

Chapter 490 Where's Dr. Sherman

After hearing the conversation, Keira couldn't help but smile.

Based on the timeline, it seemed that her father had asked someone to cause the accident.

Leilany had offended Keira before, and now, Keira thought she deserved to be killed.

"Doctor, doctor, please save my daughter!"

A middle-aged woman burst into the office, her hair a mess and her face pale, begging the doctor to save her daughter's life.

"What happened?"

The doctors rushed over to help, with Keira following closely behind.

As soon as the doctors saw the patient, they frowned in concern.

"It's difficult for my daughter to breathe now. Dr. Sherman was responsible for saving my daughter, but other doctors treated her recently, and now she's gotten worse. What should we do now?" The distressed mother pleaded with the doctors.

"Was Dr. Sherman the one responsible for treating your daughter before?" one of the doctors asked.

"Yes, it was Dr. Sherman. She's a good doctor," the mother replied.

"Well..."

The doctors present all lowered their heads, unwilling to say anything.

Seeing this, Keira walked up to the group and spoke sharply. "What's wrong with you guys? Who is this girl's attending doctor? Why aren't you treating her right away?"

"Dr. Cooper, we want to help the girl, but we're really at a loss," one of the doctors answered.

"What? What do you mean?"

Keira was growing increasingly frustrated.

"Aren't you all doctors? Why can't you treat her?"

"We don't know how Dr. Sherman treated her. Our methods don't seem to work, so..." Another doctor trailed off.

"You! Can't you guys treat the patient when Dr. Sherman isn't here?"

Keira pushed the doctors aside and approached the girl's bed. She checked the girl's heart with a stethoscope, and it was beating erratically.

As Keira asked questions, the girl suddenly began to twitch. After that, her mouth suddenly started foaming.

Keira was frightened as she had never treated a patient with such symptoms before.

Thankfully, the other doctors regained their composure and rushed the girl to the resuscitation room.

However, the girl's situation was far more complicated than anyone had anticipated. Several doctors gathered to discuss possible treatment options, but they could not come up with a solution in a short time due to their differing opinions.

As a result, they were forced to stand by helplessly as the girl's condition worsened.

The girl's mother cried and yelled, "What are you doing? Are you really doctors? Where is Dr. Sherman? Where did she go? If she were here, my daughter would get better."

Peter was taken aback by the woman's request and became angry when he heard Melly's name.

He walked over and said, "We want to help you, but you must understand the severity of your daughter's condition. Dr. Sherman is not here, and even if she were, there is no guarantee that she could do anything. We have some of the best doctors in the hospital, and you can trust us."

The mother replied, "But Dr. Sherman cured my daughter when she had the same condition before."

Peter's face darkened when he heard this. He had trouble believing that Melly was that skilled of a doctor.

After all, all of the doctors in the resuscitation room were elites in the hospital. Could Melly really compare to them?
