Brandon chuckled at the sound, remarking, "Even lunatics have a fear of death, it seems."

With that, he turned his back on Alexandra and guided Janet downstairs.

Once they reached the ward downstairs, they found Beal, Johanna, and Sonia seated on the couch.

Johanna had been chatting with Sonia, holding her hand, but the moment she spotted Janet, she quickly released Sonia's hand and hurried over. Giving Janet a thorough look, Johanna asked cautiously, "How did it go? Are you alright?"

Janet smiled and whispered, "My baby and I are both fine."

Johanna sighed with relief, but her worry was still mixed with anger. She gave Janet a light tap on the shoulder and scolded, "You nearly scared me to death, you know that?"

Despite her stern tone, the tap was more of a tender touch, barely more than a caress.

Janet offered a sheepish smile, knowing how much today's events had worried her mother.

Even though she was upset, Johanna's heart ached for her daughter. Wrapping an arm around Janet's shoulders, she gently scolded, "I never expected someone so young to be so daring. You did something so dangerous and didn't even tell your father or me."

Janet quickly reassured her, "It's okay, Mom. I knew what I was doing, and Brandon was there to protect me. Please don't worry."

But Johanna's fear lingered, and she pressed on, her voice trembling, "Even if you knew what you were doing, did you think about the baby? Your belly is so big now. How could you take such risks with the baby? What if something had happened to both of you?"

Before she could finish, tears welled up and began to stream down her face.

Seeing this, Beal stood up and walked over to her. Gently, he comforted her, "They're both safe now, and that's what matters. Don't worry. Take care of yourself."

After consoling Johanna, Beal turned to Janet with a stern look. "Regardless of the situation, both of you crossed a line this time. You worried us sick. Now, hurry up and apologize to your mother!"

"Of course," Janet replied, fully aware of her mistake. She stood there quietly, accepting the scolding, knowing how much she had troubled her parents.

When their anger had mostly subsided, Janet gently embraced her mother, lightly patting her back. "I'm so sorry, Mom. I didn't mean to worry you, but if you keep crying, I might just start crying too."

To lighten the mood, Janet pretended to cry, which brought a smile to Johanna's face, and she couldn't help but laugh.

They held each other close, their emotions swinging between tears and laughter. It took a while before they managed to calm down.

Still concerned for her daughter, Johanna guided Janet to lie down on the bed. "Alright, lie down and rest. Even if you're not tired, my grandchild might be."

Janet's heart swelled with warmth. Surrounded by her parents and loved ones, everything felt perfect.

She smiled at her mother and obediently settled onto the bed.

After making sure her mother was reassured, Janet noticed Sonia nearby and asked, "Sonia, what are you doing here? Has the poison in Aunt's body been completely cured?"

Sonia bowed to Janet to express her gratitude. "Yes, my mother is fully healed now."

Janet felt a wave of relief wash over her at the good news.

Just then, something clicked in Johanna's mind. She turned to Brandon, a hint of reproach in her voice. "Hey, you! How could you not tell me that my sister found her daughter? That's huge news!"

Brandon quickly apologized, his tone respectful. "I'm sorry, that was my mistake. I've had a lot going on lately, and I didn't want to add to Janet's stress, so I kept it to myself."

Worried that her mother might put Brandon in an awkward position, Janet quickly shot her a pleading look.

Johanna, feeling a bit frustrated but noticing Janet's healthy appearance, decided to ease up. "Alright, considering how well you've looked after Janet, I'll overlook this for now."

Brandon finally relaxed, visibly relieved by Johanna's decision.
