Chapter 7906

4-4 minutes

Jadiel's words stunned Sara.

She knew that Elder Wu Bolin (Bick) had gone to Antarctica, but she didn't know the specific details. She hadn't expected there to be such a hidden story.

Since Wu Bolin (Bick) had boarded the Japanese research vessel using extraordinary means, Sara was almost certain that he had used psychological manipulation on the Japanese research team.

Moreover, under such circumstances, psychological manipulation couldn't have been used on just one person; all the research team members would have needed to be controlled to ensure his absolute safety and the absolute secrecy of his whereabouts.

But she couldn't understand what Wu Bolin (Bick) had done in Antarctica that had attracted the attention of the US military.

In Sara's view, his actions not only threatened his own safety but also the safety of the entire Po Qing Society.

Sara, furious, exclaimed, "This Wu Bolin (Bick) has only been gone for a little over a month, and he's already caused such a disaster! There are so many places in the world he wouldn't go, but he insisted on going to that freezing, desolate place, Antarctica. Is there something about that place that attracts him?"

Jadiel quickly stepped forward to advise, "Your Majesty, please calm down. In this situation, blaming the Grand Elder is pointless. I believe the most urgent task is to find out what happened in Antarctica that alerted the American forces."

Sara coldly replied, "You make it sound so simple. Although Antarctica isn't far from us, I..." "It's practically impossible for us to cross now. The power of the Devil's Forties is beyond the resistance of ordinary people. Of the entire Broken Qing Society, only I can cross it with my bare hands."

Jadiel realized his mistake and immediately knelt on the ground, respectfully saying, “Your Majesty, please calm down. I was too talkative. Your Majesty is of such high status; how could you personally go to such a hellish place? In my opinion, we should wait and see how the American forces respond. I believe that as long as the Grand Elder doesn’t expose himself, he won’t pose too much danger to us.” Sara said coldly, “Under these circumstances, we still need to be extremely careful. My two biggest concerns right now are: first, that Wu Bolin (Bick) absolutely must not engage in direct combat with the US military, otherwise it will bring us great disaster; and second, that the US military should not increase its troop deployment in Antarctica, otherwise it will also increase our risk of exposure.”

Jadiel asked, “Your Majesty, with the Grand Elder’s strength, it’s currently the dead of winter in Antarctica, he probably won’t be able to return, right?”

“That’s right.” Sara nodded and said, “With his strength, he should be able to cross the devilish westerly wind belt in spring.”

Jadiel sighed and said, “This also means that we won’t be able to make any contact with the Grand Elder for the next two or three months.”

Sara nodded and said angrily, “It’s best not to let this matter escalate further, otherwise I will definitely not forgive him when he returns.”

After saying that, Sara waved her hand and said, “Go and inform those scholars. Report to me immediately if there is any news.”

Jadiel respectfully said, “Your subordinate obeys!”

Jadiel came out of Sara’s cultivation room and immediately sent a message to the Five Armies Commandery, ordering them to immediately consult all the scholars for any clues related to the events in Antarctica.

5-7 minutes

Soon, a message from a scholar in the White House arrived, revealing the truth about the US military's deployment to Antarctica.

Jadiel hurried back to report to Sara, saying, "Your Majesty, the scholar in the White House reports that the US military's deployment to Antarctica is because Japan suspects the research team of collective treason and large-scale illegal exploration in Antarctica. They are temporarily unable to send soldiers to Antarctica to quell the rebellion, so they have asked the United States for help."

Sara frowned: "Without a doubt, the entire Japanese research team must have been controlled by Wu Bolin (Bick). Why would he allow these people to conduct extensive exploration in Antarctica? I sent him to find rare and precious materials; those are insignificant little objects, absolutely no need for geological exploration equipment. He must have..." "They're looking for something huge, or even something so large it can't be called a thing," Jadiel said. "The US military has already taken control of most of the Japanese research team there and intercepted some of their exploration records. The geological exploration equipment they're using can probe to depths of thousands of meters below the Antarctic ice sheet, but it's generally believed that there's little exploration value below that depth because there are no ancient traces of human existence there. Even if there are some rare minerals, they have almost no value for mining. The White House can't figure out what the Japanese research team is looking for. I think this question should be..." Only the Grand Elder himself knows.

