

Chapter 1955 Alexandra Meets Beal

In a lavish suite at a five-star hotel in Barnes, Alexandra sat frustrated as his elaborate plan involving Brandon and Julian crumbled. In a fit of anger, he tossed his laptop aside.

He then picked up his phone to call Beal. "Hello, Mr. White. I have great confidence in you and am eager to advance our cooperation soon."

Beal had been caught up with Brandon's issues recently and hadn't planned to talk business.

Yet, Alexandra's persistence and the influential backing of his globally recognized family made an appealing case for the White family and Larson Group to consider a robust partnership amid their own crisis.

After a moment's hesitation, Beal agreed to meet with Alexandra.

As soon as they met, Alexandra got straight to the point. "I've been following the online chatter recently. While the evidence from Brandon might still be inconclusive, I have full faith in you and believe your son-in-law is beyond reproach."

Relieved, Beal responded with a nod. "Thank you for your trust."

They moved through the details of their collaboration, and the agreement began to take shape smoothly.

As they neared finalizing the contract, Alexandra paused. "While I trust the White family entirely, I must also protect my family's interests. I hope the stock price and financials of the White family will be more appealing when we sign this contract."

Beal nodded. "I understand. I'll sort out the online issues as soon as I can."

"By the way, Mr. White, would it be convenient to visit your home?" Alexandra asked with a smile.

Beal considered for a moment, realizing Alexandra's request to visit his home might be a move to cement his support for the White family in the local business scene.

Still, the request caught him off guard. Was it normal to visit a business partner's home so soon?

"Here's the situation, Mr. Stevenson. There have been some family matters recently, so I might not be able to host you properly at the moment. You're welcome to visit, but it may have to wait," Beal answered politely.

Alexandra chuckled. "I realize my request may seem forward, but it's tough for me to tackle the domestic market alone. I'm keen to finalize our partnership with the White family soon, to show my family a solid result and earn their trust. Only then can I business world."

Beal smiled, impressed by the young man's vision and maturity. "It's truly rare to see such insight and ambition in someone so young. Young people today are remarkably talented."

Alexandra sighed, the weight of his heritage apparent in his voice. "People from big families always face certain constraints. I hope you can understand that."

Beal nodded thoughtfully. He knew that despite Alexandra's privileged background, the young man was not free from familial pressures. With over a dozen cousins in his generation alone, all vying for a significant slice of the family pie, it was clear why Alexandra felt the weight of such expectations.

Recognizing Alexandra's urgency to cement the partnership was likely an effort to curry favor with the White family for future collaboration opportunities, Beal saw the mutual benefit.

At this moment, both the White family and Brandon needed the kind of reassurance Alexandra could bring to their shareholders and the broader market.

Considering the potential benefits for all parties involved, Beal smiled warmly and extended his invitation. "Very well, then. You're welcome to visit my home."
