

Chapter 1796 Repurchase The Land

As the Singh Group teetered on the brink of collapse, Trevor felt a sense of relief.

Trevor returned to the old site of the orphanage, where he found a few diggers but no workers.

Trevor found it in ruins, with the old building completely demolished, awaiting its new development.

The construction team had yet to commence work due to the lack of funds, rendering the amusement park project futile.

Observing the scene, Trevor couldn't help but smile knowingly. His strategy had succeeded.

He promptly called the director, saying, "Come with me to the bank. Let's reclaim the orphanage land." Together, they went to the private bank of the Sanderson family to redeem the land Collen had previously promised.

As the Singh Group faced impending bankruptcy, they had given up ownership of the land, making it available for Trevor to acquire.

Effectively, Trevor had managed to sell the land to the Singh Group at a high price, resulting in the depletion of the Singh Group's capital. He had essentially gained something for nothing.

Though the Singh Group hadn't officially gone bankrupt yet, the lack of working capital left it in an unrecoverable state.

Upon Tucker's return, he swiftly abandoned the amusement park project and sold the land to salvage the company.

Meanwhile, Trevor had already arrived with the director to meet the sales manager.

Exuding happiness, Trevor declared, "The Singh Group sold you a piece of land, and I want to buy it back."

The land transaction was a significant business deal, and the sales manager initially welcomed them with a smile, inviting them to sit down for a discussion.

However, when he observed their appearances, the sales manager's expression quickly changed.

Trevor showed no resemblance to a businessman. On top of that, he was accompanied by an elderly man in plain clothes.

The sales manager grew suspicious of them.

After assessing the situation, he concluded that these two individuals couldn't afford the land.

Replacing his pleasant demeanor with disdain, the sales manager impatiently said, "There's no such place. You can leave now!"

Trevor's frown deepened as he regarded the sales manager with an unfriendly expression.

It was clear to him that this land had little to no prospects for development, and hardly anyone dared to take it over.

It seemed evident that the sales manager was intentionally causing trouble.

Recalling that the shares he had won from Green Bat did not include those of this particular bank, Trevor realized that he faced limitations in resolving the issue.

After a brief moment of contemplation, he continued in a serious tone, "I know the land is in your bank's possession. Selling it to me wouldn't be a bad decision. There's likely no one else in Zayden willing to take over this burden."

Trevor's words seemed to agitate the sales manager even more.

He responded impatiently, "I've already said no! Leave immediately! If you delay our business, I'll have security remove you!"

Trevor was almost incredulous at the sales manager's tough and rude attitude.

He was the eldest son of the Sanderson family; how could the private bank he had established himself dare to drive him away?

The situation was absurd.

Staring at the sales manager with cold eyes, Trevor spoke in a low, stern voice. 'This is your last chance. Will you sell me the land or not?'

The sales manager sneered, deliberately raising his voice, 'I told you, it's impossible! You don't seem to understand my kindness, do you? Do you want me to tell you the price of the land? It's worth a hundred million! Can the two of you even afford one percent of that?'
