Chapter 7901

4-5 minutes

The White House spokesperson, who was fast asleep, jumped out of bed after receiving a call reporting the situation. Holding the phone, he hysterically demanded, "What?! The deployment of troops to Antarctica has been leaked online? What's going on with the military? How could they make such a basic mistake?"

Her husband, who was more than thirty years her senior, was fast asleep when she suddenly startled by her question. He sat up in bed and instinctively asked, "What happened, honey? You scared me."

The spokesperson smiled apologetically and said, "There's been a bit of an emergency. I have to go outside to take this call. Honey, you can continue to rest."

After saying that, she quickly grabbed her phone and left the bedroom, angrily questioning into the phone, "I want to know, how could someone film this clandestine operation and post the video online?!"

The person on the other end of the phone said helplessly, "I've already asked the person in charge. The CIA and the Department of Homeland Security have started investigating the real identity of the person who posted the video, but they've hidden it too well. The video was uploaded and sent through an anonymous server, so there's no way to trace it. They don't know who filmed the video and uploaded it to the internet."

The White House spokesperson paced anxiously back and forth in the room: "What a bunch of useless idiots! I'm heading to the White House right now. Tell the other staff to come over immediately. I need to meet with them to discuss tomorrow's public statement and see how to reasonably explain this matter!"

The other party said awkwardly, "The most serious problem right now is not how to explain our deployment to Antarctica to the outside world, but why we subjected Japanese research team members to inhumane torture and forced confessions. This is the biggest public relations crisis right now. Some people even say that the behavior of our soldiers is no different from what the Japanese fascists did back then!"

“What?!” the White House spokesperson exclaimed in shock. “You mean our soldiers tortured the Japanese research team?”

“It wasn’t just torture; they stripped them naked and took them outdoors in Antarctica at minus 60 degrees Celsius. And the whole thing was filmed and posted online. I’ll send you the video now, so you can take a look first!”

“Quick, send me the video!”

“Okay, it’s been sent. Please check!”

The White House spokesperson quickly opened the communication software and soon received a video.

She clicked play and watched the video bit by bit, only to feel her vision go black.

After struggling to compose herself for a moment, she gritted her teeth and said, “I’m going to the White House now. You immediately notify all relevant personnel to assemble at the White House.”

The other party said, “By the way, several permanent members of the Security Council have issued diplomatic notes demanding that we explain our actions in sending troops to Antarctica. Japan has also demanded that we explain the mistreatment of its scientific expedition team members. There is a great deal of public outrage in their country, and they have already started organizing demonstrations. Do you think we should inform the President?”

The White House spokesperson thought for a moment and sighed, “It’s too late now. Let’s not disturb the President’s rest for the time being. He’s been overwhelmed with problems on the island lately. What’s most infuriating is that that crazy woman from the Bill family actually wanted to trade one for one with the President. She’s an absolute scoundrel! Now is the time for us to do everything we can to help the President. We must do this well and not cause him any more trouble!”

The other person replied, “Okay, then I’ll notify the others to go to the White House first!”

“good!”

The White House spokesperson hung up the phone and immediately returned to his bedroom.

As soon as she entered the bedroom, she went straight to the walk-in closet to quickly change her clothes. Her husband, dragging his tired body, came into the closet and asked her in surprise, “Honey, what happened? Why are you going out so late?”

While changing his clothes, the spokesperson said helplessly, “Something big has happened, and I have to get there as soon as possible to resolve it!”

By the time the spokesperson rushed to the White House, news of the United States secretly sending troops to Antarctica and abusing Japanese research team members had already made headlines around the world.

This scandal is so shocking that it has garnered an absurd level of global attention.

The United States has a history of taking action against others, and often its methods are even more ruthless than those used against the Japanese research team. For example, there were many inhumane acts committed at Guantanamo Bay, which was infamous worldwide. However, the combined number of incidents related to Guantanamo Bay does not match the level of attention this incident has received.

The main reason is that this situation is really too bizarre. Japan can be said to be the United States’ most solid ally and junior partner. Moreover, Japan’s national strength is stronger than that of England, America’s old ally in Europe, and stronger than that of its old neighbors Canada and Mexico. It is the number one junior partner of the United States. It is truly surprising that even Japan is treated like this by the United States.

