

Chapter 127 The Truth

"What do you mean?" Rhonda couldn't make sense of Eliam's statement.

"Do you recall when I told you about the leak of Sloan Corporation's technical information?"

Rhonda hesitated for a moment before grasping something.

"Yes, I remember you even suspected me back then. Was their initial target me?"

Rhonda immediately thought of Ella. Initially, Eden Accounting had sent Ella to Sloan Corporation, but after being rejected, they had no choice but to have Rhonda replace her. Perhaps Ella held a grudge and intended to frame Rhonda?

"You're sharp. I recall asking you back then if you had upset anyone," Eliam remarked.

"But what about Dolores?" Rhonda wondered how Dolores got involved if she was the target.

"You and Dolores were close, weren't you?" Eliam suddenly enlightened Rhonda.

"They must have had something on Dolores and coerced her into setting you up. That day, she visited our office intending to steal the materials and then incriminate you, but she didn't anticipate being caught by Daniel," Eliam explained.

"And the data on her computer?" Rhonda asked, although she already had an answer.

"I had someone plant it the night she took her own life. That same night, news spread that Sloan Corporation forced an Eden Accounting employee to die. Without doing that, how could I implicate Eden Accounting?"

"No wonder Dolores called me that night, apologizing. She even left a note before her death, stating that if someone forced her again, she would die in front of them." Rhonda suddenly figured it out.

Eliam went on, "The document Dolores had when she visited our office was indeed our company's core technical information, but it wasn't from my desk. Someone handed it to her and instructed her to place it in your bag."

Rhonda was shocked.

The scheme was ruthless. Had it succeeded, she might have faced not only expulsion but also imprisonment.

"Daniel walked in and saw her slipping something into your bag, so he exposed her. Later, Dolores claimed that Estelle had asked her to give it to you, indicating her guilt and reluctance to involve you. This contributed to her decision to commit suicide."

Upon hearing Eliam's words, Rhonda started to piece together that someone was attempting to corner her.

Could it be Ella? Estelle? Margret? Or were they all involved?

"Have you caught the mole in your company?" Rhonda inquired.

Eliam nodded. "He's one of our engineers. For safety, all the projects he was working on have been suspended."

"Is this a significant loss for Sloan Corporation?" Rhonda felt as though she had inadvertently harmed the company.

"Well, although it involves core information, he didn't have extensive access to it. The situation is currently under control." Eliam hesitated before adding, "You're familiar with him too."

"Who?" Rhonda was shocked.

"Santino." Eliam sighed. To him, Santino was a fool. Rhonda had expressed her desire to help him, and Eliam had agreed, but he never expected Santino to commit such a deed.

Hearing this, Rhonda's face turned pale. She hadn't anticipated that

Santino would be involved.

But it did align with Santino's nature. If he couldn't have something, he'd ruin it.

It was entirely her fault for sympathizing with him in the first place.

"Thank you for doing so much for me." Rhonda suddenly felt that Eliam was more dependable than Santino.

"Don't feel guilty about it. I haven't eaten dinner yet. Let's go have a meal together."

Eliam took Rhonda to a French restaurant.

As Eliam ordered their meals, Rhonda excused herself to the restroom.

Before she could return, however, she received a call from Eliam, who informed her that he had to handle a matter at the company and asked her to eat alone.