

Chapter 266

She recovered swiftly and was soon discharged from the hospital.

She stood outside the hospital and contemplated if she should head home by taxi or subway. Her lower abdomen was still hurting, and there was a distance from the subway station. However, a taxi would cost far too much.

Anne was instantly overcome by sorrow at the realization that she lived a pathetic life where she needed to act so cautiously over spending a few more bucks.

When she thought of the fact that she could spend the money on buying snacks for the children, she white-knuckled through the pain and headed toward the subway station slowly.

It was barely noon by the time she arrived home, so she returned to her room to rest and made herself some soup when she started to feel hungry. After taking her medication, she went back to bed to rest.

Anne placed her palm on her stomach while lying on the bed and thought to herself, 'The blood clog has been removed, so why does it still hurt? Did they leave something in there? That's not right. If they missed something, I should still be bleeding right now. It's probably the allergy.'

Though the doctor informed her that she could go back to work immediately after the surgery, it was still just a conservative saying. Technically, one would require rest to recover from an abortion. In the end, she had come close to dying from a seafood allergy, and she simply did not want to go back to the office to see those whom she wished not to see.

Anne was certain that Anthony knew about what had happened, considering how severe the situation was. He simply turned a
