Chapter 31

Jonathon Lancaster

I have always been a man of action.

My upbringing ensured that. Whenever a problem was brought to me, I solved it. Whether it was a broken fence, a business problem, and even a spokesperson issue. If no one else could, it only made me who I am today—as a victor-war commander and a future king.

But this tragedy, I found myself helpless.

There was no solution. There was no second plan. There was just pain, and so wrong.

That pain demanded to be felt.

I saw she sorrow in my General's eyes. I wanted to take it all away. If I could, I'd shoot our hero so King and Lord on my shoulders. My beloved did not deserve this. She did not deserve to the hell torment and shame that was now in her name. My brother could've been saved by such a catastrophe.

I could feel it—my mom's misery gnawed at my heart and had no will of acting. I eagerly abandoned my own pain to focus on hers. Did I want pain? Definitely. But I don't want to bring one into the world right now. I wanted my soul to grow up with a father he could call a hero. I knew Serena would make a good mother, but I also knew that she knew wasn't right.

Why?

Why did Serena think she'd ever feel fault? It wasn't. If anyone was to blame, it was me—I was older—I should have been more responsible. We should have talked about it. Why had I not been more careful? It wasn't like birth control wasn't available for our kind—I had just been my dyslexic not arrive and there was no excuse for that. I had already had a child with Serena before. I knew how it worked. I couldn't have forced her into motherhood if she knew not to.

My foolishness was the cause of this tragedy.

Some fucking meet I was.

She didn't deserve me.

In the days that followed, Serena was like a ghost—a shell of her former self. Her smiles were weak, her movements had, and her demeanor muted. Her eyes lost all that sparkle—she was still my silly beautiful, that was for sure, but there was hollowness layered in it that I could not describe.

It didn't take long for word to get out. D. and letters of condolences poured in from all across the territory. My mother would read them to me, but even she could see that Serena's mind was elsewhere in a dark abyss. Patricia tried to cheer her up, but not even my brother's loveliness could bring a smile to her face. Mother just said give it some time, and father allowed me to take time + my duties so I could be with Serena.

She barely slept—I tried everything short of sneaking in sleeping pills. There were hugs under her eyes and it knew she still wasn't sleeping. I wasn't around. She ate little, and I was constantly trying to convince her to eat more than a few bites. I was worried about losing her. She just floated in and out of rooms silently, I can looking out the windows, sitting in couches staring into space, and muttering to herself. I caught her trying to talk to our unborn baby.

"There's so much space to rest around in sightening, Hector." She absentmindedly murmured as she sat in front of a mirror and brushed her hair.

"Serena?" I asked, looking up from my book.

"Hum?"

"You were saying something?"

"Oh…nothing, sorry." She muttered, going back to brushing her hair.

I talked to my mother, some healers, and even Clayton at one point and they all said the same thing—to just give her space.

"You can't fix this, Jon," my mother said, her hand on my arm to stop me. I interrupted. "I'm right and you know it. There's a solution for this, and let me know that she's not alone."

I tried to talk to her, and every time we were together I always made sure I was holding her in some way. She just laughed and let me do it. Kiss, but I know better. She wasn't fine. Finally, in the F. Stay a per- hour visa trips. I had enough. My mate should not be living like this.

So I formulated a plan.

"Serena?" I gently called as I entered the study. She was there holding a doll she had brought with her from Eastern Claw. It was obviously handmade, and it looked like it had seen better days.

"I forgot I brought this…" She murmured. "It's not made me so mad he said it looked like a bone. I made it in arts and cra s when I was seven…look at the stitching here…"

She held it out to me, and sure enough the stitching was crooked and uneven. The yarn had also been sewn in together was thick, and I was surprised the object hadn't fallen apart yet.

"It's beautiful," I said.

Serena sighed wistfully, looking into my eyes.

"Jon…" She paused, but stopped and looked down. "Never mind."

I knelt in front of her and lifted her chin so that she looked at me. I gave her a gentle smile.

"What?"

"I…I don't…it hurts…I mean…" She stuttered, a tear falling down from her eye.

"Where does it hurt, my love? Do you need a healer?" I asked.

"No…I mean…not like that. It just…hurts…" She sighed. I shook my head and kissed her hand.

"I know…" I said.

"You're hurting too, I know it…" She said, tilting her head.

"I am," I admitted. "My soul has been miserable. We feel the loss so strongly that it's wrenching. But it also is a gift. It's a way to mourn. I can't let you torture yourself, Serena." She shook her head.

There was silence.

"We don't deserve to feel like this…" She whispered.

"I know."

"Why did it happen? And don't say that it was the plan of the Goddess because if I hear that one more time I'm going to—" She sobbed, but I interrupted her.

"Serena…listen to me, we can question this for ages and not have an answer, or we can pick up the pieces and put it to rest. I want to."

"How?"

"Come with me. I have an idea." I said, standing up.

"I'm not pushing you into a lake."

