TENDROTTLIN 1020 AD

AURORA

The first thing I remember is Thena.

The second thing I remember is Drog.

It takes me a moment to gasp what happened. My hands fly directly to my stomach, trying to feel for any sort of dent or sign that Thena's sword had stabbed me.

Thankfully, there's nothing except the stain of the blood around my suit.

I sit up straight, looking around me. It was still dark outside from what I could see, as I must have been out for only a short time. I'm back in a small tent on the floor, a dim array of candles casting a warm glow in the room.

My mind goes back to the moments before I passed out. How Drog had looked at me when he'd seen the blood on my hands.

How he'd caught me when I fell, how he'd soothed me with his words and called me Mary.

That man was so ill. worst from the men I had known the past seven thousand years.

I had never seen his back as worried as he had right there.

It confused me to think that it had been mate-was worried about.

In the past couple of hours, our relationship had developed more than it had in the past thousand years. I found myself in more than anything else, really.

Why now then, had he used so little until now? Why had it taken us years ago on something?

Why did I hate him to begin with?

Regret sprung inside me, mischeting in my brain like a loose ball. We had spent all those years fighting and hating each other when maybe we had just been misunderstanding everything.

Well, maybe that.

I thought back to what he'd said before I passed out. It seemed wierd that he had cared to with such security, such confidence.

Still, as much as I tried to figure it out, I couldn't really understand. Contact between us had been at a minimum an'quite, and I had barely had the time to be scared to reach out.

Even more so because I knew he didn't like me. We were supposed to have this archnemesis thing going on. It confused me to think that I was supposed to hate him.

And yet hating him was the farthest thing away from what I was doing.

He amused me, of course. I hated that I liked him so much. I hated that every time he walked in the room my heart would skip a beat, or how I sometimes would get so in touch with the rumor and how even I had