

Rebirth Of The God Of War Chapter 13 by Chilton Bunton

Chapter 13 Super Evolution

Ten years later, a superhuman whose brain had evolved many times put forward a hypothesis after years of studying the mutant energy. He said that if humans had known and used the mutant energy earlier, they might have had a better chance of surviving at the beginning of the apocalypse. And the future of mankind might not be so tragic.

He pointed out that when the mutant energy appeared at the beginning of the apocalypse, one's body might evolve in a short time as long as they were dying, remained conscious and got a chance to replenish a considerable amount of life energy. Their body, physical strength, speed, and intelligence could be greatly improved. This was what he called super evolution.

The super evolution was different from what they called the general evolution.

In general evolution, the mutant energy entered people's bodies along with the air when they breathed, accumulating and subtly strengthening their bodies over time. In super evolution, people's bodies absorbed a large amount of mutant energy in a very short time, then acquired a comprehensive and substantial improvement.

Super evolution had three elements.

First was the dying state, the second was the sober consciousness, and the third was the access to a large amount of life energy.

The dying state referred to the objective environment. The sober consciousness was the subjective force, and the life energy was the large amount of biological energy required for a human body to evolve.

There was only one precondition for super evolution. It had to be the person's first time to be exposed to the mutant energy.

When this precondition was discovered by this superhuman, he gave up all the research about mutant energy because he realized that the result was destined to be useless and would not change the future of mankind. It was because all human beings had already been exposed to mutant energy for nearly ten years at that time and lost the chance of super evolution.

But actually, if he continued his research, he would find that the significance of super evolution to human beings was far more than what he had discovered.

Still, this superhuman published the result of his research. So many people in the apocalypse had known this information, including Calvin. But that time, it was too late. There was no way to change anything anymore.

However, after being reborn, Calvin remembered this information almost immediately. After weighing the pros and cons, he decided to test this theory by himself.

During the apocalypse, Calvin was just an average superhuman, and he wasn't blessed with aptitudes and opportunities. Even if he lived for twenty years, he was only a level-two superhuman. Such progress could only be regarded as common among human survivors, only a little better than those level-one superhumans.

Therefore, if Calvin wanted to change his fate after being reborn, he had to take some extraordinary measures. Otherwise, even if he had this precious experience of being reborn, he would not be able to go too far. And the super evolution was an important opportunity for him to change himself and his future.

After blocking the entrance and most of the windows of the fort with stones, leaving only one window for ventilation and observation, Calvin took out the four boxes of medicine from his backpack. This was the epinephrine he had gotten from the hospital.

He put the contents of the entire four boxes into a needleless syringe and added some st imulants into it. While doing this, his eyes grew determined and cold. He took a deep breath and pressed the injector into his heart.

There was a fizzing sound.

The high-speed compressed air turned the amber liquid into a thin stream that pierced through his skin and entered his body. Calvin only felt a hot stream flow inside him, then he got dizzy. He felt endless power filling every part of his body and coursing through his blood vessels.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

His heart began to beat faster and faster like a dense drumbeat. He could literally hear the sound of his heart thumping in his chest. His blood thrummed through his vessels.

The excessive amount of epinephrine and various stimulants Calvin injected into his body was like a rocket engine installed on an old-fashioned bicycle. After the engine was ignited, the bike was propelled into the air and instantly fell apart.

"Ahhh!"

The indescribable pain made Calvin scream and want to faint. But he knew that he couldn't. Because if he did, he would never wake up again.

Calvin closed his eyes and gritted his teeth. He then bit his tongue and used the taste of his blood to keep himself awake. He must feel the mutant energy in the shortest possible time and absorb it.

Fortunately, he was familiar with the mutant energy. Soon enough, he felt an indescribable aura.

However, it felt different from the mutant energy he remembered he had experienced before. The next moment, he only felt a bang in his head, and he blacked out. But soon, he recovered his consciousness.

He felt like his consciousness came to a new world, which seemed to be a vast starry sky with countless light points and nebulae.

Calvin didn't know what these light points were, but there was this longing in his heart to approach them.

So he started to get closer to these light points.

More than eight hours later.

The sun had already set, and the sky began to darken. But in the red mist, it only dimmed a little. Everything could still be seen.

The Golden Mountain had become a purgatory on earth. But this time, there were fewer screams and cries than before. Occasionally, a strange cry sounded from the depths of the red mist.

Crack!

A caveman picked up a round object with his skinny hand and put it into his mouth. It turned out it was a sticky eyeball. He bit it and felt the refreshing juice fill his mouth.

Then he raised his head and couldn't help but howl in a language that only their species could understand. "Yummy!"

After eating up the eyeball, the caveman greedily licked his fingers and sucked the blood on them.

While licking his fingers, he looked at the house in the distance with greedy eyes, thinking that there must be a lot more delicious food in there. He was about to walk over when his body suddenly trembled.

The wrinkled skin on the caveman's stomach suddenly twisted, and a thin black thread came out from under his skin.

When he saw this black line, he roared with excitement and surprise. He quickly burrowed deep into the ground, and soon his whole body disappeared.

Whoever saw the whole situation in the Golden Mountain would be surprised to find that the countless cavemen had disappeared, leaving only fresh human skeletons scattered everywhere. There were countless bones of human arms, legs, skulls, and ribs.

“The monsters are gone!”

“Shh! Keep your voice down. Damn it! Do you want to attract those monsters again?”

“We will die! We will all die!”