

Football 281

Chapter 281 Congradulatiots

At around 12:10 just past noon On Rakim's Instagram a post ignited everyone's attention. On it was a video of a girl with wavy light blond hair could be seen opening up a stack of letters containing the crest from various colleges. The netizens watched as she carefully tore open the first envelope, her breath catching in her throat as her eyes quickly started scanning the page until they landed on the word she had been hoping for.

Her face lit up, a mixture of disbelief and joy radiating through her expression. The video zoomed in slightly, capturing the exact moment Emma's lips curled into a grin. "I got in..." she whispered, barely audible over the rising excitement of her friends and family who were watching from the background. The camera panned over the letter, revealing the bold header: Harvard University.

But the video wasn't done yet. Emma glanced nervously at the remaining envelopes. Harvard had been her back up plan due to their exemplary law courses. In fact, if it were not for her love of Cambridge and being able to move closer to her mother's side of the family, especially her grandparents. Even as she thought this her expression was one of pure satisfaction after reading her acceptance.

Having her back-up school sorted out she felt much more confident as she picked up the second letter. This one was thicker, bearing the elegant crest of Stanford University. She hesitated for a moment holding it up for the camera. After that she didn't hesitate in sliding her finger under the flap and tearing it open. Taking the thick stack of letters from the envelope she started reading it with a light scowl before a bright smile graced her face.

"Congratulation Emma Bee," Before she could even state the contents of the letter her dad's voice beat her to it as he continued to film the moment. "I got in too," Emma quickly affirmed smiling brightly as she picked up the next letter trying to ride the luck she was on. UCLA was next and much to the surprise of the viewers she also got in there as part of their early admission.

In fact, all of her acceptance where part of early admissions making Ben all the prouder of his daughter's hard work. Last but not least was her final letter which held the prominent crest of the University of Cambridge. This one meant more than the others. Cambridge was where she had always imagined herself, ever since she was little, especially when she went on the path to become a Lawyer.

Her hands stilled as she stared at the envelope, feeling the weight of it in her palms. This was it. She took a deep breath, then carefully peeled the seal open. Her heart hammered in her chest as she slid out the letter. The camera zoomed in as her eyes scanned the page. For a second, her expression was unreadable. Then, slowly, her face softened, her lips parting in disbelief. "Congratulation on your acceptance into the University of Cambridge, following an in person interview you will be formally accepted into our prestigious institute."

Ben erupted into cheers almost dropping the phone that was videoing as he picked up his daughter pulling her into a hug. Despite her height at 5'11 he picked her up with ease before proceeding to spin her around in circles. With his athletic 6'4 frame he did so with ease as his loud laughter resounded in the room. From the computer screen the two excited voices of Rakim and their mother could be heard also cheering in celebration.

That's how the video ended following the caption: The Real Wunderkind of the Family
#ShowOfYourSibling

~~~

As the video of Emma's acceptance letters continued to spread across social media, the comments began pouring in. Rakim's Instagram was flooded with reactions from his 1.4 million followers, all buzzing with excitement over Emma's impressive achievements.

@TrueREXFan22 gushed, "Wow, Emma is so incredible! Congratulations on your acceptances, you truly deserve it! Why does my sister only know how to twerk on TikTok? -_-"

@MasterScout, clearly intrigued by Emma's success, asked, "@TrueREXFan22, what is her insta? I'm a scout for a film company? 🙏"

However, not everyone could share in the jubilation. @ImNotARat lamented, "@MasterScout, Send me a copy of her casting couch interview. Anyways, why is she casually getting accepted into Ivy League schools while I'm being waitlisted by community colleges?"

To which @KoolKat89 responded sagely, "@ImNotARat, that's just life trying to tell you something." This set off a small battle in the comment section as @ImNotARat found himself being attacked from all sides by Rakim's fans. They didn't send him threats instead choosing to start of a roast fest that made @ImNotARat question whether a cat walked across his shadow or had he stepped into shit.

Despite the small Roast fest that @ImNotARat had brought on himself whereby his Instagram was being dissected with memes and photo shopped pictures. The majority of the comments took on a positive note as people started to praise Emma for her achievements. @ScholarQueen: "Harvard, Stanford, and Cambridge? You're a superstar! You're an inspiration girl wishes you all the best Emma!"

The post also sparked a heartwarming trend. Under the hashtag #ShowOfYourSibling, fans began sharing their own sibling's moments of triumph. It wasn't long before Rakim's followers flooded the hashtag with videos of their brothers and sisters receiving acceptance letters and celebrating various achievements. The trend brought a wave of collective pride and encouragement, as everyone shared their successes Online.

A kid in Ohio at the age of 15 posted a video of himself dressed in his high school baseball kit. The video showed his team, and his family watching his big brother Teves open a letter awarding him a full ride to Vanderbilt. His teammates and friends exploded in happiness upon getting the conformation of his acceptance with music blasting through the speakers. The players collectively performed the Griddy to the song relishing in Trave's happiness.

A little girl no older than 10 named Mia located somewhere in Newyork posted a video of her big sister Akari Jones. The girl aged no older than 17 with a mix of American and Japanese features performed a few juggles with a ball at her feet showcasing her skills before launching it at a goal. She hit her target and in the next moment the little girl handed the phone to someone else before rushing to her side with a kit in her hands. It was the purple kit of the Orlando Pride with the bold date of 2023 indicating Akari had signed her first professional contract.

More such videos flooded the internet with the #ShowOfYourSibling as siblings started celebrating each other's success in unique fashion. Most performed the Griddy dance after revealing their accomplishment, whilst some younger and older siblings surprised their respective sibling with their acceptance letter. Some even went as far as pranking them by pretended they had been rejected aiming for a funny reaction. It was all in food fun, well except for the guy who shaved his majestic afro in disappointment when his little brother pretended, he didn't get his scholarship to Norte Dame.

The video that caught Rakim's attention though was the Video Liam had posted of his big sister Jenna McKinnon. They had been best friends when they both lived in Orlando, but their contact waned after he moved to Scotland. That's especially the case since he ended up attending a boarding school in France after getting into a fight in school and ended beating up a boy 2 years older than him granting him a free trip to the hospital.

Liam shared a video of his big sister Jenna McKinnon receiving acceptance letters from prestigious institutions: the University of Cambridge, the University of Stirling, and MIT. His voice from behind the camera carried a genuine happiness as he captioned the video, "So proud of my big sis Jenna! Even though we haven't talked in ages seeing you achieve your dreams brings back so many memories. Congratulations, Jenna, and thank you for inspiring all of us. #ShowOfYourSibling." The video captured Jenna's tearful joy as she read through the acceptance letters and was being congratulated by some of her friends and family.