

Chapter 153 Roderick

An increase of two percentage points?

Everyone present was left speechless. According to the contract, Tamara had pledged to attain a five-percent return, but in reality, she had only managed to achieve three percent.

So, Dooley disagreed and demanded a refund of the service fee from Tamara. Of course, Tamara was reluctant to comply. She blamed the unfavorable economic climate, insisting it had nothing to do with her strategy.

In truth, Tamara had anticipated this outcome when she devised the plan. However, her eagerness to boost her performance with this deal had led to the current predicament.

"Rhonda, I don't know what you told Dooley, but increasing the return by two percentage points isn't simple. If you can't deliver, Dooley will still come after us." Harlow doubted Rhonda's ability to achieve such a feat at her young age.

Rhonda smiled. "I'll surpass seven percent. We'll witness the results this month. Don't worry. If I fail, I'll voluntarily step down as regional director and make way for someone more competent."

Although nobody voiced their thoughts, they were all secretly waiting for Rhonda to fail.

Especially Harlow, who immediately informed Tamara of the events as soon as Rhonda left.

Tamara advised Harlow to remain calm and hand over the information on Dooley's company to Rhonda. She was eager to see what tricks Rhonda had up her sleeve.

Upon returning to her office, Rhonda didn't expect to find someone tailing her.

"Who are you?" Rhonda didn't recognize Roderick.

"My name's Roderick. And you're Rhonda, right?" Roderick lounged nonchalantly on the armrest of the sofa in Rhonda's office, not treating her with much reverence.

Rhonda's position fell under the consulting and training department. She supervised three groups within this department, which primarily consisted of instructors. Their responsibilities included identifying potential clients through online and offline teaching, as well as managing transactions for smaller clients.

As the regional manager, she would deal with high-level clients. Typically, members of the subordinate groups wouldn't have access to elite clientele like the Sloan Corporation. At that time, fortune favored Rhonda. Her proposal was selected by the Sloan Corporation, granting her the opportunity to join their project for a while.

As a result, Rhonda gained some popularity within Eden Accounting. Roderick had heard of her previously but hadn't expected her to be so young, roughly his own age.

"What do you want?"

"I'm here to remind you that the previous manager left because of Tamara. Currently, she holds sway over all the key clients in the northern district. If you want to establish a solid footing, you'll need to sway her clients to your side," Roderick advised.

"Why share this with me?" Rhonda looked at Roderick suspiciously, sensing that he wasn't as carefree as he appeared.

"Because I detest Tamara. I want to assist you in outperforming her," Roderick stated candidly.

Rhonda recalled hearing that a man in the northern district spent his days loafing around, yet managed to secure the highest monthly bonus due to his questionable relationship with Tamara.

She couldn't be certain if Roderick was that man.

However, it stood to reason that if Roderick was indeed that individual, he wouldn't be targeting Tamara.

Noticing Rhonda's silence, Roderick abruptly stood up and leaned in close to her. With a faint grin, he asked, "Don't trust me? How about I swing by your place tonight, and we can discuss further?"

It had to be acknowledged that Roderick's eyes were indeed captivating. Had Rhonda not been acquainted with an exceptionally handsome man like Eliam, she might have been enticed by Roderick.

Nonetheless, she had little regard for men who depended on women.