

The billionaire and his son want me back novel

Chapter 274

Diana was sure they hadn't done a DNA test.

Enya had passed away over twenty years ago, making a direct test impossible. The only person who could do a DNA test now was Tyson, who was far away in Monterá.

Besides, if they had actually done a test, they wouldn't just be bringing Brittany here quietly—they would be hosting a grand recognition ceremony.

With just one sentence, Diana hit the nail on the head. Everyone present had different expressions. But Christina's reaction was especially telling.

Paisley took note of everything happening and committed it to memory.

"There's no mistake," Julia said with confidence. "That aunt's close friend Byron was asked to find and turned out to be our cousin's adoptive mother. Plus, the orphanage where our cousin was found matches what Byron's investigation uncovered. So the DNA test is really just a formality."

"That's right. Grandpa has already informed the Godard family, and they'll be arriving in Harrowfell soon to do the DNA test with our cousin in person," Morris added.

Brittany held her head high as people older and more distinguished than her kept calling her "cousin" with respect.

At this moment, Brittany's vanity was thoroughly satisfied.

Follow new episodes on the Crushnovels.Com

"Dear Morris and Julia," Brittany said in an affected tone.

Morris's face darkened slightly at her words, but he held back his displeasure.

Julia, on the other hand, had no objections. Instead, she beamed. "Brittany, if you need anything, just say the word."

Brittany pointed at Paisley and said bluntly, "I don't want to see her. Get her out of here immediately."

"Who dares." Diana's face darkened. Brittany's demand was a direct challenge to her status in the Beaumont family.

Brittany lifted her chin, no longer the fawning woman she had been at the Ladies' Association. She showed no fear of Diana. "What's wrong? Are you picking a fight with me? Aren't you afraid I'll tell your husband?"

Diana scoffed, her anger turning into laughter. "You're using Byron to threaten me?"

She refused to believe Byron would be foolish enough to side with Brittany without evidence.

Brittany's face stiffened as if she had been struck at her weakest point.

When her parents first took her to meet Byron, she had immediately curried favor with Byron by calling him Uncle. But Byron had simply waved his hand and said they would wait for the DNA test results before making any conclusions.

That had been incredibly embarrassing for Brittany, though fortunately, there weren't many people present at the time.

Still, Byron hadn't stopped other members of the Beaumont family from interacting with her. That proved Julia was right—doing the DNA test was just a formality.

Brittany's expression gradually relaxed. "Anyway, I don't want to see her. Everyone here is my family. What is an outsider like her doing here?"

Julia walked up to Paisley with a bright smile, but her words were anything but pleasant. "Ms. Sutton, we don't like you being here, so please leave. Don't interfere with our family reunion."

Julia had heard from the servants in the morning that Diana had invited Paisley over.

Julia thought it was to help Nathaniel pursue Paisley, and to secure a powerful ally for his future so he could compete with their family for the inheritance.

As Morris's wife, Julia would never allow that to happen. The only solution was to invite Brittany. That way, she could disgust both Diana, her biased mother-in-law, and Paisley at the same time.

In the end, neither Julia nor Morris cared whether Brittany was truly a distant relative.

If she was, then great—building a good relationship with her would mean gaining the Godard family's support in the future. If she wasn't, it didn't matter. They could still use her to get under Paisley's skin.

Julia thought that was a surefire way to stop Paisley from being with Nathaniel.

Diana quickly glared it out and looked at Julia with sharp eyes.