Chapter 23

Patrick wore a bitter expression when facing Jack's question. "Of course, we have considered that idea, but various plug-in studios rush in whenever a popular game is released. It's difficult unless we have a particularly outstanding advantage."

When he saw Jack frown slightly, Patrick continued, "Some new games in the public testing phase could offer an opportunity to develop plug-ins, but the risks are high.

"The quality of games today is inconsistent, and most games die out shortly after being released, with very few players. We might end up losing everything if we rush in."

Jack understood and already had a preliminary idea in mind.

Jack focused on searching for new games that would be released in the following days. One role-playing game called "Bloody Dawn" piqued his interest, and after playing it for a few days, he felt it was quite promising.

It appeared to have the potential to become a hit.

The problem now was to convince Patrick to join.

Software development requires teamwork, and maintenance in the later stages cannot be done alone. Moreover, Patrick valued profit, so it would be hard to get him on board without clear results.

Jack would need to start by preparing the plug-in software, developing part of it, and inviting Patrick to join. If they could seize the opportunity, the business potential would be limitless.

While working on the plug-in, Jack gradually adapted to university life. He got along well with his roommates, except for Ronnie and Joshua.

These two locals came from wealthy families and looked down on Jack and others. They only regarded Luca because his family was also well off.

They often talked about brand names, fashion, and traveling around the European region. Only Luca could join their conversation.

Isaac gradually noticed Joshua's and Ronnie's arrogant attitudes and began to distance himself from them. Naturally, he got closer to Jack and Samuel.

Samuel liked playing billiards, while Isaac and Joshua were passionate about basketball. Jack had originally enjoyed sports, but recently, he had been unable to go out and had to stay indoors working on the plug-in for "Bloody Dawn".

Luca spent his time playing the guitar, singing, and composing.

Not only did he have a good voice, but he also wrote lyrics and music. Although Jack believed these works weren't impressive, they seemed quite sophisticated to ordinary people.

Luca's self-composed songs and guitar performances were irresistibly attractive to girls, and many female students and seniors had come to visit him. Isaac and Samuel would look at Luca with resentful eyes whenever the seniors left disappointed.

Isaac even joked, "The seniors just don't get it. How about giving me a chance? Take me instead."

However, all he got in return was Luca's disdainful look, leaving Isaac hurt for a long time. He would gaze at his reflection every day, wondering if he really was that bad.

The military training was about to begin.

The school organized rigorous military training and a grand welcome party to help the new students from all over the country adapt to university life more quickly.

According to the rules, each class was required to have representatives perform on stage to bring excitement to the event.

Additionally, there would be an exciting first-year students basketball game after the military training. The boys would sweat it out on the court, while the girls would cheer them on from the sidelines.
