Chapter 289

The brief commotion caused by the car purchase at the exhibition quietly faded in the calm, ordinary days.

Bella and her classmates' awe was also momentary, as the car stayed with Jack for only a day before he sent it to Drakengard Games.

After all, Patrick, who was busy getting funds and investments, needed the car more than Jack did.

And according to Patrick, a well-established organization had already expressed strong interest in working with them. Right after the contract was signed, a significant amount of funds would be invested in the company. Moreover, the organization's stake would be so small that it was practically helping them out.

This funding would be a great act of help to Drakengard Games. It would surely help the company to expand into broader horizons.

In the midst of his busy schedule, Jack still made time to learn Spanish at Charlotte's foreign language institute.

It was a part of his huge plan.

But surprisingly, he had difficulties studying Spanish. His progress was not as smooth as learning subjects such as English, Math, or Science.

Even so, Charlotte would teach him patiently despite occasionally teasing him.

At the same time, Leo's passion for martial arts became increasingly evident.

He would often visit Alnewgo University to learn from Jack, showing great persistence and dedication.

Seeing this, Jack decided to gather Leo and Caspian for group training to save his time and also strengthen their friendships.

Meanwhile, Feena's fantasy series had been popular online.

In just two months, it had attracted widespread attention and discussions online, surpassing one billion views.

As the second female lead, Feena instantly gained fame with her outstanding acting skills and perfect fit for the role.

Jack was genuinely happy for Feena and had sent his congratulations.

At the same time, his own life was becoming increasingly busy.

With significantly fewer visits to the radio station and Bella's clear discomfort toward Phoebe, Jack decided one evening, after much thought, to resign from his role as the station's male host. Since he couldn't have Phoebe and would be in pain from seeing her everyday, it was better to cut ties and free himself from the pain.

In winter, the sunset illuminated the sky, painting it in hues of red.

When Jack reached the radio station, he saw that Phoebe had already arrived in advance and was preparing to start the broadcast.

When she spotted him, there was a flicker of surprise in her eyes, but her tone quickly became calm.

"You're here."

Jack nodded his head slightly. Phoebe continued to say, "You haven't been coming in as often these few days. Our listeners missed you."

Jack wasn't sure how to respond. He couldn't tell her he had been absent because he was afraid Bella would be jealous.

Phoebe didn't continue asking. She started to prepare her script and told Jack about the content for the broadcast that day.

Only then did Jack realize that Phoebe had been preparing two versions of the script. One was for when he was present and the other one for when she had to host alone.

After doing the usual broadcasting routine, they played two love songs.

They were requested by a girl who was pursuing someone she liked.

The 30-minute broadcast passed in the blink of an eye. Most of the part was mainly led by Phoebe and supported by Jack.

Whenever Phoebe became immersed in broadcasting, Jack would find his gaze drifting toward her, because she was so elegant and beckoning.

Then, he remembered he would tell Phoebe that he was resigning. It would be very hard to see her again as she was usually a reserved homebody.

Jack felt a tinge of sadness in his heart.