Sara clicked her tongue in confusion, "For companies and countries like ours, or even for cultivators like us, Antarctica doesn't hold much value for exploration. But Wu Bolin (Bick) is a smart man. The fact that he's put so much effort into focusing on Antarctica means there must be something there that we can't yet imagine."

She sighed, "If he hadn't alerted the US military, I could have gone to Antarctica to investigate. But in this situation, even if I'm very curious, I can't go and do anything under the US military's nose." Jadiel thought for a moment and said... "My lord," Sara said, "after the US military withdrew from Antarctica, the US military is under a lot of public pressure. I think they won't be able to hold out for long and will publicly announce their withdrawal, perhaps even shifting the blame to Japan."

Sara nodded, her expression grave. "Have all the scholars keep a close eye on all of America's actions. I suspect they are also very curious about Antarctica now, and they might even be secretly conducting investigations and explorations there."

Just then, Jadiel's phone suddenly received a notification. He quickly said to Sara, "My lord, the White House is about to hold a press conference!"

Sara immediately replied, "Turn on the big screen, I want to see it!" Jadiel nodded respectfully and immediately walked to a wall in Sara's cultivation room. He gently swept his hand across the wall, and the stone wall instantly opened from the middle to both sides, revealing a liquid crystal screen at least 20 square meters in size.

This kind of liquid crystal screen is like the giant LED screen used by singers at concerts, assembled from modular pieces. Although Sara's daily life and cultivation are almost identical to those of three or four hundred years ago, she is also a smart person who embraces technology, so the Qing-Breaking Society has all the necessary modern equipment, and all of it is top-notch.

A dedicated satellite network maintains constant communication with satellites in space through antennas disguised as rocks on the island's ground. Although this place is located on the edge of the world, the network latency for watching the White House live broadcast here is no greater than that in the United States.

At this moment, countless reporters have already crowded the entire press conference room in the White House live broadcast video signal. Everyone is anxiously waiting for the spokesperson to appear. They have prepared too many questions and need to ask the spokesperson as soon as possible.

Meanwhile, in the back room of the White House press briefing, the young spokesperson was sitting and taking deep breaths to calm herself, while simultaneously making various sounds to warm up her voice.

With only 10 minutes left before the press conference, she couldn't help but feel nervous. She knew that today she was facing a tough battle, and how to minimize the damage caused by the deployment of troops to Antarctica and the mistreatment of Japanese research team members had become her core concern.

Just then, a team member rushed over and excitedly told her, "The military has replied. The Japanese Ministry of Defense and the Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology have compromised. They will hold a press conference in twenty minutes to explain the situation to the world. They will admit that our deployment to Antarctica was at their request, but regarding the expedition members, they will also admit that they requested a swift investigation and authorized us to conduct rigorous interrogations.”

The spokesperson breathed a sigh of relief and smiled, “That’s great! In that case, we only need to bring out the soldiers who specifically abused the Japanese expedition members, say it was their own behavior, let the military deal with them, and apologize to the victims. That’ll be the end of it!”

this moment, the White House spokesperson felt not only relaxed but also very pleased.

She knew very well that through her efforts, the potential negative impact of this incident had been minimized.

Preparing for crisis communication in such a short time and achieving such a favorable outcome was a classic case study in White House crisis management.

All of this was thanks to her composure under pressure, her quick reaction, and her sound strategy.

She believed that after this incident, her presence in the White House would reach a new peak.

So, with only ten seconds left in the scheduled press conference, she confidently walked into the press room with a smile.