Moreover, this time the United States has brought the flames of war to the last continent on Earth that has not yet been touched by their war—Antarctica. From the moment the American troops landed on the Antarctic ice sheet, the iron heel of American war has trampled across the entire earth.

It is precisely because of these special circumstances that the nature of this matter has been continuously escalated to a more serious level.

The car was speeding along the road.

But the spokesperson was extremely anxious at that moment. She couldn't wait for the vehicle to arrive at the White House and started a video conference with her team.

The meeting was connected, and everyone was in their cars, many of them still wearing their pajamas, looking quite disheveled.

The spokesperson began, "Okay, now let me outline our current priorities. First, we need to quickly find a way to conduct public relations globally, issuing warnings to all media outlets and social media platforms that are reporting on this matter, demanding that they immediately cease all reporting on this matter and delete all related content online."

After saying this, the spokesperson sighed: "I know this is basically impossible to achieve, but we must still show this attitude and successfully convey our attitude to all media and self-media platforms, so that if the president investigates, we will at least have taken remedial measures in the first instance."

Everyone agreed.

Although everyone works in the prestigious White House, they are essentially just working like cattle, so everyone knows that what they need to do at this time is to avoid or reduce their responsibility as much as possible. The decision to send troops to Antarctica was not made by their staff and public relations team, so they do not need to take any responsibility for this incident.

However, since they are responsible for public relations and external affairs, they need to be accountable for the subsequent development of this matter. If they do nothing and let the impact of this matter continue to escalate, then it will certainly be their dereliction of duty.

Therefore, they must make the most comprehensive response as soon as possible, even if these responses are actually ineffective.

This is similar to the situation in the emergency room, where medical staff, faced with a brain-dead patient, still try their best to perform a round of resuscitation work for the family to see. Although the outcome cannot be changed, what needs to be done still needs to be done.

The spokesperson then added, "Your work must be documented. You must keep a record of which platforms you have contacted and how you contacted them. If you send an email, print out the email information; if you send a text message, take a screenshot of the text message; if you make a phone call, record the call.”

4-5 minutes

Everyone immediately agreed.

The spokesperson continued, “I will be at the White House in 15 minutes. We are tentatively scheduled to hold a press conference at the White House in one hour, so please inform all your reporters in Washington to be at the White House press briefing room within one hour. We will use the extra 45 minutes to discuss the best possible explanation for the behavior shown in the video.”

“No problem!” Seeing how clearly she treated the situation and how calm she remained in the face of danger, everyone felt as if they had found a pillar of support.

The spokesperson then added, “Immediately notify the military and have them designate a person in charge to contact us in twenty minutes! Before the press conference begins, we must know what the military plans to do next: whether they can withdraw immediately or remain in Antarctica. In addition, tell them that it would be best to shift the blame to the Japanese, whether it is the higher-level management of the research station, the defense department, or even the cabinet, without giving them any chance to refuse.”

When White House staff called the military, the military was already in a state of chaos.

They were the ones who sent troops, and they were also the ones who mistreated the Japanese research team members. Therefore, they are the ones under the most pressure right now.

Normally, the military doesn’t take the White House press corps seriously, but in times like these, even the world’s most powerful U.S. military can only cower like a turtle and leave everything to the White House press corps to handle the crisis.

When it comes to public relations, the White House team is undoubtedly the most professional, and their advice is very valuable: shift the blame as much as possible, even if it has to be forced!

Who should be blamed? Of course, the blame should be shifted to the Japanese research team and the Japanese government.

They immediately contacted the Japanese Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology and the Japanese Ministry of Defense. During the video conference, the U.S. military representative made the following request: "We will be holding a press conference in an hour, at which time we will explain to the world what is happening in Antarctica, so I need your cooperation."

An official from the Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology asked awkwardly, "What has been exposed is the behavior of the US military, which has harmed our research team members. How are we supposed to cooperate in this situation?"

