

Chapter 1455 The City Lord's Order

As Liam entered the cultivation chamber to begin his seclusion and deepen his understanding of law power, far away in the Celestial Palace, both the City Lord and Caden wore satisfied smiles.

They believed they had not misjudged Liam.

Despite Liam's official ranking as a ninth-tier Primogem Expert, his capabilities were on par with those at the Primogem King level.

Liam's duel against Joseph had clearly showcased Liam's formidable strength.

But soon, Caden noticed that the City Lord was lost in thought.

Sensing the City Lord was contemplating something important, Caden paused briefly before asking, "What's on your mind?"

The City Lord looked at Caden and, after a moment's pause, shared his thoughts. "Liam is close to earning enough points to unlock level four clearance now. And he will become a Primogem King soon. But his achievements, impressive as they are, have been confined to the mission system. The Human Clan needs more than just talents; we need warriors capable of handling solo combat."

The Network of Human Sovereign encompassed more than just a mission system. It also included a military merit system.

These systems were crucial within the Network of Human Sovereign, with the military merit system playing a more important role.

Given the precarious situation of the Human Clan, there was a dire need for a vast number of powerful warriors to fend off invasions from alien aces. The military merit system was designed to assess and reward individuals based on their wartime performance.

Upon hearing this, Caden grew contemplative.

After a moment, he said, "I'll personally create a gateway and draw some alien races into an uninhabited dead star."

Dead stars, being lifeless planetary systems, were typically used by the Human Clan to simulate war scenarios.

To Caden's surprise, the City Lord shook his head and said, "Choose a life-bearing planetary system instead. If we're simulating real conditions, we need complete authenticity. Moreover, the Rosefinch Galaxy has been in peace for many years. It's time for our younger generation to experience real challenges."

Caden was taken aback by this but did not object.

Although he knew using a life-bearing planetary system would inevitably lead to casualties among the Human Clan, he also believed the City Lord's rationale wasn't wrong.

The Rosefinch Galaxy, serving as a crucial resource hub for the Human Clan, had been peaceful for too long. This tranquility had led to a sense of complacency among many of its younger members, as evidenced by the recent incident of Joseph.

Moreover, war inherently required sacrifices—a harsh reality that could not be avoided.

Only through experiencing significant losses would people truly learn the lessons they needed to learn.

When Caden thought of this, his expression hardened, and he nodded in agreement. "You're right. I will arrange the matter."

The City Lord, noticing Caden's understanding and resolve, nodded back, evidently pleased.

Although Caden was considered the least powerful one among the lords of the four galaxies, his astute mind and decisive actions in steering the development of the Rosefinch Galaxy had impressed the City Lord.

"That's all for now. You can go and proceed with the arrangements," the City Lord said.
