

Chapter 1799 I Have An Idea

After dismissing the sales manager, the bank head put on a flattering expression and respectfully asked, "What brings you here? I will personally attend to your needs."

Trevor calmly explained his desire to purchase the land, and the head readily agreed to the transaction.

The once-difficult situation had now become a win-win situation that could satisfy the shareholders, and the bank head was pleased with the outcome. The purchasing procedures were swiftly completed.

The director of the orphanage couldn't contain his excitement upon seeing the land returned to their possession.

He thanked Trevor profusely, saying, "Raven, you've been a tremendous help to us throughout these trying times. Esteban is lucky to have a friend like you!"

Trevor humbly replied, "You're welcome. Esteban and I are like family. Please use the money and land to rebuild the orphanage."

The director's heartfelt gratitude was evident as he nodded fervently before departing from the bank, full of hope for the orphanage's future.

Sensing that Green Bat had something important to discuss, the bank head tactfully excused himself, leaving the two alone in the room.

Green Bat, known for his impulsive nature, eagerly turned to Trevor as they found themselves alone in the room.

"Cheetah is deliberately provoking me again, with the clear intention of seizing the shares belonging to the Sanderson family within our Bat faction. If we don't take action, we'll be overwhelmed by them."

Trevor couldn't help but chuckle at the situation, realizing that Cheetah's efforts had indeed made Green Bat anxious.

Taking a moment to think, Trevor then shared his thoughts cautiously. "It's a troublesome situation indeed. If they continue to provoke you, who knows what they might do in the future? I have an idea that might help, but..."

Noticing Trevor's hesitation, Green Bat urged, "Raven, don't hold back. You can trust me. Speak your mind."

Trevor hesitated for a moment before finally revealing, "I have a plan to help you protect your shares, but it might be difficult for you to accept. It could hurt your feelings."

Upon hearing Trevor's concerns, Green Bat gently patted his chest, exuding a sense of assurance.

"What do you mean? I've already confirmed with Prescott that you have no ill intentions towards the Bat faction. If you have any idea, let me know. I trust you!"

Deep in gratitude, Trevor silently thanked Prescott.

His voice turned serious as he responded, "On the surface, I'm still a member of the Wolf faction, so I cannot personally assist you in dealing with Cheetah and Bear. Besides, the Bat faction isn't currently powerful enough to engage in direct confrontation, which might not be beneficial for you. Therefore, my suggestion is to temporarily avoid conflicts."

"If you trust me," Trevor continued, "you can deposit a portion of the Sanderson family's shares under my name. Once you have taken care of Cheetah and Bear in the future, and the tide has turned, I will gladly return the shares to you. What do you think?"

Though Green Bat was known for his impulsiveness, he wasn't foolish. His brow furrowed as he sensed that Trevor might have ulterior motives with the shares.

Still, Trevor noticed his hesitation and came up with an alternative solution.

"If you find it hard to trust me, I'm willing to make an exchange. My shares in the Singh Group and my position as CFO, they're all yours. I assure you, you won't lose anything. I genuinely want to help you!"

At the mention of the Singh Group, a surge of anger washed over Green Bat.

He wore a long face and spoke crossly. "Do you think I'm stupid? The Singh Group is on the brink of bankruptcy. What could be the value of its shares? The position of CFO would be meaningless then, and I won't gain any benefit from it."

Unfazed by Green Bat's reaction, Trevor maintained a calm demeanor.