The U.S. military official said coldly, "You must publicly announce to the world that all your research team members have betrayed the country and are illegally conducting large-scale exploration activities in Antarctica."

After saying that, he turned to the head of the Japanese defense department and said, "As for you, you must also publicly admit to the world that it was you who invited the U.S. military to send troops to help you quell the rebellion. Our military action was not directed at the Antarctic continent, but only at your research team members! Moreover, the reason we mistreated your research team members was at your request to conduct surprise interrogations of your traitorous research team members!"

An embarrassed and angry Japanese defense official said, "Sir, it's true that we asked you to help us quell the treason, but we never asked you to mistreat our research team members. How are we supposed to explain to our country how you treat our research team members and then make us take the blame for it?!"

The military official shouted angrily, "Bastards! We don't care how you explain yourselves, I only care about how I explain myself!"

5-6 minutes

Without a doubt, the heads of Japan's defense department and the Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology were furious at this moment.

But for them, anger solves nothing, because it is anger directed at America.

Therefore, they didn't even have the courage to refute the unreasonable demands of the US military leaders.

After all, this matter is not entirely the fault of the United States. They did send troops under the pretext of helping Japan, and now that something has gone wrong, Japan certainly cannot stand idly by.

However, the extent to which Japan would acknowledge responsibility became a point of contention between the two sides.

Japan feels that this is like two drivers who don't follow traffic rules causing an accident. Everyone is responsible, and it's impossible to make one party bear full responsibility. If the US military commandos were to abuse their own research team members, they would definitely tolerate it if it hadn't been exposed. But now that it's been exposed, how can they still tolerate it?

So the official from the Japanese Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology mustered his courage and said, "Sir, you can't put all the blame on us, especially for something like the mistreatment of research team members. If we're to take the blame, how are we supposed to explain this to the other research team members and scientists? Everyone here is just working in various units under the Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology, not military personnel. Even if we make mistakes at work, we should resolve them through normal civil and commercial procedures. If they find out that we resort to force or even request the intervention of foreign troops, how will we maintain our reputation in the future?"

The head of the defense department quickly added, "Yes, sir. We can publicly admit that we requested the US to send troops, but the US needs to give us a public explanation for the mistreatment of our research team members. That would be fair and reasonable."

The U.S. military official retorted sharply, "Fairness? Where is the fairness?! When your entire nation was starving and MacArthur had to come to the U.S. Congress to beg for food for you, why didn't you talk about fairness then?! When you used your geographical advantage to become a Cold War bridgehead and received countless supplies and aid from us, why didn't you talk about fairness then?! Now that we need you to take the blame, you're talking to me about fairness?!"

The two Japanese men were immediately embarrassed.

Although they weren't together, and although they were only on video call, they couldn't help but look at each other on the screen, hoping the other could come up with a way to refute the US military official.

However, neither of them could find a suitable breakthrough point.

The U.S. military official gradually lost patience and said coldly, "The White House will be holding a press conference soon. I hope you two won't waste any more time here. If this matter has a significant negative impact on the United States, rest assured, given our style of doing things, the consequences will make you pay back tenfold or a hundredfold. Perhaps because of your insistence today, some Japanese citizens will lose their jobs in the future, and some Japanese companies will go bankrupt. You need to think about these things carefully as soon as possible. If you can't decide, then report the matter to your superiors and let them decide. I'll wait for you for twenty minutes."

After saying that, the US military official left the video conference.

The two Japanese men were extremely embarrassed. In this situation, they naturally dared not make a decision casually. So, after discussing it, they decided to immediately report the matter to the cabinet and let the cabinet give a conclusion.

Some things can be passed down not only to those below you, but also to those above you. As long as you have the courage to shirk responsibility, you can tell your boss, "I've already done this much, you figure out how to solve it." The boss can't do anything about it; at most, they'll just fire you.

Looking back now, being fired doesn't matter anymore, as long as they don't have to bear the responsibility to their country. What if they didn't serve America well, and America retaliates against Japan later? Wouldn't they become traitors to Japan? At that point, it wouldn't just be about losing their jobs; who knows, one day some gunman might jump out and kill them.

