Chapter 509 His Ex-Wife

Seeing that Byron didn't respond, Carter shifted his attention to Johnson.

"Dr. Watts, are you ready? The speech is about to begin."

Johnson nodded and asked Carter, "Has he been like this recently?"

Carter replied, "Not recently. It started yesterday after work."

Carter was called back to work overtime yesterday.

And at that time, he noticed that Byron seemed to be in the same excited state as during his rehabilitation, not eating or sleeping, just smoking.

"It must be triggered by something."

Johnson pondered the cause of Byron's abnormal behavior, trying to analyze it.

Meanwhile, Carter received a sharp glare from Byron, who seemed to blame him for talking too much.

After seeing that, Carter shrugged and said, "Dr. Watts, this way, please. Let's finish the speech before we talk."

Johnson checked the time and realized that it was almost time for the speech to begin. He agreed with Carter's suggestion, and they both headed downstairs to commence the presentation.

Johnson had a great reputation in the field of psychology, but he kept a low profile and rarely appeared in public or gave speeches.

Because of that, many experts and scholars came to attend his rare lecture.

The journalists also came with their cameras.

When the speech ended, countless experts and scholars approached him to ask questions.

At that moment, the security personnel from the Hansen Group surrounded Johnson, intending to escort him away to prevent any accidents.

However, Cora had finally seen Johnson and couldn't let go of the opportunity for Martin to speak.

Cora mustered all her strength and rushed into the crowd of experts and scholars, calling out, "Dr.

Watts, my child is three years old now, but he still can't speak. Can you help me?"

But with so many people present, everyone was like Cora, eager to say their own wishes.

As a result, Cora's voice was drowned out in the crowd.

Johnson didn't hear her, and he walked briskly towards the exit under the escort of security guards.

However, people never underestimated a mother's determination to save her child.

Seeing Johnson getting farther away from the security guards, Cora summoned all her strength and sprinted forward...

She had been searching for Johnson for so long, and her son Martin finally got a chance to speak. How could Cora let go of this opportunity right in front of her?

With all her strength, Cora broke through the encirclement.

However, as a result, Cora fell to the ground in a disheveled state.

Everyone present was taken aback by this sudden event and turned their attention toward Cora.

Even Johnson turned and looked at Cora.

Cora didn't have time to care about the different expressions of those people. She pleaded, "Dr. Watts, please help me!"

However, when Johnson saw her face, he froze for a moment and then hesitantly asked, "Are you...

Cora?"

"Yes, I'm Cora. Do you know me?"

Cora looked at Johnson in astonishment.

Johnson swiftly concealed his surprise, speaking earnestly despite the nonsensical content.

"Well, Dr. Lane. Your contributions to medicine have been significant. I have specifically watched many interviews of you."

In fact, watching interviews was all a lie.

One was a surgeon in the cardiac surgery department, and the other specialized in psychology. They were completely different fields.

It was when Johnson was treating Byron, and their conversation turned to his marriage and ex-wife, that Johnson became aware of Cora.

Obviously, these were not suitable topics to bring up.

Upon seeing Byron's ex-wife, Johnson's intuition told him that Byron had invited him to the Hansen Group probably because of her.

Coupled with all the anomalies Byron had displayed today, Johnson felt even more certain of this speculation.

"My achievements are far inferior to you, Dr. Watts. In fact, I have been looking for you for a long time, Dr. Watts. I came to meet you today hoping you can help me..."