"Jon, I can't walk around blindfolded!" She hi ed.

"I wasn't expecting you to." I said. As gently as I could, I'd set her up and carried her in my arms.

She said nothing as I walked, snuggling closer into my hold. As I moved through the halls, people stared at us but said nothing. They had all been making up with the grown-ever-more-beautiful, and I was thankful that no one was being particularly bothersome.

I exited the palace, feeling the sunshine warm my skin. There was a cold breeze, and I held Serena tighter as she shivered slightly.

"We're outside!" She asked.

"Yes."

I walked a few paces into the forest until I spotted what I was looking for. Gently, I set her down.

"Ready?" I asked.

"No."

I untied the blindfold and watched, mesmerized as she adjusted to the sunlight. She had not been outdoors since she'd been sent—and I could tell that she missed it. She gasped when she saw what I had prepared.

There was a small shovel, a small box, and a few pots of yellow flowers all under a very large oak tree in the middle of the beautiful forest. I had already dug a hole up, and all that was le to do was some everything up.

"What's all this?" she asked, crouching down to touch the flowers curiously.

"The healers cremated the bloodied dress and sheets—all that was le of little Hector. It's all inside this box. I was thinking we could bury it and say goodbye to him. Then we can plant the flowers to mark the grave." I said.

Her head snapped to look at me, and I saw her eyes immediately post with tears. She scrubbed me my embrace, leaving the box on the ground, gently stroked her back, murmuring comforting words.

"Jon…this is so sweet…you thought of all this yourself?" She sni led.

"Yes." I proudly said. She continued to sob.

I am, I think…" She looked at me, and immediately I felt my heart warm. "I don't deserve you."

"You deserve better than me, my love." I murmured, planting a kiss on her head. I knew a newborn hurt from my pocket and gave it to her. She wiped the tears from her face and blew her nose.

"I know. Jon, let's not say farewell." I said, kissing her head.

Serena picked a few white flowers from a bush nearby and placed them inside the box. Then, together, we placed the box in the hole. I was about to secure the potted yellow flowers above it when Serena stopped me.

"I think we should say something…" She said.

"Alright." I said, helping her stand up. "Ladies first."

She smiled and looked around, and I realized that was the first real smile I've seen from her in days. Sighing, she put her hands on her hips and raised her palm to the sky, calling out to the Moon Goddess. I put my arms around her waist and pulled her back against my chest.

I gave her a kiss on the cheek, nudging her to start.

"My baby…" She whispered. "I don't know what to say. Umm…hello. I'm your mother, and I love you. I'm sorry I'm not there with you right now to see you. I hope I'm…I hope I'm not. I know you're a part of me, and Jon…I Jon dad and I made you together. I keep imagining all these things about you…if you'd have my eyes or your dad's nose…if you'd like the color purple or…whatever…But…I can't know doing it. I have to stop…because…I can't keep you. I have to say goodbye because your dad and I have a lot of things we need to do."

Her voice broke, and I felt tears escape my eyes. I held her closer as I tried to compose myself. Some of the tears dripped on my arm, and I wrapped tight around her waist.

"You're going to have brothers and sisters someday and we're going to make sure they live in a better world because Hector, this world that you were born away from…it's not a good world…it doesn't deserve the joy we would have surely brought. Loving you hurts so much but…I can't be haunted by pain forever."

Serena inhaled deeply, and hastily tried to wipe her tears away.

"I love you so much, Hector." She finished. "I'll see you soon." She whispered.

Serena glued, breaking down into sobs again. She clutched herself from my hold and sprinkled a few white petals on top of the box. She looked up at me and sighed, nodding heavily. I helped her up and gave her sweet cheeks a kiss. She looked at me expectantly and I cleared my throat.

"Hector." I said, testing the name out. I chuckled before wiping some tears o my cheeks. I didn't realize I had been crying as well. "What a strong name, named us the tamer of horses himself…"

Serena looked at me encouragingly and I held her closer.

"I always thought that the only thing that mattered in this world was winning a fire war and being a good ruler. Now…I know there are so many important things to worry about. Like your mother, for instance…" I looked at Serena, and she in turn looked at me curiously.

"Your mother is the most important thing in this world to me, little guy. That's why I want to…I have to try and be a good boy to you. That's hurting. You have no idea how happy you would have made us…but dwelling on that will only make things harder. I don't want that for your mother, pup…she deserves much more. I want to help your her back and hope that you'll help me." I let out a jagged breath and looked intently into the pool of yellow flowers.

"Goodbye, little Hector. Please say hello to your grandmother for us…" I said, touching my lips and raising my palm to the sky. Serena let out another soft, cooing into my embrace.

"I come…" I said, taking Serena's hand. We knelt down and shouted the potted yellow flowers on top of the box. I took the shovel and placed the soil on top of everything so that only the yellow flowers showed.

"These flowers remind me of you," I whispered. "Yellow. Light. You're my light, Serena."

