

Snatched 487

Chapter 487 Hijacking the Results

"How was I unwilling?" Cora felt wronged.

She didn't do anything to annoy him today, so why was she unwilling to be alone?

But the latter only sneered, "After sending one away, and can't wait to climb into the other's bed."

Cora asked, "Sending who away?"

"Ask while knowing the answer!" The man's hand suddenly exerted force, almost breaking Cora's waist.

"Byron, you must have a limit when you go crazy!" Cora felt like dying and was immediately angered.

But her argument made the man feel ridiculous. "Crazy? Didn't you volunteer to the doorsteps?"

Between those lines, Cora felt she was not respected and felt like a call-girl.

She wanted to struggle and resist, but the man's kisses rained down overwhelmingly at this moment.

Ultimately, there were all kinds of absurd memories of them on this sofa...

In the following week, Byron remained lukewarm towards Cora.

Cora was sometimes annoyed and didn't look for him the whole night.

But he didn't take the initiative to contact her as if she didn't exist.

Frustrated, Cora had no choice but to look for him again by herself.

Because she was afraid that if she didn't take the initiative to cling on, there would be no possibility for her and Byron, and her little Martin would really be fatherless.

The days were repeated in such resistance and self-dissolution.

The only thing that made Cora happy was that when she went to the First Hospital again that day, the head nurse Sadie told her, "Madam Hansen's medical exam report came back today, showing that her lesion had miraculously reversed, reducing by 50%."

"Well, this data is consistent with other cancer patients I had treated before." Cora was happy but not surprised.

But Sadie still showed outrage. "But Madam Hansen has been publicizing that she got better after taking the medicine Dr. Yoris gave."

Just before Cora came to look for her, the news spread that Nora's condition had reversed.

Now, many media were scrambling to report on this content. It was said that this news would shock the entire medical community.

What was unbelievable the most to Sadie was that Nora said that it was because of the medicine given by Jane!

"Why don't we tell Madam Hansen the truth that we did something with the medicine."

Sadie didn't want all the honor originally belonging to Cora to go to Jane. That would be very unfair to Cora.

But what she didn't expect was Cora said, "No, wait for Dr. Yoris to deny it herself."

Cora thought that Jane would never falsely claim medical achievements.

Surprisingly, on the same day afternoon, the news "The first person who cured cancer-Jane" was published.

The critical point was that in the report, Jane tampered with the curative effect data of her oral liquid and published it so that people would think that it was her oral liquid that made Nora recover.

This report was a sensation at home and abroad.

According to reports, many cancer experts and scholars at home and abroad had crowded in front of the door of the Yoris family, wanting to have academic discussions with Jane.

The journalist who wanted to interview Jane almost broke down the door of the Cross family.

The Traditional Medicine Hospital where Jane was employed was also overcrowded.

When Cora saw these reports, she suddenly had a headache.

In fact, she didn't want to be famous. Otherwise, she wouldn't have stayed silently in that humble clinic in Leucrest Town after she developed an anti-cancer drug.

As it turned out, Jane hijacked the result before Cora could publish it.

But what Cora worried the most was about the consequences of Jane's fraudulent claim...