The room was instantly illuminated by a barrage of flashes, the shutters clicking incessantly. Facing the countless flashes, the spokesperson showed no discomfort or tension, but instead smiled throughout as she approached the podium and began, “I apologize for keeping you all waiting. Before we begin today’s press conference, I would like to apologize for the delay; our press conference will be twenty minutes later than scheduled.”The room erupted in commotion. Everyone was waiting for the White House to provide an explanation to the world regarding the incident in Antarctica. They had assumed that the White House would quickly release this major news story after holding a press conference so soon. However, the press conference was suddenly postponed.

The spokesperson then announced, “The reason for the postponement is that in 10 minutes, Japan will hold an emergency press conference in their country before ours. So, if you want to know about the situation in Antarctica, please wait until Japan finishes its press conference. Our large screen will broadcast it live, so don’t worry. In 10 minutes, I will be watching the press conference with you.”

The room was immediately filled with unease. They hadn’t received any notification from Japan about the upcoming press conference. This was mainly because the Japanese side knew that taking the blame for something like this was unseemly, so they held the press conference as quickly as possible, with as few people as possible—ideally, no reporters at all. They wanted to simply explain the situation to the cameras and then end the session quickly, thus avoiding a potentially embarrassing Q&A session. If someone asked a question that contradicted their claims, the answer would be extremely awkward.

Because the other party involved in this matter is the Japanese scientific expedition team, everyone is eager to know how the Japanese government will respond.

So, everyone patiently awaited the Japanese press conference.

Ten minutes passed quickly.

The large screen switched to footage from the Japanese press conference.

Interestingly, Japan hadn’t invited any media; only one person was present in the entire hall—their spokesperson.

He looked slightly embarrassed, adjusted his glasses, took a deep breath, and then stepped onto the stage.

Once on stage, he spoke his first words in Japanese: "First, please allow me, on behalf of the Japanese Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology, to express my apologies to the people of the world. We are very sorry that our actions have caused trouble and confusion for people around the world." After speaking, he stepped off the stage and bowed deeply towards the cameras.

It must be said that their dedication to bowing is truly extraordinary; his head was almost level with his knees.

After several seconds, he stood up, adjusted his glasses again, returned to the stage, and solemnly began: "First, I want to inform everyone of something: the Japanese research team stationed in Antarctica has recently been suspected of collectively betraying their country." There was no audience at the Japanese press conference, so his remarks didn't elicit any immediate response. However, at the White House press conference, all the media reporters present couldn't help but gasp in surprise.

The Japanese spokesperson continued, "Regarding the suspected treason, I need to first explain something, because people abroad may not be aware, but those at home should remember that recently our icebreaker encountered a malfunction while transporting a new batch of research team members to Antarctica, causing the icebreaker to be unable to return, leaving both the old and new research teams stranded in Antarctica. We notified our country of this at the time. Fortunately, our Antarctic research team has sufficient supplies to support them through the winter. Since then, we have been closely monitoring their situation, maintaining daily contact to inquire if they have encountered any problems or difficulties there, and their replies have always been that everything is fine."

At this point, the Japanese spokesperson continued, "During this period, our back-end system showed that almost all large polar vehicles and equipment had not been activated. These devices were being stored as planned, awaiting the end of winter. However, what we didn't expect was that two days ago..." Suddenly, we received a fuel level signal from our icebreaker, indicating that it had suddenly consumed a large amount of fuel. The signal quickly returned to normal, but our experts determined it wasn't a false alarm. However, strangely, the backend system showed that none of our vehicles or equipment had been used. Therefore, we requested assistance from the US military to investigate. The investigation revealed that all our heavy vehicles were conducting exploration in Antarctica, and even our helicopters were continuously surveying the continent. These actions were not authorized by us. Based on these individuals' unauthorized and illegal use of state-owned machinery, equipment, and fuel, we have reason to infer that they have committed actual treason. However, because we lack the technical capability to deploy troops to Antarctica in winter, we requested US military assistance.”

