

Chapter 838 Kindergarten Admission

After Nolan escorted his son away, the head of Oracle Kindergarten, who had received the news, hurriedly arrived.

Upon spotting Liam, the principal rushed over, disregarding his own dignity, and apologized, "Mr. Hoffman, I apologize for the trouble caused!"

His eyes betrayed panic as he faced Liam. Bowen had just issued the order. However, a mess had already been caused.

Despite feeling regretful, the principal realized that dwelling on it was futile. His focus needed to be on damage control.

With this in mind, the principal turned to scold Roberto and Gabrielle, "How can our kindergarten employ individuals like you? You've tarnished Oracle Kindergarten's reputation and don't deserve to work here. Leave immediately. You're both fired!"

Roberto's expression darkened because he had recently taken a loan to buy a small villa. Losing his job meant financial instability and potential loss of savings to the bank.

Gabrielle turned pale, realizing her lavish lifestyle would end without her job at Oracle Kindergarten. It was unbearable for her.

Thus, they both pleaded desperately, "Principal, I've dedicated many years to this kindergarten and worked diligently. Please show mercy this time."

"I acknowledge my mistake, principal. You can reduce my salary, but I can't afford to lose my job. Please forgive me!"

However, the principal remained emotionless and resolute, knowing leniency would only lead to his own suffering.

Coldly, he ordered the security guards, "Why are they still here? Escort them out!"

The guards didn't dare disobey. They promptly escorted Roberto and Gabrielle out, leaving them on the roadside.

After resolving the issue, the principal assured Liam, "Mr. Hoffman, I apologize for wasting your time. I'll deal with your son's admission personally."

Satisfied with the outcome and the principal's respectful attitude, Liam didn't press further. He just said, "A kindergarten involves children's education. Vigilance across all aspects is crucial. This should not happen again."

The principal nodded earnestly. "Understood, Mr. Hoffman. I'll be more vigilant."

Liam then said quietly, "I entrust my son to you. Monitor him closely and inform me of any issues promptly. I want him to grow up normally without being bullied or receiving special treatment. Understood?"

The principal affirmed, "I understand."

Subsequently, the principal guided Liam through the admission procedures, a task completed in only three minutes.

Asher could attend school tomorrow.

After that, realizing the afternoon's empty schedule, Liam proposed to Asher, "Let's grab a bite and then head to the zoo to play, alright?"

"Okay." Asher's eyes sparkled in agreement.

Liam ruffled his son's hair, lifting him onto his shoulder, and strolled out of Oracle Kindergarten. The principal stood there watching them leave respectfully.

In Oak Restaurant near the kindergarten, Julie had dressed up for the meeting, understanding the importance of the occasion. She wore a black flannel dress, exuding maturity and charm.

Typically, Julie wouldn't bother dressing up unless she had meetings with significant clients. However, considering Oracle Kindergarten's stature as one of the top kindergartens in Salem, she understood the need not to appear too casually dressed if she wanted to secure her son's enrollment there.

Cowan, a man in his forties, met her.

He had on a pair of glasses with gold trim. He used the chance to quickly and lustfully survey her figure. But Cowan had covered everything well, so Julie noticed nothing out of the ordinary.

During their meal, Julie consistently steered the conversation toward the topic of her son's enrollment in the kindergarten. Cowan picked up on her unease, decided to take the lead, and said, "Miss Fiber, you're a prominent figure in the media now. My wife also works in the media industry. I was hoping you could offer her some support."

He continued, "If you let my wife secure a role in the Red Murray Group project, we could assist
