

My Mates 340

Chapter 340 Wish I Didn't Blink

"Thiago! Where are you going?" I was briskly following him through the hallways, expecting him to stop.

"I am going to the room. Why?" He finally stopped and shrugged his shoulders at me for acting like that.

"No! I thought you meant something else when you said I shouldn't look for you," I walked closer to him, standing face to-face and aiming for eye contact.

"Really? I don't remember saying anything. I just returned from the principal's office," he said, and my body shuddered at acknowledgment. His memory was getting messed up now.

"Oh! Okay." I didn't want to bug him for his memory and let him pass through. When we walked back into the room, we found Christina in Maynard's arms and Lazlo waiting for us awkwardly.

"What is going on over here?" Thiago questioned causally, reaching for his bed and flopping down comfortably. Since we all knew the symptoms, we didn't act surprised.

However, Christina broke the hug to walk over to me. I saw her eyes scanning me and her lips quivering.

"I am sorry for making you feel like you should apologize for defending yourself. It is difficult to accept that my father was a ra—," she pressed her lips in a tight line and wrapped her arms around her body anxiously.
