

Chapter 7260

Here, they can only search for Margaret's name through the Yellow Pages,

This lists the titles of each year's files.

If Margaret's name is found there, related content can be found as well.

However, this method only finds records primarily about Margaret.

If the record focuses on other people and Margaret is secondary,

The Yellow Pages title is unlikely to mention her name.

Interestingly, the two quickly found some content related to Margaret,

But this content was not about her events.

Instead, it recorded interactions between Stanford officials and the CIA,

Including a document titled "Recommendation to the CIA to Restrict Margaret An's Exit from the Country."

The two found the original file based on the serial number.

It was a letter of advice personally written to the CIA by the then-president of Stanford University.

In the main text, the president detailed her capital operations and achievements in Silicon Valley,

Mentioning that she already showed signs of intending to leave the country.

He believed that if she returned to China,

Given the strength of the An family, her abilities, and her prior investments in the Silicon Valley technology sector,

It would pose a significant threat to the development of emerging industries in the United States.

The original letter was followed by the CIA's reply three days later,

In which they had restricted her departure from the country and thanked the president for his advice.

Maria asked with some surprise,

"Since the president of Stanford University already had this understanding,"

"And the CIA agreed with his advice,"

"Why did your mother still return to China smoothly?"

"Were there any obstacles along the way?"

Charlie shook his head,

"I haven't heard of that."

Maria said, "Let's see if there are any other files."

The two continued reviewing the catalog and quickly found a letter registered two months later than the previous one.

This letter was from the former president of Stanford University to the CIA.

It retracted his previous assessment of Margaret,

Stating that whether Margaret returned to China or not no longer posed a threat perceived by him before.

Interestingly, he detailed the reasons for retracting this assessment,

One of which was that Margaret had shifted her focus from the internet and high-tech industry development to antique research,

And proving the hypothesis that extraterrestrial life had once visited Earth.

In the president's own words,

Margaret had lost her commercial drive and even absurdly attempted to collaborate with Stanford,

To conduct an in-depth investigation into this matter.

In the letter, the president also described in detail Margaret's so-called "fallacies."

Margaret believed that human history was not the only history of advanced intelligent life on Earth.

She firmly believed that before human history,

Earth must have had interstellar colonial civilizations far more advanced than modern civilization,

And that many miracles are attributed to humans,

And even some religious records were likely related to these interstellar colonial civilizations.

At the time, she even desperately hoped that her alma mater, Stanford, would accept her hypothesis,

And work with her to find direct evidence.

However, in the eyes of Stanford's then-president,

This was simply a waste of time.

Charlie and Maria were both extremely shocked when they saw this.

Charlie frowned and said,

"Could it be that my mother found evidence of those cultivators visiting Earth back then?"

Maria said solemnly, "It may not be direct evidence."

"Your mother is an exceptional person."

"It's very possible that she deduced this conclusion based on some clues."

"Just like Mendeleev was able to deduce undiscovered substances through the periodic law of elements,"

"As long as there are enough supporting clues,"

"Even without direct clues, it can be determined that something must exist."

"And history will eventually find direct evidence to prove him right."
