

Apocalypse 395

Chapter 395 Rose's Stats

Recognizing that Rose was in a state of confusion, believing she had transformed into a zombie and subsequently killed, Kisha smiled gently at her.

She nodded in acknowledgment of Rose's thoughts before offering her own explanation.

"Yes, you didn't die. In fact, you've awakened your abilities after being bitten." Kisha placed her hand on Rose's shoulder, giving it a reassuring pat before continuing, "You did an amazing job fighting off the virus that invaded your system, turning a dire situation into an opportunity to grow stronger."

Rose's eyes widened at Kisha's words. Her lips quivered as her eyes reddened, tears threatening to spill.

She would be lying if she said she hadn't been terrified when she realized she'd been bitten, thinking it was the end for her.

But something inside her refused to accept such a pathetic fate. She gritted her teeth, determined to fight until the very end.

Even after Sparrow defeated the evolved zombie, Rose clung to consciousness, but when she could no longer hold on, she thought she'd lost.

Yet, her body and willpower had fought alongside her, refusing to give in. Now, hearing she had awakened an ability, she felt as if the whole ordeal had been a blessing in disguise.

A wave of mixed emotions overtook her, and she found herself both laughing and crying at once.

She used both hands to wipe away the tears streaming down her face, relentless like waterfalls.

Kisha and Duke stood by, giving Rose the space she needed to process everything that had happened.

They understood that she had likely been bottling up her fears and a whirlwind of emotions, shoving them deep into her heart as she grappled with the reality of her supposed untimely death.

It took Rose quite a while to settle down, and even then, she was still hiccupping.

It seemed that her tears had drained her of energy, or perhaps her body was simply exhausted from being in survival mode for so long.

As it worked to process the virus and transform it into the spiritual energy now coursing through her, her stomach let out a loud growl that echoed across the entire flower field.

Kisha stifled a laugh but quickly reminded herself that she had been in a similar state just moments before.

With a small smile, she crossed her legs and sat in front of Rose. She pulled out the food she had shared with Duke earlier from her inventory and prepared a generous portion for her.

"Here you go," Kisha said, handing Rose the large bowl along with a bottle of orange juice.

Rose smiled gratefully at Kisha, her hunger more intense than she had ever experienced. She felt as if she could devour an entire cow.

As Rose eagerly dug into the food, Kisha returned Duke's meal to him and held her own in her hands. Instead of taking a bite, she watched Rose intently.

Lost in her feast, Rose sensed Kisha's gaze but paid it little mind.

It was as if Kisha were staring at her yet somehow not, and Rose dismissed the feeling entirely, focusing solely on satisfying her ravenous appetite.

As usual, Kisha was utilizing her gift to check Rose's status window, wondering if it would finally work or if it would still display an error while concealing all her stats.

As Kisha examined Rose's status window, her eyebrow arched in surprise at the impressive details it revealed.

She found herself torn between envy and happiness; after all, Rose was now one of her own, not an enemy.

If she had been, Kisha realized, Rose would have been one of the most formidable opponents she could face, and she wasn't sure she would emerge unscathed from such a confrontation, despite her own stats having already surpassed Rose's.

It appeared that her elemental ability—Earth—had evolved into something even more formidable: diamond.

While her body was in survival mode, it had unconsciously forged a crystal coffin composed of a unique blend of ice and diamond.

This was why Sparrow couldn't even scratch the surface of the coffin when he attempted to attack it with his wind blade.

To think that Sparrow's wind blade, known for its sharpness and power, hadn't even grazed the surface of Rose's defenses only underscored her incredible defense.

Given that she also possessed an equally formidable offensive capability, it was clear that when she shifted to attack, her power could be just as devastating.

The synergy between her ability and talent made Kisha shudder at the thought of how formidable Rose could become.

This realization reminded her of the true strength of the first awakened individuals when given the opportunity to grow.

Now, Kisha felt an urgency to step up her game; if Rose could achieve such power, there were undoubtedly others lurking out there, waiting for their chance to emerge.

Especially now, as so many events had veered off course due to the butterfly effect—or perhaps everything was simply unfolding differently than in her past lives—she felt uncertain about what the future might hold.

Despite her efforts to alter the fates of many at the base, there could be others who had survived thanks to her initial warnings.

It's possible that many of them had also awakened, and she couldn't predict whether they would be allies or foes. Therefore, strengthening herself had to become her top priority.

She then glanced at Duke, who had been watching her intently.

She wasn't sure how long he had been observing her, but when he caught her gaze, he simply smiled before returning to his meal with evident enthusiasm.

Now that she had a solid grasp of Rose's stats and abilities, and with her determination to develop further firmly in place, she set aside all other thoughts and focused on her meal. Nothing felt more important than satisfying her hunger at that moment.

Once the three finished their meal, Kisha took the time to brief Rose on how to effectively harness her spiritual energy.

She guided her through the process of channeling that energy within her body, covering all the essential information Rose would need.

After their discussion, Kisha handed Rose a bottle of scarlet honey. Although Rose already had one from before, Kisha knew she would need additional supplies now that she had awakened her abilities.

Once Kisha finished teaching Rose, she encouraged her to practice on her own and assured her that Marcus would assist her in leaving the territory when she felt ready.

With their task complete, Kisha and Duke stepped out of the spatial territory and made their way to their respective positions.

Remarkably, only two hours had passed since they had gone missing with Rose.

When Duke returned to the southern wall, he instructed Sparrow to go back and rest while he took his position.

Upon seeing Duke there, Sparrow realized that Kisha and Duke had already addressed the situation with Rose.

Whether she was alive or dead would be revealed later, but he chose not to ask directly.
