

Chapter 1797 Encounter Difficulties

Upon hearing the sales manager's exorbitant price, the director was taken aback and appeared visibly uneasy.

He couldn't help but worry that they might not be able to reclaim the old site with such a sky-high cost.

Sighing with a sense of helplessness, the director turned to Trevor and said, "It's too expensive. If it's not feasible, let's forget about it. We still have some compensation. We can build the orphanage in another location. The signboard may be bigger, and Esteban can find it when he comes back. But it's a pity to let go of the memories associated with this site..."

Trevor's gaze remained cold as he fully understood that the land couldn't possibly be worth a hundred million.

The sales manager was intentionally making things difficult.

Upon hearing their conversation, the sales manager realized the director's identity and his expression turned even more disdainful.

He loudly taunted, "You said you wanted to buy land. I thought you were some big shot, but you're just the old man from the orphanage! Let me tell you, this land is now for commercial use. You couldn't afford it in your entire lifetime! How pitiful. Get the hell out of here!"

He continued his derision, remembering something and smirking sarcastically, "A group of poor people living off sponsors! To be honest, I had promised Collen to cut off your financial support before!"

The sales manager sneered at the two men.

He couldn't help but think that they were nothing but losers at the bottom. He believed he had countless ways to deal with them, as they were courting their own demise.

The director was too furious to respond, his hands trembling as he contemplated leaving.

In contrast, Trevor remained resolute and gave the director a reassuring pat on the back. He spoke with unwavering confidence.

"Regardless of whether it's commercial land or the base of the municipal government, I will buy it back!

I will fulfill my promise to you!"

As Trevor maintained his confidence, the sales manager couldn't help but laugh mockingly.

"That's bullshit! How do you expect to buy it? Are you kidding me? Can you even afford a hundred million? If you pay a hundred million, then the land is yours. Otherwise, get out!"

Trevor snorted in response, undeterred by the sales manager's taunts.

At that moment, Trevor's phone unexpectedly rang, and he saw that it was a call from Green Bat.

With a serious expression, Green Bat said, "Raven, I want to meet you to discuss our countermeasures."

Trevor looked at the sales manager with a mischievous glint in his eyes and answered, "You have the shares of the Sanderson family's private bank, right? I'll wait for you here!"

The sales manager scoffed at Trevor's statement, not believing a word of it. He adjusted his tie and said sarcastically, "Stop being so pretentious! Calling the shareholders? Who would believe that? Don't waste your time making jokes here. I'm not afraid of anyone you call today! If you want to play games, go ahead and call him over. If he's not a shareholder, you'll be thrown out by security!"

Trevor sneered at the sales manager's bravado.

"You better maintain that attitude! Don't come begging for mercy later!" Trevor warned with a steely resolve.