After saying this, the spokesperson stepped off the podium again, once more demonstrating his dedication and bowing deeply to the camera.

He then returned to the podium and continued, “At our request, the U.S. military deployed troops and arrested our research team members suspected of treason. We authorized them to interrogate these team members. Unexpectedly, one of our team leaders admitted to treason but refused to reveal his true motives for treasonously exploring Antarctica. Out of responsibility to Antarctica and the world, we implored the U.S. military personnel on site to use torture to extract confessions from these team members—the footage you saw in the video. Here, on behalf of all the research team members from the Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology and their families, I apologize to the people of Japan and the world. Although our intentions were good, our actions were indeed very inappropriate, causing harm to the individuals involved and distress to the general public. We will resolutely prevent such incidents from happening again.”

He then stepped off the podium for the third time, once again demonstrating his dedication and craftsmanship. At this point, the art was complete.

4-5 minutes

At the Japanese press conference, silence remained after three bows.

This silence was primarily due to the absence of anyone except the spokesperson.

However, the White House press conference was erupting in cheers and gasps.

The cheers came almost entirely from American media; the impact of this event was so significant and negative that American media naturally felt deeply ashamed.

But the Japanese press conference had just shifted the blame to the vast majority of the issue, meaning that the immense public and international pressure on the United States had instantly lessened by 90%.

The gasps came from foreign media outlets who had been waiting to see what would happen. Everyone was eager to see how the American spokesperson would respond to the barrage of questions, resorting to sophistry and distorting the truth. However, they hadn't expected them to employ such a clever, underhanded tactic.

The spokesperson's expression now held a victorious smile.

Amidst the astonishment of the crowd, she stepped onto the podium, a professional smile on her face, and began, "I believe everyone has clearly seen the Japanese press conference and is aware of the specifics. Now, we will proceed to our own press conference. Since the Japanese spokesperson has already explained things clearly, we will skip the press conference and go directly to the Q&A session."

The reporters in the audience raised their hands.

The spokesperson scanned the room, deliberately selecting a Russian reporter, and said, "Please, the reporter from RIA Novosti, ask your question." The Russian journalist truly never expected this to happen to him. Generally, when holding live press conferences, the Q&A session avoids targeting media from countries with whom they have a hostile relationship, to prevent these journalists from publicly attacking them. Even when they have to call on one or two journalists to ask questions, it's usually done much later in the session, with very little time allotted, resulting in low viewership.

But tonight, with such a major event, they actually gave the first question-and-answer slot to a Russian journalist—it's simply outrageous.

Amidst surprise and delight, the Russian journalist quickly composed herself and, microphone in hand, asked, "Ms. Spokesperson, if I remember correctly, the Antarctic Treaty stipulates that no country may send troops to Antarctica for any reason. Although the Japanese spokesperson just explained the specific situation, I don't think this is a reasonable excuse for the United States to send troops to Antarctica. Couldn't two countries collude and stage such a farce to openly send troops to Antarctica? Moreover, this matter could have been reported to the United Nations first, and then the UN could have decided whether a particular country or the UN should send a joint force to resolve it. But the United States and Japan bypassed the UN and unilaterally decided to secretly send troops. Isn't that a rather egregious act?"

The Russian journalist felt that her question was watertight, and the other side had no direct rebuttal, because whatever happened between them was their own business; the US's deployment of troops to Antarctica was wrong.

The spokesperson, unperturbed, began, "This Russian journalist friend should have just heard the Japanese explanation of the situation. They discovered a large amount of fuel missing from the icebreaker. We have reason to suspect that this fuel was used on some exploration equipment, and we also have reason to suspect that the traitorous Japanese research team used the fuel for environmental destruction. Moreover, no one knows what kind of exploration they were conducting. What if it was an act of terrorism? If intervention is not timely and extremely serious consequences occur, who will be responsible to Antarctica and to the people of the world?"
