Chapter 2108. Potions To Healers

The change in the system that had led to the information being placed directly in the minds of people when the system rewarded them was amazing. Now they did not see some random item generated by the world condensing mana, which was inefficient. They also did not have to read from the system directly. Walker was amazed to find that the way Remey had made the potion originally, was actually all the ideal steps to take. Whoever, there was another addition that they had missed. They could have used something called white ginger extract. A secondary potion derived from a cooking ingredient. The white ginger was a spice that was used in many baking needs. But since the world had been combined with other ingredients properly, it had the flow of mana needed to awaken many things. One being this white ginger. Therefore, the effects of the white ginger that were not known, had to do with calming mana within the body of whatever ingested it. All known races could eat it!

Due to this, Remey dashed down to the herbalist section. She knew that many of them worked well with the bakers and chefs within the city. They had the skills to create things from the non medicinal herbs that the herbalists grew. It was a major aspect of their business as a guild. With that, Remey was already making the next potion. This time though, she had Walker trying to control the heat more for her. It was an odd task because Remey had amazing control of fire mana and the heat in general that was all due to her training and the fact that she literally had fire as part of who she was now. The fire spirit was also there, but it barely helped with the potions. Instead, it was resting carefully within the spirit marks that Remey still possessed. From what Walker understood, the fire spirit wanted to go with her to the fire elemental one day. Until then, it was storing as much fire mana as possible to condense. That way it would be as strong as it possibly could when it met these different fire spirits. As Remey forced the potion to condense at a slightly faster rate, Walker felt that he was getting closer to the fire mana this time. It wasn't because he was growing in level or anything dramatic like that. He was getting experience points because of what was happening, but he was nowhere near experienced enough to be a higher level mage focused on fire mana. No, he was gaining more of an instinctual understanding of the fire mana because Remey was using that very same fire mana. This was her way of thanking Walker for helping her. She knew that Walker had changed his point of view when it came to all manas. In her mind, that meant that he was able to better comprehend the flames that she condensed. Some benign alchemy flames, and others being normal flames. If he could feel the differences between them align with how she used them, she was sure that he would understand fire better. To Walker, this was just something fitting itself back in place where it should be. The understanding of fire mana was second nature. Whether it was part of his race or not, he understood it. He could innately sense where the alchemy and regular flames originated. Where the mana they called fire mana was focused to the smallest point. 'Corruption cleansing potion

This potion is able to cleanse the earliest corruption due to chaotic mana. As a mana that gathers randomly, many people will randomly find themselves affected by it. Most people can resist the chaotic mana better than others, however, when infected, they will experience many symptoms that can be cured with this potion. The light affinity ingredients are actually similar in nature to many time potions. Just different amounts and the manas are focused on light instead of all manas. The reason for this is because the manas in chaotic nature are able to be calmed by forcing a stronger orderly mana around them. Light is almost always the most orderly and calm by comparison to other mana which can go out of control to cause natural disasters in the world...'

The potion had an even longer all around appraisal than what Walker wanted to keep reading out loud. Especially because it went in to the ingredients, the methods, and the one who created it. But naturally, Remy was amazed by the potion she had. The potion glowed slightly more than any of the light affinity potions. On top of this. There was a clear feeling of calm around the potion when it had filled the room with its scent. Even if it was a failure at the end of the day, it could easily be used to relax an entire room. Dripping one drop on to the week that Walker had brought in caused the chaotic mana he could sense to fade. Enough that the entire single leaf that the potion had touched changed to a lighter green color. It was a success for everything that they had wanted it to be. The real test would be when and if anyone were to become corrupted by chaotic mana. They would be rushed to a place where someone could help them after they were restrained. But learning the symptoms of someone suffering from this would be imperative. The entire healing aspect of Genesis needed to both research this and focus on preventing these dangers. The fact that people could become corrupted would just be an aspect of life. People would have to accept that. With this though, people could grow. The world could also become more diverse. Everything alive in the world would have to adjust to this danger that was just an aspect of life. Therefore, they would advance and improve based on how rare these situations were. Due to that, there would be new monsters, new methods of survival, new plants! So much more too. Walker could barely contain his thoughts. "This potion is going to be great. But I can make it since I know the ins and outs. No one else will be able to do it right." Remy was sure that the difficulty level was too high. Ensuring that the purifying effects were preserved required a fine control of temperature. The only reason that Walker was able to succeed was because he had Remy there to show him the methods. Plus, he already had reached a very grand understanding of most manas, let alone fire mana itself. Therefore, he had been able to adapt and overcome what he needed much better than what others would be able to do. "It will be a test then. We will sow the formula and gather the ingredients. Some of them are all basics. So, let me teach it with you demonstrating to a few lectures. Then, we will see what happens." the old master alchemist had watched it all. He saw potential. The lesser quality for some of these potions would be good to have for water or basic purification. When it came to chaotic manas, then it would be used at the higher quality side. It was the best way to experiment with ingredient replacements and basic learning. They just had to implement this. "I guess Midnight and I need to take a trip to the healers. The cathedral might be busy, plenty of soldiers are still there recovering after they came home." Walker was not at all bothered by the idea of heading there. "Alice and Su!" Midnight jumped up from a chair she had sat in next to the old master alchemist. She wanted to go to the cathedral where she knew that Alice was for sure. But she had overheard Su saying she would be visiting there to help out as well. "Yes, you can tell Alice how we are going to move forward with these potions and that the healers will get a supply of them. They would be the ones encountering these symptoms the most." Remy felt that this was the best bet. She would most likely have an even closer relationship with healers as they would want to replicate the effects of this potion with their own skills. "Maybe they will have some mana calming skills too. They could be changing the way helears work now." Walker amused himself with more thoughts about things changing. Remy just ignored him as she fell in to recording the in depth methods she used. Especially how she had moved the manas around with each ingredient added. "We will see you two later." The old master alchemist went to help Remy record everything. He had years of experience with this. It made sense he would still check her work. ...
