummed a positive reply. "That's all we can do for now. Let's hope your brother can bring Sherry back."

While he was holding back his emotions, a tiny and soft hand touched his face. His gaze shifted, and he immediately swapped his emotions away for a smile.

However, before he could regain his composure, the girl's adorable voice asked, "Daddy, why is your hand tightened? Let go, don't squeeze the phone."

The girl even tried to pry his fingers away.

John was left speechless.

The girl was thinking about video-calling Liam.

The pain in his chest dissipated. He put on a helpless smile and released the phone.

Caprice hugged his phone into her arms and used her face to unlock it. She then video- called Liam.

Sherry leaned back on the seat and stared at the sea view outside the window.

She just had a nightmare of John surrounding her in an alleyway with a bunch of thugs, and they tried to bring her back to Glenchester for imprisonment. It was short, but it haunted her for quite a while.

Her brows unconsciously furrowed.

“Sis, what’s with that look on your face?” Carl’s voice entered her ears.

Sherry turned around and saw his face.

The man had unknowingly gotten closer to her, and his face was less than one millimeter away from hers. He extended his neck to approach her, startling her.

Sherry sighed exasperatedly.

Carl moved back but remained seated beside her. He stared at her for a while and asked

Sherry smiled at her. "I should really be here to attend Madam Sager's birthday. Don't worry, I'm fine now."

Lisa did not request her attendance, but she had received the invitation to the event from the Sagers' butler. Since she was an important employee of the Sagers' company and even headed a few of the departments, even if she was not Carl's fake fiancée, it would be inappropriate for her to miss it.

Lisa pursed her lips. She looked at Carl and grumbled, "Why didn't you stop her? Don't you know that your grandmother and your aunts are vicious?"

Carl awkwardly scratched his nose. "I know, but I'm here. They won't do anything to Sis either."

Lisa glared at him one more time. "You go greet your aunts and grandmother. Sherry is staying here with me."

Carl was left speechless. "Mom, come on. It's inappropriate."

Sherry wanted to echo, but Lisa held her hand tightly.

Judging from Carl's frivolous look, he had probably cracked the whip in front of them.

Sherry and Lisa went up to them.

Other than Madam Sager's obvious frosty expression, the others welcomed them with a fake smile.

Sherry responded with a professional smile and revealed the present she prepared for Madam Sager. "Madam Sager, this is my present to you. Happy birthday and may you be healthy and happy."

Madam Sager kept her frosty look. She looked away instantly as if looking Sherry in the eye would contaminate her eyes. She did not respond or talk to Sherry, which made things awkward.

Both Anne and Ron, plus others who looked down on Sherry, gloated at her.

Sherry frowned. She was upset by the old lady's reaction, but she could not afford to offend her. All she could do was endure the cold shoulder.

"old that you can't hear properly?" Carl said all of a sudden. He then retracted his leg from the table

Sherry nodded.

"Don't worry. It doesn't matter whether I get married now or later on, but one thing I can say for sure is that I'm not going to be coming back here," Carl suddenly added.

Sherry shot a look at him.

Carl smiled charmingly at her and seemed to be waiting for her to say something.

Sherry was made slightly uncomfortable by the way he was looking at her and quipped, "It doesn't matter to me whether you come back or not, so why are you telling me this anyway?"

Besides, he was able to easily intimidate Madam Sager and the others with just a little bit of posturing, thus there was nothing she needed to worry about.

Carl's eyes darkened ever so slightly, but he quickly collected himself and smiled nonchalantly again.

"I just wanted to tell you that, no reason." As he said this, he gently grazed Sherry's cheeks with the tips of his finger.

Sherry was upset by this. "Carl, what's your problem?"

Carl cocked an eyebrow and provoked her haughtily, "What, are you going to beat me up?

Ada approached the sink as well and asked snappily, "Miss Sherry, I believe this isn't the first time we met. Have your parents never taught you that you should greet someone you know?"

Sherry began to wash her hands while responding disinterestedly, "It doesn't seem like you greeted me either. Have your parents neglected to teach you that as well?"

Ada stuttered and had no response to this. Her face grew red.

Sherry was in no mood to continue squabbling with her. She had finished washing her hands and was wringing her hands to dry them. The sleeves on her left arm parted slightly and revealed a large scar left behind from the previous accident, which was imprinted on her arm.

She immediately took notice of this and pulled back her sleeves as subtly as she could, then she turned and walked out of the bathroom. She marched out in a haste and did not notice the look in Ada's eyes.

Carl was still waiting for her outside, and after she emerged, they went back into the banquet hall.

Ada had just exited the toilet when she watched the two stepping into the banquet hall together. She scowled and was immediately filled with jealousy and scorn. "How dare some vile, disgusting woman like you try to steal him from me?!"

It was still very lively inside the banquet hall.

Sherry and Carl returned to their seats.

Anne was busy chatting with Madam Sager along with her daughter-in-law.

An awkward silence engulfed the table.

Ron and Anne seemed to have become highly uncomfortable with what had been said, and the others did not seem much better either; take Madam Sager, for example.

She frowned so hard that her wrinkles surfaced on her face like crumpled paper. She scoffed sharply, pushed the tableware aside, and declared rather stoutly, "I'm full."

Anne quickly went up to her. "Come on, I'll take you home."

That was when Ada suddenly approached with a glass of wine of her own.

She raised the glass in Madam Sager's direction and exclaimed brightly with a delightful smile, "Grandma, let me toast to you as well. I wish you great joy, and may all of your heart's desires be fulfilled. Live a long and healthy life!"

She brushed past Sherry as she gave the toast, and the glass suddenly tipped over in her hands and spilled its entire contents on Sherry's left arm.

The sleeves of Sherry's shirt were drenched in an instant. The fabric clung to her skin and jolted her with a cold spark.

"Oh no, I'm

Lisa chuckled. "You'd better check if mom is still in the mood for a toast."

Anne turned pale.

"Don't you think it's very disrespectful of them to leave without even bidding farewell to Mom?" Ron remarked grumpily.

Lisa answered with a feigned smile, "Why don't you ask your darling niece if she spilled the wine on Sherry on purpose? Do you think we'd be in this situation if she hadn't done that?"

Ron stammered for a proper response, "Ada... Ada didn't do it on purpose."

"I am sure she did it on purpose." Lisa hissed sharply, "I'm not an idiot."

Ron gulped.

Lisa was not interested in squabbling with them any longer. She shot up from her seat and turned to Madam Sager, "Mom, I'll be leaving. I have some business to deal with."

Madam Sager ignored her.

Lisa had been used to her ambivalence and paid no mind to it. She turned and strutted off without hesitation.

Carl noticed Sherry acting strangely and asked, "Sherry, what are you looking at?"

Sherry took a deep breath and brushed it off, "Nothing."

She must have been mistaken.

That man was miles away in Glanchester. There was no way he would show up here.

Meanwhile, a car that was coming from the opposite lane that had just whizzed past Carl's car, the windows were rolling up and swiftly shut with a steady thud.

A man sat in the back seat and stared at the rearview mirror. It was John.

Inside the mirror, he could spot Carl's car driving away. With every passing second, the car grew smaller until it turned into a blip in the mirror before vanishing.

Nobody spoke inside the car.

The driver and Jason sat in the front row.
