Their aim in approaching Western white aristocrats was racial integration, so their children were raised as the next generation of scholars. Rachel Getty was instilled with the identity of a scholar by her mother from a young age, and also had a special poison from the Breaking the Qing Society in her system. Rachel Getty grew up in a more open Western society and instinctively resisted this constraint. However, her mother also told her that all of this was a helpless act, and that resistance would be meaningless. On the contrary, it might even affect her maternal grandmothers on both sides of the family. Because once their identities were exposed, given the Breaking the Qing Society's style, they would start from her maternal grandmother's generation and eradicate that lineage. At the same time, to protect their secret to the greatest extent, the Getty family would also suffer a catastrophic disaster.

Rachel Getty knew that her mother was not joking with her. Although she hated the Breaking the Qing Society and her fate as a scholar, she also knew in her heart that this was the reason for her birth. Without the scholar plan, her parents could not have married, and she could not have been born.

This fate was very similar to those brothers and sisters who had leukemia, and whose parents chose to have younger siblings to save them.

They hoped their younger siblings' hematopoietic stem cells could save their older siblings' lives. This was the destiny they had bestowed upon these younger siblings, a responsibility they had been given even before birth.

While it might seem somewhat unfair, most people could accept it.

Therefore, Rachel Getty gradually accepted this destiny bound to her.

Now, although Rachel Getty harbored deep resentment towards the Qing Society, she still hoped to fulfill her role as the scholar and the tasks assigned to her by her family and the Qing Society. Only in this way could she ensure the safety and future of her family.

If she did well, it would mean sacrificing her own happiness for the safety of her entire family.

Inside the private room, Rachel Getty stared blankly at the luxurious surroundings, while Robert paced anxiously, still pondering Steve's true purpose in inviting her to dinner. A few minutes later, the door to the private room was pushed open by the waiter, and Steve Rothschild stepped in first with a smile. He said to Robert with a cheerful smile, "Robert, the last time I saw you, you were still in high school. You've grown so much."

Robert said nervously and awkwardly, "Grandpa Steve, you look the same as you did a few years ago."

Steve smiled and said, "Not bad, Robert. After going to college, you speak more like a grown-up."

Robert smiled and asked cautiously, "By the way, Grandpa Steve, what brings you to Stanford all of a sudden?"

Steve smiled and said, "I've come to see a friend, a young talent like you."

As he spoke, he turned to look at the door and said with a smile, "Andy, please come in. Let me introduce you to my grand-nephew!"

Robert and Rachel looked at the door in surprise. They hadn't expected that Steve would bring a friend and even intend to introduce his friend to Robert.
