

Chapter 147

Jenny had always been one to seek thrills.

She agreed enthusiastically, "What a fantastic idea. Our studio needs to establish itself carefully. Initially, we can't directly compete with larger entertainment companies by poaching their talent outright. Such a move could backfire if they decided to unite against us.

"However, if we focus on nurturing the artists that Harper Entertainment has overlooked, shelved, or intentionally held back...

"People might assume you're acting out of personal vendetta against your brothers. They'd likely have low expectations, viewing it as a petty move. Scumbag No.1 and Scumbag No.2 might even dismiss it as insignificant, lowering their guard.

"Given their arrogance, they probably wouldn't actively try to undermine these artists at first. They'd likely wait, expecting you to fail and embarrass yourself, ready with their mockery.

"Alternatively, they might pretend to be generous, offering you a way back to Harper Entertainment. But once we successfully promote these artists, it'll be too late for them to stifle our growth."

Lindsay's smile deepened. "You really understand me."

Her thoughts were exactly what Jenny had just articulated.

"Once we poach Harper Entertainment's veteran operations team, we can start poaching their artists. We can consider those abandoned, outcasted, or shelved artists who have potential and good character.

"Initially, we shouldn't poach too many. Let's start with two to four. We'll do it quietly and have them switch over without mentioning they're coming to our studio. Even though Scumbag No.1 and Scumbag No.2 might want to see me fail, it doesn't mean they won't cause trouble when we poach their people."

Especially since she had just angered Oliver, who was still holding a grudge.

Announcing the poached artists after successfully bringing them over would be the best plan.

Jenny nodded. "We really are on the same wavelength. That's exactly what I was thinking too."

She and Lindsay were always in sync, whether in life, thoughts, or work. That was why they were destined to be lifelong best friends, able to trust each other completely.

"When you go to the next live variety show, I'll visit the film academy to scout for some promising newcomers. We can also invest in our own projects."

Jenny said, "I have quite a bit of money that I can invest in the studio."

She added generously, "I'll support all of you."

Despite Abby's bias against Justin and Jenny, the siblings maintained a close relationship with their grandfather. Before his passing, he had set aside six percent of the company's shares to be divided equally among them.

When Justin returned to New Horizon for his education, Abby manipulated him. In a misguided attempt to reconcile the family, Justin invited their grandfather back to New Horizon, which backfired and angered the old man. Consequently, the grandfather decided to allocate shares only to Justin.

As for Jenny, she inherited her grandfather's antique collection and his assets outside the family business. This provision ensured she would have resources independent of the Ford family if she ever chose to leave.

Casey and other cousins received nothing from the inheritance, a consequence of their actions. Over the years, influenced by Abby, they had distanced themselves from their grandfather. In contrast, Jenny and Justin had remained steadfast in their relationship with him.

After their grandfather passed away and she returned to the Ford family, the assets he left her gave her the confidence and strength to stand up to Abby and others.

The rest of the family was extremely envious and coveted her shares. Even Abby hinted both subtly and openly, trying to get her to transfer her shares to Casey and hand over the antiques their grandfather left.

She feigned ignorance, deliberately letting the subtle cues pass unacknowledged. However, when pushed to her limit, she would respond with biting retorts.
