

Chapter 38 The Surgery

The next morning, Melissa went early to work. After all, she had to communicate well with her colleagues if she wanted to choose a certain patient. This way, the doctors of the Department of Surgery II wouldn't make trouble for her.

The department director immediately agreed when he heard that Melly wanted to perform the surgery for a certain patient. Melly's reputation and status brought a lot of benefits to the Department of Surgery I, but as a doctor, Melly had always been scrupulous. Now that Melly resorted to his help, he could gain benefits in the future if he helped her now.

Melissa was relieved because the department director had agreed. She was a grateful person who always repaid favors. Since the people who sent her the recorder pen helped her, she had no reason to stand by.

But the most crucial work to do right now was to perform Arielle's surgery which was scheduled for the day after tomorrow.

She had checked the operation theater. It was furnished with first-class equipment, and most of them were imported from abroad.

"Wow! It looks like they've put in a lot of effort. These machines and equipment were recently purchased. Am I right?"

Melissa didn't show any respect to the hospital director and felt a bit uncomfortable during the inspection. She believed the lives of all the patients were equally important. The hospital had gone to great lengths to purchase advanced equipment for Arielle's operation. In Melissa's eyes, they were making a mountain out of a molehill.

"Yes, people from different departments were invited to attend the meeting," her assistant whispered.

After checking the equipment, Melissa left with her team. If the hospital director hadn't called her to take a look at it, she wouldn't even have set foot into that operation theater.

The weather was bad on Thursday. It was raining cats and dogs, and the temperature had dropped.

Arielle's operation was scheduled in the morning. According to Melissa's plan, the operation would last for three hours.

According to hospital regulations, she had to conduct an examination with the others before the surgery.

As soon as Melissa entered the ward, she saw the people of the Sherman family. Emily and Arielle were crying as if they were never going to see each other again.

She couldn't fathom their sadness, for it was a simple surgery. They were behaving as if Arielle wouldn't survive the operation.

They were making a big deal out of nothing.

Everett was sitting on the sofa nearby, looking calm and relaxed. He soon spotted Melissa and waved his hand to greet her.

But Melissa rolled her eyes at him. She felt uncomfortable seeing Everett again.

Melissa simply greeted everyone and assured them that Arielle could relax. Anyway, Arielle wouldn't listen to her. Melissa just said it as a part of the formality.

Even though Arielle was unhappy, she had no choice but to get the surgery done.

Arielle was on good behavior these two days. She didn't quarrel with Melissa or make a fuss. When she heard Melissa's words, she didn't retort or argue. She behaved as if she had changed into a whole new person.

"Change your clothes and go to the operating room," the department director said to Melissa.

After all, it was about time.

The surgery finally began. Her assistant helped her put on the surgical gown.

Melissa looked firm and confident. Seeing the unconscious Arielle lying on the operating table, she let out a sigh. After all, they had never met each other in such a situation before.

Several experts in the medical field were watching through the glass opening. Some were also shooting videos in the operation theater. Almost all the doctors of Andeport were watching the live broadcast of this operation with rapt attention.

Melissa picked up the scalpel, took a deep breath, and made a careful slit. Then, she clamped the blood vessel with the hemostat. Melissa performed the surgery with utmost attention and care. She found the problematic spot and carefully cut it.

Before the surgery, they had already discussed that when the lesion was removed, it would cause a hemorrhage.
