The assistant got it and nodded. "Yes, the reporters are still here, but the hospital director is likely still being interviewed. There's a good chance he has no idea what happened at the doorway."

Melissa was more at ease now. If the hospital director didn't know, she could deliver the statement personally for maximum impact.

"Grab the infusion bottle, and we'll go out."

Melissa likewise requested that her assistant get a wheelchair. She passed by several doctors, nurses, and patients on her way out. They were intrigued by Melissa's situation and asked many questions.

The assistant provided several explanations, and word quickly spread around the hospital.

Many of the reporters in the interview room had already gotten wind of what happened to Melissa before she arrived.

"Dr. Sherman is here."

"Let's interview her."

Melissa entered the room and was soon surrounded by reporters. They snapped many photos and never stopped questioning.

The hospital director was shocked to see Melissa in a wheelchair and wondered why she was hooked up to an IV.

But he had to keep everything under control, so he immediately requested that someone bring Melissa over.

"Dr. Sherman, I have learned that some members of the Sherman family caused you problems. You were assaulted and scolded as soon as you stepped out of the operation room, causing you to faint and sustain injuries. Is that correct?"

The reporter's queries were incisive since they were aiming to elicit gossip.

The hospital director and several doctors were in utter disbelief. The procedure went off without a hitch. How could the patient's family members do such a thing?

Melissa smiled sadly, her face pallid.

"Our surgical team has given our best throughout the complicated procedure, and everyone is understandably exhausted. Someone stopped me as soon as I stepped outside the operating room. I passed out before I could say anything. Of course, I empathize with the patient's family members. They are still in the ward as we speak. After all, the patient's case is one-of-a-kind."

Melissa's statements came off as openhanded, but after careful consideration, people realized that they conveyed much information.

Reporters were hunched over their laptops, typing away. It was massive news, and everyone wanted the inside scoop.

The next questions were all concerning the surgery. After giving a short response, Melissa eventually excused herself by saying she wasn't feeling well.

She felt relieved as her assistant wheeled her out the door. Melissa looked forward to hearing the Sherman family

In Arielle's hospital ward

Although the hospital director and doctors assured them the operation was a success and there would be no complications, Emily and other Sherman family members waited nervously. Emily still felt apprehensive. She was curious to know if Melly would do something in secret.

"She's awake," someone cried loudly, and everyone quickly gathered around the bed.

"Keep your distance. The patient has just awakened from surgery."

The head nurse kept an eye on Arielle's health and reminded others to stay back, but Emily rolled her eyes at her.

"Okay, I get it. You should wait outside first."

Some members of the Sherman family left after Emily said that.

"How are you feeling, Arielle?"

Emily spoke with compassion, and her eyes glowed with affection.

There was still some paleness on Arielle's face, but her eyes were bright and clear. Overall, she seemed to be doing much better.

She blinked and went to raise her hand, but the nurse stopped her.

"It's a good thing you've woken up. Get some rest first. We'll talk some more later."

Emily felt awful about her daughter's condition, so she had to say something quickly. She wouldn't allow anybody else to go until she saw her awake.

When the Sherman family members exited the hospital, several reporters photographed and interviewed them.

"What do you have to say about hitting the surgeon and causing her to faint?"

The Shermans exchanged glances. For a moment, they stood at the doorway in disbelief.
