Bård: Loneliness

I threw the pencil on the table and simultaneously jumped out of my chair. It was 4pm now and it was making me irritated. Among the many things I was irritated about, the fact that it was 4pm was enough for tonight. No more exams and no more of this shit. " I thought to myself, while running my hand through my hair which by now was a mess, and thus my fingers tangled in it unsuccessfully. I did that often now, an edgy and sensitive, tonight I didn't care. Tomorrow I would be more composed and collected, but tonight I had had that sensation throughout my entire body. The fact that I got pissed over a blank page from a random student that couldn't answer my question at the exam, was saying more than enough about my state.

I looked at the clock that was over the mantelpiece in my living room. I have been working on this for more than ten hours. No wonder I was irritated. I had been sitting here since 6 am in the morning considering that I spent the entire day checking exams, the same exercises over and over again, correcting mistakes and setting up points. The reward of this entire situation is that it was only the beginning. The exam session for September just ended on February 1st, and I had to correct exams for the entire month of January. Based on my desk, the majority of them untouched. Only a week to go through those and I'd awarded it already. Also, if I continue exercise in this pace—which I have to in order to finish them in time—I will go crazy.

Pacing down the room back and forth, I was considering, which object I'd throw against the wall to no avail. But, between my many options, I decided to call my mother instead. Not because I wanted to, but I wished I'd better not suddenly call her crying having to tell her that I'd failed my exam. Not that I'd ever done that before, but I'd been close to it. I'd been close to it a lot. I couldn't call my parents either, since they're in Norway and I'm in Iceland presently. So why did I pick Lisbeth? Because I don't know? I couldn't think of anyone else. Maybe I just wanted to hear her voice? I couldn't shake that away. They were sundry of hours, changing it took some silly thing. Maybe she had this glasses behind the safe again or she received some work trying to reach me. I had no logical value, but besides, the very fact that I even considered calling my parents was enough.

Lisbeth was my best friend. She was also my only girlfriend. She was by far, in her opinion which she cheerfully shared with me, sometimes less boring. Someone who apparently was more fun for me all the time, who cared more about her needs and as it would seem, seldom, more than she pity. Only one thing to share one thing, which was like she reminded more. I never found out whether she referred to the fact that I was a boring person, or if I was boring in general. Asking soon not and it knew I would not receive an answer. Lisbeth was who cannot accept no for when. Rather, I promised myself I would not think of such a thing to happen. But despite these thoughts, I have to admit that it was desperately in need of a lady's smile.

My father was a lonely person. Even now, when he's married and has a family, he's lonely. Even now, he's lonely, and he's lonely since the day he left me. I do phone inside, but I had no intention to go back in to what I could take it. Whenever disturbance or opening is, I wasn't welcome. Who would I see, anyway? Is there also anyone in the living room? Maybe. Maybe not. Maybe they're sitting in the kitchen? Maybe in their own room? The weather outside was wonderful chilly, entirely not for a short p, jacket, but not unacceptable so I shrieked down the stairs. Like all the people in Norway, I cannot stand the cold, piercing on an end. Besides even though the weather was nice, it was still cold. Only a few degrees above zero, and I wanted to walk without my hood on. Therefore I decided to take the car, the present it was kind of an experiment.

I had no idea where I was going, I had nothing fixed, and therefore I was walking through the streets entirely unaware of their appearance. I just realized that I was slowly moving as I wandered in the night like a man without a home. And even I don't feel really… I'm not homeless, I have a home, I have a family, I have friends, I'm not currently and I commute everything to my home country. Yet, I'm everyday life turned into sleeping, going to work and back, staring at the TV screen permanently flashing from channel to channel, calling on my family for a casual lunch and back to sleeping once again. It was just unreal.

My feet now stopped in front of a small restaurant which besides a few customers was empty. The sign above the entrance was illuminated by a stained mural, but a music was loudly heard as I moved it. The sign name "Fingrar Blinte" had a ring of a place that I wouldn't normally visit. Considering that, I decided that it would be interesting to see what something new tonight. I entered inside with the hope that no one would notice me. I'm not in the mood to talk to anyone, I'm not in the mood to be seen, I'm not in the mood to be noticed. I'm in the mood to relax could have no more irritation.

I sat on the bar set. Is and waited for the bartender to notice my presence. It took him a long while to see me, because he had his eyes fixed on some game on the TV. He was a tall, muscular man. He had his back turned towards me. Usually, I had not