

Chapter 141 Give Up The Position To Others

Rhonda needed time to recover, so Margret used this as an excuse to bring her back to the company. Meanwhile, Estelle temporarily took over the collaboration project with Sloan Corporation.

Rhonda didn't protest, instead returning to the company obediently and fulfilling her duties.

Her calm attitude made those who wanted to take malicious pleasure in watching her disappointment at a loss.

This morning, after the meeting, Margret summoned Rhonda to her office.

"Your team's performance this month has been abysmal. If this continues, our entire department will suffer because of you," Margret said gravely.

"There are thirty-one days in this month. I've been working at Sloan Corporation for twenty-eight days. I can't achieve the month's performance in the remaining three days," Rhonda countered.

Margret anticipated her response. "Yes, you've indeed been working at Sloan Corporation, but your team members are still here. Look at them; none have a performance exceeding one hundred thousand this month, especially Cristina with a meager thirty thousand. How did you guide them?"

"I was only back three days ago, and I didn't arrange their work before then. I'm not aware of the details. I'm only responsible for the last three days' performance," Rhonda stated, neither submissive nor aggressive.

"Have you accomplished anything in the past three days?" Margret inquired.

At that moment, Ella entered the room.

She handed Margret a form, the performance report for her team over

"In the past three days, each team member has made deals averaging two hundred thousand dollars, totaling one million and eight hundred thousand dollars. We've had a flawless finish," Ella declared proudly.

Margret slid the form in front of Rhonda and said, "Take a good look. Their three-day deals surpass your team's the entire month. Isn't that enough for you to reflect on?"

Rhonda remained silent.

Seeing this, Margret assumed she was passively resisting and grew angrier.

"Rhonda, I know you've only been back a few days and are still recovering from your injury, but Eden Accounting doesn't employ idlers. If you maintain this attitude, I suggest you reconsider your director role," Margret advised.

"Margret is correct. A team's performance is tied to its leader. If you lack the ability, you should relinquish your position to someone more capable," Ella chimed in.

"I'm sorry. I need to take this call." Rhonda's phone began to ring.

While in the room, Ella scoffed, "See that? After working with Sloan Corporation, she's gotten too big for her boots. She acts as if she's so amazing that she can even look down on you."

Margret sighed.

"Cut the crap. You've taken all the competent people from her, leaving her with the slackers. If you keep complaining, would you prefer to swap your team with hers?"

"I don't want her team. Her members constantly take leaves, slack off during work hours, and immediately indulge in leisure after work. They never care about their jobs. I don't want those useless people." Ella felt it troublesome when she talked about that team of people.

After a while, Rhonda ended the call and returned.

"Margret, there's a contract worth five million. They'll be coming to sign it shortly," Rhonda announced cheerfully.

"A single deal worth five million? How is that possible?!" Ella exclaimed, astounded.

Margret also found it incredible.

"Which company is it?"

"Marriot Securities," Rhonda replied. "Mr. Ableson Chadwick will come here personally."

"Fantastic! When are you scheduled to meet with Mr. Chadwick? I'll receive him myself," Margret excitedly stood up.

"Mr. Chadwick said he would arrive at ten-thirty," Rhonda informed her.

"Alright, you can go prepare. We'll meet in the No. 1 VIP room later."

"OK."

Once Rhonda left, Margret glanced at Ella's performance report, suddenly feeling disinterested in it.