She said nothing, only patting the soil atop. I reached for the watering can beside the tree and sprinkled some droplets over the flowers. Just then, a white rabbit hopped out of nowhere and nudged some of the yellow flowers gently. Serena gasped, and looked up at the tree.

"What is it?"

"Jon…this is the tree…how did you know?" She demanded, her eyes widened.

"What tree? I just picked one at random." I shrugged.

"If an we had our light I entered me and climbed this tree…I sat underneath it and cried." She pointed at a thick branch a few feet above us. "I have the scratches. That one branch is sticking out like a person's arm…" She murmured.

"Seems like we have the same tastes." I chuckled.

"It rows!" She looked at me, scrunching her nose and laughing. I laughed. Silence followed. All we could hear were birds chirping, and I could feel the cool breeze blowing against my skin.

"Thank you for doing this, Jon. You have no idea how much it helped. Already I feel…lighter…" She said. I looked at her, basked in the glow of sunlight. She definitely looked like a heavy weight had been li ed o her.

Yes, it would take time before the baby recovered, but already I could see the sparkle return to her eyes—a small one, easily underestimate, but there nonetheless. I just knew she would survive this—that we would survive this. I don't care how long it took.

Slowly—agonizingly slowly, but surely.

"Come, we have to go back to the palace. You have to take your medicine, and I have another surprise." I said.

"Another?" She asked, looking up as we left the pyre soon as I nodded and led her inside the palace, walking hand in hand. We entered the infirmary and went inside the private room for her. A healer entered and gave us a bottle of green liquid.

"I'm drinking this, you need to just be back for the next few hours. Don't worry, this is the last one." The healer instructed. She nodded. She was the first time they had asked her to take this particular medicine. I made sure never to leave her side during the hours that she was confined to bed.

The healer exited, and I helped Serena to be down on the bed. I put the bottle to her lips and she drank it, angling from the look on her face. It didn't taste good.

"I see a lady bedridden. Does this surprise of yours involve turning on the TV?" Serena asked. I chuckled, giving her a fond kiss on the forehead. There's that witty charleston I had been missing—I looked at my phone and smiled—the surprise was all ready.

"I'll be right back to get it, okay?" I said. She nodded.

I exited the room, making sure to close the door securely. I walked to the lobby of the infirmary, and I was instantly greeted by one of my favors.

"Alpha." Aurelia. I'm glad you could make it." I said, taking the alpha's hand and giving it a firm handshake. I looked at Serena's father, and for the first time, I noticed that they shared the same eyes. Only, they looked guarded, as opposed to my mate's vulnerability.

"Thank you for inviting us, Prince Jonathon." Alpha Damien said.

"Dear Jasper, it's good to see you again." I said, shaking the Beta's hand. "You are sure your Sammie we'll be okay being in Sabine?"

"He'll manage." Beta Jasper said.

I then greeted Serena's brother Evan, who looked like he hadn't slept for two days judging by the bags under his eyes. Then Beta Jasper introduced me to his wife, and they also brought along Erica.

Suddenly, I felt a hand on my shoulder spin me around. I turned to be face to face with a girl with black, pixie-cut hair. I remembered from Serena's stories that her name was Melanie.

"Nice to she-it." Melanie demanded. Someone then pulled her back and I recognized her to silver bracelet that he new Christopher.

"Mel, you can't talk to the prince like that." Christopher hissed.

"CHE HELL CAN'T TALK TO BEST FRENDS HERE…" Melanie yelled but was cut off by Christopher's hand clamping down on her mouth and her own mouth—she bit it.

"Well, she promised you'd behave!" Jane scolded. "I don't care if you keep licking my hand."

Melanie continued to speak with a no-fail voice.

"Apologies, Prince Jonathon. We're just…really worried…" Another male said. He, barely, towards one named Pedro.

"I'm glad you could all come." I said, addressing them all. "Serena's inside on bed rest. She'll be happy to see you all."

Melanie lunged forward, but her friends held her back. Jane's hand was still over her mouth. Alpha Damien shot them a warning look and they all looked down apologetically.

"Can I go see her first?" Evan said.

"Try not to overwhelm her." I murmured, opening the door for him. He only gave me a brief, curious look. I was aware of how my enemies thought I was Serena. I never realized how identical they looked.

I was a mom about letting Evan see Serena first, seeing as they're closest in age and he's probably dealing the most with it. I also, but refused to argue with the only sibling my mate had in it. I reluctantly stepped aside to let Evan enter.

A good war general knows when to call in the reinforcements, so I will.

N/A

How are you guys liking the story so far? Were more chapters (plus an epilogue) soon! Let me say goodbye to this story (sequel, anyone? LOL). Don't worry, there were surprises to come!

I am beyond exhausted this week. I have a workshop on Thursday (yes, I'm the one who is signing up on Friday in another country. It's gonna be a whole thing to be enjoyed, but do comment! It gives me so much joy.

Leave comments and votes!

Continue to next part