Upon receiving the report, the cabinet did not dare to delay for even a moment and immediately convened a meeting with all its members to discuss the matter.

While the cabinet was still discussing what to do, Sara, who was far away in Antarctica, also received the news.

Chapter 7905

---

She never dreamed that Antarctica, where she had spent so many years, would become the focus of global attention.

She immediately realized that this must be related to Wu Bolin (Bick)!

After Wu Bolin (Bick) left, he went to Ushuaia and, with the help of Wu Siyuan, the governor of the Left Army Commandery, went to Antarctica.

Sara wasn't very surprised when she received the message, because the original plan was for the three of them to go out and look for opportunities. No one knew if there were any opportunities in Antarctica. Sara also felt that this kind of unexpected effect was exactly what she wanted. Otherwise, if everyone followed her preconceived notions, some corners might never be noticed.

But she never dreamed that Wu Bolin (Bick)'s trip to Antarctica would lead to such a huge incident!

She doesn't know the specific situation in Antarctica yet, only that the US military landed there overnight with weapons and equipment and attacked the Japanese research team, but she doesn't know if it's related to Wu Bolin (Bick), and she can't contact Wu Bolin (Bick) now.

However, regardless of whether this matter has anything to do with Wu Bolin (Bick), she is now in a very tense mood.

Although the Qing-Breaking Society's base was extremely well-hidden and almost entirely built underground on an unnamed island, this method of concealment could only deal with ordinary satellites and aircraft. If any country's military accidentally swept over the island with professional detection equipment, they would discover that the island, which only had a small part of its head showing, had been hollowed out.

Previously, Sara was never worried about being exposed because the island was hundreds of kilometers away from both Antarctica and South America. South America itself didn't attract much attention, and Antarctica even less so. There were no tourist attractions near her island, nor were there any commercial air routes. Civilian passenger planes, ships, and even research team ships would never pass over or beside her island.

Moreover, she had someone conduct a special survey of the surrounding area two or three decades ago. There were no oil or mineral resources, and the fishery resources were not abundant. In addition, the ownership of the island had been purchased by the South American government, and no one was allowed to trespass. Therefore, she was never worried about any security risks.

But things are different now.

The U.S. military deployed hundreds of soldiers, several armored vehicles, and even self-propelled rocket launchers to the Antarctic continent overnight. The military intimidation of this modern weaponry made Sara uneasy.

Because she knew very well that once everything here was exposed to the military of a major power like the US military, there would only be one outcome: conquest.

To destroy this place, the US military wouldn't even need to send troops; they could simply deploy more bombers to level the island.

As for the underground fortifications here, even if they could withstand the first round of bombing, the people and facilities inside would not have survived.

Because all the air in the underground facility is supplied from the surface of the island using large ventilation equipment, if the surface is bombed, those inside who are not skilled enough will only face certain death.

Moreover, although this place is only a few hundred kilometers away from the Antarctic continent, a few hundred kilometers is hardly a distance for the US military. If the situation in Antarctica continues to develop, and if a US military plane happens to fly over and discovers something unusual, then everything will be over. Antarctica is bound by the Antarctic Treaty, and they can go there without hesitation, let alone here.

Sara was in a state of panic, feeling a sense of life and death crisis. So she immediately summoned Jadiel and anxiously instructed him: "Tianlin, notify all the scholars in America and Japan and their families, and tell them to find out why the United States sent troops to Antarctica. I always feel that this matter is very strange."

Jadiel knew that this matter was of great importance and could potentially affect the very survival of the Anti-Qing Society, so he immediately said solemnly, "Your Majesty, rest assured, I will go and inform them right away!"

After saying that, he suddenly thought of a detail and said, "By the way, Your Majesty, according to the routine report submitted by the Left Army Commander-in-Chief's Office some time ago, it was mentioned that when Grand Elder Wu Bolin (Bick) went to Antarctica, he boarded a Japanese research vessel at sea. Could the US military's attack on the Japanese research team this time be related to Grand Elder?!"

P.S.: Chinese New Year is almost here! I've been quite busy lately, so I wish everyone a Happy New Year in advance. I'll try to update once a day for the next few days.
