

Chapter 330 Dad

"Alright." The twins nodded understandingly.

However, a mocking voice came from behind them. "I was right. Merrick and Lindsey are fatherless."

"Lindsey is a liar!"

"They don't have a father!"

Rage filled Melissa as she heard the mockery. She instantly turned to face the children. "I am Lindsey and Merrick's mother, and there is only so much I can endure. I know you are children, but what you just did was cruel and a form of bullying. If you don't stop at once, I will have to inform your teachers or even the principal of your school."

Her facial expression and stern tone made the children keep quiet, but their parents didn't like seeing their kids being scolded.

"Ms. Sherman, I'm sure the children were joking. Why do you want to make it a big deal?"

"Exactly. My child is not rude! If we are being honest, your kids aren't saints. There must be an explanation for why our children spoke to them in that manner."

"You are the only one here, anyway. This proves that my child wasn't lying. When did it become a crime to tell the truth?"

The parents of the children all ganged up on Melissa who had now become their common enemy. They claimed that their children didn't say anything wrong. They felt offended.

Melissa was furious. She balled her fingers into fists beside her, trying to keep her rage under control. "If you want to put it that way, that's fine. What would you have done if your child was being bullied today? Is this how you would like to be spoken to? I am doing what every mother would do. For this situation, I will report to the head of the school. After all, there are cameras in the classroom."

The parents' expressions darkened when Melissa threatened to report to the school. They exchanged glances and got up in tacit understanding, approaching Melissa.

"If you were being logical, you would know you need to take responsibility for your children's actions instead of blaming our children. What is your deal? Were our children lying?"

Seeing several people coming together made Melissa step back to keep her children safe. She was at a disadvantage now. Even though she wanted them to take responsibility for their children's actions, protecting her children was a top priority.

Suddenly, a voice came from the door. It was deep and authoritative. "Yes, what your children said is a lie."

Everett stepped forward from where he was standing at the door and wrapped his arm around Melissa's waist. He narrowed his eyes at the parents with a frigid expression. "Hello, I am Lindsey and Merrick's father. It seems the fact that I am usually too busy to come to pick them up from school has led to such stupid remarks about my kids."

"Oh..."

The parents exchanged glances again, not sure how to proceed now. They had been trying to say their children were not wrong since Lindsey and Merrick's father never showed up. They, too, believed the twins had no father and were shocked to find that they were wrong. Now they were stumped.

Everett was very unforgiving. "Since you all believe you have done nothing wrong, I believe we have to let the school decide now. You can either apologize to my children and promise never to disrespect them again, or you can start looking for a new school for your children to attend."

With that, Everett led Melissa and the twins to the seats, not caring how the parents reacted to his words.

Melissa tried to wriggle out of his arm subtly, but Everett was holding her too tight. She gave up and murmured, "What are you doing here?"
