

Chapter 547 Mistress And Servant

"I can't answer that for you, Elliana," Milton said softly.

Elliana's brows rose. "What do you mean?"

Milton let out a quiet sigh. "I mean, I don't know where Mom was from. Neither does Dad."

Elliana's mind spun. "That doesn't make sense. They were together for years. They had us. How could Dad not know where Mom came from?"

"I've wondered that too," Milton said patiently. "I asked Dad once. He told me they fell in love at first sight. Mom knew he was the heir to the Sun Group, but he knew nothing about her. Just her name. She never spoke of her family or her past, and she refused to answer when he asked."

Elliana stared at Milton, her mouth slightly open. Her parents' story... It hit her like a jolt. It was hauntingly close to the story of Cole's parents.

"Mom wouldn't talk, and Dad never pushed her. He didn't care about her background. He just loved her. That was enough for him. She was a mystery, but he still chose her without hesitation," Milton continued.

Elliana stayed quiet, her chest tightening. With each word, the resemblance grew sharper. It wasn't just alike—it was a mirror image of Cole's parents' beginning.

"What happened, then?" she whispered, though she already knew. This was where the stories split.

Her grandfather, Paul, had fiercely opposed his son marrying a woman with no known past. But her father had stood his ground, choosing her mother over the family name.

The two men had clashed endlessly over it until her father finally renounced his claim as heir, moved out of the Campbell family home, and started a life with her mother. Later on, they had their children.

But out of nowhere, Eva had meddled—joining forces with Paul to drive her mother away for good. The family had been broken ever since.

"After that, everything happened like I told you before," Milton said.

Elliana nodded slowly as the final, painful pieces slid into place. Her parents' love story had begun just like Cole's parents', but their ending had been far more tragic.

Cole's parents had been luckier. Ruben had initially fought the match too, but in the end, he gave in, accepting Cole's mother and blessing the marriage.

It was still a tragedy—Cole's mother had suffered from Psychephrenia, her happiness cut short.

Elliana sighed. Now, her own mother was missing. Cole's mother had also disappeared. Where could they be? The thought settled over her like a heavy shroud.

Sensing her sorrow, Milton took one hand off the wheel and gave hers a firm squeeze. "Hey. Don't lose hope. We'll find Mom."

Elliana gave a small, steady nod. She firmly believed they would find their mother one day.

Then, another thought hit her. Darin had said her mother ran to Ublento with Adah's mother, Sally Hinks. The name sparked in her mind, and she turned to Milton. "Do you know someone named Sally Hinks?"

Milton answered, "Yes, I do. Sally was Mom's housekeeper. She was with Mom before Dad even met Mom. When Mom left, Sally went with her." He glanced at Elliana curiously. "Why do you ask?"

Elliana was left dumbstruck. A housekeeper? She had only known Sally as the warm woman who often visited her mother with Adah. She had thought they were friends. Realizing their bond was that of mistress and servant changed everything. If that was true, then Adah's mother and her own had come from the same place.

"Sally followed my mother when she fled to Ublento. Later, after Mom married Darin, Sally married Leonel. Sally and Leonel had Adah—she's a few months younger than me. We grew up together," Elliana explained carefully.

She told Milton everything she knew about Adah and her family.

Milton listened with evident surprise. "Wow. I never thought Sally would marry and have a child. I'd like to meet her daughter someday."

Elliana's lips curved into a smile. "You will get the chance. Adah's my best friend. I'll introduce you."

As she spoke, a familiar sight came into view. "That's Rosewood Villa—where I live now. Adah's staying there with me," she said, pointing ahead.